2. And appointed him head over all things for the church, as it is written, 'The head of every man is Christ; the head of the woman is the man; the head of Christ is God.' For in the church, the husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the head of the church; and the church is the fulness of him who filleth all with all, that the church may be the habitation of God through the Spirit. For this reason, the apostle, speaking of the church, says, 'The fulness of Christ.' The apostle, having said, 'The head of the man is Christ,' then concludes, 'The head of the woman is the man;' and after having said, 'The head of Christ is God,' concludes, 'The fulness of Christ.' And so he explains the things that are in the church, which are written, 'The fulness of him who filleth all with all.'

3. Who filleth all with all. — See Col. ii. 10. note 1. The fulness which Christ becometh on his members, are called, chap. iii. 19. 'the fulness of God,' because they all come from God. The persons who were more especially filled by Christ with his gifts, were his apostles, prophets, evangelists, etc. as mentioned chap. iv. 7-16. For explaining the expressions, 'the body of Christ,' and 'the fulness of all the fulness of him who filleth all with all,' Chrysostom says as follows: — 'A little from the fulness of the fulness, he filleth all with all; and so the apostles, after having filled the church with all the fulness, go on to fill the fulness of Christ; that is, they bring to perfection all things, which was the mystery of the fulness of Christ in the gathering together of all things in him.' And so, he concludes: 'The fulness of Christ filleth all with all.'

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines in this Chapter.

The apostle begins this chapter with observing, that even the Ephesians, though lying under the sentence of death on account of their trespasses and sins, Christ had filled with his gifts and graces, ver. 3; that he describes the character and behaviour of the Ephesians in their heathen state, to make them sensible, that notwithstanding the advantages which they pretended to have derived from the heathen mysteries, all the Gentiles, not excepting the initiated themselves, were deeply sunk in the grossest ignorance and wickedness, ver. 2; that they, like the Jews, had set themselves down in the holy places of the Christian church, wherein salvation is promised as a free gift to all, through faith, and had sealed that promise to them by the gifts of the spirit, ver. 6; that the fulness of Christ, or how the exceeding greatness of God's grace, may be encouraged to expect pardon upon repentance, ver. 7; that the Ephesians, that the admission, not of the Gentiles only, but even of the Jews, into the Christian church, and their having the promise of salvation through faith sealed to them, they were owing entirely to the unmerited benevolence of God, and not to their own good works, so that no one could boast of having secured salvation, ver. 8, 9. At the same time he told them expressly, that these great favours were bestowed on them to fit them for good works, ver. 10. The apostle having thus described the character and state of both Jews and Gentiles before their conversion, he desired the Gentiles to remember, that, in their heathen state, none of them, not even the initiated in the mysteries, had any knowledge of Christ the Saviour, or hope of the pardon of sin, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants, and without hope of pardon, nay, without the knowledge of the true God, ver. 11, 12. But now, by the pure favour of God, being sealed in Christ's church, they enjoyed such equal knowledge, and hopes, and privileges, as he could have wished for God's ancient people; for, though not circumcised, God had brought them nigh to himself, and to the Jews, by the blood of Christ, ver. 13. — who is the author of peace to both Jews and Gentiles, and made members of one church or fellowship, in which the true God is to be worshipped; having thrown down the Jewish peculiarities, which was the partition wall that had hitherto separated the Jews from the Gentiles, ver. 14. — and by the death of the flesh, hath taken away the cause of the enmity which subsisted between them, even the Levitical ordinances, that he might create the two into one new man, body, or well agreeing society, under himself as head or governor, thus making peace between them, ver. 15. — also that he might reconcile both in one body or visible church to God, having, through his cross, slain the cause of their enmity to God, even the wicked affections and passions of both, ver. 16. — and this peace with God, Christ preached by his apostles to the Gentiles, and to the Jews, ver. 17. — And therefore, through him, both have access in the Christian church to the worship of the Father of the universe, with hope of acceptance and pardon; a privilege much greater than any which the initiated in the heathen mysteries could claim, ver. 18. — Withal, that such of the saints, or priests of Diana, as were now become members of the 'fellowship of the mystery of God's will' by faith, and all in the province of Asia who formerly were employed about the temple of that idol, might have no cause to regret their having forsaken the apostle assured them, that they were no longer strangers to the covenants, and foreigners, as they had been, in the commonwealth of the true God, (see ver. 15.) but, by the knowledge and belief of the mystery of God's will, they became joint citizens in that commonwealth with the saints, and sons, belonging to the house, or visible church of God, as constituent parts of that great fabric, which is constructed for the use, not of the inhabitants of Asia alone, but of believers of all nations, the true saints of God, ver. 19. — For they were built upon the founda-

The apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone, ver. 20,—by which the whole building, consisting of Jews and Gentiles, being fittingly joined together, grew into an holy temple, for the Lord Jesus to officiate in as high-priest, ver. 21.—And in regard to the apostles and prophets, the foundations of the temple of God, were supernaturally fitted for their office, as is mentioned afterwards, (chap. iv. 7-11), that great temple of the Christian visible church, both in the manner in which it was built, and in the materials of which it is composed, as well as in its dimensions, described chap. iii. 18, greatly excelled the temple of Ephesus and at Jerusalem. Besides, being reared, not for the purpose of a ritual worship, and far less for celebrating the impires rites of an idol, like those performed in the temple of Diana, but for the holy spiritual worship of the true God according to the Christian manner, this temple greatly excelled the temple at Ephesus and at Jerusalem in the use for which it was built. To conclude, the apostle informs the Ephesians and the true believers in this great temple, the Christian church, in which the believing Jews also were built as constituent parts, is rendered glorious, not, like the temple at Ephesus, by the presence of a lifeless image of an idol, vainly pretended to have fallen down from Jupiter, nor even, like the ancient temple at Jerusalem, by any outward visible symbol of the presence of the true God; but by his real though invisible presence, filling every part of the fabric with the gifts and graces of his Spirit, ver. 22. See chap. i. 23, ii. 1.

By this grand figure the apostle hath taught us, that, under the gospel dispensation, the presence of God is not any longer manifested in a material temple, as under the Mosaic dispensation; neither is his worship limited to particular places and seasons; nor does it consist in ritual services. But any society of believers for worshipping God in spirit and in truth, is a real temple of God, because in that society prayers and praises are publicly offered to God. Nay, every individual believer is a temple, because God is always inwardly worshipped and praised by him. And with respect to the Ephesians in particular, since they were constituent parts of the great temple of God, the Christian church, their honour as the keepers of this temple, and as worshippers therein, was far greater than their honour as priests and worshippers of Diana; Nay, greater than it would have been, had they become priests and worshippers in the temple at Jerusalem.

Commentary.

2 In which trespasses and sins, before your conversion, ye walked according to the course of the heathen world, according to the prince of the power of the air, AND of the spirit which now inwardly worketh in the children of disobedience:—The trespasses and sins in which the Ephesians, before their conversion, walked as persons dead, were their idolatry, and the vices into which they were led by their idolatry. The Ephesians were dead likewise by trespasses and sins, as they were living under the sentence of death for their trespasses and sins. But being filled by Christ with his gifts and graces, the ungodly dead and dead in sins were delivered from the sentence of death. Trespasses are those sins which are committed through blindness or unbelief. Sin is the condition of the child of disobedience. The Greek word for trespass, trespasses, or lapsus, is used to denote Adam and Eve's first transgression, Rom. v. 12, but most strictly those acts of disobedience which are committed deliberately and habitually. It signifies signifies that continued idolatry and wickedness to which the heathens universally were addicted, as plain from the following second verse.

3 With whom also we all had our conversation formerly in the lusts of our flesh, doing the inclinations of the flesh and of the imaginations, and were by nature children of wrath, even as others.

Ver. 1.—1. Even ye hath filled,—I agree with Chandler in opinion, that this verse is strictly connected with the last clause of the last verse of the preceding chapter; and that the words necessary to complete this verse, are to be taken from that clause, and not from the following fifth verse, as our translators have done; 'Even ye have been filled, (namely, with his spiritual gifts and influences), who were dead. 2. Dead in trespasses and sins:—For sin, or sinfulness, are the causes of the death of the soul. Adam was created a living soul, and was commanded to the contrary; the transgressions and sins in which the Ephesians, before their conversion, walked as persons dead, were their idolatry, and the vices into which they were led by their idolatry. The Ephesians were dead likewise by trespasses and sins, as they were living under the sentence of death for their trespasses and sins. EPHESIANS.

4 But God being exceedingly liberal in the exercise of his mercy, through his great love with which he loved us ancient people, 5 Even as Jews, who like the Gentiles were spiritually dead through the power of their trespasses, he hath made alive together (ἐν Χριστῷ, 25.) by Christ; (by grace ye are saved); 6 And hath raised us up together, and (ἀφέσε, transitive) hath set us down together in the heavenly places (ὑπὸ) by Christ Jesus; (see ver. 5, note.) 7 That he might show (ἐν αὐτῷ) to the ages which are to come, the exceeding greatness of his bounteous grace, by his goodness, not of yourselves; 8 For by grace ye are saved through faith; (ἀποκάλεσθαι) this affair is not of yourselves; 9 For there is the gift of God; 10 Nor by works, (ἐνσω, 175.) so that no one can boast. 11 For 98. Yet we are his workmanship, 12 Christ; (ἐκ) the Meredith and W. Germain MSS. and Vulgate have here ἐκ, with grace ye are saved); 13 And were by nature children of wrath—Nature often signifies man’s ignorance and education: Gal. ii. 14. We are Jews by nature—Also men’s natural reason and conscience: Rom. xi. 11. 14. The Gentiles who have not a law, do by nature the things of the law, whereas, &c.—Also the general sense and practice of mankind: 1 Cor. xi. 11. Hath not even nature itself taught you that if a man have long hair, &c.—Also the original constitution of any thing: Gal. ii. 14. Who are not gods by nature—Also a disposition formed by custom or habit: Thus Despina Thalidou was the Sycamore, Πηλικώσίας Μαρίνας ὁ ταχεύτων, "The Sycamore is no thing you speak short."

5. Hath raised us up together, and hath set us down together, in the heavenly places by Christ Jesus.—Since understand this of the resurrection of believers from the dead, and of their introduction into the enjoyment of grace in the presence of God, as their head and representative.—Others understand it of the resurrection of believers themselves at the last day. See note 5, ver. 10. 11. That is, to the ages which are to come, &c.—This sentiment the apostle expresses here not only i. 1, 2, but also note 3. on that verse. 2. The exceeding riches of his grace, by his goodness, &c.—The great blessings bestowed on Jews and Gentiles by Christ, are not the external privileges of the gospel only, but the blessings of pardon, justification, and eternal life, promised to all who believe. 3. Nor by works, &c.—Because being referred to the Ephesians in general, that circumstance, as well as the communication itself, by the Ephesians being saved, to understand their being delivered from the ignorance and wickedness of their former state, in which sense the word saved is used likewise Rom. xi. 26. 3. But, 3. 9.—It is equally true of our eternal salvation, that it is not of ourselves, but by grace: For we do not merit salvation—it is the gift of God. 2. And this is not of yourselves.—The relative clause, as Chandler observes, being in the manner quod, cannot stand for sæc. faith, which is future; but it has the whole sentence which goes before, as its antecedent. To show this, I have supplied τί εἰσίν, &c., which means, &c., of this affair, namely, your salvation through faith, is not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.—See note 9. 3. Or, though such things should to some refer to Christ’s death, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for him; An opportunity hath been given you to believe and suffer, and grace to enable you to do both. Some ancient MSS. instead of τί εἰσίν, you have here, κανένα, &c., which Yule thinks is the true reading. 3. Nor by works, &c.—The translation τί εἰσίν, in our Bibles, represents God as appointing our works to be the evidence of our faith described ver. 2. Consequently, it is the making alive of their spirits of which he speaks, and not of their bodies: This making alive of the Jews, Christ accomplished by enlightening their understanding, invigorating their mental powers, subduing their passions, and directing their affections to right objects.—The common translation renders the Jews as made alive with Christ. But it is certain that Christ never spired... created (e. 167.) through Christ Jesus (see) unto good works; for which God before prepared us, that we should walk in them.

11 Wherefore remember, that ye were formerly Gentiles by the flesh, who are called uncircumcision, by which is called circumcision made with hands on the flesh;

12 And that ye were at that time without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, (see Rom. iv. 4), not having hope, and without God in the world:

13 But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who formerly were far off, are brought nigh (e. 167.) through the blood of Christ.

14 For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of separation; works, because through the preaching of the gospel, and the influences of Christ's Spirit accompanying it, men are made alive from the spiritual death, and enabled to do good works. This creation of believers through Christ Jesus unto good works, Taylor, in his key prefixed to Romans, No. 29, under-stands the formation of the believing church, under the government of Christ, because in the Christian church believers enjoy the greatest advantages for performing good works; and because this formation of the church is termed, ver. 15, a creation of Jews and Gentiles into one new man under Christ. The same account is given of the making men alive, mentioned ver. 5. Others, however, with more reason think, that one's enjoying in the Christian church great advantages for becoming alive, and for doing good works, is not the whole of what the apostle means by being made alive, and by being created unto good works; but that these phrases include the operation of the Holy Spirit in making men alive, and in enabling them to do good works, by means of the advantages which they enjoy in the Christian church. For which God before prepared us. This is the literal translation of διὰ τῆς οἰκονόμης ἡμῶν διὰ τοῦ θεοῦ. So that the rendering in our Bibles, namely, 'which God hath before ordained, is utterly wrong. - If the preparation here spoken of is thought to have happened before the believing Jews and Gentiles heard the gospel, it may signify that operation of God upon the minds of those who are sincere in their religion, by which he inclines them to do good works.

15. Called uncircumcision, that is, uncircumcised persons. By the same figure of speech, 'made the righteousness of God,' ver. 31, signifies made righteous persons in the sight of God. See Rom. iv. 17.

2. Circumcision made with hands on the flesh. By this description of circumcision, the apostle puts his readers in mind of the inward circumcision, the circumcision of the heart made by the Spirit of God, of which the outward circumcision was only an emblem, Rom. ii. 29, and manifested that the Jews had no reason to boast of the outward circumcision, unless it was accompanied with the circumcision of the heart.

Ver. 12. Without God in the world. - In their heathen state, the Ephesians had not the true God for the object of their worship, and were ignorant both of the nature of God, and of these commandments.

Ver. 13. Who were formerly far off, are brought nigh. - It alludes to Eph. i. 19. Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near, with the Lord. - Luke xvi. 10. 'Two men went up into the temple to pray. - 13. And the publican standing afar off, etc. See also Paul xlii. 14. Ver. 14. - He is our peace,-that is, the author of our peace; the effect being put for the cause. 1 Thes. ii. 20. 'Ye are our glory and joy, that is, the cause of our glory and joy.

2. Who hath made both one. - The union of the Jews and Gentiles, so as to make them one people, was formerly so hard, (clay xxii. 22.) under the idea of making Judah and Israel licensious one nation, which was to be governed by David their king. - ver. 29. 'David my servant shall be king over them, and they shall have one shepherd.' Hence our Lord says, John x. 26. 'Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold. - And they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold, one shepherd.'

3. And hath broken down the middle wall of separation. - Because the Jews were separated from all other nations, and made the people of God exclusively by the law of Moses, the apostle says that law 'the middle wall of separation,' in allusion to the wall called Chez, which separated the court of the Israelites from the court of the Gentiles. Further, he observes, that God hath broken down that wall, hath abolished the law of Moses with its rites, which could be performed nowhere but in the temple of Jerusalem; and that by proclaiming the gospel, a spiritual form of worship, which may be performed everywhere, he hath joined Jews and Gentiles in one church, and made them all one people of God. Now this happy union could not have taken place, if the law of Moses had been continued. For the worship of God being limited by Moses to the temple at Jerusalem, the greatest part of the Gentiles could not come to Jerusalem to worship with the Jews.

Ver. 15. And hath abolished (w) by his flesh. - His flesh may signify either his coming in the flesh, or his death in the flesh. Understand it of the latter, because in other passages we are told, that an end was put to the law of Moses by Christ's death. See ver. 16.

2. The enmity, or cause of the enmity. The enmity which subsisted between the Jews and Gentiles, was the enmity of the Jews; for the rites of Moses were so odious to the Gentiles, as the rites of heathenism were to the Jews. Esther iii. 8. Their laws are divers from all people, neither keep they their laws, (Deut. xii. 10.) and they account as profane, everything held sacred by us. This enmity between the Jews and Gentiles was so great, that the Jews not only excluded the Gentiles from their temple, and from their homes, but they would not enter the house of any heathen, or converse with him familiarly. So Peter told Cornelius, Acts x. 28. According to what is said by Bengelius, this clause should be translated 'hath abolished the 17 And coming, he brought good tidings of peace to you the far off, and to us the nigh.

18 (Col. 255). Therefore, through him, we have introduction, both of us, (w) by one Spirit to the Father.

19 Well, then, ye are (saw, 193) not now strangers and foreigners, but joint citizens with the saints, (as seen) belonging to the house of God:

20 Being built up on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the bottom corner-stone;

law of the common-rooms by precepts, namely, the precepts of the gospel. See Matt. 4:1. But as a stone comes from a word which signifies to seem good, or to be agreeable to one's own ideas, precepts denote a precept, or an injunction founded in the mere pleasure of the person who enjoins it; accordingly, it is used to denote Augustus's decree concerning the taxing, Luke c. 1. In like manner, men's obsequies, or literary injunctions of the Pythagorean philosophy, is called dignitizing, Col. ii. 10. Wherefore are the ritual ordinances of Moses, being founded in the pleasure of God, are called by Moses, [in every place, i.e., everywhere manifested.] But this name cannot be applied with propriety to the precepts of the gospel, which are all founded in the nature and reasons of things. In the Syriac version, the preposition is translated with, so as to give the following sense: He hath abolished the law of the commandments, together with the ordinances which it enjoined.

4. Concerning ordinances.—The ordinances of the law, being designed to keep the Jews separated from the rest of mankind, that they might preserve the privileges of God concerning Christ; these are also to preclude the blessings which God was to bestow on all nations through Christ's death—thereby every appointment to continue only till Christ came and died as a sacrifice for sin. After his death there was no longer any occasion to continue the ordinances and figure of the law, which were the cause of the enmity that had so long subsisted between the Jews and Gentiles. Wherefore they were all abolished at Christ's death, according to Daniel's prophecy, in xxiii. 28. 'Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people—to make reconciliation for iniquity, &c.' Hence, in allusion to Daniel's prophecy, and to the other preachers relating to himself, our Lord, before he was crucified, cried with a loud voice, 'It is finished.' And the apostle Paul, rightly understanding the influence of Christ's death in abolishing the Mosaic institutions, as far as they had a relation to religion, told the Corinthians, chap. ii. 11. 'Christ hath blotted out the handwriting of ordinances with his blood,' and in his blessed state 'nailed it to the cross,' that all might see that it was blotted out. See Col. ii. 11, note 5. So that from the time of Christ's death, the law had no influence, either to make or to continue the enmity of the people of God—but through the death of Christ abolished the law of Moses, as the law of God's temporal dominion over the Jews, it remained in its full force as the municipal law of Judæa, the government making in its civil laws, as being inconsistent with national, which were not contrary to piety or morality. The Jews, therefore, after the death of Christ, were still bound, as before, to observe the institutions of Moses, as the law of their state. Hence the apostle told the Corinthians, 1 Cor. vi. 19. 'Hath any orcunstructed one been called, let him not be unequipped.' See Preface to the Galatians, sect. 1. No. 3. 3. End of paragraph.

Ver. 16.—1. Reconcile both in one body. —The Latins also used the word corpus, body, to denote a number of men united together by a common interest, and governed by the same laws. See the Office, &c.

To, God, having slain the enmity by it. —The reconciliation described in this verse, being the reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles to God, the enmity which is said to have been slain by the cross of Christ, is that which subsisted between God and them, through the corruption of their nature. But the creation of the two into one new man, mentioned ver. 15, being the uniting of Jews and Gentiles into one new man, signifies the same. See the Office, &c. In that verse as abolished, was the hatred which the Jews and Gentiles have to one another on account of the idea of worship peculiar to each. Hence the propriety of the expressions used by the apostle. In the one case it is, having abolished the enmity, namely, men's hatred and sinful passions, (ver. 15) and in the other, 'having slain the enmity,' namely, men's hatred and sinful passions, the cause of the enmity; and in the other, 'having slain the enmity,' namely, men's hatred and sinful passions, (ver. 15) and in the other, 'having slain the enmity,' namely, men's hatred and sinful passions, the cause of the enmity. In other passages of scripture, likewise, these great effects are ascribed to the cross of Christ; and particularly, our sweet passions are with much propriety said to be crucified with Christ, Rom. vi. 6; Gal. vi. 14. For all of the arguments that can be offered to persuade sinners to return to God, through the atonement of Christ, are the most powerful. It is the greatest expression of the love of God to sinners; as a propitiation for sin, it gives present believers the sure hope of.
EPHESIANS.

21 By which chief corner-stone, the whole building being fitly joined together, as the walls of an house by the corner-stone in the foundation, growseth, by the accession of new converts, into an holy temple for the Lord Jesus to officiate in as high-priest.

22 In which temple, ye Jews also are built together with the Gentiles, to be an habitation for God, not by any visible symbol of his presence, as anciently, but by the indwelling of the Spirit, who is bestowed on you in the plenteous of his gifts, both ordinary and extraordinary.

In our learned and elegant apostle, that through an enemy to this mechanical spirit of religion in the Ephesians, yet, according to his known character, he accommodated himself to their humour, and the natural turn of their enthusiasm, by writing to his converts in a kind of archaic style, and almost with a perpetual allusion to building, and to that majesty, order, and beauty, of which their temple was a masterpiece. His lordship, however, is mistaken in supposing that St. Paul, in this noble figurative passage, accommodated himself to the peculiar enthusiasm of the Ephesians. For before this, in writing to the Corinthians, he affirmed, that their body was a temple of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. vi. 19; and ch. iii. 11, 12, he represented the Christian church as a temple of God.—Ver. 16. 'Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?'—Ver. 17. 'Which temple ye are,'—Nor is this doctrine peculiar to Paul. It was taught by Peter likewise. For he represents Christians as living stones, built upon Christ, so as to be a spiritual temple. Nay, it was taught long before by Ezekiel, who hath given a figure of the Christian church, under the figure of a great temple, chap. xli. 4.

Wherefore, although the apostle in this noble description alluded to the temple of Diana, it was not for the purpose of accommodating himself to the peculiar enthusiasm of the Ephesians, but to display that enthusiasm. The whole body of citizens of Ephesus gloried exceedingly in the honour which their city derived from being adorned with so magnificent a structure; and were intoxicated with the splendour of the worship which was performed therein. The apostle, therefore, to lessen their admiration of that famous temple, and to wean them from the worship of the heathen image of an idol, with great propriety addressed them, that the Christian church was a temple much more magnificent and beautiful, being built, not upon the foundation of wooden piles driven deep in the earth, like the temple of Diana, see chap. iii. 17, but upon the more sure foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the bottom corner-stone. That this great temple is built, not of stones and other building materials, but of living men, whose minds are purified by faith; and that it is dedicated, not to any idol, but to the living and true God, who fills every part of it with his presence, ch. iii. 19, and is worshipped in it, not by the ceremonies that are used in the temple of Diana, but by holy affections and virtuous actions, produced in the worshippers by the operation of the Spirit.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

The apostle having formerly shewed, that the Gentiles, though uncircumcised, are predestinated to the adoption of sons unto God, chap. i. 5, and have redemption through Christ's blood, chap. i. 7, and, as the sons of God, are heirs of heaven, chap. i. 11, and made into one church with the Jews, so as to grow together into an holy temple for the Lord to officiate in, chap. ii. 21; he, in this chapter, informed the Ephesians, that his doctrine concerning the Gentiles was so offensive to the Jews, that it had occasioned his imprisonment, first at Caesarea, and then at Rome, ver. 1.—But he assured them, and all in the province of Asia who were not acquainted with his apostolic commission, ver. 2.—That by revelation God had made that doctrine known to him, as he had before told them in few words, chap. i. 8, 9. And to recommend it to the Ephesians, and the other brethren in Asia, he termed it, 'The mystery,' ver. 3.; and 'The Mystery of Christ,' ver. 4.—And observed, that in other generations it was not made known to the sons of men, as it is now made known to his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, ver. 5.—The short account of which mystery is this, that the Gentiles are joint heirs with the Jews, and a joint body, and joint partakers of God's promise concerning Christ; that is, of all the blessings promised to the spiritual seed of Abraham through Christ, ver. 6.—Which therefore he terms, 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' ver. 8.—These riches the apostle was appointed, not to conceal, but to publish, that all men might know what a grand, and holy, and glorious, and advantageous society, the fellowship of the mystery of God and of Christ is, which is now established by the building of the Christian church, ver. 9.—Nay, he assured the Ephesians, that the angelic hosts themselves have acquired a more comprehensive idea of the multiform wisdom of God, through 'the fellowship of the mystery' or church, ver. 10.—As it is now constituted, according to the arrangement which, from the beginning, God had made of the dispensations of religion, to prepare the world for the coming of Christ Jesus, ver. 11.—Next, as one of the chief privileges which all the members of the fellowship of the mystery of Christ enjoy in the present constitution of the church, the apostle mentioned liberty of praying to God through the mediation of Christ, and access to his presence at all times, with assurance of being heard, ver. 12.

But, as the apostle was now about to maintain the before-mentioned doctrine concerning the Gentiles, he entreated the Ephesians not to be discouraged on account of his sufferings for them, which were their glory, ver. 13.—And told them, that his history of God and of Christ, the Head of the fellowship of the mystery, might dwell in the hearts of the Ephesians through faith; and that, as constituent parts of the temple of God, being rooted and founded in the love of Christ, they might be able to comprehend with all the saints, the different dimensions of that great fabric, the church, which is the temple of God, composed of believers of all nations, ver. 14.—And, as constituent part of the temple of God, be themselves filled with all the fulness of God, ver. 19.

 Commentary.

CHAP. III.—1 For the sake of this doctrine, that the Gentiles are predestinated to the adoption of sons (chap. i. 5.), and are made one church with the Jews, I Paul am a prisoner belonging to Christ Jesus, on account of you Gentiles.

2 Ye cannot doubt of my being imprisoned for you Gentiles, seeing ye have heard of the grace of God, which was given me on your account, to preach the gospel to you, without requiring you to obey the law of Moses:

3 That by revelation God made known to me the great secret concerning the Gentiles, (see ver. 5.), as I wrote before in few words.

4 By which, when ye read it, together with the preceding, ye may perceive more perfectly than ever by my former preaching, how well-founded, and how complete, my knowledge of the mystery of Christ respecting the Gentiles is;

5 Which mystery in former times was not made known to the sons of men, in the full, particular, and clear manner in which it is now revealed to the holy apostles and prophets of Christ, by the inspiration of the Spirit; (see Col. i. 26. note 5.).

6 Namely, that the Gentiles, without obedience to the law of Moses, should, by faith, be joint heirs with the Jews of the heavenly inheritance, and a joint body with them, and joint partakers of God's promise concerning the blessing of the nations in Christ, through the gospel;

7 Of which gospel I was made a minister by Christ himself, who

Ver. 1. On account of you Gentiles.—The apostle mentions his imprisonment for preaching the privileges of the Gentiles, to convince the Ephesians that he firmly believed what he preached concerning the Gentiles. From the account which Luke hath given, Acts xviii. 12, it appears that he had been conveyed from Damascus to Caesarea, and there met with Aquila and Priscilla, who, according to their profession, were of the professional order of prophets. On his conversion, he was circumcised and went to Jerusalem, Acts x. 6. With him also was a certain Virtus, a Roman, Acts xii. 25, who wrote to him. And by him he wrote to the Galatians, who, we may suppose, were well acquainted with the apostle and his apostolic counsellor. The same address he used in writing to the Galatians, who were his converts, and well acquainted with his apostleship, Gal. i. 12. 'For ye have heard of my conversation in times past.'

Ver. 2. Seeing ye have heard of the dispensation. —I. If the particle τοῦ, in this passage, is translated with or, as I have done, and as it will be best to translate, (see chap. iv. 21), what the apostle may say will apply to the Ephesians, who, in Donel, were well acquainted with his prophetic and apostolic counsellor. The same addresses may be considered as proposed to the Ephesians, who, in that case, were the same apostle, observing the nature of the Spirit, Rom. i. 5. It may be observed here, the apostle speaks of his apostleship, as existing in what is called the dispensation of the grace of God, Acts xix. 20, and one of the things particularly in which he was so employed was to declare the grace of God, by preaching the gospel, in few words; Acts xx. 27. For he says, Acts xxvii. 23, 'I have had many tribulations by the Jews in many cities, preach the gospel, and was almost ready to give up the ghost.' The grace of God is that which the apostle sought to communicate. This grace was contained in few words, as the apostle himself testifies, Acts xxvii. 23, 'I have had many tribulations by the Jews in many cities, preach the gospel, and was almost ready to give up the ghost.' The grace of God is that which the apostle sought to communicate. This grace was contained in few words, as the apostle himself testifies, Acts xxvii. 23, 'I have had many tribulations by the Jews in many cities, preach the gospel, and was almost ready to give up the ghost.'

Ver. 3. By which, when ye read it. —The apostle means, that by reading what he had formerly written, and what he was now writing, concerning his having received the knowledge of the mystery of God's will by revelation, the Ephesians might perceive, that although the dispensation of the grace of God, which was given him on the account of the Gentiles, was the dispensation of the grace of God, by which he was employed to predict the salvation of the Gentiles, at the same time, that the Gentiles were made joint heirs with the Jews of the inheritance promised to Abraham and his seed, and one body or church with the Jews, and partakers of his promise concerning Christ, by faith, without being circumcised, is called a mystery, for the reason mentioned chap. i. 9. note 2. From what I understand here, and in other passages, concerning the revelation which was made to him of this mystery, Locke, in his preface to the Ephesians, infers, that although the other apostles knew the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses, all of them, except Paul, were ignorant of the then understood he was made free from it, and that he himself was a disciple of the Galatians. In this case, Paul, as he was mistaken. For Paul, himself, expressly affirms chap. iii. 5., that the mystery of which he speaks is 'revealed to the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit.' Besides, what is said Acts xii. 31, on which he builds his whole argument, does not imply that the Gentiles were admitted into the dispensation of the grace of God, as a condition of their salvation; but it is necessary to their entrance into the dispensation of Jewish privileges, in which Paul did agree with him. And, therefore, to show that he never taught the Jews to break the law of Moses as the municipal law of Judea, he performed the rites which were prescribed by the law, under the influence of his own conscience, Acts xxiii. 3; and of his being converted, 'I was broken down.' The apostle, therefore, had good reason to affirm, that the mystery of Christ was not made known, although as it was revealed to him and to the other holy apostles, and prophets of Christ.
Ephesians

8 Unto me, I say, who am less than the least of all the saints, was this grace (ver. 7) given, to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ?

9 And to make all men see what the fellowship is, of the mystery, which was hid from the ages, and from the fathers, 10 To whom now to the governments and to the principalities and to the powers in the unseen world, who now rule over the inhabitants of the earth: 11 According to the disposition of the ages (στατικές τῆς ημέρας) which he made for Christ: 12 Except whom we have liberty of speech, (see Eph. ii. 18, note) and with confidence through the faith of his name.

13 Therefore, I beseech you, that ye faint not at my afflictions (κεκοιμημένοι) for you, which is your glory.

Ver. 8—1. Who am less than the least of all the saints: 2. This is a comparative formed from the superlative, the force of which is, it is difficult to express in the English language. Paul speaks of himself in the humble manner, compared with the others apostles and ministers of the word, called the saints. Eph. vi. 12, note 5. 3. An on his being born formerly a blasphemer of Christ, a persecutor of his disciples, and exceedingly injurious in the sight of all the church. Acts vii. 58. 4. To preach the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. 5. These unsearchable perfections, which are the secrets of Christ, are the only truths in which they render the present state perfectly happy. See ver. 10, note. 6. Here, and in the whole of this verse, it is extremely important to note that the word fellowship is used in a spiritual sense throughout. The word fellowship does not mean simply being united to the church. It is a word of relationship, of the relationship in Christ.

Ver. 12. Except whom we have liberty of speech, (see Eph. ii. 18, note) and with confidence through the faith of his name. 4. The word confidence has an interesting history. It comes from the Greek word εμπιστοσύνη, which means confidence or confidence in a person or thing. This word is used in the New Testament to refer to the confidence that one has in God and his promises.

Ver. 13. Therefore I beseech you, that ye faint not at my afflictions (κεκοιμημένοι) for you, which is your glory. 1. The words translated by Greek word κοιμημένοι, properly denote the manner of death, in which a person dies, being either in unconsciousness or in execution. In the latter sense it is used in Heb. ii. 2, to denote the placing of the soul in the state in which it is before the judicial process. It is a word of various significations. Here, in the sense, it denotes the death of the body, by which the body is made manifest in the flesh, and preached to the world. All these deaths or dispensations of the apostle Paul, that were spread forth to the world through the Gospel, are to be understood as the deaths of the body, by which the body is made manifest in the flesh, and preached to the world as such.

Ver. 15. Confident in the faith of Christ. 1. On this clause, Blass remarks that confidence, or assurance of acceptance, is the effect of our faith, as the apostle here affirms, it cannot be the cause of faith, as some ignorantly and dangerously suppose. 2. Ver. 15. Translate: "Confident in the faith of Christ."
EPHESIANS.

14 For the sake of this, I bow my knees to the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 15 From whom the whole family in heaven, and upon earth, is named, 16 Praying, That according to the riches of his glory, he would grant you to be mightily strengthened through His Spirit, (w. 141.) in the inward man: 17 That Christ may dwell (is) through faith in your hearts; and being rooted and founded in love, 18 That ye may be thoroughly able to comprehend, with all the saints, what is the breadth, and length, and height, and depth, 19 And to know the love of Christ, which surpasseth knowledge: Also, that ye may be filled (w. 143.) with all the fulness of God, 20 (a) Now, to him who is able to do exceeding abundantly (is) all that we ask or think, according to the power which strongly worketh in us.

false, comes, as Beza observes, from αὐτός, order, to give way, to draw back; and signifies to believe as a coward in time of battle, by deserting one's place or post.

2. My affections for you, (ὑπέρ) which is your glory. The relative τις being placed between two nouns, αὐτός and ἐν, the one in the plural, and the other in the singular number, it may, according to the idiom both of the Hebrew and Greek languages, be made to agree with either. Here it agrees with ἐν, which is in the singular number.

Ver. 14. Of our Lord Jesus Christ. These words are wanting in the Alexandr. MS. and in some of the ancient versions. And Jerome in his commentary tells us that they were wanting in the Greek copies, and were added by the Latins. Mill acknowledges that they were not to be placed before Jesus' time, but not in all; for they are in the most ancient Clementine MS. and in the Vulgate version, and that their meaning is agreeable to the apostle's doctrine in this and in his other epistles, concerning the dominion of Christ. I add, that the doubled words are in the first Syriac, as they are in the Latin, the latter of these in the sense of the following verse; which, according to the propriety of the Greek language, may be rendered οὕτως, χάρις. So it is expressed in the Syriac. For, because the relative οὗτος may refer to him, and not to the nearest antecedent, our Lord Jesus Christ, See Ex. iv. 65.

Ver. 15. The whole family. The word ἡγέω, family, signifies a number of people sprung from one father, and living together in one place. Here it signifies all rational creatures, called the family of God, because they derive their being from him, and are supported by him.

In heaven, and upon earth, is named. The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ being here declared the Father of all the intelligent beings in the universe, the heathen divinities are expressly excluded from having any hand in the creation and preservation, either of angels or of men. Further, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ being the maker and governor of all rational beings, he is the object of their worship; and, on that account, is infinitely greater than Diana, the idol of the Ephesians, whose highest praise was, 'that all Asia and the world worshipped her;' Acts x. 28, as their mother and protector, Eph. ii. 21, note 3. Some think the apostle, in this passage, condemns likewise the false of the Simonians and Valentinians, concerning the origin of things.

Ver. 16. That Christ may dwell through faith in your hearts. The apostle had called the church the 'temple of God.' chap. ii. 21. Here, he represents every individual believer as the habitation of Christ, who came from heaven that he might rule in the hearts of men. And surely the indwelling of Christ in our hearts, by the faith of his doctrines and promises, is a much greater honour than that which the sacred image of Diana was said to possess, through the residence of an image of Diana, falsely reported to have fallen down from heaven, Acts xiv. 28. So the apostle makes a better appeal from evil than the veneration of that idol pretended to possess, by carrying about her shrine, mentioned Acts xiv. 29.

Ver. 17. And being rooted and founded in love. Ye cannot have, as it appears, the idea of the place from the Greek word ἀκυρωματίζειν, founded, here used in its literal signification, agreeably to the apostle's representation of the Christian church as the temple of God, built not of stones, but of men who believe and obey the gospel. See ver. 18, note.

Ver. 18. What is the breadth, and length, and height, and depth. Those are properties of a building, and are applied to the Christian church as a temple, in allusion, as Ulianus observes, to the temple of Diana, which Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. xxxvi. c. 14. tells us, being built on a wholly ground, uncommon pains were taken to secure a proper foundation for it. Its length was 265 feet, and its breadth 250; it was supported by 107 pillars, each of them 60 feet high; it was built at the expense of all Asia, and 20 years were spent in finishing it. With this magnificent fabric, the apostle here, as in chap. ii. 20—22, tacitly compared the vastly nobler fabric of the Christian church, whose dimensions are unspeakably greater, being composed of believers of all nations, of the Greek copies before Jerome's time, but not in all; for they are in the most ancient Clementine MS. and in the Vulgate version, and that their meaning is agreeable to the apostle's doctrine in this and in his other epistles, concerning the dominion of Christ. I add, that the doubled words are in the first Syriac, as they are in the Latin, the latter of these in the sense of the following verse; which, according to the propriety of the Greek language, may be rendered οὕτως, χάρις. So it is expressed in the Syriac. For, because the relative οὗτος may refer to him, and not to the nearest antecedent, our Lord Jesus Christ, See Ex. iv. 65.

Ver. 19. To know the love of Christ, which surpasseth knowledge. This prayer doth not imply any contradiction. Though the love of Christ be great, that it cannot be comprehended by the understanding of men, the apostle, with great propriety, prayed that the Ephesians might be made to know as much of it as the insufficiency of their faculties permitted them to know, in order to their being sensible of the wisdom and power of God in gathering the Christian church, not only from among the Jews, but from among the idolatrous Gentiles also; and knowing the members of that church such unspeakable privileges.

Ver. 20. Now, to him who is able to do exceeding abundantly (is) all that we ask or think, according to the power which strongly worketh in us. —The change which the Ephesians had already experienced, not only in their views of things, but in their temper, and disposition, through the strong working of the power of God in them, was a sufficient foundation on which to build their hope of receiving all the blessings promised to EPHESIANS.

21 To him as glory by the church (w. 67.) for Christ Jesus, throughout all the endless successions of ages. Amen.

them in the gospel; and particularly, the blessing of a glorious resurrection to an eternal life of happiness with God in heaven.

Ver. 21-1. To him be glory by the church for Christ Jesus. The mediation of Christ being to end when he delivers up the kingdom to the Father, the glory to be ascribed to God by the church through all eternity, is not to be given through the mediations of Christ, but it is to be given for Christ, that is, for having saved the church by his death, his resurrection, and his government, as mediator. Wherefore, the proper translation of this clause is not, by or through Christ, but for Christ.

This sublime doctrine is to be considered, not only as a strong expression of the apostle's admiration of God's goodness to men, but also as a means of strengthening the faith of the Ephesians. For lest the great blessings which the apostle had taught them to expect, might seem too much for sinful creatures to receive, and more than God would be willing to bestow on them, he unde the doctrinal part of his epistle, in which these blessings are described, a doxology to God, as both able and willing to bestow on believers blessings far and greater than they are able to ask, or even to conceive.

2 Throughout all the endless successions of ages. He repeats the word the, after the word in, literally, throughout all the generations of the life of ages. Blackwell has translated it by the, i.e. c. 2. 2. 4, 7. "The variety and emphasis of the elegant and sublime repetitions in the third and last verses of this chapter, cannot be realized in any translation," and adds, "that it is equal to that celebrated passage in Numbers, wherein he describes, in a sort variety of synonymous words, the utter overthrow of the Israelites, and the forces in Canaan, in the following manner:—In all respects they were entirely defeated, and they suffered no small mischief in any particular, but they were cut off with an universal destruction, both army and fleet; there was nothing but what perished."

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Precepts delivered in this Chapter, as founded on the foregoing Discoveries.

The great discoveries in the foregoing part of this epistle, to which the apostle hath given the appellation of the mystery of God, and of Christ, were set forth by him, not merely for the purpose of enlightening the Ephesians from the vain mysteries of their idol gods, and of fixing them in the belief and profession of the gospel; but also for giving them an elevation of sentiment and affection becoming those whose minds were enlightened with the knowledge of the mystery of God's will; and, at the same time, for leading them to a right behaviour in all the relations of life wherein they were placed. Accordingly, as a proper introduction to the excellent summary of morality contained in the remaining chapters of this epistle, the apostle, from the consideration of the great privileges which the Ephesians enjoyed in the Christian fellowship, earnestly besought them to live in a manner worthy of the calling by which they were called; that is, of the honourable appellations bestowed on them by God since their admission into the Christian fellowship, ver. 1. And first of all, he commanded them to assist each other when in distress, from a principle of love, ver. 2. and to live together in peace, because the disciples of the initiated into the mystery of God, make one body or society, are animated by one Spirit, have one hope of their calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God, the supreme ruler of the universe, ver. 3-6. whereas, none of the heathen fellowships had any such bonds of union, leading them to consult each other's interest. Next he informed them, that for the right instruction and government of this well united body, or fellowship, various supernatural gifts were distributed to the different members thereof, by Christ the head of the fellowship, ver. 7. And from Paul, ix. viii. proved, that the power of distributing these gifts to men, was conferred on Christ as the reward of his death, ver. 8. and in confusion of the unbelieving Jews, who affirmed that the Christ was never to die, John xii. 34. he told them, that the expression in the Psalm, "He ascended high," implies Messiah's descent from heaven and death on earth, ver. 9. 10. Then observed, that by these gifts some were fitted to be Apostles, some Prophets, some Evangelists, and some Pastors and Teachers, ver. 12. in order that they might build the church of Christ, ver. 13. Wherefore, the fellowship of the mystery of God was a much more excellent and better regulated society than any of the heathen fellowships, on account of the extraordinary endowments possessed by its directors and teachers. But, lest the Ephesians might think that the miraculous gifts, with which Christ had endowed the directors and teachers in his fellowship, were always to remain, the apostle told them, they were to continue only till the doctrines and precepts of the gospel were so well understood, and the church had arrived at such maturity, that it could subsist by its own vigour without any supernatural aid, ver. 13, 14. In the mean time, he commanded the whole teachers of the Christian fellowship to speak to the people the true doctrines of the gospel from love, that they might adhere closely to Christ the head of the body or fellowship, by holding the doctrine delivered to them by those teachers whom he had inspired and authorized, ver. 15, 16.

Having thus explained the bonds by which the members of the fellowship of the mystery of God are united, the principles by which they are actuated, the supernatural gifts with which many of them were endowed, especially those who were appointed to instruct and direct the whole body, and the duty of those who were appointed by Christ instructors, St. Paul, as an inspired apostle or mystagogue of the mystery of God, in the name and by the authority of Christ, the head of the fellowship, commanded the Ephesians to relinquish the vices which prevailed among the idolatrous Gentiles, and particularly, no longer to walk as the other Gentiles walked, in the foolishness of their minds. For although the Gentiles boasted that their mysteries were the only true wisdom, and the only effectual support of the soul, they were in reality foolishness, and led those who were guided by them into every kind of sensuality, ver. 17, 19. contrary both to the doctrine and to the example of Christ, ver. 20, 21. Likewise, he commanded them to lay aside all their former lusts, and to be renewed in their mind after the image of God, which, he told them, consists in righteousness and true holiness; an idea of God very different from the representations of the heathen gods given in the mysteries, ver. 22, 24. and particularly, to abstain from lying, anger, theft, and obscene discourse; because these vices grieved the Spirit of God, who had sealed or marked them as persons belonging to the fellowship of Christ, and who were to be saved, ver. 25, 30. Then a second time prohibited anger in all its modes, and enjoined kindness, and forgiveness of injuries, after the example of Christ their head, ver. 31, 32.

10 He was ascended above them, and the right hand of power, and hath received gifts of the Holy Ghost, and hath filled the earth.

11 And hath set him over all the nations, and hath given him for an head over all things, to the church of God.

12 Whereof I was made a minister, according to the sure promise of our Lord Jesus Christ.

13 Unto him give glory and dominion for ever and ever.

14 That we, being delivered from the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life.

15 But speaking the truth in love, we may make all the members grow in him who is the head, even Christ.

16 (Eph. 4, 16.) By whom the whole body being grafted together, and compacted through the service of every joint, he maketh increase of the body in measure according to the working of each particular part, to the building of itself by love.

17 Wherefore, this (v. 55.) I command and testify by the Lord, that ye no longer walk as the other Gentiles walk in the foolishness of their mind:

18 Being darkened in the understanding, they are alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance which is in them, and through the hardness of their heart.

19 Who, being without feeling, have given themselves up, by lasciviousness, to the working of all uncleanness with greediness.

20 But ye have not so learned Christ:

21 (Eph. 4, 13.) Since indeed ye have heard him, and have been taught (w. 168.) concerning him, as the truth is in Jesus.

22 ALSO I COMMAND, (from v. 17,) with respect to the former conversation, that ye put off the old man, which is corrupted (v. 23.) by the deceitful lusts;

23 And that ye put on the new man, which (v. 24.) after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

Ver. 15. But speaking the truth in love, &c. As speaking the truth to one another in communion is enjoined ver. 26. this must be a direction to the ministers of the gospel, to teach their people.

5. We may make all the members grow. V. 25. which is a transitive substantival in this passage, as its substantive i.e. hath 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7.

16. By whom the whole body being grafted together, &c. See the parallel passage, Col. i. 18. The apostle's meaning is, that as the human body is formed by the union of all the members to each other under the head, and by the fitness of each member for its own office and place in the body, so the church is formed by the union of its members under Christ, the head. Farther, as the human body increases, till it arrives at maturity, by the energy of every part in performing its proper function, and by the sympathy of every part with the whole; so the body, or church of Christ, grows to maturity, by the proper exercise of the gifts and graces of individuals for the benefit of the whole. By comparing the body to the human body, the apostle teacheth, That there ought to be no envy nor ill-will among Christians, on account of the gifts which individuals possess, ver. 3. That every one should pay to others that respect and obedience which they owe to them on account of their station and office, ver. 11. That no teacher should pervert the doctrine of the gospel, ver. 15. And that each, by employing his gifts and graces properly, should extend the knowledge and influence of the Christian religion to the utmost of his power, ver. 16. See 1 Cor. xii. Illustration, at the close.

Ver. 17. And the other Gentiles walk (v. 12.) in the foolishness of their mind. This is the adjective ignorant, led, 1 Pet. i. 18. Morris, meaning, foolish behavior. The expression comprehends, not only idiosyncrasy, Acts xv. 15. which the legislator and philosophers pretended to justify upon political principles, but all the vices flowing from, or connected with idiosyncrasy, and of which the apostle hath given a particular account, Rom. i. 26. Now, as idiosyncrasy was nowhere practiced, but in a splendid, or with more allurements than we see Ephesians; and as it was nowhere more ingeniously defended, and its influence is in corrupting the mind, and was nowhere more conspicuous, it was highly proper to set before the Ephesians a picture of their ancient manners, with an express injunction to relinquish them.

Ver. 18. Who being without feeling, &c. Literally, being void of sorrow, hardened against all impressions of grief on account of their wicked actions. Some read evil for nothing. These wicked men, displacing the resurrection of the body, and the immortality of the soul, have no hope of happiness after this life; and therefore they have given themselves up to work uncleanness, &c. But though this resurrection they may have compromised; so that, as it is expressed in the subsequent clause, they have given themselves up to the working of all kinds of uncleanness with greediness.

2. Work all uncleanness with greediness. Eκ ακαίρωσεν. This word is commonly used to denote covetousness, because the more the covetous man possesses, the more he desires. It is the case likewise with those who are under the power of other bad passions, especially lust, which, the more it is gratified, the more craving it becomes. Hence this word is used, 2 Pet. ii. 14. to denote insatiable desire in general, but especially lust. See Eph. v. 3, note 1. 1 Cor. v. note 1. 2 Cor. xii. note 11.

Ver. 22. And the other Gentiles walk, &c. As other passages Jesus signifies the gospel or doctrine of Jesus, so here Christ has the same significance. From this passage it appears, that very early some professors of the gospel neglected locating the duties of morality. Some commentators think this verse should be joined and translated in the following manner: 'They walk in the foolishness of their mind.' But ye are not so disposed: ye have learned Christ. Of this absurd, but emphatical manner of expression, we have a similar example, Luke xii. 23. Matt. xiii. 22. Acts x. 48, &c. But ye shall not be so: but be that which is greatest among you, let him be as the younger.'

Ver. 23. Decentable lusts. The lusts of the flesh are justly called decentable, because they deceive men into the belief that they are harmless, notwithstanding they will be their destruction at last. Ver. 26. And that ye put on the new man, &c. As the new man is in scripture compared to clothes, for two reasons: First, because they render persons beautiful upon the soul, in corrupting the mind: Secondly, because they may be put off or on at pleasure. Chandler says, the soul in the corruptions, 'Put off the old man, and put on the new,' did not allude to the custom of exchanging clothes, practised in the first ages at baptism; see Gal. iii. 27. note:
CHAP. IV
25 Wherefore, putting off lying, speak the truth every one (v. 24, 243,) to his neighbour; for we are members one of another.

26 Be angry, but do not sin. Let not the sun go down on your wrath; 26
27 Neither give (v. 19) space to the devil.

28 Let him who stole steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands, as he is called, that which is good, that he may have to distribute to him who hath need.

29 Let no corrupt speech come out of your mouth; but if any speech be good for the use of edification, speak that, it may minister pleasure to the hearers. (See chap. v. 4.)

30 And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, neither ye be sealed (v. 26) until the day of redemption. (See chap. i. 13, 14, notes.)

31 Let all bitterness, and anger, and wrath, and clamor, and evil speaking, be taken away from among you, with all malice: (See Col. iii. 8.)

32 But be ye to one another kind, tenderhearted, forgiving (v. 31) each other, even as God for Christ’s sake hath forgiven you. (See Col. iii. 13, 13.)

but that the allusion is, either to the ancient theatrical representations, in which the actors assumed, and then laid aside, the characters or to the festivals of Bacchus, in which the Ephesians ran about the streets disguised in masks, singing songs in honour of Bacchus, and committing many disorders and violence.

Ver. 25.—Let him labour, working with his hands, as he is called, that which is good, that he may have to distribute to him who hath need. —That is, speech offensive to the hearers, or which tends to corrupt their minds. Thus is the kind of speech called obscenity, and double meaning, Eph. v. 1. Wherefore, obscene discourse of every kind is strictly forbidden in this prohibition. The character of rotten speech, however, is applicable likewise to filthiness, vanity, railing, backbiting, calumniating and calumniating, and profane jestsings on religion and its ministers—because all such speech is not only offensiveness, but is also offensive to the ears. (See Titus, xiii. 15.)

31 In particular, let all perverseness of temper, and anger, and wrath, and reviling and evil speaking which oftentimes place even after anger hath subsided, be taken away from among you, with all the degree of ill-will towards others. For these things are displeasing to the Spirit.

32 But be ye to one another kind, and tender-hearted, especially when any one of you is in distress, forgiving one another the injuries done you, after the example of God, who, for Christ’s sake, hath forgiven you much greater offences committed against himself.

Ver. 26.—Be angry, but do not sin. —Anger, like all the other natural passions, is given for wise purposes; such as v. 1. To make us exert ourselves vigorously in repelling the sudden assaults of enemies, robbers, and the otherwise expression of displeasure, it is exercised with propriety towards children, servants, and other inferiors, to make them sensible of their faults, and to restrain them from committing the like faults in future. The anger of superiors in such cases, if it be not excessive or too long continued, is not only allowable and commendable, especially if more prudential methods have been used to restrain the offender without effect. But if anger be excited by trivial or slightest provocations, or if it hurries the angry person to violent actions, or if it is long continued in it, it is evil, as the apostle has mentioned in his precept concerning it.

2. Let not the sun go down on your wrath. — As the Jewish day ended at sun-setting, the meaning of the expression is, that wrath must not be long continued in, for the reason mentioned in the commentary.

Ver. 27.—Neither give space to the devil. — Do not suffer, or make any false accredited. Thus, 1 Tim. iii. 11. The women in like manner must be grave, (v. 12;) not slanderers. — In this sense the Sept. translator took the word in the verse under consideration, 'Ut non detur locum calumniatorum. ' So likewise do Erasmus. According to their translation, the apostle signifies, give no occasion to foul the holy religion which ye profess.

31. Anger and wrath. — Be at war, anger, is the passion begins, but yel, wrath, is the passion carried to its height, accompanied with a desire of punishment, and leading the enraged person to re-venge, and even to curse his adversary.

32. Tender-hearted. — Literally having good heart. (See Rom. iv. 31.) This expression is very different from the former of Epiclesis, who speaks to this purpose, "If one is in addition, then may say to him, Thou hast pity on him, but take care not to feel any pity."
CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Precepts in this Chapter.

Because the characters and actions of the heathen deities, according to the notions which were entertained of them, were vicious in the extreme, and had a most pernicious influence in corrupting the manners of their worshippers, the apostle, in different parts of this epistle, but in a more solemn manner in the beginning of this chapter, held up to the Ephesians the characters of God and of Christ, as truly venerable, and worthy of imitation. For he commanded the Ephesians, now become the children of God through faith, chap. i. 5, to be imitators of God, as his beloved children, and to walk in love to one another after the example of Christ, the head of their fellowship, who had loved them so exceedingly as to give himself a sacrifice for their sins, ver. 1, 2. Next, he ordered them to avoid whoring; a vice which the heathens practised with greater restraint, and which the apostle excluded; because the persons guilty of these impurities are so odious to God, that they shall have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God, ver. 3, 4, 5. And because the heathens pretended to justify these practices by the example of their false deities, the apostle cautioned the Ephesians against being deceived with false speeches; and told them, that God had declared his disapprobation of such solicitations, his judgments brought on the nations who were guilty of them, ver. 6. The Ephesians therefore were not now to be partakers with the heathens in these vices, ver. 7. Because, though formerly such of them as were initiated in the mysteries thought themselves enlightened, they were really in darkness as to matters of religion and morality. Whereas, being truly enlightened by the gospel, it became them to walk as persons rightly instructed, ver. 8.—Withal, to lead them to a proper behaviour, he pointed out to them the virtues which are the natural fruits of minds well enlightened, ver. 9, 10. And forbade them to join in any of the fellowships of the heathen mysteries, which he justly termed the unfruitful works of darkness, because they produced no fruit to those who continued in them, except external death, ver. 11. He added, that the things done in the mysteries during the darkness of the night were so abominable, that it was an offence against modesty so much as to mention them, ver. 12.—Besides, the gospel expressly condemns these base actions, by which its excellent nature is clearly manifested, ver. 13, 14.—Next, he ordered the Ephesians to walk correctly, that they might not, by an unseasonable ostentation of their religion, provoke their persecutors to put them to death, ver. 15.—But rather, by their prudent conduct, to prolong their lives, ver. 16.—Yet they were not to conclude the good-will of their brethren towards them, by becoming, like them, madmen, running about the streets in the frantic manner of the Bacchanaeans, ver. 17. Nor, like them, drinking to excess, which would lead them to all manner of dissoluteness, ver. 18. Nor singing lewd songs in their social meetings, on pretence of their being inspired: But when filled with the Spirit in these meetings, they were to sing psalms, and hymns, and spiritual odes, ver. 19. Especially hymns of thanksgiving, addressed, through Jesus Christ, to the true God, the real author of all the good things mankind enjoy, ver. 20.

With respect to religious duties, the apostle in a general manner exhorted the Ephesians to be subject to one another in the fear of God; that is, to perform to each other, from a principle of piety, all the duties of social life, according to their different stations, and to the relations and subordinations in which they stood to each other, ver. 21. Then proceeding to particulars, in the natural order of these relations, he began with the duties of wives and husbands, which he illustrated by the example of Christ and the church; and on that occasion explained a very deep mystery relating to Christ and the church, couched in the formation of Eve, and in her marriage with Adam, ver. 22—30.

New Translation.

Chap. V. 1. Be ye, therefore, imitators of God, as children beloved;

2 And walk in love, even as Christ loved us, and gave himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God, (w) for a sweet-smelling savour;

3 But whoredom, and all uncleanness, (a) and covetousness, let them not even be named among you, as it becometh saints.

4 Also (worse than) obscenity, and foolish talking, and deceive meanings, are things not

Ver. 2.—1. An offering and a sacrifice. (b) that is, both a peace-offering and a sin-offering. Christ's love in dying for us, is a strong reason for our loving one another: because, if we do not love one another, we are destitute of that disposition which rendered Christ so acceptable to his Father; and do not deserve to be called his disciples, nor to share in the inheritance of God's children.

2. Sin-offering. (c) This epithet was given to the sin-offering, Lev. iv. 11, as well as to the burnt-offering, Gen. xviii. 21. It denotes the acceptableness of these offerings to God. For in the warm eastern cliimes, nothing is more refreshing than fragrant scents. And as in the highly figurative language of the ancient Hebrews, sweet-smelling savours to denote odours possessing a moral quality in another, God is said to smell a sweet savour from sacrifices, to signify that he perceived with pleasure the good disposition which the offerer expressed by such an act of worship. Wherefore, when the apostle tells us, that Christ gave himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God, for a sweet-smelling savour, he teaches us, that Christ's sacrifice of love was highly acceptable to God; not only as a signal instance of obedience to his Father's will, and a great expression of his love to mankind, but also on account of its happy influence in establishing the moral government of the universe of things.

Ver. 3.—1. All uncleanness and covetousness. (b) Because uncleanness and covetousness, is placed between uncleanness in this verse, and obscenity in the next, some commentators think, that in this passage it denotes the works of the flesh carried to the greatest excess. And it must be acknowledged, that uncleanness is used in Scripture for all those inordinate desires which are never satisfied with the enjoyment of their objects. See Eph. iv. 29, note 2; however, as an unsatisfiable desire of money is sometimes the parent of whoredom and uncleanness, they are sometimes in this passage, which would stand in its ordinary acceptation. See ver. 5. of this chapter. The influence of covetousness to lead men into all kinds of vice, was acknowledged even by the heathens. Quran, Surat, Al iman, 172.

Let them not even be named among you. (d) If the simple meaning of the verses here mentioned had been unaltered, certainly the apostle would not, contrary to his own precepts, have introduced these names into his letter, to be read by the Ephesians. We must, therefore, by the word meaning, understand a naming with approbation and delight; in which sense it is used likewise, 1 Cor. x. 28, note 5. Ver. 4.—1. And foolish talking. (e) This is that kind of speech by which one neighbour is rendered ridiculous and contemptible, prophet, but thanksgiving rather is proper. For this ye know, that no man receiveth of the Spirit of God, unless he be an idolater, hath inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, and of God. (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, 18. 24.)

6. Let no one deceive you (1 Thess. ii. 11) with false speeches; for, on account of these things, the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience. (Col. iii. 6.)

7. Wherefore, be not partakers with them.

8. For ye were formerly, darkness itself, notwithstanding the light ye pretended to derive from your boasted mysteries. But now ye are truly enlightened by Christ: behave as persons enlightened.

9. Now, the fruit of the Spirit, by which ye are enlightened, consists in doing all good offices to your neighbours, and in righteousness in your dealings, and truth in your speech.

10. In the whole of your behaviour, shew that ye approve what is acceptable to the Lord Christ:

11. And have no fellowship with those who celebrate the heathen mysteries, which being transacted in the darkness of night, are really the unspeakable works of darkness, as the unspeakable fruit to the initiated, except eternal death: But rather even reprouse them.

12. For the impure and wicked actions which are secretly done in the mysteries by the initiated, are so abominable, that it is base even to mention them.

13. Now, all these reprovable actions, which are practised in celebrating the heathen mysteries, are manifest as sinful by the gospel: and seeing every thing which discovers the true nature of actions to be evil, the gospel, which discovers the evil nature of the actions performed in the mysteries, is light.

called in our language lucubrations, and in Latin scurrillicita, securillitum. In the preceding verse, the apostle prohibited impure actions: in this verse, he cautioned the Ephesians against obscene language.

2. And double meanings. — The word εὐεξίαν denotes unfairly turned discourse; and is used either in a good or bad sense. In the good sense, it denotes urbanity or courtesy in discourse. Here it is used in the bad sense, for such unfairly turned discourse as, in casu expressions, conveys lewd meanings.

3. Are things not proper, viz. works not to be borne: But the phrase not proper is equally strong, as it signifies that which is improperly improper. For things immodestly improper in Christians.

4. But thanksgiving rather is proper. — By thanksgiving the apostle means, to speak and discourse of the other and harmony of God's work of creation, the deliverances wrought for us, and the benefits conferred on each, in defence of God, the great blessings of sin and misery, and the gift of eternal life consequent therefrom, with whatever is necessary to prepare us for these blessings. Discourses on these subjects will naturally produce thanksgiving to God from the hearers, and give them an unapproachably holy, or that can be derived from obscene discourses, however unfairly turned. Accorded to this interpretation, thanksgiving, the effect, stands for such discourses as are the causes of thanksgiving, see the parallel passage, Col. iii. 16. 17. Some critics are of opinion, that εὐεξίαν here means incorrectly pleasant discourse. See chap. iv. 29.

5. No sorcerer, nor unclean person. — In this, and his other epistles, the sorcerer in the most express manner condemned condemnation, and uncleanness of all sorts, because he himself was expressly persecuted these things, even in their temples, as acts of worship which rendered them acceptable to their gods. See Rom. i. 27. note. I. How different from heathenism is the worship, which proceeds, that they who continue in these views, shall for ever be excluded from the presence and kingdom of God!

2. Not covetous man, who is an idolater. — The covetous man is he whose chief care is to gain money, whether to spend it on his lusts, or hoards it. Such a man is justly reckoned an idolater, because he spends his treasure in that for the support of his life, and for his enjoyment, his whole dependence is on his riches; they are the objects of his strongest affections, and all his cares are employed about them. See the parallel passage, Col. iii. 5.

3. Hath inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, and of God. — The kingdom, even after Christ had obtained it, and been delivered it upon the Father, 1 Cor. xv. 28. is called his kingdom, as well as the kingdom of God, because it was exercised and established by him, and because, though he does not any longer govern it, he possesses the chief pre-eminence in it, after his ascension, Acts. i. 9, 10, and he governs his church with the same eternal and unchangeable power as he did when he was in the flesh. See chap. iv. 29.

6. The wrath of God cometh. — The word coming, being the present indicative, when it is sometimes put for the future, (see Acts. iv. 12), the apostle's meaning may be, that severe punishment will come on the children of disobedience at the day of judgment.

Or his meaning may be, that the wrath of God hath already come, and will come on the children of disobedience: consequently he hath in his eye the punishment already inflicted on the heathen, the Canaanites, the Assyrians, and the Babylonians, who, as nations, have all been destroyed as a result of their enormities committed, as also that destruction which the apostle knew was in the course of providence yet to come on such nations as disobeys God by their iniquity and licentiousness.

Ver. 8. Children of light. — Children of disobedience, ver. 5, and children of light in this verse, are distinguished persons, children of the quality which they were supposed to possess in an eminent degree: For the Hebraic writer, in using a word such as εὐεξίας, does not mean that the Ephesians were forbidden to enter into any of the heathen fellowship; a sense of the precept which is confirmed by the following verse.

2. Unfruitful works. — That is, works which produced no good, either to those who wrought them, or to society.

3. Works of darkness. — The apostle calls the heathen mysteries works of darkness, because the impure actions which the initiated performed in them, under the notion of religious rites, were done in the night time; and by the secrecy in which they were acted, were acknowledged by the persecutors to be evil.

1. But rather even reprouse them. — The word εὐεξίας signifies to reproce, 1 Tim. v. 5.; to confute, 2 Tim. iv. 2.; to correct, John vii. 48.; and to condemn, because the effect of error and confusion, properly administered, is to convince. The apostle wished the Ephesians to use their superior knowledge, derived from the gospel, in showing the initiated the absurdity of the mysteries, and the silliness of the things done in them.

Ver. 12. It is base even to mention. — The initiated were taken engaged not to divulge the mysteries. Here the apostle intimates, that the engagement was sincere, because it was made even to mention the things that were done in these mysteries.

Ver. 13. Every thing which makes manifest is light. — By this the apostle hath showed how absurdly the heathens go to their mysteries the application of light, and to the application of enlightened persons. For if those mysteries had been really light, they would have made no secret of them, besides those which were done in the mysteries themselves, manifest in their true colours. The honourable application of light Wherefore it saith, Awake thou who sleepest, (Eph. ii. 1.), and Christ shall shine upon thee.

See then that ye walk accurately, not as (senses) unwise, but as wise men: (See Col. iv. 6.)

Gaining time, because the days are evil. (See Col. iv. 5.)

(1. See 2.) For this, do not become (sense) madmen; but understand ye what the will of the Lord is.

And be not drunk with wine, (or 's), by which cometh dullness; but be ye filled (or 's, 169) with the Spirit.

Speak to one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord. (See Col. iii. 16.)

Give thanks at all times for all things, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to God, even the Father.

Be subject to one another in the fear of God.

Ephesians.

Because the gospel sheweth the true nature of every human action, it saith to all the Gentiles, and even to the initiated in the mysteries, Awake thou who sleepest in the darkness of heathen ignorance, and arise from the dead state in which thou liest through trespasses and sins; and Christ shall shine upon thee with the light of truth, whereby all thy faculties shall be enlivened.

See then that ye, upon whom Christ now shineth, walk accurately according to his precepts; not as unwise men, provoking your heathen neighbours by im prudent rebukes, (ver. 11.), but as wise men, avoiding their vices, and endeavouring to reclaim them by the influence of your example.

Prolonging your time in the world through this prudent conduct. For the days in which ye live are full of trouble, Gen. xlvii. 9.

Yet, for the sake of gaining time, do not become madmen, by joining the votaries of Bacchus in their frantic rites; but understand ye what the will of Christ is; that he does not allow you to partake in these impurities.

And be not drunk with wine, as the heathens are when they celebrate the feasts of Bacchus their god of wine, by which drunkenness cometh dullness of manner, (wheedled, browlings, riots). But when ye propose to be joyful, be ye filled with the Spirit with those grand discoveries which by the Spirit are made to you in the gospel.

Instead of singing, loud songs, like the heathens in the festivals of their gods, repeat to one another, in the seasons of your joy, the Psalms of David, and those hymns and spiritual songs which are dictated to you by the Spirit, singing them, and making melody in your heart by accompanying them with devout affection, a melody most pleasing to the Lord.

Give thanks at all times for all things in your lot, whether they be prosperous or adverse, through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, to God the only real Father of all the happiness that is in the universe.

With respect to relative duties, my exhortation in general is, Be subject to one another, in the various relations wherein ye stand to one another; and do it from a regard to the authority of God, who hath appointed these relations.
V. 22. Wives, be subject to your own husbands, as to the Lord. (1 Cor. xiv. 34.)
23. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church (Eph. v. 23), because he is the saviour of the body.
24. (Acts, 79.) Therefore, as the church is subject to Christ, so also let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing.

25. Husbands, love your own wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for her;
26. That he might sanctify her, having cleansed her with a bath of water, and with the word;
27. That he might present her to himself, glorious, a church not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that she might be holy, and without blemish.

28. For this reason shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh.
29. This mystery is great, but I speak concerning Christ, and his church.

22. In particular, wives, be subject to your own husbands, in the same manner that ye are subject to the Lord Christ.
23. For the husband is the head of the wife, and is entitled to direct her; even as Christ is the head of the church, and is entitled to govern it, because he is the saviour of the body: He bestows all blessings on the church.
24. Therefore, as the church is subject to Christ in every thing, because he is his head and saviour, so also let wives be subject to their own husbands in every thing pertaining to the management of the family, because he supports it.
25. On the other hand, husbands, love your own wives, and not other women, cherishing and nourishing them, (ver. 29,) even as Christ also loved his spouse the church, and gave himself to die for her.
26. That he might sanctify her, and fit her for becoming his spouse, having cleansed her emblematically by baptism, as brides are wont to be cleansed with a bath of water, and with the word, from the superstitions of Judaism and heathenism.
27. Christ thus cleanses the church, that at the day of judgment (Rev. xvi. 7,) he may present her to himself, glorious, without sin, with all the beauty of holiness, a church not having spot, or wrinkle, or any imperfection; but that she may be perfectly amiable, both in mind and body, being holy, and without any blemish.
28. Since Christ loves the church as his own body, so ought husbands to love their own wives as their own bodies, on account of their affectionate services. He who loveth his wife, loveth himself; he promotes his own happiness.
29. The wife being a part of the husband's person, he ought to love her as himself. For no man in his right wits ever yet hated his own body, but nourisheth it with food, and cherisheth it with clothing, as even the Lord, by his powerful government, nourishes and defends the church.
30. This he does, because he can say of his church what Adam said of Eve, that we are members of his body, being of his flesh, and of his bones.
31. For this reason, that the woman is of the man's flesh and of his bones, shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall be clearly united to his wife, and by this union the two shall become one person, loving one another entirely, and having the same inclinations, and the same interests.
32. This close union of the first man with the first woman, on account of her being formed of his bones and flesh, is a great secret. But in so saying, I speak of those things as they are emblems of Christ, and of the church.

The husband's love for his wife is compared to Christ's love for the church. The husband is the head of the wife, and the wife is the body of the husband, just as Christ is the head and the church is the body of Christ. The husband is to love his wife as Christ loved the church, sanctifying her and presenting her to himself as holy and without blemish. Similarly, Christ presents the church to himself as a bride without spot or wrinkle. The husband is to leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, becoming one flesh with her. This is a great mystery, as Christ's love for the church is a great mystery. The husband is to love his own wife, not another woman, cherishing and nourishing her as Christ loved the church. Christ gave himself to die for her, sanctifying her and presenting her to himself. Husbands are to leave their father and mother and be joined to their wives, becoming one flesh with them. This mystery is great, but I speak concerning Christ and his church.
EPHESIANS. Chap. VI.

33 Therefore, also, let every one of you in particular so to love his wife as himself, avoiding邪恶的行为 and behaviour towards her which is tyrannical, harsh, and bitter; and, on the other hand, let the wife take care to reverence and obeye her husband.

The apostle urges the Ephesians to love their wives, because the Lord Jesus Christ is being exceedingly addicted to whoredom, many of them hold their wives in little estimation.

Ver. 32. The mystery is great, but I speak concerning Christ, and concerning the church, in connection with the first clause is thus translated: "A mystery, how great, because it contained an important emblematical meaning concerning the regeneration of believers, and their union with Christ, which hitherto had been kept secret, but which he had discovered in the 38th verse; for hence, in allusion to what Adam and Eve had been created, this is to be spoken of by the apostle as concerning Christ and believers, 'We are bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh,' that is, in the church, and by the application of Adam's words concerning Eve, to Christ and his church, he intimates, First, That the formation of Eve, a rib taken out of Adam's side, was a figure of the regeneration of believers, by the breaking of Christ's body stated in ver. 35. Secondly, That Adam's love for Eve is an emblem of that love being formed in his bosom, was a figure of Christ's love to believers, because they are become his body, as is observed in ver. 13. Thirdly, That Adam's marriage with Eve was a figure of the eternal union of Christ with believers in heaven, mentioned in ver. 10, for he is the Father to be united to his church. In giving this emblematical representation of these ancient facts, the apostle expresses his extraordinary probability. In the first place, neither the art of writing, nor any permanent method of conveying instruction being invented, it was necessary to make such striking actions and events as could not easily be forgotten, emblems of the instruction intended to be perpetuated. See Eve, page 291. In this supposition, Adam, in whom the human race began, was a natural image of Christ, in whom the human race was to be restored, and his deep sleep, the opening of his soul, and the formation of Eve of a rib taken out of his side, were emblems of Christ's death, the opening of his soul, and the regeneration of believers, by the death of his body. The love which Adam expressed towards Eve, and with whom he was united in marriage, were living images of the love of Christ towards believers, and of his eternal union with them in one society after their resurrection. And Eve herself, who was formed of a rib taken from Adam's side, was a natural image of believers, who are regenerated both in their body and in their mind, by the same side of Christ's body. And since the circumstnbances which accompanied the formation of Eve, being fit emblems of the formation of the church, we may suppose they were brought to pass in prefiguring that great event; and, by prefiguring it, to show that it was decreed of God from the very beginning.

The Apostle, however, of these images, is not the only reason for supposing that the formation of Eve, and her marriage with Adam in Paradise, were emblems of the regeneration of believers for the death of Christ, and of their eternal union with him in heaven. The singular manner in which Eve was formed, and the declaration at her marriage with Adam, 'Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave unto his wife;' and the love of Christ towards his church, and the love of His church towards Him, strongly lead to that conclusion. Eve was not formed of the dust of the earth, as all other living creatures were made (not excepting Adam himself), but of a rib taken from Adam's side while he was in a deep sleep. Now, upon this account it is said, when sooner he was awakened, that in which the apostle had suggested is not admitted. Further, unless some deep instruction were conveyed under the formation of Eve, what occasion was there for Adam, at his marriage with her, to declare, 'This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh;' she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man; therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave unto his wife: and they two shall be one flesh?' For although the taking of Eve out of Adam might be a reason for Adam's affection towards her, it was no reason for the affection of his posterity towards their wives, who are not so formed. The reason of their love to their wives, as of the loving creatures of the same species with them, was that she was bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, and became his body, as is stated in ver. 30. Then, in allusion to what Adam and Eve were taught by God himself to consider one such. It is a small continuation of the apostle's emblematih interpretation of the formation and marriage of Eve, in that scripture we find a variety of images and emblems for illustration and interpretation. For example, Rom. vii. 4, Adam is expressly called 'the husband of one wife,' who was to come, on which account, 1 Cor. xi. 8, Christ is called 'the last Adam.' Next, the apostle calls the union of believers of all nations, 'the body of Christ,' and the members thereof are said to be 'members of this body of Christ, and of his bones.' In allusion to the formation of Eve, the emblem of the church. For as Eve was formed of a rib taken out of Adam's side during his deep sleep, so believers are regenerated both in mind and body, and formed into one great society, of which Christ is the head and governor, by the breaking of his body on the cross. Thirdly, In allusion to the formation of Eve, our Lord thought fit, when He meant to symbolize the pointing out one symbol only of his death, He appointed two. And in explaining the first of them, he expressed himself in such a manner as to show that he had his eye on what happened to Adam when Eve was formed. 'This is my body.' But in the second, 'For your regeneration.' Fourthly, In allusion to the regeneration of Eve, after the resurrection, is called 'a marriage.' Rev. xii. 1, and the New Jerusalem, that is, the inhabitants of the New Jerusalem, the society of the redeemed, is termed the bride, the Lamb's wife; and the preparing of men for that happy union, by introducing them into the church on earth through faith, and by sanctifying them through the word, is called, '2 Cor. ii. 2,' a fitting one to husband, that (at the resurrection) they may be presented a chaste virgin to Christ, in allusion, I suppose, to the presenting of Eve to Adam, in order to her marriage with him. And to show that in this expression the apostle had the idea of Eve's marriage in his mind, he mentions, ver. 3, the subtility of the devil in deceiving Eve. Finally, the union of the Jewish church with God, as the figure of the catholic church, consisting of the regenerated of all nations, is by God himself termed 'a great wife,' Jer. ii. 25, Ezek. xvi. 8, 32; and God is called 'the husband' of that people, Isa. v. 5, and their union to him by the law of Moses is termed 'the day of his espousals,' ver. ii. 2.

CHAPTER VI.

The apostle having explained the duties of wives and husbands, proceeds to the duties of children and parents, ver. 1-4; then to those of slaves and masters, ver. 5-9; as, with the account of relative duties in general, wherein it is observable, that here, and Col. iii. 18. &c. he begins all along with the duty of the inferior, as Peter likewise doth, 1 Pet. iii. 1-7; perhaps to teach us, that the right behaviour of the superior is not only a matter of greater difficulty, but is necessary to entitle the inferior to the regard of his superior.

Having delivered these precepts, the apostle added a general exhortation to the Ephesians, to be strong in the performance of all their duties; which he enforced by the discovery of another deep article of the mystery of God, namely, that evil angels are leagued together against men, and continually occupied in templing them to sin, with a view to ruin them, ver. 10-15. But that the Ephesians might not be too much terrified with this discovery, the apostle showed them what an excellent defence against the attacks of the devil God had furnished them with, in the complete armour which he had provided for them, ver. 13-18, called therefore 'the complete armour of God.'

Next, the apostle begged the Ephesians to pray for him, that he might be enabled to speak plainly and boldly in support of the gospel, when brought before the king, and his ministers, which it seems he expected would happen soon, ver. 19, 20. But to free them from their anxiety on account of the danger he was exposed to, he told them that he had sent Tychoius the deacon to give them information concerning his affairs, ver. 21, 22. Then, as a token of his love, he gave to them, and to all the brethren of Asia who were sincere in their attachment to the Lord Jesus Christ, his apostolical benediction, ver. 23, 24.

CHAPTER VI.

Children, obey your parents in every thing consistent with your duty to the Lord; for this is just.

Honour thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promise.

That it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest be long lived in the land.

Now, fathers, do not provoke your children to wrath, but bring them up in the correction and instruction of the Lord.

Servants, obey your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in the integrity of your heart, as to Christ.

Not (serv, 230) with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but, as servants of Christ, do the will of God from the soul (Col. iii. 22.

With good will, acting as servants to the Lord, and not to men only.

Knowing, that whatsoever good work any one doth, for that he shall receive the reward of the resurrection of the just, in heaven; and respect of persons is not with him.

Finally, my brethren, be strong through the Lord, and through the power of his might.

Put on the complete armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the crafty wiles of the devil.

For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world chiefest, against the spiritual wickedness of the air in high places.

Ver. 1. This is just. Children should obey their parents in every thing lawful, as it is in itself, even although the parents be unbelievers; as it is a proper return for the maintenance and edification which they receive from their parents, and as it is enjoined by the laws of every well regulated state.

Ver. 2. Which is the first commandment with promise. In the second commandment there is a promise of mercy to them who keep the commandments in general; but the fifth is the first commandment which hath a promise annexed to it in particular. This observation concerning the promise in the law to those who honoured their parents, the apostle made, to show that the honouring of parents is a matter of the greatest importance to the well-being of society, and highly acceptable to God.

Ver. 3. Be strong. By mentioning three different times in this and the following verses, the slave’s subjection to Christ, the apostle hath indicated the hardships of slavery; for he hath shewn that both the master’s power of commanding, and the slave’s obligation to obedience, are limited by the law of Christ.

Ver. 8. Or a freeman. By this appellation Geyse understands a servant who is not a slave: a hired servant.

Ver. 11. Put on the complete armour of God. By calling the Christian virtues and graces, the complete armour of God, the apostle represents the disciples of Christ, whose enemies and persecutors were many, as engaged in a dangerous warfare, and, I think, contrasts their virtues with the complete armour fabled by the bravest poets to have been fabricated by the gods, and bestowed on their favourite heroes. That armour was vastly inferior to the complete armour of God; for, in the first place, the Christian’s complete armour is really of divine workmanship, and is actually bestowed on the Christian soldier, whereas the other is mere fiction. In the second place, the armour used to have been given by the heathen gods, consisting of brass and steel, could only defend the body of the hero who was covered with it; but the complete armour given by the true God, consisting of the Christian virtues, is useful for defending the mind of the faithful against all the temptations with which their enemies attack them. In the third place, the complete armour of God gives strength to the Christian soldier in the battle, and therefore is far preferable to any armour made of metals, which may defend, but cannot strengthen the body of the warrior. See 1 Tim. vi. 8, 9, 10.

Ver. 12. Against the crafty wiles of the devil. By ‘crafty wiles of the devil’ the apostle means, not simply the temptations which arise from the moods of the flesh, the love of pleasure, the fear of persecution, the cosmetics of evil example, the solicitations of the wicked, the persuasions of the philosophers, and of the unbelieving Jews, and the false promises of heretical teachers in the church itself; but all these temptations, as prepared and pointed against men by such skilful, experienced, and malicious enemies as the devil and his agents. Accordingly it is added in the following verse, ‘We wrestle not with flesh and blood only, but with government, with powers, . . . of whom the devils are the lords.’
blood only, but with governments, with powers, of the world, and with the evil spirits of wickedness in the heavenly regions.

13 For this reason, take up the complete armament of faith, to be able to resist in the evil day, and, having fully withstood every thing, to stand.

14 Stand, then, having your loins girded about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness (2).

15 And having your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace.

16 Over all, take up the shield of faith, with which ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one. (See 1 Pet. v. 9.)

17 And receive the helmet of salvation, (1) and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

2. Flesh and blood. —Is a Hebraism denoting mankind in general. Thus, Matt. xvi. 17: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee," but thy Father which is in heaven, that is, man himself, revealed it to thee. Wherefore, in the verse under consideration, flesh and blood, as standing in opposition to governments, and powers and wicked spirits, signifies man in general, who everywhere opposes the gospel, and persecutes its professors.

3. But with governments, with powers. —These being distinguished from flesh and blood, which is an Hebraism for mankind, see ver. 12, note 2, cannot be the governments and powers of the earth, but the evil angels, who have these appellations given them here, and Rom. viii. 28, either on account of the power which they exercise as the rulers of the darkness of this world, or on account of the station and authority which they possessed before they were cast out of heaven.

4. With the rulers of the darkness of this world. —See John i. 6, note 3. —Syr. &c. —Adversus potentissimam mundi luapi tentaculum. —against the Prince of darkness, or the Devil, who is the head of all the ruling spirits in the world, as his ordinary residence, and to whom the evil angels are subject, and obey, and whose will is irresistible, and whose power is unanswerable, as he delivers and overthrows those whom he chooses. Hence, in this verse, "with the rulers of the darkness of this world," &c., signifies, and should be translated of those spirits, in general, who exercise power over the world, and are subjects of the Devil, and obey him in all the affairs of the universe. —On the word, see the note on Eph. i. 16. —Verse i. 9, call the rulers of the darkness of this world, &c., in both instances, "powers, &c.,&c." —Chandler understands this to refer to the government of the heathen world, and not to the evil angels. —But his note is not at all consistent with his translation of the verse: "rulers of the darkness of this world," &c., which he translates, "powers of darkness, &c." —On the word, see the note in the margin on this verse.

5. And with wicked spirits. —Syr. &c. —spiritalis malus. —So the phrase is to be rendered in this place, a spirit of evil, a evil spirit, as in Acts xix. 13, "a spirit of divination," &c. —That is, the evil angels, or wicked spirits, with whom we fight; and it is a quality so much more dangerous, that it exists in beings whose natural faculties are very great. —By spiritual wickednesses in heavenly places. —Chandler understands false pretensions to inspiration in the church. —The critical observers, that the repetition of the preposition in this verse, is very emphatical, as it shows the length and difficulty of the battle. —In the heavenly regions. —Eph. ii. 2. —This is the region of the air, because, chap. i. 21, "the spirits are represented as inhabiting the air, which the Hebrews called heaven, and the first heaven." —The account of the spiritual enemies of mankind, given by the apostle in this passage, is agreeable to the doctrine of the other inspired writers; particularly John, who represents the devil and his angels as opposing liberty and wickedness. —As lying under the dominion of the devil, 1 John v. 19. And without doubt, it was by the usurpation and domination of evil spirits, that mankind were so universally reduced to idolatry. Wherefore, since the progressive design of the gospel was to destroy these evils, it is certain that the devil and his angels would oppose its progress, by stirring up their adherents to persecute both the preachers and the believers of the new revelation, to the end that the first Christians were maintaining against the devil and his subjects, the opposition of idolatry, was, with great propriety, ascribed to the Ephesians, as their city was the most venerable of idolatry, by means of the worship of Diana, there performed, with the greatest splendor and ceremony of rites, in the most magnificent temple in the world, and with a vast concourse of priests, votaries, and reconnoiters of all sorts. Besides, magical works, the peculiar continuance of the devil, are, at the time the apostle wrote this epistle, to have been practiced at Ephesus more than in any other city or country in the world, Acts xix. 19, 20.

6. We fight not with flesh and blood, but with the spiritual enemies of wickedness in the heavenly regions.

13 For this reason, ye are not sufficient to resist the evil of the demons; for they are able to resist these malicious demons in the evil day of temptation, chap. xvi. 13, and they have fully practiced every stratagem to ruin you, that ye may be able to stand firm.

14 Stand then, having your loins girded with truth, as soldiers are girded with the military belt, and having on the breastplate of righteousness, as a defense against the calumnies with which the wicked attack your reputation; and, like soldiers who defend their legs and feet with greaves, have your feet shod with the preparation necessary for preaching the gospel of peace.

15 As soldiers have their weapons, which they turn every way for the defense of their whole body, so, over your whole body, take up the shield of faith; the firm belief of the doctrines and promises of the gospel; with which ye are able to extinguish all the fiery darts, that is, the most deadly temptations, of the devil.

16 And, as soldiers have helmets to secure their heads against strokes, and swords to annoy their enemies, receive the helmet of the hope of salvation, which will defend you against the fear of death, and the spiritual sword, which is the word of God, that therewith ye may put your enemies to flight.

17. —Verse i. 9, this is called the 'breath of faith and truth,' cannot be in this place those truths which are the objects of the Christian faith, but a sort of means, or, as it is sometimes rendered, a weapon, or a weapon in the Christian faith in opposition to that which is hypocracity, or, for sincerity in the profession of their faith, the whole faculties of their mind would be invigorated, and themselves put in a constant readiness for action; just as a soldier who is girded with the military belt, is fitted either for fighting or for running away.

18 Having on the breastplate of righteousness. —In the parallel passage, 1 Thess. v. 8, this is called the 'breath of faith and truth.' —The note there. —Perhaps the apostle in this passage alluded to Isa. lix. 17, where Moses is said to have put on 'righteousness as a breastplate;' that is, by the uprightness of his conduct, and his consciousness thereof, he defended himself from being moved by the calumnies and reproaches of the wicked.

19. —Verse i. 9, the 'word of God,' is here put for 'the word of God,' and should be translated, concerning the word of God, as the object of faith, and the means of putting on the breastplate of righteousness. —Verse v. 11, the word of God, which is the very charm of doctrine, because in the most consummate measure and glory are joined. —Verse ii. 2, the word of God, by way of renunciation, because in him the most consummate measure and glory are joined. —Verse v. 17, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse i. 9, this is called the 'helmet of salvation.' —The apostle says, 'And for an helmet the hope of salvation.' —Verse v. 11, 'And for an helmet the hope of salvation.' —Chandler's note on this, and the passage, 1 Thess. v. 8, 'It is, and for an helmet the hope of salvation.' —Chandler's note on this. —Verse v. 11, the 'helmet of salvation,' is the defense of the head, to preserve it from deadly blows. —And in like manner, 'the hope of salvation,' built on the promises of God, and arising from the consciousness of integrity, will ward off, or preserve from the fatal effects of all temptations from worldly terrors and evils, so that they shall not disorder the imagination, or prevent the judgment, or cause men to desert the path of duty to their final destruction. —Verse ii. 19, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. —Here the apostle calls the word of God 'the sword of the Spirit,' because it was given by inspiration of the Spirit, and because the doctrines, promises, and precepts of the word of God, are the most effectual means of putting our spiritual enemies to flight. Of the effect of the word of God, we have an illustrious example in our Lord's temptation in the wilderness, where he put the devil to flight by questions from the scriptures of the Old Testament;—here also, chap. ii. 2, that all the parts of the complete armour of the ancients are elegantly introduced in the apostle's account of the Christian's complete armour; for there is first the military belt, called by the Greek ἱλάται, and by the Latin latae. This called the next, the breastplate, which was covered with brass or iron, in order to extinguish them, or prevent their effect. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation, in the parallel passage, 1 Thess. v. 8, it is, 'And for an helmet the hope of salvation.' —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation, in the parallel passage, 1 Thess. v. 8. —Verse v. 11, 'And for an helmet the hope of salvation.' —Verse v. 17. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse v. 8. —Verse v. 11, it is, 'And for an helmet the hope of salvation.' —Verse v. 8. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse v. 8. —Verse v. 17. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse v. 8. —Verse v. 17. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse v. 8. —Verse v. 17. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse v. 8. —Verse v. 17. —Verse ii. 19, and receive the helmet of salvation. —Verse v. 8. —Verse v. 17.
18 (Acts, 119.) With all supplication and prayer, let your prayers be made, as well for the Gentiles as for all the saints, with all perseverance and prayer for all the saints, as also for yourselves. (Acts, iv. 2.)

20 For which reason I execute the office of an ambassador in a chain, that I may speak boldly concerning the mystery of the godhead, as also concerning the mystery of the gospel. (Col. iii. 3.)

21 Now, that ye also may know the things relating to me, and what I am doing, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, will make known to you all things. (Col. iv. 7.)

22 Whom I have sent to you for this very purpose, that ye may know my affairs, and that he may comfort your hearts. (Col. iv. 11.)

23 Peace to the brethren, and love, with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. (Col. iv. 18.)

Accordingly, in the parallel passage, I Thes. v. 8, the breast-plate is said to consist of two parts, faith and love. Next to the breast-plate were the greaves, which were the lower part of the breast-plate. The greaves were made of metal, and were made of different sorts, and were used to defend the feet against the strokes of swords and missile weapons. The shield was made of wood, covered with plates of brass or steel. But besides the defensive armour just described, offensive weapons were likewise necessary to render the soldier's armour complete; particularly the sword, which was used with the right hand, while the shield was held on the left. These had distinct names, and were mentioned in the Bible. (Eph. vi. 17.)

Ver. 31. Without supplication and prayer, let your prayers be made, as well for the Gentiles as for all the saints, as also for yourselves. (Acts, iv. 2.) The second object of these petitions is the perfection of the Church, the society of the saints, and the enemies of the gospel; for which purpose the apostle prays, that they may be comforted with his faith and love, and be strengthened in their faith and love. (Col. iv. 7.)

Ver. 22. Whom I have sent to you for this very purpose, that ye may know my affairs, and that he may comfort your hearts. (Col. iv. 11.)

Ver. 23. Peace to the brethren, and love, with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. (Col. iv. 18.)

2 Tycho-is will make known to you all things, etc. (Eph. vi. 20.)—This passage is a clear indication of the power that this epistle originally had a general reception, and was directed to no particular church. For how could Tycho-is be sent to "the saints which are in Rome," and to the "elders" in Christ Jesus, unless he knew the apostle's affairs, and therefore to comfort their hearts? It is evident, therefore, that this epistle was sent to the saints of some particular place. Who are these saints? and to whom should they be, the saints at Ephesus, to whom as Dr. Lardner has shown, by the consent of all the ancient MSS. and versions, it was addressed?—Acts xx. 19. Tycho-is was called an Ephesian. Perhaps Tycho-is was of the same city, which may be inferred from the way why the apostle sent his letter to the Ephesians by him, "that he might comfort their hearts," by making them acquainted with what had happened to him in Rome, and what he was doing there. But whether he was an Ephesian or not, the character of Tycho-is is the same. (Eph. iv. 15.)

Ver. 2. Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, also, with whom I have had constant communication; for he is the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. (Col. iv. 7.)

Ver. 6. In these two verses we are told of Asia, and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus. (Acts xx. 2, 4.)

Ver. 7. All things concerning me, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, also with whom I had constant communication; for he is the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. (Col. iv. 7.)

Ver. 8. The apostle says, "In these two verses we are told of Asia, and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus." (Acts xx. 2, 4.)

Ver. 10. This is the most important fact, that the epistle was directed to the Ephesians, it is difficult to understand how the apostle continued himself with giving general salutation, without mentioning any of his numerous acquaintance and friends, with whom he had been intimate during his long residence at Ephesus. (Acts, xvi. 40.) But the answer is, the epistle had to be written by the apostle in the apostle's first epistle to Timothy, the second epistle to Timothy, and also to Titus, in this letter, it is written to the Ephesians, because of their privilege in the Ephesians, as well as the Philippians and Colossians, to know what success he had in preaching at Rome, and what success he had met with, what comfort he had enjoyed under his sufferings, what converts he had made to Christ, and in what manner the violence of the gospel affected the minds of the inhabitants of Rome. (Acts, xvi. 40.)
PHILIPPIANS.

ESSAY VII.—On the Mediation of Christ.

One cannot view the present state of the world, without taking notice of the misery and sin which prevail in it. The earth would be a wilderness, were it not cultivated with great care and labour. It nourishes a number of plants and animals noxious to man. The fruits forced from it by human labour, are oftentimes destroyed by inclement seasons. Men, its chief inhabitants, are many of them excessively wicked, and their wickedness is productive of much misery to themselves in the present life, and to others who are affected by it. Besides, all of them are naturally liable to a variety of painful diseases, and to death.

This disordered state of the world hath been the occasion of much anxious speculation, to those who, fancying that things might have been so ordered as to exclude all evil, both natural and moral, have considered the admission of sin and misery into any system formed by an infinitely powerful, wise, and benevolent Being, as absolutely impossible. Hence the ancient Persians, and after them the Manichæans, to account for the present disordered constitution of things, affirmed, that the world was the work of two independent infinitely powerful Principles, that is, one good and the other evil. Others of the Easterns accounted for the evils which are in the world, by supposing that mankind had existed in some prior state, and are punished here for the sins which they committed in that prior state, and that their punishment is intended to purify and reform them. This was the doctrine of the Pythagoreans, and of some of the Jews, John ix. 1, 2.—But a third sort of reasoners, not satisfied with either of these solutions, maintained, that the world hath existed from eternity by successive generations and corruptions, in the manner we see it present, without any first cause at all. This was the opinion of the Ariantist philosophers. A fourth sort affirmed, that the world owes its origin to what they termed the fortuitous concourse of atoms, and that it is not governed by any intelligent principle whatever. This was the scheme of the Epicureans, who, to avoid the odium of the populace, pretended indeed to acknowledge the existence of gods, but denied that they made the world, or took any concern whatever in its affairs.

In this uncertainty, or rather darkness, concerning the origin of the world, revelation hath seasonably interposed. For it assured us, That there is but one first Cause of all things, who is not only infinitely powerful, but infinitely good: That all the beings in the universe derive their existence from him, are absolutely dependent on him, and subject to his government; That whatever evil exists in the world, is the natural consequence of that freedom of will with which God originally endowed his rational creatures, in order to render them moral and accountable agents: And that the first parents of mankind, abusing their liberty of action, subjected themselves and their posterity to sin and death by one single act of disobedience: But that, for remedying these evils, God was graciously pleased in his original plan, to appoint the mediation of his Son, whereby the penal consequences of sin are so far prevented, that they do not take place in all cases; for as many of mankind as are delivered by him from the power of sin, shall at length be also delivered from its punishment, and be raised to a degree of perfection and happiness, greater than if they never had sinned. The mediation therefore of Christ, by which he remitted the evils which were introduced into the world through the disobedience of the parents of the human race, hath for its object to deliver mankind, first, from the power, and, secondly, from the punishment of sin.

SECT. I.—Of the Mediation of Christ as a Priest, whereby the penal consequences of Sin are so far prevented, that they do not take place among Mankind universally.

To prevent the penal consequences of sin from taking place among mankind universally, revelation assured us, that the Son of God, by the appointment of his Father, made propitiation for the sins of mankind by his sufferings and death in the human nature; that is, by his sufferings and death he hath rendered it consistent with the character of God, as the moral governor of the world, in certain cases to pardon sinners: For we are told, Rom. v. 12. that 'as by the obedience of one man, (Adam), sin entered into the world, and by sin death—so by the obedience of one man, (Christ), righteousness entered into the world, and by righteousness life'; that is, an opportunity of becoming righteous, and of obtaining life, was granted to mankind on account of the obedience of Christ.

To this account of the ruin and recovery of the human species, various objections have been made. And, first, it hath been loudly urged, That to involve all mankind in sin and misery, on account of a disobedience to which they were nowise necessary, and to bestow righteousness and life, or an opportunity of obtaining these blessings, through an obedience in which they had no concern, are both of them contrary to our natural ideas of the justice and goodness of God.

To this objection, however, it is a sufficient answer to observe, that the very same constitution takes place in the present state of things. For we see evils brought on the innocent, and favours communicated to the guilty, through actions in which neither the one nor the other had any hand. Thus, the misconduct of kings and rulers brings misery on their subjects, who are not necessary to their follies. The sins of parents, in like manner, bring poverty, distress, and even death, on their innocent children. — On the other hand, the wisdom and justice of princes are productive of happiness to their people: The virtues also, and heroic deeds of parents, bring honours and riches to their descendants, which remain with them often to the latest posterity.

This constitution of God, whereby evils are brought on innocent persons, for the faults of others in which they were nowise concerned; and blessings are conveyed to the unworthy, for the good deeds of others to which they contributed nothing— is not repugnant to the ideas which mankind entertain of justice and goodness. For, by universal consent, in all well regulated human governments, without any imputation of injustice, a similar constitution is established by law, through which, on the one hand, children are involved in the punishment inflicted on their parents, for crimes of which the children are entirely innocent; and, on the other, are made to share in the honours and rewards conferred on their parents, for virtues to which the children contributed nothing.

Since, then, by the appointment of men, so many evils befal the innocent, and so many benefits come to the undeserving, on account of actions performed by others, in which they had not the least concern, why should it be thought inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God, as moral governor of the world, to have subjected Adam's posterity to sin and death on account of his offence, notwithstanding they were in no respect necessary thereto? And having subjected them to these evils, it certainly must appear both proper and just, that he should have provided a remedy for them by the obedience of his Son, although the persons benefited by it contributed nothing to his obedience. Wherefore, the account which revelation hath given of the introduction of sin and misery into the world, and of the method in which these evils are remedied, cannot be found fault with, although in either case no regard was had to the personal demerit of the individuals affected thereby; but, in both, God acted agreeably to the sovereignty of his own will.

To prevent any mistake, however, on this head, let it be observed, that what hath been advanced it by no means follows, that mankind are not to be rewarded or punished according to the nature of their own deeds. For, as B. Butler hath observed, Analogy, part ii. chap. 5. sect. 7. "The world's being under the righteous government of God, does indeed imply, that, finally and upon the whole, every one shall receive according to his personal deserts: And the general doctrine of the whole scripture is, that this shall be the completion of the divine government. But during the progress, and, for aught we know, even in order to the completion of this moral scheme, vicarious punishments may be fit and absolutely necessary." And if so, vicarious rewards may also be necessary for the same end.

Secondly, To the foregoing vindication of the account given in revelation of the ruin and recovery of the human species, it may be objected, that the evils which, according to the present constitution of things, are brought on the innocent by the vices of the guilty, and the benefits which the undeserving receive through the good deeds of the virtuous, are things merely accidental, owing to the natural relations by which mankind are connected: Consequently, that no argument can be drawn from such a constitution, to prove that it was consistent with the justice and goodness of God to subject Christ, an innocent person, to sufferings and death, for the sake either of saving the guilty from the penal consequences of their transgressions, or of bestowing favours on the undeserving. True. Such an argument does not follow from that part of the constitution of things just now explained: But it follows from another part of the same constitution, equally original and equally evident. For, to use Butler's words immediately following those already quoted, "Men by their follies run themselves into extreme distress, into difficulties which would be absolutely fatal to them, were it not for the interposition and assistance of others. God commands by the law of nature, that we afford them this assistance, in many cases where we cannot do it without very great pains and labour and sufferings to ourselves. And we see in what variety of ways one person's sufferings contribute to the relief of another; and how or by what particular means this comes to pass, or follows, from the constitution and laws of nature which come under our notice; and being familiarized to it, men are not shocked with it." For example, many, by their vices and follies, bring on themselves diseases, and a variety of accidents, which would often prove fatal to them, were it not for the timely assistance afforded to them by others, who, in kindling them that assistance, sometimes expose themselves to great dangers, and sometimes subject themselves to long and painful sufferings. Having therefore, in the present constitution of things, instances of innocent persons suffering voluntarily, by the express appointment of God, extreme evils for the sake of alleviating or removing the temporal penal consequences of the sins of others, it cannot be thought inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God, in his original plan of the government of our world, to have provided that the eternal penal consequences which he hath connected with sin, shall not in every case, and to every person, inevitably follow their transgression; and even that this deliverance should be accomplished by a person different from the sinner himself, who, for a purpose so benevolent, voluntarily exposed himself to the greatest sufferings for a time. To object against this appointment, is in reality to object against God's original constitution of nature, and against the daily course of his providence in the government of the world. For, as the before mentioned excellent author hath observed, Anal. part ii. ch. 5. sect. 7. "The world is a constitution or system, whose parts have a mutual reference to each other: And there is a scheme of things gradually carrying on, called the course of nature, to the carrying on of which God hath appointed us, in various ways, to contribute. And when, in the daily course of nature, we are appointed that innocent people should suffer for the faults of the guilty, this is liable to the very same objection as the instance we are now considering. The infinitely greater importance of that appointment of Christianity, which is objected against, does not hinder but it may be, as it plainly is, an appointment of the very same kind with what the world affords us daily examples of. Nay, if there were any force at all in the objection, it would be stronger, in one respect, against natural providence than against Christianity: Because, under the former, we are in many cases commanded, and even necessitated, whether we will or no, to suffer for the faults of others; whereas the sufferings of Christ were voluntary."

Thirdly, To the efficacy of the sufferings and death of Christ in preventing the future penal consequences of sin, it hath been objected, That we do not understand how they can have any such efficacy. True; we do not understand this, because revelation hath only discovered to us the fact, without explaining the manner in which it is brought to pass. Nevertheless, from the silence of scripture, and from our ignorance of the manner in which Christ's sufferings and death operate in preventing the future penal consequences of sin, it doth not follow, that his sufferings and death have not such efficacy, by an extraordinary and tyrannical appointment. They may have it in the way of natural consequence. For, to use B. Butler’s words, Anal. part ii. c. 5. sect. 7. “What has been often alleged in justification of this doctrine, even from the apparent natural tendency of this method of our redemption—it tends to vindicate the authority of God’s laws, and deter his creatures from sin; this has never yet been answered, and is, I think, plainly unanswerable: though I am far from thinking it an account of the whole of the case. But without taking this into consideration, it abundantly appears, from the observations above made, that this objection is not an objection against Christianity, but against the whole general constitution of nature. And if it were to be considered as an objection against Christianity, or, considering it as it is an objection against the constitution of nature, it amounts to no more in conclusion than this. That a divine appointment cannot be necessary or expedient, because the objector, does not discern it to be so; though he must own, that the nature of the case is such as renders him incapable of judging whether it be so or not, or of seeing it to be necessary, though it were so.”—Further, as the same excellent reasoner observes in the same page, “Though it is highly right, and the most pious exercise of our understanding, to inquire with due reverence into the ends and reasons of God’s dispensations; yet, when those reasons are concealed, to argue from our ignorance, that such dispensations cannot be from God, is infinitely absurd. The presumption of this kind of objections, seems almost lost in the folly of them: And the folly of them is yet greater, when they are urged, as usually they are, against things in Christianity, analogous or like to those natural dispensations of providence which are matter of experience. Let reason be kept to, and if any part of the scripture account of the redemption of the world by Christ, can be shewn to be really contrary to it, let the scripture, in the name of God, be given up. But let not such poor creatures as we, go on in objecting against an infinite scheme, that we do not see the necessity or usefulness of all its parts, and call this reasoning.”

Fourthly, To the efficacy of the sufferings and death of Christ in preventing the future penal consequences of sin, it hath been objected that it is unnecessary; because, sinners being rendered capable of pardon by repentance, God, whose goodness is infinite, will pardon them without any atonement: that is, he will, in consequence of the sinner’s repentance, prevent the future penal consequences of his sins from befalling him. But, before an objection of this kind is urged, the objector ought to know, whether there are any reasons which make the punishment of sin necessary under the moral government of God: And if there are such reasons, whether they may be dispensed with in every case where repentance takes place: And what effect the dispensing with these reasons, and the pardoning of the sinner simply on his repentance, would have on the other subjects of God. To the determining of these questions, such a knowledge of the whole plan of God’s moral government, and of the relation of its various parts to each other, and of the purposes for which, and the means by which he carries on his government, is necessary, as doth not fall within the comprehension of human reason. In such a state of ignorance, for any one to determine, in opposition to the scheme of salvation made known in revelation, that God may and will pardon sinners simply on their repentance, seems not a little presumptuous.

Were we to judge of this matter by what happens in the present life, we should be led to believe, that repentance will not, by itself, prevent the penal consequences of sin in the life to come. For when men ruin their fortunes by extravagance, or their health by excess in sensual indulgences, it is well known, that repentance alone doth not remove these evil consequences of their follies and excesses. In like manner, when individuals incur the penalties of human laws, no wise governor finds it either reasonable in itself, or expedient for the good of the community, to free the criminal from the punishment which the wholesome laws of the state have been concerned to such crimes, merely because he hath repented of them. The punishment of criminals is necessary to deter others from committing the like offences. Wherefore, if in the present life repentance is never found of itself to remove the temporal evil consequences which God hath connected with vice; also, if men themselves being judges, repentance ought not to prevent the punishment of crimes injurious to society, what reason hath any person, from the present constitution of things, to expect that repentance of itself will prevent those penal consequences which God may have thought fit to annex to vice in the life to come? Much more, what reason hath any one, from the present constitution of things, to expect that repentance and reformation will put the sinner into the condition he would have been in, if he had always preserved his innocence? The prevalence of propitiatory sacrifices in every age and country of the world, certainly sheweth it to be the general sense of mankind, that repentance is not of itself sufficient to procure the pardon of sin; but that something besides is necessary to induce the Deity to be propitious, even to the penitent sinner.

I acknowledge, indeed, that the prevention of the bad consequences of vice, and the removal of these consequences when they happen, which is in the present constitution of things sometimes takes place through the timely assistance of others, affords a presumption, that the connection between sin and punishment is not so rigid, but that in certain cases it may be broken. This presumption, however, goeth no farther than to afford a slight hope, that punishment, even in the life to come, may possibly be avoided through some foreign assistance. But whether any such assistance be actually provided, and what that assistance is, and by whom it is to be afforded, cannot be known from the present constitution of things.

It is God alone who can discover these things to us. Wherefore, if revelation teacheth that God hath been pleased, through the vicarious sufferings of his Son, to prevent those penal consequences from coming on sinners in the future life, which in the original constitution of things he hath connected with sin, these things should not be objected against because they are not discoverable by human reason. The only thing proper for us to do is, to inquire whether it be really a doctrine of revelation, that through the sufferings of Christ the penal consequences of sin are, in the life to come, to be prevented from coming on the sinner, who, having repented of his sins and reformed his conduct, is capable of being pardoned? And if, on inquiry, this is found to be a doctrine of revelation, “our wisdom is,” as Butler observes, “thankfully to accept the benefit, by performing the conditions upon which it is offered, without disputing how it was procured on the part of Christ.”

Sect. II.—Shewing it to be a Doctrine of Revelation, that Christ hath made atonement for the sin of the world by his death.

That Christ hath made atonement for the sins of men by his sufferings and death, is revealed in all those passages of scripture where his death is represented as a propitiatory sacrifice. For since, according to the ideas which, in every age and nation, mankind have entertained of propitiatory sacrifices, they were believed to have a real efficacy in procuring the pardon of sin, the scriptures, by calling Christ’s death a sacrifice for sin, have declared it to have that efficacy; and have taught us to expect pardon, through the efficacy of that sacrifice.
To recite all the passages of the Jewish and Christian revelations, in which the sufferings and death of Christ are spoken of as a propitiatory sacrifice, and the pardon of sin is represented as owing to the efficacy of that sacrifice, would lengthen this Essay beyond bounds. The following appear to be some of the principal passages, and therefore they merit the reader's attention:—Isa. iii. 6. 'The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.' 10. 'When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed.'—John i. 29. 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.'—Rom. iii. 25. 'Who hath given God hath set forth as a propitiation through faith in his blood, for a proof of his own righteousness in passing by the sins which were before committed through the forbearance of God.' 26. 'For a proof also of his righteousness in the present time, in order that he may be just, when justifying him who is of the faith of Jesus.'—Rom. iv. 25. 'Who was delivered to death for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.'—Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us.'—Eph. i. 7. 'By whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.'—Heb. ii. 14. 'Since then the children partake of flesh and blood, even he in like manner partook of these, that through death he might render ineffectual him who had the power of death, that is, the devil.'—Heb. ix. 25. 'Not however, that he should offer himself once as the high-priest entereth into the holy places every year with other blood. 26. For then he must often have suffered since the formation of the world; but now once, at the conclusion of the ages, he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offering by the sacrifice of himself. 27. And so much as it is appointed to men once to die, and after that the judgment; 28. So also Christ, being once offered in order to carry away the sins of many, will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time without sin-offering, in order to salvation.'—Heb. x. 10. 'By which will we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Christ once.'—1 Pet. iii. 18. 'For Christ also hath once suffered for sin, the just for the unright, that he might bring us to God.'

These passages, with many others which might be mentioned, taken according to their plain meaning, in conjunction with what Christ said to his disciples, when he instituted his supper, to prevent his death, and the ends for which he died, from being forgotten in the world; namely, 'This is my body of the new covenant which is shed for many for the remission of sins,' Matt. xxvi. 28. I say, these passages teach us, That Christ's sufferings and death have, as B. Butler expresses it, "an efficacy additional to, and beyond mere instruction, example, and government."

To elude, however, the force of the argument taken from the account given in the scriptures of the end for which Christ suffered and died, some have affirmed,

First, That Christ's death is called a sacrifice for sin, not because it was really such a sacrifice, but merely in accommodation to the prejudices of mankind, who from the beginning of the world, expected the pardon of their sins through the efficacy of sacrifice. To this the answer is, 1. We know that Christ's death is not called a sacrifice for sin, in accommodation to the prejudices of the Jews, and in conformity to the Mosaic phraseology; but that the Mosaic phraseology was founded on the Levitical sacrifices being types or prefigurations of the sacrifice of Christ. So we are assured, Heb. viii. 5. 'These serve with a representation and shadow of heavenly things, since Moses, when about to construct the tabernacle, was admonished of God—See now, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern which was shown thee in the Mount.' For from this it appears, that as the tabernacle which Moses finished was a copy of the tabernacle shewed to him on the Mount, so the Levitical priesthood, which he appointed, was a type of the priesthood of Christ; and the service of the Levitical priests, which he appointed to be performed in the earthly tabernacle, agreeably to the pattern shewed to him in the Mount, was a type of the service of Christ, as an high-priest, in the heavenly holy places. The same thing appears from many other passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Wherefore, the death of Christ was not called by the inspired writers a sacrifice for sin, in allusion to the Levitical sin-offerings; but these were called sacrifices for sin, because they were types or prefigurations of the real sacrifice of Christ. 2. If, in the account which the inspired writers have given of Christ's death as a sacrifice for sin, they have not alluded to the Levitical sacrifices, it will readily be allowed, that they have far less alluded to the heathen sacrifices. For these not being of divine institution, as the Levitical sacrifices were, if the sacred writers have called Christ's death a sacrifice for sin, in allusion to the heathen sacrifices, they have given to those superstitions an importance to which they were by no means entitled. 3. If Christ, in speaking of his blood as shed for the remission of sin, and his apostles, in sacrificing to his death all the efficacy which the sacrifices for sin were supposed, both by the Jews and Gentiles, to possess, have not expressed what is true in fact, but only have accommodated their language to the ill-founded and foolish hopes of mankind, they have deceived us in a matter of the greatest importance. And the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was written professedly to prove that Christ really offered himself a sacrifice for sin, is a pernicious writing; because, by establishing a false fact, it had led mankind to trust for the pardon of their sins to a lie.

Secondly, To destroy the argument by which Christ's death is proved to be a real sacrifice for sin, taken from the account given of it in scripture, there are some who contend that it is called a sacrifice for sin in a metaphorical sense only; because he died for the confirmation of his doctrine concerning the pardon of sin to be obtained through repentance, and as an example of patience and fortitude in suffering for righteousness sake, whereby his disciples are strongly excited to virtue. The persons of whom I speak, supposing, it seems, that to the pardon of a sinner nothing is requisite but his repentance and reformation, affirm, that Christ's death, by which the reformation and virtue of the world are so effectually promoted, may be called a sacrifice for the sin of the world in a metaphorical sense, with as much propriety as prayer, and praise, and almsgiving, are called sacrifices with which God is well pleased.'—But not to insist on what is well known, that prayer, and praise, and almsgiving, are nowhere called sacrifices for sin, I reply, 1. That if Christ's death had no other efficacy in procuring pardon for sinners, but by promoting their reformation, and exciting them to virtue, the sufferings and death of any other prophet or martyr may, with as much truth and propriety as the sufferings and death of Christ, be called a sacrifice for sin; and the salvation of sufferers may as truly be ascribed to their sufferings and death, as to Christ's; at least, in as far as their sufferings added weight to their doctrine; and in proportion to the influence which their doctrine, in conjunction with their example, hath had in exciting others to virtue. Yet notwithstanding where in scripture are the sufferings of any prophet or martyr termed a sacrifice for the sin of the world; nor is the salvation of sufferers ascribed to any of them; nor are they among the sacrifices of which in particular, the apostle Paul, who, next to his Master, suffered the greatest evils for the confirmation of the gospel, and who exhibited such admirable examples of all the virtues, both active and passive, hath nowhere spoken of his own sufferings and death as a sacrifice for sin. He speaks, indeed, Philip, ii. 17. of his willingness to be 'poured out upon the sacrifices and service of the faith' of the Philippians. But not to mention, that the faith of the Philippians is called the sacrifice, the allusion is not to the sin-offering, but to the meat-offering, on which oil was commonly poured, Lev. vi. 15. Consequently, the apostle's meaning, strict of the metaphor, is simply, that he was willing to die for the confirmation of the faith of the Philippians, that being made strong, it might be rendered acceptable to God; as is evident from 2 Tim. iv. 6, where the same expression is introduced and applied to the apostle's dying: '这份 συναγωγή, 'I am already poured out, and the time of my departure hath come.' In short, so far was Paul from considering his own sufferings as a sacrifice for sin, that he rejected the idea with abhorrence: 1 Cor. i. 13. 'Was Paul crucified for you? 1—2. If the efficacy of the death of Christ in saving mankind, consisted only in its being a confirmation of his doctrine, and in its being an illustrious example of courageous suffering for truth, whereby mankind are powerfully excited to virtue, How can those be saved by his death who lived before he came into the world, most of whom never heard that he was to come and die, and could know nothing either of his doctrine or example? In like manner, How can those be saved by his doctrine and death, who, although they have lived since his coming, never have heard of either? And yet, in the scriptures, all who shall be saved from the beginning to the end of the world, are expressly declared to be saved through the efficacy of his death: John ii. 2. 'He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world.'—John xi. 51. 'This he spake not of himself; but being high-priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God who were scattered abroad.'—3. Although it be true that Christ's death hath a powerful influence in promoting the practice of virtue among those to whom it is made known, that influence cannot be the only reason of its being called 'a propitiation for the sins of the whole world.' To merit that appellation, it must, as was formerly observed, have some efficacy additional to, and beyond mere instruction, example, and government, of which many of mankind are to have the benefit, although they have never heard of Christ's death.—What that influence is, and how it operates in procuring pardon for penitent sinners, God hath nowhere told us; but its effects he hath clearly enough revealed from the beginning of the world, in the sentence which he passed on the serpent after it seduced our first parents, Gen. iii. 15. by foretelling that 'the seed of the woman would bruise the serpent's head,' and in so doing have his 'own heel bruised.' God declared, that the seed of the woman, by dying, would render the malicious contrivance of the devil for destroying the human species abortive. Accordingly, in the sentence which God passed on Adam and Eve, by saying, that she was to 'bring forth children in sorrow,' and that he was 'to eat bread in the sweat of his face, till he returned to the ground,' God intimated, that he permitted them to live and beget children: and placed them and their posterity, from that time forward, to the end of the world, under a law better suited to their weakened nature, than that which they had lately broken; and that he granted them this grace, or favour, on account of the seed of the woman having his heel bruised when he should bruise the serpent's head. In this first instance, therefore, the death of Christ in prospect had the efficacy to suspend the chief temporal penal consequences of Adam's sin. And by procuring for him, and all his posterity, a new trial under a more gracious law than the first, it will, in the second instance, prevent the eternal penal consequences of sin, with respect to all who, through faith and repentance, are capable of being pardoned. Such, then, according to revelation, is the efficacy of the sufferings and death of Christ as a sacrifice for sin, in preventing the penal consequences of men's transgressions, both in this life and in that which is to come.

Sect. III.—Of the Mediation of Christ as a Prophet and King, whereby mankind are delivered from the power of sin.

Having described and defended the mediation of Christ as a priest, whereby sinners are freed from the punishment of sin, it remains to treat of his mediation as a prophet and king, by which they are delivered from the power of sin.

After mankind had remained under the guidance of their own reason, as long as was necessary for making them sensible, by experience, of its insufficiency to lead them to the knowledge and practice of their duty; and after the most learned heathen nations had actually lost the knowledge of God, and were become excessively corrupted, it pleased God to send his Son into the world, as a prophet divinely commissioned and inspired, to teach them the doctrines and precepts of religion, and to make known to them the rewards and punishments of a future state.

Christ's mediation as a prophet, Butler hath described, Anm. part ii. chap. 5. sect. 6. in the following terms—"He published anew the law of nature, which men had corrupted, and the very knowledge of which, to some degree, was lost among them. He taught mankind, taught us authoritatively, to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world, in expectation of the future judgment of God. He confirmed the truth of this moral system of nature, and gave us additional evidence of it; the evidence of testimony. He distinctly revealed the manner in which God would be worshipped, the efficacy of repentance, and the rewards and punishments of a future life. Thus, he was a prophet in a sense in which no other ever was. To which is to be added, that he set us a perfect example, that we should follow his steps." To this mediation of Christ as a prophet it may perhaps be objected, that it was not necessary, because, by his own immediate operation, God might have communicated to mankind, at their birth, whatever knowledge of the doctrines, and precepts, and sanctions of religion, was requisite. True; he could have done this: but the objector should remember, that in the knowledge of religion by the mediation of his Son, is analogous to the method in which God instructs them in the knowledge of the things pertaining to the present life. For, notwithstanding he could easily have brought the whole human species into the world with the knowledge and experience of full-grown men, he hath not thought fit to adopt that constitution, but bringeth them all into the world infants, ignorant of every thing; and maketh use of the mediation of their parents and teachers, for conveying to them the knowledge necessary to their conducting the affairs of the present life properly. Just so, God hath not thought fit to bring the human species into the world, endowed with the complete knowledge of spiritual and divine things; but, for their instruction in these matters, maketh use of the mediation of Christ, that is, maketh use of the labours of the holy prophets, apostles, and ministers of Christ, seconded by the influences of his Spirit. And where the instruction of prophets and apostles, and of the ministers of the gospel, is withheld, Christ, in the course of his providence, raiseth up in every nation teachers from time to time, whose labours, likewise, he rendereth successful to a certain degree, by the influences of his Spirit. Wherefore, this method of instructing mankind in matters of religion and morality, by the meditation of Christ, being similar to the method in which God instructs them in the matters which relate to the present life, by the mediation of parents and teachers, it cannot be objected against as unwise in view of God.

Secondly, for delivering mankind from the power of sin, and leading them to the practice of virtue, God appointed his Son's meditation as a king; that is, he hath made him governor of the world, and appointed him to erect a kingdom in it which is not of this world, and authorised him to govern it, not by force, but by methods suited to that rational nature, and that liberty of action, wherewith he hath endowed men, that, becoming his subjects willingly, they may obey his laws from choice. This spiritual kingdom Christ hath erected, by uniting into one church, or religious community, all those, who through his mediation as a prophet, being enlightened with the knowledge of true religion, have received his laws as the rule of their conduct. To this church Christ hath committed all those revelations which God hath pleased to make to mankind, both in early and in later times, to be preserved for the benefit of the world. In this church also, Christ hath appointed the pure spiritual worship of God to be performed publicly, and a standing invitation to religion to be given to sinners to the end of the world, by ministers specially set apart to that office, to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God. This church, or religious community, Christ governs not only by laws written on the hearts of individuals, but also by laws written explicitly in his word. With this church Christ is ever present in an invisible manner; and is gradually enlarging it, and thereby is extending his kingdom through the world; and hath promised to protect it by his providence against its enemies, so that the gates of hell shall never prevail against it in such a manner as to destroy it. Besides this outward visible church, consisting of all who are favoured with an external revelation, and who profess to believe that revelation, Christ hath another church or kingdom, which likewise is not of this world, called his cathedra invisibilis church, consisting of all persons, scattered over the face of the earth, who live in obedience to his laws written on their hearts, and who worship God by those natural acts of piety which right reason dictates. This church also Christ protects by his providence, so that it shall never perish. To the end of the world there shall still be men in every age and nation, who make conscience of knowing and doing the will of God according to the light afforded them by their own natural powers, and by such instructors as from time to time Christ raiseth up to teach them. Lastly, though great numbers of mankind, both in his visible church and out of it, do not obey the laws of Christ sincerely, yet as all are bound to obey him, they shall all be judged by him at last; and in such a manner, that his government will issue in infinite and endless happiness to the obedient, but in unutterable misery to the obstinately rebellious. For Christ is gone to prepare a place for his people, and will return to take them to himself, that where he is, there they may be also. At which time likewise he will send everlasting destruction on them who know not God, as well as on them who obey not the gospel of his Son.

To the mediation of Christ as a king, for the purpose of delivering mankind from the power of sin, and of training them to virtue, it hath been objected, that it is unnecessary, because, as God might have brought every individual of the human species into the world perfect in knowledge, so he might have brought them into the world perfect in virtue; and if, afterwards, any of them had fallen into vice, he might have restored them by an immediate exertion of his own power, without having recourse to such a complicated constitution as the mediation of his Son. True: But it should be considered, that in the natural world nothing is brought to pass by an immediate exertion of the power of God, excepting what are called the laws of nature. All other things are accomplished by the intervention of means. For instance, whatever hath life, is brought into the world by the instrumentality of parents, although God could have brought them into life merely by willing it. In like manner, he might have supported the life of animals by his own power, without the intervention of means, if he had so pleased. Yet he hath chosen to do it by food, to the production whereof a great variety of means are employed; in each of which his wisdom, and power, and goodness, are as much exerted and displayed, as they would have been if the life of animals had been supported by an immediate exertion of his power, without any means. This being the course which God follows in the administration of his natural kingdom, why should it be thought proper for him to follow a different course in the government of the moral world? As Taylor justly observes, In accomplishing his purposes, in the moral as well as in the natural world, God hath multiplied and beautifully diversified the displays of his perfections, in such a sensible manner, that the attention of his intelligent creatures is roused, their powers of contemplation are exercised, their admiration and gratitude are excited to a much higher degree, than if every thing in the natural and moral world had been produced without means. In this constitution, therefore, there is the greatest propriety; since it is impossible to turn our eyes to any part of either world, without beholding God in those multiplied and varied exercitations of his perfections, by which he accomplishes his purposes. So that in both worlds God employs means, not because he is deficient either in wisdom or in power, but to multiply the instances of both; and to set these before his rational creatures, as the most engaging subjects of contemplation, and the most powerful motives of action:—A method of exerting his perfections more proper in the moral world than even in the natural; because to render men accountable, it is necessary that they be induced by rational considerations to become virtuous from choice.

Thus, as Butler observes, it appears, that against the mediation of Christ as a prophet and king, there lieh no objection, but what may be urged with equal force against the natural providence of God.

Sect. IV.—Of the Objection to the Mediation of Christ, taken from the Dignity of his Person.

Notwithstanding all that hath been said in vindication of the mediation of Christ, there is still remainder, which we have not hitherto mentioned, but which I have reserved last of all, to be treated of by myself, because being loved, not against any one part of the mediation of Christ, but against the whole thereof, it requires to be completely discussed. The objection of which I speak, is that taken from the dignity of the Mediator, and the vicinity of the creatures for whom his mediation was appointed.

In scripture, the Mediator is said to be the only begotten Son of God, the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person; the first-born of all the creatures, lying in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible; and who having made all things, uphouldeth them by the word of his power, and governs the whole as its Lord or proprietor. This great personage is said to have divested himself of the form of God, and to have appeared on earth in the likeness of man, and to have humbled himself still further, by suffering the painful and ignominious death of the cross as a malefactor; and all for the purpose of saving the sinful inhabitants of this earth, which, in comparison of the immensity of the universe, is as nothing; and who being, as is supposed, the lowest order of God's rational creatures, their salvation, it is affirmed, was an end too inconsiderable to merit that a person of such dignity should assume the human nature, and therein die as a malefactor to accomplish it; and that, after his resurrection, he should continue united to the human nature for ever. These things, it is said, are so astonishing, that our understanding, dazzled and confounded by them, cannot conceive them to be possible.

This objection being considered by infidels as sufficient to overturn the gospel from the foundation, merits our attention; especially as it is plausible, and at times hath occasioned doubts in the minds even of enlightened believers. To remove this embarrassing objection, let it be observed, that notwithstanding the mediation of so great a person as the only begotten Son of God, for the salvation of the human species, may at first sight appear a transaction unworthy of him, on account of the low rank mankind hold in the creation, and on account of the small dimensions of the earth, their present habitation, in comparison with the other orbs which are supposed to be inhabited, and which compose the great system of the universe, the mediation of the Son of God for the salvation of such creatures will not appear unworthy of him, if the importance of the human species, as rational creatures, is justly estimated, and the constitution of the earth, their present dwelling-place, is duly attended to.

And first, to begin with the earth, the habitation of the human species, for whose salvation the mediation of Christ was appointed, it is acknowledged, that, in respect of its magnitude, it holds but a middle rank even among the orbs of which our solar system consists. Nevertheless its importance, as the dwelling-place of mankind, may depend, not so much on its relative magnitude, as on the exquisite contrivance of its parts, their nice arrangement, their suitableness to produce the ends for which they were designed. Judging of the earth according to this rule, although it now lieth under the curse of God, and bringeth forth to man nothing spontaneously but thorns and thistles, Gen. iii. 18. it was, in its primitive state, more excellent in many respects than it appears to be at present; as may be gathered from the excellence of its productions before it was cursed of God. Gen. ii. 9. 'Out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for fruit; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden,' whose fruit, by the operation of God, possessed the noble quality of rendering those who ate it immortal; just as the present fruits of the earth, by the same operation, keep men alive for a time; also it produced 'the tree of knowledge of good and evil,' which may be called the tree of death, because its fruit was of such malignity, that it not only introduced death into the body of him who ate of it, but also corrupted his mind by inflaming his passions; as our first parents by fatal experience found. Further, the importance of our globe in the mundane system may be learned from this, that one of the purposes for which the mediation of the Son of God was appointed, is declared in scripture to be, to put the righteous in possession of an habitation similar to the earth in its primitive state, that illustrious display of the perfections of God which was made in its original constitution, may not perish from the universe. Hence, the habitation of the righteous after the resurrection, is called 'a new heaven and a new earth;' and the creation thereof is termed, by the apostle Peter, Acts iii. 21. 'The restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' In this new earth, wherein the righteous are to live for ever in an embowed state, there will be no curse to spoil its con- texture, or to mar its productions, or to blast its beauty, as in this earth; but it will remain, without any change, an illustrious monument of the great Creator’s wisdom, power, and goodness, to all eternity; as was just now observed. And if so, are we not warranted to suppose, that, in the view of God, our earth had a pre-eminence above many other parts of the universe?

2. With respect to the human species, for whose salvation the mediation of Christ was appointed, although their habitation be but of small dimensions, considered in relation to the immensity of the universe, they may be of more account for their numbers than the inhabitants of any other world in the system, however great its dimensions may be. For who can tell, whether rational beings anywhere else propagate their kind, as the human species doth? and whether, anywhere else, the constitution taketh place which subsists in our world, in which multitudes die almost as soon as born, and multitudes live only a few years, then are removed, and their places are filled by new comers, who in like manner die and are succeeded. And, for as much as all who die, whether in early infancy or in advanced age, are to be brought a second time into life, namely by a general resurrection, and on that occasion are all to be finally disposed of, according to their different capacities and deserts; I say, when the mystery or secret purpose of God in creating such a number of human beings in this manner completed, the human species may be found more considerable for their number, than the inhabitants of other orbs whose dimensions are greater, but who do not die. And on account of their immense number, this our species may have been judged by God worthy to be redeemed, or saved from perishing, by the mediation of so great a person as his only begotten Son.

The multiplication of the human kind by generation, which takes place in our system, is a thing so wonderful, whether their bodies or their souls are considered, that were it not a matter of daily experience, it would be thought an absolute impossibility. Wherefore, if generation takes place in no other system of rational beings, the human species, to which that faculty hath been imparted, may be of more importance in the sight of God, than any other species which doth not possess the same faculty; and on account of their number, the new earth, or material habitation, which is to be assigned to them who are saved after they are restored to life, will probably be of greater magnitude than any earth or material habitation existing at present in the universe.

3. As the human species, the inhabitants of this earth, may, in respect of their number, be more considerable than the inhabitants of any other habitable globe, they may be more considerable even in respect of their nature. For as Taylor hath observed, in his Key to Romans, No. 139, the human body, though it is now contaminated with disease and subjected to death, having been created in its original state capable of immortality, it may have been the chief of all the organized material works of God; the work in which his wisdom and power shone most illustriously. For, as it is composed of a dense or gross fleshly substance, its structure must on that account be the more exquisite, in order to its being united to, and animated by a rational spirit, in such a manner that its organs of sensation should convey to that spirit ideas of things external; and its members, being actuated by the votations of that spirit, should become fit instruments of its operations during its union with the body. The superior excellence of the mechanism of the human body, may likewise be understood from God’s declared resolution to raise the bodies of all his holy prophets since the world began. In this new earth, wherein the righteous are to live for ever in an embowed state, there will be no curse to spoil its con- texture, or to mar its productions, or to blast its beauty, having raised them in this excellent form, reunited to their spirits, he will continue them so united for ever, that this most admirable piece of material mechanism may remain as eternal monument of his divine skill in its formation.

Next, with respect to the human spirit, although its faculties are greatly weakened, and their operations are exceedingly obstructed, through the disorder introduced into the human frame by our first parents eating the forbidden fruit, its faculties are of such a nature, and its operations are so excellent, as plainly to demonstrate, not only that man was originally made after the image of God, but that at the resurrection, when the human spirit is joined to a body fashioned like to the glorious body of Christ, its faculties will appear vastly superior to what they are now supposed to be. Wherefore, in respect of their spirits, the human species may be beings of an order eminently excellent. The sin which hath been, and still is in the world, is no proof of the meanness of the human nature; otherwise, as Taylor justly observes, No. 133, the angels who sinned will be proved to be as mean and contemptible in their nature as men. As little will the weakness of infancy, the imperfections of our views in the first stages of life, and our being subject to pain, disease, and death, prove us to be an inconsiderable part of the creation; since, as the same author remarks, the Son of God experienced in our nature all these disadvantages, and yet lost nothing of his original excellence. In short, for any thing that appears, there may be in the human mind powers and faculties equal to those of the highest angels, which, in the future state, when the soul is united to its glorified body, will display themselves in an admirable manner; agreeably to our Lord's declaration, Matt. xiii. 43. 'Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.'—The human species, both in respect of their body and spirit, being of a nature so excellent, their preservation must be acknowledged an end not unworthy of the infinite wisdom of God to accomplish, even by so great an interposition as the mediation of his own Son.

4. Although mankind, through the disobedience of their first parents, have been degraded below their natural rank, who, as Taylor suggests, can tell, whether the trials which in this degraded state they are exposed to, may not be more severe than the trials allotted to any other species of the rational creatures of God? The corrupted and diseased bodies in which our spirits are lodged, and which have a great influence, not only on our passions, but on our powers of perception and reasoning; the state of infancy and childhood, in which we remain so long subject to animal appetites and passions, without the aids of experience and reason, and in which habits of sensuality are early formed; the pernicious influence of the evil examples which continually surround us; with many other disadvantages, all concurring to render a right conduct in our present state extremely difficult;—I say, these things considered, the virtue of beings placed in such unfavourable circumstances, though it be not a perfect virtue, may in some respects excite the more perfect virtue of other beings who are not exposed to such a long and severe course of trial as that to which mankind are subjected. Wherefore, to produce a virtue thus tried, may have been an end not unworthy of the mediation of the Son of God: especially if we add,

6. That the virtue of beings circumstanced as men are, and exercised under such embarrassing difficulties and temptations, being superior to the virtue of other intelligent creatures who have not been so exercised and tried, it is far from being unreasonable to suppose with Taylor, that, by their trials and acquirements, the redeemed of the human species may be fitted for nobler employments and higher charges than other beings, who, perhaps, were naturally superior to them, but who are their inferiors in this second stage of their existence, not having been exercised and improved as they have been. To use the before-mentioned excellent author's words:—"Who can tell, how widely such as have honourably passed through the trials of this state may be dispersed through the universe; how much their capacities shall be enlarged; what offices and trusts will be put into their hands; how far their influence shall extend; and how much their salvation may contribute to the good order and happiness of the universe!" Something of this kind seems to be intimated in those expressions of scripture, in which the redeemed of the human species are represented as made 'kings and priests unto God, even the Father;' and in those passages where it is promised to him who overcometh, that 'he shall sit with Christ on his throne, even as he overcometh, and is set down with his Father on his throne.' And since we know by revelation, that some of the angels are at present employed as ministering spirits to such of the human race as shall be heirs of salvation, may not the redeemed of the human species, now raised to an high degree of perfection, be themselves employed, according to their different capacities, in the like offices to beings of an inferior nature? And notwithstanding the number of mankind, who from the beginning to the end of the world are to be thus exalted and rewarded, though great, may be but small in comparison of those who shall perish, this, instead of being an objection to the foregoing conjecture, is rather a confirmation thereof; because, being a proof of the severity of the trial to which mankind are exposed, it enhances the virtue of those who pass through that trial with honour, and showeth, that notwithstanding their number should be comparatively small, it was not below the dignity of the Son of God, for the sake of saving them, to assume the human nature, and to continue united to it for ever, as an eternal monument of what he did and suffered for their salvation.

6. We may even ask with Taylor, "Who can determine how far the scheme of redemption may exceed any scheme of the divine wisdom in other parts of the universe? Or how far it may affect the improvement and happiness of other intelligent creatures, even in the remotest regions?" The divine dispensations towards men may be made known in other systems by revelation, even as the sin and punishment of the angels have been made known to us. Besides, we are told expressly, Eph. iii. 10. 'That now to the governments, and to the powers in the heavenly regions, the manifold wisdom of God is made known through the church.' And St. Peter assures us, 1 Epist. i. 12, that 'these things the angels desire to look into.' It is therefore the sense of revelation, that the heavenly hosts study the wisdom and grace manifested in our redemption; and that they increase their stock of knowledge, by contemplating those displays which God hath made of his love in his dealings with mankind. If so, is it unreasonable to suppose, that the mediation of the Son of God for the salvation of men, will be made known to other systems of God's reasonable creatures; to whom also, if they stand in need of it, the benefit of Christ's death may be extended? And although they should not need any atonement, because they have not sinned, the knowledge that such an atonement was required and made for others, may have an influence in supporting God's government even among them, and in confirming them in their obedience for ever.

7. Lastly, As there is but one God who made and rules the universe, however different the methods may be by which he governs his rational creatures dispersed through the immense regions of space, it is reasonable to conclude, that these methods are all connected by some general principle, which hath such influence in them all, as to form one great and efficient plan for promoting the virtue and happiness of the whole. Now, who can tell whether the mediation of Christ for the salvation of the human species may not be a principle of the kind just now described? and whether it may not contribute to promote the virtue and happiness of all the rational creatures of God to whom it shall be made known, as well as to promote the virtue and happiness of the human species, for whom it was more immediately intended? It is true, we are ignorant at present of the manner in which Christ's mediation will operate among the various systems of God's rational creatures. But when a communication is opened among the different orders of intelligent beings dispersed through the universe, it is reasonable to think, that the manner in which the mediation of Christ opereth in promoting the virtue and happiness of the rational creatures which compose these different systems, will be discovered. And when that period arriveth, the mediation of Christ for the salvation of the human species will doubtless appear a truer and more highly worthy of God to have accomplished, and of the Son of God to have accomplished, even by a method so unexpected as his sufferings and death in the human nature.

Upon the whole, from the foregoing views of the human species, which are by no means irrational, this system, in which the purposes of God respecting us are brought to pass by trials and by a scheme of providence, which, for aught we know, have no place anywhere else in the universe, may exceed all the other systems, so far as to render the scheme of our redemption, and the mediation of so great a person as the only begotten Son of God for accomplishing it, highly worthy of the divine wisdom, notwithstanding the dimensions of the earth, our present dwelling-place, be incomconsiderable, compared with the immensity of the creation; and notwithstanding our species may, at first sight, appear inferior to the other rational creatures of God. For, as hath been already showed, the effects of the mediation of Christ for our salvation, may in many respects be highly beneficial to all God's rational creatures to whom it is made known; to those who inhabit the remotest regions of the universe, and even to such of them as hold the highest ranks in the scale of the creation.

PREFAE TO PHILIPPANS.

SECT. I.—Of the founding of the Church at Philippi.

Paul, with his assistants, Silas and Timothy, after having preached in most of the countries of the Lesser Asia, were directed by the Holy Ghost to pass over into Europe, in the spring of the year 51, for the purpose of offering salvation to the Greeks, at that time the most celebrated people in the world for their genius and learning. These messengers of God, therefore, loosing from Troas, landed at Neapolis, a city of Macedonia; but making no stay there, they went directly to Philippi, at that time a Roman colony. At Philippi, as the writer of the Acts of the Apostles informs us, chap. xvi. 18, they abode a considerable time, and converted many; among whom was Lydia, a native of the city of Thyatira, who now resided in Philippi for the sake of commerce; and the jailer of the prison into which Paul and Silas were cast. These, with the rest of the converted, afterwards rendered themselves remarkable by their love to the apostle, and their zeal to advance the progress of the gospel. Feeling themselves unspeakably happy in being brought out of the darkness of heathenism, they conceived, it seems, a strong desire that their countrymen should share in the same felicity; for while the apostle preached in Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia, the brethren at Philippi sent him money twice, that the success of the gospel might not be hindered by its preachers becoming burdensome to the Thessalonians. The same attention they showed to the apostle, and for the same reason, while he preached the gospel in Corinth, 2 Cor. xi. 9.—These, however, were not the only proofs which the Philippians gave of their good disposition. Their behaviour in other respects was every way worthy of their profession. They maintained the doctrine of the gospel in purity, and walked in the holy manner required by its precepts. The Christians at Philippi, therefore, were deservedly much beloved of the apostle. He visited them often as he passed to and from Greece, and in these visits confirmed them in the faith, and gave them much spiritual consolation.

SECT. II.—Of the Occasion of Writing the Epistle to the Philippians.

The brethren at Philippi having heard of their spiritual father's imprisonment at Rome, sent Epaphroditus, one of their most esteemed pastors, to that city, to comfort him, by making known to him their love, and by supplying him with money, that he might want nothing necessary to render his confinement easy, chap. iv. 18. In making this present to the apostle, all the brethren of that church, no doubt, contributed according to their ability; but none more liberally, we may believe, than Lydia, who was the apostle's first convert there, and who showed such attachment to Christ, and such regard to his servants, that she constrained them to lodge in her house all the time of their first abode at Philippi.—These bishops, likewise, and deacons, (of whom it seems there were several now in that church,) showed equal forwardness with the other brethren in expressing their respect for the apostle by so seasonable a gift; as may be gathered from his mentioning them particularly in the address of his letter.

This new instance of the Philippians' love to their spiritual father, and of their zeal for the gospel, making a deep impression on his mind, he wrote to them the letter in the canon bearing their name, in which he first of all praised them for their faith, and for their earnest desire to contribute to the spreading of the gospel. Next, as news which he knew would be most acceptable to the Philippians, he informed them, that he had preached with great success in Rome, and that his imprisonment, instead of hindering, had furthered the gospel, by making it known even in the palace itself. Then he expressed his hopes of being soon released: in which case he promised to visit them: but in the meantime he would send Timothy to comfort them. Also he thanked them in the most handsome manner for their kind remembrance of him, and for their care in supplying his wants. And to make them easy, he told them, that through their liberal gift he had every thing which his present situation rendered necessary.

From the manner in which the apostle expressed himself on this occasion it appears, that before he received the Philippians' present he was in great want even of necessaries; which may seem strange, considering how numerous and rich the brethren in Rome must have been. But we should remember, that as Paul had not converted the Romans, he did not think himself entitled to maintenance from them: That being a prisoner, he could not work, as in other places, for his own support: That from the churches where enemies and opposers had raised a faction against him, he never would take any thing: And that the Philippians were the only church with which he communicated, as concerning giving and receiving. This honour he did them, because they loved him exceedingly, had preserved his doctrine in purity, and always had behaved as sincere Christians.

The excellent character of the Philippians may be understood from the manner in which this epistle is written. For while most of his other letters contain reproaches of some for their errors, and of others for their bad conduct, throughout the whole of the Epistle to the Philippians no fault is found with any of them; unless the caution, chap. ii. 3, 4, to avoid strife and vain-glory in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, can be called a reproach. But his letter is employed entirely in commending them, or in giving them exhortations and encouragements, which, as Chrysostom long ago observed, "is a strong proof of the virtue of the Philippians, who gave their teacher no subject of complaint whatever." However, though the apostle entertained a good opinion of the Philippians, he by no means wished them to rest satisfied with their present attainments. For he told them, that he himself constantly endeavoured to make further progress in virtue, and ordered them all to walk by the same rule. The affectionate and encouraging strain in which the letter to the Philippians is written, was owing in part to the good account which Epaphroditus their pastor had given of their behaviour. But having brought word also, that the Judaizing teachers were endeavouring to introduce themselves among the Philippians, the apostle judged it necessary to put them on their guard against persons, whose whole business was to destroy the purity and peace of the churches. And therefore, in chap. iii. it is observable that the apostle's zeal for the truth, and his great love to the Philippians, led him to speak of these corruptors of the gospel with more bitterness than in any of his other letters. Perhaps, also, he was directed to do so by a particular impulse of the Spirit, who judged it proper that this sharpness should be used for opening the eyes of the faithful, and making them sensible of the malignity of the false teachers, and of the pernicious tendency of their doctrine.

After giving the Philippians, with their bishops and deacons, his apostolical benediction, St. Paul thanked God for their conversion; declared his persuasion that God would preserve them in the faith to the end of their lives, through the confirmation which the gospel would derive from his sufferings; expressed the most tender affection for them; and prayed God to bestow upon them spiritual blessings, that they might be filled with the fruits of righteousness, ver. 1—11. In the next place, lest they might have been afraid that his long imprisonment had been hurtful to the gospel of Christ, he assured them that it had contributed to advance that good cause, ver. 12. In so much that the gospel was now known in the palace itself, ver. 13. That the indulgence shown to him had made many of the brethren more bold in preaching than formerly, ver. 14.—Yet they were not all actuated by laudable motives, ver. 15. For some preached publicly, merely to enrage the priests and magistrates against him, as the ringleader of the Christians, ver. 16. But he told the Philippians, he knew that this, through the direction of the Spirit of Christ, would rather contribute to his enlargement, ver. 19. At the same time he declared his resolution boldly to defend the gospel when brought before the emperor, even although it were to bring death upon himself, ver. 20. To be continued in life, he told them, would promote the cause of Christ, but to die would be more for his own advantage, ver. 21. Therefore he was in a strait whether to choose life or death, ver. 23. Only knowing that his continuing in life would be more for their interest, ver. 24. He was persuaded by the apostle to visit them, ver. 26. In the mean time he exhorted them all to behave suitably to the gospel and, in particular, strenuously to maintain the true doctrine of the gospel, both against the unbelieving Jews and against the heathens, ver. 27. And to be in no respect terrified by their threatenings, ver. 28. But to suffer cheerfully for their faith in Christ, ver. 29. After the apostle's example, ver. 30.
PHILIPPIANS.

CHAP. I.—Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints (44) in Christ Jesus who are in Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:

2 Grace be to you, and peace (Rom. i. 7, note 3, 4.) from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 I thank my God upon every remembrance of you.

4 (Always in every prayer of mine for you all, with joy making prayer).

5 (Eph. 190.) For your fellowship in the gospel from the first day till now:

6 Being persuaded of this very thing, that he who hath begun in you good work, will be completing it unto the day of Jesus Christ.

7 As it is just for me to think this (Phil. 1. 7), concerning you all, because I have you in my heart, both in my bonds, and in my (my) defence, and confirmation of the gospel; ye all being joint partners of my grace.

8 For God is my witness that I long after you, with the bowels of Christ Jesus. (See Eus. iv. 84.)

9 And this I pray, that your love still more and more may abound through knowledge, and in all the sight of God.

10 In order that ye may approve the things that are excellent;

Ver. 1.—I. Paul and Timothy.—See Preface to I. Thessalonians, sect. 3, where the reason of Paul's inserting Timothy's name in the inscription of several of his epistles, although he was no apostle, is explained.—For Timothy's history and character, see Preface to I. Timothy.

2. Servants of Jesus Christ.—Gr. ἀπόστολοι, literally bondmen, slaves. This appellation was given to the chief ministers of the eastern princes. Wherefore it may be considered as an honourable title, as was observed Rom. i. 1, note 1. Or this appellation Paul and Timothy took, perhaps to express the labours and hardships while they were undergoing in the service of Christ.—In writing to the Philippians, Paul had no occasion to assert the apostolical authority. Therefore, they were discoursing among them, and all of them loved and obeyed him sincerely as an apostle of Christ.

3. With the bishops and deacons.—The English translator had rendering this, "Serviorum et ministrii." That the apostle ordained bishops and deacons in all the churches which he planted, I think evident from Acts xvi. 22, where they are called by the general name of elders: that there were such at Epheus, appears from Acts xx. 17, 18, where the elders of the church are expressly called bishops. Further, Gal. vi. 20, "The minister is set a servant of the church." And Col. iv. 17, 18, the presidents are spoken of: And Col. iv. 17, Archippus is said to have received "a ministry in the Lord among the Colossians." The apostle did not mention the bishops and deacons in the inscription of his other epistles, but there were reasons for mentioning them in this epistle, and for omitting them in the rest: It was a letter of thanks to the church at Philippi for the present of money they had sent him; and in making the collections for that purpose, the bishops and deacons may have shown such a forwardness as invited this mark of respect and gratitude. His letters to the other churches were all consisting of points both of faith and practice; and therefore they were not addressed to the bishops and deacons, but they might have imagined these writings were their property, and that if he addressed them they were the most proper persons to the people, they thought it; or at least to interpret them according to their own ideas; and that by this letter, Paul might show his respect to them, and make allowance to the people of the property of his imputed epistles, and to teach them to read and interpret them for themselves concerning their true meaning, they were all described to the churches, or to the saints in general. Besides, though they were first delivered to the bishops, or presidents, of the particular churches; it was not left to them to communicate the contents of these letters to the people by word of mouth; but they were ordered to read them in the apostles own words to all the hearers (I Thess. iv. 19); Thess. v. 27, and such as chose it, might take copies of these for their own use.

Ver. 3. Upon every remembrance of you.—I. In Capes, "auf every remembrance of you." The English translators think that Paul means by this, "All remembrance of you that hath been known to me," and that he is thinking of, and thinking with, the Philippians when he thinks of the conversion of the Thessalonians. Here the apostle prayed that their love here might multiply and abound.

Ver. 7. Because I have you in my heart, both in my bonds and my defence, and confirmation of the gospel.—Here the apostle declared that his sincere desire of the perseverance of the Philippians was the same with his bondages and sufferings. Paul having expressed in the apostles his attachment, his anxious concern for the comfort and prosperity of the Philippians, he now declares that heareth was to be his chief concern for their faithful maintenance of the apostles, and that he desired it for the good of the gospel. It is a root of all virtue (I Tim. i. 18). That the apostle had spoken of himself as a "servant of the Lord," and said that he was "a bondman of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 1), and that he was "a prisoner of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 7), and now that he is describing the nature of the bonds which he bore, and the restraint which he was under in the service of the gospel, he said to the Philippians, "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you." Paul speaks of the bondages which he bore in the service of the gospel as the same with every remembrance of the Philippians. It is a root of all virtue; and this apostle has expressed it by the term, "Because I have you in my heart." For "Because I have you in my heart, both in my bonds and my defence, and confirmation of the gospel," or the apostle has said, "Because I have you in my heart, I am both in bonds and in my defence, and confirmation of the gospel."

Ver. 8. Your love still more and more may abound.—The apostle had showed great love to mankind, and the Philippians had shewed great love to his person; and the apostle desired that the Philippians should love one another more, and thus increase the love which they had for the apostle. The Philippians had shewed great love to the apostle; and the apostle desired that the Philippians should love one another more, and thus increase the love which they had for the apostle. The apostle therefore desired that the Philippians should love one another more, and thus increase the love which they had for the apostle. The Philippians had shewed great love to the apostle; and the apostle desired that the Philippians should love one another more, and thus increase the love which they had for the apostle.

Ver. 9. The words set the apostle above all the other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. For he was a great man, and was full of grace and truth. And the apostle set the Philippians above all other men of his time. which are excellent! and that ye may be sincere, and without occasioning stumbling, until the day of Christ; 39 and then, like trees of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God.

13 Now, I wish you to know, brethren, that the things which have befallen me have turned out rather to the advancement of the gospel.

13 (Tit. 3:20.) For my bonds, (σωμάτων, as 164.) an account of Christ, are become manifest in the whole palace, and in all other places. 14 And many of the brethren in the Lord, being assured by my bonds, have become much more bold to speak the word without fear.

15 Some, indeed, even from envy and strife, and some also from good-will, preach Christ.

16 Now, they who from strife preach Christ, do it not sincerely, thinking to add affliction to my bonds.

17 But they who preach from love do it sincerely, (see ver. 16,) knowing that I am placed for the defence of the gospel.

Ver. 16—1. That ye may approve the things which are excellent. 2. And that ye may be sincere; — not, from mē, from, or out, the shining or splendour of the sun, and τιμῆς, Pachamarae's Dict. Property it denotes such things as, being examined by the brightest light, are found pure and without fault. In the New Testament, it is applied both to man’s reputation and mind and conduct. Elmer hath showed that it is used in that sense also by heathen writers. —Having said, ver. 9. Thus I pray (that) your love may yet more and more abound, &c. &c. He adds a new petition in this verse, i.e., that ye may be sincere: for the word ἄμεσα, εὐθύς, &c. He states the object, oρθός εἰς τον χριστόν, not to the Jews, nor to the Greeks, nor to the church of God. —See 1 Cor. iv. 3.

Ver. 12. The things which have befal me; —i.e., τιμῆς, literally, 'the things relating to me.' The apostle means that he had been a prisoner in Rome, and been kept in bonds there together with all the rest of those who had bailed him during his confinement. Ver. 13. Are well known in the whole palace, &c. &c. In Rome, the praetorium was the place where the praetor determined causes. More commonly, however, it signified a place without the city, where the praetorian cohorts or regiments of guards were lodged. In the provinces, the governor’s palace was called the praetorium, Mark xv. 16, both because the governor administered justice in his own palace, and because they had their guests stationed there. Of this use of the word we have an example, Mark xvi. 8. See also Acts xxiii. 31. Wherefore, though the apostle was himself at Rome when he wrote this, and though the matters of which he wrote were done in Rome, he uses the word praetorium, in the provincial sense, to denote the emperor’s palace, because he wrote to persons in the provinces. The knowledge of the true cause of the apostle’s confinement may have been spread through the palace by some Jewish slaves in the emperor’s family, who happening to hear Paul in his own hired house, were converted by him. At this time Rome was full of Jewish slaves. And that some such belonged to the palace, or had access to it, we learn from Josephus, De vita san., who tells us he was introduced to the emperor by means of a Jewish convert. —Such of the slaves in the palace, who had embraced the gospel, whether heathen or Jews, would not fail to show the officiers of the court whom they served, the true nature of the Christian faith, and the real cause of the apostle’s imprisonment; that it was for no crime, but only for preaching a new scheme of doctrine. And as it was now fashionable among the Romans to circulate a passion for philosophy, and many of them had a strong curiosity to be informed of every new doctrine which was being launched, and every strange occurrence which had happened in the province, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the knowledge in the palace would explain the Christian religion to the emperor’s domestics, and relate to them the resurrection of his author from the dead, and that some of them were of high rank, highly impressed with their religion, embraced the gospel. Those, with the persons who converted them, are ‘the saints of Caesar’s household,’ mentioned chap. iv. 22, as including the Philippians.

2. And in all other places.—The Christians at Rome were numerous before the apostle’s arrest; but their number was greatly increased in his preaching, and by the preaching of others also. It is no wonder, then, that in all places of the city the real cause of the apostle’s imprisonment, and the true nature of the gospel, were so well known.

Ver. 11. The word.—The Alexandrian, Clement, and other MSS., together with the Syriac and Vulgate versions, read οἰκονομίας, 'the word of God.'

Ver. 12. Some, indeed, even from envy and strife.—preach Christ.—By Christ, here, we are not to understand that corrupt gospel which the Judaizers preached, who made circumcision necessary to salvation. For of that gospel the apostle would not say, as he does, ver. 18, 'I espouse that Christ is preached.' This verse states the same idea as the preceding; 'The transitive sense of ἀποκρίνεσθαι, hath 1 Cor. xiii. 32. ἀποκρίνεσθαι αὐτῷ, He be no occasion of stumbling: neither to the Jews nor to the Greeks, nor to the church of God.' —See 1 Cor. iv. 3.

CHAP. I.

18 What then? Am I sorry? No. But in whatever manner, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached, even in this I rejoice, yes, and will rejoice.

19 For I know that this will turn out to me for salvation through your prayer, and according to the leading of the Spirit of Jesus Christ:

20 Agreeably to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as at all times, so now also, Christ will be magnified in my body, whether by life, or by death.

21 For to me to live is Christ, (verse 20.) but to die is gain.

22 Now, if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my work. (Kas. 21.) Yet what I should choose, I do not know.

23 For I am straitened of the two, having a strong desire to depart and be with Christ, (verse 90.) because that is far better.

24 (verse 100.) Nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

25 And being firmly persuaded of this, I know that I shall live and abide some time with you all, (verse 19.) for the advancement of the joy of your faith;

26 Wherefore, "I live in the flesh," is to live burdened with those afflictions to which men are subject by reason of the body.

27 Yet what I shall choose do I not know. [Verse 19.]—The original word yephe, commonly signifies to cause, but signifies to cause to be, as in Job xxvi. 25. LXX, it simply signifies to cause; as it is likened in a passage of Juvenal. Ad Nicenum, which Periech graphed in his name on this verse. The apostle knew that it was far better for him, in respect of immediate happiness, to be with Christ, than to remain in the flesh. Yet he was in a strict way he ought to choose, because his life, though burdensome to his body, was necessary to his usefulness to the Philippians, and to all the Gentile churches, of whose privileges he was the strenuous defender.

28 Ver. 26. Having a strong desire (verse 23.) to depart.—The simple word signifies to cause to depart, and the compound word yephe, to depart.

29 This is, then, to cause to depart, and the compound word yephe, to cause to depart. Here, in the first horizon, he presses one's returning from a feast, Luke ii. 4. And because on such occasions people were commonly joyous and the mais, we philosophy taught them to die cheerfully, make use of the word yephe to signify to die, in which sense it is used, likewise, in this verse. Or it may be translated "to return: namely, to God.

30 And be with Christ, which is far rather from all things by much far better.—Verse 23. Mortuus est, aequissimius. This is the highest superlative, which is impossible to form in any language. From that the apostle adds, we may infer that he had no knowledge of our expectation of a middle state of insensibility between death and the resurrection. For if he had known of such a state, he would have thought it better to live and promote the cause of Christ and of religion, than by dying to fall into a state of absolute insensibility. Besides, how could he say that he had a desire to be with Christ, if he knew he was not to be with him till after the resurrection? See 2 Cor. vi. 8, note; Rom. vi. 9, note 2. The use of philosophy, it hath been said, is to teach us to die. But as Paul has observed, one page of the gospel is more effectual for that purpose than volumes of philosophy. The reason why the apostle gives of another life, is, to a good mind; a support more strongly than the Stoical consolation drawn from the necessity of nature, the order of things, the unimportance of our enjoyments, the safety which they occasion, and many other such topics, though, they may awn the mind with a stubborn patience in bearing the thought of death, can never raise it to a fixed contempt thereof; much less can they make us consider it as a real good, and insensible with the dead of dying; or by desiring the apostle on this occasion strongly expressed.

31 Ver. 26. I know that I shall live and abide some time with you all.—His expectation of living, is a proof that the apostle wrote this letter toward the end of the second year of his imprisonment, as we have already observed. See also chap. ii. Perhaps his hope arose from his knowing that the Christians in Caesar's household were now on the point of receiving his release; or it might be discovered to him by revelation that he would be released. In the commentary, I have explained yephe-
And that your boasting concerning me in Christ Jesus may abound, through my coming again to you.

Only (ἐν ὑμῖν ἐν ἐμοὶ) be ye worthy of the gospel of Christ; that, whether coming and seeing you, or being absent I shall hear of your affairs, I MAY FIND that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one soul, jointly contending for the faith of the gospel;

And not terrified in any thing by your adversaries: which to them indeed is a demonstration of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that (ἐν θεω) from God.

For to you (τοῖς ἐντῷ, ἱστ. 310.) this with respect to Christ hath been graciously given, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for him.

Having the very same conflict as ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.

Thus, I shall abide some time occasionally with you all; because, as Pierre observes, it is not to be thought that the apostle meant to tell the Philippian, that he would fix his abode with them, and leave off travelling amongst the churches which he had planted.

Ver. 28. That your boasting concerning me in Christ Jesus may abound, through my coming again to you. When the Philippian epistle was written, Paul was in Rome, and as a chief apostle of Christ, the Judaizers, as Pierre observes, accused, perhaps that his long imprisonment was a proof of his being deserted of Christ. If so, his coming to them again would effectually overturn that argument, and show that the boasting in him as an approved apostle was well founded.

Ver. 27-1. That ye stand fast in one Spirit. —Beza's note on this clause is, "Standing firm athletes conquer great men saviors, etc." then add, "by the Spirit I understand the Holy Spirit." But the subsequent clause again does not suit this interpretation.

2. Jointly contending. —Συνεχείας τινων. This word denotes the action of the constables in the Olympic games called Aσπασίαι, where it signifies the greatest exertion of courage and strength.

3. For the faith of the gospel. —Ἐπίσπευδατον. This word is rightly translated in our English version; being the dative of the object, and not of the instrument. By the faith of the gospel, some understand the doctrine of salvation by faith, without obedience to the law of Moses; but I think it better to understand it in a more general sense, for the whole of the gospel taken completely, which the unbelief of the Jews and brethren endeavoured to overturn, not only by argument, but by persecuting the Christians.

Ver. 26-1. Which to them indeed is demonstration of perdition. —The epistle with which the Philippian refused to obey the law of Moses, was considered, not only by the unbelieving Jews, but by the Judaizing Christians, as a proof of their damnation. —In like manner, the resolution with which the Christians refused to join the heathens in their worship, was considered by the heathens as an obstinacy in atheism which would bring on them eternal punishment in Tartarus.

The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having exhorted the Philippian to walk worthy of their Christian profession, by maintaining the faith of the gospel, and by living in concord with one another, he, in the beginning of this chapter, besought them all, by every thing most affecting in the Christian religion, to complete his joy, ver. 1—by being alike disposed to maintain the faith of the gospel, and by cultivating the same mutual love, and by minding one thing, namely, the promoting the honour of Christ, ver. 2—and for that purpose he counselled them, in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, to avoid strife and vain-glory, and to cultivate an humble disinterested temper of mind, ver. 3, 4.—after the example of Christ, ver. 5.—who, though he was in the form of God, and knew that he was entitled to like worship with God, ver. 6.—divested himself of these honours, and took the form of a servant, by becoming man, ver. 7.—In which state he humbled himself still further, by suffering death, even the death of the cross, for the salvation of the world, ver. 8.—But on that account God hath exalted him in the human nature to the dignity of Saviour, which is above every dignity possessed by angels in heaven, or by men upon earth, ver. 9.—and in the same nature hath exalted him to the office of Lord, or governor, over every thing in heaven, and earth, and hell, ver. 10.—But all to the glory of God the Father who exalted him, ver. 11.

After proposing this great example of humility, obedience, and reward, the apostle very properly exhorted the Philippian to work out their own salvation, by imitating Christ's humility and obedience, ver. 12.—Not discouraged with the difficulty of the undertaking, because God worketh in men both to will and to work effectually, ver. 13.—Then mentioned certain duties, to which the Philippian were to be especially attentive, ver. 14—16.—Assuring them, if it were necessary for the perfecting of their faith and holiness, that he was willing to die for them, ver. 17, 18.

Next he informed them, that he hoped he was able to send Timothy to them soon, who, by bringing back word

Ver. 1. If there be any consolation in Christ,—This is not an expression of doubt, but the strongest affirmation that there is the greatest consolation in Christ, 2 Cor. i. 1.

Ver. 2. That ye be alike disposed. — Be not, supposing ye are alike, to be the same with me: in the end of the verse, considers the former phrase as a general direction, of which the clauses which follow are the particular. But, in my opinion, the direction in the beginning of the verse refers to ver. 27. of the preceding chapter, where the Philippians were exhorted with one soul jointly to contend for the faith of the gospel, whereas their mind went about, being among their own friends, and leading to the spirit of strife and vain-glory in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, as mentioned in ver. 3. of this chapter. See the following note.

2. Minding one thing. — The word πνεύμα sometimes denotes an act of the soul, πνεύμαν καντήμαν, to be of the soul, Acts xxiv. 21. We may, therefore, to hear of the (πνεύμα καντήμαν), what thou thinkest. — Gal. iv. 10. (That πνεύμα καντήμαν, ye will change nothing.) Sometimes it denotes an act of the will, Phil. iv. 2. Exodus i. 11. Hebrews, (πνεύμα καντήμαν) be to be of the same undeveloped disposition. — Phil. iv. 1. There is a disposition to be in you which was even in Christ Jesus; hence the Greeks used the word πνεύμα to denote the affections. Further, as an operation of the will, πνεύμα signifies to set one's affections on an object, so as to use every means in one's power to obtain it; Col. ii. 3. To see πνεύμα, to see thy affections on things above, and endeavor to obtain them. — Phil. iv. 10. I rejoiced, that now at length πνεύμαυε, ye have made your care of me to flourish again. In such cases πνεύμα has the same meaning with πνεύμαν καντήμαν, of the same mind with, etc. See Tit. iii. 8.

3. Do nothing through strife or vain-glory. — This, with what follows, was written to caution the Philippians against strife and vain-glory in the exercise of their spiritual gifts; faults which the brethren at Corinth and Rome had fallen into.

But by humilityreck one another better than yourselves. — The apostle does not mean that we should reckon everyone without distinction superior to ourselves in natural talents, acquired gifts, or even in goodness; but that we should, by our humble behaviour, acknowledge the superiority of those who are above us in status or office; or who we are sensible exceed us in gifts and graces: for general expressions are always to be limited by the nature of the subject to which they are applied. Besides, we cannot suppose that the apostle requires us to judge falsely, either of ourselves or others.

Wherefore, let this disposition. — That ye be alike disposed. — 1 Thes. v. 12, 13. Literally, Let this be desired by you, which was desired evidently by Christ. — See ver. 27. note 2.

Ver. 6. — Who being in the form of God. — As the apostle is speaking of what Christ was before he took the form of a bondman, the form of God, of which he is said, 'Let this be desired by you, which was desired by Christ.' See ver. 7. note 2.

Ver. 7. — And having been in the form of God. — As the apostle is speaking of what Christ was before he took the form of a bondman, and having been in this form, the form of God, of which he is said, 'Let this be desired by you, which was desired by Christ.' See ver. 6. note 2.

Ver. 8. — Therefore, let this disposition. — That ye be alike disposed. — 1 Thes. v. 12, 13. Literally, 'Let this be desired by you, which was desired evidently by Christ.'

8 And being, in fashion as a man, subject to all the evils incident to man, he humbled himself, still further by becoming obedient to death, even the ignominious death of a slave.

CHAP. II.

10 That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and of things on earth, and of things under the earth;—all who are in the state of the dead must do this:

11 And every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

12 (Verse 33.) Wherefore, my beloved disciple, since in imitation of Christ (ver. 8. ye have always obeyed God, even when I was present only, but now in mind of what he requires, but you must not only, but now more in my absence, with fear and trembling, strongly work out your own salvation.

13 For it is God who inwardly worketh in you, (rev. ob. from beneficence,) both to will and to work effectually—so the original word signifies. Ver. 12.—It is God who inwardly worketh in you, &c.—According to the Arminians and moderate Calvinists, the word θεωρείσθαι (ver. 12) translated inwardly worketh, does not in this passage signify any irresistible operation of the Deity on the soul, to give it a desire to work, but to give a desire to work effectually. For of Satan it is said, Eph. ii. 2. that "he, having inwardly worketh in the children of disobedience," &c. Rom. vii. 15. we have the effectual workings of sinful passions in our members; and Theseus. ii. 11. ἐποίησεν, 'the strong working of error.' These passages, they think, no one understands of a physical, but of a moral working, which leaves the will free for its actions, and consequently free agents. They likewise observe, that if God inwardly worketh in men by my influence which is irresistible, and to which no co-operation of theirs is necessary, there would be no occasion for exhorting them strongly to work out their own salvation, since the whole is done by God himself. Besides, they think the inward working of God in men, to will and to work without imposing on their freedom, may be explained in the following manner.—First, by the operation of His Spirit God gives men enlightened eyes of the understanding; Eph. i. 17. whereby they are enabled to discern the truth of the doctrines and promises of the gospel, and to perceive the beauty of virtue and the deformity of vice, and to form just notions of the great influence of the one and of the other. Secondly, He occasions these views on things to recur to them frequently, and by such force as to engage their attention: The consequence of which is, that the love of virtue and the hatred of vice is necessary, in order that they may be possessed of those pleasures of the present life, which cannot be enjoyed with innocence, are dear to men, and therefore are possessed by men as God thus worketh. Also such an earnest desire of the happiness of the life to come is excited in them, as leaves them no longer unmoved to conduct. Thirdly, when men are in danger of falling into sin through strong temptation, the Spirit of God, by raising their conscience, restrains them. Or, if they fall into sin, the Spirit of God brings them to repent, by the condescensions and painful stingings of their own conscience. Fourthly, A communication of the power of God into men's lot being ordered by God, he either suits their trials to their strength, or he gives them assistance in proportion to the greatness of their trials; so that he never suffers men to be tempted above what they are able to bear. Such an inwardly laying thus explained the manner in which God by his Spirit worketh in men to will and to work out their own salvation, observe, that notwithstanding the operations of the Spirit of God have a powerful influence in restraining men from sin, and in exciting in them virtue, no violence is thereby done to human liberty. This they infer from what God said concerning the Antichristians, Gen. vi. 3. 'My Spirit shall not always strive with men; and from the apostle's command, 'not to quench the Spirit, nor to grieve him; for these things,' they say, imply that the operations of the Spirit of God may be restrained, consequently, that in the affairs of their salvation men are free agents, and must themselves co-operate with the Spirit of God; which, they affirm, the apostle's exhortation in the passage under consideration evidently evinces.

2. From beneficence—(ver. 13.) The word ἐνάθλημα sometimes signifies good will or benevolence, as here, and Luke xi. 14. 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, (εἰρήνη) good will towards men.' The motive which induced God to work inwardly being described here, the proposition is right of translated from, Pierce, who translates the preceding clause thus, 'work out another's salvation, which means the meaning of this clause is, God worketh in you, both to will and to work from beneficence; making beneficence, the principal source from which men are to work out each other's happiness. Both in will and to work effectually,' and as an objection to this translation of verse 13, that in the first clause of the verse ἐνάθλημα signifies inwardly worketh. For ἐνάθλημα both both significations, and in scripture it is not uncommon to find the same Greek 14 Do all things, good offices to each other, without murmuring and without disputings: Be not like discontented servants, who murmur against their master's commands as oppressive; nor like disobedient children, who dispute their father's injunctions as unreasonable.

18 After the same manner be ye also glad when ye suffer for the gospel, and partake with me in the joy of exaltation to Christ.

19 Now I hope to be able, through the goodness and power of the Lord Jesus, to send Timothy to you soon, that I also may be encouraged under my affliction, when I hear of your joys, and of the trials which I have heard of you.

20 But I have chosen to send, because I have no one here at present so much of my own disposition, as person who has so many at my orders for the spreading of the gospel, consequently, who will be so anxious to advance your interests.

21 For all the teachers here seek their own pleasure and profit, and not the things belonging to Christ Jesus.

22 But I need not commend that worthy person to you; ye know the proof which he gave of his good disposition at Philippi, that he was in the affliction, diligent, and submissive manner in which a son serveth with a father in any business, so he hath served with me in the work of the gospel.

23 Well, then, I hope to send him to you immediately, so soon as I shall see what the issue of my appeal to Caesar will be.
PHILIPPIANS.

(24, 25.) However, though I am willing to be parted from you, yet I shall send Epaphroditus to you, my brother, and fellow-labourer, and fellow-soldier, but your messenger, and minister to my want.

26 For he longed after you, and was exceedingly grievous because he had heard that he was sick.

27 For indeed he was sick nigh to death; but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, that I might not have sorrow upon sorrow.

28 Wherefore I have sent him the more speedily, (Vulg. fastinantis,) that seeing him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the more without sorrow.

29 Receive him, therefore, in the Lord with all joy, and have such persons in great estimation.

30 Because (as) in the work of Christ he drew nigh to death, not regarding His life, that he might fully supply the want of your service toward me.

CHAPTER III.

37 View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

Sr. Paul wrote the most of his epistles to confute the erroneous doctrines and practices of the Judaizing teachers, who, in the first age, greatly disturbed the churches; more especially by their affirming, that unless the Gentiles were circumcised after the manner of Moses, they could not be saved. But, as these teachers artfully suited their arguments to the circumstances and prejudices of the persons whom they addressed, the controversy had a new aspect in every epistle. And the apostle's reasons, in confusion of their doctrine, comprehended a great variety of particulars for explaining and establishing the doctrines of the gospel, highly worthy of the attention of Christians in every age.

Among the Philippians, as among the Corinthians, the Judaizers supported their erroneous doctrines, chiefly by magnifying their own character and authority as teachers. This appears from their appealing to their circumcision as a proof of their right descent from Abraham; and from their calling themselves the circumcision, to intimate that they were the keepers of the former revelations, and the only objects of the divine favour. Moreover, they boasted of their knowledge of the ancient revelations, and of the care with which they observed the divine law. And on all these accounts they hoped the Philippians would pay more regard to their opinions in matters of religion, than to Paul's, whom they affected to despise, because he was born among the Gentiles; by which they said his descent from Abraham was at least rendered uncertain. Withal, supposing him to have been educated at Taras, they affirmed that his knowledge of the ancient revelations was superficial and erroneous; and that having apostatized from the institutions of Moses, it was little wonder that he now represented those institutions as of no avail in the sight of God.

His confutation of the pretensions of these wicked men, and of the calumnies by which they endeavoured to lessen his authority, the apostle introduced with telling the Philippians, that to write the same things to them, concerning the false teachers and their pretensions, which he had written to other churches, and which he had ordered Epaphroditus to represent to them, was by no means troublesome to him, seeing it was safe for them, ver. 1.—Wherefore, as he had written to others, so he now wrote to them, to beware of the Judaisers, whom he called dogs, a name which the Jews, in contempt, gave to the Gentiles; and evil workmen or laborers, on account of their corrupting the gospel. And because the unbelieving Jews boasted in the appellation of the circumcision, as importing that they alone, of all mankind, were acceptable to God, the apostle desired the Philippians to beware of them, calling them the circumcision, to show that they were soon to be destroyed. This bitterness in speaking against the unbelieving Jews and Judaising teachers, the apostle used, I suppose, by the direction of the Spirit, to make the Philippians shun his company and conversation, and to put them on their guard not to allow them any footing in their church, ver. 2.—Next, he assured the Philippians that the disciples of Christ are the circumcision: They are persons acceptable to God, because they possess the inward qualities signified by circumcision, and worship God in spirit, and boast in their relation to Christ as his disciples, and not in their fleshly descent from Abraham, nor in any rite pertaining to the flesh. At the same time, to show the falsehood of the calumnies which these deceivers spread abroad concerning the apostle's extraction, he told the Philippians, that if any particular teacher among them had confidence of acceptance with God, on account of his descent and privileges as a Jew, he himself had more cause for such confidence than that teacher; by which they might know, if he spoke in a slighting manner of those things, it was not from envy, as being destitute of them, ver. 4.—For he was circumcised on the eighth day after his birth: He was a branch from the stock of Israel. He belonged to the honourable tribe of Benjamin, which did not join in the defection under Jeroboam: Though born in Tarsus, he was an Hebrew, descended from Hebrew parents: And was educated a Pharisee, a sect which was acknowledged to have the most perfect knowledge of the law, ver. 5.—These particulars the apostle mentioned also in his epistle to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. xi. 22.—And to make the Philippians still more sensible of his title to have confidence in the flesh, he told them, that from his earliest years he was so exceedingly zealous of the law, and of the traditions of the fathers, that he persecuted the Christians as enemies to both. And with respect to his own obedience to the law, he assured them that it was altogether blameless, ver. 6.—Wherefore, whatever honour the false teachers could claim on account of their knowledge of the law, and of the care with which they obeyed its precepts, that honour was more justly due to him. Nevertheless, all these things, which indeed formerly he considered as the greatest advantages, he now looked on as things to be cast away, because they were of no use in the justification of sinners, ver. 7.—Nay, he regarded all human attainments as things to be cast away, when set in competition with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord; and had actually thrown them all away, that he might obtain justification through him, ver. 8.—Not by his own righteousness, which never could merit justification, but by a righteousness of faith, ver. 9.—So termed, not because faith is itself a perfect righteousness, but because it is the only principle that can lead men to that measure of righteousness of which they are capable; and in particular, to suffer with Christ for the truth, ver. 10.—Which righteousness will be rewarded with a glorious resurrection from the dead, ver. 11.—These blessings of faith counted for righteousness, and of resurrection from the dead, the apostle had not yet received; but he represents himself as striving to lay hold on them. And by comparing his exertions for that purpose, with the exertions of those who contend in the games, he gives us a lively picture of the labour and difficulty of the Christian course, ver. 12, 13, 14.—Then he exhorted the Philippians to follow his example, in striving to obtain justification and eternal life by faith, ver. 15, 16, 17.—And pronounced all who sought to be justified by the sacrifices and purifications of the law of Moses, enemies to the death of Christ, ver. 18.—And assured them, that their end would be perdition, because their only view in teaching such a method of justification, was to gratify their own lusts, ver. 19.—Whereas the teachers of truth, and their disciples, had no temptation to pervert the gospel; because they lived in a pure and heavenly manner, and looked for the coming of Christ from heaven, ver. 20.—to re-fashion their present body, (which was humbled or made mortal by sin,) into the likeness of his own glorious body, at the resurrection, ver. 21.

The apostle's method of confuting the Judaisers in this epistle is worthy of notice. He doth not, as in his epistles to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Hebrews, bring arguments from the writings of Moses and the prophets; but, to the assertions of the Judaisers he opposes his own affirmations as an inspired apostle; expresses a just abhorrence of the teachers who corrupted the gospel; and vindicates his own character and qualifications as an apostle. This method he followed, because he knew it was sufficient for establishing the Philippians, who, from the beginning, knew him to be a true apostle of Christ, loved him as their spiritual father, and were sure he would not deceive them.—In those epistles in which he confuted the errors of the Judaisers by arguments from the writings of Moses and the prophets, St. Paul made the churches to which they were sent, and all who should afterwards believe, sensible, not only that he was an apostle, but a learned Jewish doctor, who was well acquainted with the ancient scriptures, and who understood their true meaning.

New Translation.

Chap. III. Now, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord; to write the same things to you, to me, indeed, is not troublesome, and for you it is safe.

Ver. 1. Now therefore to write the same things to you, which I have written to other churches, and which I have desired Epaphroditus to tell you, to me indeed is not troublesome, and for you it is safe.

Ver. 2. For you it is safe. The condemnation of the errors of the Judaisers, which the apostle was about to write in this chapter, he had already written in his epistle to the Ephesians, and to the Colossians. Also, he had desired Epaphroditus to tell them the same things to the Philippians by word of mouth; but, as he did not think it proper to communicate to them by Epaphroditus verbally, all the Philippians might not have had an opportunity of hearing them; or they might have misunderstood them.
PHILIPPIANS.

2 Beware of dogs; I mean malicious furious bigots. Beware of false teachers; those especially mentioned ver. 18. Beware of the unbelieving Jews, who, though they call themselves the circumcision, may more properly be called the excision, because are long God will destroy them.

3 The Jews, being destitute of the qualities signified by circumcision, have no title to the name, and should be shunned. We are the true circumcision who worship God in spirit and in truth, and have no reliance on our descent from Abraham, nor on any rite pertaining to the flesh.

4 Though, indeed, if salvation were to be obtained by these things, I might have confidence even in the flesh. Nay, if any other teacher have confidence in the flesh, I have more reason for such confidence than he hath.

5 I am no proselyte: My circumcision was on the eighth day after my birth. My progenitors were not proselytes, for I am one of the descendants of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin: And though born in Tarsus, I am an Hebrew descended from parents who were Hebrews: And with respect to the law, I was educated in Jerusalem and a Pharisee.

6 With respect to my zeal for the law, and for the traditions of the elders, it was great; as I shewed by persecuting the church. And with respect to the righteousness which the Jews affirm to be obtained by law, I am unblamable, having observed its precepts with the greatest care from my youth.

7 Nevertheless, what things were gain to me, these I counted  [Greek] loss for Christ.

Whereas, having them in writing, they could examine them at their leisure, and have recourse to them as often as they had occasion.

Ver. 2.- Beware of dogs.-The apostle calls the bigots among the unbelieving Jews, dogs, because they backed against the doctrines of the gospel, and against its faithful teachers, and were ready to devour all who opposed their errors. Our Lord used the word dogs in the same sense when he commanded his apostles not to give that which is holy to dogs. Perhaps the unbelieving Jews are called dogs, likewise, to signify that in the sight of God they were now become as abominable for crucifying Christ and persecuting his apostles, as the idolatrous heathens were in the eyes of the Jews, who, to express their detestation of them, called them dogs.- ver. 15. The atrociously wretched are called dogs.

2 Beware of evil labourers.-So the word [Greek] translated Matt. xx. 1.-As the apostle honoured those who faithfully assisted him in preaching the gospel with the appellation of fellow-labourers, we may believe, that by evil labourers he meant false teachers, called also 2 Cor. xi. 15. deceitful labourers; because instead of building, the church of Christ by its foundation.

3 Beware of the excision.-The word [Greek] is formed by the apostle in ridicule of the unbelieving Jews, and the Judaising teachers in the Christian church, who called the circumcision the circumcision. For [Greek], i.e. properly signifies to cut off all around whatever is superfluous. But [Greek], from which the verb is derived, signifies, aware a summum ad infinitum, i.e. to cut, to rend. The former operation is performed to rend a thing more polished and perfect; the latter, to destroy it. Wherefore [Greek], the excision, the appellation given to the unbelieving Jews and Judaising teachers, is finally contrived to express the pernicious influence of their doctrine; perhaps also to signify the destruction which was coming on them as a nation. The account given of these wicked men, Rom. xvi. 16. Gal. vi. 12. Tit. ii. 11. shows, that they deserved all the harsh names given them in this place.

Ver. 3. We are the circumcision.-We, the disciples of Christ, who have the superfluous excises of passion and evil desire cut off from our hearts, and who worship God spiritually, alone deserve the honourable appellation of the circumcision, that is, of circumcised persons. See 1 Tim. iv. 17.

Ver. 4.-Of the tribe of Benjamin.-It is an observation of Theodoret, that the Benjaminites were more honourable than the four tribes which descended from Bilhah and Zilpah, Sarah's handmaids or slaves. They were more honourable likewise, on account of their adherence to the law of Moses, when the ten tribes were seduced to idolatry by Jeroboam.

5 An Hebrew of the Hebrews.-The Jews who lived among the Greeks, and who spake their language, were called Hellenists. Acts vii. 1. Ix. 29. 36. Many of these were descended from parents, one of whom only was a Jew. Of this sort was Timothy. Acts vii. 44. But those who were born in Judea, of parents rightly descended from Abraham and Isaac, and who, receiving their education in Judea, spake the language of their forefathers, and were thoroughly imbued in the Jewish and learning of the Hebrews, were reckoned more honourable than the Hellenists; and to mark the excellence of this and learning, they were called Hebrews; a name the most ancient, and therefore the most honourable, of all the names borne by Abraham's descendants; for it was the same given to Abraham himself by the Canaanites, to signify that he had come from the other side of the Euphrates. An Hebrew, therefore, possessing the character and qualifications above described, was a more honourable person than an Israeliite, as that name marked no more but one's being a member of the commonwealth of Israel, while a Jew might be born and bred in a foreign country. Paul indeed was born at Tarsus, in Cilicia; yet, being an Hebrew of the Hebrews, he received his education in Jerusalem, and spoke the language used there, and understood the Hebrew in which the ancient oracles of God were written, he was a Jew of the most honourable class, and was far preferable to the Judaising teacher at Philippi, if, as Mr. Pierce conjectures, and the apostle himself seems to intimate, he was only an Hebrew. The reader need observe, however, that all the privileges hitherto mentioned by the apostle were derived from others; but those he is going to mention were of his own acquisition.

Ver. 6. The righteousness which is by law.-The greatest part of the Jews firmly believed, that the righteousness required in the law consisted chiefly in observing its ritual precepts. And therefore if a person was circumcised, he was considered as a deity in the sight of God. Moreover, the Hebrews, the sacrifices observed, the sabbaths and other festivals enjoined by Moses, made the necessary purification in those cases of pollution, paid the tithes of all they possessed, and abstained from the crimes injurious to society, or, if he committed any such, was considered as purified for them according to law, he was, as the apostle expresseth it, With respect to the righteousness which is by law, unblamable. Further, as the ritual services enjoined in the law were not burdensome to the nature of things, but in the commandment of God; and as, according to the law, atonement was made for sins committed in the performance of those services, they were, on account of their being done from a regard to the divine will, considered as acts of that more acceptable to God than even the performance of moral duties. In the third place, as these ritual services were both numerous and hornitorious, and required so frequently that they gave almost constant employment to the priests, Jerome, the diligent and exact performance of them was thought equivalent to a perfect righteousness, and so meritorious, that it entitled the performer to immortality and eternal life. All these circumstances Paul entertained, whilst he continued a Pharisee. But he relinquished them when he became a Christian, as he informs us, ver. 7.

Ver. 7.- What things were gain to me.-[Greek] properly signifies the gain or profit which is made by merchandise, or otherwise. The things which the apostle formerly reckoned gain to him, but which since his conversion he counted loss, were those mentioned in the note on ver. 6. and not his living in all good conscience before God. For he who said to the Corinthians, I would that all men were even as myself, 1 Cor. x. 12. 'Our boasting is this,-that with the greatest simplicity and sincerity we have had our conversation in the world,' could not say of any degree of moral righteousness he had attained by the grace of God, that he counted it loss; unless he thereby meant, that it was to be thrown away as of no use in procuring his justification meritoriously. See vers. 8. note 1.

2 These I counted loss for Christ. 1-5. The word [Greek] signifies loss incurred in trade; and moreover that kind of loss which is sustained at sea in a storm, when goods are thrown overboard for the sake of saving the ship, and the people on board. In this sense the word is used by Luke, Acts xiv. 10. 21. 22. 28. Rom. ix. 27. 30. 40. Ephes. x. 30. 31. And in other parts. Accordingly Beza explains it by destruction, mischief. The term thus understood, gives a beautiful sense to the 8 Nay, most certainly also I count all things as loss (ver. 7, note 2.) for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have thrown away all things, and reckon them to be dung, that I may gain Christ,

9 And be found in him, not holding mine own righteousness which is from the law, but that righteousness which is from God, through faith by faith;

10 And may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being conformed to his death, 11 (Eph. 1:22.) That any how (κατὰ τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ, ἐνεπορευθήκα) I may arrive at the resurrection from the dead.

12 (Oxy, 356.) For I have not yet received the crown; but I made perfect, but I pursued; (v. 17.) that I may lay hold on (ὑπάρχω) that for which (ὑπάρχω) indeed I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus.

13 For the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus. — The apostle counted all things lost, not only because they were inefficacious in procuring for him a meritorious justification, but because in themselves they are of little value in comparison with the ex- cellency of knowledge of Jesus as Saviour, and of the method of salvation through him, with which the apostle was so revisited, that all other knowledge, and every human statement, he despised as things not worthy of his care, while voyaging to eternal life.

14 And reckoned them to be dung. — Paul was excommunicated by the Jews in Jerusalem, and expelled from the city: a treatment which none others met with, who were not so obnoxious to the Jews as Paul was, after he deserted their party and became a Christian. Acts, xvi. 3.

15 The apostle's meaning is, that he considered all the things in which he formerly gloried, as of no more value in procuring a meritorious justification, than the filth of the streets, which pollute those who handle it. — The prophet Isaiah hath spoken in the same manner of the legal righteousness on which the Jews put the greatest value, chap. lix. 6.

16 But we are all as unclean things, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.

17 This is found in him. — This expression Pierce explains by Locke's note on Gal. iii. 27. "By taking on them the profession of the gospel, they have been, put on Christ; so that to God looking on them, there appears nothing but Christ. They were, as it were, covered all over with Christ, as a man with the clothes he hath put on."

18 The righteousness from God. — We have the phrase ἀναθεματικόν, or the apostate, or the stranger, used, I think, only in this passage. It is opposed to ἀναθεματικόν, the Gentile, Gentile Gentile Gentile's, Gentile the Gentile's Gentile's Gentile's Gentile's righteousness, which is from the law, and the righteousness which is from God by faith. — 3. By faith. — ἐπιθυμήσας.Endeans this think he may be translated, upon faith; to signify that the righteousness which cometh from God, is built upon faith as its foundation, just as believers are said to be built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets.

2. By faith, — ἐπιθυμήσας. Endeans think he may be translated, upon faith; to signify that the righteousness which cometh from God, is built upon faith as its foundation, just as believers are said to be built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets.

3. By faith, — ἐπιθυμήσας. Endeans think he may be translated, upon faith; to signify that the righteousness which cometh from God, is built upon faith as its foundation, just as believers are said to be built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets. But though this sentiment be true, righteousness upon faith is an expression altogether unknown to us, for which reason the common translation ought to be retained.

19 Ver. 10.—And may know him. — Our translators, whom I have followed here, supposed that the infinitive, ἐπιθυμήσας, was put for the subjunctive, ἐπιθυμήσας, that it answers to κατὰ τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ, ἐνεπορευθήκα, ver. 9. But Bengelius, because the article is in the genitive case, is of opinion, that ἐπιθυμήσας is governed by τῷ καιρῷ, in the end of the preceding verse; consequently, that righteousness, which is from God by faith, is righteousness which cometh from God, and not self-righteousness. Notes on Gal. v. 15-21.

20 And the end thereof be found a believer in him as Saviour, not holding mine own righteousness, which is from law, as the means of my salvation, but that righteousness which is from the faith enjoined by Christ, even the righteousness which is from God by faith; that being the only righteousness of which a sinner is capable;

21 And that I may know Christ (ver. 8.) experimentally as my Saviour, and the power of his resurrection in confirming my faith in him as my Saviour, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being conformed to his death, by dying, as he did, a martyr for truth;

22 That any how, at the end of the race, I may arrive at the resurrection from the dead: obtain a body like to Christ's glorious body, which is the peculiar privilege of the sons of God, Rom. viii. 23.

23 For I have not yet received the prize, as having finished the race, nor yet am I made perfect, by being complete of the day of Christ; But I pursue, that verily I may lay hold on that righteousness which cometh from God by faith, and that glorious resurrection, (ver. 11.), for obtaining which indeed I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus, when he appeared to me, and forced me to take hold of the.
PHILIPPIANS.

13 Brethren, I do not reckon myself to have laid hold on the prize, as having finished the race: But one thing I do, not minding indeed the things behind me, but stretching forward to those things before me.

14 I follow (συνεχώς) along the mark, (ἐπεξεργάζομαι, mind: voice) exceedingly stretching myself forward to the things before me—the part of the course yet to be run over;

15 As many therefore, as wish to be perfect, (ἐπιταγμός) let us think this: And if ye think differently concerning any other point, even that God (ἐπιστημόνως) will discover to you.

16 However, to what we have come, (ἐγκινοῦμεν) let us go by the same line, (ὁποία) let us mind the same thing.

17 Brethren, be joint imitators of me, and (ἐπιλογίως) look steadfastly on them who walk so as we have us for an example.

18 For many walk, (πολλοί) who have often said to not yet received, (ἐλατὴρός) righteousness from God by faith, mention

ver. 9, and a blessed resurrection from the dead, mention ver. 11, which taken together he terms the prize, ver. 11. Now, of the former, as well as of the latter, it may be said with truth, that believers do not receive in the present life. In the present life it is pep, and indeed by believers, but not bestowed on them till their trial is finished, and sentence pronounced concerning their whole being, according to the general judgment.

2 Nor yet am I made perfect.—Thus, Pierre, thanks is, was observed in opposition to the Judaizers, who taught that perfection was to be obtained by obeying the laws of Moses; Gal. iii. 3. Are ye so foolish, that having begun in the Spirit, (συνεφόρος) ye would be made perfect by the flesh?—Others, however, of opinion, that by using the word συνεφόρος, the apostle alluded to the princes bestowed on the victors in the Greek games. For, as of the victors, some were more valuable than others, being rewarded with victor's corn, victor's oil, and victor's cup, (ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις) and the persons who obtained them, were συνεφόρος, ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, to be made perfect. These latter prizes were crowns of leaves, some of trees, and some of herbs. But the inferior prizes were tripods, shields, cups, &c. The former were greatly preferred to the latter, not for the materials of which they consisted, but for the honours and privileges of which they were the symbols. Le Clerc, however affirms, that no presence from any ancient author can be produced, in which ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, to be made perfect, signifies to be rewarded with the prizes in the games. But, although the Greeks did not use the word in this manner, it may have it here: as it was well known that the apostle both visited in some Greek worlds, means which, though uncertain, are analogous to their ordinary constructions. Accordingly, we find him using the very word ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, in the other passages, to lay hold on prizes, ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, ταῖς ἐπικρήσεις, in the metaphorical style, is to lay hold on the prize, when he delivered the confessor by the judges of the games. In the subsequent clause, this word, whose proper signification is to take a fast hold of a thing, is elegantly used by the apostle, to denote Christ's laying hold on him, as he was going to Damascus to persecute his disciples, and his forming him into the stadium to run, that he might lay hold on righteousness from God, and a glorious retribution, called the prize of the calling of God from above. See ver. 11, note 3.

Ver. 14. I follow along the mark. (συνεχώς) The word συνεχώς is derived from συνεχέω, to be continuous, as evident from Pliny's application of it to the genus: Herod. p. 363. As we are to understand it here, συνεχώς, to syncretize, or incorporate. As it is employed in the present construction, is to follow along, συνεχώς, to lay hold on, in the metaphorical style, is to lay hold on the mark, whose word συνεχώς, to lay hold on, when it carried on by the apostle, in the following sense that which he obtained in Christ. The expression of the apostle's meaning is, that in running for the prize of righteousness by faith, and on of a blessedness, he kept within the prescribed bounds: He suffered all the persecutions and afflictions, which God and the judge of the race, (ὁμοίως) appointed him to suffer, without murmur, or grudge, or complaint, or flagging. He was even willing to die a martyr, for the truth, that he might be conformed to Christ in his death. This was not the case with the false teachers mentioned ver. 15, who were enemies of the cross of Christ, and who corrupted the gospel to avoid suffering.
Philippians.

Chap. III.

you, and now even weeping I say, are enemies of the cross of Christ; the whole in perdition, whose god is in the belly, and whose glory is in their shame; who (apostate) mind earthly things. (See Col. iii. 3.)

20 (Tit. 3.) But our conversation is for heaven, (if so) from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ.

21 ('O ap τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ) Who will re-fashion our humbled body, (in order that it may become of a like form with his glorious body, according to that strong working, by which he is able also to subdue all things to himself.)

Ver. 18. For many walk.--He speaks here of the Judaizing teachers, mentioned chap. i. 16, as preaching Christ innocently, and with a view to add affliction to the apostle's house. And the description which he gives of their deluded manners is agreeable to what is said of them elsewhere, particularly 2 Cor. xi. 13. 20. 1 Tim. v. 5.

Ver. 19. --Whose god is the belly.--The apostle gives the same character of the Judaizing teachers, Rom. xiv. 13 Th. i. 11. And therefore it cannot be doubted, that he is speaking here of them and of their disciples, who, we may well suppose, resembled their teachers, not in their principles only, but in their manners also.

2. Whose glory is in their shame.--These false teachers not only lived in gluttony, drunkenness, and debauchery, but they gloried in these vices, and in the money which they drew from their disciples, although all these things were most abhorred.

3. Who mind earthly things.--Pierce supposes, that in this expression the rules of the law of Moses, which were of an earthly nature, are included.

Ver. 20.-But our conversation is for heaven.--As the verb ἀποκατάφησιν, from which ἀποκατάφησις is derived, signifies to be healed, in general, see Philip. i. 27. the common translation, which is that also of the Syriac and Vulgate versions, may be retained. But Le Clerc affirms, that ἀποκατάφησις and ὀρθία, being words of the same signification, the clause ought to be rendered, Our city, namely, the new Jerusalem, is in heaven. Beza, however, and others translate it, Our citizenship is in heaven; so that we do not, like the persons mentioned ver. 5, 'mind earthly things.' See Col. iii. 1-3. This, it must be acknowledged, is a good sense of the passage, provided it is authorized by the original.

2. From whence also we look for.--Though the antecedent was here, he is in the place by his own error placed in the singular, because it respects the meaning rather than the form of its antecedent. See Eph. iv. 66. 2 Peter thinks this adversative may be removed, by supposing that ἐκ is included in τῆς ἐκ τῆς, from which place we look for the Saviour to come. The apostle, by a common figure of speech, ranks himself with those who are to be alive at Christ's second coming. See 1 Thess. iv. 15. note.

3. The Saviour.—Eustathius has quoted a passage from Cicero, to show the greatennesses contained in the word ἀνακατάφησις, answerer. But they are meanesses contemptible, compared with those implied in the name Jesus, answering to παρθένος, answerer. The transcendent excellence of which great name the apostle hath let forth, chap. ii. 10, 11.

Ver. 21.--Who will re-fashion the body of our humiliation, in order that it may become of a like form with the body of his glory. The body of our humiliation, is our body humbled into a state of mortality by the sin of the first man; and it is contrasted with the body of Christ's glory, or the glorious incorruptible body in which he now lives as Saviour and universal Lord. Like to this glorious body of the Saviour, of which an image was given in his transfiguration, is rendered as 1 Cor. xv. 43. note 2, the bodies of those who now have their conversation for obtaining heaven, and shall be new made when Christ returns. So that here, as Rom. viii. 23. the redemption of the body from corruption by a glorious resurrection, is represented as the especial privilege of the righteous.

2. Wherewith he is able to subdue all things to himself.—Here, from Christ's being able to subdue all wicked men and evil angels, by converting such of the former as are capable of conversion, and by punishing the rest along with the evil angels, the apostle judgently concludes, that he is able, by the same power, to re-fashion the humbled fleshly body of the saints, so as to make them of a like form with his own glorious body. It deserves to be remarked, that Christ is here and in the whole of the preceding verses, the subject of the whole discourse, with himself, by his own proper working, or whatever term of expression is the same. See the note on ver. 1. In general the same subject is carried, and is completed, 1 Cor. xv. 25. Heb. xi. 8. For removing this difficulty, see 1 Pet. iii. 18. note 3, where Christ's resurrection, as sacrificed to the Father, to the Spirit, and to Christ himself, is explained.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

To the foregoing condemnation of the doctrines and practices of the Judaizers, the apostle, as the application of his discourse, subjoined, in the beginning of this chapter, an exhortation to the Philippians to stand firm in the belief of the doctrine of Christ, and in the constant practice of his precepts.

In what follows, St. Paul proceedeth to a new subject. Euodia and Syntyche, two Christian women of note in Philippi, having differed on some points of doctrinal or practical, the apostle besought them to lay aside their disputes, and be united to each other in affection, ver. 2.-And to bring about their reconciliation, he requested a person in Philippi, whom he calls his true co-partner, to help them to compose their differences; because they were sincere in the belief of the gospel, and had formerly assisted himself, and Clement, and other faithful preachers, in the work of Christ, ver. 3. Next, he gave the Philippians directions concerning their temper and conduct as Christians. They were to cherish spiritual joy, moderation, freedom from anxious cares, and to be often employed in prayer, ver. 4.-6. All these virtues they were to practice, according as they had learned them from him, and had seen them exemplified in him, ver. 8.-9. In very polite terms, he thanked the Philippians for their affection to him, expressed by the care they had taken to supply his wants, ver. 10. —But lest, from the warmth of his gratitude, they might fancy that his present distress was a measure of displeasure at his poverty, he told them that the want of the necessaries of life were not evils insupportable to him; for he had learned in every state to be content; and was able to bear all sorts of distress, through his brethren, through Jesus Christ, ver. 11.-13. Yet he commended them for attending to his state, ver. 14. —And told them he accepted their present the more willingly, because they were the only church, he had received any thing from while he preached in Macedonia, ver. 15. —From which they would see that he was not covetous of gifts; and that he received their present only because he sought from them pious actions, as the fruit of his labours among them, which in the end redounded to his advantage, ver. 17.—Knowing, however, that it would give them joy, he told them, that through their liberal gift sent by Epaphroditus, he now had ever thing he wished, and was filled with comfort, ver. 18.—Withal, to encourage them in such good works, he assured them that God would supply all their wants abundantly, ver. 19.—In which persuasion, he addressed a short doxology to God, ver. 20.

The apostle having, in this handsome manner, thanked the Philippian church for their present, he desired the bishops and deacons to salute every saint at Philippi in his name; and sent them the salutation of the brethren who were with him at the writing of this letter, ver. 21.—adding, that all the saints in Rome salute them, but chiefly they of Caesar’s household, ver. 22. For the gospel being made known in the palace, by means of the apostle’s bonds, chap. i. 12, 13. it had made such an impression on some of the emperor’s domestics, that they embraced and professed the Christian faith. Having, therefore, friends in the palace, the apostle hoped to be released through their good offices, chap. i. 95, ii. 24. Nor was he disappointed in his expectation. For, after having been confined two years, he was set at liberty.

St. Paul concluded this epistle, as usual, with his apostolical benediction sealed with an amen, to shew his sincerity in all the things he had written, ver. 23.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IV.—Wherefore, my brethren, whom I greatly love, and whom I long exceedingly to see, and who are to be my joy and crown, (see 1 Thes. ii. 19 note), so stand firm in the Lord, O beloved.

2 Euodia I beseech, and Syntyche I beseech, to be of the same mind in the Lord.

3 And ye (yourselves) I entreat also, true yoke-fellow, help (serve) these women who (in, 164.) for the gospel have combated together with me, and with Clement; and the rest of my fellow-sufferers, whose names are in the book of life.

4 Rejoice in the Lord always: I say, again, Rejoice.

Ver. 1.—Wherefore, my brethren, &c.—This being the conclusion and application of the discourse in the preceding chapter, it ought not to have been separated from it. See 1 Cor. x. 24, where the discourse and the chapter end with a similar exhortation.

2. Exceedingly longed for;—καταστειλείς. The Hebrews gave this phrase a translation to things which they greatly valued, and which were the objects of their strongest desire. In this place the word expresses likewise the apostle’s longing to see the Philippians.

3. And crown;—Πάντας τινί. St. Paul often compared his labours in the gospel to the combats in the games. Here, by an elegant and bold figure, he calls his Philippian converts his crown, in allusion to the crowns which the victors in the games were rewarded. His meaning is, that their conversion and perseverance would procure him much honour and a great reward at the judgment.

4. O beloved;—Ιερουσαλήμ. It is scarce possible to express affection more strongly than the apostle hath done in this short verse, by the various tender epithets which he bestowed on the Philippians: not in flattery, but from the real feelings of his heart, penetrated not only with gratitude for their attention to him in his distress, but with esteem on account of the excellence of their character and behaviour.

Ver. 2. To be of the same mind in the Lord;—Ως και εὐλογήσω. Paul calls Philippians his fellow-labourers, as well as the Cretans. Whithby is of opinion, that the apostle exhorted these women to promote the gospel with one mind and accord; and support his opinion by this argument, that no one can be of the same judgment with another, merely by courtesy.

Ver. 3. True yoke-fellow;—.sendKeys. From 1 Cor. vii. 7. It is more than probable that Paul was never married. But when Euodia, Hist. iii. 30, tells us, the ancients thought otherwise; and that they have been followed by some of the moderns, who suppose the apostle’s wife was here addressed. But the gender of the substantive, which is masculine, ἀνδρον, shows this to be a male. Whence if the apostle had addressed a female, he would have written τὴν συμμαθέαν.

Ver. 4. Rejoice;—Χαίρετε. Eusebius indeed affirms, that the Greek vocatives, though masculine in their termination, are sometimes feminine in their signification. But in this he is contradicted by Eustath.—But, following Theophylact, it gives it as his opinion, that this yoke-fellow was the husband either of Euodia or of Syntyche; and that these women were female preachers. I also think the husband of one of these women was meant here; and that he is called true yoke-fellow, on account of his excellent character as a husband. Others suppose the title was addressed by the title of true yoke-fellow, because being one of the apostle’s chief converts at Philippi, he had assisted him in the gospel.—Will think Epaphroditus was the husband of the yoke-fellow, and that the women were to be helped by him at Philippi, and had laboured with him in the gospel. But on this supposition, Epaphroditus, at the time the apostle wrote, must have been at Rome, or in some other place. But of one of the above suppositions is admitted, some or one or other of the bishops or deacons, mentioned chap. i. 1. may have been addressed by the title of yoke-fellow, which is the title of a fellow-labourer, and by which the apostle addresses his fellow-labourers in these words, that they are written in the book of life; i.e. refer to the personal service of Christ with them, and to express his charitable belief concerning them, that being faithful labourers, they were to be rewarded with eternal life.

CHAP. IV.—Wherefore, my brethren, whom I greatly love, and whom I long exceedingly to see, and who are to be my joy and crown, (see 1 Thes. ii. 19 note), so stand firm in the Lord, O beloved.

2 Euodia I beseech, and Syntyche I beseech, to lay aside your disputes, and be of the same friendship towards each other, which the Lord requires in his servants.

3. And I entreat thee also, faithful yoke-fellow, in the work of Christ, to help these women (Euodia and Syntyche) to compose their differences; who are worthy of this mark of attention, because they courageously maintained the truth of the gospel, along with me, Clement, and the rest of my fellow-labourers at Philippi; whose names I am persuaded are in the book of life, as persons to be saved.

4. Instead of being much grieved with the evils to which ye are exposed, by his name, appears to have been a Roman city, as Philippus was a Roman colony, he may have been converted there, and may have assisted the apostle soon after his conversion, or in some after period.

2. Who for the gospel have combated together with me;—Probably some Jewish teacher at Philippi had embraced Euodia and Syntyche to the party. But these two women having sedulously opposed his corrupt doctrine, the apostle calls it very properly, a combating with him, and with Clement, and with the rest of his fellow-labourers. Or, these women, as Theophylact thinks, may have been aged widows; whose office it was in instruct the younger of their own sex; and who may have met with much trouble and persecution, both from the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles, while they faithfully discharged their duties.

That there were ancient in the church aged widows, employed to teach the younger of their own sex the principles and precepts of the gospel, appears from 1 Tim. v. 16. And that the sufferring of persecution for the gospel required as great an exercise of courage as the Paganian games, is intimated in Acts x. 22. Withal, there is added a holy εἰρήνη καὶ προδοσία, a combat of sufferings.

3. And with Clement;—The ancient Christians have told us, that this is the Clement who afterwards became bishop of the church at Rome, and who, to compose some素晴 errors, which had arisen in the church at Corinth, about their spiritual guides, wrote an epistle to the Corinthians, which is still extant.

4. Whose names are in the book of life;—In scripture there are two books mentioned, in which men’s names are said to be written. 1. A book in which the names of those are written whom God allows to live on earth. Of this book speaks, Rev. xii. 17. 2. If not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written.”—Also, Isaiah, chap. iv. 2. Every one written among the living in Jerusalem.”—2. A book in which the names of those who are to inherit heaven and eternal life are written. Of this book our Lord speaks, Luke x. 20. Rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven.” Also the apostle, Heb. xii. 23. First-born who are written in heaven.” This book is called, Rev. xvi. 8. The book of life of the Lamb.” And, Rev. xxii. 21. The Lamb’s book of life.” Of this book Christ likewise hath spoken, Rev. xix. 12. If any man take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the Lamb.” In this book Matthew refers, chap. iii. 18. A book of remembrance was written for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name.” These things, however, are not to be taken literally. They are metaphors formed on the customs of men, when they wrote the names of the apostle and different books. But on this supposition, Epaphroditus, at the time the apostle wrote, must have been at Rome, or in some other place. But of one of the above suppositions is admitted, some or one or other of the bishops or deacons, mentioned chap. i. 1. may have been addressed by the title of yoke-fellow, which is the title of a fellow-labourer, and by which the apostle addresses his fellow-labourers in these words, that they are written in the book of life; i.e. refer to the personal service of Christ with them, and to express his charitable belief concerning them, that being faithful labourers, they were to be rewarded with eternal life.

7 And the peace (Rom. i. 7. note 4.) of God, which surpasseth all understanding, will guard your hearts, and your minds, (w., 167.) through Christ Jesus.
8 Finally, brethren, whatever things are true, whatever things are noble, whatever things are just, whatever things are pure, whatever things are praiseworthy, be beating, whatsoever things are of good fame, if there be any virtue, and if any praiseworthy, attentively consider these things.
9 (A) Also ye have learned, and received, (see Col. ii. 6. note.) and heard, and seen in me: These things praiseworthy, the God of peace will be with you.
10 (as) But I rejoiced greatly in the Lord, that now the length ye have made your care of me to flourish again, (A 2 cor. 215.) in which indeed ye were careful, (chap. ii. 2. note.) but ye had not an opportunity.

Concerning his own beneficent government of the world for the good of his church, and concerning his return to judge the world in righteousness, and to render to every one according to his deeds.

This joy comes also from our belief of the promises which Christ hath made to us, concerning the pardon of sins, the assistance of his Spirit, the efficacy of his power to preserve us from the snares of the devil, the resurrection of the body, the life everlasting in the righteousness, the creation of the new heavens and a new earth, for the righteous to dwell in, and their eternal felicity in that happy place. The apostle exalted the Philippians to rejoice almighty in the Lord, not only because they discovered and perceived the great power of the gospel, and that he is a permanent source of joy to believers, but because the joy flowing therefrom was able to support them, both under the fear and the feeling of the sufferings to which they were subjected.

2. To all men. The apostle desired the Philippians to make their moderation evident to all men, because thereby they would effectually recommend their religion to their persecutors. In this sentiment Peter agreed with Paul. I Pet. ii. 12.

3. The Lord is nigh. Every signifies, either in respect of place or time. Here I understand it of place. The Lord is here, observing your behaviour. If it is understood of time, the meaning is, the Lord will soon come and destroy the Jewish commonwealth; so that the power of one class at least of your persecutors will shortly be an end.

6. With thanksgiving. On this see the note. That, after beginning his prayers with complaints and tears, he ended them with thanksgivings. The exhortation in this verse implies, not only that the afflicted have many necessities for which they ought to give God thanks; but that they ought to be thankful for their very afflictions, because they are the means by which the Father of their spirits maketh those partakers of his holiness, in order to fit them for living with himself in heaven for ever.

7. The peace of God. This I take to be the happiness which God bestoweth on his people in the life to come; called also, the rest of God. And to that interpretation the characters here given of the peace of God agree;—it is so great that it surpasseth human understanding; and the hope of enjoying it, is the most effectual preservative of the affections and thoughts from sin. Others by the peace of God understand, the peace arising from reconciliation with God through Jesus Christ; others, the peace which God himself possesseth in the enjoyment of his infinite perfections. In this latter sense of the phrase, the apostle's meaning is, that the pleasures which good dispositions afford, have a great efficacy in making men steadfast in the profession of religion. The peace of God is used only here and Col. iii. 15. where it signifies the peace which God enjoys.

8. Whatever things are true, whatever things are noble, whatever things are praiseworthy, whatsoever things are of good fame, if there be any virtue, and if any praiseworthy, attentively consider these things;
PHILIPPIANS.  Chap. IV.

11 I do not speak this (Acts 25:4.) because I was unhappy (5:21) a slave. For I have learned, in whatever state I am, to be contented. 2

12 I am able to bear all things through Christ who strengthens me. 1

13 Withstanding, ye have done well, when ye jointly communicated to me in my affliction. 2

14 And know ye also, O Philippians, that in the beginning of the gospel, when I went forth from Macedonia, 2 in Thessalonica, there was no church communicated with me, in the matter of giving and receiving, but ye only. 2

15 For even when I was in Thessalonica, ye sent indeed once and again to my necessity. 1

16 Not because I earnestly seek a gift, but I earnestly seek fruit that may abound to your account. 3

17 And now I have all things, and abound: I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the things sent by you, a smell of a sweet savor, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. 3

18 (a) But my God will supply all your wants, through Christ Jesus, according to his riches in glory. 1

19 I need no longer to write you of Epaphroditus, for he is my brother, my fellow-worker, my beloved fellow-soldier; he was, for your part, also sentinel over your affections. 2

16. Where the apostle saith, the Philippians sent once and again to his necessity in Thessalonica. For Thessalonica being the chief city of Macedonia, their communicating with him in the matter of giving and receiving, was not after he departed from Macedonia, but whilst he was in that country. Some are of opinion that the translation should be, 'when I was departing, or about to depart from Macedonia.' But although the Greek may bear this sense, yet, for the difference of time, it will not remove the difficulty. For the Philippians sent money twice to the apostle, their first present, at least, could not be received when he was departing. I therefore think that Epaphroditus must be translated, or sent forth from Thessa

20. For even when I was in Thessalonica, Chrysostom observes, that the emphasis in this sentence is to the apostle's necessities: the inhabitants of so small a town as Philippi were so ready, and so generous to the apostle, that they frequently provided for him, in the shape of money, when he was at Thessalonica in the metropolis of Macedonia, that the gospel might be spread in those countries, being preached to them without any expense to themselves. Yet it must be remembered, that even in Thessalonica the apostle maintained himself more by his own labour than by the contributions of the Philippians. 1 Thess. ii. 9-10. 2 Thess. iii. 7-9.

21. Not because I earnestly seek-. So εὐθείας properly signifies, the apostle's meaning, as Pierce expresseth it, is, "Not do I mention all this because I am desirous of a gift from you, now or at any time, for the sake of the gift itself. But what I desire on all such occasions is, that your relation may produce such good effects as may turn to account to you." 1 Thess. iv. 13-18.

22. All things,-All and every thing. Here our translators have followed the Vulgate, Habeat veniam omnium. Estius observes, that one of the meanings of veniam is, to receive rent from lands, or wages for labor. But this sense might be translated, 'I have from you all things.' And by using this word the apostle may have insinuated, that what he had received from the Philippians was due to him, on account of his having preached the gospel to them.

23. The things sent,-Besides money, the Philippians may have sent to the apostle clothes and other necessaries. A smell of a sweet savor, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. - These were the epistles and books, and other kinds of sacrifices; not only to the peace and thank-offerings, but to the burnt-offerings and sin-offerings. See Eph. v. 3. 6. Here they are given to the present, which the Philippians sent to the apostle; not because that present partook of the nature of any sacrifice or offering whatsoever, as is plain from this, that it was offered immediately to the apostle, and not to God; but merely to

PREFACE.

Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colosse, mentioned Col. iv. 13, as cities in which there were Christian churches at the time this epistle was written, were situated not far from each other, in the Greater Phrygia, an inland country in the Lesser Asia. Of these cities Laodicea was the greatest, being the metropolis of Phrygia, and near it stood Colosse by the river Lycus where it falls into the Meander. Laodicea, though inferior in rank to Laodicea, was a great and wealthy city, and had a Christian church, which perhaps was more considerable than the churches in Laodicea and Hierapolis, on account of the number and quality of its members; and therefore it merited the attention which the apostle paid to it, by writing to the Colossians the epistle in the canon which bears their name.

The inhabitants of Phrygia were famous for the worship of Bacchus, and Cybele, the mother of the gods. Hence she was called Perga Matrim, by way of distinction. In her worship, as well as in that of Bacchus, both sexes practised all sorts of debaucheries in speech and action, with a frantic rage, which they pretended was occasioned by the delirium to which they were reduced. These were the orgies (from ὀργίας, orgias) of Bacchus and Cybele, so famed in antiquity; the lewd rites of which being perfectly adapted to the corruptions of the human heart, were performed by both sexes without shame or remorse. Wherefore, as the Son of God came into the world to destroy the works of the devil, it appeared in the eye of his apostle a matter of great importance, to carry the light of the gospel into countries where these abominable impieties were digniﬁed with the honourable appellation of Virginal worship, especially as nothing but the heaven-descended light of the gospel could dissipate such a pernicious infection. That this salutary purpose might be effectually accomplished, St. Paul, accompanied by Silas and Timothy, went at different times into Phrygia, and preached the gospel with great success in many cities of that country, as we are informed by Luke in his history of the Acts of the Apostles, and as shall be proved more particularly in the following section.

SEC. I.—Showing that the Apostle Paul preached the Gospel, and planted Churches in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis.

From the history of St. Paul's travels given by Luke, it appears that his constant custom was, to go directly to the chief cities in every country where he proposed to introduce the gospel. This method he followed, ﬁrst, Because in the great cities he had an opportunity of making the doctrine of salvation known to multitudes at once; and among others, to persons of station and education, who being best qualiﬁed to judge of the nature and evidences of the gospel, their example, if they embraced the gospel, knew would have a powerful inﬂuence on others. Secondly, Because whatever corruption of manners prevailed among the natives of any country, he supposed would be more predominant in the great cities than anywhere else; and being there supported by all the countenance which authority and example could give them, he foresaw that the triumphs of the gospel, in overthrowing these corruptions thus supported, would be the more illustrious. The apostle's constant custom, therefore, being to go directly to the great cities in all the heathen countries, they must be mistaken who are of opinion, that Paul, in his journeys through Phrygia, never once visited either Colosse, or Laodicea, or Hierapolis, notwithstanding we are told, Acts xvi. 4, that Paul and Silas travelled through the Lesser Asia, to deliver the decree of the apostles and elders in Jerusalem to the churches which they had planted; and in particular, that they went throughout Phrygia, Acts xvi. 6. Also we are told, Acts xviii. 23, that on another occasion Paul went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order.

Nevertheless, to prove that Paul did not preach the gospel in Colossae, two passages in his epistle to the Colossians are appealed to. The first is, chap. i. 4. 'Having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints.' This, it is said, implies that the Colossians were not converted by Paul; and that he had only heard of their being converted by some other teacher. But the apostle might express himself in that manner, consistently with his having converted the Colossians, because it was his custom, when absent from the churches which he had planted, to make inquiry concerning their state, (1 Thess. iii. 5,) that he might know whether they persevered in maintaining that great article of the Christian faith, which he was so anxious to establish, but which was everywhere opposed by the Judaizing teachers, namely, that both Jews and Gentiles, under the gospel, were entirely freed from obedience to the law of Moses as a term of salvation; and that obedience to the gospel was the only thing required in order to meet with the acceptance with God. This doctrine the apostle, Col. i. 26. termed 'The mystery which was kept hid from ages and from the generations;' and, ver. 27. 'The mystery concerning the Gentiles, which is Christ to them the hope of glory.'

Wherefore, when Epaphras came from Colossae to the apostle, it is natural to think, that, according to his usual manner, he inquired concerning the state of the Colossians: And being informed by him that the greatest part of them persevered in the true faith of the gospel, Col. i. 8. notwithstanding the attempts of the false teachers to seduce them, he was greatly elated, and with perfect propriety said to them, chap. i. 3. 'We give thanks to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ always when we pray for you: 4. Having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints.'

Besides, it ought to be remembered, that the apostle spoke in the same manner of the faith and love of other churches and persons of whose conversion he himself was undoubtedly the instrument. Compare Philothen, ver. 5. with ver. 19. of that epistle. See also 1 Thess. iii. 6. and note 1. on Eph. i. 15.—Wherefore, the passage under our consideration is no proof at all, that the Colossians were indebted to some other teacher than Paul for their faith in the gospel.

The second passage quoted from Paul's epistle to the Colossians, to prove that he never preached the gospel in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, is chap. ii. 1. 'I wish you to know how great a combat I have for you, and for them in Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh.' But this by no means implies, that the brethren in Colosse and Laodicea had not seen the apostle when he wrote this letter to them. For, as Theodoret justly observes in his preface to this letter, the apostle's meaning is, that his combat was for the converted Gentiles in Colosse and Laodicea, who doubtless had often seen his face; and not for them alone, but 'for as many as had not seen his face in the flesh;' that is, for all the converted Gentiles every-where, and in every age of the world. That is this the true meaning of the expression. Theodoret proves from the next verse, where the apostle does not say, that your heart may be comforted, as he would have done if the Gentiles of Colosse and Laodicea had been of the number of those who had not seen his face in the flesh; but that their heart, namely, who have not seen my face, may be comforted as well as yours.

In the third place it is alleged, that the apostle himself points out Epaphras as the spiritual father of the Colossians, chap. i. 7. 'As ye have also learned it from Epaphras.' But, in my opinion, the word also indicates the direct contrary. The Colossians had learned the true doctrine of the gospel, not from the apostle alone, but they had 'learned it from Epaphras also,' who, as a faithful minister of Christ, and fellow-labourer with the apostle, after his departure, had not failed to put the Colossians in mind of his doctrine. Besides, if Epaphras had converted the Colossians, the apostle, instead of saying, chap. iv. 12. 'Epaphras, who came from you, a servant of Christ, salute you,' would rather have said, as Lardner has observed, Epaphras, by whom ye believed; or somewhat to the like purpose, expressive of the obligations they lay under to him.

The following are the arguments which prove that Paul converted the Colossians. First, This apostle, speaking of the Christian church, says, chap. i. 25. 'Wherefore I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God, which was given me on your account, fully to preach the word of God.' But if the dispensation of God was given Paul, on account of the Colossians, fully to preach the word of God, can it be imagined, that, notwithstanding he was so often in Phrygia, he would neglect his commission so far as never to preach the gospel in Colosse? Secondly, Throughout the whole of this epistle, the Colossians and the Colossians are represented as taking a special interest in each other's affairs, like persons who were bound to each other by the strongest ties of friendship. For example, chap. ii. 5. 'Though in the flesh I be absent, yet in spirit I am with you, rejoicing when I see your order, and the firmness of your faith.'—In like manner, chap. iv. 7. 'All things concerning me, Tychicus, a beloved brother, and faithful minister, and fellow-servant in the Lord, will make known to you. 8. Whom I have sent to you for this very purpose, that he may know the state of your affairs, and comfort your hearts.' Nay, as a person for whose opinion the Colossians had the highest regard, he bare testimony to them concerning Epaphras their own pastor, chap. i. 7. that he 'was a faithful minister of Jesus Christ with respect to them,' and chap. iv. 13. 'had much zeal for them, and for those in Laodicea, and those in Hierapolis; all which are expressions of such an affection, as would naturally subsist between persons converted to the faith of the gospel, and him who had converted them.'—Thirdly, The apostle wrote the salutation to the Colossians with his own hand, as he did to the other churches which were planted by him, and who knew his handwriting. Whereas, in his epistle to the Romans, who were strangers to him, the salutations were written by Tertius. Fourthly, That the Colossians were converted by an apostle, appears from chap. ii. 6. 'Seeing then ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, walk ye in him: 7. Rooted in him, and built upon him, and made firm in the faith, even as ye have been taught, abounding in it with thanksgiving.' This the apostle could not have said to the Colossians, if their only teacher had been Epaphras, or any other who was not an apostle. See also chap. i. 6. 'From the day ye heard it, and knew the grace of God in truth.' These things, as Dr. Lardner very well observes, Can. vol. ii. chap. 14. show that the Colossians were converted by an apostle. Now, who should this be but Paul himself, who made so many journeys into their country, and preached there with such success?

Upon the whole, we may believe that the churches in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, were planted by St. Paul, with the assistance of Timothy in particular; and therefore, in writing this epistle, Timothy joined the apostle, as one well known to the Colossians, and greatly respected by them.
We learn the news of Paul's confinement at Rome reached the Christians in Colossae; they sent Epaphras, a native of their city, chap. iv. 12. and formerly an idolater, chap. i. 13, but now a Christian minister in their church, chap. i. 7., all the way to Rome to comfort the apostle, by declaring the affection which the Colossians bore to him as their spiritual father, chap. i. 8., and to give him an account of their state, and to bring them back word how matters went with him, chap. iv. 7—9.

From Epaphras the apostle learned, that the greatest part of the Colossians persevered in the faith, and were remarkable for their love to all the brethren, chap. i. 4.: But that certain false teachers had persuaded some of them to worship angels, and to abstain from animal food, and to observe the Jewish festivals, new moons, and sabbaths, and to mortify their bodies by long continued fastings; in short, to practise the rites of the law of Moses as absolutely necessary to their salvation, chap. ii. 16—23.

Long before the light of the gospel shone on the world, the Greeks had introduced their philosophy into many of the countries of the Lesser Asia, and among the rest into Phrygia, where it would seem the doctrines of Pythagoras and of Plato were much admired. The followers of Plato held, that the government of the world is carried on by beings inferior to the gods, but superior to men, such as the Jews believed angels to be. These they called daimones, a name which in the Greek language signifies divinities; and these they enjoined their sect to worship, on account of their agency in human affairs. See Col. ii. 8. note 2. The philosophy of Pythagoras led to a different discipline. They held, that mankind had all lived in some pre-existent state, and that for the sins committed by them in their pre-existent state, some of their souls were sent into human bodies, and others of them into the bodies of brutes, to be punished for, and to be purged from their former sins. Wherefore, believing the whole brute creation to be animated by human souls, they held it unlawful to kill any thing which hath life, and abstained wholly from animal food. Withal, effectually to free themselves from the vices and pollutions contracted in their pre-existent state, they practised repeated and long-continued fastings, and other severities, for the purpose of thoroughly subjecting the body with its appetites to the soul.

From the things which the apostle Paul hath written to the Colossians, it appears that some of them had embraced the discipline of Pythagoras, and of others of them the philosophy of Plato; and that the Judaizers who came to Colosse, the more effectually to recommend the law of Moses to the Christians in that city, had affirmed that Pythagoras derived his discipline, and Plato his dogmas, from the writings of Moses. That these false teachers made use of an argument of this kind, to recommend the Jewish institutions to the Colossians, is the more probable, that some of the early Christian writers, and if I am not mistaken, some of the Jewish writers also in the first ages, affirmed the very same fact. See Ryan's history of the effects of religion on mankind, sect. 2. The truth is, the Pythagorean discipline bears some resemblance to the abstinenence from unclean meats, and to the fastings enjoined in the law of Moses. But, be this as it may be, it cannot be denied that the Pythagorean precepts, both concerning the abstinenence from animal food, and concerning the mortification of the body by fasting and other severities, together with the doctrines of Plato concerning the agency of angels in human affairs, and the honour which is due to them from men on that account, are all expressly condemned by the apostle in his epistle to the Colossians. This being the case, may we not believe that the Judaizing teachers, who it is well known artfully suited their tenets to the characters and prejudices of the persons whom they addressed, talked to the Colossians, in a plausible and pompous manner, concerning the dignity and office of angels, and represented them as proper objects of worship to mankind, on account of the blessings which they received through their ministry? and even insinuated, that, to render mankind complete in knowledge, new revelations of the will of God, more perfect than those made by Christ, might be expected through the ministry of angels, who they affirmed were better acquainted with the will of God than it was possible for Christ to be; as, according to them, he was nothing but a man! Nay, these impostors may have gone so far as to obtrude their own false doctrines on the Colossians, as new revelations made to them by angels. Further, in proof of the agency of angels in human affairs, and to show that they are proper objects of men's worship, they would not neglect to tell the Colossians, that the law of Moses was given by the ministry of angels, and that angels conducted the Israelites into Canaan. And with respect to such of the Colossians as were tainted with the Platonic philosophy, we know that to persuade them to worship angels, or at least to make use of their mediation in worshipping God, they professed that it was arrogance in sinners to worship God without some mediator, and therefore they exhorted the Colossians, as an exercise of humility becoming them, to send up their prayers to God by the mediation of angels; which they said was more acceptable to God, and more effectual than the mediation of Christ, who could not be supposed to have power with God, like the angels his ministers in the government of the world. Lastly, As the heathens in general, trusting to propitiatory sacrifices for the pardon of their sins, were extremely attached to that kind of sacrifice, we may suppose, although it is not mentioned by the apostle, that the Judaizers told the Colossians, since there were no propitiatory sacrifices prescribed in the gospel, it was undoubtedly the will of God to continue the sacrifices and purifications of the law of Moses, which he himself had appointed as the means of procuring the pardon of sin. And by this argument also, they endeavoured to allure the Colossians to embrace the law. Upon the whole, the Judaizers recommended the law as an institution excellently calculated for procuring the pardon of sin, and for perfecting men in virtue, consequently as absolutely necessary to salvation.

But this whole form of doctrine, by drawing men away from Christ the head, and making them forget all the benefit which they may derive from his mediation, it was necessary that an effectual remedy should be provided for putting a stop to so pernicious a scheme of error. And such a remedy the Spirit of God actually provided, by inspiring the apostle Paul to write this excellent epistle, wherein all the errors of the false teachers are condemned, either directly or by establishing the contrary truths. In particular, the Levitical sacrifices and purifications were shewn to be of no manner of use under the gospel, by the apostle's doctrine, chap. i. 14. that 'we have redemption through the blood (that is, the sacrifice) of Christ, even the forgiveness of sins.' In like manner, the vain figment, that angels are superior in dignity and power to Christ, was entirely destroyed by the apostle's doctrine, chap. i. 15. that Christ is 'the image of the invisible God, the first-born (or Lord) of the whole creation;' ver. 16. 'Because by him were created all things which are in the heavens, and which are upon the earth, things visible, and things invisible, whether he be thrones, or dominions, &c.' Consequently, that the angels themselves, whatever their nature or their office in the universe may be, were created by Christ, and are absolutely subject to him: ver. 16. 'That he is the head (or ruler) of the body, even of the church; ver. 19. For it pleased the Father, that in him all the fulness (of perfection and power) should continually dwell: consequently, that the Colossians had no inducement to worship, either evil angels through fear, or good angels from humility. And, to put these important doctrines concerning the dignity and office of Christ beyond all doubt, the apostle told the Colossians, chap. i. 25, 26, that he was commissioned by God to preach them to the world. Next, because the false teachers instituted, that a more perfect revelation of the will of God might be expected through the ministry of angels, than that which Christ had made, the apostle assured the Colossians, chap. ii. 3, 'that in him all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are laid up.' And added, ver. 4. 'this, concerning Christ's possessing all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' I affirm, that no one may deceive you with plausible speech, concerning the office and power of angels in the government of the world. He therefore ordered them, ver. 8. 'to take care that no one made a prey of them, through an empty and deceitful philosophy.' he meant the Platonic philosophy, in which the dignity and office of angels were so highly extolled; because, ver. 9. 'in Christ continually dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.'—Also, because the Judaisers endeavoured to persuade such of the Colossians as were tainted with the Pythagorean philosophy, to receive the precepts of the law of Moses concerning meats and fasting, as conformable to the Pythagorean precepts, and as having the same influence to purify the soul; the apostle told them, that they had no need, either of the Platonic dogmas concerning the dignity and mediation of angels, or of the Pythagorean precepts concerning abstemiousness from animal food, and concerning the mortification of the body; because, ver. 10. 'they were made perfect, in every thing necessary to their sanctification and salvation, by the precepts, meditation, and government, of him who is the head of all government and power.'—Further, because the Judaisers extolled the sacrifices and purifications appointed in the law of Moses, as the only effectual means of obtaining the pardon of sin, the apostle assured them that these were of no use now: Because, ver. 14. Christ, by his death, had blotted out the handwriting of ordinances contained in the law, with its curse, and had nailed it to his cross in its blotted out state, that all might see that the curse of the law was removed. He therefore ordered them to resist every teacher who attempted to impose on them, either the ordinances of the law of Moses, or the Pythagorean abstemiousness and mortifications, and the like. He forbade them to rule you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a festival, or of a new moon, or of Sabbaths. And in relation to the worshipping of angels as more powerful mediators than Christ, he said to them, ver. 19. Let no teacher 'make you lose your reward, delighting in humility and the worship of angels,' ver. 19. 'and not holding the head,' plainly telling the Colossians, that in prizing God, if they made use of the mediation of angels, or of their presence of humility, and worshipped them as the authors of the blessings which they enjoyed, they renounced Christ the head, and deprived themselves of the benefit of his mediation, and lost all the blessings they were entitled to as the members of his body. Withal, to make the Colossians still more sensible of their folly in listening to the false teachers, the apostle asked them, ver. 20. 'Since ye have died with Christ from the elements of the world; that is, since ye have been freed, by your death with Christ, both from the heathen philosophy and from the law of Moses. Why then, living under that philosophy and law, do ye subject yourselves to the ordinances of either? for things are not according to the commandments of God, but, ver. 23. 'according to the commandments of men?'—Besides, ver. 23. though these commandments have the appearance of wisdom, in reality foolishness; being destructive of the vigour both of the mind and of the body.

Pierce, in his note on Col. ii. 18, where the worshipping of angels is condemned, thus writes: 'St. Paul seems to me to have here a more especial regard to one particular sect of the Jews, the Essenes. As what he mentions, ver. 23. of the neglecting of the body, will be shown presently to suit them, so they had somewhat peculiarly among them relating to angels: For thus Josephus, De Bello Judaic. lib. ii. c. 7. sive 12. assures us, that when they received any into their number, they made them most solemnly swear, that they would keep or observe the books of their sect, and the names of the angels, with like care.' In confirmation of his opinion, Pierce quotes a note of Dr. Hudson on the above passage from Josephus, to the following purpose: 'It is hard to say why the Essenes took such care of the names of angels. Was it that they made use of them in their charms to cure diseases? Or, did they pay them any such worship as the apostle condemns, Col. ii. 18.? The other things there condemned are certainly theirs, and agree to the Essence above all others.' See Col. ii. 23, note 7.

More, de Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum Magn. seems to think, that the great concern of St. Paul, in his epistle to the Colossians, taught the creation of all things by God's beloved Son, chap. i. 15, 16, 17. proceeded from his observing the beginnings of that absurd notion concerning the creation of the world by an evil principle, which was first broached in the Christian church by the Gnostics, and which afterwards was propagated by their disciples, the Marcionites, Encratites, and Manicheans; or at least, that it proceeded from his foreseeing, by the spirit of prophecy, the rise and progress of the monstrous tenets of these heretics, all flowing from their doctrine concerning the creation of the world by an evil principle; and because he was anxious to guard the truthful against their pernicious errors.

The same author, after describing the cosmogony of the ancient heretics above-mentioned, adds, That they differed greatly from each other in their manners. Such of them as were of a morose disposition, and aversive to sensual pleasures, ordered their disciples to weaken and subdue the body, as the fountain of all pravity, by hunger, and thirst, and every kind of hardship: And forbad the use of wine, and of marriage, and of whatever tended to the gratification of the body; in order that the mind, being delivered from the fetters and contagion of matter, might be free. Hence came that austere manner of life, which the Marcionites, Encratites, Manicheans, and other ancient heretics, led.—That such of them as were inclined to sensual pleasures, by the very same dogmas concerning the pravity of matter, and concerning the evil principle, took to themselves a liberty of gratifying their lusts without fear. For they affirmed, That pietas consists in the knowledge of God, and in the union of the mind with him: That they who attain this union, and by contemplation draw their mind away from their body, have no concern with the actions of the body; and therefore are under no obligation to restrain its propensities. Hence proceeded the dissolute lives of the Cappadocians and others, who affirmed that all things were lawful to them; and that temperance was enjoined to men, not by God, but by the maker of the world, whom, as we have said, they represented as an evil being. Of this twofold discipline, proceeding from one and the same fountain, there are many traces in scripture. For among the first corrupters of Christianity, the apostle Paul mentions the who assumed to themselves a great show of wisdom, by a voluntary neglecting of the body, Col. ii. 23. And the apostles Peter and Jude speak of others, who were so corrupted as to affirm, that Christ had purchased for them a liberty of sinning; and who argued that whatever their lusts inclined them to do was lawful. See I John, Preface, sect. 3.

Before this section is concluded it may be proper to remark, with Lardner, that in the epistle which our Lord directed St. John to write to the church of the Laodiceans, there are traces of the errors which the false teachers endeavoured to disseminate in Phrygia. For example, to shew that angels are not superior to Christ in dignity and power, and that they are not to be worshipped on account of their ministry in the government of the world, he in that epistle asserted his own power as Creator of the world, nearly in the terms made use of by Paul in his epistle to the Colossians. For he calls himself, Rev. iii. 14. 'The beginning (195), the efficient cause) of the creation of God.' Next, because the false teachers, who troubled the churches of Phrygia, were puffed up on account of their pretended knowledge of things which they had not seen, Col. ii. 18, and thought themselves complete in every respect, by obeying the precepts of the law of Moses, and the prescriptions of the heathen philosophy, Christ condemned that vain boasting in the Laodiceans: Rev. iii. 17. 'Thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and blind, and naked.'—And whereas St. Paul said to the Colossians, chap. ii. 10. 'Ye are made complete by him who is the head of all government and power;' Christ said to the Laodiceans, Rev. iii. 18. 'I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in fire, that thou mayest be rich, and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see.'

It may be proper also to take notice, that although the worship of angels was at the first represented in the churches of Phrygia, by the apostle's epistle to the Colossians, it afterwards prevailed among them to such a degree, that the council which met at Laodicea, the metropolis of Phrygia, found it necessary to condemn that idolatry by their 35th canon, as Theodoret informs us in his note on Col. ii. 18, as follows: 'This mischief continued long in Phrygia and Pisidia. Hence the council which met at Laodicea, in Phrygia, made a law against praying to angels; and to this very day there are to be seen among them, and in the neighbouring parts, the oratories of St. Michael.'—The 35th canon of the council of Laodicea, to which Theodoret refers, is in the following words: 'Christians ought not to leave the church of God, and go and name angels, or gather assemblies. If, therefore, any one is found to practise this secret idolatry, let him be Anathema, because he has left our Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, and has turned to idolatry.'—The time of the meeting of this council is uncertain. Lardner, vol. 8, p. 293, thinks it was held a. p. 363. This is the council of Laodicea which, in its last two canons, declared what sacred books were to be publicly read in the churches.

Sect. III.—Of the time when the Epistle to the Colossians was written; and of the Persons by whom it was sent.

At the time the Apostle wrote this letter, he was in bonds for preaching the gospel, Col. iv. 3. But his confinement was not so strict as to prevent his preaching occasionally. For he mentions, chap. iv. 10. 'his fellowship and sufferings in the kingdom of God,' who had been a consolation to him. This agrees with Paul's first confinement at Rome, where, Acts xxi. 30, 'he dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all who came in unto him; 31. Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.'—Now, on the supposition that this epistle was written during the apostle's first confinement at Rome, since it was sent by the persons who carried his letter to Philemon, in which he desired him to provide a lodging at Colosse, because he hoped to see him soon, ver. 22, we have reason to think that both letters were written in the second year of the apostle's confinement, and towards the end of that year answering to a. p. 61, when the apostle had a prospect of being soon released.

The letter to the Colossians was not sent by Epaphras their own pastor. That good man, from the time of his arrival in Rome, had exerted himself so strenuously in the cause of Christ, that he became obnoxious to the magistrates, and was imprisoned, Philm. ver. 23. The apostle, therefore, sent this letter by Tychicus, and Onesimus, a slave who had run away from his master Philemon, but whom the apostle converted in Rome, and sent back to Colosse.

Because Tychicus, the bearer of the apostle's letter to the Colossians, carried likewise his letter to the Ephesians, Eph. vi. 21, 22, and because there is a remarkable agreement in the sentiments and language of both epistles, many have conjectured that they were written about the same time. See Pref. to Ephesians, sect. 5. This too was Locke's opinion, who says, "They seem to be writ at the very same time, in the same run and warmth of thoughts, so that the very same expressions, yet fresh in his mind, are repeated in many places: The form, phrase, matter, and all the parts quite through, of these two epistles, do so perfectly correspond, that one cannot be mistaken in thinking one of them very fit to give light to the other."—But though this observation be just in general, it will not hold in every instance. For in comparing some of the similar passages of the two epistles, we must not fancy, because the expressions are the same, or nearly the same in both, that their meaning is precisely the same. The different circumstances of the churches to which these letters were addressed, and the different views which the apostle had in writing to them, occasioned him, in some instances, to affix different meanings to the same expressions. The false teachers made their errors into different forms, suit them, as was observed above, to the characters and prejudices of the persons whom they wished to persuade. And therefore, in confuting them, the apostle was obliged to give him arguments a new turn; so that, although in words some passages may be the same in different epistles, they are not the same in sense. Of this we have an example in the inscriptions of the epistles to the Ephesians and to the Colossians; wherein, in the former we have, τημῷ τοὺς ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, καὶ τοῖς πνεύμα ἐν Ἑρωμήν; and in the latter, τοῖς ἐν Κολοσσεῖς ἐποιεῖ, καὶ πνεύμα ἐν φυσιν ἐν Χριστῷ. For in the epistle to the Ephesians, the phrase ἐν τῷ πνεύμα ἐν φυσιν, signifying to the believers in Christ Jesus; namely, who were in the province of Asia, as distinguished from the saints who were in Ephesus: Whereas the same phrase, in the epistle to the Colossians, signifies to the faithful brethren in Christ; as is plain from the clause, τοῖς ἐν Κολοσσεῖς, which is connected both with τῷ πνεύμα and with πνεύμα ἐν φυσιν ἐν Χριστῷ. The reason is, if τοῖς πνεύμα ἐν φυσιν ἐν Χριστῷ, in the inscription to the Colossians, is translated 'to the believing brethren in Christ,' it will be of the same import with τῷ πνεύμα, 'to the saints.'—For other examples, see Col. ii. 13, note 2, and ver. 14, note 5. Wherefore, a proper attention to the above observation is necessary, in many instances, to our understanding the true meaning of the apostle Paul's writings.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines and Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

The apostle began the doctrinal part of this epistle with confuting their leading error; the error for the sake of which all the rest were introduced; namely, that the institutions of Moses, but especially the Levitical sacrifices, were still necessary, because there were no propitiatory sacrifices in the gospel. This false and most destructive doctrine the apostle exploded, by shewing, that they who are 'translated into the kingdom of God's beloved Son, have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins;' consequently, that in the gospel dispensation God hath appointed a propitiatory sacrifice of real efficacy, namely, the sacrifice of the blood of Christ, to which believers can have sure recourse for pardon, and have no need of any other propitiatory sacrifice whatsoever, ver. 13, 14.—But lest the Colossians might have been told by the Judaizers, that the pardon of the sins of the whole world was an effect too great to be ascribed to the once shedding of Christ's blood, the apostle observed, that the atonement made by that one sacrifice is perfectly sufficient for the taking away the sins of all who believe, because the supereminent dignity of Christ enhanced the merit of his death.—Christ's dignity the apostle described in a magnificence of language suggested by the grandeur of the subject. He is the image of the invisible God, and the Lord of the whole creation, ver. 15.—For he created all things in the heavens, and upon the earth, visible and invisible, ver. 16.—And by him all things are upheld, ver. 17.—The apostle having thus described the original dignity of Christ as God's beloved Son, for the purpose of displaying the merit of his death, proceeded to speak of the honour and power which he received in the human nature, as the reward of his death; whereby he hath shewed, in a conspicuous light, the folly of those who endeavoured to persuade the Colossians to prefer the mediation of angels to the mediation of Christ. He is the head of the body, even of the church, and the beginning or author thereof. He is also the first-born or Lord of the dead, having died to raise them again to life, ver. 18.—This greatness, both in the natural and moral world, he hath received from his Father, that he may unite angels and men in one great community under himself as their head, in order that they may be happy in their subjection to God, and in the society of one another, to all eternity. For, saith the apostle, it pleased God, in whom all the fulness of the Godhead was made perfect, to put all things in subjection to Christ, and to head over them all; and through the exercise of his authority and power, by him to unite all things under him as head, having made peace between them by the blood of his cross, ver. 20.—Even the idolatrous Gentiles, notwithstanding their former wickedness, he hath thus united, ver. 21.—In one body with the Jews, in his church, through the death of his Son, to render them holy and unblemish'd in Christ's sight at the last day, ver. 22.—To be in that manner presented before Christ, the apostle told the Colossians, would be their happy lot, since they were continuing firm in the faith of the gospel doctrine, which, because of its efficacy to sanctify sinners, was preached to every creature under heaven: of which gospel Paul was made a minister by Christ himself, ver. 23.

But lest his imprisonment for having preached salvation to the believing Gentiles, equally with the Jews, through the death of Christ, although they did not obey the law of Moses, might have led the Colossians to suppose the truth of his doctrine, the apostle told them, that he rejoiced in the affliction he was enduring for them; that is, for maintaining their title to salvation; and that these afflictions were expressly appointed to him by Christ, for the purpose of building his body, which is his church, ver. 24.—Of which church, he told them a second time, he was made a minister, or apostle, to build it by fully publishing God's determination to save the believing Gentiles, ver. 25.—Then he informed them, that this determination was a mystery or secret, which, during the Mosaic dispensation, was kept hid both from the Jews and from the Gentiles, but was now discovered to such of the Jews as God thought fit to employ in publishing it to the world, ver. 26.—To those preachers, God was pleased to make known by revelation the greatness of the glory of this mystery concerning the Gentiles; that is, the glorious excellence of that part of his plan which relates to the Gentiles; namely, That Jesus Christ, to them also, is the author of the hope of a glorious resurrection to eternal life, as well as to the Jews, ver. 27.—Him, therefore, all the inspired Christian teachers preach as the only Saviour of the world, exhorting every man to receive him as Saviour, and teaching every man with all wisdom the true doctrines of religion, that at the day of judgment they may present every man perfect, both in respect of holiness and pardon, ver. 28.—And to accomplish that glorious end, Paul himself laboured with the utmost vigour in preaching Jesus Christ, the hope of glory to believers of all nations, and in defending that doctrine with success, in proportion to the supernatural gifts bestowed upon him as an apostle, ver. 29.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAPTER I.

I. Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, and Timothy our brother,

2 To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ who are at Colosse, grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

VER. 1.—Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ, &c. To convince the Colossians, that all the things contained in this epistle were dictated by the Spirit of God, Paul began it with assuring them, not only that he was an apostle of Jesus Christ, but that he was made an apostle by the will of God the Father; an honour which none of the false teachers could claim.

VER. 2.—And Timothy our brother. —Timothy's early piety, his excellent endowments, his zealous labours in the church, and his great acuteness, made him very worthy of their regard. Paul allowed him to join in writing several of the letters which he addressed to the churches; nor, however, did he add anything to his own authority, but rather to add to Timothy's influence: for which purpose also, he calls him here his brother, rather than his son. See Pref. to 1 Thess. sect. ii. about the middle.

COMMENTARY.

CHAPTER I.

I. Paul, made an apostle of Jesus Christ by the appointment of God, (see Gal. chap. i. Illust.) and Timothy, who, though not an apostle, is our brother in the ministry.

2. To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ who are at Colosse. May virtuous dispositions be to you, and happiness temporal and eternal (see Rom. i. 7. notes 3, 4.) from God the Father of Jews and Gentiles, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom God dispenses these blessings to mankind.

VER. 2.—And faithful brethren in Christ who are at Colosse. —If the epistle had called the Colossians saints, in a moral sense, there would have been no occasion to have added to the expression the appellation of faithful brethren. Saints means all in Colosse who made an outward profession of believing the gospel; and faithful brethren denotes those who to that profession joined a suitable practice. This epistle, therefore, was addressed to the whole community of Christians at Colosse, and more especially to such of them as were sincere in their profession as Christians.

VER. 3.—That is, the Father of us all. —According to Essence, God is called the Father of all, and not of Christ only, because he is the high dignity to which they are raised by having the same Father with Jesus Christ, ver. 3; also to shew, that believers are the especial objects of God's love.
CHAP. I.

3. We give thanks to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, always when we pray for you;
4. (Chap. v.) Having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all ( Acts, 48.) the saints.
5. (Acts) Through the hope which is laid up for you in the heavens; of which ye have heard before in the word of the gospel;
6. Which is present ( ver. 19.,) among you, as also in all the world, and is bringing forth fruit, even as (ver. 17.), among you from the day ye heard and acknowledged the grace of God in truth;
7. As ye also learned it from Epaphras, our beloved fellow-servant, who is a faithful minister of Christ ( Col. 1.) with respect to you;
8. Who likewise hath signified to us your love in spirit.

9. For this reason also, from the day we heard these things, our prayers cease not pray ing (see 1 Thess. v. 17.) for you, and requesting that ye may be filled with the knowledge of his will, through all wisdom and spiritual understanding given to you;
10. In order that ( Eph. 1.) ye may walk worthy of the Lord to all pleasing, bringing forth fruit by every good work, and increasing (ver. 17.) in the knowledge of God;
11. Being strengthened with all strength, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joy.

12. We give thanks to the Father, who maketh us fit for a portion of the inheritance of the saints in the light.

Ver. 4. Having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus.]—The apostle did not mean his having heard of the conversion of the Colossians, but of their persevering in the belief of the great doctrine of the grace of God, that men are saved by faith without obedience to the law of Moses. See Pref. sect. 2. page 1. p. 1. Now, as some had been seduced by the false teachers from this true faith, Pref. sect. 2. page 1. p. 1., the whole body of the saints at Colosse, but of the faithful brethren there; that is, of those who had persevered in the truth, by rejecting all that was false from them. See Eph. 1. 16. note 2.

Ver. 5. Through the hope which is laid up for you.]—Here hope is put for eternal life, the object of the Colossians' hope; if the sense given in the commentary is not admitted, the meaning may be that the Colossians loved the saints on account of their entertaining the same hope of eternal life with themselves.

Ver. 8. 9. Which is present among you as also in all the world.]—Here is a statement of the. apostle, signifying the Roman empire, a sense which it has in other passages, particularly Luke ii. 1. 'There went out a decree from Caesar Augustus,' that is, the whole world should be taxed.'—In like manner, every nation under heaven. Acts ii. 5. signifies those nations only with whom the Jews have had communication. So also Cyrus, in his decree concerning the Jews, says, Ezra i. 2. 'The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth.' Thus understood, the meaning of the apostle's expression is no hyperbole. For, at the time the gospel was written, A. D. 61, the gospel had been preached and received in most of the countries within the Roman empire, and which had produced a great change in the manners of those who received it.—As the word ἐπιστέφω, present, is commonly applied to things having life, it here means multiplied itself.

Ver. 12. 13. Which is present among you as also in all the world.]—This is in allusion to the partition of the land of Canaan into so many portions, which were distributed to the Israelites by lot. And thy inheritance, and thy possession, in Canaan, is an inheritance in the land of Canaan, is an inheritance in the land of Canaan, which was divided among the tribes of Israel. And it is an inheritance in the land of Canaan, which was divided among the tribes of Israel. And in the inheritance of the natural seed of Abraham, was a type of the inheritance of the spiritual seed, the children of God. Here, in Tit. ii. 11. 1 Pet. v. 10. the grace of God signifies the gospel. In writing to Gentiles, the apostle with great propriety termed the gospel the grace of God; for this, among other reasons, that therein God declared his gracious intention of making the Gentiles heirs of the heavenly commonwealth by faith, even as he had done with the Jews, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses, ver. 12. This doctrine, in other passages, is called the truth and the truth of the gospel. Wherefore, their 'hearing and acknowledging the grace of God in truth,' means their hearing and acknowledging the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the salvation of the Gentiles by faith.

13 Who, for that purpose, hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his beloved Son.

14 Whom we have (aXeTiXevoov) redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.

15 (Oo) He is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of the whole creation.

16 (Oo, 254.) Because (as) by him were created all things which are in the heavens and which are on the earth, whether visible, or invisible, whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, all things were created (aXeTiXevoov) through him, and he (as) for him.

2. The inheritance of the saints.—This inheritance compriseth, not only the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type, but all the privileges of the cashal bowed on believers, to fit them for the enjoyment of the heavenly country.

13. For when the tabernacle is the image of the real tabernacle, the sun is living in the light of the glory, and enjoying all the privileges mentioned xxv. 13, it is the true tabernacle of the Lord, John 1. 14. Hence it is, as the apostle proclaims to the Greeks, Acts xxvi. 18, that the sun is the first-born of every creature, Acts xxvi. 18. —See 1 John 1. 5. n. 3. Moreover, it was proper to call men living under the dispensation saith no light, in the following verse, to call all other men under the power of darkness. In other passages also, the word light signifies the dispensation: Eph. v. 8. Now ye are light in the Lord. 1 Thess. v. 5. All ye are sons of the light. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Let him that ruleth in the glorious gospel. See Rom. xiii. 2 note, and Col. i. 16, where much of the Sun was made apostate, prophet, and inspired teachers, and the Son, and the other note, saith perfect on the word of the ministry.

Ver. 12.—1. The power of darkness.—Evil spirits are called. Eph. v. 12. the rulers of darkness of this world, and their dominion is styled, Luke xxi. 33. the power of darkness, as here, for the reason mentioned 1 John 5. 19 note. See also Acts xxi. 13. His beloved Son. —The apostle calls Jesus God's beloved Son, because God gave him that appellation by a voice from heaven at his baptism. —See John 1. 14. For the mutual subjects of the kingdom of his Son are the objects of his love.

Ver. 13. Redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.—Through his blood is an expression of the passage "by whom, as by his forgiveness of sins is an explanation of redemption."—The words through his blood are wanting in the Syriac and Vulgate Version also in the Clementine, and the other manuscripts MSS. Some think they were transcribed here from Eph. i. 7. But as there are many expressions in the two epistles particularly the same, which really do both belong, it is no reason why the words in question should be reckoned an interpolation.

The Son is called the image of the invisible God, —Here he is the substantive person of the third person, and hath for his antecedent God's beloved Son, because he is the image of the invisible God, and express image of his substance; Heb. i. 2. In the creation of all things he exhibited the perfections which the Son, as such, seeth in him during his abode upon earth, John 1. 11. —The apostle calls him the Son, who was called the image of the invisible God, Col. i. 15, because he beholds men's hearts with the light of the gospel, Col. iv. 6. the light of the glory of the grace of Christ, and because he manifested the divine perfections in the most clearly by that fulness of grace and truth which abode in him during his abode upon earth, John 1. 14. —The apostles call him the image of the Son of God, 2 Thess. iii. 17 because he abides into men's hearts with the light of the gospel, Col. iv. 6. the light of the grace of Christ, and because he manifested the divine perfections in the most clearly by that fulness of grace and truth which abode in him during his abode upon earth, John 1. 14. —The apostle calls him the image of the invisible God, because he appeared to the patriarchs by his Son. But this opinion is attended with great difficulties, as Whitney has shown in his note on Heb. ii. 2. —The Son, then, says the apostle, is called the image of the invisible God, 1 Peter iv. 18. In the same sense only Christ said to Philip, John xvi. 9. 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.' But it should be considered, that in other passages of scripture the word image denotes likeness, but similitude, of nature and properties. 1 Cor. xv. 35. 'As we have borne the image of the earth.' And thus the image of the invisible heavenly —Heb. i. 1. the law containing a shadow of the good things to come, and not the very image of the things. 2. The first-born of the whole creation;—So the phrase aXeTiXevoov is translated. Rom. viii. 14. —He is the first-born of the whole creation, 1 Cor. iv. 15. —He is the first-born of the whole creation, xxvi. 18. —It bears upon the sense of this passage. For surely the Son is the creation of all things, does not prove him to be the first-created, unless the power of creation is called the first-born of the whole creation, which is one, I think, will suffice. As little does the Son's creation all things prove, that he himself is the first-creating himself. Yet these absurdities will be established by the apostle's reasoning.

13. Who, for that purpose, hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his beloved Son. That in the kingdom of the Father or a beloved Son, namely, into the gospel church.

14. By whom we all have redemption through his death, even the forgiveness of sins. So that in the kingdom of the Father and beloved Son there is a propitiation for sin provided, more effectual than the Levitical sacrifices.

15. That the shedding of his blood should procure forgiveness of sins for all who believe, cannot surmise that, when ye consider that, which is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of the whole creation. These high titles belong to the Son, because by him were created all things which are in the heavens and which are upon the earth, things visible, the material fabric, and the living things therein, and things invisible, good angels and bad, the differences of whose nature and office I express by thrones, lordships, governorships, and powers: all things were created through God by the Son, for he that is for the manifestation of his wisdom and power, and to be governed by him.
And he is (ἐστιν) before all things, and (καὶ) by him all things (ἐστιν) consist.

And he is the head of the body,

For it pleased the Father, that in him all the fulness (ἐστιν) should dwell.

And by (ἐν πάση) him to reconcile all things (ἐστιν) to him, having spoken of Christ as the head of the body or church, I agree with 5.

And, having made all things, he is in existence prior to all things, and by his power all things stand together in the harmonious order in which he at first placed them.

And he is the head of the great body or society called the church. He is also the beginning or author of the church, the first-born or lord of the dead, (Rom. xiv. 8), who make the greatest part of the church, that in all respects he may be the chief person next to God.

This account of the greatness of the Son needs not surprise you. He derives his greatness from the Father: For it pleased the Father, that in him all the fulness of perfection and government should continually abide. See chap. ii. 9.

And by him to unite all things to him as his head, having spoken of Christ as the head of the body or church, I agree with 5.

And by him to unite all things (ἐστιν) to him as his head, having spoken of Christ as the head of the body or church, I agree with 5.

And by him to unite all things (ἐστιν) to him as his head, having spoken of Christ as the head of the body or church, I agree with 5.

And by him to unite all things (ἐστιν) to him as his head, having spoken of Christ as the head of the body or church, I agree with 5.

27 To whom God was pleased to make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery (which is Christ), to you the hope of glory:

28 Whom we preach, admonishing every man, and teaching every man with all wisdom, (see 1 Cor. xii. 8, note 1.), that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus.

29 (1st) For which I also labour, combating vigorously, according to the effectual working of him who worketh effectually in me with power.

as in the parallel passage, Eph. v. 2. 'to his holy apostles and prophets,' a sense which the word saints has, Jude ver. 3. 'Such of the Jews and Gentiles as received the gospel, and were fitted for that office by the gifts of the Spirit,' are called, Eph. v. 11. 'the same perfected for the work of the ministry.'

Ver. 27. Which is Christ to you the hope of glory.—'Εγγυήσεως τοῦ Χριστοῦ, of 路μάκος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, the relative ; it agrees in gender with 路μάκος, the relative.

Ver. 28. To admonishing every man.—'Νομιμοποιοῦντες, admonishing every man as a father his own children.

29. And teaching every man in Christ Jesus. The apostle repeats the words every man three times in this verse, not as having preached to every individual, but to show, as Baza observes, that in preaching he made no distinction between Jews and Gentiles.

3. That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus.—The word 完成 properly denotes, the priest's bringing the sacrifice or offering to the altar. The apostles and other ministers of the word, like priests, being appointed to an acceptable offering to God, Rom. xvi. 16. they laboured, by their doctrine, their admonitions, and their reproofs, to render every man perfect in Christ Jesus; perfect both in respect of the knowledge and practice of the gospel. Phil. ii. 12. The apostle speaks of his being poured out as a sacrifice and service of the faith of the Philippians; also 2 Cor. xi. 2. where he saith, he had bestowed the Corinthians to one husband, to present them as a chaste virgin to Christ.

Ver. 29. Combating vigorously.—The word 批判 properly denotes the exertions of those who contended in the Grecian games. To these combustions Paul fitting compared himself. Phil. iv. 13. He describes, where he met with the greatest opposition from evil spirits and wicked men; and in preaching the gospel he sustained terrors and sufferings, much greater than those which the athletes endured in the combats. See Col. ii. 1. note 2.

CHAPTER II.

View and the Discoveries and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

In the preceding chapter, by displaying the power and dignity of Christ, who died as a sacrifice for the sins of the World, and by teaching that God hath appointed and accepted that sacrifice, the apostle established the doctrine of the atonement on a sure foundation; and by setting forth the efficacy and extent of the atonement, that through it the Gentiles hope for a glorious resurrection, he greatly recommended the gospel to the Colossians. Further, by declaring Christ's commission to his apostles to preach salvation to the Gentiles through his death, and by describing his own labours as an apostle in preaching that great blessing, he had shewed what obligations mankind lie under to him for communicating and perpetuating such interesting discoveries. Deeply impressed, therefore, with the importance of these matters, he begins this second chapter with wishing, that the Colossians knew what a combat of affliction he was sustaining for preaching that Jesus Christ is the hope of glory to the Gentiles, ver. 1.—His sufferings for that doctrine he wished them to know, that the hearts of the Gentiles might be comforted by the full assurance of its truth which his sufferings would give them, so as to lead them openly to profess that doctrine. And, because the Gentiles entertain the highest veneration for the mysteries of their gods, the apostle, to entice the Colossians to put a just value on the doctrines of the gospel, calls the atonement for the sin of the world made by the death of Christ, and the hope of pardon, and of a glorious resurrection to eternal life, which the Gentiles were allowed to enter into by virtue of that atonement, 'the mystery of God and of Christ,' a mystery infinitely more grand, more interesting, and more certain, than any of the mysteries of the heathen deities, of which the Phegrians were so fond, ver. 3.

Farther, to shew the Colossians that the things written in the preceding chapter, concerning Christ's being the image of the invisible God, and the Maker and Governor of all things, constitute a principal part of the mystery of God and of Christ, the apostle introduced the subject anew in this place, by observing, that in Christ 'are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge laid up,' ver. 3. This second display of Christ's dignity was the more necessary, because the false teachers at Colosses, with a view to discredit his mediation and gospel, affirmed, that he was nothing but a man; and talked in the most pompous manner of the dignity and office of the angels, by whom the law was given. This we learn from ver. 4. where the apostle told the Colossians, that he said these things concerning the dignity, the knowledge, and the power of Christ, that no false teacher might deceive them with enticing speeches, for the purpose of discредiting Christ, or of magnifying angels, ver. 4. Next he assured them, that his anxiety for the purity of their faith proceeded from the interest which he took in their affairs, ver. 5.—and therefore he commanded them, agreeably to the account given them of Christ, that he is the image of the invisible God, the Maker and Governor of the world, the Saviour of mankind, and the only Mediator between God and man, to walk in him; they were constantly to hold that belief concerning Christ, and to yield him the honour and obedience due to his greatness, ver. 6.—and to continue closely united to him, and built upon him, and made firm in the faith of the true doctrine of the gospel concerning his person and offices, as they had been taught it; and to give thanks to God for the discoveries made to them concerning Christ's dignity and office, ver. 7.—He exhorted them, therefore, to take care that no false teacher made a prey of them, through the empty and deceitful philosophy of the Platonists, which was calculated to support the heathen idolatry, and was obstrued on them to establish the worship of angels as greater in knowledge and power than Christ, and was contrary to the duty which they owed to Christ, ver. 8, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, ver. 9, so that to be made complete, whether in respect of knowledge, or sanctification, or pardon, or favour with God, Christ’s disciples need not have recourse, either to angels, or to the law of Moses, or to the Greek philosophy. In every respect they are not completed by him who is the head of all government and power; the head and ruler of all the angelical hosts, ver. 10. In particular, Christ’s disciples, by the circumcision not made with hands, the Christian circumcision, consisting in putting off the whole mass of the sins of the flesh, are more effectually purified than the Jews were by the circumcision which was made with hands upon their body, or than the heathens by the Pythagorean abstinences and mortifications. So that they had no occasion to have recourse to the bodily circumcision, nor to the mortifications prescribed by the Pythagoreans, to render them complete in respect of purity, ver. 11. This Christian circumcision, he told them, was accomplished by their baptism, in which their being buried under the water typified the death and burial of the old man or nature, through the death of Christ. Moreover, being raised out of the water of baptism with Christ, it was both an emblem and a pledge of their resurrection with him to eternal life; so that in respect of pardon, likewise, they were made complete by him, and had no need of the Levitical expiation, ver. 12. For you Gentiles, although dead through the sins and uncircumcision of your flesh, God will make alive together with Christ, having forgiven you all trespasses, ver. 13. And to shew that by his own death Christ hath made both Jews and Gentiles complete in respect of pardon, the apostle observed, that he hath blotted out the moral precepts of the law of nature, as sanctioned in the law of Moses with the curse. These apostle called the handwriting of ordinances, because the chief of them were written by God himself; and declared that they were contrary to the Gentiles, because they subjected them, as well as the Jews, to death for every offence; but that Christ had blotted out the handwriting, and in its blotted out state had nailed it to the cross, to make all men sensible, that the law, on account of its weakness, was abolished, together with the curse, ver. 14. Further, Christ’s disciples are made complete by him in respect of government. For such of the angels as are inimical to mankind, he hath stripped of their power by his cross, and hath triumphed over them by means of it. So that no person need be terrified when he recollects the malice and power of evil spirits, nor be tempted to worship them, either from hope or from fear, ver. 15.

In what follows, the apostle gave the Colossians two exhortations, founded on the doctrine he had laid down in ver. 10. The first was, That since they were made complete in the knowledge of their duty by the precepts of Christ, they were not to allow any judging teacher to rule them in meats, or in drinks, or in a festival, or in a new moon, or in subhats, ver. 16. These, even in the Mosaic dispensation, were of no value but as shadows of gospel dispensations. And therefore, as the body, of which these services were the shadows, was Christ’s body, the church, and as all the blessings represented by these shadows were now bestowed by Christ on his church, there was no more need of the Mosaic shadows to prescribe them, ver. 17. The second exhortation was, That since Christ was the head of all government and power, the Colossians were not to allow any teacher tinctured with the Platonic philosophy to make them lose their reward; namely, the benefit of Christ’s mediation, by persuading them from humility to worship angels. These false teachers, by boldly describing the nature and office of the different orders of angels, intruded into things of which they had no knowledge, and were actuated by a foolish vanity, ver. 18. Besides, they renounced Christ, the head of all government and power, by whose influence alone the whole body, or church, groweth. And by renouncing him, they deprived themselves of the benefit of his intercession, and of all the other blessings which he hath purchased for believers, ver. 19. Having thus taught the Colossians their duty, he said to them, Since your death with Christ in baptism, and by your professing the Christian faith, ye have renounced your former philosophical and religious opinions, in as far as they are contrary to the doctrines of the gospel, why, as ye yet still entertained these false opinions, have ye subjected yourselves to the ordinances which are built upon them? ver. 20. Namely, the Pythagorean precepts, Neither eat, nor taste, nor handle, ver. 21. Such meats as occasion the destruction of life in order to their being used; that is, eat, &c. no animal food, ver. 22. Which precepts, as well as the precepts of the Platonists, formerly mentioned, concerning the worship of angels, have indeed an appearance of wisdom, as they recommend a worship voluntarily offered, together with humility, and the mortification of the body; But, in reality, they are mere foolishness; especially the precepts which enjoin abstinence from animal food, and frequent fasting for mortifying the passions, because they make no provision for the satisfaction of the body, which is as real a part of our nature as our soul, and needs to be strengthened with such food and drink as is fit for it; otherwise it cannot serve the soul in the functions and duties of life, ver. 23.

Commentary.

Chapter II. 1 Wherefore, I wish you to know what a great combat I sustain for you Gentiles in Colose, and for them in Laodicea, and as many as have not seen my face in the flesh: I esteem, for all the believing Gentiles everywhere, to the end of the world, whose privileges I maintain:

2 That being compacted together into one church with the Jews in love, their hearts may be comforted, even by their attaining, through

Ver. 1. I wish you to know. 1. That I have a great combat for you. This verse does not contain a reason for what goes before, but is an inference from it. γενετ. έν παντι εκ του προερχομενου τασαριανου και άνερπτη. For the meaning of παντι, see ver. 18, note 2.

2. Hence this combat. η θησαυρους. This apostle means the persecutions he had suffered all along, for preaching salvation to the Gentiles through Christ without obedience to the law of Moses; and more especially his two imprisonments at Caesarea, during which he was tried for his conduct without the law, in prison; and after his second imprisonment at Rome, Felix and Festus, together with his imprisonment at Rome. Perhaps, also, the opposition which the Judaizers made to his doctrine concerning the Gentiles, his anxiety to maintain their privileges, and the earnestness and frequency with which he prayed for them, were parts of the combat of which he speaks.

3. And for them in Laodicea. 1. Laodicea was the metropolis of the Great Syria. It was washed by the river Lycus, which joineth their streams near it. The situation of Laodicea near the Lycus, distinguished it from other cities of the same name, being called Laodicea on the Lycus after the king who founded it, named Diosippus, afterwards Rhesa, and last of all Laodicea, from Laodice the wife of Antiochus the son of Seleucus, for his life before the Roman governor, Felix and Festus, together with his imprisonment at Rome. Perhaps, also, the opposition which the Judaizers made to his doctrine concerning the Gentiles, his anxiety to maintain their privileges, and the earnestness and frequency with which he prayed for them, were parts of the combat of which he speaks.
even by all the riches of the full assurance (see 1 Thess. 1. 5. note 8) of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ." 3 (KJV) In whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge laid up? See ver. 9. 4. Now this (verse 55.) I affirm, that no one may deceive you with plausible speech. 5 For though in the flesh I be absent, yet in spirit I am with you; rejoicing (see Acts 20. 21.) when I see your order, and the firmness of your faith in Christ. 6 (1 Thess. 2:1.) Since, then, ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, wait ye in him, your sufferings for the gospel, the greatest degree of the full assurance of salvation, founded on understanding, leading them to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, namely, the Father, and of Christ; that is leading them to profess their belief of the Father's purpose of saving the Gentiles by faith in the Lord Jesus, which was formerly a secret, but is now made known by Christ, who hath accomplished that gracious purpose. 3 In whom, and not in angels, are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Colossians 3:9. 4. Now this, concerning the treasures of wisdom and knowledge deposited in Christ, I affirm, that no one may deceive you with plausible speech, concerning angels, as if they were superior to Christ in knowledge, divinity, and power; and concerning the law given by their ministration, as if it were more effectual for your salvation, than the gospel given by Christ. 5 For though in the body I be absent, yet in spirit I am with you, by the interest I have in you, and the pains I take to know your affairs; and have much joy when I hear of the order with which ye worship God, and submit to your teachers and religious officers; and of the firmness of your faith in the doctrine of Christ, concerning the salvation of men by faith. 6 Since, then, ye have believed on Christ Jesus the Lord, as the image of the invisible God, the maker of all things, and as the head, that is, the teacher and ruler of the church; and have trusted to his mediatory death, and not to the mediation of angels, nor to the sacrifices of the law for pardon, continue in and behave suitably to that faith;...

7 Rooted in him, and built upon him, (Eph. ii. 20.), and established in the faith, even as ye have been taught; abounding in it with thanksgiving.

8 Beware lest there be any one who makes a prey of you through an empty and deceitful philosophy, which is according to the tradition of men, according to the element of the world, and not according to Christ.

9 For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. (See Chap. i. 15. ii. 9.)

10 (Koim ouc epi tòs éntomh) And ye are made complete, (Eph. i. 16.), who is the head (tòn en pie) of all government and power. (See verse 6.verse 15.)

Verse 7,1. Rooted in him. The apostle alludes to Christ's authority. John xv. 1. 'I am the true vine, ye are the branches.' They were to be rooted in Christ, as plants are to the beneficent influence of the sun. 2. And built upon him. The church, consisting of all true believers, is represented. Eph. ii. 21, 22. as a great house of temple, built by God and dignified by God, and 'built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone.' See chap. iii. 11. Verse 8. Any one who makes a prey of you. The word σετες, (see also verse 29), properly signifies to make a prey of any one, or to cause one to become a prey of any one. It is proper to apply it to the false teachers, who were too ready to collect money from their hearers, and to strip the churches of their goods and wealth, and to allure others to their seductions. This is the meaning which I wish to express in the translation. See verse 14. The apostle does not condemn sound philosophy, but that kind of which has no foundation in truth and being, formed merely from imagination, aimed at the pride of human reason, is supported by the tradition that is, the affir- mations of the inventors, handed down from one to another. See the note on verse 2, toward the end. Of this kind was the philosophy of the Platonists concerning demons. (See 1 Cor. x. 20, note.) whom they represented as carrying away men's servants to God, and as bring- ing back from God the blessings prayed for. They spoke of them, likewise, as governing the elements, and all human affairs, by a sort of independent power. And for that reason Plato enforced his discipline to humour and worship demons. But in opposition to that philosophy, Christ, who was the true come, the hero of all, 1 Thess. iv. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and ears of same great king, beholding and hearing all things. These the philosophers call demons; but the holy scriptures call them angels, and that most properly; for they carry the Father's commands. The angels carry the children's to the Father. And therefore the scripture represents them as ascending and descending. Not that he needs such intelligence, who beforehand knows all things; but because it is more expedient for us mortals to make use of such mediators, that we may the more nobly and reverently the Supreme Governor, and the great power of his government. From a sense hereof we deduce a maxim: 'Speak to us, but let not God speak to us, lest we die.' The latter part of this quotation, the argument taken from humility, by which, as we are told, ver. 18. the false teachers of Colosse recommended the worship of angels, is plainly enough unmasked. Even in To- bellus's day, complete in the Greek, he has written: 'And the angel who conducted Tolus said, chap. xii. 15. 'I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints.' In this verse we have a proof of the early influence of the Greek philosophy in corrupting the gospel.

3. According to the elements of the world. 1 Thess. ii. 11, elements, denote, among other things, the first principles of science. See 2 Pet. iii. 10, 11, 12. But the world's so distinguished from philosophy, may signify here, as in Gal. iii. 3. the heathen religions or the worship, called demons, because they contained only the first principles of piety, exceedingly corrupted by heathen superstitions. Ver. 9. All the fulness of the Godhead. All that is in God, is in Christ. This word was derived from πλήρω, which signifies not only full, but finished, perfect, complete; that which is perfect, or complete. See Heb. x. 12, signifies completed, perfected; and esp. xiv. 15, the fulness of the earth, denotes every thing contained in the earth. The noun signifies, in the original, to brine to, to bring into, to bring together; the Græce, and other ancient languages, not understanding the apostle's meaning in this passage, as Chap. II. 7. And be ye rooted in him as the root is rooted in the stock, and built upon him as upon a sure foundation; and by this close connection with him, ye be established in the faith of the gospel, even as ye have been taught by me, growing more and more in it, with thanksgiving to God for having made you partakers of so great a blessing.

8 More particularly. Take care lest any teacher make a prey of you through an empty and deceitful philosophy, calculated to recommend the worship of angels, and abstinence from animal food; which philosophy is founded neither on reason nor on revelation, but on the unsatisfied desires of men, and to attribute to the idolatrous worship of the heathen world, but not conformable to the doctrine of Christ; consequently it is utterly wrong.

9 For in Christ dwelleth all the fulness of perfection and government, proper to the Godhead, bodily, so that the philosophy which represents angels as greater in power and knowledge than Christ, is false.

10. And ye are made complete, in every thing necessary to your salvation, by him who is the head, even Christ, who has given you both government and power in the world; and have no need of the heathen philosophy, nor of the rites of Moses, nor of the intercession of angels, nor of any new revelations which they can bring.

11. He foretold that 'the fulness of the Godhead' was made manifest in Christ. Col. i. 15. and 'eternal being, who, they descend from God by the fulness of power, and they all bow themselves to him. According to the heathens, the fulness of the Godhead consisted of the inferior deities, those who imagined themselves over the particular things of nature. In the Bible, the Godhead was composed of the angels. Which, therefore, they called the eyes, and the hands, and the feet of the Godhead. (See verse 18.) But most Christians, according to the literal import of the word πλήροις, hold that the fulness of the Godhead was only in the Father, in the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in the fulness of perfection and government which is essential to the Godhead; and that fulness they believe is essential also to Christ as the Son of God. The same, who held Christ to be only a man, affirm, that divine perfections were confounded on him as the reward of his sufferings; and to fit him for being the head or governor of the body, of that, is of the church. Yet, how the fulness of the divine perfections could be communicated to the man Jesus Christ, without his becoming God, it is not easy to conceive. To avoid this difficulty, others explain Christ's humanity in the same sense as the Hebrews explain the term 'human.' The word ἄνθρωπος, (see also verse 29), indicates the unity of the divine and human nature in the person of Jesus Christ. In support of this opinion he observes, that since the apostle, in the passage referred to, prayed God to fill the Ephesians with all the fulness of God, he could not mean by that expression, the fulness of the perfections essential to God; because God filled them with an ordinary fulness of spiritual blessings whereof he filleth men. This, Pierce saith, was not the fulness of one gift, but of all the gifts of God; and that the apostle means the fulness of all the gifts which were then bestowed on the disciples of Christ. These, he saith, are called the fulness of the Godhead, not because they exist in the Godhead, but because God; just as he called the 'increase of God.' Col. ii. 19 doth not mean an increase of perfection luminant in God, but an increase of spiritual blessings produced in believers by God. From this he concludes, that the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ, and consisted in the sum of all the fulnesses, or excellency, which from the Godhead was communicated to Christ, in order to dignify his name. It is, according to the evangelist, a 'fulness of grace and truth;' such grace and truth as came by Jesus Christ; and are received by no. John i. 14-16. And of his fulness we have all received.' Agreeably to this interpretation, Pierce thinks the sense, as verse 19. verse 20, to be translated. And ye are filled by him.

Most Christians, however, believe, that the fulness of the Godhead which dwelt in Christ means that fulness of the divine perfections which was communicated to the man Jesus Christ, by virtue of the union of the divine nature with the human for the person.

2. Hence, etc. The word πλήροις, commonly translated body, like its corresponding Hebrew word, signifies substance, See Wofl word on this verse. Wherefore, the word ,// also might be translated substantially. Augustine, in his notes on Joel i. 18, as quoted by Pierre, explains the word under consideration: 'In quo quippe habentur substantiae divinae, non menor sublinfert in imaginem tempori a regis (Salomonis) fact, et corporifruit; in etsi sole argentei.' See verse 18.

In this verse the apostle shows, not only the import, but the absurdity of adding, either the doctrine, or commandments of men, to the gospel. For if Christ is not made complete by Christ in his precepts, nothing can be added to his gospel, and the whole of his commandments; for, to me, Christ is made complete by Christ in the precepts of the gospel, and the whole of his commandments.

2 Who is the head of all government and power? The supremacy of Christ over all the sciences. Or the doctrine of Christ's supremacy and authority over all other sciences and systems. Or the doctrine of Christ's supremacy and authority over all other sciences and systems.

3 The body of the sins of the flesh. The whole mass of the sins of the flesh, according to the use of the word body in the Hebrew language. The body of sin is sold to the wages of death, against, according to his precepts, work together for their good.

4 Because the body of Christ. That is, all the members of Christ are united in one body. All the members of Christ are united in one body.

5 As to the circumcision which is made without hands. In this verse the apostle shows, not only the importance and necessity of the fourth commandment, but the absurdity and impious boldness of men, to add to the commandments of God, anything that is not contained in the commandments of God.

6 Not being able to help us. Not being able to help us.

7 If any man walk in this manner. If any man walk in this manner.

8 According to the body of Christ. That is, the body of Christ is made up of all the members of Christ, and the whole of the members of Christ are made up of all the members of Christ.

9 As to the commandments of God, and the whole of the commandments of God.

10 As to the commandments of God, and the whole of the commandments of God. As to the commandments of God, and the whole of the commandments of God.

11 In particular, ye Gentiles have no need of the Jewish circumcision to render you holy and acceptable to God. Ye have received a more excellent circumcision from Christ, by which also ye have been circumcised with the circumcision made without hands of men; namely, the circumcision of Christ, made by the putting off of the body of the sins of the flesh, even by the circumcision which Christ requires.

12 This appears from your being buried with him in baptism, as persons whose old man hath been crucified with him (see Rom. vi. 6, note 1); in which baptism also, that it might be a complete emblem of your circumcision, ye have been raised with him out of the water, as persons made spiritually alive, through your belief of the strong working of God, who raised him from the dead.

13 Also you believing Gentiles, who were dead on account of trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh, God will make alive together with him; he will raise you to eternal life, a new man, as it were, even as he raised Christ; so that being made complete by Christ, in respect of particular, ye have no need of the Jewish expectations.

14 And to shew that ye Gentiles are made complete in respect of the promise of Christ, and have no need of any Jewish expectations, God hath blotted out the handwriting of ordinances concerning us, that men's knowledge proceeds from their animal passions, which have their seat in the flesh.

15 Because the promise of Christ is ye are made complete in Christ, and have no need of any Jewish expectations, because the promise of Christ is ye are made complete in Christ, and have no need of any Jewish expectations.

16 For the promise is of Christ. That is, the promise is of Christ, and is made complete in Christ, and is made complete in Christ.

16 (Col. 2, 15.) Wherefore, let no one judge the Gentiles, which was contrary to us, as it subjected us to the curse for every sin, and hath taken it from among us, nailing it to the cross in its blistered-out state, that all might see it blistered out.

15 Further, ye Gentiles are made complete by Christ, in respect of government and protection; for having spoiled evil angels of every dispensation of their usurped power, Christ hath showed them openly as vanquished, tripping over them by his cross; so that ye need not be afraid of the devil, who formerly seduced and oppressed you.

16 Further, since ye are made complete in the knowledge of the purpose of the dispensing of the powers of the Gentiles, which was contrary to us, as it subjected us to the curse for every sin, and hath taken it from among us, nailing it to the cross in its blistered-out state, that all might see it blistered out.

condemning their conduct, the apostle's direction will appear more proper, if the clause be translated, "Let none rule you even," &c. a verse which the word ενω γινομενων will easily bear in the writings of the church, where it was customary to express the government of their rulers by saying, that they judged Israel.

3 In meat or in drink; for the law of drink was forbidden, except to the Nazarites, who were not to drink wine nor strong drink during the days of their separation. Now as then that account they were thought more holy than others, it is not improbable that the elders, who pretended to have received from Moses and the prophets, by tradition, many precepts not written in the law, might enjoy abundance from wine and strong drink to such of their disciples as aimed at superior holiness. See Heb. x. 19, Rom. xvi. 17, note.

4 Or in respect of a festival; η ἑορτας. A festival, as distinguished from New moons and Sabbaths, signifies a day of rejoicing annually observed. Of these, some were enjoined in the law; others, by private authority; such as those instituted in commemoration of the deliverance of the Jews by Esther, and of the purification of the temple by Judas Maccabaeus.

5 Or of a new moon, or of Sabbaths. 5 The whole of the law of Moses being abrogated by Christ, Col. ii. 11 note, Christians are under no obligation to observe any of the Jewish holidays, not even the seventh day Sabbath. Wherefore, if any teacher made the observance of the seventh day a necessary duty, the Colossians were to receive him. But though the brethren in the first age paid so regard to the Jewish seventh day Sabbath, they set apart the first day of the week, the Lord's day, as the chief worship day, and for commemorating the death and resurrection of their Master, by eating his supper on that day also, for the purpose of private exercises of devotion. This they did, either by the precept or by the example of the apostles, and not by virtue of any injunction in the law of Moses. Besides they did not sanctify the first day of the week in the Jewish manner, by a total abstinence from every labour of every kind. That practice was condemned by the council of Laodicea, as Judaising. See Sueton. Thes. Ecclesiast. v. 2293.

18. — Verse 17. make you lose your reward — This is an exhortation founded on the second article of the doctrine contained in v. 16. Namely, that Christ is the head of all government and power. For if, on any pretence, one forecourt Christ and attacheth himself to angels, shall lose the whole benefit of Christ's mediation. Pierce, on the authority of Demetrius, thinks ενω γινομενων, in this verse, should be translated condition. Our translators, following Chrysost, make the Greek commentators, have rendered it, beforehand. Others, because διακοσμητος signifies, to Col. ii. 15. "Let the peace of God (v. 14, 15) rule in your heart;" in Hebrews, the word διακονημενος extraordinarily, and as it should be understood, signifies, to minister. But as διακονησθαι comes from διακονον, a reward, the compounded word διακονητας more properly signifies, to remit a reward from yourself, thus not withholding the worship of angels, more powerful mediators than Christ, will certainly occasion.

By delighting in humility, &c. The word διακονης, often in scripture, signifies to take pleasure in things. Thus, Mark xii. 37. διακονητας, which delight to walk in long robes; 2 Sam. xv. 30. δυνατον την ευγενειαν σου, I have no pleasure in thee; I Sam. xv. 22. διακονηθης, hath delight in thee; 2 Sam. i. 9. In the law of the Lord is delight, ascribing delight to the sign. It is signified likewise to Is. ii. 5. διακονητας, I wish you to know.

3 In the worship of angels, &c. Because the Jews entertained a great respect for the angels, on account of their supposed agency in human affairs, exclusive of most of their considerations at the giving of the law, (cf. x. 2 note,) the apostle, in this epistle, and in his epistle to the Hebrews, was at great pains to show, that the Son is greater than all angels. Hence the false apostles intimated, that those persons who were addicted to the worship of angels, recommended the practice as an exercise of humility most acceptable to God, on pretence that it was prescribed in the law, and enjoined by their god; but, in reality, it was designed to engross God's honor, &c. the priestly office, and to substitute an inferior worship for that of angels, whom the Hebrew writer, in short, and by means of the several talents and gifts of his members — being served with every thing necessary, and united into one body, increaseth exceedingly. See Eph. iv. 16, note.

20 Wherefore, since in your baptism ye died with Christ, (ver. 12,) and thereby are loosed from the institutions, both of religion and philosophy, (ver. 8,) under which ye formerly lived, why, as ye were still living under these institutions, do ye subject yourselves to the ordinances prescribed by these institutions.

21 Not holding firmly the head. — Here, the worshiping of angels is declared to be a renouncing of Christ, as Governor, Saviour, and Mediator. Consequently, a renouncing of all the benefits of his government and mediation. — The same may be said of the worshipping of saints: For, though it is not so directly taught in this passage, the arguments by which the worship of angels is condemned, conclude equally against the worshipping of saints. Besides, an object of worship ought to be both omniscient and every-where present, which neither angels nor saints can be. The apostle's exhortation in this verse is a good caution to us, to beware of all refinements in Christianity, which have no signification in the authority, office, and honour of Christ, as head of the church.

2 By whom, &c. — Here the gender of the relative is, different from that of the antecedent v. 18, 20. Of this solution, there are other examples in the sacred writings. See Est. iv. 21. In the present instance, it may be removed by rendering, "by whom," or, "by which," after v. 20, thus, Not holding firmly the head Christ, from whom, &c. For so we have it expressed in the parallel passage, Eph. iv. 15, v. 20. — Verse 21. Since ye have died with Christ from the elements of the world. That is, since ye have renounced at your baptism all your former principles and practices. — The apostle, in ver. 12 of this chapter, had affirmed, that the burial of the body under the water of baptism represented the putting off of the body, and with it all the sinful appetites and passions which have their seat in the body. Here, carrying on the same illustration, the apostle still has the Colossians, that have been buried with Christ in their baptism as dead persons, they had shaken off all their former obligations, arising from the principles of religion and philosophy which they had adopted in their heathen state. — Διακοαναζωσθα τω ἀποκτενων και εἰς νέαν ἐπιθησθατε, in the same form of expression with τοι οὕτως τοι κατεστάθη, Pet ii. 2. deliver yourselves to the new birth, and being born again, &c. — Pet ii. 3. — δια τον αυτοκτόνον, as he died for us. — 4 Why, as living in the world. — When Δια τον αυτοκτόνον is used in a moral sense, by the inspired writers, it commonly, if not always, denotes the Gentiles. See 1 Cor. i. 19. Wherefore, Pierce is mistaken in supposing, that this and what follows was addressed to the Jews as distinguished from the Gentiles.

3 Do ye subject yourselves to men? — The phrase ενεργοις ἁγιοις, may be translated, agreeable to the Hyperboles which were used, were the rules of the Pythagoreans respecting abstinence from animal food, mentioned in the following verse, and of the Platonists concerning the worshipping of angels, condemned in ver. 11. Which, it seems, some of the church at Colosse had actually began to follow: perhaps at the persuasion of the Judaising teachers, who wished to subject them to all the rites of the law. See the Preface, sect. 2.

Ver. 21.—Neither eat, nor taste, nor handle, whatsoever things tend to destruction in the eating, or according to the commandments and doctrines of men. The word 60 translated eat, may be seen in the Lexicon. Others translate this clause, Touch not, the words are 60. Which is a precept of the Essenes. We have the phrase in this sense complete; 1 Cor. vii. 1. It is good for a man (μεταγ. ἐλπ. 57) not to touch a woman. The second precept is by some understood of those meats which the law forbade as unclean; and the third, of those things by touching of which the body was greatly defiled. But the next verse, Whatever things tend to destruction in the eating, according to the commandments and doctrines of men, and the direction, ver. 8. Take care lest there be any one who makest a prepost in thee, through an empty and deceitful philosophy, which is according to the tradition of men; shew clearly that these are Pythagorean, rather than Jewish precepts, and that they relate wholly to men. The apostle writes morally here, personating the false teachers delivering these precepts to their disciples; in which there is a beautiful gradation—Eating being more than tasting, and tasting more than handling.

Ver. 22.—Indecently; by which is meant, according to the ancient physiologists, called the formation of things under, generation, and their death or destruction. Corruption, (ὁ ναὸς, the temple, speaking of the death of the body, says, 1 Cor. xx. 42. It is known to corruption. And, 2 Pet. ii. 12. 57. corruption, is used to denote the destruction of life, so it is in this passage.

2. In the using, ἐργάζεσθαι. Corruption. If this is translated, in the absence, it will signify that the teachers here spoken of reckoned the eating of animals an abusing of them.

3. According to the commandments and doctrines of men. The description of the commandments which the apostle blamed the Colossians for obeying, shows that he meant the Pythagorean ordinances concerning abstinence from animal food, and not the ordinances of Moses concerning abstinence from unclean meats. For the apostle could not say that the ordinances of Moses were the commandments and precepts of men.
and actions, which he called their earthly members; namely, fornication, &c. ver. 5.—Then told them, that however pleasing the heathens might think these things were to their gods, they were so provoking to the true God, as to draw down his wrath on the persons who were guilty of them, ver. 6.—And that though formerly, while heathens, they lived in the habitual practice of these vices, ver. 7—it now became them, in their Christian state, to put them all away, together with anger, &c. ver. 8,—because at their baptism they professed to put off the old man, with his deeds, ver. 9.—By calling fornication, with the other vices, their old man, the apostle insinuated that the Phrygians were much addicted to these vices. Further, he exhorted the Colossians to put on the new man, who is new made through knowledge of the truth, after the image of God, ver. 10.—And to encourage them to acquire the new nature of which he spake, he told them that it communicates such a dignity to the person who possesses it, that God does not regard whether he be a Greek or a Jew, &c. But that, in the new creation, every man is honourable everywhere, according to the degree in which he possesses the nature of Christ, ver. 11.—Withal, to show them the excellence of the new man, he described his qualities, fruits of the Spirit, &c. and exhorted the Colossians, as the elect of God, to put them on, ver. 12, 13.—And over all to put on love, which he represented as a griddle whereon the spiritual dress is made perfect or complete, ver. 14.—Then prayed, that in consequence of their putting on the qualities above mentioned, the peace of God might rule in their hearts; which was an implied promise, that so it should be, ver. 15.—Next, because the worshipers of Cybele and Bacchus, identifying themselves to be inspired by these deities, ran through the streets and fields during their festivals, in a frantic manner, committing numberless extravagances, and singing lewd songs in honour of the gods whom they worshipped, the apostle, to prevent the Colossians from joining in these madnesses, commanded them to have the word of Christ dwelling in them richly, that is, to call it frequently to their remembrance, and to speak it to one another with all prudence: and in their social meetings, when they felt themselves moved by the Spirit, instead of singing lewd songs after the manner of the heathens, to teach and admonish one another by singing psalms, and hymns, and odes dictated by the Spirit; and to do so with true inward devotion, to the honour of the Lord, ver. 16.—And whatever they said or did by inspiration, to do all in such a manner as to promote the honour of the Lord Jesus, whose disciples they called themselves. Further, because the heathens offered solemn thanksgivings to Bacchus, as the giver of all the good things man-kind enjoy, the apostle ordered the Colossians to ascribe the honour and praise of all blessings to God alone, who is the real Father or Author of every thing good: And to give him thanks for his favours, through the mediation of Christ, ver. 17.—Having thus directed the Colossians to mortify their corrupt earthly affections, and to acquire the holy dispositions of the new man, who is created after the image of God, to avoid imitating the heathens in their lewd speeches and songs; the apostle, in the remaining part of the chapter, inculcated the relation of the husband and wife, the duty of children and parents, the duty of husbands and wives, ver. 18, 19.—From these, he passed to the duties of children and parents, ver. 20, 21.—Then described the duties of slaves; on which he insisted at greater length, on account of the difficulty of these duties, ver. 22, 23.—And last of all, he inculcated the duties of masters, chap. iv. 1, with which this chapter should have ended.—See the Illustration prefixed to Eph. vi. at the beginning.

New Translation.

Chap. III.—1 (Bes. 128.) Since, then, ye have been raised with Christ, seek the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.

2 ( Steph.) Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth.

3 For ye are dead: (sae. 211.) But your life is hid with Christ (v. 165.) by God.

4 When Christ shall appear, with whom our life is hid, (from v. 3.) then ye also shall appear with him in glory.

5 Put to death, therefore, ye members, which are on the earth: Fornication, impurity, unnatural lust, evil desire, and covetousness, which is idolatry.

Commentary.

Chap. III.—1 Since, then, ye have been raised with Christ in baptism, (ch. ii. 12, note.) in token that ye shall be raised from the dead, pursue the joys which are above, where Christ now sitteth at the right hand of God, to bestow these joys on his people.

2 And that ye may be earnest in the pursuit, set your affections principally on heavenly things, and not on the empty perishing riches, honoures, and pleasures of the earth.

3 To do so is wise: For ye must die, and leave all the things which are on earth. Nevertheless, your bodily life will be safely laid up with Christ by God, to be restored to you at the resurrection of the just.

4 So that when Christ shall appear to judge the world, with whom our life is hid, then ye also shall appear with him, raised to life in glorious immortal bodies.

5 Since ye are thus to be raised, instead of the Pythagorean mortifications, put to death your corrupt actions which are committed on earth; namely, fornication, whether with married or unmarried women, lechery in thought and speech, seduction, evil desire of every kind, and covetousness, which is idolatry. See Eph. v. 5, note 2.

Ver. 1. Seek the things which are above.—In scripture, seeking denotes the constant employing of one's thoughts and endeavors for obtaining the object of one's desire. Matt. vii. 21. Wherefore, in this passage, the apostle exhorted the Colossians earnestly to pursue the joys of heaven, not by the superstitions practices condemned in the foregoing chapter, but by the practice of real piety and virtue. And that they might be effectually excited to do so, he advised them, ver. 2, to make the joys of heaven the objects of their strongest affections.

Ver. 2. Your life is hid with Christ by God. 1 This is said in allusion to the custom of hiding treasures, for their safe preservation.

At the time the apostle wrote this to the Colossians, they were in possession of their lives. Whether their hope must have been, that whether they were put to death by their persecutors, or died in the course of their own life, their life would not be lost. God and Christ had bound themselves by promise, to restore it to them at the resurrection.

Ver. 5. Put to death therefore your members which are on earth, fornication, &c.—The apostle having represented the vicious appetites and passions of the human heart under the idea of a body, chap. ii. 17. the body of the sins of the flesh, because they have their seat in the body, he, in this passage, elegantly calls the sinful actions to which these bad affections prompt men, 'the members of that body,' or old man. See Rom. vi. 13, note 1. and the Illustration prefixed to Rom. vi. 14. According to some commentators, 'Members which are on the earth' is an epithet for 'earthly members.'

2. Unnatural lust. 1.—The word ἄμωμος denotes the unnatural lust which men indulge with men. Hence the subjects of that lust were called ἄμωμοι. The heathens were extremely addicted to that vice. See Rom. i. 26, 27. 1 Cor. vi. 9. Thes. i. 5. 1 Thes. i. 6. note 4. In confirmation of the translation which I have given of the word ἄμωμος, I observe that the Syriac version reads: 'members posteriors, unnatural lust.'

3. Evil desire. 1.—Evil desires. Under this appellation, im-believers in the life to come, rule in your hearts, through the exercise of the virtues I have recommended; to which happiness also ye are called by God, who has joined you together in one body, that ye may love and support one another. And be ye thankful to God, who has bestowed on you so excellent a hope.

16 Let the doctrine which Christ spake, and which he inspired his apostles to speak, be often recollected by you; and with the greatest prudence teach and admonish each other, by the Psalms of David, and the other hymns recorded in Scripture, and by such songs as yourselves or others have uttered by inspiration of the Spirit; singing them with true devotion in your hearts to God. And whatever ye speak or do, do all agreeably to the character and will of the Lord Jesus. And instead of the thanksgivings which the votaries of Barchus offer to him, as the giver of good things to men, give ye thanks to God, even the real Father, from whom all good things come; and do so, not through the mediation of angels, but through the mediation of Christ.

18 As to relative duties, my command is, Husbands, be obedient to your own husbands, whether they be Christians or heathens, as it is fit for the government of the family, and afterwards for that of the whole Church; and also to the Lord, as to yoursuperior obligations.

19 On the other hand, Husbands, treat your wives with kindliness, and do not use bitterness when you reprove them; lest it estrange their affection from you, and make them negligent of their duty.

20 Children, while ye are young, your parents’ family, and depend on them, be obedient to them in all things relating to your education, and to your deportment; for this is well-pleasing to Christ.

21 Fathers, do not exasperate your children by harsh commandments, or by rebuking and chastising them more severely, and more frequently, than their faults deserve, lest they be discouraged.

22 Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, whether they be heathens or Christians, serving them well, not only when their eye is on you, as men-pleasers do, but also in their absence, from the rectitude of your own disposition, as fearing God, whose eye is always on you.

23 And whatever service ye perform, whether it be easy or burdensome, work it from the soul, cheerfully and faithfully, as working to the Lord Christ, whom ye cannot deceive, and not to men only; (See Eph. vi. 7. commentary.)

for great peace, the meaning of the exhortation, Study to be of a remarkably peaceable disposition. Yet as, in the parallel passage, Romans, viii. 6, God’s peace is required to be in the heart, so this too must passeth all understanding. I take the sense to be as in the commentary. See Phil. iv. 7. note 1.

2. And be ye thankful.—According to Julius Pollux, the word ἀγαθοκράτους means the discourses concerning Christ; especially as the apostle immediately subjoins, and with all wisdom teach and admonish each other, by psalms, &c. If this is the meaning of the Psalms, the translation must thus: ‘Let the speech concerning Christ dwell richly among you.’

3. Teach and admonish (ἐκτάσθησθε) each other.—Properly, ἐκτάσθησθε is the present tense of the third person. Thus, Matt. viii. 22. ‘Let the dead bury (ἐκτάσθησθε) their dead.’ But it is used likewise for the first person, Acts xii. 14. ‘We have been bound (ἐκτάσθησθε) ourselves with a curse.’ And for the second, Rom. xii. 9. ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbour as (ἐκτάσθησθε) thyself.’ In the passage before us, and in ver. 13. (ἐκτσθήσθησθε) denotes the second and third person jointly, yourselves and others, or each other.

4. Psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs.—See Eph. v. 19. notes. Gs., are poems which were composed to be sung, accompanied with a lyre or other musical instrument. That the brethren who were able to repeat the psalms and hymns recorded in the Jewish scriptures, or who had been taught to them by the Spirit, should repeat them, not only in the public assemblies, but in private meetings, to those who had not copies of the scriptures, or who were not able to read them, was extremely proper. By hearing these psalms and hymns recited or sung, and by joining in singing them, both their knowledge and their joy would be promoted.—In these public and private meetings, such of the priests as had the world’s office committed to memory, were in like manner to instruct and admonish each other by rehearsing them.

25 But he who doth unjustly, shall receive for the injustice he hath done (Kau, 267.) for there is no respect of persons. And stealing, and many of the masters were tyrannical and cruel to their slaves. Perhaps, also, he was thus particular in his precepts to slaves, because the Jews held perpetual slavery to be unlawful, and because the Justianists taught that doctrine in the church. But from the apostle's precepts it may be inferred, that if slaves are justly acquired, they may be lawfully retained; as the gospel does not make void any of the political rights of mankind. See 1 Tim. vi. 1. note 1.

25 But he who doth unjustly, either as a servant, by neglecting his master's work, or as a master, by being harsh to his servant in his requisitions and in his chastisements, shall receive punishment for every act of injustice and cruelty he hath committed. For at the judgment there is no regard had to the station of persons.

Ver. 25. Shall receive for the injustice he hath done, &c.—The greatness of the temptations to which rich men are exposed, by their splendour and high station, will be no excuse for their tyranny and oppression: As on the other hand, the subjection which the insubordination and severity of a tyrannical master hath laid in the way of his slave, will be no excuse for his idleness and unfaithfulness.—In this and the preceding verse, the apostle gave great consolation to slaves under the hardships of their lot.

His account of relative duties the apostle finishes, in the beginning of this chapter, with a direction to the proprietors of slaves, to be not only just, in maintaining them properly, even after they have become incapable of working, but also generous, in bestowing rewards on such of them as distinguished themselves by their ability and faithfulness, ver. 1.—Here the third chapter ought to have ended; or rather at chap. iii. 17.

To render his practical admonition in the more complete, the apostle recommended to the Colossians perseverance in prayer, with due thanksgiving, as the best means of obtaining God's assistance to enable them to fulfill all the duties of life, ver. 2.—Next he exhorted the Colossians to pray for him, that God would grant him an opportunity to preach the true doctrine of the gospel freely, for which he was in bonds, ver. 3.—And courage to preach it in that bold manner, which became him whom Christ had made his apostle to the Gentiles, ver. 4.—Then he counselled the Colossian brethren to beware of provoking the heathens by any imprudent display of their zeal, but rather, by conducting themselves wisely, to avoid persecution if possible, ver. 6.—And in particular, when conversing with unbelievers, to make their discourse mild and courteous; but at the same time season it with the salt of wisdom and truth, that they might be able to answer every person properly, who inquired into the grounds of their faith, ver. 6.—And after telling them, that he had sent Tychicus and Onesimus to give them an account of his affairs, ver. 7, 8, 9.—he presented the salutations of the brethren by name, who were with him, ver. 10, 14.—and desired them in his name to salute the brethren in Laodicea, ver. 15.—Moreover, to convince the Colossians that his doctrine and precepts were everywhere the same with those contained in this letter, he ordered them, after they had perused it, to take care to have it read in the church of the Laodiceans; and to read in their own church the epistle which was to come to them from Laodicea, supposed to be the epistle to the Ephesians; a copy of which it seems was to be sent by the Ephesians to Laodicea, for the benefit of all the churches in that neighbourhood, ver. 16.—Next he desired them to encourage Archippus in the work of the ministry, ver. 17.—Then wrote the salutation with his own hand: And concluded the whole, with giving them his apostolical benediction, ver. 18.
5 Walk in wisdom, toward them who are without, gaining time. (See Eph. v. 15, 16, notes.)

6 Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, knowing how you ought to answer every one. (See 1 Pet. iii. 15.)

7 All things concerning me, Tychicus, a beloved brother, and faithful minister, and fellow-servant in the Lord, will make known to you;

8 Whom I have sent to you for this very purpose, that he may know your affairs, and at the same time comfort your hearts, by giving you an account of my constancy in preaching, and my affection for you.

9 With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is my fellow-prisoner, and whom I have sent to you for this very purpose, that he may make you known to all things which are done here.

10 Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner, saluteth you, and Mark, Barnabas’s sister’s son, concerning whom ye got orders? If he come to you, receive him;

11 And Jesus, who is called Justus, they of the circumcision. These alone are labourers with me in the kingdom of God, who have been a consolation to me.

12 Epaphras, who came from you, a servant of Christ, wishes you health; at all times fervently striving for you, by prayers, that ye may stand perfect and completed in the whole will of God.

5 Behave with prudence towards them who are out of the church, thereby avoiding persecution, and gaining time to spread the gospel among persons disposed to listen to it.

6 Let your speech to unbelievers at all times be courteous, and seasoned with the salt of piety and virtue, knowing how to make a proper answer to every one who desires an account of your faith.

7 All things concerning me, Tychicus, a Christian brother beloved by all who know him, and a faithful minister, and my fellow-servant in the work of the Lord in this place, will make known to you with fidelity;

8 Whom I have sent to you for this very purpose, that he may know your affairs, and at the same time comfort your hearts, by giving you an account of my constancy in preaching, and my affection for you.

9 With him I have sent Onesimus, now a faithful and beloved Christian, who is from your city. To whom I have made known to you all things which have happened to me here.

10 Aristarchus, who, for his zeal in preaching the gospel, as a prisoner like me, wisteth you health; as also Mark, Barnabas’s sister’s son; concerning whom ye got orders: if he come to you, receive him as a faithful minister of Christ.

11 And Jesus, who is named Justus, saluteth you. They of the Jewish nation, converts to Christ; and the only persons of that denomination who have sinned against their own gospel, and who have been a consolation to me. These faithful ministers of Christ, of the Jewish nation, acknowledge you as their brethren, though ye be uncircumcised Gentiles.

12 Epaphras, who came from you, a servant of Christ, wishes you health; at all times fervently striving for you, by prayers, that ye may stand perfect and completed in the knowledge and practice of the whole will of God; and especially in the knowledge of salvation through faith, without circumcision.
13 For I hear him witness, that he hath much affection for you, and them in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

14 Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, salute you. (See 2 Tim. iv. 10, note 1.)

15 Salute the brethren in Laodicea, and Nympha, and the church (see vii. 232,) in his house.

16 And when this epistle hath been read (see ch. 217.) to you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans. And that ye also read (see vi. 2.) the one from Laodicea.

17 And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the church of Christ, that thou mayest fulfil it properly. All the pastors of your church ought to exert themselves in opposing the false teachers.

18 My salutation I Paul write with my own hand, to assure you that this epistle is really mine. 2 Thess. iii. 17. Remember my bonds. My gracious dispositions, together with the favour of God and good men, remain with you all. Amen.

19 And saluteth you,—The apostle did not mention Epaphras’s imprison- ment to the church of the Colossians, lest it might have affected them too generally. But he informed Philemon of it, ver. 23, that he might communicate it to his pastor and principal brethren, to whom it was proper to account for Epaphras’s delaying to return. With respect to the rest, that they might not attribute his absence to any thing wrong, the apostle, in this and the following verse, gave Epaphras a very high character for fidelity and diligence in the work of the gospel; and assured the Colossians that they were the subject of Epaphras’s earnest prayers, and that he expected great things from them, and for the brethren in Laodicea, and in Hierapolis. See following note.

20 Ferrerly serving you by prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete.—The word εὐσεβίαν, properly denotes, combining in one the ideas of reverence, of piety, and of devotion. Here it signifies the greatest fervency of desire and affection in prayer. For the meaning of εὐσεβίαν, compare, see Col. ii. 19, note.

21 Ver. 13. Them in Laodicea,—(see Col. ii. 1, note 3), and them in Hierapolis.—Hierapolis was a considerable city in the Greater Phrygia, situated on the Meander, not far from Laodicea and Colossae. It was named Hierapolis, that is, the holy city, from the multitude of its temples. But it is not known what particular deities it was its tutelary gods. It is borne the image of Apollo, of the Ephesian Diana, of Cybele, and of Asia. The two last mentioned idols were worshipped in Hierapolis on account of the medicinal springs with which it abounded.—There was likewise a Mephitis, or opening in the earth, from which a pestilential vapour issued, which killed any animal which happened to breathe in it.

22 Ver. 14. Luke, the beloved physician,—Luke was deservedly beloved of the apostle Paul. He was not only an excellent and an intelligent disciple of Christ, but the apostle’s affectionate and faithful friend, as appears from his attending him in several of his journeys through the Lower Asia and Greece. He likewise accompanied him when he carried the collections to the saints in Judea, where, during the apostle’s two years’ imprisonment at Jerusalem, he wrote his second Epistle, and to him he sent his salutation before Felix and Festus, and heard the speeches which he had recorded in his history of the Acts. And when the apostle was sent a prisoner to Italy, Luke accompanied him in the voyage, and remained with him in Rome till he was released. Last of all, this excellent man was with the apostle during his second imprisonment in the same city; on which occasion, when his other assistants deserted him through fear, Luke abode with him, and ministered to him, 2 Tim. iv. 11, note.

23 And Nympha, and the church in his house,—It seems Nympha had a numerous family of slaves and others, who, having embraced the gospel, formed a church, or society for religious worship, among themselves. See Rom. xv. 6, note 2.
THESSALONIANS.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Introduction of the Gospel at Thessalonica; and of the date of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Thessalonians.

For the history of the Acts of the Apostles it appears, that St. Paul first passed into Europe to preach the gospel, after he had delivered the decrees of the council of Jerusalem (Acts xvi. 4.) to the churches in the Lesser Asia, whereby the Gentiles were declared free from obeying the law of Moses, as a term of salvation. In the course of that journey Paul having come to Troas, as was mentioned in the Preface to the epistle to the Philippians, sect. 1., there appeared to him in the night a vision of a man in the habit of a Macedonian, praying him to come over into Macedonia, and help them. In obedience to that call, which they knew to be from Christ, the apostle, with his assistants Silas and Timothy, went first to Philippi, and laid the foundation of a very flourishing church there. After that they went to Thessalonica, a great sea-port town of Macedonia, which being anciently called Thermas, gave its name to the bay on which it was situated. At that time Thessalonica was the residence of the Proconsul who governed the province of Macedonia, and of the Questor who had the care of the Emperor's revenues. This city, therefore, being the metropolis of all the countries comprehended in the province of Macedonia, (see 1 Thess. i. 7. note,) and the seat of the courts of justice, and the place where the affairs of the province were managed, and carrying on an extensive commerce by its merchants, was full of inhabitants, among whom were many philosophers and men of genius. There was likewise, to this city, a constant resort of strangers from all quarters; so that Thessalonica was remarkable for the number, the wealth, and the learning of its inhabitants. But, like all the other cities of the Greeks, being utterly corrupted with ignorance in matters of religion, with idolatry, and with all sorts of wickedness, it was a fit scene for the apostle to display the light of the gospel in. He therefore went thither directly after leaving Philippi, and, as there was a Jewish synagogue in Thessalonica, he entered into it soon after his arrival, according to his custom, and three sabbath-days-presumed with the Jews out of the Scriptures. His discourses, however, had not that success with the Jews which might have been expected, a few of them only believing; whilst of the religious proselytes a great multitude embraced the gospel, among whom were many women of the first distinction in the city. Yet the greatest part of the Thessalonian converts were idolatrous Gentiles; as appears from the apostle's first epistle, in which he speaks to that church in general, having turned from idols to serve the living God.—The many converts which the apostle made in Thessalonica from among the idolatrous Gentiles, and his receiving money once and again from the Philippians while he preached in Thessalonica, Philip. iv. 16., show that he abode in that city a considerable time after he left off preaching in the synagogue. But his success among the proselytes and idolatrous Gentiles exciting the indignation and envy of the unbelieving Jews, they gathered a company, and brake into the house of Jason, where the apostle and his assistants lodged, intending to bring them forth to the people, that they might be put to death in the tumult. But they happily escaping, the brethren by night sent Paul and Silas away to Berea, a neighbouring city of note; where likewise they convert-ed numbers of religious proselytes and idolatrous Gentiles, and even many of the Berean Jews. For the latter being of a better disposition than their brethren in Thessalonica, 'they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so.' But the Thessalonian Jews hearing of the success of the gospel in Berea, came and stirred up the idolatrous multitude, so that Paul was constrained to depart. Silas, however, and Timothy, not being so obnoxious to the Jews, abode there still. In this flight the apostle was accompanied by some of the Berean brethren, who conducted him to Athens, and who, when they departed, carried his order to Silas and Timothy to come to him forthwith. In obedience to that order, Timothy alone came to Athens. But the apostle immediately sent him back to Thessalonica, to comfort the brethren, and to exhort them concerning their faith, 1 Thess. iii. 1, 2.—After Timothy left Athens, Paul endeavoured to plant the gospel in that celebrated mart of learning by the force of reasoning alone, without the aid of miracles. The Athenian philosophers, however, not being convinced by his discourses, though he reasoned in the most forcible manner against the polytheism to which they were addicted, he made but few disciples. Leaving Athens, therefore, before Timothy returned from Thessalonica, he went to Corinth, the chief city of the province of Achaia, in hopes of being better received. This happened soon after the Emperor Claudius banished the Jews from Rome. For, on his arrival at Corinth, the apostle found Aquila and Priscilla, lately come from Italy, in consequence of the Emperor's edict.

St. Paul had not long been at Corinth when Timothy came to him from Thessalonica, Acts xviii. 5, and, no doubt, gave him such an account of affairs in Thessalonica, as made him sensible that his presence was greatly wanted in that city: But the success with which he was preaching the gospel in Achaia rendered it improper for him to leave Corinth at that time. To supply therefore the want of his presence, he immediately wrote to the Thessalonian brethren this his first epistle, in which, as we shall see immediately, he treated of those matters which he would have made the subjects of his discourses had he been present with them.

From these facts and circumstances, which are all related in the history of the Acts, it appears that this first epistle to the Thessalonians was written, not from Athens, as the interpolated postscript at the end of the epistle bears, but from Corinth; and that not long after the publication of Claudius's edict against the Jews, which happened in the twelfth year of his reign, answering to A. D. 51. I suppose it was written in the end of that year.

SECT. II.—Of the Occasion of Writing the First Epistle to the Thessalonians.

It seems the idolaters in Thessalonica, greatly displeased with their fellow-citizens for deserting the temples and worship of the Gods, were easily persuaded by the Jews to make the assault, above described, against the Christian teachers. The Jews, however, and the idolatrous rabble, were not the only enemies of Christ in Thessalonica. The philosophers, of whom there were many in all the great cities of the Greeks, finding the gospel very favourably received by the people, would naturally, after their manner, examine it scientifically, and oppose it by arguments. This I may venture to affirm, because, while the magistrates, the priests, and the multitude, were endeavouring to suppress the new doctrine by persecuting its preachers and adherents, it is not to be imagined that the men of learning in Thessalonica would remain inactive. We may therefore believe, that many of them reasoned both against the doctrines of the gospel and against its miracles; repro- bating the former as foolishness, and representing the latter as the effects of magic. And with respect to its preachers, they spoke loudly against them as impostors, because they had not appeared, with Jason and the rest, before the magistrates, but had fled by night to Berea. For, with some show of reason, they might pretend, that this flight was proceed from the falsehood of their doctrine and miracles. Besides, having left their disciples in Thessalonica to bear the persecution alone, without giving them any aid, either by their counsel or their example, the philosophers might urge that circumstance as a proof that the pretended messengers of God were deficient in courage, and had no affection for their disciples,—to the great discredit of Paul, in particular, who had boasted of his fortitude in suffering for his faith, and had professed the greatest love to the Thessalonians.

If the reader will, for a moment, suppose himself in the place of the learned Greeks, at the time the gospel was first preached in Thessalonica, he will be sensible how natural it was for them to oppose it by disputation; may, he will acknowledge that their discourses, after the apostle's flight, might be such as we have represented. On this supposition it can hardly be doubted, that these discourses were reported to Timothy in Berea, by the brethren who came to him from Thessalonica, after Paul's departure; and that, when Timothy followed the apostle to Athens, he informed him particularly of every thing he had heard. What else could have moved the apostle to send Timothy back to Thessalonica, to exhort the brethren concerning their faith, and to caution them not to be moved by his afflictions? 1 Thess. iii. 2, 3. The truth is, the danger the Thessalonians were in, of being moved by the specious reasonings of the philosophers addressed to their prejudices, was great, and would have required the presence of the apostle himself to fortify them. But as the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles were greatly enraged against him, he could not return, but employed Timothy to perform that office; which he was well qualified to do, by his extraordinary talents and endowments. Timothy, therefore, returning to Thessalonica, gave the brethren the necessary exhortations and encouragements, which no doubt proved of great use to many.

During this second visit to the Thessalonians, Timothy had an opportunity of hearing from the philosophers themselves, the objections which they urged against Paul's character and behaviour, together with the arguments whereby they endeavoured to disprove the gospel. So that when he came to the apostle at Corinth, we may suppose he explained the whole to him with greater precision than formerly; and added, that although the sophists had endeavoured to shake the faith of the Thessalonians, they had stood firm hitherto, and had borne the persecution with admirable patience, 1 Thess. iii. 6. Nevertheless, being young converts, they were but ill fitted to maintain such powerful opponents, either in the way of arguing or of suffering, unless they were properly assisted. Indeed the apostle himself, when he fled from Thessalonica, was so sensible of this, that during his abode in Thessalonica, he laboured to establish a church ther of the Church of the Thessalonians, he might strengthen his converts, by defending the gospel against the cavils of the men of learning; 'but Satan hindered him,' 1 Thess. ii. 18. Wherefore to supply the Thessalonian brethren the want of his presence and counsel, he wrote them from Corinth this first epistle, in which he furnished them with a formal proof of the divine original of the gospel, intermixed with answers to the objections, which we suppose the learned Greeks, who made the gospel a subject of disputation, raised against its evidences; together with a vindication of his own conduct, in fleeing from Thessalonica when the Jews and the idol- trous multitude assaulted the house of Jason, in which he and his assistants lodged.

This account of the apostle's design in writing his first epistle to the Thessalonians, and of the subjects handled in it, I acknowledge is not explicitly declared in the epistle itself. But in the Exception of the Gospels, the true spirit and rule of the New Testament, the author of these inspired writings I have shewed, that it is not by any formal declaration, but by the nature of the things written, that he commonly discovers the purpose for which he wrote. This is the case, particularly, in the first epistle to the Thessalonians, where the nature of the things written clearly leads us to consider it as a proof of the divine original of the gospel, and a refutation of the objections raised against the gospel and its preachers: for the whole sentiments evidently point toward these objects; and viewed in that light, the language in which they are clothed exhibits a clear unambiguous meaning, as shall be shewn in the illustrations prefixed to the several chapters. Not to mention that, on supposition the apostle had these objects in view when he wrote this epistle, many of his expressions acquire a beauty and energy, which entirely disappear when we lose sight of the apostle's design. To these things add, that the long apology which the apostle makes for his sudden flight from Thessalonica, together with the many warm expressions of his affection to the Thessalonians, which take up a considerable part of the second, and the whole of the third chapters, appear with the greatest propriety, considered as a vindication of the apostle's conduct as a missionary from God; whereas, in any other light, these particulars appear to be introduced for no purpose. Since, therefore, the things written in the first epistle to the Thessalonians form a regular and connected proof of the divine original of the gospel, there can be no doubt of the apostle's intending that proof, both for the confirmation of the faith of the Thessalonians, and for enabling them to convince unbelievers.

The subjects handled in this epistle, being matters in which all the brethren throughout the province of Macedo- nia were equally concerned with the Thessalonians, the apostle ordered it to be 'read to all the holy brethren,' chap. v. 27; that is, it was to be read publicly, not only in the church of the Thessalonians, but to the brethren in Philippippi and Berea, and in all the other cities in the province of Macedonia where churches were planted. Nay, it was intended to be shewed to the unbelieving inhabitants of that province, whose curiosity might lead them to inquire into the causes of the rapid progress of the gospel, or whose malice might incline them to impugn the Christian faith; at least, the things written in this epistle are evidently answers, which the Thessalonians were to give to such as required a reason of the faith that was in them.

Before this section is finished, it may be proper to remark, that the proof of the divine original of the gospel, contained in the first epistle to the Thessalonians, being written by one of the greatest inspired preachers of the gospel, and being designed for the consideration of persons celebrated for their genius and learning, it will ever merit the attention of the friends of the Christian religion, and should not be overlooked by its enemies; because it may be supposed to exhibit the principal arguments on which the Christian preachers themselves built their pretensions as missionaries from God, and by which they so effectually destroyed the prevailing idolatry, and turned great numbers of the heathens every-where to the faith and worship of the true God.

Sect. III.—Of the Subjects treated in the First Epistle to the Thessalonians; and of the Persons mentioned in the Inscription as the Writers of this Epistle.

In the opinion of the best critics and chronologers, this being one of the first inspired writings which the apostle Paul addressed to the Greeks, whose philosophical genius led them to examine matters of science and opinion with the greatest accuracy, he very properly chose for the subject of it, the proofs by which the gospel is shewed to be a revelation from God. The reason is, by furnishing a clear and concise view of the evidences of the gospel, he not only confirmed the Thessalonians themselves in the faith thereof, as a revelation from God, but enabled them to persuade others also of its divine original; or, at least, he taught them how to confute their adversaries, who, by misrepresentations and false reasonings, endeavoured to overthrow the gospel.

The arguments proposed in this epistle, for proving the divine original of the Christian revelation, are the four following:—1. That many and great miracles were wrought by the preachers of the gospel, professedly for the purpose of demonstrating, that they were commissioned by God to preach it to the world. —2. That the apostles and their assistants, by preaching the gospel, brought upon themselves, everywhere, all manner of present evils, without obtaining the least worldly advantage, either in possession or in prospect. —3. That in preaching this new doctrine, they did not, in any respect, accommodate it to the prevailing inclinations of their hearers, nor encourage them in their vicious practices: They used none of the base arts peculiar to impostors for gaining belief; but that their manner of preaching and acting was, in all respects, suitable to the character of missionaries from God; so that, on account of their personal character, they were entitled to the highest credit as teachers. —4. That the first preachers of the gospel delivered to their disciples, from the very beginning, precepts of the greatest strictness and holiness; so that by the sanctity of its precepts, the gospel is shewed to be a scheme of religion every way worthy of the true God, and highly beneficial to mankind.

Further, though it was proper that Paul, who was the chief preacher and worker of miracles, should be the writer of this letter to the Thessalonians, yet, as Silvanus and Timothy had assisted him in preaching, and had themselves wrought miracles among the Thessalonians, and were teachers of the same virtue, disinterested character, and were equally faithful in preaching the gospel, they joined him in it, to give the greater weight to the appeals he was about to make to the Thessalonians. For every thing said in this letter is said of them all, and is equally true of them all; as the Thessalonians well knew. However, the arguments taken from their miracles, character, and precepts, will not have their full weight, unless we recollect, that the things affirmed of Paul and Silvanus and Timothy, are true of all the apostles and inspired preachers of the gospel without exception. In the next place, although the first epistle to the Thessalonians was written by Paul alone, Silvanus and Timothy are fitly mentioned in the inscription, for this other reason, that being ministers of the word, who possessed the gift of discerning spirits, when they read the first copy of this letter, they were qualified, by that gift, to know whether every thing contained in it was dictated to Paul by the Spirit of God; and therefore, by allowing their names to be inserted in the inscription when it was transcribed, they declared it to be so, and added their testimony to all the doctrines and facts contained in it. By the way, this shews the propriety of the apostle’s joining Sotheneus with himself, in the inscription of his first epistle to the Corinthians; and Timothy, in the inscription of his second epistle to the same church, and in the inscriptions of his epistles to the Philippians and Colossians. For Paul, though an apostle, willingly submitted his writings to be tried by those who possessed the gift of discerning spirits; as is plain from 1 Cor. xiv. 37. 'If any one be really a prophet, or a spiritual person, let him acknowledge the things I write to you, that they are the commandments of the Lord.' Soothwise, therefore, being a spiritual person, very properly joined Paul in his letter to the Corinthians, because by his gift of discerning spirits, he was equally qualified with Silvanus and Timothy to attest that all the things contained in the letter to which his name is prefixed, proceeded from the inspiration of the Spirit of God.

In this epistle, besides proving the divine original of the gospel, the apostle, by wholesome reproofs, corrected certain vices and irregularities which the Thessalonians had not yet amended. Now on this subject let it be observed, once for all, that notwithstanding a great change was wrought in the manners of the first Christians by their believing the gospel, they did not become all at once perfect, either in knowledge or virtue. The operation of the gospel, in rooting out their old prejudices, and in correcting their predominant vices, was gradual, and oftentimes slow. Hence, though the first Christians were all of them much more knowing and virtuous than the generality of their heathen neighbours, there were particulars in the behaviour and habits of many of them which needed correction. Not to mention, that through the imperfection of their knowledge of a religion altogether new to them, they were in danger of deceiving themselves with respect to their favourite vices, and of being deceived by the specious reasonings of the false teachers, who, from interested motives, flattered them in their evil practices. Wherefore we ought not to be surprised, if in most of the epistles which St. Paul wrote to his converts, some irregularities are reproved. These faults were the natural, and almost unavoidable consequences of their former character, their imperfect views, and their national prejudices.

With respect to the Thessalonians in particular, the apostle, well knowing that it was difficult for them, all at once, to divest themselves of their former habits, thought proper, when treating of the holy nature of the precepts of the gospel, to renew in the most solemn manner those precepts against fornication, in all its forms, which he had delivered to them from the very first. And his earnestness on this topic was an intimation to them, that he thought them still defective in purity. The same suspicion he insinuated at the conclusion of his exhortation, chap. iv. 9. 'But concerning brotherly love, ye have no need that I write to you' for this implied, that they needed to be written to concerning chastity, as he had done in what immediately goes before.—Further, because the apostle had been informed by Timothy, or some other person, that they did not pay a proper respect to their teachers when they admonished them concerning the irregularities of their behaviour, he besought them to obey those 'who laboured among them in the Lord,—and to esteem them very highly with love, for their work's sake,' ch. v. 12, 13. It seems the Thessalonian brethren had not acquired a just idea of that subordination to their teachers, which was necessary to the very existence of the Christian societies, while they had no protection from the civil powers, but rather were oppressed by them. The truth is, the Christian churches could not subsist in those early times, amidst the storms of persecution which came upon them from every quarter, except by maintaining a cordial union among themselves, and by following carefully the directions of their spiritual guides.

On the other hand, the rulers and pastors of the church of the Thessalonians being discouraged, and perhaps intimidated, by the refractory disposition which many of their people showed when rebuked for their vices, had, it seems, forborne to admonish them. The apostle therefore addressed them likewise, requiring them to be faithful, and plain, and earnest in admonishing every one who sinned; and particularly those who went about meddling in other people's affairs, and neglecting their own, chap. v. 14. For notwithstanding St. Paul, while in Thessa- lonica, had expressly forbidden these practices, there were some who still followed them, to the great scandal of the Christian name.

This plain dealing of the apostle towards all his disciples, seconded by the fidelity of their own pastors, had no doubt, in time, the desired effect upon the first Christians. For, considering the honesty of disposition which they had shewed, in so readily forsaking the idolatrous practices in which they had been educated, and in embracing the gospel at the hazard of their fortunes and lives, it cannot be doubted, that most of them paid a proper regard to the earnest remonstrances of their spiritual father, delivered to them by the direction of the Holy Ghost, and to the admonitions which, from time to time, their several pastors gave them, agreeably to the mind of Christ; correcting at length those irregularities, in which, after their conversion, they had continued through mistake, or inattention, or prejudice, or habit; and attaining to such a holy manner of living as was suitable to the gospel; so that even the heathens, in process of time, regarded them with admiration, on account of their virtuous.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Subjects treated in the first Chapter of this Epistle.

The apostle's design in this epistle, as was shewed in the Preface, sect. 3. being to furnish the Thessalonian brethren with a proof of the divine original of the gospel, both for establishing themselves, and for convincing unbelievers, he elegantly introduced his subject by declaring, that he gave thanks to God at all times, or daily, for their faith and love, and perseverance of hope; which he told them was an evidence of their election by God to be his people, although they did not obey the law of Moses, ver. 3, 3, 4.—Then, to make the Thessalonians sensible that their faith in the gospel was well founded, he put them in mind of the arguments by which they had been induced to receive the gospel as the word of God.

The first argument which he mentions is, That the gospel had been offered to the Thessalonians, not in word, or preaching only, but in preaching accompanied with great and evident miracles, performed in their presence; and with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, communicated to them after they believed. And these miracles and supernatural gifts, he affirms, had wrought in them 'much assurance,' that is, the strongest persuasion of the truth of the gospel; in which persuasion they were confirmed by the holy disinterested behaviour of the preachers of the gospel, ver. 5.—But this being a branch of his second argument, the apostle only mentions it here, referring the more full consideration of it to chap. ii.—He adds, that the Thessalonians had shewed the strength of their faith, by imitating the apostles, and the Lord Jesus, in suffering much affliction for the gospel with joy, ver. 6.—so that they were patterns of faith and fortitude to all the brethren in the provinces of Macedonia and Achaia, ver. 7.—Further, he affirms, that from them the fame of the gospel had resounded, 'not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place, their faith in one God only was spoken of' as a thing very extraordinary, ver. 8.—That their fellow-citizens, who had carried their religion into distant countries, had told at the same time, in what manner the preachers of the new religion had entered, and established themselves among the Thessalonians; that they had done it by great and evident miracles; and that the Thessalonians, struck with these miracles, had turned from idols, and were become the worshippers of one living and true God.' ver. 9. and looked for the return of his Son from heaven, who, as the preachers of the gospel affirmed, had been raised from the dead; even Jesus, who would deliver them from the wrath to come on unbelievers at the day of judgment, ver. 10. —Now, that the Thessalonians looked for the return of Jesus from heaven, and that God had raised him from the dead, and that they expected, at his return, to be delivered by him from the wrath to come on unbelievers, are all fully mentioned in this place, because their expectation of these things, shows what a strong impression the miracles wrought in confirmation of the gospel had made on the minds of the Thessalonians. Moreover, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, being a demonstration of his character as the Son of God, and of his power and authority as Judge of the world, it is an undeniable proof of the divine original of the gospel, and renders the rejection of it extremely dangerous.

Here, then, is the first argument by which the gospel is proved to be a revelation from God. The apostles and evangelists wrought miracles, to show that they were actually sent of God to publish those great discoveries to which they have given the name of To every one, The Gospel, or good news from God. Now, on this argument I observe, that the efficacy of miracles to prove a divine commission, when wrought expressly for the purpose, is so plain, that little reasoning is needful to show it. Persons of ordinary understandings, equally with those whose minds are more improved, naturally reason as Nicodemus did, John iii. 2. 'Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do those miracles which thou dost, unless God be with him.' Wherefore, being thus a dictate of common sense, the apostle had no occasion to show, that a teacher who works miracles in confirmation of his doctrine, is commissioned of spiritual gifts. All he had to do was to make it evident, that his own preaching at Thessalonica had been accompanied with undeniable miracles. To the Thessalonians, however, this was not necessary. They had been eye-witnesses of his miracles, and had been convinced by them; and after their conversion they had received from the apostle the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and among the rest the power of working miracles, and of speaking foreign languages; which power, such of them as possessed it had often exercised. Nevertheless, to convince those who should live in after ages, that the first preaching of the gospel was accompanied with great and evident miracles, the writers of this epistle have taken the very best method that could be devised, by that method which carries absolute conviction with it. They speak plainly to the Thessalonians in this letter, concerning the miracles which they wrought in their presence, and the spiritual gifts which they conferred on them; and affirmed before them all, that those miracles and gifts produced in them the fullest assurance of the divine original of the gospel; and that the Thessalonians showed the strength of their persuasion, by forsaking the established idolatry, and suffering with joy much affliction for the gospel. They further affirmed, that the miracles which they wrought among them were done publicly, and so well known, that when the unbelieving inhabitants of their city went with their merchandise to foreign countries, they not only reported that the Thessalonians had forsaken the worship of the gods, but that they had been persuaded to do so by the miracles which the preachers of the new religion had wrought in their presence, and by the extraordinary favours which these preachers conferred on their disciples. Now, who does not see, that open appeals of this kind, made to the Thessalonians concerning the miracles which were wrought in their presence, and concerning the impression which these miracles made on their minds, and the change produced in their religious sentiments through the influence of that impression, are undeniable proofs that miracles were really wrought at Thessalonica, and spiritual gifts conferred; and that by the power of these miracles and gifts, the Thessalonians were turned from worshipping idols, to serve the living and true God! For, three persons in their right senses, as Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy undoubtedly were, cannot be supposed to have made open appeals of this nature to such numerous societies as the church of the Thessalonians, and the other churches in which this epistle was to be read, where every individual must have known whether the matters affirmed were true or false, unless they had been conscious to themselves that they were all strictly true. As little can it be supposed, that the Thessalonians and the rest would have received and preserved the letter in which these things were affirmed, unless they had known them to be all strictly true. Wherefore, that great and evident miracles were wrought at Thessalonica; that spiritual gifts were conferred on them who believed; and that these miracles and spiritual gifts produced among the Thessalonians such a firm persuasion of the truth of the new religion, that many of them forsok their idol gods, embraced the gospel, and worshipped the one true God only; and that this change of religion brought upon them much affliction—are all as certain, as that the Thessalonians embraced the gospel, and that this epistle was written by Paul, and sent to Thessalonica.

Commentary.

Ver. 1.—1. Paul, and Silvanus, and Timothy, to the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

2—This is an expression of the same kind with that, 1 John v. 20. 'We are in the true God, in his Son Jesus Christ.' We are in subjection to the true God, by being in subjection to his Son.

Ver. 2. We give thanks to God at all times for you all.—From this and from many other passages in Paul's epistles, we learn that it is the duty of Christians, and especially of the ministers of the gospel, to pray for others, and to praise God for all that is ex-
I. THESSALONIANS.

Chap. 1.

To God at all times for you all, making mention of you in our prayers. See Phil. 1. 3-5.

3 Without ceasing remembering your work of faith, and labour of love, and perseverance (see Rom. ii. 7.) of the hope of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God, even our Father.

4 Knowing, brethren, beloved of God, your election.

First Argument in Proof of the Divine Original of the Gospel, founded upon the Miracles by which it was confirmed.

5 For our gospel came not to you (as) in word only, but also (as) in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and with much assurance, as ye know what sort of men we were among you for your sakes.

6 And ye became imitators of us, and of the Lord, having embraced the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost.

7 So that ye are become (ver. 1 Pet. iii. 8. note s.) patterns to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia.

8 (Tit. 1.) Besides, from you the word of the Lord hath resounded, not only in Macedonia and Achaia; but also in every place to which our fellow-citizens resort, communicated to the first believers, for the purpose of edifying each other, and for confirming the truth of the gospel.

9 Your work of faith, in allusion to our Lord's words, John vi. 29. This is the work of God, that ye believe. The apostle uses the same phrasing, Phil. i. 6. Faith therefore is truly a good work.

10 Labour of love. Some hold that this indicates that labour in working with their hands, to which the Thessalonians submitted from love to their distressed brethren, that they might have wherewith to relieve them.

11 In the sight of God, even our Father. Some join this with the first clause. Without ceasing remembering in the word, &c. But I prefer the sense which arises from the order of the words in the original, and which I have followed in the translation.

12 Your election. This being said in the whole church of the Thessalonians, cannot be understood of the election of every individual in that church, eternal life. For there were amongst them some who walked disorderly, 2 Thess. iii. 11., concerning whom the apostle desired, that they should lose their privileges, chap. v. 14. Besides, the election of the Thessalonians was such as left the temple, and made haste to get rid of the perverted men, as hampered them so effectually as to make his labour amongst them fruitless, chap. iii. 2. The power of faith was not inconsistent with the power of their election to eternal life. Those who, on hearing the gospel, hated the change of their state, and turned to Christ, and Jesus, 1 Thess. ii. 13. were afterwards called by God. So that the Lord the God hath chosen (electe) them to be a special people to himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth. But the Joining in their election delayed the election of the Gentiles to be the people of God while they refused to subject themselves to the law of Moses. Wherefore it was highly proper to assure the Thessalonians, that they were elected, or made the people of God, by faith in Christ above.

The controversy, agitated in later times, concerning particular election, was not known in the primitive church. Brethren, whatever the secret purpose of God may be, it was extremely dangerous for any person to presume on his election, in such a manner as to neglect the working out of his own salvation with fear and trembling. For more concerning election, see Rom. ix. 11. note s. 1 Pet. i. 1. note s. 2 Pet. i. 2. verse.

But also with power. In scripture, power, usually signifies, that supernatural power whereby Jesus and his apostles were enabled to work miracles, for the confirmation of the gospel. Acts x. 38. How God moved and wrought miracles of the Holy Ghost, (see Acts x. 38.) and with power. Matt. xvi. 22. And in the name of Jesus Christ. Acts iii. 6. 10. By the power of the Holy Ghost. Matt. xvi. 22. Truly the signs and miracles of an apostle were fully wrought among you, with all patience, by signs and wonders, and by the power of God. Acts xii. 23. Those spiritual gifts of prophecy, healing diseases, speaking foreign languages, and the interpretation of languages, in which the apostles your faith to God-ward is spread abroad, so that we have need to speak any thing.

9 For they themselves publish concerning us, what sort of entrance we had to you, and how ye turned to God from idols (ἀποστολή), to serve the living and true God;

10 And to wait for his Son from heaven; whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, (παντοκράτωρ) who delivered us from the wrath which is to come.

For the sakes of commerce, the news of your faith in the true God is spread abroad by them; so that we have need to speak anything, either in our own praise or in yours.

9 For your fellowship and the joy of hearts, which ye have in the presence of our God and Father, in that ye have been translated into a peculiar people, a royal priesthood, to serve God, who bought you with his own blood; to proclaim the praises of him that hath glorified you.

10 and in expectation, not the appanage on earth of any of the gods, who are formerly worshipped by you, but of God's Son from heaven to judge the world, whom, when he raised from the dead, even Jesus our Master, who, as Judge, will deliver those who believe from the wrath which is to come upon them who obey not the gospel.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

In this chapter, the apostle proposes his second argument in proof of the truth of the gospel. It is taken from the character, the behaviour, and the views of the persons who first preached it. Now the importance of this argument will appear, if we consider what the things were which the preaching of the gospel published, and required mankind to believe. They told everywhere, that Jesus their Master is the Son of God; that he wrought many miracles in Judaea; that he was crucified by the Jews, his crucifixion being the most evident of all his miracles; that he was exalted to the right hand of God, that he is the mediator of the new covenant, and by his name for God. In all this he was confirmed in the next verse, they were distinct: as in Acts 14:10.

...and their disinterestedness in preaching the gospel, were extended to those particularities by which the moral character was raised above all dispute. Living in every respect, therefore, such men as missionaries from God ought to be, the evidence of the gospel, so far as they depend on human testimony, derives great lustre from the character and behaviour of its first preachers.

His illustration of these topics for the apostle begins with showing that those who are truly converted were fully persuaded of the truth of all the matters which they preached. For he said to the Thessalonians, that their entrance among them was not in word only. They did not come with a seducing story in their mouth, which they themselves did not believe, ver. 5. Their persuasion of the things which they preached, they showed at their entrance among the Thessalonians, by the persecution which they had suffered, and by their sufferings for the gospel. So they, Although they had before suffered, and were shamefully handled at Philippi, (they had been scourged, and laid in the stocks, as ye know, we were bold, through our God, to speak to you the word of God, amidst a great tumult."

That is, amidst a new and heavy persecution, raised against us in your city by the unbelieving Jews, ver. 2. Their preaching the gospel under persecution is fully mentioned by the apostle, as a proof of their firm persuasion of the things which they preached, because impious, having nothing in view by their fictions but to acquire fame, or power, or riches, or pleasures, they abound eneering a long-continued course of heavy sufferings in proseling these fictions; for, less is to be expected by suffering for maintaining them.—Next the apostle affirms, that their elevation, or gospel, did not proceed from error; that is, from an erroneous opinion, rashly taken up, without any foundation; nor from those in-pure worldly motives which influence impostors; neither did they use any guile in contriving or in gaining credit to the gospel which they preached, ver. 5.

But the freedom of the apostles, and other ministers of the word, from error, impurity, and guile, being circumstances which rendered their testimony credible in the highest degree, it was proper to speak of these things at more length. And therefore, beginning with their freedom from guile, the apostle observes, that as persons 'commissioned of God to preach the gospel,' they delivered its doctrines and precepts exactly as they received them from God; at no time preaching 'so as to please men, but God, who knew their hearts.' And this they did, notwithstanding they were sensible that the doctrines of the gospel, as they delivered them, would be reckoned by the Greeks foolishness; and that its precepts would be condemned as unreasonable severities, because they were contrary to the maxims and practices of the world, ver. 4. Who does not see, that if the Christian preachers had been impostors, they never would have framed a gospel, or scheme of religion, of this kind!—And as the Christian preachers used no guile in framing their exhortation, or gospel, so they used none of the base arts practised by impostors for procuring credit to it. They never accused any person with fawning flattering speeches to win his affections, (Eph. ii. 1-3.) neither did they make hypochristical pretensions to extraordinary piety, 'as a cloak to cover covetousness,' (2 Cor. 2. 14.) nor to cover covetousness of their understanding and of the purity of their heart. Wherefore, no reasonable person can suspect, that they were influenced, either through weakness or vice, to receive a scheme of error, held out to them by their Master, without any evidence to support it. To be more the converse of this, we need only compare with them the first discourses of such enthusiasts and impostors as have deluded the world; whose credulity may easily be traced, in the weakness of their understandings, and in the viciousness of their lives. Upon the whole, as the apostle informs us, the gospel is distinguished from enthusiasm and impostors in general by the qualities above mentioned; so, by the same qualities, they were distinguished from the Greek philosophers in particular; who, though they were free from enthusiasm, and spoke admirably concerning the moral virtues, yet followed the most absolute courses in private; and in teaching had no regard to any thing but to the hire which they received for their instructions.

The apostle and his assistants having, in this and the preceding chapter, proved the divine original of the gospel, by the miracles which they wrought in the presence of the Thessalonians; by the miraculous gifts which they conferred on them who believed; by the example of all false teachers, 2 Pet. ii. 3.—But so far were the ministers of the gospel from behaving among their disciples at Thessalonica in an impious insolent manner, that they 'were well employed to govern themselves at their expense, after the example of all false teachers;' 2 Pet. ii. 3. And with respect to maintenance, they had also a right to be maintained by those to whom they preached; and on that score, if they had lived honestly, they might have established themselves at their expense, after the example of all false teachers, 2 Pet. ii. 3. But far more were the ministers of the gospel from behaving among their disciples at Thessalonica in an impious insolent manner, than they did, when they were entertained with the table of their host. 2 Pet. ii. 3. And in fact they hazarded, by preaching it to them, and all this from no motive, but because the Thessalonians were become dear to them, on account of their love of truth, ver. 8. And with respect to maintenance, they put the Thessalonians in mind, that instead of demanding anything from them on that account, they would rather have entailed them the expense of all their labors; they did not desire from them that which they desired from their masters.—Lastly, with respect to evasive, to show that, in believing the gospel, the apostle and his associates were neither blinded by the fervor of enthusiasm, nor prejudiced by the influence of vicious inclinations, they appealed to the sober, holy, and virtuous manner of living, which they all along followed among their disciples, and especially among the Thessalonians: 'Ye are witnesses, and God also, how honestly, and justly, and unblamably, we lived among you who believe,' ver. 10. This is not the manner of life which false teachers, who are blinded by the flames of enthusiasm, or seduced by corruption of heart, follow among their disciples.—Such never fail to make themselves known by some vicious practice which cleaves to them, and which they justify by their erroneous principles. See 2 Pet. ii. 19. Jude 4.—Further, to shew that they were not blind enthusiasts, Paul and his assistants called on the Thessalonians to bear witness to the correctness with which they exhorted every one of them, 'even as a father his children;' to follow all the branches of holiness, ver. 11. And how they solemnly testified that they should walk worthy of the true God, whom they now worshipped; and suitably to the nature of that glorious dispensation into which he had called them, ver. 12. Appeals of this kind, made by the preachers of the gospel to their own disciples, concerning the manner in which they lived among them, and concerning the instructions and exhortations which they gave them, are incontestable proofs, both of the soundness of their understanding and of the purity of their heart. Whereupon, no reasonable person can suspect, that they were influenced, either through weakness or vice, to receive a scheme of error, held out to them by their Master, without any evidence to support it. To be more the converse of this, we need only compare with them the first discourses of such enthusiasts and impostors as have deluded the world; whose credulity may easily be traced, in the weakness of their understandings, and in the viciousness of their lives. Upon the whole, as the apostle informs us, the gospel is distinguished from enthusiasm and impostors in general by the qualities above mentioned; so, by the same qualities, they were distinguished from the Greek philosophers in particular; who, though they were free from enthusiasm, and spoke admirably concerning the moral virtues, yet followed the most absolute courses in private; and in teaching had no regard to any thing but to the hire which they received for their instructions.
much insisted on by the learned Greeks, for discrediting the gospel. And, because these objections were levelled against the miracles and character of the Christian preach- ers, they are introduced with great propriety after finishing the arguments drawn from these topics.

Objection 1.—The apostle, after thanking God that the behaviour of the preachers of the gospel, as well as their miracles, had induced the Thessalonians to receive their word as the word of God, proceeds to observe, that they showed the strength of their faith by becoming imitators of the churches of God in Judea; having suffered the same things from their own countrymen, as the others of the Jews, ver. 14. This manner of expressing the sufferings of the Thessalonians for the gospel, the apostle adopted, because it gave him an opportunity of answering a very plausible objection, which the philosophers raised against the gospel, from the unbeliefe of the Jews in Judea. Said they, the Christian preachers build the gospel upon the Jewish revelation; and tell us, that their master gave himself out in Judea, as the great personage foretold by the Jewish prophets; and that in confirmation of his pretensions he wrought many miracles in different parts of the country. But the rejection of the gospel by suffering the Jews, their putting Jesus to death, and their persecuting his disciples, are strong presumptions, or rather clear proofs, that the gospel is inconsistent with the Jewish revelation; and that the Jews did not believe the miracles which Jesus pretended to perform, but considered him as an impostor, and his miracles as feats of magic. This objection, it is true, the apostle has not stated; but, seeing what follows is a direct answer to it, and comes immediately after the Thessalonians are said to have suffered like things from their own countrymen, as the churches of God in Judea had suffered from the Jews, we cannot avoid supposing, that when he says of the Jews, ‘Who have both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have greatly persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men,’ &c. he intended to remove any suspicion that might arise to the prejudice of the gospel, from the unbelief of the Jews, their crucifying the Lord Jesus, and their persecuting his apostles. For it is the same as if he had said, The Jews indeed have killed the Lord Jesus; but they have also killed their own prophets, notwithstanding they wrought miracles among them, and were universally acknowledged to be true prophets. The same persons have persecuted us, the apostles of Jesus, in the persuasion that they please God. ‘But they do not please God;’ for in this, as in their whole conduct, ‘they are enemies to mankind,’ ver. 15.—and in a little time God will shew his extreme displeasure with them, for crucifying his Son, and persecuting his apostles, by destroying their nation, ver. 16.—So remarkable were the Jews in all ages for their enmity to the messengers of God, that Stephen challenged the council to shew which of the prophets their fathers had not persecuted. This being the character of the Jews, their rejection of the gospel, their killing the Lord Jesus, and their persecuting his apostles, afford not the smallest presumption, either that the gospel is inconsistent with the Jewish revelation, or that the miracles of Jesus and his apostles were false. In these things, the Jews behaved as their fathers did to the prophets who brought the former revelations from God to them; and the punishment which soon fell on them shewed, how much God was displeased with them for so doing.

Objection 2.—The second objection was levelled against Paul and Silas in particular; being founded on their behaviour during the tumult at Thessalonica. These men, said the philosophers, though the chief preachers of the new doctrine, did not appear with Jason and the brethren before the magistrates, either to defend it, or to suffer for it. What could this be owing to, but to their consciousness that the whole was a fraud; or, to their timidity! either of which was irreconcilable in missionaries from God, who boasted in their sufferings as adding weight to their testimony concerning their Master. Something of this sort must have been said against Paul and Silas; otherwise their behaviour, which was advised by the Thessalonians themselves, Acts xvii. 10, needed no apology, at least to the Thessalonians; and far less so earnest an apology as that which the apostle has offered in this chapter, where he assures the brethren, that when he fled to Berea, he intended to be absent ‘during the time of an hour,’ or for a few days only, till the rage of the Jews should subside; and that accordingly, while in Berea, ‘he had endeavoured with great desire to see them,’ ver. 17, ’and would have come to them once again, but Satan hindered him,’ by bringing the Jews from Thessalonica to Berea, where they stirred up the people against him, and obliged him to flee to Athens, ver. 18.—Yet on neither of these occasions did he flee from a consciousness of fraud, or from the fear of death; but from his wishing to have an opportunity of perfecting the faith of the Thessalonians, and of converting a greater number of the Gentiles. For he considered them, and the rest of his Gentile converts, as his hope, and joy, and crown of glorying at the day of judgment, ver. 19.—and to convince them that he really believed his future happiness would be increased by their perseverance, and by the conversion of the Gentiles, he repeated the same assurance ver. 20.

Second Argument in Proof of the Divine Original of the Gospel, taken from the Character, Behaviour, and Views of its first Preachers.

New Translation.

Commentary.

Ver. 1. That it was false; καθαραὶ ἐστίν. Here as signifies false; but the word is used in that sense 1 Cor. xi. 11. If Christ hath not because of his suffering, and false speech, the proffer Jeremiah, speaking of false, says, Jer. vii. 6, ‘Let me not use myself with false speeches.’ The prophet Jeremiah, speaking of false, says, Jer. vii. 6, ‘Let me not use myself with false speeches.’ See Ezek. v. 9. Properly: ‘suffering an empty person or thing: consequently, a thing descriptive of truth. The apostle meaning is, that his entrance among the Thessalonians was not the entrance of a deceiver, who, with a view to draw money from his hearers, or to acquire power, or to live in pleasure among them, told them stories which he himself knew to be false. To this interpretation the reason assigns. In the following verse agrees: his sufferings for the gospel being the evidence proof: but who said of his not having preached in vain to the Thessalonians, his sufferings were no proof. Beza, if the apostle had meant to say, that his entrance were not in vain, the expression would have been, γεγονότα γὰρ τὸ φθινόν με ἐπιβεβαίως. The interpretation which mountain gives of this passage is: ‘Non falsi, non mendaci, non ingeniorum morte praebentes.’ Ver. 2.—Shamefully handled; ἐφόδιασεν. Shaming, with rods was a punishment so ignominious, that the Roman law forbade it to be inflicted on any Roman citizen.
3 (Tit. 3:1-7) Besides, our exhortation was not from error, nor from impurity, nor to gain, but was as from God, fitted to the preaching of the gospel, even as we behoved the gospel, which is the power of God and the wisdom of God.

4 But as we were approved of God to be entrusted with the gospel, as we speak, not as pleasing men, but God, who trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time came we with flattering speech, as ye know, neither with a cloak of covetousness, but as true witnesses of God, were we called to the gospel of God.

6 Neither sought we from men (τὸν ἐπιστήμην) honour, neither from you, nor from others, though we could have used authority as Christ's messengers.

7 But we were gentle among you: Even as a nurse cherisheth her own children;

8 So, taking affectionate care of you, we were well pleased to impart to you, not only the gospel of God, but also our own lives, because ye were become dear to us.

9 (Tit. 3:1-7) Besides ye remember, brethren, our labour and toil; for night and day we wrought, in order not to overload any of you, when we preached to you the gospel of God.

10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holly, and righteously, and unblamably, we lived with you who believe.
every one of you, as a father his own children," exhorting and comforting you.

12. And testifying, that we should walk worthy of God, whom hath called you into his own kingdom and glory.

On these accounts also we give thanks to God without ceasing, that (1 Thessalonians 1:2-3) when ye received the word of God, as from us, ye embraced not the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God, which also worketh effectually in you who believe.

Answer to the Objection against the Truth of the Christian Miracles, taken from the Unbelief of the Jews in Judea, and their persecuting Jesus and his Disciples.

14. For ye, brethren, became imitators of the churches of God which are in Judea in Christ Jesus, because ye also have suffered like things from your own countrymen, even as they have from the Jews,

15. Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us, and do not please God, and are contrary to all men;

16. Hindering us (1 Thessalonians 5:5) to preach to the Gentiles that they may be saved; so that they fill up the measure of their iniquities always; but the wrath of God is coming upon them at length.

17. (1 Thessalonians 4:14) Wherefore, brethren, being scattered, while he was preached in Corinth, recorded to us, that in preaching the gospel, Paul had no view, but to promote the glory of God, and the salvation of men.

Ver. 14. Because ye also have suffered like things from your own countrymen, even as they have from the Jews.

Ver. 15. Which both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us, and do not please God, and are contrary to all men.

Ver. 16. Hinder us to preach to the Gentiles that they may be saved; so that, instead of pleasing God, the Jews are filling up the measure of their iniquities always; but the wrath of God is coming upon them at length.

Ver. 17. Wherefore, brethren, being scattered, while he was preached in Corinth, recorded to us.
I. THESSALONIANS

Ver. 17.—1. Being separated from you.—This is commonly applied to parents who are deprived of their children; in which sense Chamber says it is used by Euripides.
2. During the time of an hour.—2 Cor. vii. 5. God is 5. Because likewise used the same sense; hence moments, etc., more vast, etc., Victoria lists. The apostle meant, that when he left Thessalonica to Berea, he proposed to be absent only a few days, till the rage of the Jews was abated; after which he intended to return. As he himself tells them, he was more earnestly, etc., on that account, endeavored to return, and actually made two attempts for that purpose. But the coming of the Jews from Thessalonica, to stir up the people in Berea against them, frustrated his design, and obliged him to leave Macedonia.
3. The Thessalonians.—This is the only instance wherein 2 Cor. xi. 15, is used affirmatively; for, in the usual signification, it would turn the verse into an absurdity, by making a reason for what was before, and at the same time the repetition of the same sentiment. Whereas, translated affirmatively, though it is a repetition, it is added with great elegance, to enforce the answer to the question in ver. 15. The manner in which the apostle speaks of the Thessalonians in this passage, shows that he expected to know his converts as the day of judgment. Here, we may hope to know our relations and friends then. And as there is no reason to think, that in the future life we shall lose those natural and social affections which constitute so great a part of our present enjoyment, may we not expect that these affections, purified from every thing animal and terrestrial, will be a source of our happiness, that here likewise? It must be remembered, however, that in the other world we shall have one another, and so much on account of the relation and friendship which formerly subsisted between us, as on account of the knowledge and virtue which we possessed. For among rational beings, whose affections will all be united to the high state of moral and intellectual perfection to which they shall be raised, the moral affections and warmest friendships will be those which are founded on excellence of character. What a powerful consideration this, to excite us to cultivate in our relations and friends the noble and lasting qualities of knowledge and virtue, which will prove such an essential source of happiness to them, and to us, through the endless ages of eternity!

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Subjects contained in this Chapter.

Objection 3.—By the reasoning in the beginning of this chapter it appears, that the learned Greeks took occasion, from the sufferings of the Christian preachers, to raise a third and very plausible objection against the miracles which they wrought in confirmation of the gospel. Said the philosophers, If these men really possess miraculous powers, why do they flee from their enemies, and not rather work miracles for their own preservation; which at the same time would convince the most obstinate that they are sent of God! The behaviour of these pretended missionaries from God, who, instead of restraining their enemies by their miraculous power, fly from them in the utmost flattery, is a clear proof that their miracles are nothing but impostures on the senses of mankind. The reader will recollect, that this very argument was used for discrediting our Lord's miracles, Matt. xxiv. 22. Also the chief priests, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others, himself he cannot save. If he be the king of Israel, let him come down from the cross, and we will believe him. This objection was much insisted on by the philosophers, some of the Thessalonian brethren who came to Berea informed Timothy thereof, who, when he followed the apostle to Athens, no doubt related the matter to him. Now, this being a natural objection, the apostle was greatly distressed that he had it not in his power to return to Thessalonica, to shew the falsity of it. Wherefore, when he could no longer bear his anxiety, he determined to remain at Athens alone, ver. 1. And sent Timothy to establish the brethren, and to exhort them concerning their faith; ver. 2.—by telling them, that no man should be moved by these afflictions;—he meant the afflictions which had befal, him, in particular flight from Thessalonica and Berea, as is plain from what follows:—for yourselves know that we were appointed to this:—we apostles were appointed to suffer, and were not allowed to deliver ourselves from persecution by the grace. ver. 3.—Thus the Thessalonians knew. For Paul had told them, when Christ made him an apostle, he appointed him to suffer for his name; that all men might have a clear proof of his being himself fully persuaded of the things which he preached. The power of miracles, therefore, was bestowed upon the apostles, that they might deliver themselves from persecution. They were to prove the truth of the gospel by their sufferings, as well as by their miracles. Besides, Paul having foretold the very persecution which befell him in Thessalonica, his sudden flight could not be imputed to fear occasioned by any unforeseen evil, but to Christ's injunction to his apostles, when persecuted in one city to flee into another. Upon the whole, the apostle's fleeing from Thessalonica and Berea, was no proof of the falsehood of his miracles, as his enemies contended; neither was it inconsistent with his character as a missionary from God, ver. 4.

Objection 4. — A fourth objection was levelled by the philosophers against Paul in particular. They affirmed, that notwithstanding all his faith and speeches to the Thessalonians, he did not really love them. For he had left them to bear the persecution by themselves, without giving them any assistance, either by his exhortations or his example. And from this they inferred, that he was an hypocrite, who had deceived them with professions of a love which had no place in his heart. In answer, the apostle told the Thessalonians, that they might know how tenderly he loved them, from the following circumstances: — That, not knowing what impression the arguments of the sophists might make upon them, his anxiety for their perseverance in the faith was extreme; and that he sent Timothy to them from Athens, for this purpose also, that he might know their faith, ver. 5. Further, he told them, that being informed by Timothy of their firm adherence to the gospel, and of their entertaining a most affectionate remembrance of him, his spiritual father, at all times; and that they as earnestly desired to see him, as he to see them, ver. 6. — The good news had given him the greatest consolation in all his afflictions, ver. 7. — Because their standing firm in the Lord, was life to him, ver. 8. — Wherefore he could not be enough thankful to God, for all the joy which he felt on account of their steadfastness, ver. 9. — And having the greatest concern for their welfare, his daily prayer to God was, that he might be allowed to visit them, in order to supply the deficiencies of their faith, by giving them more complete views, both of the doctrine of the gospel, ver. 10. — Withal he prayed, 'that God and Christ would remove every obstacle,' which might hinder his prosperous journey to them, ver. 11. — And still farther to convince them how tenderly he loved them, he sent Timothy in particular, to make them 'abound as much in love to one another, and to all men, as he abounded in love towards them,' ver. 12. — That their hearts might be established unblemished in his presence, and as found so at the coming of Christ to judgment, ver. 13. — Sentiments and affections of this kind never were found in the breast of any impostor. And therefore the apostle's tender feelings thus warmly expressed, the sincerity of which the Thessalonians could not call in question, when they considered his known veracity, as well as all the other circumstances mentioned in this earnest apology, might well convince them, that the enemies whereby the enemies of the gospel endeavoured to discredit him as a missionary from God, were without foundation.

Answer to the Objection urged against the Preachers of the Gospel, for not delivering themselves from persecution by their miraculous powers.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—1 Wherefore, no longer (vex- tern) bearing our anxiety; we were well pleased to be left at Athens alone,2

2 And sent Timothy our brother, and a minister of God, and our fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ, to establish you, and to exhort you concerning your faith;
3 That no one should be moved by these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto. ( Acts ix. 16.)

4 For even when we were with you, we foretold you that we were to be afflicted, as also happened, (ex. 209.) as ye know.

VER. 1.—1. No longer bearing our anxiety.] — Even were literally signifies bearing or carrying, but never forbearance; the anxiety affixed to it by our translators. I have supplied the word anxiety, because the following verse it appears, that the apostle was at this time in great distress, lest the Thessalonians should have been moved from the faith of the gospel, by the false arguments of the unbelievers.

2. Athens alone.] — Though Timothy and Silas were ordered to follow the apostle from Berea to Athens, Acts xviii. 13. only Timothy came to him there; Acts xviii. 1. It is plain, therefore, that when Timothy left Athens, the apostle remained in that city alone; which was a very trying situation, as he expected great opposition from the Athenian philosophers.

3. Our fellow-labourer in the gospel.] — Acts xviii. 11. Timothy did not go to Athens with Paul and Silas, because of Paul's departure. He had probably been with the apostle at Thessalonica, and had assisted him in converting the Thessalonians; which is implied in the expression, our fellow-labourer in the gospel.

4. As also happened.] — That is, as also happened, which denotes the assurance which the apostle took, either from joy or fear. — The Thessalonians were not, on account of the afflictions which had befal len the apostle, to be moved from the profession of the gospel, through fear of his being an impostor, because he had not restrained his enemies by his miraculous power, but had fled first to Berea, and then to Athens.

CHAP. III.—1 In Athens Timothy informed me, that the unbelievers urged my fleeing from Thessalonica as a proof of my being destitute of miraculous powers; and the argument being specious, I was afraid it might make an impression on you. Wherefore, no longer bearing my anxiety on that account, I was well pleased to be left in Athens, without any assistant.

2. And sent Timothy, our brother, who has devoted himself to serve God, and who was our fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ among you, to establish you in the profession of the gospel, and to exhort you concerning the foundation of your faith.

3. Of one of the topics I desired him to insist on was, that none of you should be moved by those afflictions which befell us. For yourselves know, that when Christ made me his apostle, I was appointed to suffer persecution, to shew my persuasion of the things which I preached.

4. For even when we were with you, we foretold you that we were to be afflicted in your city; as also happened, as ye know. And we fled, because Christ commanded us, when persecuted in one city, to flee into another. So that we are not allowed to exercise our miraculous powers for saving ourselves from persecution.
I. THESALONIANS.

5 For this reason also, no longer bearing my anxiousness, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter! may have tempted you, and our labour have become in vain.

6 But now when Timothy came to us from you, and gave us the good news of your faith and love, and that ye have good remembrance of us at all times; ardently desiring to see us, even as we also to see you:

7 By this, brethren, we were comforted3 concerning you, in all our affliction and necessity, even by your faith.

8 (Ous) For now we live,2 (1 Thess. 1:10) when you were in our affliction and distress.

9 (Teg. 98.) But what thanksgiving can we return to God concerning you, for all the joy with which we rejoice through you in the presence of our God?

10 Night and day we most exceedingly request to see your face, and to supply the deficiencies of your faith.

11 Now may God himself, even our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ,2 make straight our way into you.

12 And may the Lord fill you, and make you overflow with love to one another, and to all, even as we also to you;

13 That he may establish your hearts, unblamable in holiness before God,2 even our very very sometimes signifies to reduce that which is out of joint; and having reduced it, to knit and strengthen it. Sometimes also it signifies to make a thing perfect. Heb. xiii, 21, in which latter sense it seems to be used in this passage. For the apostle wished to give the Thessalonians more complete views, both of the doctrines and evidences of the gospel, and to impart to them spiritual gifts in greater plenty. Rom. i. 11.

Ver. 5. And that ye have good remembrance of us at all times.—The apostle, no doubt, means their remembering him with respect, as a teacher sent from God; and with gratitude, since he had given them the knowledge of the true God, and of eternal life. These are the best foundations of a respectful, grateful remembrance; for, as Dr. Chandler observes, the persons who are converted by the labours of the faithful ministers of Christ, owe it to their own power, and not to the labours of others; which is an obligation that will not be soon or easily forgotten. It were therefore to be wished, that such motives of affection, as the office and services of the ministers of the gospel, were more constantly and generally recollected by their hearers.

Ver. 6. Make straight our way into you.—This being the first sort of the inactive passive, there is no occasion to change it into active perfect, as some critics propose.

8. Concerning you, in all our affliction and necessity.—Always signifies a necessity or pressure of any kind, but especially that which is occasioned by poverty. This kind of necessity the apostle endured now in Corinth, as in other places, particularly in Thessalonica, where he wrought with his hands for his own maintenance, and even for the maintenance of his assistants, Acts xvi. 34. The afflictions of which he here speaks, were the persecutions which, in a lesser or greater degree, he suffered from the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles in every place where he preached the gospel. The apostle's generosity, in bearing all manner of afflictions and straits for the advantage of others with patience, and in rejoicing in them, is truly noble, and worthy of the highest admiration.

Ver. 7. And now we know the Lord.—The apostle would not have thought life worth the having, if his disciples had not persevered in the faith. But having heard of their steadfastness, all sense of his misery was gone, and joy had taken full possession of his soul; and really lived. In like manner, faithful ministers of the gospel, after the apostle's example, have no higher joy, than when they find their wishes, their prayers, and their labours, effectual for the conversion of their people, and for their establishment in truth and virtue.

Ver. 8. All the joy—That is, for the exceeding great joy. Thus James ii. 1. 'Count it all joy; count it the greatest joy.' The apostle's joy arose from the conversion of the Thessalonians, and next from their steady perseverance in the faith and proposition of the gospel, amidst great temptation and persecution.

2. In the presence of our God.—Joy in the presence of God, signifies not a carnal or worldly joy, but a spiritual joy, such as God approves.

Ver. 9. To supply the deficiencies of your faith.—Spare.
I. THESSALONIANS.

FATHER, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his holy angels,3 who, with joy, will witness your acceptance and glorious reward.

Acts, when applied to sinful men; but through the grace of God, and the mediation of Jesus Christ, the faithful of the sincere will be saved, and their sins forgiven. In short, they shall be treated by God, before whom they are to appear after the judgment, as if they had been always immutable. They shall receive the reward due to a perfect righteousness.

At the coming of Jesus Christ with all his holy angels,4 as we are told, Matt. xxv. 27, 31, 32. These angels will be the help and support of the elect, on the day of their perfection, Deut. xxviii. 2. Zech. v. 9. They are likewise called his holy angels, Jude, ver. 14. It is of them, and not of the righteous, that the apostle here speaks; for the righteous will not appear till they are raised from the dead, so cannot come with Christ from heaven.

On that awful day, all the righteous after their resurrection, shall stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. The wicked likewise shall be there accommodated. And even the evil angels, who are now reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the ages, being brought thither, shall be sentenced to punishment. The design of Christ in coming to judgment, is to complete the kind design of his first appearance. Then he came to put mankind in the way of salvation; now he will appear to destroy salvation on the heirs thereof, by a solemn sentence of punishment.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

To make all mankind sensible how worthy of God the Christian religion is, St. Paul and his assistants, in this chapter, appeal to the holy nature of the precepts of the gospel, which they delivered to the Thessalonians from the very first. In reckoning this appeal a third argument in proof of the divine original of the gospel, I think I am not mistaken. Because, if the apostle's intention therein had only been to animate the Thessalonians to a conversation worthy of their Christian profession, there was no occasion for his insisting so earnestly, and so repeatedly, on his having formerly delivered all these precepts to them; but his enjoining them now, in the name of God and of Christ, would have been sufficient.

To this account of the apostle's design in calling the attention of the Thessalonians to the precepts of the gospel, I cannot think it any objection, that he has not, in so many words, declared it to be his design. In the essay on his style and manner of writing, we have taken notice, that it was not his custom formally to declare the purpose for which his arguments are introduced. That circumstance leaves his readers to gather from the nature of the things which he writes. In the present case, therefore, seeing he appealed to the commandments which he had given them in the name of the Lord Jesus, the author of the gospel, after putting them in mind of the miracles which he had wrought in their presence, and of his own sincerity and disinterestedness in preaching the gospel, can it be thought that he made such an appeal in such a discourse, with any other view but to make all who should read this letter sensible that the gospel, being worthy of God, is truly of divine origin?

Let us now see how the apostle states this argument.

First of all, he besought and exhorted the Thessalonians, by the Lord Jesus, to abound in that holy manner of living, which he and his assistants had formerly assured them was the way to please God, ver. 1. Next, he told them, they knew what commandments he had given them by order of the Lord Jesus, ver. 2. Then repeated some of these commandments, whereby it appears, that they were directed chiefly against those abominable impurities in which the heathens universally lived, and which many of them practised as worship acceptable to their idol gods. In particular, he had represented to them, that God would not suffer their sanctification, and their abstaining from all the kinds of abominations, ver. 3. By declaring this to be the divine will, the apostle made the Thessalonians sensible from the beginning, that the will of the true God was a very different will from that of the gods whom they formerly served, who willed their votaries to worship them with the grossest acts of uncleanness and intemperance. He told them likewise, that God willed them to use their bodies in an holy and honourable manner, ver. 4. — not as a passive instrument of lust, after the manner of the Gentiles, who, being ignorant of God, committed these base actions in honour of their false deities, to whom they ascribed the most immoral characters, ver. 5. — Also, it was the will of God that no man should injure his brother in respect of chastity, because the Lord Jesus will punish men for all such wicked actions. This the apostle affirmed he had formerly told and fully testified to them, ver. 6. Besides, they were to consider, that God had not called them to be his votaries, for the purpose of gratifying any impure lust, as the heathen gods were supposed to have called their votaries, but to a continued life of purity, ver. 7. And therefore he assured them, that whosoever despised his precepts concerning purity, 'despaired not men only, but God, who had given him his Holy Spirit,' and had inspired him to deliver these precepts in his name, ver. 8. — Failing in his appeal to the commandments which he had delivered to the Thessalonians from the beginning with this solemn declaration, the apostle had directly affirmed, that all the precepts of the gospel are the precepts of God, and every way worthy of him. And by placing them in this light, he holds them up to the view of all mankind as a clear proof of the divine original of the gospel; or, as the apostle himself expresses it, chap. ii. 13. as a proof that the gospel is the 'word, not of men, but of God,' which it would not be, if their precepts were not precepts of holiness.

To complete this argument, St. Paul shews the efficacy of the doctrines and precepts of the gospel to make men holy, by taking notice that the Thessalonians, since their conversion, were become remarkable for their love to the brethren, ver. 9. — not in their own city only, but 'through all the province of Macedonia.' And because, by such a conduct, they greatly strengthened the evidences of the gospel, he 'exhorted them to abound still more,' that excellent virtue, ver. 10. — and earnestly to study to be quiet, and to mind their own affairs, and to labour diligently, 'in some honest occupation,' 'as he had formerly commanded them,' ver. 11. — because thus they would be esteemed even by the heathens, and have wherewith to supply their own wants, without being obliged to any person, ver. 12. The lewdness, and ill-nature, and officious meddling in other people's affairs, which the apostle tells the Thessalonians he had condemned at his first coming among them, and had forbidden under the most tremendous penalties, were vices to which the Greeks in general were excessively addicted; and therefore, in addressing them, it is evident he was by no means desirous of accommodating the gospel to the humours of men.

The direct and open appeals made, in this epistle, to the Thessalonians, and to all in whose hearing it was to be read, concerning the sanctity of the precepts which the apostle delivered in public and in private, whether at his first coming among them, or when he was better acquainted with them, are clear proofs that the preachers of the

For, if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again; so also, them who sleep (he) in him (ch. i. 1. note 2) will God bring with him.

For, if we believe that Jesus was put to death for calling himself the Son of God, and rose again from the dead, to demonstrate the truth of their assertions; so also we must believe, that they who have died in subjection to Jesus, will God at the last day bring with him into heaven.

Besides, to show you in what manner the righteous are to be brought into heaven with Christ, this I affirm to you, by the command of the Lord, that the dead in Christ shall rise first.

For the Lord himself will descend from heaven (av) with a shout, with the voice of an archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead (or) in Christ shall rise first.

For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with a shout, with the voice of an archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first.

19 For this perishable must put on imperishable, and this mortal must put on immortality.

17 After the righteous are raised, we, the people of Christ, who are living on the earth at his coming, being changed, shall, at the same time, be caught up in clouds to meet the Lord in the air.

CHAPTER V.

The apostle, after describing the coming of Christ to raise the dead, and carry the righteous with him into heaven, does not quit the subject of Christ's return; but proceeds in this chapter to foretell the terror which his appearing will occasion to the wicked, and the punishment which he will inflict on them. This circumstance merits the reader's attention, because it proves, that, in describing Christ's return to the earth, the apostle had some farther view besides that of comforting the Thessalonians under the death of their relations. For if this had been his only purpose, nothing more was necessary but to tell them, 'If they believe Jesus died and rose again, so also them who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.' Wherefore, since in the preceding chapter he not only mentions the resurrection and departure of the righteous into heaven, but enters into a particular description of the circumstances of Christ's coming to judgment, by which his power and greatness, as the Son of God and Judge of the world, will be manifested; also, since in this chapter he goes on to foretell the terror which Christ's return will occasion to the wicked, and the punishment which he will inflict on them; it seems to me plain, that his chief design in all this was to shew, that by committing the judgment of the world to Christ, the Father hath confirmed his Son's gospel, and hath authorized him to punish all who do not obey it; as the apostle also expressly affirms, 2 Thess. i. 6, 7.

To the authority, however, of Christ as Judge, and to the argument for the divine original of the gospel founded therein, it may be objected, that we have no evidence thereof excepting the apostle's prophecy, and Christ's own prediction, that he will return as Judge. I therefore reply, that although, in ordinary cases, a prophecy proves nothing till it be accomplished, yet we have complete evidence, in Christ's resurrection from the dead, that the prophecies concerning his return to judge the world will in due time be accomplished. For, seeing the chief priests and elders of the Jews put him to death as a deceiver, because he called himself 'the Christ, the Son of the blessed God,' and because he affirmed, that 'they should see him sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds in heaven;' namely, to raise the dead and judge the world; his resurrection from the dead is certainly a demonstration from God, that he is his Son; that he is now on the right hand of power, and that he will come in the clouds of heaven to judge mankind. Hence, the first preachers of the gospel always appealed to Christ's resurrection, as the proof of his return to judgment. For example, Paul, in his oration to the learned Athenians, Acts xvii. 31. 'He will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath appointed; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.'—3 Cor. iv. 14. Knowing, that he who raised up Jesus from the dead, will raise us up also by Jesus, and will present us with him.—And in this epistle, 1 Thess. i. 10. 'And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, who delivers us from the wrath which is to come.' Hence also, in the proof of the divine original of the gospel under our consideration, the apostle very properly connects Christ's return with his resurrection from the dead; and produces the two events thus connected as his fourth argument.—1 Thess. iv. 14. 'For if we believe that Jesus died, for calling himself the Son of God and Judge of the world, and you again, to prove that these characters really belong to him; even so must we also believe, that they who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him' from the dead into heaven. The truth is, we cannot believe the resurrection of Jesus, without believing that he is the Son of God, and the Judge of the world; and if we believe that he is the Son of God and the Judge of the world, we must believe that his gospel is a revelation from God.

Further, the argument taken from Christ's power and dignity as Judge, is introduced in this proof of the divine original of the gospel with peculiar propriety; because it effectually removed those prejudices which were entertained, from the very beginning, against Christ and his gospel, on account of his having been publicly put to death, as a deceiver, by the chief priests. For his crucifixion, though a stumbling-block to the Jews, was necessary to his resurrection, whereby his dignity as the Son of God, and his power as Judge of the world, have been established beyond contradiction. Since then the return of Christ to judgment is indubitable, the righteous may rejoice in the prospect; firmly persuaded, that they shall obtain the resurrection to eternal life promised them in the gospel. On the other hand, the wicked may tremble, when they think of the circumstances of Christ's advent foretold by his apostle, and of that terrible punishment which he will then inflict upon them, and from which none of them shall escape. Nay, insinuates themselves, although they may believe nothing at all of the matter, should not make light of the warning which the gospel revelation hath given them of Christ's return; because the bare possibility of its happening ought to fill them with terror.

His description of the punishment of the wicked the apostle introduces with observing, that there was no need for his writing any thing to the Thessalonians, concerning the time of Christ's coming to judge the world, ver. 1.—Because, from what he had formerly told them, they knew perfectly that the time of it is uncertain, not having been revealed to any person; and that it will be sudden and unexpected, ver. 2.—and will occasion great terror and astonishment to the wicked, when he comes to punish them. And their terror will be exceedingly increased by this, that, about the time of Christ's coming, 'they will promise to themselves peace and safety' for a great length of years. But while in this state of security, ‘sudden destruction shall come upon them, and none of them shall escape,’ ver. 3. —This is all the apostle thought fit to write at present concerning the punishment of the wicked. Nevertheless, as he hath declared, chap. iv. 17., that the righteous are to be caught up from the earth, in clouds, to join the Lord in the air, that they may be for ever with him, it follows, that the wicked, being left on the earth, shall be burnt in the conflagration which the apostle Peter assures us will consume the earth after the judgment is ended, 2 Pet. iii. 10–12. This being the unavoidable lot of the wicked, had not St. Paul good reason to call their punishment destruction, and to declare that none of them shall escape!

Having set forth the punishment to be inflicted on the wicked at the coming of Christ, under the idea of destruction, the apostle told the Thessalonians, that being fully instructed concerning the design of Christ’s coming, that event will not be terrible to them, ver. 4, 5. —Yet, they were not to be slothfully and securely like the wicked, but they were to watch continually, ver. 6, 7.—and, as persons living in the midst of enemies, they were always to have on the Christian armour, ver. 8.—because God had not appointed them to wrath, or destruction with the wicked in the general conflagration, but to salvation through Jesus Christ, ver. 9.—who died for this end, that whether they were of the number of the dead or of the living at his coming, they may live in endless happiness with him, ver. 10.—Lastly, he desired

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAPTER V. —1 (a) However, concerning the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write to you;

2 For yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.

3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as the pains of child-bearing on her who is with child; and they shall not escape.

Ver. 1. —1 However, concerning the times and the seasons, ye know, brethren, ye have no need that I write to you; —in them when they find themselves overtaken by the judgment, than to compare it to the pains of child-bearing. This description is the more affecting, that the verb, to suffer, is used, and is the only word in all the gospels, so cometh; sudden destruction cometh; representing the certainty and instantaneousness of its coming.

2. And they shall not escape. —The persons who shall not escape the terrible destruction of that day, are they who know not God, and who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. And the destruction which cometh upon them, is everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, 2 Thess. i. 8, 9.

Though the apostle Paul hath often spoken of Christ’s return from heaven, and of the resurrection of the dead, the judgment of the world, and the state of the righteous and of the wicked after the judgment, this is the only passage in which he hath professedly given an account of these great events. Yet, as he hath not introduced all the particulars relating to them, which he himself, his Master, and the other apostles have occasionally mentioned, it will not be unprofitable if in this place, taking I Thess. iv. 14. and v. 1, 2, 3, 4 as the groundwork of the description, I shall insert in their order, the further discoveries concerning the judgment of the world, and the final issues of things, which are made to us in other parts of the scripture.

Before the coming of Christ to put an end to the world, all those events included in the mystery of God which he hath declared to his servants the prophets, must be finished, Rev. x. 7. But as many of these events have not as yet taken place, the coming of Christ may still be at a great distance. Accordingly, the apostle Peter hath forewarned, 2 Pet. iii. 4, that in the last days there will be scoffers, who, because his coming is delayed for a long time, will ridicule the promise of his coming, and affirm, that the world never shall have an end. For the same reason also, as Paul informs us, in these three men, immediately before the coming of Christ, will promise to one another peace and safety, for a great length of years. While the last generation of the wicked are thus living in a state of absolute security, the Lord himself will descend from heaven in their unspeakable astonishment. And their confusion will be augmented by the visible majesty in which he shall appear. For he will come ‘in his own glory,’ Luke xi. 26. and ‘in the glory of 4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, (1 Thess. 5, 1971) so that day should, like a thief, come on you, 1

5 All ye are sons of light, and sons of day: we are not sons of night, neither of darkness. 2

6 Therefore, let us not sleep, even as the others; but let us watch, and be sober.

7 For they who sleep, sleep in the night, and they who get drunk, 1 are drunken in the night.

8 But we being sons of day, let us be sober, putting on the breast-plate 1 of faith and love, and for an helmet 2 the hope of salvation.

4:1 1 Thess. 5:2 2 Thess. 3:5

1. THESALONIANS.

4:1 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness; ye are not in a state of ignorance and security, like the heathen, as the day of Christ should, like a thief in the night, come on you unexpectedly, and fill you with terror.

5:1 All ye who believe are enlightened persons, and persons for whose benefit the day of judgment is appointed. We are not persons living in the night of heathenish ignorance, nor other persons for whom the darkness of eternal death is designed.

6:1 Therefore, as persons enlightened, let us not stupefy ourselves with sensuality, even as the heathens; but let us keep ourselves awake, and preserve the right use of reason by habitual temperance.

7:1 For they who sleep, sleep in the night, and they who get drunk, do it in the night; that is, the stupidity and sensuality in which the heathens live, are suitable to the darkness of ignorance in which they live.

8:1 But we being persons for whom the day of judgment is appointed, let us be sober; and being surrounded with enemies, let us wear the breast-plate of faith and love as a defence to our hearts, the seat of the passions, and for an helmet the hope of salvation, which will defend our head, the seat of reason. See Rom. xiii. 12.

And as this fire is said to be prepared for the devil and his angels, it is reasonable to think that they also shall be punished in the configuration. But while we believe that he who will endure to be conformed to Christ through suffering will be saved, we may think that his condescending wisdom will not order the conflagration of their wrath to be combustible, whose souls may survive this second death of the body, just as it is survived the first, Matt. xvi. 27. Yet both the one and the other will be saved, and will, I think, be happiness, and beauty to the world, and to the church, who are without the law. Therefore, let us live in the spirit of the world, and in the spirit of the church, and the church will be saved, and the world will be saved.

6:1 Now the things which we have to say of the heathens are very true. The heathens are not only corrupt in their outward manners, but also in their inward thoughts. And as they live in darkness, they also reason in darkness, and have no knowledge. They do not understand the things which are of God, and can understand nothing of the things which are of Christ. For they are not able to understand the Apostle's words, 1 Cor. xii. 2. And as they cannot understand the things which are of God, so they cannot understand the things which are of Christ. For they are not able to understand the Apostle's words, 1 Cor. xii. 2.

9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but (as apostles) to the acquisition of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, 10 Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we may live together with him.

chap. iv. 17.

11 Wherefore, comfort one another, and edify

(see ver. 6, literally, one the other) each the other, even as also ye do.

13 Now, we beseech you, brethren, to know them who labour among you, and who preside over you in the Lord, and admonish you;

19 And to esteem them very highly (es) with love and good will be, of a long-suffering disposition towards all.

15 Take care that no one return evil for evil to any one, but always pursue ye what is good, both towards one another, and towards all.

and passions in a great measure depend, it must be of importance to defend the head against the intrusion of such thoughts and imaginations, as have any tendency to excite bad affections, or carnal desires. But, for that purpose, nothing is better than to have the head as filled with the glorious hope of the salvation offended to us in Christ, as with all good thoughts and imaginations whatever. This hope, therefore, is most elegantly termed the Christian's armour. The exhortation to the Thessalonians to arm themselves, teaches us, that the soul's light must not only watch but fight. See Ephes. vi. 17, note 1.

Ver. 9. God hath not appointed us to wrath. The design of God in sending his Son, was not to condemn but to save the world; they, therefore, who are appointed to wrath, are such only who wilfully and obstinately refuse to believe and obey the gospel.

Ver. 10. Wake or sleep. Become the work here used is ανεξαπατησεις, and not ανεξαπατησεσαι. Wholly thinketh the apostle is speaking of natural sleep, and not of soul's state. Beware that you are not going to sleep. But Bension hath shewn, that the two first-mentioned words are used indiscriminately, both by sacred and profane writers, for death. Further, he observes, that whoever ενοχηπαίτας signifies to be on our guard, it is not true, that if we are found asleep, that is, off our guard, we shall live with Christ. The antithesis, therefore, between verse 9, and verse 10, proves here should signify to sleep.

2. Live together with him. In the opinion of some commentators, this import, that the righteous in the state of the dead will live with Christ. But, in any opinion, this is the best explanation of their living with Christ after the resurrection.

Ver. 11. Edify each other, even as also ye do. This being the exhortation with which the apostle concluded his discourse, chap. iv. concerning Christ's carrying with him into heaven those who are alive at his coming, and those who are then raised from the dead, it shows that the expression, ver. 10. Whether we wake or sleep, means, Whether we are alive or dead. It were much to be wished, as Chandler observes, that Christians, entering into each other's true interests, would banish from their conversation that calumny, slander, folly, and filthiness, which engrosses so much of this short transitory life; and, by discoursing of things of substantial worth, endeavour to fortify each other against the wiles of the devil.

Ver. 12. Know them that labour among you, and who preside over you. This is the epistle is addressed, with respect to persons in adversity, always maintain that rational joy which the doctrines and promises of the gospel inspire.

II. PREFACE.

Sect. I.—Of the Occasion of Writing the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians.

From the matters contained in this epistle it appears, that the messenger who carried Paul's first letter to the Thessalonians, gave him, when he returned, a particular account of their affairs, (see 2 Thess. iii. 11,) and, among other things, informed him, that many of them thought the day of judgment was to happen in that age; because in his letter the apostle seems to insinuate, that he was to be living on the earth at the coming of the Lord: 1 Thess. iv. 15. 'We who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord.'—Ver. 17. 'Then we who are alive and remain, shall be caught up.'—Chap. v. 4. 'But ye are not in darkness, so as that day should, like a thief, lay hold on you.'—Ver. 6. 'Therefore, let us not sleep, even as the others; but let us watch and be sober.'—The same person also informed the apostle, that such of the Thessalonians as thought the coming of Christ and the end of the world at hand, were neglecting their secular affairs, in the persuasion that all business of that sort was inconsistent with the care of their souls: That certain false teachers among the Thessalonians pretended to have a revelation of the Spirit, importing that the day of judgment was at hand: That others affirmed they were sent by the apostle to declare the same things by word of mouth: Nay, that a forged letter had been handed about in Thessalonica, as from him, to the same purpose.—An error of this kind being exceedingly prejudicial to society, it was necessary to put a stop to it immediately; and the rather, that being imputed to Paul, it was utterly subversive of his apostolical character and inspiration. The state, therefore, of the Thessalonians was no sooner made known to the apostle, than he wrote to them this second epistle; in which, as in the former, Silas and Timothy joined him, to show that they were of the same sentiments with him concerning that momentous affair.

The foregoing account of the occasion and design of writing the second epistle to the Thessalonians, is taken from chap. ii. 1, where the apostle besought the Thessalonians, 'with relation to the coming of Christ, and their gathering together around him,' (described in his former epistle, chap. iv. 14–18,) not to give the least heed to any teacher pretending to a revelation of the Spirit, who affirmed that the day of Christ was at hand; or who brought any verbal message or letter to that purpose, as from him. The whole was a falsehood, wickedly framed. And to convince them that it was a falsehood, he assured them in the most express terms, that before the day of the Lord there will be a great apostasy in the church; that the man of sin is to be revealed; that he will oppose and exalt himself above every one who is called God, or who is an object of worship; and that he will sit, or continue a long time, in the church, as God. Then he put this question to the Thessalonians, ver. 5. 'Do ye not remember, that when I was yet with you I told you these things?' So that if they had recollected the apostle's discourses, they would easily have perceived the falsehood of the things which the deceivers pretended to inculcate as a message from him. The chief design, therefore, of this epistle was, to convince the Thessalonians that the apostle and his assistants did not entertain the opinion imputed to them, that the coming of the Lord and the day of judgment were to happen in their lifetime; and to foretell the rise and progress of the 'mystery of iniquity,' together with the coming and destruction of the 'man of sin;' that the faithful, being forewarned, might not be surprised at these events when they took place in the church.

Sect. III.—Shewing that none of the Apostles believed the Day of Judgment was to happen in their Lifetime.

Grotius, Locke, and others, have affirmed, that the apostles of Christ believed the end of the world was to happen in their time; and that they have declared this to be their belief, in various passages of their epistles. But these learned men, and all who join in that opinion, have fallen into a most pernicious error. For thereby they destroy the authority of the gospel revelation, at least so far as it is contained in the discourses and writings of the apostles; because, if they have erred in a matter of such importance, and which they affirm was revealed to them by Christ, they may have been mistaken in other matters also, where their inspiration is not more strongly ascertained by them than in this instance. In imputing this mistake to the apostles, the dared have heartily joined the learned men above mentioned, because a mistake of this sort effectually overthrows the apostles' pretensions to inspiration. It is therefore necessary to clear them from so injurious an imputation.

And, first, with respect to Paul, who was an apostle of Christ, and Silvanus, who was a prophet and chief man among the brethren, and Timothy, who was eminent for his spiritual gifts, I observe, that the epistle under our consideration affords the clearest proof that these men knew the truth concerning the coming of Christ to judge the world. For in it they expressly assured the Thessalonians, that the persons who made them believe the day of judgment was at hand, were deceiving them: That before the day of judgment there was to be a great apostasy in religion, occasioned by the man of sin, who at that time was restrained from shewing himself, but who was to be revealed in his season: That when revealed, he will sit, that is, remain a long time in the church of God, as God, and shewing himself that he is God; and that afterwards he is to be destroyed. Now, as these events could not be accomplished in the course of a few years, the persons who foretold that they were to happen before the coming of Christ, certainly did not think the day of judgment would be in their lifetime. And as for the expressions in the former epistle, which have been thought to imply that Paul believed the day of judgment at hand, we have shewed, in note 1. on I Thess. iv. 15. that they are mere rhetorical forms of expression, which ought not to have been made the foundation of a doctrine of this magnitude. Besides, St. Paul, Rom. xi. 23–36, by a long chain of reasoning having shewed, that, after the general conversion of the Gentiles, the Jews in a body are to be brought into the Christian church, can any person be so absurd as to per severe in maintaining, that this apostle believed the end of the world would happen in his own lifetime?
Sacr. IV.

PREFACE TO II. THESALONIANS.

Next, with respect to the apostle Peter, I think it plain, from the manner in which he hath spoken of the coming of Christ, that he knew it was at a great distance: 3 Pet. iii. 8. Knowing this first, that scoffers will come in the last of the days, walking after their own lusts; 4. And saying, where is the promise of his coming? For from the time the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as at the beginning of the creation. 8. But this one thing, let it not escape you, beloved, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. 9. The Lord who hath promised, doth not delay, in the manner some account delaying; Now, seeing Peter hath here foretold, that in the last age the wicked will mock at the promise of Christ’s coming, on account of its being long delayed—and from the stability and regularity of the course of nature, during so many ages, will argue that there is no probability that the world will ever come to an end—it is evident that he also knew the coming of Christ to judgment was at a very great distance, at the time he wrote that epistle.

The same may be said of James. For in the hearing of the apostles, elders, and brethren, assembled in the council of Jerusalem, he quoted passages from the Jewish prophets, to show, that all the Gentiles were, in some future period, to seek after the Lord, Acts xv. 17. But if James looked for the general conversion of the Gentiles, he certainly could not imagine the end of the world would happen in his time.

Lastly, the apostle John, in his book of the Revelation, having foretold a great variety of important events respecting the political and religious state of the world, which could not be accomplished in a few years, but required a series of ages to give them birth, there cannot be the least doubt that he likewise knew the truth concerning his master’s second coming. And therefore, to suppose that he imagined the day of judgment was to happen in his own lifetime, is a palpable mistake.

Upon the whole, seeing the apostles, and other inspired teachers of our religion, certainly knew that the coming of Christ to judgment was at a great distance, every impartial person must be sensible they have been much injured, not by the enemies of revelation alone, but by some of its friends, who, upon the strength of certain expressions, the meaning of which they evidently misunderstand, have endeavoured to persuade the world that the apostles ignorantly believed the day of judgment was at hand. These expressions may all be applied to other events, as shall be showed in the next section; and therefore they ought to be so applied, because candour requires that sense to be put on an author’s words which renders him most consistent with himself.

Sacr. IV.—Different Comings of Christ are spoken of in the New Testament.

In this Article I propose to show, that there are other comings of Christ spoken of in scripture, besides his coming to judgment; and that there are other things besides this mundane system, whose end is there foretold; and that it is of these other matters the apostles speak, when they represent the day of their master, and the end of all things, as at hand.

1. First, then, in the prophetic writings of the Jews, (2 Sam. xxii. 10-12.; Psal. xcvi. 2-5.; Isa. xxix. 1.), great exaltations of the divine power, whether for the salvation or destruction of nations, are called the coming, the appearing, the presence of God. Hence it was natural for the apostles, who were Jews, to call any signal and evident interposition of Christ, as governor of the world, for the accomplishment of his purposes, his coming, and his day. Accordingly, those exhortations of his power and providence, whereby he destructive Jerusalem and the temple, abrogated the Mosaic institutions, and established the gospel, are called by the apostles his coming and day; not only in allusion to the ancient prophetic language, but because Christ himself, in his prophecy concerning these events, recorded Matt. xivv., habitually that expression of the Son of Man, in allusion to the following prophecy of Daniel, of which his own prophecy is an explanation: Dan. vii. 13. 'I saw the night visions, and beheld, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days. And they brought him near before him. 14. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.' This prophecy, the Jewish doctors with one consent interpreted of their Messiah, and of that temporal kingdom which they expected was to be given him. Further, they supposed he would erect that temporal kingdom by great and visible exertions of his power, for the destruction of his enemies. But they little suspected, that themselves were of the number of those enemies whom he was to destroy, and that his kingdom was to be established upon the ruin of their state. Yet that was the true meaning of 'the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven.' For while the Jewish nation continued in Judaea, and observed the institutions of Moses, they violently opposed the preaching of the gospel, by which Messiah was to reign over all people, nations, and languages. Wherefore, that the everlasting kingdom might be effectually established, it was necessary that Jerusalem and the Jewish state should be destroyed by the Roman armies. Now, since our Lord foretold this sad catastrophe, in the words of the prophet Daniel, Matt. xivv. 30. 'And they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory;' and, after describing every particular of it with the greatest exactness, seeing he told his disciples, ver. 34. 'This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled;' can there be any doubt, that the apostles (who, when they wrote their epistles, certainly understood the true import of this prophecy), by 'their master’s coming,' and by 'the end of all things,' which they represent as at hand, meant that coming to destroy Jerusalem, and to put an end to the institutions of Moses!—It is no objection to this, that when the apostles heard Christ declare, 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down,' they connected the end of the world, or age, with that event: Matt. xxiv. 3. 'Tell us, when shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming, (ως προφέρεται εἰς μέλλοντα), and of the end of the age?' For as the Jewish doctors divided the duration of the world into three ages; the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age of the Messiah; the apostles knew that the age under the law was to end when the age under Messiah began. And therefore, by the end of the age, they meant, even at that time, not the end of the world, but the end of the age under the law, in which the Jews had been greatly oppressed by the heathens. And although they did not then understand the purpose for which their master was to come, nor the true nature of his kingdom, nor suspect that he was to make any change in the institutions of Moses; yet when they wrote their epistles, being illuminated by the Holy Ghost, they certainly knew that the institutions of Moses were to be abolished, and that their master’s kingdom was not a temporal, but a spiritual dominion, in which all people, nations and languages, were to be governed, not by external force, but by the operation of truth upon their minds, through the preaching of the gospel.

PREFACE TO II. THESSALONIANS.

Sect. IV.

Further, that the apostles, by the coming of Christ, which they represented as at hand when they wrote their epistles, meant his coming to establish his spiritual kingdom over all people, nations, and languages, and not his coming to put an end to this mundane system, is evident from what Christ himself told them, Matt. xvi. 28. 'There be some standing here, who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom.' And, agreeably to this account of the coming of Christ, and of the end of all things, I observe, that every passage of their epistles, in which the apostles have spoken of these things as at hand, may, with the greatest propriety, be interpreted of Christ's coming to establish his everlasting kingdom over all people, nations, and languages, by destroying Jerusalem, putting an end to the law of Moses, and spreading the gospel through the world. Thus, 1 Cor. x. 11. 'These things—were written for our admonition, upon whom (τὰς της σοις) the ends of the ages are come,' means, the end of the age under the law, and the beginning of the age under the Messiah.—Philip. iv. 5.

1. Let your moderation be known to all men; the Lord is nigh; namely, to destroy the Jews, your greatest adversaries.—Heb. x. 25. 'But now once, (εἷς γε τούτων) at the conclusion of the ages,' the Jewish jubilees, 'he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offering by the sacrifice of himself.'—Heb. x. 25. 'Exhorting one another daily, and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching;' the day of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem and the Jewish state.—Ver. 37. 'For yet a very little while, and he who is coming will come and will not tarry.'—James v. 7. 'Wherefore, be patient, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord.'—Ver. 8. 'Be ye also patient; strengthen your hearts, for the coming of the Lord,' to destroy the Jews your persecutors, 'draweth nigh.'—Ver. 9. 'Behold, the Judge standeth before the door.'—1 Pet. iv. 7. 'The end of all things,' the end of Jerusalem and of the temple, and of all the Mosaic institutions, 'hath approached.' Be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer.'—1 John ii. 18. Young 'children, it is the last hour' of the Jewish state; and, as ye have heard (from Christ, in his prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem) that the antichrist cometh, so now there are many antichrists; whence we know that it is the last hour of the Jewish state.

2. There is another coming of Christ spoken of by the apostles, different likewise from his coming to judge the world, and to put an end to the present state of things; namely, his coming to destroy the man of sin,' 2 Thess. ii. 8. 'Him the Lord will consume by the breath of his mouth, and will render inefficacious by the bright shining of his coming.' This singular event, which will contribute greatly to the honour of God, and to the good of his church, being out of all proportion to the ordinary interposition of the power of Christ in the government of the world, is, agreeably to the Scripture style, fitly called 'the coming of the Lord,' and 'the bright shining of his coming.' But this coming is nowhere in Scripture said to be at hand.

3. There is likewise a day, or coming of Christ, spoken of by Paul, different from his coming to judgment, and from both the former comings—I mean, his releasing his people from their present trial, by death. 1 Cor. i. 8. 'He also will confirm you until the end without accusation, in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.'—Philip. i. 6. 'He who hath begun in you a good work, will be completing it until the day of Jesus Christ.'—1 Thess. v. 23. 'May your whole person, the spirit, and the soul, and the body, be preserved unblamable, unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.' It is true, the release of Christ's servants from their present trial by death is accomplished, for the most part, by no extraordinary display of his power; yet it is fitly enough called his day and coming, because by his appointment all men die, and by his power each is carried to his own place after death. Besides, his servants in particular, being put on their duty like soldiers, must remain at their several posts till released by their commander; and when he releases them, he is fitly said to come for that purpose.

4. Besides all these, there is a day, or coming of the Lord to judge the world, and to put an end to the present state of things. This coming, Christ himself hath promised, Matt. xvi. 27. 'The Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels; and then shall he reward every man according to his work.' Now, this being a real personal appearing of Christ in the body, it is, more properly than any other of his comings, called the day and coming of Christ. And the purposes of it being more important than those of his other comings, the exhortations of his power for accomplishing them will be most signal and glorious. On that occasion, likewise, he will appear in far greater majesty than formerly. For whereas, during his first abode on earth, his dignity and perfections were in a great measure concealed under the veil of his human nature, at his second coming, his glory as the image of the invisible God, and as having all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him bodily, will be most illustriously displayed, by his raising the dead, judging the world, destroying the earth, punishing his enemies, and rewarding his servants.—Hence this coming is, with great propriety, termed 'the revelation of Jesus Christ,' and 'the day' of his revelation, when he shall be glorified in his saints, and admired of all them who believe.'

Thus it appears, that when the apostles wrote, there were four comings of Christ to happen—three of them figurative, but the fourth a real personal appearance; that these different comings are frequently spoken of in Scripture; and that, although the coming of Christ to destroy Jerusalem, and to establish his everlasting kingdom, be represented by the apostles as then at hand, no passages from their writings can be produced, in which his personal appearance to judge the world is said, or even insinuated, to be at hand. The truth is, if the different comings of Christ are distinguished, as they ought to be, we shall find, that the apostles have spoken of each of them according to truth; and that the opinion which Infidels are so eager in maintaining, and which some Christians have unadvisedly espoused, to the great discredit of the inspiration of the apostles, as if they believed the day of judgment was to happen in their lifetime, hath not the least foundation in Scripture.

CHAPTER I.

It seems, the messenger who carried the apostle's first letter to the Thessalonians had informed him, that they were exceedingly strengthened by it, and bare the persecution, which still continued as violent as ever, with admirable constancy.—This good news was so acceptable to Paul and his assistants, that they began their second letter with telling the Thessalonians, they thought themselves bound to return thanks to God for their increasing faith and love, ver. 3—and that they boasted of their faith and patience, in all the persecutions which they endured, to other churches, ver. 4. (probably the churches of Achaia), in expectation, no doubt, that their example would have a happy influence on these churches, in leading them to exercise the like faith and patience under sufferings.—And, for the encouragement of the suffering Thessalonians, the apostle observed, that their behaviour under persecution demonstrated God's righteousness in having called them, notwithstanding they were of the Gentile race, into the gospel dispensation, ver. 5.—Yet it was just in God to punish their Jewish persecutors, by sending tribulation upon them, ver. 6.—while he was to bestow on the Thessalonians a share in his rest, along with the believing Jews, when Christ will return from heaven with his mighty angels, ver. 7.—to punish all who know not God, and who obey not the gospel of his Son, ver. 8.—with everlasting destruction, by flaming fire ensuing from his presence, ver. 9.—The apostle adds, that, at the judgment of the world, Christ will be glorified by the ministry of the angels, who shall put his sentences in execution, and be admired by all who believe, and, among the rest, by the Thessalonians, ver. 10.—And in this persuasion, he always prayed that their behaviour of the Thessalonians might be such as would induce God to judge them worthy of the gospel, whereby they were called to eternal life; and also to perfect in them the work of faith with power, ver. 11.—That, on the one hand, the name of the Lord Jesus Christ might be glorified through them by their persevering in the faith of the gospel, even when persecuted; and, on the other, that they might be glorified through him, by the virtues which they were enabled to exercise, in a degree proportioned to the grace of God, and of Christ, bestowed upon them; for these virtues would excite in the minds of their persecutors, the highest admiration of their character, ver. 12.

NEW TRANSLATION.

1 Paul, and Silvanus, and Timothy, to the church of the Thessalonians, which is in God our Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ.

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We are bound to thank God always concerning you, brethren, as is fit, because your faith growth exceedingly, and the love of every one of you all towards each other aboundeth;

4 So that we ourselves boast of you (in, 163.) to the churches of God, on account of your patience and faith, in all your persecutions and afflictions which ye sustain.

5 This is a proof of the righteous judgment of God, (see άναλογία, 154.) in that ye were counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye even suffer.

6 (Eph. 137.) Notwithstanding, I rejoice with God to give in return affliction to them who afflict you;

7 And to you the afflicted (166) rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with the mighty angels;

8 Insisting punishment (162) with flaming fire, on them who know not God, and on them who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Ver. 1. God our Father.—God is the Father of all mankind, by creation; and of them who believe, by regeneration; and that whether they be Jews or Gentiles.

Ver. 3. Your faith growth exceedingly.—This teaches us, not to satisfy ourselves with a general belief, that the gospel is from God, nor with a superficial view of its doctrines and precepts. Our persuasion of the divine origination of the gospel should grow in strength daily, and our views of its doctrines and precepts ought to become more clear and extensive. For, as all the virtues derive their life and operation from faith, the stronger our faith is, the greater our virtue will be. In this light, it is of the utmost importance frequently to review the evidences of the gospel, that we may therby strengthen our faith; and to watch the scriptures daily, for the purpose of improving our views of the doctrines and precepts of our religion.

Ver. 4. We ourselves boast of you to the churches of God.—This passage shews us, what is the occasion of joy to faithful ministers: It is the faith, and peace, and charity, and patience, of the churches in which they minister.—As Hebron observes, the apostle's address here is suitable. He excited the expectation of other churches by bestowing of the Thessalonians to them; and he praised them, not for the manner in which he had praised them, in the hearing of the churches.

Ver. 5. Righteous judgment of God.—It is a proof that God hath judged justly and impartially, in bestowing the gospel upon you, and that he knows the hearts of mankind.

Ver. 6. The kingdom of God.—So the gospel is called by our Lord. Matt. xii 28 'The kingdom of God is come to you.'

THESSALONIANS.

COMMENTARY.

1 Paul, and Silvanus, and Timothy, to the church of the Thessalonians, which is in subjection to the true God our Father, whereby it is distinguished from an assembly of idolatrous Gentiles, and in subjection to the Lord Jesus Christ, whereby it is distinguished from a synagogue of unbelieving Jews.

2 May virtuous dispositions be multiplied to you, with complete happiness from God our common Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the Father dispenses these blessings to men.

3 He, who in our former letter (11.) prayed the Lord to fill you with faith and love, are bound to thank God always concerning you, brethren, as is fit; because, agreeably to our prayers, your faith in the gospel growth exceedingly, notwithstanding the persecution which ye suffer, and because the love of every one of you all towards one another aboundeth;

4 So that we ourselves boast of you to the churches of God planted by us in these parts, on account of your singular patience and faith, under all the persecutions, and under all the afflictions which ye sustain, whether from your own countrymen, or from the unbelieving Jews in your city.

5 This your exemplary faith and patience under persecution, we told the churches, is a demonstration of the righteous judgment of God, who counted you Gentiles worthy of the kingdom of God, into which he hath called you, (1 Thess. ii. 12.), and for which ye even suffer.

6 Notwithstanding God is justified by your patience in suffering, he reckons it right to give in return affliction to them who afflict you. This I declare, to terrify your persecutors;

7 And to comfort you who suffer, I add, that God reckons it right to give to you Gentiles who are accounted enemies by us Jews, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed as the Son of God, by coming from heaven with his mighty angels;

8 Insisting punishment with flaming fire on the heathens who do not acknowledge God, but worship idols and atheism, who believe not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, when preached to them; or who, though they profess to believe it, obey not its precepts.

The apostle calls the gospel dispensation 'the kingdom of God,' in allusion to Dan. ii. 41. 'In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed.' See ver. 11. note 1.

Ver. 1. Notwithstanding, it is just.—The meaning is, Notwithstanding, by the persecution which ye endure, the righteousness of God's judgment, in counting you worthy of his kingdom, is demonstrated, yet it is just with God to punish them. See

Ver. 6. Notwithstanding, it is just.—The meaning is, Notwithstanding, by the persecution which ye endure, the righteousness of God's judgment, in counting you worthy of his kingdom, is demonstrated, yet it is just with God to punish them, &c.

Ver. 7. Rest with us.—Blessings. The apostle does not mean relaxation from persecution. The believing Jews had no relaxation in that sense, any more than the believing Gentiles. But he means relaxation from the troubles of this life at death, and the enjoyment of eternal rest, the rest of God, along with the believing Jews.

Ver. 8. Insisting punishment with flaming fire.—So καταστροφή, literally signifies. See 1 Pet. ii. 14, where καταστροφή is translated punishment. Some are of opinion, that καταστροφή should be joined with the last clause of the preceding verse, thus,—shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire. But the construction I have adopted is more suitable to the design of Christ's second coming, which is to comfort the righteous, as well as to punish the wicked. Besides, the Syriac transatorial hath, 'Gentiles shall appear in vehement ignis.'—Thus κάτω, the fire of flames, is an Hebrazism which denotes, that the fire will descend from heaven in flaming flames, and the wicked shall burn fiercely, so as to occasion a great light. And who obey not the gospel.—The belief of the gospel is often termed by Paul the obedience of faith; because God hath commanded men to believe the gospel. Hence Christ told the Jews,
II. THESSALONIANS.

9 These wicked men, being raised from the dead, shall suffer punishment, even everlasting destruction, by fire issuing from the presence of the Lord; the fiery cloud by which the presence of the Lord will be rendered illustrious; and from that glorious to 10 In that day, when he shall come to be glorified (v. 167.) through his saints, and to be admired by all the believers, and by you, because our testimony was believed (v. 188.) by you.

11 (Ecc. 2) On which account also we always pray concerning you, that our God may count you worthy of the calling, and fulfill all the good-will of his goodness in you, and the work of faith with power;

John vi. 20. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." Hence also faith is called a work, 1 Thess. i. 2. "Your faith also is spoken of in this city, as the declaration of your praise, and of the unbelieving Jews in his eye, and all who, like them, obstinately and maliciously oppose the gospel to judgment."

To understand this account of the punishment of the wicked, we must recollect, that the Jews, the righteous are to be caught up from the earth, "in clouds, to join the Lord in the air." 1 Thess. iv. 17. "Consider therefore that the wicked shall not be caught up, but are to be left on the earth." And in regard to the apostle assures us that the present earth, "is safely preserved by the word of God, and by the fire against the day of judgment, and by the judgment of fire upon the ungodly," 2 Pet. iii. 7. It follows, that the wicked shall be the first to be raised from the dead, and those who were alive on the earth at the coming of Christ, shall begin to suffer the punishment due to them, in the flames of the fire, in the fire of the general conflagration. This is what Paul likewise declares in the 6th verse of the 2nd chapter, and John, Rev. xvii. 8, where, speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem and God's people by fire, he says, they were "made as the sea, an example to all those who after them, would live ungodly, an example of that dreadful punishment by fire which God will inflict on the wicked at the day of judgment."

John iii. 33. "He shall come to judgment, and the world by his glory shall be judged, and the world in the glory of his power." This is also the glory of his power, in the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, it is probable that the fire which is to burn the earth, with the wicked left thereto, will issue from the presence of the Lord, that is, from the pillar of fire by which God manifested his presence among the Israelites in the wilderness.

The fiery cloud with which Christ is to be surrounded when he judge the world, is, to the same reason, called his presence. See ver. 24. It is also called "the glory of his power," because it is a token of the great power with which the Father hath invested him, as Lord and Judge of the world. In the description which the apostle Peter, 2 Pet. iii. 10, 12, hath given of the burning of the earth, he says, "under an account of the order in which it will proceed. He begins with the heavens, or air which surrounds the earth, and the burning of the heavens, air, or the earth, is to be set on fire, ver. 13 and the earth thereto, burning furiously, shall be dissolved; and, ver. in the flames spreading thence, worlds above worlds shall utterly burn; and the burning penetrating to the center, the earth shall be dissolved, and all what is composed shall be melted, reduced to a homogeneous mass of liquid fire, which will either continue burning, or be extinguished in order to a renovation, as it pleased God."

Seeing the fire in which the wicked are to be punished is called by our Lord, Matt. xxv. 41. "fire prepared for the devil and his angels." It is not inferred, that these malicious spirits also are to be burnt in the flames of the conflagration of this punishment, they may be inferred, if, as some suppose, they are united to other bodies of such a nature as to be affected by fire. Other particulars concerning the fallen angels, mentioned in scripture, seem to agree with this account of their punishment. For example, we are told, Eph. ii. 2 that they have their habitation at present in the air, 2 Pet. ii. 4. "As they feast in the gallows which is in the air, and the day of judgment being the time expressly fixed by Judas for their judgement and punishment, do not they afterwards deny that it is possible to believe, that when the heavens, or atmosphere of air surrounding this earth, is set on fire, therefore the sinners shall be burnt in their prison house, even as the devil shall be burnt in the brass image where he is left, so that our Lord's sentence is to be understood literally of the devil, and his wicked angels, and not metaphorically. And that the effect of this burning upon both will be the utter destruction of their bodies, without any hope of their ever regaining new bodies; while their spirits, surviving the destruction of their bodies as long as it please God, shall be made unexpiably miserable by their own thoughts, without any alleviation to alleviate the bitterness of their most unutterably state. These things are all so terrible, that the sound of them, though distant, shall strike terror even those who are most sunk in wickedness and iniquity.

Ver. 9.1. Everlasting destruction signifies that destruction of the animal life which is called death, but is no where used to denote the extinction of the immortal soul. When, therefore, the wicked are said to be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, it cannot be from that injury, to the immortality of the soul, for which they are here under sentence, and in which they stand condemned. For, as we have already observed, the punishment of the wicked, cast into the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, is called the second death, Rev. xiv. 15. to intimate, that as the soul or thinking principle in men is not destroyed in the first death or destruction of the body, so neither is it to be extinguished by the punishment of the body in the general conflagration; which therefore is called the second death. And second the wicked shall never be delivered from this second death by any new resurrection, it is properly termed 'everlasting destruction.' Nevertheless, whether an end is to be put to their misery, and at what period or in what manner it is to be ended, is not revealed, and rests with God alone to determine.

2. From the presence of the Lord. — The luminous cloud with which the Lord shall be surrounded when he comes to judge the world, is called as his face, or presence, because thereby his presence, when he comes to judge the world, will be manifested, as the presence of God was manifested at Sinai by a cloud, whose appearance was like 'devouring fire,' Ezek. xxiv. 17. See 2 Pet. ii. 1. Note 2.

Ver. 10.1. In that day. — The words εἰς τὸν χρόνον δυστικού, εἰς σάρξ, or presence, because thereby his presence, when he comes to judge the world, will be manifested, as the presence of God was manifested at Sinai by a cloud, whose appearance was like 'devouring fire,' Ezek. xxiv. 17. See 2 Pet. ii. 1. Note 2.

Ver. 11.1. Judge you worthy of the calling. — Some are of opinion that the action of calling is here put for the designation of the whole of that calling. But it is more natural to interpret it as the gospel, by which men are called to lay hold on eternal life; and so the meaning will be, May our God, who instructs your actions, find you Thessalonians always making a right improvement of the gospel, whereby ye will be judged by him worthy of it.

2. And full — Others translate εἰς τὸν χρόνον, or presence, because in other passages the word is used in that sense. See Col. i. 9. Note 1.

3. The good-will of his goodness. — The same refers to v. 5. — This, as Black adds, is the shortest and the most charming expressive formation that is to be found in that immense genealogical and admirable benevolence of God, which no words or thoughts can fully express, but was never so happily and so fully expressed as here." Soc. Class. vol. I. p. 151.—

Because the word he is not in the original, and because it is never applied to God in the New Testament, Channer is of opinion, that it denotes the goodness of the Thessalonians in making the collections for the saints in Judea; and that the apostle probably here, that is, in this epistle, wrote it. But then this time the epistle was written, the Thessalonians had not made these collections; for which reason I prefer the interpretation given in the commentary.

Ver. 12. And ye through him.—By the glorification of the Thessalonians, Theophylact understood their glorification at the day of judgment. But I rather understand it of their glorification in the eyes of their persecutors; because that fortitude in suffering for the gospel, which by the grace of God and of Christ they were enabled to shew, could not fail, he was observed in it, to raise in the minds of their persecutors an high admiration of their character.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Subjects handled in this Chapter.

To excite the attention of the Thessalonian brethren to the things the apostle was going to write concerning the time of Christ's second coming, and to give them the greater weight, he began this chapter with beseeching them, in relation to the coming of Christ to judge the world, and their gathering together around him in the air, of which he had written in his former letter, ver. 1.—not to be so soon shaken from any honest purpose which they had formed concerning worldly affairs, nor thrown into confusion, neither by any pretended revelation of the Spirit obstructed upon them by false teachers, nor by any verbal message as from him, nor by any letter forged in his name, importing that he believed the day of judgment was at hand, ver. 2.—And to remove the impression which had been made on the minds of the Thessalonians by these base arts, the apostle assured them, in the most express terms, that the day of the Lord shall not come, till there first happen a great apostasy in religion among the disciples of Christ, and the man of sin be revealed; that is, till a tyrant shall rise up in the church, which should exceedingly corrupt the doctrine of Christ, and grievously oppress his faithful servants, ver. 3.—Next he described the character and actions of that tyrannical power, and instituted, that it would continue a long time in the church, openly opposing both God and Christ, ver. 4.—Then asked them, if they did not remember, that when he was with them he told them these things, ver. 5.—And that there was a power then existing, which restrained the man of sin from revealing himself, ver. 6.—and would restrain him, till it was taken out of the way, ver. 7.—Which things, if they had not been written, and revealed; that is, by the apostle, but after the man of sin is revealed in his season, and that continued during the time; and when he was allied to him, he shall be destroyed, ver. 8.—In the mean time, to enable the Thessalonians, and every one who might read this letter, to judge properly of the apostasy, the apostle described the manner in which it was to enter, and the vile arts by which it was to be established, ver. 9, 10.—And to put the faithful upon their guard against the authors and abettors of the apostasy, he declared, that such as give heed to these impostors will at length, through the strong working of error, be seduced to believe the greatest and most pernicious lie that ever was devised, and shall on that account be condemned, ver. 11, 12.—Then expressed his charitable opinion concerning the Thessalonians; that they would neither be involved in the sin, nor in the punishment of the revolting which he had described, ver. 13, 14.—and exhorted them to hold fast the doctrine which he had delivered to them, whether by sermons or by letters, ver. 15.—And that they might be enabled to do so, he earnestly prayed that Christ and God would comfort them, and establish them in every good doctrine and practice, ver. 16, 17.

Commentary.

CHAP. II.—1 Now, because there are some who affirm that the end of the world is at hand, we beseech you, brethren, in relation to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, to judge the world, whereof I have written in this and in my former letter, and to our gathering together around him after the judgment; (see 1 Thess. iv. 17, note 5.)

1.—1. We beseech you concerning,—or in relation to. Some commentators adopt the common translation of this clause, because it is the apostle's custom to express the words of the things most dear to them: as 1 Cor. 1v. 31. 1 Thess. v. 27. 2 Tim. iv. 1. But in none of these passages is the preposition επί, or any other preposition whatever, used.

2. Now, the Lord Jesus Christ, 1—(ver. 167.)—Grotius, Hammond, Le Clerc, Whitby, Wetstein, and others, understand of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem; and especially, that this letter was written to correct the mistaken notion into which the Thessalonians had fallen, concerning the coming of Christ to judgment, described in the former letter: I say, considering all these circumstances, we can have no doubt that the coming of Christ, spoken of in this verse, in his coming, not to destroy Jerusalem, but to judge the world, and to raise the righteous, gathered round him in the air after the judgment, into heaven.

3. And our gathering together around him,—Of this the apostle had written in his former epistle, iv. 17. We shall be caught up in clouds to join the Lord in the air; and so we shall be for ever with the Lord! See note 3. on that verse.

Ver. 1. 1—We beseech you concerning,—or in relation to. from your purpose, nor troubled, neither by spiritual nor by worldly, nor by letter, as (1 Pet. 1:21), from 1 Thess. 2:2), intimating that the day of Christ is at hand; and let no man deceive you by any method; for that day shall not come, unless there come the apostasy first, and there be revealed that man of sin, the son of perdition.

Epistle. I. 10. To have waited for the Son of God from heaven, and no doubt considered it as a most joyful event, yet the frailty of many of the apostles was such, that the thought of his immediate appearing had unhinged their minds, and led them to neglect their worldly affairs, whereby much confusion was occasioned, which the apostles endeavoured to remedy by this letter.

3. Neither by spirit. — As many of the disciples, in the first age, were endowed with the gift of inspiration on particular occasions, the false teachers began very early to give out, that their erroneous doctrines had been decreed to them by the Spirit of God; hoping, by that deceit, to more effectually recommend their deceptions. Of these false pretences, an instance is made in 1 John iv. 6. But to prevent the faithful from being misled by such crafty impostors, some of the brethren in every church were endowed with the gift of discerning spirits, whereby they were enabled to judge of the sincerity of their pretended inspiration, and the nature of the inspiration by which any teachers spake, 1 Cor. xiv. 20. It would appear, however, that the false teachers in the church of the Thessalonians had not been thus judged; perhaps because they pretended that what had been revealed to them, was agreeable to the apostle’s first letter, and to the message sent to them from which they had fathomed. Or the Thessalonians had not paid sufficient attention to the judgment which the discerners of spirits were to pass upon these impostors, on which account the apostle gave them this caution.

Nor by word, nor by letter. — As we see in 1 Thess. 5:19. It seems one of the false teachers pretended to bring a message from the apostle to the Thessalonians, intimating that the day of Christ was at hand. Nay, they had forged a letter, as from him, to the same purpose. The practice of forging messages from the apostles, in order to gain credit among the brethren in distant parts, began very early, Acts xx. 35, as did the practice likewise of forging revelations of the Spirit, 2 Pet. ii. 1; 1 John iv. 1. Also, that letters were forged in Paul’s name, appears from 2 Thess. iii. 17.

5. Intimating that the day of Christ is at hand. — Knatchbull thought this clause should be joined with the beginning of the next verse, in the following manner: ‘As that the day of Christ is at hand, let no man deceive you by any method; it will not come, unless the apostasy be first revealed.’ See note 1. on ver. 3.

Ver. 3. — Unless there come the apostasy first. — 2 Thess. ii. 3. And there be revealed that man of sin, that son of perdition.

2 Thess. ii. 3. And there be revealed that man of sin, that son of perdition.

Ver. 2. And he shall be revealed. — What this means, will be shewed ver. 6, note 2.

3. That man of sin, that son of perdition. — The article, joined to these appellations, is emphasized, as in the former clause implying that the ancient prophets had spoken of these persons, though under different names; particularly the prophet Daniel, whose descriptions of the little horn and blasphemous king agree so exactly in meaning with Paul’s descriptions of the man of sin, and son of perdition, and little one, that there can be little doubt of their being the same person. But this will best appear by a comparison of the passages:

Dan. vii. 21. And the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them.

Dan. xii. 1. And he shall be revealed according to his will, and he shall exalt and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods.

Dan. xii. 9. And he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes.

Dan. vii. 1. I considered the horns, and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots.

Dan. xii. 7. And he shall think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand.

Dan. xii. 10. And in his state he shall honour the god of forces; (Mahanaim), gods who are protectors, that is, tutelary angels and saints.

Dan. xii. 2. And he shall be revealed the God of his fathers, not the desire of women.

Dan. vii. 11. I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake, I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed without being burned.

Ver. 26. And they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end.

Dan. xii. 21. And he shall be broken without hand.

12 That all may be condemned who have

Roman state. 1 To this conjecture the fathers may have been led by tradition, or they may have informed themselves from Daniel's prophecies. But in whatever way they obtained the notion, it seems to have been true. For the power of the emperors, and of the magistrates under them, first in the heathen state of the empire, and afterwards when it had been Christianized, was that which restrained the man of sin, or corrupt clergy, from exalting themselves above all that is called god, or an object of worship civil and religious.

6. 1 And then shall be revealed that lawless one, being the man of sin, whose character and actions are described in ver. 4, the ruin of the present person, as was observed in note 2 on ver. 6, must mean that he would no longer work so successfully, but that he should expose himself possessing the character of the lawless one as in his own person, and performing the actions ascribed to the man of sin. For, as the apostle observes, there are three cases in which this kind of destruction could take place.

3. Will consume. 4: As before. This word, Chandler observes, is used to denote a lingering gradual consumption, being applied to the waste of time, to the dissipation of an estate, and to the slow death of being eaten up of worms. He supposes it has the same meaning here, importing that the man of sin is to be gradually destroyed by the breath of Christ's mouth.

8. By the breath of his mouth. 5 So by his breath should be translated in this passage, where the prelating of true doctrine, and its efficacy in destroying the man of sin, are predicted. For, the mouth being the instrument by which speech is formed of breath or air blown out of the lungs, breath of his mouth is a proper figurative expression, to denote the speaking or preaching of true doctrine. Accordingly, the preaching of the gospel is termed, Rev. xvi. 15. 'a sharp sword proceeding out of the mouth of God.' Hosea v. 1. 'I have hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth.'

8. And will rend in effectual. 6 So rendeth shall be translated. See Rom. iii. 31. note 1.

6. By the shining of his coming. 7 So the shining of his coming shall be. The word rendered in this passage, as darkness is dispelled by the rising of the sun, so the mystery of iniquity is destroyed by the light that is in the heathen state of the empire, or the great apostasy, and thereby evil would cease, or the true doctrine of the gospel shine. On this verse Benson observes, that if St. John and St. Paul have prophesied of the same corruptions, it should seem, that the head of the apostasy will be destroyed by some signal judgment, after its influence or dominion hath been greater than it could have been destroyed by the force of truth. Daniel titles him, that after the little horn is consumed and destroyed, chap. vii. 27. 'the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High.' This, by many, is supposed to be the millennium, of which John hath prophesied Rev. x. 4, and of which so many contradictions have been written, but which, I suppose, means nothing but the happy state of the church, after the general conversion of Gentiles and Jews to the Christian faith, though the mystery of iniquity would prevail in the apostle's days. But the man of sin, that lawless one, was not to show himself openly till that which restrained was taken out of the way. The coming, therefore, of the man of sin, or his beginning to reveal himself, was to happen after the empire became Christian, and to take place in the year of the Lord, as in the following clauses.

5. 2. After the strong working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood. 8 The structure of this sentence requires that Satan be joined, not with power, with signs, and miracles, but with power and signs, power and signs. Now, 'power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood,' are either signs and miracles, and exertions of power, performed not in reality, but in appearance only; or more improperly upon them, or, they are real signs and miracles performed for the establishment of error; consequently, they are the works of evil spirits. Of this sort, the miracles performed by Pharaoh's magicians may have been; also some, if any, may be performed by heathen historians. For the apostle intimates here, that by some kind of miracles, or strong working which had the appearance of miracles in the eyes of the

10. And by every deceit which wickedness can suggest, for the purpose of persuasion, among them who perish, because they do not cherish the love of true doctrine, by which they might be saved; but delight in error, that they may be at liberty to gratify their vicious inclinations.

11. And for this cause, God, as a punishment of their wickedness, will permit the inworking of error in the minds of these false teachers, to lead them to believe a lie the most monstrous and perversity that ever was invented.

12 So that all, both teachers and people, shall be condemned, who villain, Satan established idolatry in the heathen world. Nay, our Lord himself foretells, that false Christians should give great signs and wonders, in so much that, if it were possible, they would deceive the very elect. Wherefore, speaking of the working of the man of sin was to be after the strong working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and miracles. It is not improbable that some of those by the miracles which the corruptions of Christianity were introduced may have been real miracles performed by evil spirits, called here 'miracles of falsehood,' because they were done for the establishment of error. See Rev. xii. 13, 14, where the same events are thought to be foretold.

The coming of the lawless one, with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood, plainly avouches, the Magisterial and Antichristian character of the man of sin, as some pretend. For, instead of working miracles, he utterly disclaimed all pretensions of this kind. In like manner, and for the same reason, the man of sin cannot be the fullest leaders of the Jews, in their revolt from the Romanism, as Le Clerc and Whitby have affirmed; nor any of the heathen Roman emperors, as others have imagined. Besides, although these emperors ordained themselves above all others, and opposed Christ very much, they did not apostatize from the Christian faith, nor sit in the temple of God.

10. With all the deceit of unrighteousness. 9—Jesus saith unto him, 10 'I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me.' There is no deceit in Christ. Judgment. 11—For this cause, God will send to them the strong-working of error; that is, shall bring in, or shall permit the strong-working of error in their hearts. For the Hebraic word denoting action, is used to express, not the doing, but the bringing about of some evil thing, being the sense of the word in 2 Cor. x. 1, note, and Philm. iv. 1. From this we learn, that, as a punishment of their sins, God suffers wicked men to be self-hardeners in sin. Wherefore, as the sin of the person of this in the passage consisted in not loving the truth, what could be more just or proper than to punish them, by subjecting them to the effects of the greatest errors and lies? The Greek legislators and philosophers were punished in the same manner, by God's giving them up to unlearnedness, through the lusts of their own hearts. Rom. i. 28. This being the course of things established by God, the consideration thereof ought strongly to excite us to cherish the love of truth. 12. To their believing a lie; 11—Jesus saith unto him, 12 'for this cause, God shall send to them the strong-working of error.' This form of expression does not always denote the final cause, but oftentimes the effect simply; and therefore the clause might be translated, 'as they will believe a lie.' The lie here intended by the Spirit of God, I suppose, is the monstrous lie of transubstantiation, or of the conversion of the bread and wine in the Lord's supper, into the real identical body and blood of Christ, through the will of the priest accompanying his pronouncing the words of institution; notwithstanding there is no change whatever produced in the accidents, or sensible qualities of these substances. This impious fiction is not only a palpable contradiction to the senses and reason of mankind, but a more pernicious falsehood, being the foundation of that fictitious power of partaking sin, and of saving or damnning men, according to their own pleasure, which the Roman ecclesiastics have blasphemously attributed to themselves and by which they make men utterly negligent of holiness, and of all the ordinary duties of life. Now, seeing the strong working of error, ending in the belief of a lie, was to be sent on these men as a punishment for their not loving the truth, it is highly proper, as the only thing necessary to be said, that they believed the lie, as the lady, because they in a canonical manner loved not the truth, but had pleasure in iniquity. Therefore, the more they by their believing a lie being rendered highly criminal, will be more properly punished with condemnation, ver. 12.

The SS. have not believed the truth concerning the prophecies which procure the pardon of sin and the favour of God, because they have taken pleasure in unrighteousness.

2. Have not believed the truth, but have taken pleasure in unrighteousness. — Languages signify both to take pleasure in a thing, and the use of it. From this we learn, that it is not the simple ignorance of truth which exposes men to damnation. In many cases this may be no fault in the ignorant. But it is such a refusal to believe, through their taking pleasure in unrighteousness, which will prove fatal to them; for a disposition of that sort, renders the wicked altogether impenetrable.

It is now time to inform the reader, that learned men have differed as to the sense of a part of the prophecies of this chapter. Nevertheless, the diversity of interpretation given of this and of the other prophecies of God, does not prove them uncertain. The facts and circumstances mentioned in these prophecies, are for the most part, facts and circumstances which bore no relation to the events of the ancient church. The prophecies, for the most part, contained the following statements: the coming of Christ; the church as an institution; the civilization of the earth; the prosperity of the Jews; and the sudden destruction of the Roman empire. In this, the following passages of prophecy have been given any of the present, the proper method of ascertaining its meaning is to compare the various events to which it is thought to relate, with the words of the prophecies, and to adopt that which most exactly agrees, in all its parts, to the present condition of things.

According to this rule, though many different interpretations have been given of the prophecies of the Bible, as a whole, and of the state of the church, it is still the opinion, that the present state of the church, is a fulfillment of the prophecies. But such an interpretation of the prophecies as is stated above, is not the only interpretation which is possible. The present state of the church, is a fulfillment of the prophecies, and the interpretation of the prophecies is the same as that of the present state of the church. The interpretation of the prophecies is the same as that of the present state of the church, because the prophecies are fulfilled in the present state of the church. The interpretation of the prophecies is the same as that of the present state of the church, because the prophecies are fulfilled in the present state of the church. The interpretation of the prophecies is the same as that of the present state of the church, because the prophecies are fulfilled in the present state of the church. The interpretation of the prophecies is the same as that of the present state of the church, because the prophecies are fulfilled in the present state of the church.
II. THESALONIANS.

13 But we are bound to give thanks to God always concerning you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath chosen you from the beginning to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth;

14 To which he called you, by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ;

15 Well then, brethren, stand fast, and hold fast the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or by letter.

16 And may our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God even our Father, who hath loved us, and given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, probability never will take place but in a time, the knowledge of which is not in man's power even in the highest degree, it is evident, therefore, that this prophecy, which speaks of the future and is certain to be fulfilled, is in accordance with the accomplishment of it by the council of heaven, as it was in the case of the wise virgin, according to the promise of the Lord. The grace of God is the same in the case of the wise and foolish virgins, and the grace of the Spirit is the same in the case of the saved and the lost. The grace of the Spirit is the same in the case of the saved and the lost, and the grace of heaven is the same in the case of the saved and the lost. The grace of heaven is the same in the case of the saved and the lost, and the grace of the Spirit is the same in the case of the saved and the lost.

17 Comfort your hearts, and establish you in every good word and work.

13 But I do not mean that ye Thesalonians shall be conserved either in this revolt against God or in the punishment thereof. For we are bound, as I told you before, to give thanks to God always concerning you, beloved of the Lord Jesus Christ, because God hath chosen you from the beginning to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.

14 To which he called you, by our gospel, in order to obtaining a share in the glorious inheritance which our Lord Jesus Christ will bestow on his faithful servants at the last day.

15 Well then, whilst they shall perish who love not the truth, brethren, stand fast, and hold fast those precepts and doctrines which ye have been taught, whether by our preaching or by our letter; nor let any one cast out the word of God, at the last day.

16 And to enable you so to do, I pray that our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God even our Father, who hath loved us as a father loveth his children, and hath given us everlasting consolation under the ministration of life, and a well-founded hope of eternal life through our faith.

17 Comfort your hearts under afflictions for the gospel, and establish you in every good doctrine and practice, in opposition to the attempts of impostors to seduce you.

the apostle terms his doctrines in general traditions. 2 Thess. iii. 6. 'Withstand every doctrine which is not according to the word of our Lord and of the apostles.' This application Paul gave to the doctrines and precepts of the gospel on a double account; first, because they were delivered by Christ and by the Spirit to the apostles, mere and infallible; secondly, because the doctrines delivered them to the world in the same authority, without attempting to prove them by any other argument. See Col. ii. 2. According to the account of the matter, the precepts in the text. 'Hold fast the traditions which ye have been taught.' Apply to none but to those which are written and precepts which the apostles, and other inspired teachers, delivered to the world as revelations from God. And no doctrines merit the name of traditions, in the scripture sense of the word, but such as were taught by the apostles of Christ, or by other spiritual men, who received them by immediate revelation from him. And through the inspired teachers, to whom these doctrines were revealed, communicated them to the world first of all by word of mouth, they cannot now be known to be theirs, but by their holding a place in these writings which are allowed to be the genuine productions of these inspired teachers. The traditions, therefore, on which the church of Rome lays so great stress, are of no manner of value.

16. — May our Lord Jesus Christ, and God even our Father, who hath loved us. — This, and what follows, though standing immediately connected with 'God even our Father,' must be understood as repeated concerning our Lord Jesus Christ, unless οὐ ἐν ὑπόθεσιν be put for ὑπόθεσιν, which is scarcely to be admitted: For the clause, 'may our Lord Jesus Christ,' will be a sentence without meaning, if it is not completed in one or other of the methods just now mentioned. In this passage, the same operation is ascribed to the Son as to the Father, agreeably to what Christ himself hath told us, John v. 19. What things soever he doth, these also doth the Son likewise.

2. And give us everlasting consolation. — That is, the means of never failing consolation; as is plain from the following verse, in which the apostle wishes that Christ and God might actually comfort their hearts.

3. And good hope through grace. — Good hope is an euphemistic expression, signifying hope, not of ordinary blessings, but of such as are great and lasting, and the hope of which is well founded, being found in the grace and favour of God, which must never fail. Ver. 17. Establish you. — Εὐφραίνεσθε signifies to support a thing in such a manner as to render it firm, and preserve it from falling. Here it is applied to the mind, and denotes the establishment of it in the belief of every good doctrine, and in the practice of every virtue, by strengthening it, and giving it just views of the doctrine and precepts of religion, and by infusing into it a sincere love of both.}

CHAPTER III.

In the end of the foregoing chapter, by praying God to comfort and establish the Thesalonians, the apostle intimated, that God's grace and assistance, obtained, whether by their own prayers or by the prayers of others, is the best preservative from apostasy and sin. Wherefore St. Paul, at this time, being deeply afflicted with the malice and rage of the unbelieving Jews, who, while Galio was proconsul of Achaia, had made the Eunuch of Cyrene his interpreter, in which his life was endangered, he besought the Thesalonians to pray to God in behalf of him and his assistants; that, by their bold and faithful preaching, the gospel might be as speedily and successfully propagated through the world, as it had been among the Thesalonians, ver. 1—and that they might be delivered from those ungodly and unreasonable men of the Jewish nation, who pretended to have faith in the true God, but had it not, ver. 2. However, that the malice of the Jews might not terrify the Thesalonians too much, he put them in mind of the power and faithfulness of Christ, who will not suffer his servants to be tempted above what they are able to bear, ver. 3.—then prayed God to direct them all to that which was good, ver. 4.—And because his former letter had not reclaimed the disorderly among them, he, in the name and by the authority of Christ, commanded the faithful to avoid the company and conversation of them who had not obeyed his former order concerning working for their own maintenance, ver. 6.—And to add the more weight to his command, he put the Thessalonians in mind, that when he and his assistants were with them, they did not, on presence of their being employed in preaching the gospel, lead an idle life, ver. 7.—nor intrude themselves into the houses of the rich, nor live on other people's labour; but wrought daily for their own maintenance, ver. 8.—This course they followed, not because they had no right to maintenance from their disciples, but to make themselves examples of prudent industry to the Thessalonians, ver. 9.—Further, he put them in mind, that when he was with them, he commanded, if any man did not work, none of them should give him to eat, ver. 10.—And because he was informed, that there were still among them persons who did not work at all, but who went about idly, begging and censuring other people's actions, pretending perhaps, that, as the day of judgment was at hand, to employ themselves in worldly affairs was inconsistent with the care of their salvation, ver. 11.—such idle persons he commanded immediately to correct their disorderly way of living, ver. 12.—And the faithful he exhorted, not to become weary of honestly working for their own maintenance, and of doing acts of charity to the really needy, ver. 13.—At the same time, that his injunctions might be better obeyed by the disorderly than formerly, he desired the rulers of the church, if any refused to do the things commanded, in this letter, to point them out to the faithful, that they might put them to shame, by avoiding their company, as he had directed, ver. 14.—yet they were not to regard them as enemies, but to admonish them as brethren, who might still be reclaimed, ver. 15.—Next, to shew his great affection to the Thessalonians, he prayed for all manner of happiness to them, ver. 16.—Lastly, to authenticate this epistle, the apostle with his own hand wrote the salutation; and declared it to be the mark by which all his genuine letters might be distinguished from such as were forged, ver. 17. In my former letter, (chap. v. 14.), I ordered your rulers to rebuke them who walked disorderly; but their rebukes have been disregarded. Wherefore now we command you, brethren, by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye shun the company of every brother, who, having been once and again admonished, still walketh disorderly, and not according to the precepts which he received from us.

VER. 1. Even as among you.—This is a very high commendation of the Thessalonian brethren, and was designed to encourage them in their attachment to the gospel.

VER. 2. Delivered from brutish and wicked men.—As that which I have translated brutish men, literally signifies men who have no place; that is, who deserve to have no place in society; consequently unreasonable brutish men, who act merely from the impulse of their passions, and who, like wild beasts, should be avoided. No doubt the apostle, when he wrote this, had the heathen priests and philosophers in his eye, as well as the unbelieving Jewish zealots. Yet seeing the latter were so exceedingly enraged against him for preaching salvation to the Gentiles, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses, that they followed him from place to place, and raised a furious storm of persecution against him wherever they found him, by informing the rulers and magistrates against him: it is not improbable the former were particularly pointed at in this passage, especially as they had lately made an insurrection at Corinth, with an intention to have the apostle put to death.

VER. 3. For all men have not faith.—Faith, in this passage, does not signify the actual belief of the gospel, but such a desire to know and to do the will of God, as will dispose a person to believe the gospel, when fairly proposed to him.—In this the Apostle points not only at the Jews, who boasted of their faith in the true God, and in the revelations of his will which he had made to them, but at the Greek philosophers likewise, who had assumed to themselves the pow'r of dispensing with the gospel or truth.

VER. 3. Keep you from the evil one.—As τον τρομωόντα. This is the same given in other passages of scripture to the devil; Matt. vi. 13; Acts 19. 24; Eph. vi. 16.—The apostle assures the Thessalonians that the Lord Jesus would establish and keep them from the evil one, to prevent their being too much distressed with fear for their own perseverance, when they found him so anxious to be delivered from brutish and wicked men.

VER. 4. Ye both do, and will do.—The apostle in this expresses his good opinion of the greatest part of the Thessalonian brethren, but not of every one of them without exception, as is plain from verses 11—14.

VER. 8. 1. May the Lord direct your hearts to the love of God, and to the patience which Christ exercised in all his afflictions, that ye may be preserved from apostacy.

VER. 8. 2. And to the patience of Christ.—As the patience of Job is the patience of which we are so anxious as examples, so the patience of Christ is the patience which he exercised in his sufferings.

VER. 9. 2. Walketh disorderly.—Arrears, disorderly persons, are they who profess to be subject to the discipline of the gospel, yet do not walk according to its precepts. See 1 Thess. 4. note 1. What the apostle condemned under this description was idleness, (ver. 11.), and by the solemnity with which he introduces his charge, we are taught that it is most offensive to God, and dangerous to ourselves and others, as well as a weak representation of ourselves and truth. May all who have a regard to religion, be prepared to this! The same charge is repeated, ver. 14. See note 2. on that verse.

VER. 9. 2. Tradition which he received from us.—See chap. ii. 15. Col. ii. 8. notes.
II. THESSALONIANS.

7 For yourselves know how ye ought to imitate us; because we did not walk disorderly among you;
8 Neither did we eat bread as a gift from any one, but with labour and toil we wrought night and day, in order not to be a burden on any of you.
9 Not because we have not right, but that we might give ourselves to you for a pattern, that in us ye might imitate us.

10 (KJV 493.) And therefore when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any one would not work, neither let him eat.
11 For we hear that there are some who walk among you disorderly, not working at all, but busybodies in other people's affairs.

12 Now, brethren, we have commanded you by the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread.
13 And ye, brethren, be not weary in well-doing.

14 (ως, if any one do not obey our command, point out that man, and keep company with him, that he may be ashamed.)
15 Yet do not count him as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.
16 And may the Lord of peace himself give you peace always in every way. The end.

Ver. 10. — 1. Not because we have not right; — When our Lord first sent out the twelve to preach, he said to them, Matt. x. 9. "The workman is worthy of his hire;" and by so saying, conferred on his apostles a right to demand maintenance from those to whom they preached. See 1 Cor. ix. 4, note. This right Paul did not insist on among the Thessalonians, but wrought for his own maintenance while he preached to them. Lest, however, his enemies might think this an acknowledgement that he was no apostle, he here asserted his right, and told them, that he had demanded no maintenance from them, to make himself a pattern to them of prudent industry.
2. For, brethren, — We may see from this passage, how far the apostles were from depending on the voluntary contributions of the churches. They worked diligently for their own support, not for their own comfort, but on the principle that they were "the servants of the living God." "We must do the right thing," says the apostle; "for it will be a good thing for you and for me."
3. For, if the apostle did not make the necessary and laborious work of preaching the gospel an excuse for not working, the Thessalonians had no reason to excuse themselves from working, on pretence they were attending to their neighbours' affairs. For, if, the apostle did not make the necessary and laborious work of preaching the gospel an excuse for not working, the Thessalonians had no reason to excuse themselves from working, on pretence of their mind other people's affairs; which in truth was but idle meddling.

Ver. 11. — 1. Take notice that man; — A like direction is given, Rom. xv. 17. 1 Cor. v. 9, 11. 13. Phil. iii. 17. But see the word ἀνακρίνεις, put a mark upon that man, mean excommunicate him; to which meaning the subsequent clause seems to agree. Groshe de construes the words οὐδὲν ἐφέρας, with οὐδὲν ἔθηκας. 2. Give no notice of that man by a letter. But the phrase in that sense is not common. See Benson on the passage.
2. Keep no company with him, that he may be ashamed. — From this and other passages, particularly Matt. xviii. 15—17. Tit. iii. 10. and ver. 6. of this chapter, it appears that Christ had established a wholesome discipline in his church, to be exercised by the pastors and people for reclaiming those who sin. This discipline does not consist in corporal punishment, imprisonments, fines, and civil incapacities; but in the administration of admonitions and rebukes. When there are without effect, and the offender continues unrepentant, he is to be excluded from joining the church in the office of religion. In that case, however, the faithful must not lose, either their affection for the offending party, or their hope of his recovery; but must continue to admonish him as a brother, till he appears incorrigible. When this happens, he is to be cast out of the society, and avoided as a sinner. But the word οὐκ ἐκτιμήσῃς, except in the offices of humanity, would be dangerous. Matt. xviii. 17.

Ver. 16. — 1. The Lord of peace. — The apostle calls Christ 'the Lord of peace,' in allusion to Isa. ix. 6, where he is foretold under the character of 'the Prince of peace,' because he was to reconcile Jews and Gentiles to God and to one another, making peace between God and them; and 'making of two one new man,' whose members are to live in peace with one another. — This prayer the apostle subjoins to the foregoing command, in imitation of Christ, if there are some who still walk among you disorderly. — From this it appears, that, after writing the former letter, the apostle had received a particular account of the state of the Thessalonian church. Probably the messenger who carried that letter gave him an account of their affairs at his return, or

Lord be with you all.

17 The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: thus I write.

18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

2. The Lord be with you all.—This wish is founded on Christ's promise, Matt. xxviii. 20. "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." With this promise Paul may have been made acquainted by revelation. Ver. 17. The salutation, &c. which is the token in every epistle.—Paul commonly employed one to write, or at least to make a fair copy of his letters, especially if they were of any length. Wherefore, as impostors had now begun to forge letters in his name, of which he learned many instances of that fraud, he wrote the salutation in all his letters with his own hand. And that the faithful at Thessalonica might be able to distinguish his genuine letters from such as were forged, he desired them to take particular notice of that mark. It seems the apostle's converts were generally acquainted with his handwriting.—Describing inscriptions, that Paul may have dictated some of his epistles, while his hands were employed in the labours of his occupation of tent-making; and says, This may account for some small inaccuracies of style at which little minds have been offended, but which good judges easily know how to excuse.

CONCLUSION.

As the first epistle to the Thessalonians contains a formal proof of the divine original of the gospel, founded on the knowledge and experience of the persons to whom it was addressed, its primary intention was to establish them in the faith of the gospel. Yet, like the other inspired writings, it was calculated for the benefit of all the churches of Christ to the end of the world. Accordingly, it has been of singular use to them in every age; for from it we learn what the facts and circumstances were on which the apostles built their pretensions to a divine commission, and by which they persuaded mankind to embrace the gospel. And our knowledge of these facts and circumstances leads us to believe, that the rapid progress of the gospel was owing neither to fraud nor to enthusiasm, nor to the power of the sword, but to the excellent nature of the gospel; the holy lives of its first preachers and professors; the undeniable miracles which the apostles wrought in proof of their mission from God; the gifts of the Spirit which they bestowed on their converts; the witness which they bore to the resurrection of their master; and their appealing to that great miracle, in proof that, according to his promise, he will return from heaven to reward the righteous, and to punish the wicked. For these being matters of fact, obvious to the senses of mankind, the vulgar, equally with the learned, were able to judge of them; and, being strongly impressed by them, great numbers of them became Christ's disciples. Wherefore, although no miracles are now wrought in confirmation of the gospel, and the spiritual gifts have long ago ceased in the church, we have still abundant evidence of the divinity of our religion. The first epistle to the Thessalonians affords a convincing proof, that the gospel was established in the chief city of the province of Macedonia by its own intrinsic excellence, accompanied with miracles and with the exercise of the spiritual gifts, notwithstanding the philosophers, of whom there were many in Thessalonica, endeavoured to overturn it by reasoning; and the unbelieving Jews, to stop its progress, stirred up the heathens to persecute those who professed it. For the miracles and spiritual gifts which accompanied the preaching of the gospel, rendered it superior to all opposition.

The second epistle to the Thessalonians, although it was written to correct a particular error, being an illustrious monument of the inspiration of its author, affords to us who live in these latter times an additional, and I may say an increasing evidence of the truth of our religion. Certain false teachers, by misinterpreting an expression or two in the apostle's first epistle, had made the Thessalonians believe, that the coming of Christ to raise the dead and carry the righteous into heaven was at hand, and thereby had occasioned them to neglect their worldly affairs. To undeceive them, the apostle, in his second epistle, assured them, that before the coming of Christ a great apostasy or defection from the true faith and practice of the gospel would take place in the church; that that defection would not happen all at once, but would proceed by slow degrees to the height and extent determined; and that to carry it to that height, a long series of ages was requisite. And to shew that the apostasy would be of a long continuance, the apostle foretold the particulars of which it was to consist, described the persons by whom it was to be introduced, and discovered the vile arts by which they were to establish it. Withal, that the Thessalonians might not be too much affrighted with the foresight of the evils which the apostasy would occasion, and that the faithful who beheld these evils might not be tempted to think God had cast off all care of his church, the apostle foretold that the apostasy would be destroyed—but in a gradual manner as it had been introduced; and even described the means by which it would be destroyed; namely, by the scriptures put into the hands of the people, and by the preaching of the true doctrine of the gospel out of the scriptures; so that the eyes of the people, long blinded by the arts of the deceivers, being opened, they would at length discern and acknowledge the truth.—No events similar to those having ever taken place in any prior age of the world, the prediction of them by the apostle, and their happening exactly as they were foretold to us, who have seen the rise and progress, and begun destruction of the apostasy, are such a demonstration of the inspiration of St. Paul, and of the truth of our religion, as cannot be gainsaid.

The matters contained in the two epistles to the Thessalonians being of such importance, we may believe that the presidents of the Thessalonian church, in obedience to the apostle's adjuration in his first epistle, took care to have both of them frequently read to the people in their public assemblies; who, considering them as expressions of their spiritual father's love to them, and of his earnest concern for their salvation, would hear them read with pleasure, and be greatly strengthened and comforted by them.—May the reading of these excellent writings have the same happy effects on the disciples of Christ, to the end of time!
I. TIMOTHY.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—The History of Timothy's Conversion to Christianity.

Paul and Barnabas, in the course of their first apostolic journey among the Gentiles, having come to Lystra, a city of Lyciaonia, in the Lesser Asia, Acts xiv. 6, preached there some time, and converted a pious Jewish woman, named Lois, with her daughter Eunice, whose husband, it is thought, was then dead, 2 Tim. i. 5.—Soon after this, Timothy, Eunice's son, who had been brought up by his mother and grandmother in the Jewish religion, and in the knowledge of the scriptures, 2 Tim. iii. 15, being greatly affected by the apostle's discourses, believed.—From the time of his conversion, Timothy made such proficiency in the knowledge of the gospel, and was so remarkable for the sanctity of his manners, as well as for his zeal in the cause of Christ, that he attracted the esteem of all the brethren in those parts. Accordingly, when the apostle came from Antioch in Syria to Lystra, the second time, they so praised Timothy, that 'he would have to go forth with him,' Acts xvi. 2, 3. The testimony of the brethren, however, was not the only reason of this choice. Timothy was pointed out as a fit person to be ordained an evangelist, by a revelation made either to Paul himself, or to some of the Christian prophets in Lystra, 1 Tim. i. 18. In the mean time, Timothy, though a Jew, not having been circumcised by reason that his father was a Greek or Gentile, it was proper he should bear that mark of his descent; because, without it, the Jews would have looked on him as a Gentile, and have despised his instructions. This, and not any opinion that circumcision was necessary to salvation, determined the apostle to propose, and Timothy to receive the rite by which the Jews, from the earliest times, had been distinguished from the rest of mankind. Afterwards, the eldership in Lystra, the more strongly to impress Timothy with a sense of the importance of the function he had undertaken, solemnly set him apart to the office of an evangelist, by the laying on of their hands, 1 Tim. iv. 14, and by prayer. This was followed by the laying on of the apostle's hands, for the purpose of communicating to Timothy the gifts of the Holy Ghost, 2 Tim. i. 6.

Timothy, thus prepared to be the apostle's fellow-labourer in the gospel, accompanied him and Silas when they visited the churches of Phrygia, and delivered to them the decrees of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, freeing the Gentiles from the law of Moses as a term of salvation. Having gone through these countries, they at length came to Troas, where Luke joined them, as appears from the phraseology of his history, Acts xvi. 10, 11, &c.—In Troas, as was mentioned, Pref. to 1 Thess. sect. 1, a vision appeared to Paul, directing them to go into Macedonia. Loosing therefore from Troas, they all passed over to Neapolis, and from thence went to Philippi, where they converted many, and planted a Christian church. From Philippi they went to Thessalonica, leaving Luke at Philippi; as appears from his changing the phraseology of his history at ver. 40. We may therefore suppose that, at their departing, they committed the converted at Philippi to Luke's care.—In Thessalonica they were opposed by the unbelieving Jews, and obliged to flee to Berea, whither the Jews from Thessalonica followed them. To elucidate their rage, Paul, who was most obnoxious to them, departed from Berea by night to go to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy in Berea. At Athens Timothy came to the apostle, and gave him such an account of the affected state of the Thessalonian brethren, as induced him to send Timothy back to comfort them. See Pref. to 1 Thess. sect. 1.—After that, Paul preached at Athens; but with so little success, that he judged it proper to leave Athens, and go forward to Corinth, where Silas and Timothy came to him, and assisted in converting the Corinthians. And when he left Corinth, they accompanied him, first to Ephesus, then to Jerusalem, and after that to Antioch in Syria.—Having spent some time in Antioch, Paul set out with Timothy on his third apostolic journey, in which, after visiting all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, in the order in which they had been planted, they came to Ephesus the second time, and there abode long. In short, from the time Timothy first joined the apostle as his assistant, he never left him, except when sent by him on some special errand. And by his affection, fidelity, and zeal, he so recommended himself to all the disciples, and acquired such authority among them, that Paul inserted his name in the inscription of several of the letters which he wrote to the churches, to shew that their doctrine was one and the same. His esteem and affection for Timothy the apostle expressed still more conspicuously, by writing to him those excellent letters in the canon which bear his name; and which have been of the greatest use to the ministers of the gospel, ever since their publication, by directing them to discharge all the duties of their function in a proper manner.

Sect. II.—Of the Time when the First Epistle to Timothy was written.

In the third verse of the first chapter of this epistle, the apostle saith, 'As I entreated thee to abide in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, so do: that thou mayest charge some not to teach differently.' From this it is plain, 1. That Timothy was in Ephesus when the apostle wrote his first letter to him.—2. That he had been left there by the apostle, who, at parting with him, entreated him to abide in Ephesus.—3. That this happened when Paul was going from Ephesus into Macedonia.—And, 4. That he entreated Timothy to abide in Ephesus, for the purpose of charging some teachers in that church not to teach differently from the apostles.

In the history of the Acts of the Apostles, there is no mention of Paul's going from Ephesus into Macedonia but once; namely, after the riot of Demetrius, Acts xx. 1. For which reason, Theodoret among the ancients, and among the moderns, Estius, Baronius, Capelius, Grosliius, Lightfoot, Salmisius, Hammond, Witsius, Lardner, Benson, and others, have given it as their opinion, that the apostle speaks of that journey in his first epistle to Timothy. Yet, if I am not mistaken, the following circumstances will shew their opinion to be ill-founded.

1. When the apostle went from Ephesus into Macedonia, as related Acts xx. 1. Timothy was not in Ephesus, having gone from that city into Macedonia with Eratus, by the apostle's direction, Acts xii. 22. And in the first epistle to the Corinthians, which was written after Timothy's departure from Ephesus, we are informed, that he was to go from Macedonia to Corinth, 1 Cor. iv. 7. 'I have sent to you Timothy.—1 Cor. xvi. 10. 'If Timothy be come, take care that he be among you without fear.' Vers. 11. 'Send him forward in peace, that he may come to me: for I expect him with the brethren.'
But before Timothy returned from Corinth, the apostle left Ephesus, and went into Macedonia, where the brethren above mentioned met him. 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13, having Timothy in their company; as is plain from his joining the apostle in Macedonia, in his second epistle to the Corinthians, which all agree was written from Macedonia, immediately after the brethren from Corinth gave the apostle an account of the success of his first letter. Wherefore, since Timothy was not in Ephesus when the apostle left that city after the riot, it could not be the occasion on which the apostle said to him, 'As I entreated thee to abide in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, so do.' But the journey into Macedonia, of which he speaks, must have been some other journey not mentioned in the Acts. — To remove this difficulty, we are told, that Timothy returned from Corinth to the apostle, before his departure from Ephesus, and that he was left there after the riot; but that something happened, which occasioned him to follow the apostle into Macedonia; that there he joined him in writing his second epistle to the Corinthians; and having finished his business in Macedonia, he returned to Ephesus, and abode; agreeably to the apostle's request. But as these suppositions are not warranted by the history of the Acts, Timothy's joining the apostle in his second epistle to the Corinthians may still be urged as a proof, that he came with the brethren directly from Corinth to Macedonia. — Further, that Timothy did not go from Macedonia to Ephesus, after joining the apostle in his second epistle to the Corinthians, but returned with him to Corinth to receive the collections, I think is plain from Acts xx. 4, where he is mentioned as one of those who accompanied Paul from Corinth to Jerusalem, with the collections.

2. When the apostle wrote his first epistle to Timothy, 'he hoped to come to him soon,' chap. iii. 14. But, from the history of the Acts, it is certain, that in no letter written to Timothy after the riot, till his first confinement in Rome, could the apostle say, that 'he hoped to come to him soon.' He could not say so in any letter written from Troas, the first place he stopped at after leaving Ephesus: For at that time he was going into Macedonia and Achaia, to receive the collections from the churches in these provinces. Neither could he say so, after writing his second epistle to the Corinthians from Macedonia: For in that epistle he told the Corinthians he was coming to them with the Macedonian brethren, who were commissioned to attend him in his voyage to Jerusalem with the collections, 2 Cor. x. 4, and that he meant to sail directly from Corinth to Judea, 2 Cor. i. 16. — As little could he write to Timothy, that 'he hoped to come to him soon,' when he altered his resolution on occasion of the lying in wait of the Jews, and returned into Macedonia, Acts xx. 3: For he was then in such haste to be in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, that when he came to Miletus, instead of going to Ephesus, he sent for the elders of that church to come to him, Acts xx. 16, 17. — When he arrived in Judea, he could not write that 'he hoped to come to Ephesus soon;' for he was imprisoned a few days after he went up to Jerusalem. And having continued two years in prison at Cesarea, he was sent bound to Rome, where likewise being confined, he could not, till towards the conclusion of that confinement, write to Timothy, that 'he hoped to come to him soon.' And even then he did not write his first epistle to Timothy: For Timothy was with him at the conclusion of his confinement, Phil. ii. 19—23.

3. From the first epistle we learn, that the following were the errors Timothy was left in Ephesus to oppose: Fables invented by the Jewish doctors to recommend the observance of the law of Moses as necessary to salvation; Uncertain genealogies, by which individuals endeavoured to trace their descent from Abraham, in the persuasion that they would be saved merely because they had Abraham to their father: Intricate questions and strifes about some words in the law: Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, who reckoned that which produced most gain to be the best kind of godliness; and opposers of knowledge falsely so named. — But these errors had not taken place in the Ephesian church before the apostle's departure: for in his charge to the Ephesian elders at Miletus he foretold, that the false teachers were to enter among them after his departing, Acts xx. 29. 'I know, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock.' 30. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them.' The same thing appears from the two epistles which the apostle wrote to the Corinthians; the one from Ephesus before the riot of Demetrius, the other from Macedonia after that event; and from the epistle which he wrote to the Ephesians themselves from Rome, during his confinement there: For in none of these letters is there any notice taken of the above mentioned errors, as subsisting among the Ephesians at the time they were written; which cannot be accounted for on supposition that they were prevalent in Ephesus, when the apostle went into Macedonia after the riot. I am therefore of opinion, that the first to Timothy, in which the apostle desired him to abide in Ephesus for the purpose of opposing the Judaizers and their errors, could not be written, either from Troas or from Macedonia, after the riot, as those who contend for the early date of that epistle suppose; But it must have been written some time after the apostle's release from his confinement in Rome, when, no doubt, he visited the church at Ephesus, and found the Judaizing teachers there busily employed in spreading their pernicious errors.

4. In the first epistle to Timothy, the same sort of persons, doctrines, and practices, are reproved, which are condemned in the second. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 1—6, with 2 Tim. iii. 1—5, and 1 Tim. vi. 20, with 2 Tim. ii. 14, and 1 Tim. vi. 4, with 2 Tim. ii. 16. — The same commands, instructions and encouragements, are given to Timothy in the first epistle as in the second. Compare 1 Tim. vi. 13, 14, with 2 Tim. iv. 1—5. — The same remedies for the corruptions which had taken place among the Ephesians, are prescribed in the first epistle as in the second. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 14, with 2 Tim. i. 6, 7. — And as in the second epistle, so in the first, every thing is addressed to Timothy, as superintendent both of the teachers and of the laity in the church of Ephesus: All which I think imply, that the state of things among the Ephesians was the same when the two epistles were written; consequently, that the first epistle was written only a few months before the second, and not long before the apostle's death.

These arguments appear so convincing to Pearson, Le Clerc, L'Enfant, Cave, Fabricius, Mill, Whitefield, and others, that they were unanimously of opinion, Timothy was left by the apostle in Ephesus, as he went into Macedonia, not after the riot of Demetrius, but after he was released from his first confinement in Rome. And from that circumstance they infer, that he did not write his first epistle to Timothy till some time in the end of the year 64, or in the beginning of 65. I think it was written from Nicopolis. See Pref. to Titus, sect. 1.

To the late date of the first epistle there are three plausible objections, which must not be overlooked.

Object 1. It is thought, that if the first epistle to Timothy was written so early, he could not, with any propriety, have said to Timothy, chap. iv. 12. 'Let no man despise thy youth.' — But it is replied, That Servius Tullius, in classing the Roman people, as Aulus Gallius relates, lib. x. c. 38, divided their age into three periods: — Childhead, he limited to the age of seven-
PREFACE TO I. TIMOTHY.

SECTION III.

Of the Occasion of Writing the First Epistle to Timothy.

After Paul was released from his bonds in Rome, and Timothy had returned to him from Philippi, whether he had sent him, Phil. ii. 19. it is reasonable to suppose, that they went together into Judea to visit the Hebrews, according to the apostle's promise, Heb. xiii. 23, taking Crete in their way. And having exhorted and comforted the brethren in Judea, who were greatly distressed by the tumults which brought on the war with the Romans, they departed to visit the Colossian and Ephesian churches; the latter of which merited the apostle's particular attention, on account of the pains he had been at in planting it, as well as on account of the number and quality of its members. See these things more fully narrated, Pref. to Titus, sect. 1.

On his arrival at Ephesus, finding the false teachers busy in spreading their errors, he no doubt rebuked them sharply, and charged them to teach the true doctrine of the gospel. And because the neighbouring churches of Asia, by reason of their frequent intercourse with the Ephesian brethren, might be either greatly profited, or greatly hurt, according as truth or error prevailed in Ephesus, the apostle, when going from that city into Macedonia, judged it necessary that Timothy should remain there, for the purpose of restraining the false teachers, by publicly confuting their errors, and condemning their evil practices.

But Timothy being young, and the true committed to him being weighty, the apostle, after his departure, wrote to him this excellent letter from Philippi, or rather from Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12, to direct him in the discharge of his duty, and, at the same time, to establish his authority with the Ephesians. Agreeably to this design, the commission given to Timothy, at parting, to oppose the false teachers, is mentioned; and the particular errors he was to condemn, together with the truths he was to inculcate, are specified in chap. i. For the same purpose, in chap. ii. the apostle prescribed the manner in which the public worship of God was to be performed in the church at Ephesus. And, because it was necessary that Timothy should be assisted by a sufficient number of well-qualified fellow-labourers in the ministry, the apostle, in chap. iii. explained the qualifications of the persons he was to ordain as bishops and deacons.-In chap. iv. he foretold the heresies which were to prevail in the church in after-times, and the mischief which they would occasion, that the faithful might be sensible these things did not happen by accident, but were permitted of God, and would be directed to an unhappy issue.-In chap. v. he instructed Timothy in the right method of admonishing the old and the young of both sexes; and mentioned the age and character of such widows, as were to be employed by the church in teaching the younger women the principles of religion.-Lastly, in chap. vi. he described the duties which Timothy was to inculcate on slaves; condemned strifes about words, and perverse disputations; spake strongly against the inordinate love of money; and required him to charge the rich to be rich in faith and good works.

With these directions and rules to Timothy, in his character of superintendent of the church at Ephesus, the apostle mixed many earnest charges to him, in his character as an evangelist, to shew himself a pattern of all the virtues which he recommended to others; and, considering the excellency of Timothy's disposition, and his great veneration for the apostle, it cannot be doubted that he observed the directions and charges contained in this letter with the most religious anxiety. There is no reason to think his labours at Ephesus were so blessed of God, that the false doctrines and corrupt practices of the Judaizing teachers in that city were for a while repressed. For at the time the epistle to the church of Ephesus was written, she seems to have maintained an excellent character, as appears from what is expressed in that letter, Rev. ii. 1-7.

Sect. IV.—Of the Use which the Church, in every Age, is to make of St. Paul’s Epistles to Timothy and Titus.

Though the errors of the Judaizing teachers in Ephesus, which gave rise to the apostle’s epistles to Timothy, have long ago disappeared, the epistles themselves are still of great use, as they serve to shew the impiety of the principles from which these errors proceeded. For the same principles are apt, in every age, to produce errors and vices, which, though different in name from those which prevailed in Ephesus in the apostle’s days, are precisely of the same kind, and equally pernicious.—These epistles are likewise of great use in the church, as they exhibit to Christian bishops and deacons, in every age, the most perfect idea of the duties of their function; teach the manner in which these duties should be performed; describe the qualifications necessary in those who aspire to such holy and honourable offices, and explain the ends for which these offices were originally instituted, and are still continued in the church.

The very same things, indeed, the apostle, about the same time, wrote to Titus in Crete: but more briefly, because he was an older and more experienced minister than Timothy. Nevertheless, the repetition of these precepts and charges is not without its use to the church still, as it maketh us more deeply sensible of their great importance: Not to mention, that in the epistle to Titus there are things peculiar to itself, which enhance its value. In short, the epistles to Timothy and Titus, taken together, containing a full account of the qualifications and duties of the ministers of the gospel, may be considered as a complete body of divinely inspired ecclesiastical canons, to be observed by the Christian clergy of all communions, to the end of the world.

These epistles, therefore, ought to be read frequently, and with the greatest attention, by those in every age and country who hold the sacred order, or who have it in view to obtain them; not only that they may regulate their conduct according to the directions contained in them, but that, by meditating seriously on the solemn charges delivered to the apostle, in the persons of Timothy and Titus, their minds may be strongly impressed with a sense of the importance of their function, and of the obligation which lieth on them to be faithful in discharging the duties in respect of which they be considered, as the apostle Paul as making one great community, which he sometimes called the church of God, sometimes the body of Christ, and sometimes the house or temple of God; as is evident from Eph. ii. 19. Ye belong to the house of God: 20. Being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the bottom corner-stone. 21. By which the whole building being aptly joined together, growth into an holy temple for the Lord. 22. In which ye also are built together for an habitation of God by the Spirit.”—This account of the house, temple, or church of God, sheweth, that no particular society of Christians, however numerous or pure, is the church of the living God,” exclusively of all other Christian societies; but that the appellation belongs to every society of believers who hold the doctrines contained in the scriptures, and who worship God in the manner there prescribed: And that the whole of these churches, taken collectively, is the pillar and support of the truth.” For if the apostle had spoken of any particular church, as the pillar and support of the truth, exclusively of the rest, not the church at Rome, but the church at Ephesus, must have been that church; because Timothy, in this epistle, was instructed 'how to behave himself in the church of the living God' at Ephesus, and not at Rome. 'Nevertheless, not even the church at Ephesus was called by the apostle 'the church of the living God,' exclusively of all the other churches of Christ, else he excluded the churches at Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Colosse, and the rest, from being churches of the living God, notwithstanding they were planted by himself. But this no reasonable person will believe.—Therefore, the claim of the church of Rome to be the only Catholic church, if they mean to exclude all those who are not of their communion from being churches of Christ, ought to be rejected with contempt, because it is an usurpation manifestly contrary to scripture.

In proof, however, that the Romish church is 'the only church of the living God,' which is 'the pillar and support of the truth,' the Papists appeal to Christ's promise to 'build his church on Peter as on a rock;' and boldly affirm, that the church which he was to build on Peter, was the church afterwards to be planted at Rome. But since, in speaking to Peter, Christ mentioned no particular church as to be built on him; also, since it is not pretended that the church at Rome, or any of the Gentile churches, was planted by him, there is no reason to think, that the church which Christ was to build on Peter was the church at Rome. Our Lord spake of his universal church, which, it is well known, was built, not on Peter alone, but 'on the foundation of all the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the bottom cornerstone,' as declared in the before-cited passage, Ephes. ii. 19–22.—Further, the church to be built on Peter was to be of such stability, that, 'the gates of hell were never to prevail against it.' Both this character belong to the church at Rome, or to any particular church built by any of the apostles? It belongs to the Catholic church alone. For notwithstanding some particular churches, of which the Catholic church is composed, have been, and others may yet be overthrown, they will at no time be all destroyed; but as in times past, so in times to come, there will always, somewhere, be societies of Christians, who maintain the true faith and worship enjoined in the gospel. So that, while the world standeth, the church of Christ shall at no time be extinct.—Thus it appears, that the church of the living God, which is the pillar and support of the truth, and against which the gates of hell shall never prevail, is no particular church, but the Catholic or universal church, consisting of all the churches of God, which have existed from the beginning, and which shall exist to the end of the world.

3. In opposition to the claims of the Papists I observe, that as there is no reason for thinking the Romish church 'the only church of the living God,' so there is no reason for thinking her 'the only pillar and support of the truth;' by virtue of any powers which her bishops, as Peter's successors, have received from Christ, to determine infallibly what is true doctrine and what false; and to remit or retain sins authoritatively. By Christ's promise, 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven,' infallibility in doctrine was not confined to Peter. The same promise, and in the same words, was made to all the apostles, Matt. xvii. 18.—In like manner, the power of remitting and retaining sins was bestowed, not on Peter singly, but on him with the rest of the apostles: not, however, as bishops of particular churches, but as persons who were to be endowed with the gift of inspiration, to render them infallible in doctrine and discipline. This appears from John xx. 21, where Christ said to his apostles in general, 'As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. 22. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. 23. Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.'

Granting, however, for argument's sake, that the powers of declaring infallibly what doctrines are true and what false, and of remitting and retaining sins, had actually been bestowed on Peter alone, as the Papists contend, the bishops of Rome cannot claim these powers, as Peter's successors, unless they can shew, not only that they were bestowed on Peter, as bishop of the church which was afterwards to be planted at Rome, but also that they were promised to his successors in that charge. Now, that these powers were bestowed on Peter as an apostle, and not as the future bishop of Rome, hath been sufficiently proved already. And that they were not promised to the bishops of Rome, as Peter's successors, is absolutely certain; because neither in what Christ said to Peter, when he bestowed these powers on him, nor in any other passage of scripture, is there the least insinuation that they were to descend to his successors in the bishoprick of a church which did not then exist. Therefore, the powers of binding and loosing, and of remitting and retaining sins, which the bishops of Rome have arrogated to themselves as Peter's successors, not being warranted by scripture, ought to be strenuously opposed as an usurpation spiritual tyranny, destructive of the religious liberty of Christians.

3. In opposition to the bold pretensions of the Papists, I moreover affirm, that the claims of the Romish church to be 'the pillar and support of the truth,' by virtue of the power of making laws for the government of the Catholic church, both in spirituals and temporals, which all Christians are bound to obey, and which the Papists, without any proof, contend, belongs to the bishops of Rome as Peter's successors, have no foundation in scripture.

The Papists, indeed, as we are informed by the Rhemish translators of the New Testament, in their note on Matt. xvi. 19, assure us, 'That the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' which Christ promised to give to Peter, 'signify the height of government, the power of making laws, of calling councils, of the principal voice in them, of confirming them, of making canons and wholesome decrees, of arrogating the contrary, of ordaining bishops and pastors, of deposing and suspending them, finally, the power to dispense the goods of the church both spiritual and temporal; which signification of pre-eminent power and authority by the word keys, the scripture expresseth in many places.—Moreover, it signifieth that men cannot come into heaven, but by him, the keys signifying also authority to open and shut, as it is said of Christ, Apoc. iii. 7. 'Who hath the key of David: He shall open, and no man shutteh, by which words we gather, that Peter's power is marvellous, to whom the keys, that is the power to open and shut heaven, is given.' All these powers, the Papists contend, were bestowed on Peter, in the metaphorical promise of 'giving him the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' But before this is admitted, they ought to shew, by better proofs than they have hitherto produced, that these paramount extensive powers were signified by the word keys.

The only proofs to which they appeal are, the promise to Peter, 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth,' &c. and the promise to the apostles in general, 'Whosoever sins ye remit, are remitted,' &c. But these promises are no certain evidence, that the high powers and prerogatives above-mentioned were conferred on Peter under the name of the keys; because the power of binding and loosing, and of remitting and retaining sins, easily admit of a different and more rational interpretation, as shall be shewed by and by.—Further, that by promising to Peter 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' together with the powers of 'binding and loosing,' and of 'remitting and retaining sins.' Christ did not confer on him supreme and uncontrolled authority over his brethren apostles, and over the Catholic church, is clear from Christ's own words, Luke xxii. 24. 'There was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. 25. And he said to them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; but ye shall not be so. 26. But he who is greatest among you shall be the servant of all. And he that shall be the least among you all, the same shall be greatest.'— Matt. xxiii. 8. 'Be not ye called Rabbi, for one is your master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren.'—

Peter, having thus expressly forbidden any one of his apostles to usurp authority over the rest; also having declared them all brethren, that is, equals in authority, is it to be supposed that the keys of the kingdom of heaven, he subjected to him the rest of the apostles, together with all who at that time believed on Christ? Farther, allowing, that by the powers of binding and loosing, of remitting and retaining sins, Christ actually meant, as the Papists contend, the powers of making laws, and of establishing constitutions of discipline binding on the whole community of Christians, can any reasonable person believe that these powers were conferred on Peter exclusively of the rest of the apostles, who recollects that these powers were afterwards conferred on all the apostles? Powers of such magnitude, said to be bestowed on Peter, and through him conferred on the bishops of Rome, ought not to be acknowledged on doubtful evidence, and far less on no evidence at all; as that certainly must be reckoned, which is contradicted by Christ himself.—This, however, is not all. We know, that by 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' and the powers of 'binding and loosing,' &c. Peter himself did not understand 'the height of government, the power of making laws, of calling councils,' &c.; neither did he fancy that the prerogatives were conferred on him singly. For at no time did he either exercise or claim authority over his brethren apostles. As little did he assume the sole government of all the churches of Christ planted in his lifetime. More particularly, he did not call the Council of Jerusalem, which met to determine the question concerning the circumcision of the converted Gentiles. Neither did he preside in it. That office the apostle James seems to have performed. For, as president of the Council, he summed up the debate, and dictated the decree, by which the Gentiles were freed from obedience to the law of Moses, as a term of salvation.—Lastly, no instance can be produced of Peter's opening heaven to any one, or of his shutting it against any one, according to his own pleasure.—How ridiculous, then, must it appear in the bishops of Rome, to assume powers and prerogatives, as Peter's successors, which we are certain Peter himself never pretended either to possess or to exercise!—See Gal. ii. 14. note.

These things considered, may not 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' and the powers of 'binding and loosing,' which was promised to Peter in common with the other apostles, Matt. xxviii. 18, may be interpreted of his being inspired, as an apostle, to declare infallibly the laws of the gospel, (see Harmony of the Gospels, sect. 74, p. 317.), rather than of his being authorized to pronounce excommunications, anathemas, degradations, and other censures and penalties or punishments, as the Rhemish translators of the New Testament affirm; which sentences are all ratified in heaven. In like manner, the power of 'remitting and retaining sins,' which was promised to all the apostles, may more naturally be interpreted of their being enabled by inspiration to declare whose sins, according to the tenor of the gospel, are to be forgiven, and whose sins are not to be forgiven; than to interpret it, as the Romanists do, of a power granted to their priests to pardon and absolve sinners, on their performing the penitential works of praying, fasting, alms, and other penances of human invention; and, if these are not performed, to continue the sinner under the guilt of his sins, though truly pardoned, and to send him to purgatory, till released by the efficacy of their prayers and masses. See James v. 14, 15, 16. notes.

In opposition to the high claims of the bishops of Rome as Peter's successors, I observe that they cannot prove, by good historical evidence, Peter's having ever been a bishop of the church at Rome; consequently they cannot be his successors in a see which he never filled. It is true, to prove that Peter was the first bishop of the church at Rome, the following testimonies from the fathers are appealed to by the Papists:—Irenæus, who was bishop of Lyons in Gaul, and who flourished about the year 172, tells us, 'that Linus was the first bishop of Rome, by Peter and Paul, and after him Anacletus, and the third Clemens.' Tertullian, who flourished about the year 200, saith, 'Clemens was the first bishop of Rome after Peter.' See Fulke's note on Rom. xvi. 16, in his edition of the Rheims New Testament.—Eusebius, who flourished about the year 315, in his E. Hist. b. 3. c. 2, without limiting that either Paul or Peter were bishops of Rome, thus writeth: 'After the martyrdom of Paul and Peter, Linus first obtained the episcopate of the church of the Romans.—Of him, Paul writing to Timothy, makes mention in the salutation in the end of the epistle, saying, Eubulus, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, salute thee.' The same Eusebius adds: 'Peter was the first bishop of Antioch.' E. Hist. b. 3. c. 36. 'At the same time flourished Ignatius, who is still highly honoured, being the second in the succession of the church of Antioch after Peter.' But in chap. 23. of the same book Eusebius saith, 'Eudocius being who was the first bishop of Antioch, Ignatius succeeded him.'—Jerome, who flourished about the year 329, saith, 'Peter sat at Rome 25 years, until the last year of Nero. If so, Peter came to Rome in the second or third of Claudius, and from that time forth had his ordinary residence among the Christians in Rome, as their bishop, till his death. Yet the same Jerome, in his book of illustrious men, chap. 16. calleth "Ignatius the third bishop of the church of Antioch after the apostle Peter."—Damascus, who was himself a bishop of Rome, and contemporary with Jerome, saith, "Peter came to Rome in the beginning of Nero's reign, and sat there 25 years." But as Nero reigned only 14 years, if the testimony of Damascus is to be credited, we must believe that Peter survived Nero 11 years, and was not put to death at his own will. Especially as the proposed sense of the promise is agreeable to the fact. Acts ii. 14-10, and is founded on Dan. ii. 44., where the erection of the Christian church is foretold under the idea of a kingdom which the God of heaven was to set up, and which was never to be destroyed.

—For the same reasons, the power of 'binding and loosing,' which was promised to Peter in common with the other apostles, Matt. xxviii. 18, may be interpreted of his being inspired, as an apostle, to declare infallibly 3 K
The reports of the ancients concerning Peter's being the first bishop of Rome are not so different and so inconsistent, as is a proof that these reports were not founded on any certain tradition, far less on any written evidence; but took their rise, in all probability, from the bishops of Rome themselves, who very early attempted to raise themselves above all other bishops; and for that purpose spake of themselves as Peter's successors in the see of Rome. And because, in the third and fourth centuries, when religious controversies were carried to a great height, and the churchmen who were put out of their places generally fled for redress to the bishops of Rome, it was natural for the oppressed to advance the power of their protectors, by readily admitting all the claims which they set up as Peter's successors. Nay, some of them may, from flattery, have invented the strange story of Peter's having sat as the bishop of Rome 25 years; notwithstanding, according to the ancient tradition already mentioned, he was the first bishop of Antioch. But the improbability of Peter's having resided in Rome, as bishop of the church there, for so many years, will appear from the following well known facts. Paul's epistle to the Romans was written a. u. 57 or 58, that is, in the third or fourth year of Nero, when, according to Jerome, Peter had acted as bishop of the church at Rome full 15 years. Now in that epistle, although many salutations were sent to persons of inferior note, no salutation was sent to Peter. This I think could not have happened, if Peter had been then residing in the church at Rome as its bishop. See Heb. xi. 25. In the letter which Paul wrote from Rome, during his first imprisonment, which lasted more than two years, he made no mention of Peter, not even in his letter to the Colossians, chap. iv. 10, 11, where he recites the names of all the brethren of the circumcision, who were his fellow-labourers in the kingdom of God. Is not this a strong presumption that Peter did not then reside in Rome as its bishop?—Towards the end of Paul's second imprisonment, he thus wrote to Timothy, 'At my first answer none one appeared with me, but all forsook me. May it not be laid to their charge?' If Peter then resided at Rome, as bishop of the church there, is it to be thought that he would have forsaken his brother apostle on so trying an occasion, when the testimony of Jesus was to be maintained before the emperor, or his prefect?—Lastly, is it probable that Paul, who never had been in Rome, and was personally unknown to most of the brethren there, would have written to them so long a letter to instruct them in the true doctrine of the gospel, and to compose the divisions which had taken place among them, if Peter had resided among them, and instructed them as their bishop, during the space of 25 years? Besides, would Paul, who, in his epistle to the Hebrews, hath so often mentioned the apostles, under the denomination of their rulers, have omitted, in his epistle to the Romans, to mention Peter, if he had been residing among them as their bishop at the time it was written?

Since, then, the most ancient Christian fathers, Tertullian excepted, mention Peter as the first bishop of Antioch; and since the testimonies concerning his being the first bishop of Rome are of a later date, and are in themselves not only different but inconsistent; also, since there are such strong presumptions in Paul's epistles, that Peter did not reside in Rome during Paul's lifetime, there is good reason to think that he never was bishop of the church at Rome. But if Peter never was bishop of Rome, the claim of the bishops of that church to be his successors in an office which he never held, is ridiculous. Wherefore, although it were true that the powers promised to Peter were promised, not only to him as the bishop of a particular church, but also to his successors in that episcopate, the bishops of Antioch, as his successors, would have a better title to these powers than the bishops of Rome.

If any more arguments were necessary to refute the extravagant claims of the bishops of Rome to infallibility in doctrine and discipline, the following well known facts might be mentioned as absolutely decisive. Different bishops of Rome, in different ages, have directly contradicted each other in their decisions concerning doctrine, as well as concerning discipline. The same may be said of councils, both general and particular, where the bishops of Rome have presided, either in person or by their legates. Where, then, is the so much vaunted infallibility of the bishops of Rome! And where the infallibility of councils, on which so much stress hath been laid both in ancient and modern times?

From the foregoing facts and reasonings it appears, that the church of Rome is not 'the church of the living God, which is the pillar and support of the truth,' exclusively of all other Christian churches. Far less is it 'the pillar and support of the truth,' by virtue of any infallibility which its bishops possess as Peter's successors in the bishoprick of Rome. The honour of supporting the truth, as shall be shewed immediately, belongs to no particular church whatever, but to the Catholic church, consisting of all the churches of God which have existed from the beginning, and which are up to the end of the world.—Further, it appears that the bishops of Rome have no just title to supreme authority over all the churches of Christ, as successors to the apostle Peter; because there is no certain evidence that he preceded them in the bishoprick of Rome. To conclude, the claim of the bishops of Rome to infallibility and supreme authority in the Catholic church, which they have founded on a fact so destitute of evidence as Peter's having been the bishop of Rome during 25 years, ought to be strenuously resisted by the whole Christian world, as subversive of the liberty wherewith Christ hath made mankind free in all religious matters.

If the sufficiency of the claim of the church of Rome to be 'the pillar and support of the truth,' will appear still more clearly, if we consider what the truth is, of which the church of the living God is the pillar and support.

The truth which is supported by the church of the living God, as by a pillar placed on a firm foundation, is not any particular system of doctrine, or any system of human invention, such as the symbols of faith, which, both in ancient and modern times, have been composed by convocations of the clergy, assembled in councils, whether general or particular, under the patronage of the civil powers. But the truth which is supported by the church of the living God, is that scheme of true religion, consisting of the doxologies, precepts, and promises, which God hath made known to mankind by revelation; and which having been consigned to writing by the apostles and prophets, to whom it was revealed by the Spirit, their gospels and epistles contain the truth, expressed in that 'form of sound words,' which the apostle Paul commanded Timothy 'to hold fast,' 2 Tim. i. 13.

Agreeably to this account of the truth, the gospel revelation is called the truth in the following passages of scripture—Gal. iii. 1. v. 7. Eph. i. 13. 2 Thess. ii. 16. 1 Tim. ii. 4. vi. 5. 2 Tim. ii. 15. 16. Tit. i. 1. and elsewhere.——The inspired writers having so often called the gospel revelation the truth, it can hardly be doubted, that when the apostle Paul, in his first epistle to Timothy, gave to the church of the living God the honourable appellation of 'the pillar and support of the truth,' he meant to tell him, that the Catholic church, by preserving in their original integrity the inspired writings of the evangelists and apostles, and of Moses and the prophets, which contain the revelations of God from first to last, have supported or preserved the truth in the world. For all the revelations of God to mankind being exhibited, in an indelible manner, in the writings sealed with their church, if any errors, either in faith or practice, are attempted to be introduced by false teachers, or by men covetous of power or of riches, they may be detected and refuted, not by appealing to the decrees of councils, and to the creeds of particular churches, but to the divinely inspired scriptures, fairly interpreted according to the plain unconstrained meaning of the passages which relate to these subjects, taken in connection with the context where they are found.

Thus it appears, that the universal church of the living God, preserving the scriptures in their original integrity, in which the whole revelations of God are contained, hath not only secured the truth of revelation itself from being shaken by the attempts of infidels to overthrow it, but has prevented its doctrine, precepts, and promises, from being corrupted by false teachers and worldly men, who endeavour to make gain of godliness. Moreover, by handing down the scriptures from age to age, in the church, the Catholic church hath prevented the revelations of God from being lost. And by so doing, the church of the living God hath actually become the pillar and support of the truth; because, if the scriptures had either been corrupted or lost, the revelations of God, which are the truth, would have been corrupted or lost together with them.

III. It remains to show in what way the divinely inspired scriptures, which contain the gospel revelation, which is the truth, have been preserved in their original integrity by the church of the living God.

Some of the writings of the New Testament were inscribed and sent to particular churches; such as Paul’s epistles to the Thessalonians, the Corinthians, the Romans, the Ephesians, and the Colossians. Others of them were written and sent to particular persons; such as his epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon; and John’s epistles to Gaius, and the Elect Lady. Others of them were inscribed and sent to persons professing the Christian faith, who were scattered through widely extended and distant countries; such as Paul’s epistles to the church of Galatia, and to the Hebrews; Peter’s two epistles to the strangers dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; and the epistle of James to the twelve tribes scattered abroad. These writings, though sent to particular churches and persons, were not intended for their use alone, but for the use of the whole community of Christians everywhere. It is therefore reasonable to believe, that while the particular churches and persons to whom the apostles sent their epistles, preserved the originals with the greatest care, they would transcribe them, not only for the use of their own members, but for the use of their brethren in other churches, to whom, no doubt, they sent these transcripts, that they might have an opportunity of taking copies of them, and of dispensing them for general edification. Moreover, as in the first age the disciples of Christ were very zealous in spreading the knowledge of their religion, we may believe that in whatever country they travelled for the purpose of preaching Christ, they carried with them such of the sacred writings as were in their possession, that their converts might take copies of them to be used in their public assemblies for worship, and by themselves in private. Thus, copies of the gospels and epistles were in a short time carried into all the provinces of the Roman empire, and even beyond the bounds of the empire, where the gospel was introduced. And these writings being considered by the disciples of Christ as their most precious treasure, the copies of them were preserved with much more care, and were multiplied to a far greater degree, than the copies of any other extant at that time: insomuch, that there is no longer writing existing, of which there are so many ancient MSS. copies remaining, as of the writings which compose the canon of the New Testament.

Of those ancient MSS. of the New Testament which still remain, some are found in the libraries of princes, universities, and monasteries, and some have been brought into Europe from different and distant parts of the world. These, added to the former, have considerably increased the number of the ancient copies of the scriptures; so that the learned of this and the preceding ages have had an opportunity of examining and comparing many very ancient copies, both of the whole New Testament, and of particular parts thereof. Accordingly, these learned men have, with incredible labour, faithfully collected all the various readings of the copies which they collated, and have found, that although in number these readings amount to many thousands, the greatest part of them make no material alteration in the sense of the passages where they are found. And with respect to those which alter the sense of particular passages, the same learned men, by that Critical skill for which they were famed, have been able in most instances, with a good degree of certainty, to fix upon the genuine readings of all the doubtful passages.

Every one, however, must be sensible, that if the scriptures had come down to us only in the copies preserved in any one church of the living God, and we had been restrained from consulting the copies preserved elsewhere, as we must have been if the scriptures had been entrusted to a particular church, the errors unavoidably occasioned by the carelessness of transcribers, and by other causes, could not in many instances have been corrected, unless by the uncertain conjectures of critics, which, in writings divinely inspired, would have been of no authority. Whereas, by consulting copies of the scriptures found in different and distant parts of the world, the faulty readings of one copy have been happily corrected by the concurrent better readings of other copies, confirmed by the readings preserved in the ancient translations of the scriptures still remaining; so that we have the text of the gospels and epistles as it was originally written by their inspired authors, or nearly so.—The world, therefore, being indebted for the preservation of the scriptures, not to any one church of the living God, but to the whole community of churches of Christ, each having contributed its share by the copies which it hath preserved, the universal church, and not any particular church, is the church of the living God, which, by preserving the scriptures, hath become in very deed the pillar and support of the truth.” See 1 Tim. vi. 20, note 1.

The same reasoning will apply to the ancient oracles of God, which were delivered to the Jews to be kept. For, by carefully preserving the Hebrew scriptures, in which the former revelations are recorded, and by handing them down from age to age uncorrupted, notwithstanding in their disputes with us Christians they had many temptations to corrupt them, the church of the living God among the Jews was to them, as the Christian church is to us, the pillar and support of the truth.

Here, however, it is to be carefully observed, that although the church of the living God hath supported the truth, by preserving the scriptures in which it is contained, neither the truth itself, nor the writings in which it is contained, derive any part of their authority from the Catholic church. The truth derives its authority from the inspiration by which it was made known to the evangelists and apostles; and the copies of the scriptures in our possession, which contain the truth or revelations of God, derive their authority, not from the church, but from their being materially the same with those written by the inspired penmen. And of this we are assured, in the same manner that we are assured of the genuineness of the writings of other ancient authors. Only the proofs in behalf of the authenticity of the scriptures, arising from the ancient copies of these writings in our possession, are more in number, and of greater weight, than the proofs which can be produced in behalf of the authenticity of any other ancient writing whatever.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

St. Paul began this epistle with asserting his apostolical dignity, not because Timothy was in any doubt concerning it, but to make the Ephesians sensible of the danger they incurred, if they rejected the charges and admonitions, which, by the commandment of God and of Christ, the apostle ordered Timothy to deliver to them, ver. 1, 2.—Next, to establish Timothy's authority with the Ephesians as an evangelist, he renewed the commission he had given him at parting; namely, to charge some who had agreed to the office of teachers, not to teach differently from the apostles, ver. 3.—And, in particular, not to draw the attention of the people to those fables which the Jewish doctors had invented to make men rely on the ritual services of the law as procuring the favour of God, notwithstanding they were utterly negligent of the duties of morality; neither to lay any stress on those endless genealogies whereby individuals traced their pedigree from Abrahams, in the persuasion that, to secure their salvation, nothing was necessary but to be rightly descended from him; an error which the Baptist, long before, had expressly condemned: Luke iii. 8. 'Begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father,' ver. 4.—This kind of doctrine the apostle termed vain babbling, because it had no foundation in truth, and made men negligent both of piety and charity, ver. 5, 6. —Further, because, in recommending these fables and genealogies, the Judasists pretended they were teaching the law of Moses, the apostle assured Timothy they were utterly ignorant of that law, ver. 7.—which he acknowledged to be a good institution, provided it was used lawfully; that is, agreeably to its true nature, ver. 8.—

NEW TRANSLATION.

Chap. 1.—1. Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour, and of the Lord Jesus Christ our hope;—

2. To Timothy, my genuine son in the faith; (genuine; grace, and (grace) peace, from God our Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord.

3. As I entreated thee to continue in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, so do thou that thou mayest charge some not to teach differently.

Ver. 1.—1. By the commandment of God.—This clause, if joined with what goes before, signifies that Paul was made an apostle by the commandment of God and of Christ. See Tit. 1. 3. note 1. But joined with what follows, the meaning is, that he wrote this epistle to Timothy by the commandment of God and of Christ. This construction I have adopted as most suitable to the apostle's design:—

2. To Timothy, who is my genuine son in the faith, being like minded with myself: May gracious assistances, merciful deliveries, such as I have often obtained, and inward peace from God our Father, and from Christ Jesus our Lord, be multiplied to thee.

3. As I entreated thee to continue in Ephesus, when I was going into Macedonia, I now, by the commandment of God, require thee so to do; that thou mayest charge the Judasists not to teach differently from the inspired apostles of Christ;

COMMENTARY.

Chap. 1.—1. Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, write this epistle by the commandment of God, the contriver of our salvation, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, on whose death, and not on the sacrifices of the law, our hope of eternal life is founded;—

2. To Timothy, who is my genuine son in the faith, being like minded with myself: May gracious assistances, merciful deliveries, such as I have often obtained, and inward peace from God our Father, and from Christ Jesus our Lord, be multiplied to thee.

3. As I entreated thee to continue in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, I now, by the commandment of God, require thee so to do; that thou mayest charge the Judasists not to teach differently from the inspired apostles of Christ;

because he had converted him, and thereby conveyed to him a new nature. We have the same phraseology, Phil. 1. 24. 'my son Onesimus, whom I beg of my bonds.' 1 Cor. iv. 19. 'To Christ Jesus, by the gospel, I have begotten you.'—Perhaps also the apostle called Timothy his genuine son, on account of his age, and because he resembled him in the disposition of his mind, his faith, his love, and his zeal in spreading the gospel, and the whole affairs of the church of Ephesus, it was of great importance that the Ephesians should know, that in all these matters he followed the commandment of God and Christ, delivered to him by the apostle: 2. Because Paul was made an apostle, not by the commandment of Christ, but by Christ himself, Acts xxvii. 20. 21.

2. Our Saviour.—This title is given to God in other passages, 1 Tim. ii. 3. 4. Tit. iii. 4. Jude ver. 5. Because he contrived the method of our salvation, and sent his Son into the world to accomplish it, John iii. 16.

3. Our hope.—The apostle hoped for salvation, not through the meritorious works of the law, as the Judasists did, but through the sacrifice for sin made by the death of Christ.

Ver. 2.—1. Timothy my genuine son.—See Titus, chap. 1. 4. Illustration. Some think the apostle called Timothy his genuine son, for the same reason that the disciples of the prophets were called the sons of the prophets. But I rather suppose he called Timothy his son, because he had converted him, and thereby conveyed to him a new nature. We have the same phraseology, Phil. 1. 24. 'my son Onesimus, whom I beg of my bonds.' 1 Cor. iv. 19. 'To Christ Jesus, by the gospel, I have begotten you.'—Perhaps also the apostle called Timothy his genuine son, on account of his age, and because he resembled him in the disposition of his mind, his faith, his love, and his zeal in spreading the gospel, and the whole affairs of the church of Ephesus, it was of great importance that the Ephesians should know, that in all these matters he followed the commandment of God and Christ, delivered to him by the apostle: 2. Because Paul was made an apostle, not by the commandment of Christ, but by Christ himself, Acts xxvii. 20. 21.

2. Our Saviour.—This title is given to God in other passages, 1 Tim. ii. 3. 4. Tit. iii. 4. Jude ver. 5. Because he contrived the method of our salvation, and sent his Son into the world to accomplish it, John iii. 16.

3. Our hope.—The apostle hoped for salvation, not through the meritorious works of the law, as the Judasists did, but through the sacrifice for sin made by the death of Christ.
I. TIMOTHY.

4. Nor to give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which profess to be knowledge, but which are rather what is superstitious and unprofitable (or, rather, disputes rather than great education), which is (in, 167) through faith.

5. Now, (τι τοιούτοις γιγαντούς, ver. 3), the end of the charge (is) love from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and an unfeigned faith.

6. From which things some having swerved, have turned aside to foolish talking; (see 1 Tim. vi. 20; 2 Tim. ii. 14).

7. Desiring to be teachers of the law (though they neither understand what they say, nor do what they say) concerning what things they strongly affirm.

8. Wk know indeed that the law is good, if one use it lawfully.

9. Knowing, then, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, the ungodly and sinners, the unholy and profane, murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, adulterers, liars, false accusers, and if any other thing be opposite to wholesome doctrine.

10. According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, with which I am entrusted.

11. (Καὶ, 204.) Now I think Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath strengthened me, because he reckoned me faithful when he appointed me to the ministry.

12. Who was formerly a defamer of him, and a persecutor, and an injurious person. But I received mercy, because I acted ignorantly in unbelief.

the apostle showed great delicacy, hoping that they might still be reclaimed. The same might be said of the false teachers at Corinth, and of the incorruptible person there. Thus, Ver. 1–11. Several new topics are introduced, etc.

11. 'Jewish fables,' because they were invented by the Jewish doctors to recommend the method of the false teacher at Corinth, and of the incorruptible person there. Thus, see 1 Cor. vii. 17. The following verses, etc.

12. 'Endless genealogies/'—Through the Jews were all excepting the Gentiles, descended from Abraham, the genealogies by which many of them pretended to derive their pedigree from him, could not with certainty be shown to be true; for which reason the apostle turns them aside.

13. 'Disputes,'—So the phrase ἕλεγχοι, etc., properly signifies, being the Hebrew disputers. — Mill affirms that all the ancient MSS., excepting that of Codex Sinaiticus, read here αἰσθήματα αἰσθήματα, etc. This is rather the dispensation of God which is by faith, the Christian dispensation. But I have followed the reading of the common edition adopted by the English translators, etc., as it gives a good sense of the passage.

Ver. 3–11. Now the scope of the charge. — The word τιούτος, etc., denotes a manner of phrase brought to one another, and rendered by word of mouth. The charge here meant is that which the apostle ordered Timothy to give to the teachers in Ephesus. For he had said, Ver. 3. I endeavoured to remain, etc. So also, etc. For, etc., etc., that they may be charge. — For, etc. He tells them what the scope of his charge was to be. See Ver. 1. Others think, etc.

Ver. 12. Endless faith. — According to Buxtorf, the apostle in this expression had these Jewish teachers in his eye, who gave the unbelieving Jews, taught doctrines which they knew to be false, so that their faith in those doctrines was fictitious.

Ver. 13. From which things some having swerved. — The word συνεσυραγκασθήσατε, etc., signifies a spring from the mark at which one should, and is correctly used in this place, as Ver. 7, was introduced in Ver. 3. The word ἅπαντα, etc., properly signifies a spring from the mark, and of the same import with the Hebrew word שַׂעַר, which is made for a righteous man, etc. The law of Moses, being given as a rule of life to the good as well as the bad, the apostle means doubtless, etc., that it was given, not for the purpose of justifying the most righteous man that ever lived, but for maintaining the wicked by its threatenings and promises. Thus, it will appear, etc.

Ver. 14. Nor to inculcate fabulous traditions, invented to prove that men cannot be saved unless they obey the law of Moses; and uncertain genealogies, by which every Jew endeavours to trace his descent from Abraham, and which are by their uncertainty, etc.

Ver. 15. Now the scope of the charge, etc. — By three to these teachers, etc., that instead of inculcating fables and genealogies, they inculcate love to God and man, proceeding from a pure heart, and directed by a good conscience, and nourished by unfeigned faith in the gospel doctrine.

Ver. 16. From which things some teachers having swerved, have in their discourse turned aside to foolish talking; — talking which serves no purpose but to discover their folly, and to nourish fully in their disciples.

Ver. 17. As thou mayest know by this, that they set themselves up as teachers of the law of Moses, though they understand neither what they themselves are concerning it, nor the nature of the law which they establish.

Ver. 18. I know indeed that the law of Moses is an excellent institution; — if one use it agreeably to the end for which it was given.

Ver. 19. Now I know this, that the law is not made to create a righteous man, but for condemning and punishing the lawless, etc.

Ver. 20. I know this, that the law of Moses is not given for the purpose of justifying any man, etc.

Ver. 21. For we know, etc. — That is, the doctrine which none can understand, etc. See Ver. 3. But, in verse of the context, etc., having recourse to the sermon which it prepared for the office. But the doctrine which the apostle here declared, etc., that the law of Moses was not given for the purpose of justifying any man, etc.

Ver. 22. For we know, etc. — That is, the doctrine which none can understand, etc. Since the doctrine, etc., as it was not the religious institution, etc.

Ver. 23. But we know, etc. — That is, the doctrine which none can understand, etc. See Ver. 3. But, in verse of the context, etc., having recourse to the sermon which it prepared for the office. But the doctrine which the apostle here declared, etc., that the law of Moses was not given for the purpose of justifying any man, etc.

Ver. 24. For we know, etc. — That is, the doctrine which none can understand, etc. Since the doctrine, etc., as it was not the religious institution, etc. But, in verse of the context, etc., having recourse to the sermon which it prepared for the office. But the doctrine which the apostle here declared, etc., that the law of Moses was not given for the purpose of justifying any man, etc.

Ver. 25. For we know, etc. — That is, the doctrine which none can understand, etc. Since the doctrine, etc., as it was not the religious institution, etc. But, in verse of the context, etc., having recourse to the sermon which it prepared for the office. But the doctrine which the apostle here declared, etc., that the law of Moses was not given for the purpose of justifying any man, etc.
14 And the grace of our Lord hath superabounded unto me, according to the riches of his grace, which is given me by resurrection of Jesus Christ.

15 (O, 71.) This saying is true, and worthy of all reception, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief. 2

16 (Acts.) However for this cause I received mercy, that in me the chief of sinners Jesus Christ might shew forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them who should hereafter believe on him in order to everlasting life. 3

17 (Gal. 4, 9.) And now to the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

18 This charge I commit to thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before (2 Tim. 1, 17), concerning thee (chap. iv. 14.), that thou mayest carry (v. 167), through them the good warfare; 4

19 (2 Tim. 5, 1.) Holding faith and a good conscience, (chap. iii. 9.), which some having put away, (v. 10, with respect to the faith have made shipwreck), 5

self nor through any-contract, without going contrary to his conscience. At the first time Paul was doing things which, after he became an apostle, made him call himself the chief of sinners, he was "the servant of Christ, and God's servant;" and then, if, in persecuting the Christians he was doing God's will.

Ver. 11-15. And the grace of our Lord. 1 Some are of opinion, that we see here, as 1 Cor. ix. 16, is used in the sense of 1 Tim. i. 14, so that the translation might run, And the grace of our Lord hath superabounded. 2 But this makes more difficulty in the sense of the passage, since the more than gifts with which he was endowed were the effects of Christ's goodness to him. 3 Hath superabounded in me, both in death and life. 4 By faith the apostle means, such a love and power of the Lord and wisdom of God was added to him, that God might not require his servants to praise, his cause for persecution, in any manner whatever. 5 By life, he means, he who was under any supposed him to allow him all the exercise of the right which he himself claimed of judging for himself in matters of religion. In these virtues, the apostle was very deficient before his conversion; but, after it, they superabounded in him.

15. This exhortation is in 1 Tim. i. 18-20. The word τάξιν, with respect to, as well as faithful. 6 Gal.v. 9; note 2. But those being the attributes of a person, cannot be applied to a cause or doctrine. Wherefore the proper translation of the word in this verse is, εὐγενείαν τὸν ἄνθρωπον. 7 (I am chief.) The apostle did not mean, that he was absolutely the greatest of all sinners, but the greatest of those who came through grace; so is plain from ver. 13. And he spoke in this manner concerning himself, to show the deep-seated hatred of his own sinning Christ, and persecuting his disciples; and that he knew himself to be the son of other men, and of their circumstances. Further, he does not say, of whom I am, but of whom I was, but of whom I was the chief even after he had advanced himself. By that manner of speaking the apostle hath taught us, that a sinner, after repentance, is still guilty of the sins he hath committed; that in pronouncing his God considers him a guilty, and that till he is perfectly sanctified, he can never be a true servant of God in the sight of God.

16. 1. That in me the chief of sinners. 1 Here are two answers to τάξιν, in ver. 15, and therefore, the words of sinners are fully supplied in this place. Some, however, think τάξιν, in both places, should be translated the order, supposing the apostle's meaning to be, That he was the first supplier of sinners, and under the order of the Chrisians, who had obtained mercy. But this opinion, contrary to Acts xxvi. 23-24. 11, 7.

2. For pattern. 1 Timothy i. 18. This pattern means, a pattern made by impression; being derived from v. 15., which signifies a mark made by impressing a stamp. John iv. 15. For more concerning the word, see 2 Tim. i. 13, note 1, and concerning τάξιν, see 1 Pet. iii. 21. note 2. 3 To those who should hereafter believe. 1 The original of this passage may be supplied and translated as follows, for a pattern of the pardon of them who should be saved and believe. 8 And it must be acknowledged, that no example could be more proper, to encourage the greatest sinners in every age to repent, than the pardon which Christ granted to one who had so unlovingly persecuted his church.

Ver. 16-18. Now to the King eternal. 1 Perhaps τάξιν, of which I was chief, may be better translated, to the King of the ages, namely, the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age under the Messiah. According to this translation, which is perfectly agreeable to the apostle's meaning, "To him who hath preserved the three dispensations under which mankind has lived, so as to make them co-operate to the same great end, the pardoning of sinners, and is immortal, &c. he honour and glory for ever ascribed by angels and men." 9

18. Of whom are the two Judaising teachers Hymenaeus and Alexander, whom, for their obstinately persisting wittily to corrupt the passage may be supplied and translated as follows, 'for a pattern of the pardon of them who should be saved and believe.' And it must be acknowledged, that no example could be more proper, to encourage the greatest sinners in every age to repent, than the pardon which Christ granted to one who had so unlovingly persecuted his church.

Ver. 16-18. Now to the King eternal. 1 Perhaps τάξιν, of which I was chief, may be better translated, to the King of the ages, namely, the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age under the Messiah. According to this translation, which is perfectly agreeable to the apostle's meaning, "To him who hath preserved the three dispensations under which mankind has lived, so as to make them co-operate to the same great end, the pardoning of sinners, and is immortal, &c. he honour and glory for ever ascribed by angels and men." 9

18. Of whom are the two Judaising teachers Hymenaeus and Alexander, whom, for their obstinately persisting wittily to corrupt the passage may be supplied and translated as follows, 'for a pattern of the pardon of them who should be saved and believe.' And it must be acknowledged, that no example could be more proper, to encourage the greatest sinners in every age to repent, than the pardon which Christ granted to one who had so unlovingly persecuted his church.
I. TIMOTHY.

Ver. 20. Whom I have delivered to Satan. This is the punishment which the apostle ordered the Corinthians to inflict on the infirm person. (1 Cor. v. 5. See the notes on that passage. The apostle delivered abstinent offenders to Satan, not only for their own reformation, but for striking terror in others. If the offender, in consequence of this punishment, was affected with some bodily disease, it probably were off on his recovery, or through length of time. And even thought it continued, some of the offenders may have been so obstinate in their wicked courses, that they did not amend. This seems to have been the case with Hymenaeus and Alexander, two of the corrupt teachers of Ephesus, whom Timothy was left to oppose. For notwithstanding the apostle, after his departure, punished them by delivering them to Satan, they persevered in spreading their erroneous doctrines.

Tim. ii. 17, 18, iv. 11. —The apostle's treatment of Hymenaeus and Alexander is a proof that he was guilty of no impiety in the things which he pronounced, nor of any bad practices among his disciples; otherwise he would have behaved towards those opponents with more caution, for fear of their making discoveries in the deceptiveness of his character. At that time the apostle delivered Hymenaeus and Alexander to Satan, does not appear. But from his instructing Timothy of it, as a thing he did not know, it may be conjectured, that the apostle did not after he left Ephesus, and was come into Macedonia; probably immediately before he wrote this epistle. And as it was done without the knowledge or concurrence of the church at Ephesus, it was not the censure called excommunication, but an exercise of authoritative power which was peculiar to him as an apostle.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Directions contained in this Chapter.

In this chapter, the apostle, first of all, gave Timothy a rule, according to which the public worship of God was to be performed in the church of Ephesus. And, in delivering that rule, he shewed an example of the faithfulness, on account of which Christ had made him an apostle. For, without fearing the rage of the Jewish zealous, who contended that no public place be saved, who did not embrace the institutions of Moses, he ordered public prayers to be made for men of all nations and religions, ver. 1. —For kings, and for all in authority, notwithstanding that they were heathens, that the dignity of Christ, shewing themselves good subjects by praying for the Roman magistrates, might be allowed in peace to worship the only true God according to their conscience, ver. 2. —Thus, to pray for all men, the apostle assured Timothy is acceptable to God, ver. 3. —Who hath provided the means of salvation for all men, ver. 4. —And is equally related to all men, as their Creator and Governor, and as the object of their worship; even as Jesus Christ is equally related to all men, as their Mediator and Saviour, ver. 5. —Having offered himself a ransom for all: a doctrine, the proof of which, the apostle told Timothy, was now set before the world in its proper season, ver. 6. —By many preachers, and especially by Paul himself, who was appointed a herald to proclaim, and to prove, that joyful doctrine, ver. 7.

But because the Jews fancier their prayers offered up in the Jewish synagogues and prayer houses, but especially in the temple at Jerusalem, were more acceptable to God than prayers offered up anywhere else; also, because the heathens were tinctured with the same superstition concerning prayers offered in their temples, the apostle ordered prayers to be made by men in every place, from a pure heart, without wrath, and without disputing about the seasons and places of prayer, ver. 8. —From which it is plain, that not the time when, nor the place where, prayers are made, but the dispositions of mind with which they are made, render their comfort and acceptance acceptable to God. —Next, he ordered women, when joining in the public worship of God, to appear in decent apparel, adorned with the ornaments of modesty and purity of manners, rather than with gold and silver and precious stones, ver. 9. —It seems there were in Ephesus some ladies who had embraced the gospel, to whom this injunction was necessary. These were to adorn themselves with good works, ver. 10. —And because some of the Ephesian women preached and prayed in the public assemblies in presence of the men, on pretence of their being inspired, the apostle strictly forbade that practice, as inconsistent with the subordinate state of women, who are not to usurp authority over men, ver. 11, 12. —For, the inferiority of the woman to the man, God shewed, by creating the man before the woman, ver. 13. —Besides, that women should not teach men, but be taught by them, is suitable to that weakness of understanding, of which their general mother Eve gave a melancholy proof, when she was deceived by the devil into transgression, ver. 14. —Nevertheless, for the comfort of pious women, the apostle observed, that as a woman brought ruin upon mankind, by yielding to the temptation of the devil, so a woman, by bringing forth the Saviour, hath been the occasion of the salvation of mankind, ver. 15.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II.—1. Now I exhort, first of all, that (Jesus, from Ion, times) deprecations, supplications, and thanksgivings, be made for all men:

2. For kings, and all who are in authority:

Ver. 1. Now I exhort, first of all, that deprecations, &c. —By this exhortation we are taught, what we should pray for, in our conversation, however wicked they may be: but to use the means necessary thereunto, and to beg of God to accomplish those means with his blessing.

Ver. 2.—And all who are in authority, &c. —That is, for the ministers and counsellors of kings, and for the inferior magistrates, by whatever names they may be called. —In the early times, the Jews had two public offices: one to hold them in captivity, Ezra vi. 10, 12. Baruch i. 10, 11, being directed by God to do so, Jeremi. xxxi. 7. But afterwards, becoming more bigoted, they would not pray for any heathen ruler whatever. Nay, the zealous among them held, that no obedience was due from the people of God to idolatrous princes, and often raised seditions in the heathen countries, as well as in Judea, against the heathen magistrates. (See Prov. i. 10. sect. 9.) This malevolent disposition some of the Jewish converts brought with them into the Christian church. The apostle, therefore, according to the true spirit of the gospel, commanded the brethren at Ephesus to pray, both in public and private, for all men, whatever their name and character might be, and especially for kings.

2. That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life. —Besides what

That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty.

3 For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour,

4 Who commanded all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth. (See Tit. 1, 1. note 4.)

5 For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus;

6 Who gave himself a ransom for all, that is to say, for whom he testified in his proper season.

7 (Ez 1, 42, 2.) For which I was appointed a herald and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not,) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth.

8 (Barnabas, see ver. 4, note.) I command, therefore, that the men pray everywhere, since it is mentioned in the commentary, that all may exercise their power in such a wise and equitable manner. That, under the protection of their government, we may live in peace with our neighbours and undisturbed by foreign enemies. In the first age, when the disciples of Christ were liable to be persecuted for their religion by their heathen neighbours, it was highly necessary, by praying for kings and all authority, to make the heathen rulers sensible that they were good subjects. For this they might expect to be less the object of their hatred. In the first age, this display of the Christian character was the more necessary, that the heathens were apt to confound the Christians with the Jews, and to impute to them the whole spirit and wicked practices of the Jews, who, confusing their benevolence to those of their own religion, cherished so unaccountable hatred of all the rest of mankind.

1 Ver. 5. Who commanded all men to be saved—What was this command? The word ςκοπησης should be translated; 'for the will of a superintending, the object of a command.' In this sense the word ςκοπησης is used Luke x. 12. Lord, '....if thou commandest, I will sanctify myself.' They command not the heavens to be circumcised—They command not the heavens to be circumcised—Heb. x. 5. 'He that sacrificeth and offereth (κυρπείται καὶ τυπάται) hath not committed.' Then wholly burnt-offerings and sin-offerings (κυρπείται καὶ τυπάται) '....if he offer a burnt-offering or a sin-offering,' Lev. iv. 2 et seq. Who commandeth all men to be saved, the apostle's meaning will be, as in the commentary, that God commanded the apostle to save all men from sin and vice by preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, supposing the apostle to speak of the eternal salvation of all men, when he says that he would sacrifice himself equally to all, whether they were Israel, or Gentiles, or any nation. Since it is 38668898.

5 Ver. 1. —I.—Who gave himself a ransom for all. —For which I was appointed a herald and an apostle. —I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not. —A teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth. —I command, therefore, that the men pray everywhere, since it is mentioned in the commentary, that all may exercise their power in such a wise and equitable manner. That, under the protection of their government, we may live in peace with our neighbours and undisturbed by foreign enemies. In the first age, when the disciples of Christ were liable to be persecuted for their religion by their heathen neighbours, it was highly necessary, by praying for kings and all authority, to make the heathen rulers sensible that they were good subjects. For this they might expect to be less the object of their hatred. In the first age, this display of the Christian character was the more necessary, that the heathens were apt to confound the Christians with the Jews, and to impute to them the whole spirit and wicked practices of the Jews, who, confusing their benevolence to those of their own religion, cherished so unaccountable hatred of all the rest of mankind.

3 Ver. 1. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour. —Who commanded all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth. (See Tit. 1, 1. note 4.)

4 Ver. 1. For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus. —Who gave himself a ransom for all, that is to say, for whom he testified in his proper season.

I. TIMOTHY.

1. Timothy.

Lifting up holy hands, without wrath, and (παρευρισκομένης) disputings. 9 In like manner also, that the women adorn themselves in decent apparel, with modesty and sobriety, not with plaited hair only, or gold, or pearls, or costly raiment; 10 But (which becometh women professing godliness) (διὰ τὴν πεπαραγάμην) with good works. (See 1 Pet. iii. 6. notes.)

11 Let a woman learn in silence with all submission.

12 For I do not allow a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over a man, but to be silent. 13 For Adam was first formed, then Eve. (1 Cor. xi. 9.)

14 (Acts, 234.) Besides, Adam was not deceived. 15 But the woman being deceived, became in transgression.

16 (Acts, 100.) However, she shall be saved (διὰ τῆς προσευχῆς) through childbearing, if they pray; prayers offered in temples were more acceptable to God than prayers offered any where else.—This worshipping of God in all places was founded as the peculiar glory of the dispensation, Mal. i. 11.

3. Lifting up (παρευρισκομένης) holy hands—that is, hands not cleansed with water, but hands undefiled with unclean, memory, and other wicked actions. This the Psalmist suddenly imitated, Psal. xlvii. 4. xixi. 6. as did the prophet Isaiah likewise, chap. i. 16, 17. There is here an allusion to the custom of the Jews, who, before they prayed, washed their hands, in token of that purity of heart and life which is necessary to render prayers acceptable to God. The lifting up of hands is put for praying, the thing signified by that action.

4. Without wrath.—By wrath, the apostle means an inward resentment of injuries, accompanied with a resolution of doing evil to those who have injured us. Perhaps also he meant to condemn the Judaeans for the anger which they often expressed against the Gentile converts, on account of their not obeying the law of Moses.

5. And disputings.—παραλείψας sometimes signifies signa ex ira, withal, sometimes reasons and disputings with others. See Luke xi. 46, 47. The disputings of which the apostle speaks in this passage, are not those only about the times and places of prayer, but those about other points of religion, whereby bigotry inflames themselves into rage against those who differ from them. This precept then, be used in the word of God ought not to be attended by any who lead the devotions of others in the public assemblies, thereby causing them to be the private restraints and angry passions, into their addressees in the church.

Ver. 3. That the woman adorn herself with good works.—It is often said that we adorn ourselves in decent apparel. The art of the Greeks was a kind of garment suited by the women, which reached down to their ankles. The σεβασμὸς, according to Tholus and Eustathius, was a long upper garment which covered the body every way. Sebaste, signifies not only what is beautiful, but what is sacred, and clean, and suitable to one's station. For, in this passage, the apostle does not forbid either the richness or expensiveness of the dress of women in general, as is plain from the commendation given to the virtuous woman, Prov. xxxi. 22. 22. who, through her industry, clothed all her household with scarlet, and herself with alab and purple; not to mention, that the good of society requires persons to dress themselves according to their rank and fortune. What the apostle forbids, is that immoderate manner of dressing which is calculated to excite improper desires in the spectators; also, that finery of dress which proceeds from vanity, and nourishes vanity; in short, that attention to dress which consumes much time, leads women to neglect the more important adorning of their minds, makes them careless of their families, and runs them into expenses greater than their husbands can afford. See 1 Pet. iii. 3. note. How apt the eastern women were to indulge themselves in finery of dress, we learn from the prophet Isaiah's description of the dress of the Jewish females in his time, Isa. xxiii. 24-29.

Ver. 10. Become them women professing godliness.—In scripture, the words become us often denotes likeness and true religion in general, godliness in this verse may signify true religion, and, particularly, the Christian religion; a meaning which it has likewise, chap. iii. 6. By increasing concerns concerning public prayers, the apostle means to say, that women must adorn themselves in decent dresses, when they joined in the public worship. This is evident from the subsequent verse, which forbids them to speak in the church.—See 1 Pet. iii. 3, where the same direction is given to women concerning their dress.

Ver. 12. Nor in usurp authority over a man.—The Greek word αὐτοκρατέριον signifies both to have and to exercise authority over another. In this passage it is properly translated usurp authority; because when a woman pretends to exercise authority over her man, she arrogates a power which does not belong to her. See 1 Cor. xi. 5. note. 1. Cor. xi. note.

Ver. 11. Besides, Adam was not deceived. The serpent did not attempt to deceive Adam; but he attacked the woman, knowing her to be the weaker of the two. Hence Eve, in extenuation of her fault, pleaded Gen. iii. 13. The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. Whereas Adam said, ver. 12. The woman whom thou gavest to me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat; insinuating, that she—she had been given him for a companion and help, he had eaten of the tree from affection to her. In this view of the matter, the fall of the first man stands as a warning to his posterity, to beware of the pernicious influence which the love of women, carried to excess, may have upon them to lead them into sin. What is mentioned Gen. iii. 22. Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil; does not imply that Adam was either tempted or deceived by the serpent, from an immediate desire of knowledge; but, refers to the woman sayer, according to the common use of the word man, which in the Greek and Latin languages, as well as in the Hebrew, signifies man and woman indiscriminately. Hence it is said here, He led out the man; that is, both the man and the woman. See Spect. vol. vii. No. 515. The apostle's doctrine of introducing the private restraints, and angry passions, into their addressers in the church.

Ver. 15. She shall be saved through child-bearing. The behaviour of Eve, who may be supposed to have been created by God with as high a degree of understanding as any of her daughters ever possessed, ought to be remembered by them all as a proof of their natural weakness, and as a warning to them to be on their guard against temptation. Perhaps also the apostle mentioned Eve's transgression on this occasion, because the subjection of women to their husbands was accentuated at the fall, on account of Eve's transgression, Gen. iii. 16.

Ver. 16. One shall be saved through child-bearing. The word κοιμάσθη, meant, in this verse, to rest, or sleep, the equivalent, in the foregoing verse, who is certainly Eve. But the apostle did not mean to say, that she alone was to be saved through child-bearing; but that all her posterity, whether male or female, are to be saved through the child-bearing of a woman; as is evident from his adding, if they live in faith, and love, and holiness with sobriety. For, safety in child-bearing doth not depend on that condition at all; since many plants male and female, and others of a contrary character are preserved. The salvation of the human race through child-bearing is not dependent on the innocence passed on the serpent, Gen. iii. 15. I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head. Accordingly, the apostle, I think, cautions women to adorn themselves in decent dresses, when they joined in the public worship.
I. TIMOTHY.

shall be saved equally with the male, through child-bearing; through bringing forth the Saviour; if they live in faith, and love, and chastity, with that sobriety which I have been recommending.

2. If they live in faith. — The original word πίστις is rightly translated faith, for it signifies in other passages, particularly Philip. i. 25. — The change in the number of the verb from the singular to the plural, which is introduced here, was designed by the apostle to show, that he does not speak of one, but of any particular woman, but of the whole sex. See 2 Esd. 16.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Directions given in this Chapter.

Because many false teachers were now spreading their erroneous doctrines with great sedition among the Ephesians, St. Paul judged it necessary that Timothy, to whom he had committed the care of the church at Ephesus, should be assisted by a number of bishops and deacons, well qualified to teach the people. Wherefore, after observing what an honourable office that of a Christian bishop is, ver. 1, he described the qualities and virtues necessary in one who aspires to attain it; whereby it appears, that an able and faithful Christian bishop is a person most venerable on account of his character, as well as on account of his office, ver. 2-7. In like manner, the apostle described the qualifications and virtues necessary in a Christian deacon, ver. 8, 9. — And that none might be appointed to those offices who were not of a good character, he ordained a thing to be proved, that is, ordered their names to be published to the people, that if any person had sought to say against them, they might have an opportunity to speak it. If no accuser appeared, they were to be considered as an unblemished reputation, and were to be invested with the proposed office, ver. 10. — The apostle likewise described the character of those women who were to be employed as female presbyters, in teaching the young of their own sex the principles of the Christian faith; and as female deacons, in taking care of the sick and the poor, ver. 11. — Farther, by observing that the deacons, who performed their office well, purchased to themselves the respect of the people, the apostle, I think, insinuated, that the most faithful of the deacons might be chosen bishops, ver. 12. — These things he wrote to Timothy concerning the doctrine he was to teach, the errors he was to confute, the manner of performing the public worship, the behaviour and dress of the women in their assemblies for worship, and the character and qualifications of the persons Timothy was to ordain bishops and deacons, notwithstanding he hoped to come to him soon, ver. 14. — Or, if any accident prevented his coming, having written these things in this letter, Timothy might know in what manner to behave himself in the house or temple of God, now committed to his care; which therefore was neither the temple at Jerusalem, but the church of Christ at Ephesus, consisting of all in that city who believed. And to excite Timothy to be diligent in teaching true doctrine, zealous in opposing error, and cautious in ordaining offices, he told him, that in regard the Catholic Christian church is the temple in which the living God is worshipped, and the knowledge of true religion is preserved, and the practice of virtue is maintained, it is actually the pillar and support of the truth, ver. 15. — By giving that honourable appellation to the Christian church, the apostle hath insinuated, that therein are kept, not the mysteries of any of the heathen gods, but the far greater mystery of godliness, or true religion, to be made known, not to a few initiated persons, as the heathen mysteries were, but to all mankind. — Lastly, to shew the greatness of the mystery of godliness which is kept in the Catholic Christian church, the apostle explained the particulars of which it consists, ver. 16. — Thus, by tactfully contrasting the Christian church with the temples of Ephesus and Jerusalem, and by displaying the far more noble purposes for which it was erected, the apostle shewed how vastly superior it is to all the most magnificent material fabrics which have ever been reared for the worship of God by the hands of men.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III. — 1 This saying is true, if one earnestly seeketh the office of a bishop, he deserveth an excellent work. 2 (Amr) Therefore a bishop must be unblamed, the husband of one wife, vigilant, prudent, of comely behaviour, hospitable, fit to teach. (2 Tim. ii. 24.)

Commentary.

CHAP. III. — 1 When about to elect bishops, thou shouldst remember that this saying is true. If one earnestly seeketh the office of a bishop, he deserveth a work which, though very laborious, is both honourable and beneficial, as it promotes the glory of God and the good of mankind. 2 Therefore a bishop ought to be free from blame; the husband of one wife, at a time; attentive to his duty and to his people; prudent in his conduct; of comely behaviour; hospitable to strangers; fit to teach, by having good knowledge of the things he is to teach, a clear manner of expressing his thoughts, and an earnest desire to instruct the ignorant.

Ver. 1.—1. If one earnestly seeketh. — The word συνίστασθαι properly signifies the earnest desire, the strong desire, the desire of the subsequent clause, which likewise signifies strong desire, and might be translated seeketh.

2. The office of a bishop. — This, in the Syriac version, is κομματικός. Bobet, the editor, 1st Ed. Tim. v. 17. at 45. 5. &c. 1 Tim. 3. 2. 3. He deserveth an excellent work. — A bishop's office is termed κομματικός, a work, to intimate, that he must not spend his life in ease and idleness, but in a continued application to the duties of his office. It is also termed καγιάς, a good, excellent work, because of its honourableness and usefulness. See 2 Tim. ii. 2. note 2. — The word οἰκογενεία, whether our, or one's, family, is used by the apostle, by acclamation, to denote what is morally good. But when they are distinguished, a family includes also the idea of honour, and συνίστασθα the idea of profit.

Ver. 2. — 1. The husband of one wife. — That the gospel allows women to marry a second time, is evident from 1 Cor. vii. 39. By parity of reason, it allows men to have more than one wife. Wherefore, when it is said here, that a bishop must be — the husband of one wife, the apostle could not mean, that persons who have married a second time are thereby disqualified for sacred offices. For in that case, a bishop whose wife dies while he is young, and is left without children, unless he can live continually unmarried. The apostle's meaning, therefore, in these canons is, that such persons only are to be entrusted with sacred offices, who, in their married state, have contented themselves with one wife and with one husband at a time; because thereby they have shewed themselves temperate in the use of their pleasures. As the Apostle at large universals in his pastoral, to the primitive institution, which enjoined one man to be united to one
1. Timothy.

3 He must not be addicted to wine, nor of such a hasty temper as to be a striker of those who provoke him, nor one who gains money by sinfulness, or even by dishonourable occupations, but equitably in judging of the offences which any of his flock may commit; not a worrier, a brawler, garrulous, talkative, fond of noise and lascivious in his dealings.

4 He must be one who possesses such wisdom and firmness as to govern properly his own family. In particular, he must have his children in subjection to him; as becometh the gravity of his character, and his reputation for prudence.

5 For if one be not capable of governing so small a society as his own family, but suffers his children to be disobedient and vicious, how shall he govern in a proper manner that greater and more important society, the church of God?

6 A bishop must be not one newly converted, lest being puffed up with pride on account of his promotion, he fall into the punishment inflicted on the devil.

7 Moreover, before his conversion, he must have behaved in such a manner as even to have a good testimony from the heathens; that to him, drawn by his reputation for beneficence. The reason was, by receiving such into his house, he would have an opportunity of recommending the Christian religion to them by his conversation and example. From this account it is evident, that the hospitality curtly required in a bishop, was not what is now meant by that word; namely, the keeping a good table and an open house, for one’s friends and others, who are able to make him a return in kind; but it consisted in entertaining strangers, and being present to public meetings and religious assemblies. But now that the ancient customs are changed, and men are everywhere open, in which traveller’s and pilgrim’s, for their money, can be as well accommodated as in private houses, there is little occasion for what the apostle calls hospitality. The benevolent disposition of a bishop, in the present state of society, will be more properly expressed in relieving the poor, who are more numerous than among Christians in the first ages. For then, the profession of the gospel exposing men to persecution, few embraced the religion who had not some degree of probity. The brethren, therefore, in these days, being generally men of prudence, would not, without cause, be hardened to the commonwealth to which they belonged. But at present, in the countries where Christianity is professed, where the church comprehends many who, though they call themselves Christians, have no principle of religion at all, the number of the poor who must be relieved is exceedingly great.

8 Who earns money by base methods. —So the word ἐνάλλαξις, (corrodium quadratum ferraci, Scipionis) properly signifies. As many of the brethren in the first ages maintained themselves by their own labours, it might happen, that the occupations which they followed in their heathen state, and which the apostle here designates, would follow after they became Christians, were not very reputable. Therefore, to discourage trades of that sort, and especially to prevent the ministers of religion from indulging in worldly business, and even by low methods, the apostle ordered, that no one should be elected a bishop who was engaged in any business.

9. One who ruleth well his own house: —A bishop must not only rule his own family, but he must, if he be successful, if he be worthy to promote religion and virtue in all its members; rule it calmly, but firmly, never using harshness where gentleness and love will produce the desired effect: also he must afford to his family, according to his circumstances, that is, according to their necessities, their means, and all his circumstances are suitable, and according to his necessities, which is necessary to their comfortable subsistence.

10. Not a new convert. —See also, literally, one newly consecrated: unto, into the body of Christ by baptism; one newly converted. Such were not to be made bishops, because being improperly instructed in the Christian doctrine, they were not fit to teach it others. Bishops, as their constancy and other virtues had not been sufficiently tried, they could have had little authority, especially with the brethren of longer standing and greater experience.

11. Raging (ἐναργής) being puffed up. —Raging, says ἐναργής is of the same signification with ἐναρμονία, and that they are said ἐναρμονία, whose wine, or pride, of an high opinion of their own knowledge, insolence and makes giants. See 2 Cor. x. 9. note 1.

12. Fall into the condemnation of the devil. —According to Erasmus, this clause should be translated, fall into the condemnation of the devil’s sence which the word ἐπίδημον hath, ver. 11. For he supposes that by the accuser in the New Testament, and Judas and Gentiles, who were, ready to condemn the Christians for every mis-he may not be liable to reproach for the sins he committed before his conversion, and fall into the snare of the devil, by these reproaches may tempt him to renounce the gospel.

8. The deacons, in like manner, must be grave, not double-tongued, not giving themselves to much wine, not persons who earn money by base methods. 9. Holding fast the mystery of faith with a pure conscience. (Chap. I. 19.)

10. (Kai lewv kai) But let these also be proved first, then let them exercise the deacon's office, being unaccused. (1 Tim. v. 11.)

11. (Eis en thewmati) The women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, but vigilant, faithful in all things.

12. Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, (see 1 Tim. v. 2.) ruling well their children, and their own house. (1 Tim. iii. 2.)

13. For they who have performed the office of a deacon, procure to themselves an excellent degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Ver. 7. May not fall into reproach, and the snare of the devil.—Here it is intimated, that the sins which one hath formerly committed, when cast in his teeth, after he becomes a minister, may be the means of tempting him to repeat these sins, by the devil's suggesting the same, that he may have little reputation to lose. Nor is it the only evil. The people, knowing his former miscarriages, will be the less affected with what he says to them. —All who are candidates for the ministry ought to consider these things seriously.

Ver. 8. The deacons (see Rom. xvi. 1, note 3.) in like manner must be grave. —The word ἐμπληκόμεθα, translated grave, include the idea of dignity and singleness. These qualities were required in deacons, because they seem to have been employed in teaching. See vers. 9-5. note.

Ver. 9. Holding fast the mystery of faith. —In the opinion of many, this is the doctrine of the salvation of the Gentiles by faith without the works of the law of Moses, called 'the mystery of God's will,' Eph. i. 9; and 'the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations,' Col. i. 26. But I rather think it denotes the doctrine of the gospel in general, as 1 Cor. ii. 7. 'a mystery;' and vers. 11. of this chapter, 'the mystery of godliness.' —The apostle's direction implies, that a deacon should be both sound in the faith, and conscientious in maintaining it. And although the apostle hath not mentioned it, Timothy, after this direction concerning deacons, must have been sensible that it was necessarily equal to bishops and in deacons, to hold the mystery of the faith with a pure conscience. —Soundness in the faith being required in deacons, it is a presumption against their being employed in teaching; but whether by preaching, or by catechising, is hard to say. They likewise performed the office of readers in the church. See here.

Ver. 10. But let these also be proved first. —The word also implies, that the rule for trying the character of the deacons was to be observed with relation to bishops. The rule was this: They published in their assemblies for worship the names of the persons designed for ecclesiastical functions, that if any one had ought to accuse them of, they might shew it. So we are told by Lampri-dius, in his life of Alexander Severus, in 114. c. 66, quoted at large. Truth of the Gospel Hist. p. 331, who, it wished, to have the same method followed in appointing the governors of provinces; and alleged the example of the Jews and Christians, who published the names of their ministers before they established them in their office. Now, although Lamprianus speaks of a rule observed by the Christians in the time of Alexander Severus, previous to their admitting persons to be bishops and deacons, it was a rule so natural and reasonable, that we may suppose it was prescribed by the apostles, and that it is referred to in this passage, where he ordered persons to be proved before he exercised the deacon's office. But Eusebius thinks the apostle, in this direction, required, that no one should be made either a bishop or a deacon till he had given proof of both of his steadiness in the faith, and of his other virtues, during a reasonable space of time after his conversion. The other interpretation, however, agrees better with the subsequent clause, being (ἐκ τῶν ἀνδρῶν) unaccused.

Ver. 11. —The women, in like manner, must be grave. —In translating ἐμπληκόμεθα, by the word women, I have followed the Vulgate, which hath here, Mulieres similiter pulchras. The women in like manner must be married, not given to evil desires, not evil gainers, not the sinners of the Gentiles, nor (ἐκ τῶν ἀνδρῶν) procuring to themselves (ἐκ τῶν ἀνδρῶν) an excellent step or degree. —In the early ages, bishops and deacons were sometimes taken from among the deacons. Thus Eusebius, bishop of Nicomede, before his promotion, was a deacon of one church in the time of Antoninus, as Eusebius states in his Eclog. Hist. v. 1. and Vales. But whether this was the practice in the apostle's time; or,
16 (Acts 10, 8.) Or if by any accident I am obliged to tell thee, I have written it, thou mayst know it is not to the behoof of the flesh, but to the behoof of the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and support of the truth.

16 (KJV 207.) For confusedly great is the mystery of godliness; God was manifested in the flesh, was justified in the Spirit, was seen of angels, was preached among the Gentiles, was taken up in glory. If it was the practice, whether St. Paul had it in view here, is hard to say;—because of the Stephanus signified a step or seat, some imagine the edification of the church is signified by the staircase, and where persons of the greatest dignity were set on the most elevated seats.

1. Timothy. 458

1. Timothy. 458

16 (Acts 10, 8.) Or if by any accident I am obliged to tell thee, I have written it, thou mayst know it is not to the behoof of the flesh, but to the behoof of the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and support of the truth.

16 (KJV 207.) For confusedly great is the mystery of godliness; God was manifested in the flesh, was justified in the Spirit, was seen of angels, was preached among the Gentiles, was taken up in glory.
I. TIMOTHY.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Predictions contained in this Chapter.

By calling the Christian church, in the end of the preceding chapter, 'the pillar and support of the truth,' the apostle teaches us, that one of the important purposes for which that great spiritual building was reared, was to preserve the knowledge and practice of true religion in the world. Nevertheless, knowing that, in after-times, great corruptions both in doctrine and practice would at length take place in the church itself; and that the general reception of these corruptions by professed Christians would be urged as a proof of their being the truths and precepts of God, and on the pretense that the church is 'the pillar and support of the truth,' the apostle, to strip these corruptions of any credit which they might derive from being received by the multitude, and maintained by persons of the greatest note in the church, judged it necessary, in this fourth chapter, to foretell the introduction of these corruptions, under the idea of an 'apostasy from the faith,' and to stigmatize the authors thereof as lying hypocrites, whose conscience was seared. And to give his prediction the greater authority, he informed Timo thy, that the Spirit spake it to him with an audible voice; and mentioned in particular, that those lying teachers would corrupt the gospel by enjoining the worship of angels and of departed saints, ver. 1, 2—and by forbidding certain classes of men to marry, on pretense that thereby they made themselves more holy; and by commanding some at all times, and all at some times, to abstain from meats which God hath made for food, provided it be received with thanksgiving, ver. 3.—namely, that every kind of meat is good, and that nothing is to be cast away as unclean which God hath made for food, provided it be received with thanksgiving, ver. 4.—For it is sanctified, that is, made fit for every man's use, by the word (or permission) of God, and by prayer, ver. 5.—These things the apostle ordered Timothy to lay before the brethren in Ephesus, because the foreknowledge of them was given to him, and by him discovered to Timothy, for this very purpose, that he might warn the faithful to oppose every appearance and beginning of error, ver. 6.—And because the Jewish fables, termed by the apostle 'old wives' fables,' and the superstitious practices built thereon, had a natural tendency to produce the errors and corruptions which he foretold were to arise in the church, he ordered Timothy to reject them with abhorrence, ver. 7.—Especially as rites pertaining to the body are of no avail in the sight of God, and of very little use in promoting either piety or love; whereas a pious and holy life is the only thing which renders men acceptable to God, ver. 8.—With this, that these things might make the deeper impression on Timothy's mind, the apostle solemnly protested to him, that in affirming them he spake the truth, ver. 9.—And indeed he had showed by the heaviness and solemnity with which he had suffered for preaching, that he trusted for salvation neither to the rites of the law of Moses nor to the mortifications prescribed by the Pythagorean philosophy; nor to the favour of any idol, but to the favour of the living God alone, who is the preserver of all men, but especially of believers, ver. 10.—The same doctrine he ordered Timothy to inculcate on the Ephesian brethren, ver. 11—and to behave in such a manner that it should not be in the power of any person, whether he were a teacher or one of the people, to despise him on account of his youth, ver. 12.—Then, because the Jews and Judaising teachers founded their errors on misinterpreations of the Jewish scriptures, he ordered Timothy to read these inspired writings frequently to the people in their public assemblies, and likewise in private for his own instruction; and on the true meaning of these scriptures to found all his doctrines and exhortations, ver. 13.—In the mean time, that he might attain the true knowledge of these ancient oracles, he ordered him to exercise the spiritual gift which he possessed; probably the inspiration called 'the word of knowledge,' which had been imparted to him by the imposition of the apostle's hands, when, in conjunction with the eldership of Lystra, he ordained him an evangelist, ver. 14.—Farther, he desired Timothy to meditate much on the scriptures of the Old Testament, and to be wholly employed in studying them, and in explaining them to the people, ver. 15.—Finally, he commanded him to take heed to his own behaviour and to his doctrine, from this most powerful of all considerations, that by so doing he would both save himself and them who heard him, ver. 16.

CHAP. IV.—1 (α) But the Spirit (πνεύμα) expressly saith, that in after-times (τοῦτο) very godliness in the world, be the support of the truth, the Spirit

Ver. 1.—1. The Spirit (πνεύμα) expressly saith; or, in so many words saith. Made supposeth this to be an allusion to Dan. xii. 30. But the times here mentioned are not in Daniel, nor anywhere else in scripture; not even in the prophecy which the apostle himself formerly delivered concerning the man of sin. I therefore think these words were, for the greater solemnity and authority, suggested by the Spirit in the apostle's hearing, after he had finished the preceding passage concerning the church's being the pillar and support of the truth. Of the Spirit's speaking in an audible manner, we have other instances in scripture. Thus the Spirit spake, in Peter's hearing, the words recorded Acts ii. 18, 20; and in the hearing of the prophets in scripture. Thus the Spirit mentioned, Acts xii. 13. Also Acts xvi. 6, Acts xxi. 11.

2. That in after-times.—So the phrase εἰς τοὺς μελλόντας may be translated, because it denotes future times, without marking whether they are near or remote. Made thinks the particular time is determined in this passage. For he supposes all the times mentioned in the New Testament to have a reference to Daniel's four monarchies, which he considers as the grand sacred calendar; namely, the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Greek, and the Roman monarchies. Now, as the monarchies, and as under it the God of heaven set up the kingdom of His holy One, Made thinks the latter, or last times, are the last part of the duration of the Roman empire, when the man of sin was to be revealed. Others, because the times in which the historical prophecies were called, Heb. i. 1, 2, the last days, and 1 Pet. i. 10, the last erve was used by the Greeks to signify subjects withdrawing their obedience from the civil powers, 2 Thes. ii. 3 note 1, the apostle did not say it was applied, but men's relinquishing the true faith and practice of the gospel; as the phrase, 3 apostatize from the faith, imports. Wholy, therefore, those whom he hath followed, are mistaken, who interpret the apostasy for 2 Thes. ii. 3, of the rebellion of the Jews against the Roman emperors, which ended in the overthrow of their state.—In the epistle to the Thess.

alonians, the character of the characters who were to introduce the apostasy is described; but in this epistle, the erroneous opinions and corrupt practices which constituted the apostasy, are foretold. And the apostles introduced this prophecy immediately after a short account of the mystery of godliness, may we not conjecture that his design in so doing was, to give the faithful an opportunity of comparing the apostasy, called in, the epistle to the Thess.

alonians, the mystery of godliness, with the mystery of godliness, that they might be more sensible of the pernicious nature of the apostasy, and be excited to oppose it in all its stages.

4. Giving heed (ἐρχομένων προς διαδικοστε χρηστος) to deceiving spirits;—that is, to false pretences to inspiration, which cause men to err from the true faith of the gospel. The apostle means those gross frauds by which the corrupt teachers, in the dark ages, were to enforce their erroneous doctrines and superstitions, practices the ignorant multitude, under the notion of revelations from God, or from angels, or from departed saints. In this sense the word πνευμα is used 1 John iv. 1. 1 'Believe not every spirit;' every pretender to inspiration, 7 try the spirits whether they be of God. 5

5. And to doctrines centering on the demons. 4—For this translation, see 1 Tim. iv. 3. The word translated διαδικοστε was used by the Greeks, to denote a kind of being of indeterminate nature between a god and man. See 1 Cor. x. 20 note 1. Col. ii. 8 note 6. They gave the same sense to the souls of some departed men, who were supposed to be the spirit and soul of human beings suiting in the presence of the God of prophecy; vol. ii. p. 438. The latter part they called superior διαδικοστε, and supposed them to have the power of communicating some species to angels. The latter they termed inferior διαδικοστε. These were of the same character with the angels, and the souls of men were worshipped as interceders. When, therefore, the Spirit of God foretold, in an indeterminate manner, of the future, of the spirit of the Euphrates horsemen is said, Rev. x. 20, to be their 'wrestling,' 4 or wrestling, 5 διαδικοστε, that is, angels and saints; not deities, as our translators have rendered the word. For in no period of the church were devils worshipped by Christians. 4—Epiphanius, quoting this text, adds to it the following clause: 'For they will be worshipers of the devil, as in Israel also they were worshippers,' alluding to the Israelites worshipping Baal and Asherah. Hosea and Malachi contend, that this addition is a part of the pseudepigraphal texts, and that it was an error of the apostles, which the early Christians explicated, because it is found only in one ancient MS. On supposition, however, find it is a marginal explication, it shows what the apostles meant to be the meaning of the word διαδικοστε, to worship the demons. Those who have offered this interpretation, as the apostles had no idea of the evil influence that the corruption of the apostles, and the hypocrisy of liars, would have on the church, have reason to believe, or know the truth. See 1 Thes. v. 21 note. 6.

5. Who thoroughly know the truth.—That is, who are seared in their conscience, and will inven-numerable falsehoods, to recommend their erroneous doctrines and corrupt practices to the ignorant multitude.

3 These lying teachers will forbid the eating of the flesh, and such of both sexes as wish to live piously, to marry; and command the people to abstain from certain meats, which God hath created to be used with thanksgiving by the faithful, who thoroughly know the truth concerning that matter;

4 That every creature of God is good, fit for man's food, is good, and may be used, being received with thanksgiving to God the giver; and no kind is to be cast away, either from peevishness, or from the fancy that it is unlawful.

of godliness, but denying the power. 2 Tim. iii. 5. These hypocritical teachers are called liars, because of the gross fictions and frauds which they were to contrive for the purpose of establishing the worship of demons. How well the appellation agrees to the Roman clergy in the dark ages, no one may understand who is acquainted with their pretended ceremonies, the superstitious observances of angels, and of the ghosts of departed saints, and concerning the miracles done by them, and by them persons be repaired, the sign of the cross, &c. all preached by monks, and priests, and even bishops; and committed to writing in books, and manuals, many of their sermons, to render them objects of adoration. 2. Who are seared in their own conscience. 6—Epiphanius thinks this clause should be translated, 'who are burnt in their conscience;' meaning, that these impostors would bear in their consciences indelible marks of their atrocious crimes, as satisfactory marks in their bodies marks impressed with red-hot irons, in tokens of their crimes. This opinion Bengelius, episcopate, and supported by a passage from Plato's Gorgias. But the translation I have adopted gives a meaning equally emphatical and proper.

Ver. 3—1. Who forbid to marry. 2—This false morality was very early introduced into the church, being taught first by the Jews, 3 the Samaritans, and Marcionites, and afterwards by the Manicheans, who said marriage was the invention of the evil one, and who considered it as sinful to bring creatures into the world to be unhappy, and to be born for death. In process of time the monks embraced celibacy, and represented it as the highest pitch of sanctity. At length celibacy was recommended by the priests, and by the orthodox themselves, and more especially by the bishop of Rome, the great patron of the worship of angels and saints. For they strictly enjoined their clergy, both regular and secular, to abstain from marriage. Thus, the worship of demons, and the prohibition of marriage, though naturally connected, have gone hand in hand in the church, as the spirit here foretold.

3. And command. 3—In the original passage of this there is a holiest ellipse which is anywhere found in the New Testament. For, as the ancient commentators observe, command to be used, and given to be fulfilled. Hence the translation I have adopted gives a meaning equally emphatical and proper.

3. To abstain from meats. 3—The lying teachers, who enjoined the worship of demons, were likewise to command the abstinence from certain meats. This part of the prophecy has been exactly fulfilled. For it is as much the rule of the monks and nuns to abstain from meats, as from marriage. Besides these rules to certain classes of men, the lying teachers instituted particular times and days of fasting, to be observed by all Christians without exception; namely, the forty days of Lent, and two days every week, whereon to fast, is to the sun. Here, therefore, the apostle hath pointed out two instances of the hypocrisy of the lying teachers who were to enjoin the worship of demons. Under the false pretense of ab-liness, they were to recommend abstinence from marriage to the monks, and friars, and nuns; and under the equally false pretense of devotion, they were to enjoin abstinence from meats to some men at some times, and to all men at some times. But there is no ne-necessary connection between the worship of demons and abstinence from marriage and meats; consequently the Spirit of God alone could foretell that these two hypocrisies were to be employed for the purpose of recommending the worship of demons.

4. Created to be received with thanksgiving by the faithful. 2—It is an observation of Bishop Newton, that 'there is no creature of all the good creatures of God: But thanksgiving is the necessary condition. What then can be said of those who have their tables spread with the most plentiful gifts of God, constantly sit down and rise up again, without suffering so much as one thought of the Giver to intrude upon them? Can we either believe, or know the truth? See 1 Thes. v. 19 note. 6.

5. Who thoroughly know the truth. 3—That is, who are seared in their conscience, and will invennummerable falsehoods, to recommend their erroneous doctrines and corrupt practices to the ignorant multitude.

6. Who thoroughly know the truth. 3—That is, who are seared in their conscience, and will invennummerable falsehoods, to recommend their erroneous doctrines and corrupt practices to the ignorant multitude.
I. TIMOTHY.

5 For it is sanctified (De Ge 3, 60.) by the command of God, and the prayer of all.

6 Laying these things before the brethren, thou wilt be a good minister of the word of the faith, and of the good doctrine, to the knowledge of which thou hast attained.

7 But profane and old wives' fables reject; (c) and exercise thyself (De Ge 2, 10) to godliness.

8 For bodily exercise is profitable for little; godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the present life, and of that which is to come. (See chap. vi. 19.)

9 This saying is true, (see 1 Tim. i. 18, note 1.), and worthy of all reception.

10 (Eu yap 3, 31.) Besides this we both labour and suffer reproach, (evi) that we trust in the living God, who is (evi) the Saviour of all men, especially of believers.

11 These things give in charge, and teach.

12 Let no one despise thy youth: But be thou耐心 to the believers in speech, in behaviour, in love, in spirit, (Ev 2, 11) in faith, (Ev 2, 11) in charity: (Ev 2, 11)

(See Tit. ii. 5.)

13 Till I come, apply thyself to reading, (Ev 2, 11) to exhortation, (Ev 2, 11) to teaching, (Ev 2, 11)

(See 2 Tim. iii. 16, note 3.)

Ver. 8.—1. Laying these things, &c.—If any prejudices with respect to the distinction of men (sacerdotal) remained in Timothy's mind, through the strictness of his education in the Jewish religion, the clear and express manner in which the apostle here asserted the lawfulness of eating all kinds of meats, must have entirely freed him from these prepossession.

2. To the knowledge of which thou hast attained.—That the expression in the original, ἐπιστεύσαι, is rightly translated, to the knowledge of which thou hast attained, will appear from the Bible translation of Luke 1, 3. (Ev 2, 11), ἑπιστεύσαι ἐπὶ τὸν θεὸν ἀποκαλυπτόμενον, and ver. 9, ἐν πάσῃ πρακτικῇ ἑπιστήμῃ. Having had perfect understanding, (Ev 2, 11) of all things from the very first.

3. And exercise thyself to godliness.—Ev 2, 11. This is an allusion to the exercises by which the athletes prepared themselves for the combat. The apostle's meaning is, That by the exercise of godliness, men prepare themselves for the employments of the life to come; see ver. 6, note 1.

Ver. 8.—1. Bodily exercise is profitable for little.—In this verse the apostle concludes, not only the austereities of the Essenes and Pharisees, but, if we may believe the Jews, the Greeks and others, and the exercises also by which the Greeks prepared themselves for the combat. Exert was a sort of exercise, because the word εὐσκόμησις is used, which, though it signifies exercise in general, was the technical word for that kind of exercise which the athletes performed naked, as a preparation for the combat. Therefore the writer of the present epistle introduced the language of the common practice of the apostle, and of that which is to come. —According to Welbopton, the apostle's meaning is, That godliness is profitable for all things, as having in the law the promise of happiness in the present (Ev 2, 11), and in the promises of happiness in the life to come. But there are promises in the gospel likewise, of the good things of the life to the godly. Matt. vi. 30. 'If God so clothe the grass of the field, &c.'—ver. 23. Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.'—Mark x. 30. 'There is no man that hath left house, father, mother, sister, wife, children, brother, for the sake of the gospel, and shall not receive an hundredfold now in this time, &c.' These promises, however, do not SACERTAIN to every individual who lives in a godly manner, health, and wealth, and reputation; but they assure us that piety and virtue have a natural tendency to promote our temporal welfare, and commonly do promote it. Or if, in particular instances, through unforeseen accidents, it happens otherwise, the consciousness of a well-spent life affords unspeakably more delight, than the enjoyment of temporal prosperity affords to those who, being destitute of godliness, have no hope of happiness in the life to come.

10. On account of this, I both endure great hardships and suffer reproach from Jews and Gentiles, that I trust to be made happy both here and hereafter, neither through bodily exercise, nor through the sacrifice of beasts, nor through the power of any idol, but by the living God, who is the preserver of all men, and specially of believers.

11. These things solemnly enjoins as God's express commands, and teach the believers to act suitably to them.

12. Let no one despise thy youth: But be thou patient to the believers in speech, in behaviour, in love, in spirit, in faith, in charity. (See Tit. ii. 5.)

13. Till I come, apply thyself to reading, to exhortation, to teaching, (servants.) See 2 Tim. iii. 16, note 3.
I. TIMOTHY.

14 That thou mayest understand the scriptures, neglect not to exercise the spiritual gift which is in thee, which was given thee by the imposition of my hands, according to a prophetic impulse, together with the imposition of the hands of the eldership at Lystra, who thereby testified their approval of thy ordination as an evangelist.

15 Make these things thy care: Be wholly employed in them, that thy proficiencies may be evident to all.

16 Take heed to thyself, and to thy doctrine; continue therein; for, he doeth this those will both save thyself and them who hear thee.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Directions contained in this Chapter.

Because it is the duty of ministers to reprove such of their people as err, and because the success of reproof, in a great measure, depends on the manner, in which it is given, this chapter, directed to Timothy how to admonish the old and the young of both sexes, ver. 1, 2. - Next, he ordered him to appoint a proper maintenance for those widows who, being poor, and having no relations able to maintain them, were employed by the church in the honourable and useful office of teaching the younger women the principles of religion, and in forming their manners, ver. 3. - And to prevent the church from being burdened with too great a number of poor widows, he disposed all to be maintained their own poor relations who were able to do it; because so God had commanded, ver. 4. - And, that Timothy might have a clear rule to walk by in this business, the apostle described the circumstances, character, age, qualifications, and virtues of those widows, who might fitly be maintained by the church, and employed in teaching the younger women, ver. 5-10. - As also the character and age of those who were to be rejected, if they offered themselves to be employed and maintained in that manner, ver. 11-15. - And that the church might be under no necessity of employing any widows as teachers, but such as were truly desolate, the apostle, a second time, ordered the rich to take care of their own aged female relations who were poor, ver. 16.

With respect to those elders who were employed as presbyters in the church, and in determining controversies about worldly matters between man and man, the apostle ordered Timothy to allot to them an honourable maintenance out of the church's funds; especially if to the office of presiding they joined that of preaching and teaching, ver. 17, 18. - And for guarding the character of those who have sacred offices against malicious attacks, he forbade Timothy to receive any accusation against an elder, unless it was of such a nature that it could be proved, and was actually offered by two or three credible witnesses, ver. 19. - But being so proved, he required him to rebuke the guilty person publicly, that other sinners might, without a shaming, in that affair, either prejudice against or partiality for any person, ver. 21. - On the other hand, those who held sacred offices might give as little occasion as possible for accusations, the apostle ordered Timothy to ordain no person a bishop or deacon rashly; but, previous to that step, to inquire into the character and conduct of the candidate with the greatest strictness. And to exhort him to the more care in this important part of his duty, he told him, that by ordaining unfit persons to sacred functions, he would make himself a partaker of all the sins they might commit in exercising such holy offices, inconscionably bestowed on them, ver. 22. — Next, he directed him to take care of his health, which, considering the office he was appointed to, was of great consequence to the church, ver. 23. — Then gave him a rule, by which he was to guide himself in judging of the characters and qualifications of the persons he proposed to ordain as bishops and deacons, ver. 24, 25.

Ver. 2.—Honour widows.——For the meaning of the word ἀξιόζειν, see ver. 17. Note.—The Greek commentators inform us that the widows of whom the apostle speaks in this passage, were aged women appointed by the church to instruct the young of their own sex in the principles of the Christian faith, and who for that service were maintained out of the funds of the church. See 1 Tim. iii. 11. note 1. This opinion of the Greek commentators is rendered probable by the apostle's order in Timothy, ver. 2, to admit none into the number of widows without inquiring into their age, circumstances, character, and qualifications, even as in ordaining bishops and deacons. See ver. 16. note 2.

2. Who are really widows.——By a real widow is to be understood one who is desolate, ver. 8: one who is not able to maintain herself, and who has no near relations in a condition to maintain her. Because in the first age the poor were maintained by the church, ver. 16, the apostle, to lessen the number of the poor, ordered Timothy in this passage to allow, that is, to employ and maintain as teachers, only such poor widows as had no relations able to maintain them. This was a prudent regulation, because, by employing as teachers widows really desolate, an honourable office, with a decent maintenance, was allotted to worthy persons, who at any rate must have been supported by the church. See ver. 16.

4. Let these learn first piously to take care of their own family, and, ver. 16, the apostle, to lessen the number of the poor, ordered Timothy in this passage to allow, that is, to employ and maintain as teachers, only such poor widows as had no relations able to maintain them. This was a prudent regulation, because, by employing as teachers widows really desolate, an honourable office, with a decent maintenance, was allotted to worthy persons, who at any rate must have been supported by the church. See ver. 16.

5. Now, she who is really a widow and desolate, (1 Tim. 5, 10.) trusteth in God, and continueth in fastings, and prayers, night and day. (See 1 Tim. 5, 17. note.)

6. But she who liveth in pleasure is dealt with while she liveth.

7. (1 Tim. 5, 24.) Now, these things give in charge, that they may be blameless.

8. (Eph. 6.) For if any provide not for his own, and especially those of his family, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

9. Let not a widow be taken into the number under sixty years old, having neither been an harlot, nor a burden on the public, which, in that case, would not be beneficial by our charity to our parents. But after maintaining our family, if we have to spare, we are to require our parents for the care that they have taken of us in our wants, by maintaining them when reduced to poverty. This is a duty so sacred, that a family of real Christians will cheerfully submit to some hardships, rather than suffer their parents to live on the charity of others.

Ver. 5.—1. Really a widow and desolate. —The word ἀδέηστης signifies reduced to adversity. The apostle, I suppose, alludes to the funeral mourning of ἀνακλίνεσθαι, which comes from δείπνεω, deipnus, and ἀνακληται, ἀνακλά. —2. Trusteth in God. —Hæc trustit unciunctae in traut. —Ecc. v. 10.

Ver. 6.—1. She who liveth in pleasure.——The word ἀκακίας signifies she forthrightly; see, concerning this word, James v. 5, note 2.

2. Is dead while she liveth.——She is spiritually dead; dead to virtue and religion. This may be said of every wicked person, but especially of the widows described in this verse. Our Lord likewise used the word dead to express extreme wickedness: 'Let the dead bury their dead!' The philosophers represented those as dead, who abandoned their sect, and gave themselves up to sensual pleasures.

7. These things give in charge, that they may be blameless. —The gender of the word ἀκακίας shows, that the Ephe-

CHAP. V.—1 When reproach is necessary, do not severely rebuke an old man, but beseech him, as thou wouldest beseech thy father in the like case; and the young men, who sin, as if they were thy own brothers.

2 The old women beseech, as if they were mothers to thee, and the young, as if they were thy sisters, observing the strictest chastity in speech and behaviour towards them.

3 With respect to widows who are to be maintained by the church as teachers, my command is, Employ and maintain those only who are really widows, or desolate.

4 But if any widow have children or grand-children able to maintain her, let not the church employ her as a teacher; but let these relations learn first piously to take care of their own family, and, then, to make a just return of maintenance to their aged parents for their care in bringing them up. For this attention to parents in poverty is good for society, and acceptable in the sight of God. See ver. 8. 16.

5. Now, to shew those who the widows are of whom I speak, she who is really a widow and desolate, besides being poor and friendless, is of a pious disposition; she trusteth in God for her support, and continueth in deprivations and prayers night and day. Such a widow will take pleasure in instructing the young.

6. But the widow who liveth in privacy and in luxury is dead while she liveth in that manner, and should not be employed as a teacher of the young.

7. Now, these things concerning the obligation lying on children to maintain their parents, charge the Ephesians to perform, that they may be blameless.

8. For if any one professing Christianity maintaineth not his own poor relations, and especially those with whom he hath lived in family, he hath renounced the faith of the gospel, and is worse than an infidel; many of whom would be ashamed of thus violating the obligations of nature and humanity.

9. Let not any widow be taken into the number of teachers of the young under sixty years old, having neither been an harlot, nor a burden on the public, which, in that case, would not be beneficial by our charity to our parents. But after maintaining our family, if we have to spare, we are to require our parents for the care they have taken of us in our wants, by maintaining them when reduced to poverty. This is a duty so sacred, that a family of real Christians will cheerfully submit to some hardships, rather than suffer their parents to live on the charity of others. See ver. 5. 8.

1. Conclude, but the wife of one husband at a time; consequently, had governed her passions properly in her youth.

10. Further, she must be one who is borne witness to for good works, that she hath brought up children, religiously and virtuously, that she hath formerly lodged strangers, even though heathens, that she hath washed the disciples' feet in their journeys, when they went about preaching the gospel, that she hath relieved the afflicted; in short, that she hath diligently performed every charitable work.

11. But the younger widows reject, for when they cannot endure Christ's reproof, they will marry; 12. Incuring condemnation, because they have put away their first fidelity.

13. And at the same time also they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but also idle, and meddlers, speaking things which they ought not.

14. I command, therefore, young widows to marry, to bear children, to govern the house, to give occasion to the adversary for reproach.

15. For already some are turned aside, sown after Satan.

16. If any believing man or believing woman have widows, let them relieve them; and let not the church be burdened, that it may relieve those who are really destitute.

The Latin likewise used the word minimum for ad minimum.—Bengelius saepe esto is put here advisedly.

2. Having been the wife of one husband;—namely, at a time. For although it was not the custom among civilized nations for women to be married to more than one husband at a time, if a woman divorced her husband unjustly, and after that married herself to another man, she really had two husbands. See the note on ver. 14. of this chapter, and 1 Tim. iii. 2. note 1. Because the Latins used the word maritum to denote a woman who from her virginity had been married only to one man; and because that kind of marriage was reckoned honorable in some of the heathen priests and priestesses. Whitby supposes the apostle ordered husbands be thrice, husbands of one wife, and widows to have been the wives of one husband in the sense above described, that they might be nothing inferior to the heathen marriages of religion. But, in my opinion, he would have spoken more conformably to truth, if he had said that the apostles of the Christian religion, bishops, and deacons, and widows, that they might, in the eyes of the public, be not inferior to the heathen priests and priestesses.

3. That she hath hlooded strangers, &c.—Thus, in the other good works mentioned by the apostle, being attended with great excellence, in that poor widow who desired to be married to the number, could be supposed to have performed them at their own charges. I therefore suppose he speaks of the office of deaconesses, who had been employed in the offices here mentioned at the common expense; consequently the meaning of the direction will be, that, in choosing widows, Timothy was to prefer those who formerly had been employed by the church as deaconesses, and had discharged that office with faithfulness and propriety. For since these women had spent the prime of their life in the laborious offices of love mentioned by the apostle, without receiving any remuneration, but maintenance, it was highly reasonable, when a good woman was to be employed in such a good service, to promote them to so honorable a function, which required knowledge and experience rather than bodily strength and courage.

4. When they cannot endure Christ's reproofs;—xetp6 yap xetp6. On this word Buxtorf remarks, that it comes from 7p6u, to pull away, and xetp6, reproof; and that the metaphor is taken from high-bred brutes, who, having pulled away the reins, ran about at their pleasure. Gaseus and Le Clerc translate the clause, who do not obey the reproof. But the Greek commentators, suppose, that xetp6, is governed by xetp6, in the compound word xetp6 yap xetp6, and that the meaning is, they pull the reins contrary to Christ, whilst he restrains them from marriage. But whatever the etymology of this word may be, the apostle plainly means, that the younger widows who had undertaken the office of teaching the novices of their own sex, not being able to continue under that weight of work which they had laid on themselves by devoting themselves to the service of Christ, and which the nature of the office required, would marry and desert his service. See ver. 15. The simple word xetp6 yap is used, because it is designed to denote mar's living voluptuously.

5. They have put away their first fidelity;—Among other things, xetpe, signifies fidelity in performing promises and engagements, Rom. iii. 3. "Will not get the unbelieving of the world (even the faithfulness for fidelity) of God?"—Tit. ii. 10. "Showing all good fidelity." See also Col. v. 22. 1 Tim. i. 12. "The faithfulness which the widows who are married are here said to have put away, was their faithfulness to Christ, which they had virtually deserted when they took on them the office of teaching the younger women; for by marrying them it put them out of their power to perform that office with the attention and assiduity which it required."

6. Tuttius also;—The word 7eucolou, eurulon et ineptae, signifies persons given to idle talk, a vice to which women are commonly much addicted. 7. I command therefore, young widows to marry;—As this discourse is concerning widows, that were already married, and therefore the apostle directs Timothy to prevent their marriage; this discourse is concerning widows, that were already married, and therefore, in the first place, he commands Timothy to prevent their marriage, and then, in the second place, he commands Timothy to teach them the doctrine of Christ, 1 Cor. vii. 15. "To the married I command, not I, but the Lord; that the husband should leave his wife; and to the unmarried I command, not I, but the Lord; that they should marry not again."—Ver. 9. From this command it is evident, that under the gospel marriage is lawful, both to men and women, and, therefore, it is no sin to marry another, if the previous marriage is inoffensive, or, if it was even a marriage of necessity, if it is not to the marriage, in the eyes of the public, the church. for the apostle says, "God, who ordains it, that is no sin to marry any more, if the previous marriage was not to the reproach of the church."

8. Therefore the priests, who at all times recommend a single life to those who aim at superior sanctity, misunderstand the apostle, when they affirm that he considered celibacy as a more holy state than wedlock. For, if that were true, why did he order that aged widows, who had been married to one husband, should be employed to teach the young of their own sex, and not rather aged women who never had been married at all? Also, why did he make it a qualification of the bishop, that he should be the husband of one wife? and not rather that he should be an unmarried person, and continue unmarried all his life?—As the expression, that a bishop should be the husband of one wife, did not make it necessary that every bishop should be a married man, (1 Tim. iii. 2. note 1. at the end), so the apostle's command to the younger widows to marry, did not oblige them to marry, if they could live chastely unmarried, and found it convenient, in other respects, so to do. Besides, every young widow might not have it in her power to marry.

9. Some are turned aside after Satan;—Some of the widows employed by the church as teachers, had, by marrying, unceasingly engaged themselves for that excellent office. Thus the apostle termed a turning aside after Satan, not because marriage is an unlawful state in itself, but because, through the temptation of Satan, they had deserted their station in the church.

10. Have widows;—that is, the grandmothers, grandmothers, daughters, or sisters, who are poor widows. In the opinion of Tertullian, this provision extended to the proprietary rights of a widow's estate, and how it was to be devoted to the service of Christ, when they became incapable of labor.
Let the elders (ἄρα καὶ διδάσκαλοι) who preside well be counted worthy of double honour, especially those who labour in (προς ἀγωγήν) teaching and exhorting. For such we have proved by the appointment of the apostles, that they which run in a good work are first to labour, then to eat, being thereby examples to all that follow. For this cause I also, for these reasons, to the churches of Asia, write, that they should stuff those that have charge of the public ministry. For it is not the apostles only, who do lay this charge upon them: no, but the church also is in this ordinance, that they which labour in the public ministry, should be provided for. For the scripture saith: He that planteth the vineyard, and he which laboureth therein, are appointed together. And that it is not the apostles only, who are the ministers of the public ministry, but the church also, has been long established. For in their epistles, they often add, in the conclusion, this sentence: Salute such as work the work of God, even as I have commanded you. And that the ministers should be supplied, was required by the apostles, and by the church: which is so declared in the following verses, as the apostle says: To do this, is the rule of the Lord Jesus Christ, which was delivered to his apostles. And the church has always followed the example of the apostles, in doing this.
I. TIMOTHY.

18 For the scripture (Deut. xxv. 4) saith, The ox treading out the corn thou shalt not muzzle; and, The labourer is worthy of his hire. (See Luke x. 7. and Matt. x. 10, where the expression is his next.)

19 Against an elder receive not an accusation, unless (wv.) by two or three wit- nesses.

20 Those who sin, rebuke before all, that others also may be afraid.

21 I charge thee, (owner) in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the elect angels, (see 2 Tim. iv. 1.), that thou observe these things without prejudice, doing nothing through envy of foolish men.

22 Lay hands hastily on no one, neither partake of other men's sins. Keep thyself pure.

23 No longer drink water, but use a little wine, for thy stomach's sake, and thy frequent infirmities.

24 Of some men the sins are very manifest going before to condemnation: (Tit. iv.) but in some (2ts., 226), especially they follow after.

25 In like manner also, the good works or some are very manifest, and those which are otherwise cannot be long hidden.

unbecoming their Christian profession, when they brought their suits into the heathen courts, and dishonoured all their brethren, by declaring that they thought there was not a wise and equitable person among them, to whose determination they could submit their disputes, 1 Cor. vi. 1-6.

Fourthly, The presidents managed the temporal affairs of the church as a society. The money collected by the brethren, for defraying the common expenses, supporting the poor, and maintaining those who were employed in sacred offices, was very early put into the presidents' hands, and from them the deacons received the share that was allotted for the poor; so did the teachers what belonged to them. And as the president was supposed to be a person of good understanding, prudent, and experienced in business, the brethren would naturally apply to him for advice respecting their worldly affairs, at least in all difficult cases.

26 For worthy of double honour: 1 Thess. v. 14; 1 Tim. v. 17. The word double signifies the honour done to a person, by bestowing on him such things as are necessary to his comfortable support: Acts xxvii. 10. Who also honoured us with many honours. 1 Thess. iv. 13. The word double signifies the maintenance given to parents who are poor: Matt. xix. 6. And honour not his father or his mother. It signifies likewise the maintenance given by the church to widows: ver. 2. Honour widows who are really widows: the word double signifies the maintenance, as of equal authority with the words of Moses, it is a proof, not only of the early publication of these gospels, but of their authenticity as divinely inspired writings. See what is written concerning the maintenance of the widows of the church. 1 Cor. ii. 12. God in 6. Ver. 15. Unless by two or three persons. This is not a proper translation of the clause. For I see no reason why an accusation against an elder should not be received, if of the maintenance of the widows of the church, to whose service they devoted the greatest part of their time and pains.

27 Especially those who labour in preaching and teaching. 1 Thess. iv. 11. Note 3. It occurs in the apostle's Epistles of some of the elders who professed employed themselves also in preaching and catechizing. This appears likewise from Heb. xii. 7. Remember them who have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God. Among the presidents who laboured in teaching, the bishops were the chief. For the word was required, not only that they should be apt to teach, but, 1 Tim. iii. 1. that they should 'rule their own house well.' 1 Tim. iii. 5. For if a man know how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God? The ability to rule was necessary to the presbytery, the bishops being in small churches. It was formerly observed, chap. v. 17. note 1., it might happen that there was no ruler but the bishop. In churches where there were other rulers, the bishops might expect those consulted them, and ruled in conjunction with them. In process of time, however, the bishops arranged to themselves the wise, whose counsel they took, and shared in ruling their own churches, both in spiritual and temporal affairs; as we learn from 1 Peter iv. 11. and 5. verse consulted them. 1 Tim. i. 1. The custom of having elders in imitation of the synagogue, whose only business it was to rule, and without whose advice nothing was to be done in the church, has I know not for what reason, grown out of use, through the pride of the bishops, who wished to be themselves the only persons of consultation in the church. On the ancient practice mentioned in the foregoing passage, as Exodus observes, the reformed founded their little countries, which they called constabiles. See a passage from Josephus's letter to Eusobius, quoted Tacit. ii. 5. note 3. where he shows in what manner bishops came to be raised above presbyters.

28 The labourer is worthy of his hire. 1 Thess. iv. 11. I mean as well as what went before, it is affirmed by the apostle to be said in the scripture, yet it is nowhere written in the Jewish scriptures. It is found only Matt. x. 10. Luke x. 7. The apostle therefore must have read either Matthew's or Luke's gospel, before he wrote this epistle. And seeing he quotes this saying as a scripture, and represents it as of equal authority with the words of Moses, it is a proof, not only of the early publication of these gospels, but of their authenticity as divinely inspired writings. See what is written concerning the maintenance of the widows of the church. 1 Cor. ii. 12. God in 6. Ver. 15. Unless by two or three persons. This is not a proper translation of the clause. For I see no reason why an accusation against an elder should not be received, if of the widows of the church, to whose service they devoted the greatest part of their time and pains.

29 Of some men the sins are very manifest going before to condemnation: (Tit. iv.) but in some (2ts., 226). especially they follow after.

30 In like manner also, the good works or some are very manifest, and those which are otherwise cannot be long hidden.
CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

I. TIMOTHY.

BECAUSE the law of Moses, Exod. xxi. 2, allowed no Israelite to be made a slave for life without his own consent, the Judaizing teachers, to allure slaves to their party, taught that, under the gospel likewise, involuntary slavery is unlawful. This doctrine the apostle condemned, as in his other epistles, 1 Cor. vii. 20, 21, 22. Col. iii. 22., by enjoining Christian slaves to honour and obey their masters, whether they were believers or unbelievers, ver. 1, 2., and by assuring Timothy, that if any person taught otherwise, he opposed the wholesome precepts of Jesus Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel, which in all points is conformable to godliness or sound morality, ver. 3., and was puffed up with pride, without possessing any true knowledge either of the Jewish or of the Christian revelation, ver. 4..—Next, the apostle told Timothy, that the Judaizers, who insinuated such a doctrine, did it to make gain of the slaves, whom they persuaded to embrace the gospel in the hope of thereby becoming free men; and that these teachers esteemed that the best religion, which brought them the greatest gain, ver. 5.—But that true religion, with a competency, is great gain, ver. 6..—Whereas religion is not real gain: it will not contribute in the least to make men happy in the life to come: For, as we brought nothing with us into the world, so it is vain that we can carry nothing out of it, ver. 7.—Therefore, instead of eagerly desiring to be rich, having food and raiment, we ought to be contented, ver. 8.—Especially as experience teaches, that they who are bent on becoming rich expose themselves to innumerable temptations, not only in the pursuit, but in the enjoyment of riches, by the many foolish and hurtful lusts which they engender, ver. 9.—Hence, the apostle justly calls the love of money the root of all the evil affections and actions which are in the world, ver. 10.— Covetousness, therefore, being both criminal and disgraceful in all, but especially in the ministers of religion, the apostle ordered Timothy, as a servant of God, to flee from the inordinate love of money, and from all the vices which it occasions; and to pursue righteousness, piety, faith, charity, patience, and meekness, ver. 11.—and to combat strenuously the good combat of faith, by making and maintaining the good confession concerning Jesus Christ, that he is the Son of God, ver. 12.—Then charged him, in the sight of Christ, who himself witnessed under Pontius Pilate that confession, ver. 13.—to observe this commandment concerning it in an unblamable manner, whereby he would do his part in preserving the good confession in the world, till it was rendered indissoluble by the appearing of Jesus Christ himself on earth, ver. 14.—whom God, the only Potentate in the universe, will, at the proper time, shew to all as his Son, by the glory and power with which he will send him to judge the world, ver. 15, 16.

But lest Timothy, from the foregoing severe condemnation of the love of money, might have inferred that it was a crime to be rich, the apostle, to obviate that mistake, ordered him to charge the rich, not to trust in uncertain riches for their happiness, but in God, who always liveth, and who bestoweth on men all their enjoyments, ver. 17.—and to make a proper use of their riches, by relieving the necessities of the poor, and promoting every good work, ver. 18.—Because thus they will provide for themselves a firm foundation to stand on, during the wreck of the world, and at the judgment, ver. 19.—Lastly, to make Timothy sensible how earnest the apostle was that he should preserve the doctrines of the gospel pure, he renewed his charge to him; and cautioned him to avoid the vain babbling of the Judaizers, and those misinterpretations of the scriptures by which they opposed the doctrine of the apostles, and which they falsely dignified with the name of knowledge, ver. 30.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VI.—1 Let whatever servants are under the yoke, esteem their own masters worthy of all honour: that the name of God and the doctrine of the gospel be not evil spoken of.

2 And they who have believing masters, let them not despise them because they are brethren: but let them serve them more; because they are believers and beloved who receive the benefit. These things teach and exhort.

3 If any one teach differently, and consent not to the wholesome commandments which are our Lord Jesus Christ's, and to the doctrine according to godliness,

Ver. 1. Esteem their masters worthy of all honour.—By ordering Timothy to continue with and obey their masters, the apostle hath showed, that the Christian religion neither alters men's rank in life, nor abolishes any right to which they are entitled by the law of nature, or by the law of the country where they live.

Ver. 2.—But let them serve them more. Instead of encouraging slaves to disobedience, the gospel makes them more faithful and conscientious. And by sweetening the temper of masters, and inspiring them with benevolence, it renders the condition of slaves more eligible, than by making them regret the liberty they lost. The true spirit of the gospel, they will treat their slaves with humanity, and even give them their freedom, when their services merit such a favour.

4 Who receive the benefit. Elmer hath showed, that although the word ἀποκάλυψις literally signifies to take hold of, to receive, to own, this sense is more suitable to the subject in hand, than to understand it, as some do, of the slave's taking hold of the benefit of the gospel on the one side, and the master on the other. Besides, ἀποκάλυψις, benefit, is nowhere used to denote the gospel. Still mentions one MS, which reads κείμενος, of the service, as the Syriac translator seems to have done; 'Qui custodiat, sunt ministerio eorum.'

Ver. 3.—1. If any one teach differently. That the apostle had the Judaizers in his eye here, is evident from Tit. i. 10. There are many murmurs and foolish talkers and deceivers; especially they of the circumcision; 11. Whose mouth must be stopped, who subvert...
I. TIMOTHY

4 He is puffed up with pride, and knoweth nothing either of the Jewish or of the Christian revelation, although he pretends to have great knowledge of both; but is dismembered about questions and debates of words, whereby come envy, strife, evil speakings, unjust suspicions.

5 Perverse disputings of men wholly corrupted in mind, and destitute of the truth, who reckon gain to be religion. From such withdraw thyself.

6 But godliness with a contentment is great gain. (See 1 Tim. iv. 8. note 2.)

7 For we brought nothing into the world, and it is plain that we cannot carry it out of the world.

8 (Acts 106.) Wherefore, having food and raiment, let us be therewith contented.

9 But they who will be rich fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which plunge men into destruction and perdition.

10 For the love of money is the root of all evil; which some covetously seek, and they err from the faith, and pierced themselves all around with many sorrows.

whole families, teaching things which they ought not, for the sake of worldly gain.

2. And consent not.—Bentley, in his Philalethes. I. p. 71, 72, affirms, that the word ἀκολούθοντας is in no good Greek author significant to consent. Yet it is a natural sense of the word: for the Latins used acclives, which answers to the Greek ἀκολούθοντας, to denote one's agreeing to an opinion. Thus we find in Hesiod, without variation, and in English we say, I accede to, or come into your opinion.

3. Which are our Lord Jesus Christ's.—All the precepts which the apostle delivers by inspiration being the precepts of Christ, there is no occasion to suppose that he here referred to some precepts concerning slaves, which Christ, while on earth, delivered to his apostles, and which, though not recorded by the evangelists, were made known to his apostles in their intercourse with him. See Titus, ii. 2.

4. Is dismembered.—In, literally, being sick; brain—Bremius translates it, being mad. Doddridge, &c. Persons who are extremely addicted in any foolish frivolous pursuits, or who are excessively fond of any groundless opinions, are said to be sick with those opinions, for they are so deluded that they do not discern the judgment.

5. About questions and debates of words.—The questions which sickened the false teachers, were those concerning slavery and the observance of days and months, and the words about which they debated, were those wherein the law and its statutes are declared to be established for ever, and through all generations: For, from these words, they argued, that the law would never be abolished. The questions and debates of which the apostle speaks, are called, Tit. ii. 9. Strifes and contentions about the law; and 2 Tim. ii. 11. Fighting about words; and 23. foolish and unprofitable questions.

6. Wherefore come envy, strife, evil speakings, unjust suspicions. This clause seems remark on the propriety of the apostle's having said, that the gospel is so little esteemed that men are ready to fall into every kind of error, and especially into that, which is the most absurd. For the apostle has shown that there are many errors in this world, and he desires them to be considered as nothing compared with the error of those who think that by seeking after the gospel, they are seeking their own destruction.

7. Perverse disputings, &c.—A philosophic conversation, such as was held in the schools of the philosophers, was called ἐπικρατεῖν, because it was thought an useful way of spending time. But the addition of the proposition ἀστραμμάτων, as, and unjust suspicions, is very obvious, but within very unanswerable reflections, and ought for the future to put them on their guard.

8. Who withdraw thyself.—It seems the Jews and the Gentiles, who had no view in teaching but to draw money from their disciples. And the money which they gave, was spent in the gratification of their lusts. Hence the apostle calls their 'belly their god.' (Phil. iii. 19.)

9. From such withdraw thyself. This clause is wanting in some MSS. and versions; but the Greek commentators have explained it, as which, as Estius observes, is a proof that the reading is at least sound.

10. But godliness with a contentment.—No Diocletian has translated it, but contentment, which is both submissiveness. If the common translation is retained, the meaning will be, that godliness makes a man contented, whatever his circumstances are; consequently it is great gain. —Rev—In this passage, and in the providence of God, resignation to his will, hope of reward in the life to come, and the assurance of eternal life, which is to be obtained only by his grace, are called for. For the true religion, is a combination of love with every duty, and the only way to please God; for in these things piety or true religion consisteth.

2. In great gain; the—Christians, from παράσημον, a passage because gain, or riches, make every thing accessible to him who possesses them.

3. For we brought nothing into the world.—This is an allusion to Ezekiel, v. 13. 'As he came in the land another womb, naked shalt he return,' &c. We brought nothing into the world but our existence, which, as our Lord tells us, Matt. vi. 26. being more than meat he who hath given the greater blessing will undoubtedly bestow the less.

4. Neither can we carry anything out.—Why then perplex ourselves with heaping up riches? We only need παράσημον, a free passage to our native country, and should not engage ourselves in the snares mentioned ver. 9.

5. Foolish and unprofitable questions. This clause seems remark on the propriety of the apostle's having said, that the gospel is so little esteemed that men are ready to fall into every kind of error, and especially into that, which is the most absurd. For the apostle has shown that there are many errors in this world, and he desires them to be considered as nothing compared with the error of those who think that by seeking after the gospel, they are seeking their own destruction.

For the apostle has shown that there are many errors in this world, and he desires them to be considered as nothing compared with the error of those who think that by seeking after the gospel, they are seeking their own destruction.

I. TIMOTHY.

11 Therefore do thou, O man of God, flee these things; and pursue righteousness, piety, faith, love, patience, meekness.

12 Combat the good combat of faith: lay hold on eternal life, for which thou wast called; and confess the good confession in the presence of many witnesses.

13 I charge thee in the presence of God, and of Christ Jesus, who witnessed under Pontius Pilate the good confession, 14 That thou keep (v. 71.) this commandment without spot, unblamably, till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.

15 Which in his own season the blessed (1 Tim. i. 11. note 2.) and only Potentate will show, even the King of kings, and Lord of lords.

16 Who alone hath immortality, and dwelleth

Hymenaeus and Philetus, who, by affirming that the resurrection was already past, 2 Tim. iii. 17, denied a future state, and thereby set their disciples free from every restraint: for they were not able to convince the more ignorant, who may indulge themselves without scruple, in all kinds of curious speculations and wild fancies, which are not forbidden by human laws.

And pierced themselves all around. — The critics observe, that the original word πνεύσκοντες properly signifies have stabbed themselves as it were from head to foot and all around, so as to be wholly covered with wounds.

Ver. 11. O man of God. — The ancient prophets had this appellation given to them, to show that their function was a service which God had appointed to them. For the same reason the ministers of the gospel are called men of God, 2 Tim. iii. 17. That man of God may be perfect and thoroughly furnished. — Wherefore, by engaging Timothy in this passage a man of God, the apostle suggested to him the strongest incitement to live conscientiously. He was engaged in a work assigned him by God, far more noble than the pursuit of riches, and a work with which the immemorial pursuit of riches was incompatible. His business was to teach mankind the knowledge of God and of eternal life, and to persuade them to lay hold on eternal life, by avoiding covetousness, and pursuing righteousness, piety, faith, and to be himself a pattern of all these virtues. Paul's reflection on this passage is worthy of a place here. — "Happy," says he, "would it be for the church of God, if these important articles of prudential religion were more inculcated, and less of the real (πραξίς) of its teachers spent in discussing vain questions, and inordinate strivings about words, which have been productive of so much envy, contention, obserbation, and suspicion." Ver. 10. — Combat things good. — The phrase πάντα ἐντέριον, being general, may be understood of any of the Olympic contests. But the apostle seems to have laid the combat either of boxing or wrestling in his eye, rather than that of the two in the passage. And he was requiring greater exertions of courage than the race, and being attended with more danger, were bitter images of the combat of faith, which was to be carried on by confessing the good confession in the presence of many witnesses, often with the hazard of the contending's life.

2. Confess the good confession. — Πάντα ἐντέριον, being the second person of the first sects of the indicative, is put here for the imperative; as is evident from the preceding phrases, which are all in the imperative mood. Our translators have overlooked. — The translation I have given of this clause, shows what the good combat of faith was, which Timothy was to carry on; it consisted in confessing before all mankind the principal article of the gospel, namely, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God and Judge of the world.

3. In the presence of many witnesses. — The witnesses before whom Timothy was to maintain the good combat of faith, by confessing the good confession, were not any particular assembly, like the general assembly of all Greece used to behold the Olympic combats, to which the apostle alludes; but they were the whole human race; nay, the holy angels also, who, in the next verse, are described as spectators of his behaviour in this combat.

Ver. 12. I charge thee in the presence of God. — The circumstances and sub-strata of this passage with which the apostle addressed Timothy on this occasion, did not proceed from any suspicion of his fidelity as a minister, but from his own deep sense of the truths which Timothy was to confess and maintain. Hence the ministers of the gospel may learn, that these truths ought to be often and earnestly insisted on by them in their particular offices.

2. Who witnessed (οὗτος ὁ Ποντιας Πιλάτου) under Pontius Pilate. — Though the proposition is with the present, it is more elegantly used to signify under, as denoting time. Thus Acts xii. 25.

I. TIMOTHY.

the very properly termed these interpretations 'oppositions of knowledge,' because they were framed to establish doctrines contrary to and subservient of the gospel.—Withal, to destroy their credit, he asserted that the knowledge from which they proceeded was 'falsely called inspired knowledge.' The Judaisers, who gave these interpretations, were not inspired with the knowledge of the true meaning of the scriptures, but falsely pretended to that gift.

Ver. 31. Grace be with thee.—This epistle being chiefly designed for Timothy's own use, no salutations were sent to any of the brethren at Ephesus.

II. TIMOTHY.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—Of the Time when the Second Epistle to Timothy was written.

From various particulars in the second epistle to Timothy, it appears that it was written while the apostle was in confinement at Rome. But whether that confinement was the one mentioned by Luke in his history of the Acts, or an after imprisonment, learned men are not agreed. Eusius, Hammond, Lightfoot, and Lardner, think it was the confinement mentioned by Luke, for the two following reasons——

First, It is evident from 2 Tim. iv. 11, that when Paul wrote this letter Luke was with him. Wherefore, as Luke hath spoken of no imprisonment of Paul at Rome but the one with which his history of the Acts concludes, the learned men above-mentioned infer, that must be the imprisonment during which the apostle wrote his second epistle to Timothy.—But the answer is, Luke did not propose in the Acts to give a history of the life of any of the apostles, but an account of the first preaching and propagation of the gospel. Wherefore, having related how the gospel was published, first in Judea by the apostles Peter, James, and John, and by the evangelists Stephen, Philip, and Barnabas; and after that in many heathen countries by Paul, Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, and others; and by Paul in his own hired house during his two years' confinement at Rome; he ended his history at that period, as having finished his design. It is evident, therefore, that although Luke hath written nothing farther concerning Paul, it is no proof that Paul's ministry and life ended then, or that Luke was ignorant of it. His silence concerning Peter after the council of Jerusalem is a proof that his ministry and life ended then; or that silence concerning many particulars mentioned in Paul's epistles is a proof that those things did not happen; or, if they happened, that they were not known to Luke.

Secondly, It is said, that if this epistle was written during an after imprisonment of Paul in Rome, Timothy must have been so old that the apostle could not, with propriety, have exhorted him to ' flee youthful lusts,' 2 Tim. ii. 22. But, besides what is to be said in the note on that verse, it should be considered, that in the year 68, when the apostle is supposed to have been a prisoner at Rome the second time, Timothy may have been only 34 years of age; which, both by the Greeks and Romans, was considered as youth. See Preface to 1 Tim. sect. I. 1.

These are the arguments on which the writers above-mentioned have founded their opinion, that Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy during his confinement at Rome, of which Luke hath given an account in his history of the Acts.

Other learned men hold, that the apostle wrote this epistle during a second imprisonment at Rome, and support their opinion by the following arguments:

1. At the time the apostle could not, with propriety, have exhorted him to 'flee youthful lusts,' 2 Tim. ii. 22. But, besides what is to be said in the note on that verse, it should be considered, that in the year 68, when the apostle is supposed to have been a prisoner at Rome the second time, Timothy may have been only 34 years of age; which, both by the Greeks and Romans, was considered as youth. See Preface to 1 Tim. sect. I. 1.

2. The boldness with which the apostle preached the gospel to all who came to him, during the confinement mentioned by Luke in the Acts, and the assurance with which he defended himself against his accusers, encouraged others to preach the gospel without fear; so that he had fellow-labourers then in abundance. Phil. i. 14.

3. The Roman governors of Judea, by whom Paul was tried for his life, declared at his trials, that no crime was alleged against him, but only his holding opinions which his accusers said were contrary to their religion, Acts xxv. 18, 19. They likewise declared, that he had been guilty of no crime against the state, Acts xxvi. 31. Hence, therefore, being the only thing laid to the apostle's charge, and that circumstance being made known by the governor of Judea to his judges at Rome, they must have had a favourable opinion of his cause. This appears likewise from what the apostle himself wrote to the Philippians, chap. i. 12. 'I wish you to know, brethren, that the things which have befallen me have turned out rather to the advancement of the gospel. 13. For my bonds on account of Christ are become to me a joyful thing, and the deliverance of all them that trust in him.' Phil. i. 12. 13.

4. And abide some time with them, Phil. i. 24. and sent them the salutation of Cesar's household, Philip. iv. 22, by whose good offices he hoped to be set at liberty. But when he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, his judges, considering the things laid to his charge as crimes against the state, were so enraged against him, that he called his escaping condemnation to himself; made his first answer, as being ' delivered out of the mouth of the lion,' 2 Tim. iv. 17. And having no hope of being acquitted at his next hearing, he looked for nothing but immediate death, 2 Tim. iv. 6, 'I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure hath come.' 7. I have finished the race.' Ver. 22. 'And, despising the shame, he stood up straight, and the time of my departure hath come.' 7. I have finished the race.'

5. The law of Moses, as declared by Moses himself, was the law of nature; and in nature all were sinners, Gal. iii. 17. And in consequence of that, all who came to the apostle were sinners, Tit. ii. 11. Yet the apostle declared that he 'was under the law, so as under the law,' Gal. iii. 18, 'I am under the law, which is the power of sin.' Therefore the apostle could not, with propriety, have exhorted him to 'flee youthful lusts,' 2 Tim. ii. 22. But, besides what is to be said in the note on that verse, it should be considered, that in the year 68, when the apostle is supposed to have been a prisoner at Rome the second time, Timothy may have been only 34 years of age; which, both by the Greeks and Romans, was considered as youth. See Preface to 1 Tim. sect. I. 1.
Sect. I. Preface to II. Timothy.

Many of the brethren in the Lord, being assured by my bonds, have become much more bold to speak the word without fear. At that time also he had the service of many affectionate friends; such as Mark, Timothy, Luke, Tychicus, Aristarchus and others, mentioned Col. iv. 7, 10, 11, 12, 14. But when he wrote his second to Timothy, his assistants were all so terrified by the rage of his accusers and judges, that not so much as one of them, nor any of the brethren in Rome, appeared with him when he made his first answer, 2 Tim. iv. 16. And after that answer was made, all his assistants fled from the city, except Luke, 2 Tim. iv. 11.

4. His own account of confinement. In Rome, of which Luke has given an account, Demas was with him, Phil. ver. 24. and Mark, as his fellow-labourers, Col. iv. 10, 11. Phil. ver. 24. But when he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, he says, 'I have loved the present world,' 2 Tim. iv. 10; and Mark was absent; for the apostle desired Timothy to 'bring Mark with him,' 2 Tim. iv. 11. From these circumstances it is evident, that the epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, and the second to Timothy, were written by the apostle during different confinements.

To invalidate these arguments, Lardner supposes, that on Paul's arrival at Rome from Judea, he was shut up in close prison as a malcontent, and expected nothing but instant death; that being in the greatest danger, all his assistants, except Luke, forsook him, and fled for fear of their own lives; that in this state of destitution he wrote his second to Timothy; that the Emperor having heard his first defence, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 16. entertained a favourable opinion of his cause, and by a written order appointed him to be confined in the palace manner, described Acts xxviii. 16, 30; that afterwards his assistants returned; and that he preached the gospel to all who came to him, and converted many.

But these suppositions are all directly contrary to the apostle's own account of the matter. For, 1. After making his answer, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 16. instead of being allowed to live in his own hired house, he was so closely confined, that when Onesiphorus came to Rome, he had to seek him out among the different prisons in the city, before he could find him, 2 Tim. i. 17. After his first defence, his judges, instead of being more favourably disposed towards him, were so enraged against him, that he looked for nothing but immediate condemnation at his next answer, 2 Tim. iv. 6, 7. Luke, who was with the apostle during his first confinement, and who hath given an account of it, hath not said one word of any danger he was in; he only tells us, that his confinement lasted two years, Acts xxviii. 30. 4. If the liberty which the apostle so soon obtained was the effect of his first answer, we must suppose that the persons despised by the council at Jerusalem to answer his appeal, either were in Rome before he arrived, or came to Rome in the same ship with him; and that the Emperor gave him a hearing on the second day after his arrival. For Luke informs us, that these facts after his going, he had such liberty that he called the chief of the Jews to his own house, and spake to them what is mentioned Acts xxviii. 17. But such a speedy hearing, granted to a Jewish prisoner, by a heathen and great an empire, who was either occupied in affairs of government or in pursuing his pleasures, and such a sudden alteration in the prisoner's state, are things altogether incredible. 5. The apostle being in a state of destitution when he wrote his second to Timothy, he must, as Lardner supposes, have written it before he made his first answer, since the alteration of his circumstances was the effect of that answer. Nevertheless, from the epistle itself, chap. iv. 10, we know, not only that it was written after the apostle had made his first answer, but that it produced no alteration whatever in his circumstances. For after making that answer, he wrote to Timothy, that the time of his departure was come. In short, he was in as much despondency after his first answer, as before it.

Upon the whole, the arguments to prove that Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy during the confinement recorded in the Acts, being of so little moment, in comparison of the facts and circumstances which shew that it was written during a subsequent confinement, I agree in opinion with those who hold, that the apostle was twice imprisoned at Rome; once, when he was brought thither from Judea to prosecute his appeal; and a second time, when he came to Rome from Crete, in the summer of the year 65, when Nero was persecuting the Christians; (See Preface to Titus, sect. 1. last paragraph); and that having made his first defence early in the year 66, he wrote his second to Timothy, to be sent to Rome in the summer of that year, as may be conjectured from his desiring Timothy to come to him before winter.

I have taken pains in refuting the opinion of the learned men first mentioned, concerning the time of writing the second to Timothy, because on that opinion Lardner hath founded another notion still more improbable, but which, after what hath been said, needs no particular confutation; namely, that when it is called the apostle's second epistle to Timothy, was written before the one which is placed first in the Canon, and which is generally believed to have been the first written.

Sect. II. Of the place where Timothy was, when the Apostle wrote his Second Letter to him.

That Timothy was at Ephesus, when the apostle wrote his second epistle to him, may be gathered from the following circumstances. 1. Hymenæus and Alexander are mentioned in the first epistle, chap. i. 20. as false teachers, whom Timothy was left at Ephesus to oppose. In the second epistle, he is desired to 'avenge the vain babbling of Hymenæus,' chap. ii. 16, 17, 18, and chap. iv. 15. to be 'on his guard against Alexander.' We may therefore conjecture, that Timothy was in Ephesus, the place where these false teachers abide, when the apostle's second letter was sent to him. 2. As it was the apostle's custom to salute the brethren of the churches to which his letters were sent, the salutation of Prisca and Aquila, and of the family of Onesiphorus, 3 Tim. iv. 19. shows that Timothy was in Ephesus when this letter was written to him. For that Ephesus was the ordinary residence of Onesiphorus, appears from 2 Tim. i. 16.; and considering that Prisca and Aquila lived with him, before this, about some time in Ephesus, (Rom. xvi. 2. note.) the salutation sent to them in this letter makes it probable, that they had returned to that city. 3. From Titus lii. 12. where the apostle says, 'When I shall send Artemas to thee, or Tychicus, make haste to come to me,' it appears to have been the apostle's custom, to send persons to supply the places of those whom he called away from the stations they had assigned them. Wherefore, since in his second epistle, chap. iv. 9. he thus wrote to Timothy, 'Make haste to come to me'; then added, ver. 13. 'Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus;' may we not infer, that Timothy was then in Ephesus, and that the teachers at Ephesus, and which Timothy was left in Ephesus to oppose. See Pref. to 1 Tim. sect. 2. note 4.

These arguments make it probable, that Timothy remained in Ephesus, from the time the apostle left him there as he was going into Macedonia, until, in compliance with his desires signified in this letter, he set out for Rome; consequently, that Timothy received in Ephesus both the letters which the apostle wrote him.

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion on which the Second Epistle to Timothy was written: And of the Time of St. Paul's Death.

In the Preface to Paul's first epistle to Timothy, sect. 8, the reader will find a brief history of the apostle's travels with Timothy, from the time he was released from his first confinement at Rome, till he left Timothy in Ephesus to oppose the false teachers, as mentioned 1 Tim. l. 3. But, in regard that history will be given more fully in the Pref. to Titus, sect. 1. penult. paragraph, it is only needful in this place to relate, that after the apostle left Timothy at Ephesus, he went into Macedonia to visit the churches there, according to his promise, Philip. ii. 24. then went to Nicopolis in Epirus, with an intention to spend the winter, Tit. iii. 12. and to return to Ephesus in the spring, 1 Tim. iii. 14. But having ordered Titus to come to him from Crete to Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12. on his arrival he gave him such an account of the state of the church in Crete, that Titus was ordered by the apostle speedily to finish his business and sail, with Titus to Italy, in the end of the autumn 65, rightly judging, that his presence at Rome would be of great use in strengthening and comforting the persecuted brethren in that city. In the mean while, Paul, on his arrival at Rome, taking an active part in the affairs of the Christians, soon became obnoxious to the heathen priests, and to the idolatrous rabble, who hated the Christians as demons, because they smiled on the vanity of the empire, and condemned the established worship. Wherefore, being discovered to the magistrates, probably by the unbelieving Jews, as the ringleader of the hated sect, he was apprehended, and closely imprisoned as a malefactor, 2 Tim. ii. 9. This happened in the end of the year 65, or in the beginning of 66.

The apostle hath not informed us directly, what the crime was which the heathen magistrates laid on him, nor in what place; if it was the burning of the city, which the emperor falsely imputed to the Christians in general, his absence from Rome when the city was burnt being a fact he could easily prove, it was a sufficient exculpation of him from that crime. Probably, therefore, the magistrates accused him of denying the gods of the empire, and of condemning the established worship. In this accusation, it is natural to suppose, the unbelieving Jews joined, from their hatred of Paul's doctrine; and among the rest Alexander the Ephesian coppersmith, who having, as it would seem, apostatized to Judaism, had blasphemed Christ and his gospel; and on that account had been lately delivered by the apostle to Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20. This virulent judaizing teacher happening to be in Rome when Paul was apprehended, he, in resentment of the treatment received from the apostle, appeared with his accusers when he made his first answer, and, in the presence of his judges, contradicted the things which he urged in his own vindication. So the apostle told Timothy, 2 Epist. iv. 14. 'Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil. 15. For he greatly opposed our word, and the rest of the unbelieving Jews were not a little enraged against Paul, for preaching that Jesus Christ, being linearly descended from David, was heir to his throne; that being raised from the dead, his right to rule the Gentiles was thereby demonstrated; and that the Gentiles were to be saved through faith in him, without obeying the law of Moses. These things they urged against Paul as crimes worthy of death, on pretence that they subverted, not only the law of Moses, but the laws of the empire. The hints which the apostle hath given us of the things laid to his charge, and of the particulars which he urged in his own vindication, lead us to form these conjectures: 2 Tim. ii. 8. 'Remember Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, according to my gospel. 9. For which I suffer evil unto bonds, as a malefactor. 10. For this cause I patiently bear all things on account of the elect; the Gentiles elected to be the people of God instead of the Jews; that they also may obtain the salvation which is by Jesus Christ, with eternal glory.' Such were the crimes of which St. Paul was accused by his enemies. The answers which he made to their accusations are instanced 2 Tim. iv. 17. 'However, the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me, that through me the preaching might be fully declared, and all the Gentiles might hear.' The Lord strengthened him fully to declare in the presence of his judges and accusers, what he had preached concerning the supreme dominion of Christ; his right to rule all the Gentiles as the subjects of his spiritual kingdom; his power to save them as well as the Jews, together with the nature and method of their salvation. He likewise told Timothy, that the Lord had delivered him from all the things which he had preached, that all the Gentiles might hear of his courage and faithfulness in maintaining their privileges. To this bold declaration of his preaching concerning Christ, the apostle added: 'Timothy he was animated, by considering, That if we die with him, we shall also live with him. If we suffer patiently, we shall also reign with him. If we deny him, he also will deny us.' 2 Tim. ili. 11. 12. To conclude, the evident reasonableness of the things which the apostle advanced in answer to the accusations of his enemies, and the confidence with which he urged them, made, it seems, such an impression on his judges that they were greatly prejudiced against him, and shewed themselves determined to take his life, they did not then condemn him, but sent him back to his prison, thinking it necessary to give him a second hearing.

How long the apostle remained in prison, before he was allowed to make his first answer, doth not appear. Neither do we know what length of time elapsed between Timothy and the apostle's epistles to Timothy, according to the time which he had made his first answer, to come to him before winter, we may conjecture that he made his first answer early in the summer of the year 66, and that he thought it might be a considerable time before he would be brought to a second hearing. Soon after his first answer, therefore, in the year 66, the apostle wrote his second epistle to Timothy, to inform him of what had happened to himself since his coming to Rome; namely, that he was closely imprisoned as a malefactor; and that he had spoken for himself in the hearing of his judges. Also he gave him some hints of the crimes which his enemies laid to his charge, and of the answers which he had made to their accusations, and of the principles by which he was emboldened to make these answers. Moreover he told him, that, although his judges had not yet condemned him, he had not the smallest hope of escaping when he should be brought to a second hearing: That his accusers and judges had shewed themselves so enraged against him, before he made his first answer, that when he was brought into the court, neither any of the Roman brethren, nor any of the Jews, nor any of the Jews of the provinces, nor any of his own fellow-labourers, who were then in the city, appeared with him; but all forsook him: That, during the trial, his judges shewed such an extreme hatred of the Christians, and of all kind of their causes, that all his assistants, except Luke, had fled from the city, fearing that they likewise would be apprehended and put to death: That being thus deserted by his friends, and fellow-labourers, and having no hope of escaping, he had a great desire to enjoy Timothy's company and services during the short time he had to live. He therefore requested him to come to him before winter. Yet being uncertain whether he should live so long, he gave him in this letter a variety of advices, charges, and encouragements, with the solemnity and affection of a dying parent; because if he should be put to death before Timothy came, the loss would in some measure be made up to him by the things written in this letter.

These particulars, which are all either expressed or insinuated in the apostle's second epistle to Timothy, shew clearly, that it was written not long before the apostle's death; the time of which may be determined with a good degree of probability by the following circumstances. The Emperor Nero having set fire to the city on the 10th of July, A. D. 64, to remove the odium of that nefarious action, which was generally imputed to him, he endeavored to excite a general and most violent hatred against the Christians, who at that time were become the objects of the popular hatred on account of their religion. For, as if they had been the incendiaries, he caused them to be sought and hunted; and the public, as it was perpetrated by the Christians, who at that time were become the objects of the popular hatred on account of their religion. For, as if they had been the incendiaries, he caused them to be sought and hunted; and the public, as if the perpetrators of the manner. So Tacitus informs us, Annal. lib. v. c. 44., and Suetonius, Ner. c. 16. This is what is commonly called the first general persecution of the Christians. Whereas, as the apostle says, with one voice, have reported that the apostle Paul was put to death at Rome by Nero in this persecution, we cannot be much mistaken in supposing that his death happened in the end of the year 66, or in the spring of 67, in the 19th year of Nero's reign.

Secc. IV. Shewing that the Facts recorded in the Gospels, and preached by the Apostles, are strongly confirmed by St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy.

This epistle being written by Paul, to an intimate friend and companion in the work of the gospel, under the miseries of a jail, and in the near prospect of death, it is natural to think, that if the facts which he had everywhere preached concerning Christ had been falsehoods, and the gospel scheme of salvation, which he and his brethren apostles had built thereon, were a delusion, he would, at such a time as this, have made reparation to mankind for the injury he had done them in persuading them to believe on Jesus of Nazareth, for whose name so many had already suffered, and were likely to suffer more. And that he would have made this reparation by acknowledging to Timothy, that the things which he had related concerning the character, miracles, and resurrection of Jesus, were false; and by ordering him to undeceive the world. Or, if vanity, or a regard to his own fame, or obstinacy in wickedness, or any other cause, prevented him from doing justice to the world and to truth, it might have been expected, that, in this private correspondence with so intimate a friend and associate, some expression would by accident have dropped from his pen, betraying the falsehood and wickedness of the cause they were engaged in; or that some word or circumstance, which he had mentioned, might have led to a discovery of the fraud.

Nothing, however, of either kind appears throughout the whole epistle. On the contrary, almost every sentence in it is an unembittered protest against the apostle's strong conviction of the truth of our Lord's pretensions, and of all the things he had told concerning him.—For example, he begins his letter with affirming, that by preaching the gospel, he had served the God of his fathers with a pure conscience; and says, he thanked God in his private prayers continually for Timothy's faithfulness in preaching the gospel.—Then ordered him to skip up the spiritual gift which he had conferred on him; and to be courageous in the work he was engaged in, because the effect of that gift was not to fill those who possessed it with fear, but with courage, and love, and self-government; and not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, 'nor of me (said he) the Lord's prisoner,' but to suffer evil jointly with me for the gospel, of which I am an herald, and for which I am suffering; and he commanded him Next, he expressed the highest satisfaction in suffering for Christ, because he knew he was really the Son of God, and would reward him in the end. And ordered Timothy to guard, by the power of the Holy Ghost which dwelt in him, the good doctrine concerning Christ which had been committed to him in trust; and to be strong in the honourable office of an evangelist which was bestowed on him; and to deliver all the particulars of the doctrine concerning Christ, which he had heard from the apostle confirmed by many witnesses, to faithful men capable of teaching that doctrine to others, that it might be continued in the world to the end. And more especially to publish and affirm everywhere the grace and power of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, and thereby proved to be the Son of God; for preaching facts, he himself was now suffering as a malefactor, even unto death. But he told him, that he had been the instruments of the enemies of the gospel to keep it in bonds. Do what they would, they could not hinder it from being preached and believed in the world.—And with respect to himself, he assured Timothy, that he had suffered imprisonment and every evil patiently, and with the greatest joy, for the gospel, because he knew that if he were put to death with Christ, he would also be raised from the dead with him, and reign with him in the life to come. Whereas, any preacher of the gospel, who, from the love of ease, or the fear of death, either concealed or denied the things concerning the Lord Jesus, him will Christ deny at the day of judgment. Then charged Timothy to put the teachers at Ephesus in mind of those things; and, in the mean time, to strive to present himself to God an approved unashamed workman in the work of the gospel, teaching and exhorting, not to neglect the office of a teacher, but to be patient in mischief, labouring, and to show himself an example to all. And therefore it is said, that this epistle to Timothy is more truly an exposition of the 2d Corinthian, and contains a perfect summary of the doctrine of the apostle.
Preface to II. Timothy.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Particulars contained in this Chapter.

The apostle begins this epistle with a delicate praise of Timothy. He told him, that he gave thanks to God that he had unceasing remembrance of him in his prayers, as a faithful minister of Christ, ver. 3.—And that, recollecting the sensibility and gratitude which he discovered by the tears of joy which he shed when the apostle instructed him in the doctrines of the gospel, he had a strong desire to see him once more, now that he was in prison for their common master, ver. 4.—That this desire was increased, when he called to remembrance the unfeigned faith which first dwelt in his grandmother Lois, and then in his mother Eunice, and he was persuaded in him also; also that Timothy was come of a pious race, ver. 5.—The apostle’s thanksgiving to God, in his secret prayers, for Timothy’s faithfulness as a minister of Christ, I call delicate praise, because being bestowed in the presence of God, out of the hearing of the world, it was a praise in which there was neither insincerity nor flattery. The apostle, it is true, mentioned this to Timothy himself, along with the other particulars which were so honourable to him: But he did it in a private letter to him, and with no view, except to stir him up strenuously to exercise the spiritual gifts which were imparted to him, for the purpose of defending and spreading the gospel, ver. 6.—Moreover, to excite Timothy the more effectually to exercise his spiritual gifts for these ends, the apostle put him in mind, that, together with the spiritual gifts, God communicated to his faithful servants, fortitude, benevolence, and temperance, to enable them to exercise these gifts without fear, and in a prudent manner, for the benefit of mankind, ver. 7.—He, therefore, desired him not to be ashamed of the things he was to preach concerning Christ; namely, that he is the Son of God, and Saviour of the world; neither to be ashamed of his spiritual father, although a prisoner, for preaching these things; but courageously to suffer evil jointly with him for the gospel, through the assistance of God, ver. 8.—Who hath saved both Jews and Gentiles; having called both into his kingdom by the gospel, not on account of their good works, as the Jews and Gentiles, concerning their own calling, but merely from God’s free grace, bestowed on them through Christ, agreeably to the promise of pardon and salvation made to the first parents of mankind at the fall, long before the Jewish dispensation began, ver. 9.—This promise, the apostle observed, was now published to all, through the appearing of Christ in the flesh; in so much that the Gentiles, by the gospel, had obtained a clear knowledge of the immortality of the soul, and of an eternal state of happiness hereafter for good men of all nations, who, before the gospel was published, had no certain knowledge of these great truths, ver. 10.—Further, the apostle assured Timothy, that to publish these joyful doctrines he was himself appointed a herald, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles, ver. 11.—And that for preaching these doctrines to the Gentiles, and not for any crime, he now suffered the miseries of a jail. Nevertheless, he was not ashamed of his imprisonment, because he knew in whom he had believed, that he is the Son of God, and Governor of the world, ver. 12.—He therefore ordered Timothy, to hold fast the form of sound words in which he had delivered the doctrines of the gospel to him, as well as these doctrines themselves, which had been revealed to him. 13. Then mention the desertion of the Judaizing teachers in Asia, ver. 15. And spake with the warmest gratitude of the kindness of Onesiphorus, who had gone among the different prisons of Rome seeking him; and, when he found him, had ministered to him with the greatest affection, as he had done to him formerly in Ephesus, as Timothy well knew, ver. 16, 17, 18.

New Translation.

I. Timothy, my beloved son: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from Christ Jesus our Lord.

2 I give thanks to God, (whom from my forefathers I serve) with a pure conscience, that I have unceasing remembrance of thee in my prayers, nights and days.

3 Remembering thy tears, I greatly desire to see thee, that I may be filled with joy:

4 Calling to remembrance also the unfeigned faith which is in thee, which dwelt, first in thy grandmother Lois, and in thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded that it dwelleth in thee also.

5 For which cause I put thee in mind to stir up the spiritual gift of God which is in thee through the imposition of my hands.

6 For God hath not given us a spirit of cowardice, but of power, and of love, and of self-government.

7 Wherefore, be thou ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner:

Ver. 1. On account of the promise of life which is by Christ Jesus. The apostle now begins his exhortation, that is, to declare the end for which Paul wrote, that is, to publish to Jews and Gentiles the promise of eternal life, which is to be obtained through Christ Jesus. The law of Moses did not promise eternal life to them who obeyed its precepts: it promised nothing but a long and happy life in Canaan, see Rom. x. 3. note. The promise of eternal life was made, first at the fall, and after that more explicitly in the covenant with Abraham. See Titus i. 2. note.

Ver. 2.—I. I give thanks to God, whom (see ver. 20) I serve with a pure conscience, that I have unceasing remembrance of thee in my prayers, nights and days. It was not the usual custom for persons to receive the grace of God, but that having embraced the Christian faith herself, she persevered in it, and persuaded her daughter Eunice to do the same; and the instructions and example of these pious women prepared their son for receiving the gospel when it was preached to him by the apostle. These pious women were the two grandmothers of Timothy. The pains which these worthy persons took to impress the mind of their son in his childhood with sentiments of piety and virtue, is a fit example for the imitation of all mothers, who, if they take the same pains with their children, may hope that, by the blessing of God, their care will be followed with the same happy effects.

Ver. 3. For God hath not given us a spirit of cowardice, but of power, and of love, and of self-government. The ministers of the gospel were not animated with the selfish and bigoted spirit of the Jews and Judaizing teachers, who hated all mankind but those of their own nation and religion, and confined salvation to the disciples of Moses. The grace of God teaches us to love one another, Gal. v. 13, 14. But this does not make us weak or foolish. It teaches us not to love ourselves only, but to love our enemies, to love those who persecute us, and even to hate them not, and to pray for them. Self-government consists in the freedom of the will, which determines our actions with a fixed and firm purpose, and prevents us from being the tools of evil men.

Ver. 4. Wherefore, be thou ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner. The apostle means that Timothy and the other Christians should not be ashamed of the doctrine of the gospel, and of the profession of Christianity, but that they should be ashamed of not publishing it, or of being afraid to declare it in public. This doctrine is a great comfort to the soul, and it is a great sin to be ashamed of it. It is a sin against God, and it is a sin against the body of Christ, and it is a sin against the witness of the Spirit, and it is a sin against the glory of the gospel, and it is a sin against the eternal salvation of souls. The apostle therefore says, that if any man be ashamed of the gospel, he is a base man, and he is a base man who is afraid to publish it, or to declare it in public. The apostle therefore says, that if any man be ashamed of the gospel, he is a base man, and he is a base man who is afraid to publish it, or to declare it in public. The apostle therefore says, that if any man be ashamed of the gospel, he is a base man, and he is a base man who is afraid to publish it, or to declare it in public.

Ver. 5. Which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, &c. In scripture language, to dwell signifies to abide permanently. Here it is intended, to the great praise of Timothy, that he was not born in a heathen family, but that his grandmother was a pious Christian woman, and that he was educated in the Christian faith from the earliest period of his life. The apostle says, that he was brought up in the Christian faith, that he was brought up in the Christian faith, that he was brought up in the Christian faith.
But do these jointly suffer evil? yes, the gospel, according to the power (see ver. 7.) of God.

9. Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not (except 22.) on account of our works, but on account of his own purpose and grace, which was given us through Christ Jesus (Rom. xii. 2.) before the times of the ages: (See Tit. i. 2. note 2.)

10. (as 101.) And is now made manifest by the appearance of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath indeed made death itself, and hath made life and immortality clear, (Rom. xi. 26.) through the gospel:

11. For which I am appointed an herald, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.

12. For which cause I suffer even such things: nevertheless I am not ashamed; for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to preserve (Rom. viii. 30.) me what is committed to me until that day.

13. The form of wholesome words which appear from our Lord's command, recorded John x. 27. 'And ye shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning.' Act ii. 38. 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth.'

5. But do these jointly suffer evil for the gospel?—The apostle in the Greek, is often governed by a proposition understood. Here the proposition underlies εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, and not εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, because the sphere of 'to suffer evil with the gospel,' would be too bold a figure. The proper meaning of εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ in the compound word εἴσερχεσθαι ἀλλῷ, jointly to suffer evil with me, and the other faithful servants of Christ.

Ver. 9. And grace which was given us. This (εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ) grace or gift is that which was given to all mankind after the fall, in the promise that the seed of our Saviour should bruise the head of the serpent, and which, according to the apostle's account of it, Rom. v. 17, was a promise of deliverance from death by a general resurrection, and of eternal life to all who at the judgment are found capable of it.

Ver. 10.-1. By the appearing:—The word εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ properly signifies διαφωτισμός, splendor; and by the Greeks was applied to the appearing of a god. See Parkhurst's Dictionary. I think the apostle alludes to Christ's calling himself 'the light of the world.' See Tit. i. 1. note 2.—The manifestation of God's purpose and grace, and the making death itself, and life and immortality clear, were accomplished, not merely by Christ's appearing, but by his suffering and dying for us in the flesh, and by his rising from the dead in the body by which he died.

5. Who hath indeed made death itself, and hath made life and immortality clear:—The word εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ signifies to render a thing ineropable, to deprive it of its ineropability (see note 1.);—Christ hath not abolished temporal death to any one, since all without exception die. But he hath deprived death of its power to continue mankind in the state of the dead. By submitting to die, he hath procured for all men a resurrection from the dead; and for the righteous, an eternal life in a general resurrection. Hence the apostle tells us Heb. ii. 14. The Son of God 'purtake of flesh and blood, that through death (εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ) he might destroy him who had the power of death; that is, render his malicious contrivances for destroying the human species ineffectual, agreeably to the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent.

3. Hath made life and immortality clear.—This is commonly supposed to be an Hebrewism for immortal life. But though I have so explained it in the commentary, perhaps the word εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ should be translated, not immortally, but incorruption; in which case the meaning will be, 'hath made the life or existence of the soul after death, and the incorruption of the body after the resurrection, clear.' So that the salvation of believers, mentioned ver. 9, includes not only a resurrection from the dead, but an immortal bodily life in heaven. The word εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, which has translated made clear, is explained by Scrupus, biclinium redeo; tinctum, illustratur; it makes a thing, which was formerly dark, clear, and plain. This is more proper than the common translation brought to light. For the Israelites had an obscure knowledge of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body, given them in the writings of Moses, as is plain from our Lord's words, Luke xx. 37, and from what is related, 2 Macab. vi. 14. 25. See Ex. x. 19. note 2. Nevertheless, as these things were but obscurely revealed in the ancient oracles, the far more correct doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which signifies (Rom. xi. 26.) the express promise to raise the dead, and give eternal life to believers, is more properly he called a making things clear. The heathens also had some confused hopes of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body. But as they had no ground for these hopes but uncertain traditions, their own wishes, they were much in the dark as to these things. And therefore, concerning these important matters, it is quite just to say, that in former ages they were not made known to the sons of men, as they are now revealed to the holy apostles and prophets, by the Spirit, Eph. iii. 5.

Var. 12.—1. For which cause I suffer even such things:—By assigning his preaching salvation to the Gentiles, without any reliance on the law of Moses, as the cause of his second bondage in Rome, he hath instated, that the unbelieving Jews were active in getting him imprisoned, and tried for his life as a criminal.

2. I know in whom I have believed:—By appearing to Paul on the road to Damascus, and by bestowing on him the spiritual gift, Jesus convinced him that he was risen from the dead, and that he was the Son of God. Wherefore, he could say with the greatest confidence, 'that he knew in whom he had believed.' He knew that Jesus was no impostor, but the Son of God, the Governor of the world, and the judge of the living and of the dead.

3. I am persuaded he is able to preserve what is committed to trust in me:—εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, literally, my deposit. This signifies either something which the apostle had deposited, or committed in trust to Christ, to be preserved and restored to him at the last day; or something which Christ had committed in trust to him to be preserved. They who understand the phrase in the first sense, think the apostle speaks of the deposit or property which he had committed to Christ to preserve his bodily life, to preserve till he should restore it to him at the last day. This doctrine is a good sense, and is applied to Paul in 1 Pet. i. 19. 'Let those who suffer according to the will of God, (εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ) and commit the care thereof to him for an unspotted entry into the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' By the Holy Ghost who dwelleth in us, the apostle represents the doctrine of the gospel as a deposit committed to him, and to the other faithful ministers of Christ, to be preserved in purity; (see ver. 1. note 1.) I am of opinion, that εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, in this verse, means the true doctrine of the gospel committed to trust in the apostle, and to the faithful men mentioned 2 Tim. ii. 2. It is true, that in ver. 14. and in 1 Tim. vi. 20, where the same injunction is given, the word used is not εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, so in this verse, but εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ; but these words have the same meaning, being both of them derived from εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ, which signifies to commit a thing to trust to another to be kept; and it is applied in particular to doctrines; 2 Tim. ii. 2. 'What things thou hast heard from me by many witnesses, these (εἰς τὸ ἀλλῷ) commit thou to faithful men, who shall be also able to teach others.' It being the great duty of the ministers of Christ, in that, and in every age, to preserve in purity the doctrines of the gospel committed to trust in them, the apostle, to encourage them, declared himself as世界上最 mich;—brought to light. For the Israelites had an obscure knowledge of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body, given them in the writings of Moses, as is plain from our Lord's words, Luke xx. 37, and from what is related, 2 Macab. vi. 14. 25. See Ex. x. 19. note 2. Nevertheless, as these things were but obscurely revealed in the ancient oracles, the far more correct doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which signifies (Rom. xi. 26.) the express promise to raise the dead, and give eternal life to believers, is more properly he called a making things clear. The heathens also had some confused hopes of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body. But as they had no ground for these hopes but uncertain traditions, their own wishes, they were much in the dark as to these things. And therefore, concerning these important matters, it is quite just to say, that in former ages they were not made known to the sons of men, as they are now revealed to the holy apostles and prophets, by the Spirit, Eph. iii. 5.
thou hast heard from me, hold fast, with the faith and love which are in Christ Jesus.
14 The good deposit, guard by the Holy Ghost, who dwelleth in us.
15 Thou knowest this, that all they who are in Asia have turned me off; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

May the Lord grant mercy to the family of Onesiphorus, (see v. 18, note), for he often refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; (see ver. 8.) 16 But in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me.
17 May the Lord grant to him to find mercy (mercy) from the Lord in that day. And how many things he ministered to me in Ephesus, thou knowest well.

2. Of wholesome words which thou hast heard from me. This is the literal translation of the words " ἀλματία ἐπαραγαμή". See 2 Tim. i. 12, note 3. The Cambridge Greek Testament reads " ὁ σωστὸς λόγος μυθουσ...". But in 2 Tim. i. 12, note 1. Our translators have added the words in italics, which are not in the original, and besides are unnecessary, because the apostle is speaking of a deposit committed in trust to himself as well as to Timothy, as plain from the first words of the verse, "Guard by the Holy Ghost...". As the form of wholesome words, mentioned ver. 13, was a part of the deposit, an exhortation to guard them was extremely necessary before the writings of the apostle and epistles were published, in which the doctrines of the gospel were expressed in words taught by the Holy Ghost. And now that these inspired writings are in our possession, this exhortation implies, that we ought to preserve them pure without any alteration; and that all the translations which are made of them ought to exhibit, as nearly as possible, those ideas and words which were dictated to the inspired writers by the Spirit of God. See 1 Cor. ii. 13, note 1.

2. The Holy Ghost who dwelleth in us. The apostle means the gift of discerning spirits, which was bestowed by the Holy Ghost on many of the first Christians, to enable them to judge of teachers pretensions to inspiration, and of their doctrines.

Ver. 16. - All they who are in Asia have turned me off. According to the Greek commentators, the apostle is here speaking of the actions of the Judaizing teachers, who had followed him from Asia to Rome. But if this were his meaning, we must be translated by the word from, which is a very unusual sense of that preposition. I agree with the ancient in thinking the Judaizing teachers, and not the brethren in Asia, are here meant; because it is not to be thought that all the brethren either from or in Asia turned Paul off from being their apostle or teacher, by denying his apostolical commission. Benson conjectures that Onesiphorus informed the apostle of the defection of the Judaizing teachers in the province of Asia; and that the apostle mentioned a thing which Phygellus and Hermogenes, who was on the spot, knew, to stir him up to the greater diligence in guarding the deposit of the word of God.

16. May the Lord grant mercy to the family of Onesiphorus. For he continued his attachment to me, and often comforted me in my imprisonment, by his visits and friendly offices, and was not ashamed of me though chained as a malefactor; but being come to Rome, he searched for me with great diligence among the different prisons in the city, and at last found me.

For that good man himself I pray, May the Lord reward him for his kindness to me, and grant him to find pardon from the Lord Jesus in the day of judgment. Besides, how many things he supplied to me while I abode in Ephesus, thus, being a witness thereof, knowest well.
II. TIMOTHY.

Chapter II.

1. Thou, therefore, my son, be strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus.

2. And what things thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others.

3. Thou, therefore, endure suffering, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus.

4. No man that warreth entangleth himself with the business of this life, that he may please him who hath chosen him.

Commentary.

Chapter II. — Because there has been such a general defection among the teachers in Asia, my son, be strong in preaching the grace which is bestowed upon mankind through Christ Jesus.

1. Be strong in grace. — Grace here may signify the office of an evangelist bestowed upon Timothy by the grace of Christ; for it is used to signify the office of an apostle. Rom. 1:6. Or it may signify the spiritual gift bestowed upon Timothy to fit him for his office. In that case the grace is the office. Tit. ii. 11; and the apostle’s meaning may be, that Timothy should strongly set forth the great blessings bestowed on mankind through Christ, as they are revealed in the gospel.

2. And what things thou hast heard of me among many witnesses. — Timothy must teach those things which he learned from the apostle; but if he has heard them from many, he need not confine his teaching to anything which has not been testified by many. The apostle means, that the doctrine of Christ is that which is confirmed by the testimonies of many, and that, therefore, he who candidly devises the truth, and the church of God has the same witness, should be received with full confidence. Paul often appealed in the course of his preaching to the conversation of the people. 1 Tim. iv. 7, 8. Here, therefore, it is the same. When the apostle says that he has heard from many witnesses, he means those who lived in the apostles’ time, and their testimony had been confirmed by time and experience. These witnesses are the ancient prophets who foretold our Lord’s coming in the flesh, and also the apostles and their successors, who have taught us the word of God.

3. Thou, therefore, endure suffering, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. — Here is another exhortation to the patience of the apostle. The way of Christ is like a battle, and it is not possible to follow it without suffering. It is not unimportant to know that the apostle, whose life was passed in the battle of the faith, has written an epistle which is to be read in the churches, that he who has the honor of professing Christ may be strong in faith, and not faint in the day of battle. But the words, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus, mean, that the apostle wishes Timothy to be as a good soldier of Christ, who, being obedient to his master, bears up against the power of the enemy. For as a good soldier must be strong, and must not shrink from danger, so must the apostle, who by the grace of God is carried among men, be strong in the faith of Christ, and be able to endure suffering in the fight for the Gospel.

4. No man that warreth entangleth himself with the business of this life, that he may please him who hath chosen him. — This is a general advice to all, but especially to a minister of the Gospel, that he should be careful to avoid any business which may take him away from his business. For the man who has been chosen by God to be a minister of the Gospel should be free from all worldly cares, and should attend to the interests of his office with all earnestness, and not allow himself to be entangled in the affairs of the world. For the man who is occupied with the business of this life is not able to discharge his office properly, and is not fit to be a minister of the Gospel.
he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.
5 And also, if one (σύν) contend in the games, he is not crowned unless he contend according to the laws.
6 It becometh the husbandman to labour (μείζων) before he partaketh of the fruits.
7 Consider what I say, (ταύτα) and may the Lord give thee understanding in all things.
8 Remember Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, raised from the dead, according to my gospel:
9 (Εσδ. 164.) For which I suffer evil unto bonds, as a malefactor. But the word of God is not bound.
10 For this cause I patiently bear all things (Χρ. 115.) on account of the elected, that they also may obtain the salvation which is by Christ Jesus with eternal glory.
11 (O νομ. 71.) This saying is true, (ταύτα) that if we die with him, we shall also live with him.
12 If we suffer patiently, we shall also reign with him: If we deny him, he also will deny us. (See Matt. 10, 33.)
13 (Ez. 130, 2.) Though we be unfaithful, he abideth faithful. He cannot deny himself.
14 Put them in remembrance of these things, earnestly testifying to them, in the presence of the Lord, not to fight about words, 15 Strive to present yourself to God an approved unashamed workman, who rightly divideth the word of truth.

him to be a soldier. The same rule ought a minister of the gospel to follow, that he may please Christ who hath called him.
5 And also, if one contend in the Grecian games, he is not crowned unless he contend according to the laws of the combat. As little can thou expect to be rewarded, unless thou fulfill thy ministry in the manner prescribed by Christ.
6 It becometh the husbandman to labour his field before he partakes of the fruits of it. How much more oughtest thou to labor in the ministry before thou art rewarded!
7 Consider what I say concerning the necessity of devoting thyself wholly to the ministry, and of enduring evil, and may the Lord Jesus give thee a just discernment in all religious matters.
8 Often recollect and preach, that Jesus Christ, who was descended from David, was raised from the dead, and thereby demonstrated to be the true Messiah, according to the gospel which I preach.
9 For which gospel I suffer even unto bonds, as a malefactor. But though my enemies may bind me, they cannot bind the word of God. It will spread itself in spite of all opposition.
10 For this cause I patiently bear all things in account of the Gentiles elected to be the people of God, (see 1 Pet. 1, 1 note 3), that they also may obtain the salvation from sin and death which is procured by Christ Jesus, and which will be accompanied with eternal glory.
11 Suffering for Christ is not so great a misfortune as the world imagines: For this affirmation is true, that if we die with Christ, as martyrs for religion, we shall also live with him eternally.
12 If, like Christ, we suffer persecution patiently, we shall also reign with him: But if, when brought before kings and councils, we from fear deny our relation to him, he will, at the judgment, deny that he knows us.
13 Though we be unfaithful in denying him, he abideth faithful to all his promises and threatenings. He cannot act contrary to his own essential perfections.
14 Put the Ephesians in mind of these great motives, earnestly testifying to them in the presence of Christ, and as they shall answer to him, not to fight about words, (see 1 Tim. vi. 4, note 2), as the Judasites do, to no manner of use, but to the subverting of the faith and morals of the hearers.
15 Strive to behave so as at last thou mayest present thyself to God an approved unashamed workman, who hath rightly distributed the doctrine of the gospel to all, according to their need.
II. TIMOTHY.

16 But profane empty babblings, ( september, circumstantial), resist; for they will increase to more ungodliness;

17 And their word will eat as a gangrene: of whom are Hymenaeus and Philetus;

18 Who concerning the truth have erred, afferring that the resurrection hath already happened; and overturn the faith of some.

19 (Merry) Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth firm, having this seal, Thf Lord will make known them who are his: And, let every one who nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity.

20 But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earthenware; and some to honour, and some to dishonour.

21 If, then, a man will cleanse himself well from those things, he will be a vessel appointed to honour, sanctified, and very profitable for the master's use, prepared for every good work.

22 Flee (2, 106.) therefore youthful lusts: But pursue righteousness, faith, love, and peace, with them who call on the Lord from a pure heart.

Vers. 17. Of whom are Hymenaeus and Philetus.—The apostle mentions these two by name, as profane empty babblers who were false teachers. Because their errors were of the most dangerous nature: as evident from the report which the apostles give of them in the next verse. And because Hymenaeus, in particular, had spoken disrespectfully of Christ, the apostle found it necessary to deliver him to Satan, 1 Tim. i, 20; Philetus is mentioned nowhere else in scripture. Perhaps these teachers denied that Jesus Christ came in the flesh, see 1 John iv. 2, consequently denied the reality both of his death and of his resurrection. See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3.

Vers. 19. Aberating the resurrection hath already happened.—They affirmed, that the only resurrection Christ promised was a spiritual resurrection from sin and error by believing the gospel; and that that resurrection having already happened, no other is to be expected. See Irenaeus, lib. ii. c. 5. This doctrine, the apostle says, he supposed, on Christ's words, John v. 23, 25, 26, wherein dwells a spiritual resurrection is spoken of. But they overlooked the other parts of his discourse, ver. 26, 28, in which he promised expressly the resurrection of the body,—by explaining the doctrine of the resurrection of the body in a figurative sense. Hymenaeus and Philetus endeavoured to recommend the gospel to the Greek philosophers, who considered the resurrection of the body not only as impossible in itself, but as highly dishonourable, had it been possible. See Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 4. These Judæans, however, carried the matter farther than even the Greek philosophers. For, being Scholastics, who held that there is nothing external, and that the soul is a pure substance, they denied the resurrection of the body, they denied the future existence of the man. The heresy of Hymenaeus was that which Irenæus ascribes to the Gnostics, lib. 2. c. 37. "Ezech resurrectionem a mortuus ascendit aequus, quos ab ipsius placuerit resurrerat." This heresy seems afterwards to have been exposed by Marcellus, who said, "Non carnis sed animae resurrectionem esse exponamus. We are not to believe the resurrection of the body, but of the soul." Epiphanius Hierem. 12.

Vers. 20. If, then, a man will cleanse himself well from those things, he will be a vessel appointed to honour, sanctified, and very profitable for the master's use, prepared for every good work.

3. The Lord will make known them who are his, &c.—The apostle and prophesies, as the foundation stones of the temple of God, the Christian church, have this inscription graven upon them, "The Lord will make known them who are his." These are nearly the words which Moses spoke to Korah and his company, who endeavoured to overturn his authority, Num. xvi. 6. "The Lord will shew who are his," which the LXX. have translated as the apostle hath done: ον εστιν ὁ λαός, ὃς ἐστίν ὁ βασιλεὺς. "The Lord will make known them who are his." This inscription is said to be written on the foundation of God, that is, on the apostles, and is called a seal, or confirmation of their authority, in allusion to the common use of seals. The remaining part of the inscription is: "Depart from the tents of these wicked men." The opposition of the heretical teachers to the apostle, was as real a rebellion against God as the opposition of Korah and his company to Moses, and was certainly to be punished. Wherefore, to the safety of the faithful, it was necessary that they should not depart from these heretical teachers, as it was to the safety of the Israelites that they should not depart from the tents of Korah and his companions. To show this, and to make the heretical teachers sensible of the destruction that was coming upon them, the apostle represents a command, similar to that given by Moses to the Israelites, as written on the apostles, the foundation stones of the church of God: Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity; let them depart from wicked teachers, lest they be involved in their punishments.

Vers. 20. 1. And of earthenware.—The word οὐσίας signifies vessels of clay, such as potters make, and which are appropriated to mean those made of gold and silver. They are called οὐσίαι, because being burnt in the fire, they are hard like shells.

2. And some to dishonour.—The application of the comparison begins in this verse, as it was in the comparison Rom. x. 12, and other instances. But the member wanting here may be thus supplied:—Just as in the church, which is the house of God, there are teachers of different characters and capacities; and some of them, being faithful, are employed in the honourable work of leading men in the path of truth, and of making vessels of others, being unfaithful, are permitted to follow the dishonourable occupation of solving them who love error, that the approved may be manifest. See Pref. sect. 4, penult. para. at the middle.

degrees exchange that pleasure which it takes in the performance of its duty, for delights of a much more intense and unprofitable nature." Spectator, No. 447.—The Jews seem to have been remarkably deficient in the virtues mentioned by the apostle, being men of immoral lives.

Ver. 24. And the servant of the Lord must not strife.—In this and the following verse, the apostle seems to have had Christ’s example as a teacher in his eye, proposing it as a model to all who are engaged in teaching. The virtues here mentioned, our Lord generally exemplified in teaching: Yet, on some occasions, he deplored from his usual kindness, and with great severity reproved notorious sinners, such as the scribes and pharisees. In the same manner, the prophets and apostles used strong speech in checking obstinate offenders; while those who showed any caution and honour in their opposition to the gospel, they instructed with the gentleness of Christ, preaching, to the carnal conscience ver. 25.

Ver. 25.—And being caught alive by him out of the snare of the devil, they may awake to do the will of God. The word ἐξέλαβον means the servan of the Lord, and ἐξέλαβον, the demonstrative, refers to God, mentioned ver. 10.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Prediction concerning the Apostacy, and of the other Matters contained in this Chapter.

The apostle, in the end of the preceding chapter, having informed Timothy, that for wise reasons false teachers were suffered to arise, he in the beginning of this chapter foretold, that in future times, through the pernicious influence of the corrupt doctrines propagated by false teachers, many in the Christian church, and among the rest the false teachers themselves, would become so wicked, that it would be dangerous to the faithful to live among them, ver. 1.—Men would be unmeasurable selfish, scandalously covetous of money, boasters of being high in favour with God, insolent on that account, blasphemers of God by the injurious representations which they would give of his character and will, disobedient to parents, ungrateful to benefactors, unholy in their dispositions, ver. 2.—Without the affections natural to mankind, avowed covenant-breakers, slanderers of those who maintained the truth, immoderately addicted to sensual pleasures against those who oppose their corrupt practices, having no love to good men, ver. 3.—Betrayers of trusts, headstrong in their errors, swollen with pride, and lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, ver. 4.—And to shew that in this description the teachers of religion were comprehended, the apostle added, that the persons of whom he spoke, in order to conceal their enormous wickedness, would make loud pretensions to superior sanctity; they were to have the outward appearance of godliness, but in practice they would deny its power. And because some teachers of this character were then beginning to shew themselves, the apostle told them, ver. 6.—Of this sort, he told him, those teachers were, who, on pretence of instructing the female part of families, introduced themselves into houses, and led captive silly women laden with sin, by assuming the direction of their conscience, ver. 6.—And who detained them in bondage, by keeping them always learning, and never leading them to the knowledge of the truth, ver. 7.

This part of the chapter is generally, and I think justly, considered as a prediction of the apostacy from the faith and practice of the gospel which early began to take place in the Christian church, but which was not carried to its height, till the Roman empire in the west was overthrown by the incursions of the barbarous nations.—Of that apostacy St. Paul had prophesied twice before: namely, 2 Thess. ii. 3–12. and 1 Tim. iv. 1–5. In the first of these passages, the blasphemous claims of the corrupters of Christianity in later ages, their feigned miracles, and other abuses by which they were to establish their usurped authority in the church, are described: In the second passage, the impious doctrines and superstitious practices, which, by virtue of that authority, they were to introduce, are particularly set forth. But in this epistle, the influence of the Ungodly doctrines and superstitious practices of the promoters of the apostacy, in corrupting the morals both of the teachers and of the people, are foretold. These three prophecies taken together, exhibit such a striking portrait of the characters, pretensions, and practices of the promoters of the apostacy, that no intelligent reader, who is acquainted with the history of the church, can doubt that the erroneous doctrines and superstitious practices which were early introduced, and which, under mistaken notions of sanctity, were supported by persons of the greatest reputation, are in these propositions for the sake of truth in that monstrous fabric of spiritual tyranny, which the bishops of Rome, assisted by their clergy, erected; and in that universal corruption of manners which it occasioned. As little can he doubt, that the productions of these evils recorded in scripture, were designed by the Spirit of God to convince the faithful in after-times who were to be witnesses of the apostasy, that it had happened by the permission of God, who often makes the wickedness of men instrumental in accomplishing his greatest purposes.

Last, however, the knowledge of that great and universal corruption which was to take place in the church, might have led Timothy and the brethren at Ephesus to fear that the church would never recover from such a sad state, the apostle observed, that the opposition of the authors and promoters of the apostasy to the truth, was of the same nature, and would end in the same manner, as the opposition of Pharaoh’s magicians to Moses. For as Jannes and Jambres resisted him by false miracles, so the promoters of the apostasy, being men corrupted in mind, would resist the true doctrines of the gospel by spurious miracles and other base arts, ver. 9. But they would not be permitted to go on in their deceits longer than the time determined. Their wicked practices would at length be made plain to the deluded themselves, as the wicked practices of Pharaoh’s magicians were made plain both to the Israelites and to the Egyptians, ver. 9.—Then,

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III. — 1 (Verse 6, 104.) This also know, that in latter days perilous times will come:

2 For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy,

3 Without natural affection, disbelievers, accursed, without love, without sound mind, 4 Betrayers, headestrong, puffed up, see 1 Tim. iii. 6, note 2, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God: 5 Having a form of godliness, but denying Ver. 1. In latter days. — The phrase ἐν τοῖς μετὰ τὴν σαρκαστικήν ἡμεραῖαν, which signifies future days or time, without marking whether these days were far off or near at hand. And therefore it does not signify the last of the world, as in our English phrase, but future age in general, being in this same import with τοῖς μετὰ τὴν σαρκαστικήν, latter times, 1 Tim. iv. 1, where also the apostle is foretold.

Ver. 2.—1. For all men shall be. — The word men includes both teachers and people. The apostle seems to have had the teachers principally in his eye here, as is plain from ver. 6, where he represents them as “going into houses, and leading captive all the women,” and ver. 8, where he likens them to Jannes and Jambres, on account of their resisting the truth, by the false miracles which they pretended to work. 2. Self-lovers. — The extreme selfishness of the teachers of religion in latter times, the apostle mentioned first of all in this prophecy, because their other vices were to originate from and proceed from this. The time at which this is said to be in this and the following verses have always existed in the world: But being spoken of here as characteristic of the latter days, it isplain, that besides being common in the latter days, they would be openly showed and defended. Accordingly it is well known, that in the dark ages the clergy defended all the enormities mentioned by the apostle, encouraged the people by their false doctrine to commit them, and went before in the practice of these enormities.

3. Money-lovers. — The Roman clergy have carried their love of money to such an height, that they pretend to sell heaven for money, even in the wickedlest of men, under the name of indulgences.

4. Disobedience to parents. — In the language of the Hebraists, parents signified superiors of every denomination. The disobedience of the Roman clergy to princes and magistrates, and even to their deposing princes, is well known. It may also signify their encouraging children to become monks and nuns, contrary to the will of their parents.

Ver. 3.—1. Without natural affection. — The Roman clergy being forbidden to marry, can have neither wives nor children openly; so are without the affections natural to mankind; at least they dare not show their having these affections. — It may likewise be meant of the laity, who were to shun up their female sex in numbers, in prudence of superior sanctity, but in reality from interested motives.

5. Standerers. — The authors and abettors of the apostasy will impose all manner of crimes to those who resist their corruptions. How exactly this hath been fulfilled in the Roman clergy, all who are acquainted with their history know.

Ver. 4.—1. Betrayers. — Προδοταί, if this word is translated traitors, as in our Bible, it may signify, that they would deliver up their nearest relations to death who opposed their corruptions. See Mark xii. 12.

2. Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God. — It is observable, that this description begins with mentioning extreme selfishness as the root, and concludes with the excessive love of sensual pleasure as the end, of all the corruptions that were to prevail in latter times. Hence we may learn, what a pernicious thing the excessive love of sensual pleasure is. It hath been the source of those monstrous perjuries of religion which have endangered Christians in the dark ages; and governed by it, many in every age destroy their health, their fortune, their punishment, the support of their families, and every thing valuable in life, for the sake of gratifying their appetites.

II. Timothy.

more effectually, will have an appearance of godliness, by their care in performing the external duties of religion, but they will be utterly void of real piety. Now, from these turn away.

6. Of these indeed they are, who go into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away by divers lusts;

7. Always learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

8. Now, in the manner that Janes and Jambres resisted Moses, so by false miracles (ver. 13.) these teachers will resist the truth; men wholly corrupted in mind, undiscerning, concerning the faith.

9. However, they shall not proceed further: For knowledge shall be very plain to all, as their also was.

10. But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, meekness, love, patience.

11. Persecutions, sufferings, such as befell me in Antichis, in Iconium, in Lystra: Such persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me.

12. And all ind which I was to live godly in Christ Jesus shall be persecuted.

13. Now wicked men and sorcerers will wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.

14. But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned, and with which thou hast been instructed, to the end that thou mayest be able to present thee an approved workman unto God, approved to be sound in the faith; instructed in the doctrine of Christ Jesus, and therefore able to teach others also.

Ver. 8. From these turn away. Some think the phrase turn away may be translated these turn away; turn out of the church all teachers who have any resemblance to the persons I have mentioned. They are introducing the corruptions, which, in after-times, their successors will carry to the height I have described.

Ver. 9. 1. Of these, indeed, they are who go into houses, and lead captive silly women, &c. This with the two subsequent verses, is thought by some to be a prophetic description of the practices of the Roman monks and friars of the dark ages, who, by hypostatical pretensions to extraordinary sanctity, and by pernicious confessions and other wicked arts, deluded and corrupted the laity. But this I think is rather to be understood as a practice universal to these early in the church, and by a gradual progress were at length, under the Romish hierarchy, formed into a regular system of deceit. We may therefore suppose, that as in the prophecies which foretell the political state of the world, so in the prophecies concerning the apostasy in which its religious state is represented, the general course of things, through a succession of ages, is foretold, rather than the state of things in any particular age.

This I think will be allowed; when it is considered, that not the rise only, but the progress and downfall of the apostasy, is foretold in these prophecies. So that their subject being a series of things which were to happen throughout a long course of years, and which were gradually to produce a widely extended and confirmed state of corruption in the church, there is no reason for limiting their fulfillment to any particular period.

2. Led away by divers lusts. The word διαφθορίας, lewdness, being properly applied to beasts which are led in hales wheresoever their owners please, it signifies that these women were slaves to their lusts.

Ver. 10. Haast fully known. The word γνωσίας is applied to one who follows another in walking, and keeps close by him. Metaphorically it signifies, to attain the complete knowledge of a thing. In this sense it is used Luke 1. 2.

Ver. 11. Timothy being a native of Lystra, and the apostle's disciple and companion, when the apostle was expelled from that city, and dragged out of the street as one dead, he may, as Remov supposed, have been present, and have been one of those who stood round him when he revived, Acts xvi. 38.

Ver. 12. But wicked men and sorcerers. And sorcerers. This word properly denotes sorcerers, enchanters, magicians, who, deceiving the vulgar by false miracles, make them in his attempt to persuade Pharaoh to let the Israelites go.

2. To these also resist the truth. Resist the truth in the manner Janes and Jambres resisted Moses; namely, by false miracles. In the early ages the heathen teachers were much addicted to the study of magic. Clem. Alexz. Strom. lib. v. p. 104, tells us, that some of the Greeks pretended to have access to the books of Zoroaster. We know likewise, that in later times the monks and friars were great pretenders to miracles. Hence they are called, ver. 13. γνωσίας, magicians. The apostle, therefore, in reproving the heathen teachers who were to arise in the church in after-times, with great propriety compared them, both in their character and punishment, to Pharaoh's magicians.

4. Undiscerning concerning the faith. As Rom. i. 28. signifies a mind incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, so ignorant in this passage may signify persons incapable of distinguishing the true doctrines of the gospel.

Ver. 11. However, they shall not proceed further. How exactly the whole of this prophetical history has been fulfilled, they know who are acquainted with the history of the ancient heresies, and of the Roman church, and of the Reformation.

2. For their foolishness shall be very plain to all. As, their want of understanding. The apostle does not charge the errors of the authors of the apostasy, and the base arts by which they established their authority, foolishness, because, though they thought themselves superlatively wise in the methods which they devised for obtaining power and wealth, their doctrines and practices were as void of reason as are the imaginations and actions of fools: Or, foolishness here may signify imposture.

3. And thine also was. The vile arts by which the corruptions of Christianity established their errors being discovered, their folly and wickedness shall be very plain to the people, even as the folly and wickedness of Pharaoh's magicians was made plain to the Egyptians, by the stop which God put in their enchantments. And thus the truth being set in a more clear light, the wisdom and righteousness of God, in permitting these corruptions to take place for a while, will be demonstrated.

Ver. 10. Haast fully known. The word γνωσίας is applied to one who follows another in walking, and keeps close by him. Metaphorically it signifies, to attain the complete knowledge of a thing. In this sense it is used Luke 1. 2.

Ver. 11. Timothy being a native of Lystra, and the apostle's disciple and companion, when the apostle was expelled from that city, and dragged out of the street as one dead, he may, as Remov supposed, have been present, and have been one of those who stood round him when he revived, Acts xvi. 38.

Ver. 12. But wicked men and sorcerers. And sorcerers. This word properly denotes sorcerers, enchanters, magicians, who, deceiving the vulgar by false miracles, make them in his attempt to persuade Pharaoh to let the Israelites go.
been intrusted, knowing from whom thou hast learned them:

15. And that from a child thou hast known the sacred scriptures, which are able to make thee wise to salvation by the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

16. The whole scripture is divinely inspired, and is profitable for teaching, for confession, for correction, in instruction in righteousness;

17. That the man of God may be perfect, and thoroughly fitted for every good work.

II. TIMOTHY.

USE CHAP. III.

1. That the writer of the several books had all the thoughts, and even the very words suggested to them by the Spirit of God; and that they were the penmen of the Spirit, to commit to writing just as he dictated to them. In fact, they all thought with more latitude; and wrote indeed, as if they had received the Law from God; and that the prophets were inspired by the Spirit to foretell future events which lay out of the reach of human foresight; but that they were left to express themselves in their own words and phrases, in which they give a faithful account of what the Spirit dictated to them, and what the Spirit designed, strengthened their memories, and preserved from mistakes, this last opinion may be more correct. See 1 Cor. ii. 13. 1 Thes. ii. 13. Gal. i. 12. and Acts. ix. 17.

1. That the man of God (see 1 Tim. vi. 11) may be perfect, and thoroughly fitted for every good work. The apostle's exhortations to the Jewish scriptures make in each part of their divine inspiration, and as such are of great assistance in understanding the gospel revelation; so that a Christian minister, who rightly understands them, is thereby well fitted for every part of his work. Our Lord also, on various occasions, bare testimony to the Jewish scriptures, and to their connexion with the gospel. Luke xxiv. 27. "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he explained unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself." He also commanded his disciples to "search these scriptures, because they testify of me." John v. 39, etc. What then are we to think of those teachers, who are so much pains to disjoin the Christian revelation from the Jewish, as if the latter were not of divine origin, and had no connexion with the gospel; and instead of illustrating and confirming the gospel, were rather an encumbrance to it? In this excrement of the Jewish scriptures the duties of a Christian minister are declared to be — 1. To teach the people the true doctrine of the gospel. 2. To confute all errors contrary to true doctrine. 3. To correct, by proper admonitions, reproves, and exhortations, those who openly transgress the precepts of the gospel. 4. To direct and encourage all to follow a righteous course of life. Lastly, in this excrement of the Jewish scriptures the apostle encourages the Judaisers, who affirmed that the law was contrary to the gospel.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Solemn Charge given to Timothy in this Chapter.

Having in the preceding chapter explained to Timothy the duties of his office as an evangelist, the apostle now solemnly charged him, in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is to judge the living and the dead at his second coming, to be diligent and faithful in all the duties of his ministry, by preaching true doctrine, confuting gain-sayers, rebuking sinners, and exhorting both the teachers and the people under his care, to behave properly in every respect, ver. 1, 2, because the time was approaching in which the people would not endure wholesome doctrine; lest having ears full of doctrine and unable to hear the word of truth, which is the power of God, and can save both the soul and the body, ver. 3, 4. Next, he exhorted Timothy to watch at all times to oppose the entrance of false doctrine and corrupt practices, without being intimidated by the evils to which he might expose himself by his fidelity; and to do the work of an evangelist in such a manner as to show himself an approved minister of Christ, ver. 5. Then told him, that he was thus earnest in his exhortations to him, because the time of his departure was come, ver. 6. — and because he himself had combated the good combat, had finished the race, and had all along preserved the faith pure, ver. 7. — and was to be rewarded as a conqueror in the good combat with a crown of righteousness, by Christ the righteous judge of the world; so that if Timothy proved equally courageous and faithful in discharging the duties of his ministry, he might expect the same reward from Christ, who will bestow a crown of righteousness on all who, conscious of their own integrity, long for his appearing to judge the world, ver. 8.

In the remaining part of the chapter the apostle gave Timothy a particular account of his own affairs, and of the behaviour both of his friends and enemies, ver. 9—18. — Then desired him to salute Priscus and Aquila, and the family of Onesiphorus, ver. 19. — And because he had left Erastus at Corinth, and Trophimus at Milestae, and all his assistants had fled from the city, he begged him to come to Rome before winter. Then give him the

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. I have fully instructed thee in thy duties, and thou art well acquainted with the Jewish scriptures, in which the gospel is both explained and confirmed; I charge thee, therefore, in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, who will judge the living and the dead at his appearing, when his kingdom shall be displayed in all its glory.

Ver. 2. Preach the gospel doctrine in purity; be constant and earnest in preaching it, whether it be reasonable or unreasonable to the people; do not confute false teachers, rebuke wholly, but be patient with them, being under thy care, with the greatest patience when teaching them.

Ver. 3. Thou oughtest to be very faithful and diligent in these duties now; for there will be a time when the people will not endure wholesome doctrine or teaching, but having itching ears, they will, by the motions of their own peculiar lusts, multiply to themselves teachers, who, to gain their favour, will sooth them them in their vices.

Ver. 4. And thus indeed they will turn away their ears from the true doctrine of the gospel, and, by their teachers, they will be led aside to believe fables, concerning miracles wrought in support of the greatest errors.

Ver. 5. But watch thou at all times, and withstand the beginnings of these corruptions; patiently bear the work of an evangelist; fully perform thy ministry; (see ver. 17, note 1.)

Ver. 6. For the church is soon to lose the benefit of my ministry: I am already poured out, and the time of my departure hath come.

Ver. 7. Henceforth there is laid aside for me a crown of righteousness, (Phil. iii. 14, note 2,) which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will deliver to me at that day; and not to me only, but to all them also who love his appearing.

22 The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen.

II. TIMOTHY.

17 However, though men forsook me when brought to my trial, the Lord Jesus, according to his promise, Luke xxi. 15. stood by me and strengthened me, that on such an occasion, and before such personages, through me the preaching concerning Christ might be fully declared, and that all the Gentiles might hear that it was so declared; and I escaped with such difficulty, that I cannot describe it better than by saying, I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.

18 And the Lord Jesus will deliver me from every evil work, so that I shall do nothing for the preservation of my life inconsistent with my former preaching; and he will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom. To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

19 In my name with health to Priscilla, and her husband Aquila, and to the family of Onesiphorus.

20 Erastus, who accompanied me in my way to Crete, abode in Corinth. But Trophimus I left at Miletus sick, when I departed from Crete.

21 Make haste to come before winter, sailing being then dangerous. Eubulus saluteth thee. So do Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren with whom I have any intercourse.

22 May the Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit, to strengthen thee in all difficulties and dangers as he hath strengthened me, (ver. 17.) Grace be with you in Ephesus who maintain the truth. Amen.
TITUS.

PREFACE.

SEC. I.—The History of Titus, collected from Paul's Epistles.

Although Titus was a person of such eminence among the first preachers of the gospel, that St. Paul was to him the letter in the canon of scripture which bears his name, for the purpose of directing him how to discharge the duties of his office, his name is not so much as once mentioned by Luke in his book of the Acts. His history, therefore, must consist of such particulars as are related of him in the apostle Paul's epistles, where indeed he is often mentioned with great respect, and of such probable conjectures as these particulars necessarily involve.

That Titus was converted by Paul, appears from his calling him 'his genuine son by the common faith.' Tit. i. 4. Yet at what time, and in what place, Paul converted him, he has never told us. They who think Titus was a religious proselyte before his conversion, are of opinion that he was converted at Antioch, soon after Paul and Barnabas came to that city from Tarsus, as mentioned Acts xii. 25. But others, supposing him to have been originally an idolatrous Gentile, conjecture that his conversion happened in some of the countries of the Lesser Asia, through which Paul travelled in the course of his first apostolical journey; the history of which is given, Acts, chapters xiii. xiv. What is certain is, that Titus was with Paul in Antioch before the Council of Jerusalem; and that having distinguished himself, after his conversion, by his piety and zeal, he was one of those whom the church at Antioch sent to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles and elders concerning the circumcision of the converted proselytes, fourteen years after Paul's own conversion; that is, in the year 49. Gal. ii. 1, 2. When the messenger from the church of Antioch came to Jerusalem, the apostles, elders, and brethren assembled, and, after reasoning on that question, decreed that it was not necessary to circumscribe the converted Gentile proselytes. Nevertheless, the Jews in Jerusalem zealously endeavoured on that occasion to have Titus circumcised. So the apostle inculcates, Gal. ii. 3. where he saith, 'Not even Titus who was with me in being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised.' Here it is proper to remark, that the Jews called all the idolatrous Gentiles Eunomius, Greeks; for in their manner of speaking, Jews and Greeks comprehended the whole of mankind. See Rom. i. 16, note 3. According to this interpretation of the appellation, from the apostle's calling Titus a Greek it may be inferred, that before his conversion he was an idolatrous Gentile. The same thing appears likewise from the attempt of the Judaising sect to force him to be circumcised. For after the decree of the Council was passed freeing the converted proselytes from obedience to the laws of Moses, if Titus, before his conversion, had been one of that denomination, the Judaising sect could not with any show of reason have insisted on his circumcision. Yet, as the Council had determined nothing respecting the converts from among the idolatrous Gentiles, some of the zealous Judaising sects, who by stealth introduced themselves into the private meeting in which Paul explained to James, Peter, and John, the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, when they found out that Titus, before his conversion, was an idolater, might insist to have him circumcised, on pretence that he was not freed from circumcision by the Council's decree. But this attempt to subject a Gentile convert to the law of Moses, Paul resolutely withstood, 'that the truth of the gospel might remain with the Gentiles,' Gal. ii. 5.

After the Council, when Paul and Barnabas, accompanied by Judas and Silas, returned to Antioch, to give the brethren an account of what had happened at Jerusalem, Titus, I suppose, returned with them; and, from that time forth, seems to have accompanied Paul in his travels as one of his assistants. For when the apostle set out from Antioch, to visit the churches which he had gathered among the Gentiles in his first apostolical journey, and to confirm them by delivering to them the decrees of the Council, Titus went with him all the way to Corinth, andlaboured with him in the conversion of the inhabitants of that city. This appears from 2 Cor. viii. 23. 'If any inquire concerning Titus, he is my partner and fellow-labourer in the gospel towards you.' The reason is, the apostle, before he returned to Corinth, having not visited them since their conversion, the fellow-labouring of Titus with him towards the Corinthians must have happened at the time they were converted. If this reasoning is just, then, that after the Council, when Paul set out from Antioch with Silas to visit the churches, Titus either went with them, or was sent away before them with the apostle's letter to the Galatians, which I think was written from Antioch soon after the Council. See the Preface to Galatians, Sect. 2. In that case, when the apostle went through Galatia with the decree, he may have met Titus, and have taken him along with him: Or, during his eighteen months' abode at Corinth, he may have sent for Titus to come and assist him in converting the Corinthians.

After the apostle had planted the gospel in Corinth, he went to Jerusalem. But whether Titus abode at Corinth, or accompanied him to Jerusalem, is not said. This, however, we know, that he came to the apostle, as many others did, during his long residence at Ephesus, mentioned Acts xix. 10. For by him he sent his first letter to the Corinthians, which was written in Ephesus about the time of the riot of Demetrius. This service the apostle assigned to Titus, because being well known to, and much respected by the Corinthians, on account of his former labours among them, he hoped he might have influence in composing the disturbances which had taken place in their church. On his return from Corinth, Titus met the apostle in Macedonia, and gave him such an account of the good disposition of the Corinthians as filled him with joy, and induced him to write them a second letter, which he employed Titus likewise to carry. At the same time, he requested him to excite the Corinthians to finish their collections for the saints in Judea, which they had begun during Titus's former visit to them. In prosecution of this design, Titus abode at Corinth till the apostle himself came and received their collections, and the collections of the other churches of Achaia.—On that occasion, Paul spent three months at Corinth, Acts xx. 3, then set out for Jerusalem, taking Macedonia in his way. His companions in his journey to Jerusalem are mentioned Acts xx. 4, and though Titus is not named as one of them, it does not follow that he was not of the number.—He is not said by Luke to have been with the apostle in Macedonia, in his way to Corinth. Yet, from the apostle's sending him from Macedonia to Corinth with his second epistle to the Corinthians, we learn that he was one of his chief assistants at that time. Wherefore, notwithstanding Luke, in his account of the apostle's return from Greece, hath not mentioned Titus among those who accompanied him to Jerusalem with the collections, he may have been one of them; and having gone with him to Jerusalem, he may have ministered to him during his imprisonment there, and in Cæsarea; nay, he may even have sailed with him to Rome. These, however, are only conjectures; for from the time Titus delivered the apostle's second letter to the Corinthians, in the year 56, we hear nothing of him till the year 62, when he was left by the apostle in Crete, 'to set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city,' Tit. i. 5.

The leaving of Titus in Crete is supposed to have happened some time in the year 62, after the apostle was released from his second imprisonment. This is surprizing, but the less surprizing, if we consider that the apostle was not immediately set free. The Colossians, Thessalonians, and the Hebrews, having promised to visit them, we may believe, that, when at liberty to fulfill his promise, he sailed in spring 62 from Italy or Judea, accompanied by Titus and Timothy. In their way, touching at Crete, they went through the cities, and preached the gospel to the idolatrous inhabitants with such power and success, that great numbers of them were converted. See sect. 2. of this Pref. However, although the apostle's success was so great in Crete, and his converts were not formed into churches, he did not judge it proper to remain in Crete; but, committing the care of the churches there to Titus, with an order to ordain elders in every city, he sailed into Judea in spring 63, accompanied by Timothy. The brethern in that country being greatly distressed by the troubles which preceded the war with the Romans, the apostle, if he heard in Crete of their distress, might think it necessary to hasten his visit to them. Accordingly, as soon as he landed in Judea, he and Timothy went up to Jerusalem, and spent some time there in dealing with the Jews, after which they proceeded to Antioch; and, in their progress through the churches, comforted and established them.—From Antioch the apostle set out on his fifth and last apostolical journey, in which he and Timothy travelled through Syria and Cilicia, then came to Colossae in Phrygia early in the year 64. And seeing he had desired Philemon to provide him a lodging in Colossae, it is reasonable to think he abode there some time. On that occasion, as Benson and others conjecture, he may have written his epistle to Titus in Crete, in which he desired him to come to him at Nicopolis, because he proposed to winter there, Tit. iii. 12—in Colossae the apostle went with Timothy to Ephesus, where, having inquired into the state of the church in that city, he gave the Ephesian brethren such exhortations as he judged necessary, then departed to go into Macedonia, leaving Timothy at Ephesus to charge some teachers not to teach differently from the apostles, 1 Tim. i. 3.

In passing through Macedonia the apostle no doubt visited the Philippians and the other brethren in that province, according to his promise, Philip. ii. 24. That he went forward to Nicopolis to winter there, as he proposed; being accompanied by Erastus and Trophimus, who, it seems, had joined him either at Ephesus or in Macedonia.—In the beginning of the year 65, while the apostle abode at Nicopolis, taking into consideration the weight of the charge which he had devised on Timothy, he wrote to him that excellent letter in the canon called The First Epistle to Timothy, in which he taught him how to discharge the duties of his function properly.—It seems that, at parting with Timothy, St. Paul had promised to return soon to Ephesus from Nicopolis, 1 Tim. iii. 14. But he was disappointed in his resolution. For not long after writing his letter to Timothy, Titus came from Crete to Nicopolis, according to the apostle's order, Tit. iii. 12., and gave him such an account of the state of the churches in that island, as determined him to visit them immediately; so that, laying aside his purpose of returning to Ephesus, he left Nicopolis early in the year 65, accompanied by Titus, Trophimus, and Erastus; the latter of whom went no farther with him than to Corinth, 2 Tim. iv. 20. At his arrival in Crete he no doubt visited the churches, and rectified the disorders which had taken place in them. But while employed in that work, hearing of the persecution which Nero was carrying on against the Christians in Rome, on account of the things that they had set fire to, and to ordain elders in every city,' Tit. i. 4.

The leaving of Titus in Crete is supposed to have happened some time in the year 62, after the apostle was released from his second imprisonment. This is surprising, but the less surprising, if we consider that the apostle was not immediately set free. The Colossians, Thessalonians, and the Hebrews, having promised to visit them, we may believe, that, when at liberty to fulfill his promise, he sailed in spring 62 from Italy or Judea, accompanied by Titus and Timothy. In their way, touching at Crete, they went through the cities, and preached the gospel to the idolatrous inhabitants with such power and success, that great numbers of them were converted. See sect. 2. of this Pref. However, although the apostle's success was so great in Crete, and his converts were not formed into churches, he did not judge it proper to remain in Crete; but, committing the care of the churches there to Titus, with an order to ordain elders in every city, he sailed into Judea in spring 63, accompanied by Timothy. The brethren in that country being greatly distressed by the troubles which preceded the war with the Romans, the apostle, if he heard in Crete of their distress, might think it necessary to hasten his visit to them. Accordingly, as soon as he landed in Judea, he and Timothy went up to Jerusalem, and spent some time there, in dealing with the Jews, after which they proceeded to Antioch; and, in their progress through the churches, comforted and established them.—From Antioch the apostle set out on his fifth and last apostolical journey, in which he and Timothy travelled through Syria and Cilicia, then came to Colossae in Phrygia early in the year 64. And seeing he had desired Philemon to provide him a lodging in Colossae, it is reasonable to think he abode there some time. On that occasion, as Benson and others conjecture, he may have written his epistle to Titus in Crete, in which he desired him to come to him at Nicopolis, because he proposed to winter there, Tit. iii. 12.—From Colossae the apostle went with Timothy to Ephesus, where, having inquired into the state of the church in that city, he gave the Ephesian brethren such exhortations as he judged necessary, then departed to go into Macedonia, leaving Timothy at Ephesus to charge some teachers not to teach differently from the apostles, 1 Tim. i. 3.

In passing through Macedonia the apostle no doubt visited the Philippians and the other brethren in that province, according to his promise, Philip. ii. 24. That he went forward to Nicopolis to winter there, as he proposed; being accompanied by Erastus and Trophimus, who, it seems, had joined him either at Ephesus or in Macedonia.—In the beginning of the year 65, while the apostle abode at Nicopolis, taking into consideration the weight of the charge which he had devised on Timothy, he wrote to him that excellent letter in the canon called The First Epistle to Timothy, in which he taught him how to discharge the duties of his function properly.—It seems that, at parting with Timothy, St. Paul had promised to return soon to Ephesus from Nicopolis, 1 Tim. iii. 14. But he was disappointed in his resolution. For not long after writing his letter to Timothy, interference from his brethren apostles; just as the apostles of the circumcision modelled, corrected, and governed the churches planted by them, without any interference from him.

If the foregoing reasoning is just, the account given in sect. 1. may be admitted; namely, that St. Paul sailed into Crete, after he was released from his first confinement at Rome; that, at his landing in Crete, he went through the different cities, and converted many of the inhabitants; and that, being in haste to perform his intended visit to the Hebrews, he committed the care of modelling and settling the churches in Crete to Titus, and then set out with Timothy for Judea.—These transactions I think happened after the apostle’s release from his first confinement at Rome, because, though he touched at Crete in his voyage to Rome to prosecute his appeal to the Emperor, being a prisoner, he would not be allowed to go through the island to preach; consequently, if he made any converts on that occasion, they must have been few.

Sect. III.—Of the Island of Crete, and of the Character and Manners of its Inhabitants.

Crete, where Titus exercised his ministry when the apostle wrote his letter to him, is one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean, and lies to the south of the Archipelago. In length from west to east, it is about 250 miles, in breadth about 50, and in circuit about 600. Anciently it was famous for its hundred cities; for the arrival of Europa on a bull from Phoenicia; for the laws of Minos, one of its kings; for the loves of Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, and of his daughter Ariadne; for the labyrinth, the work of Dedalus; for the destruction of the Minotaur; but above all, for the sepulchre of Jupiter, with his name inscribed upon it. See Titus i. 12, note 2. And to finish the mythological history of Crete, it was famous for Mount Ida, where Jupiter is said to have been preserved from his father Saturn, and educated by the Cretan, Corymbantes, or Ithacius.

According to ancient authors, Creto was originally peopled from Palestine. This fact Bochart hath rendered probable, by observing, (Canaan, lib. i. c. 15.), that part of Palestine which is on the Mediterranean was by the Arabs called Kirith, and by the Syrians Creth; and that the Hebrews called the inhabitants Crothi or Crethim, which the L. X. X. have translated Κρητα, Cretains, Ezek. xiv. 19, Zeph. ii. 8. That these must not speak of the island of Crete, is plain from their joining the Philistim with the Crothim, as one and the same people. Accordingly it appears, that the Crothim were a part of the Philistim; Crethi, or, as it is in the Chaldee paraphrase, Creth, being declared, 1 Sam. xxx. 14–16. to be the land of the Philistines.

Bochart adds, That the Crethi in Palestine were noted archaei, and that some of them were employed by King David as his lifeguards. See 2 Sam. viii. 16, 18. xvi. 23. 1 Kings i. 38. 1 Chron. xvii. 17. in all which places they are called in our translation Chereithites, but the original word is Creti, which is the Chaldee paraphrase for Crothim, Creth, and Crethim, which our translators have rendered, ‘I will cut off the Chereithites;’ but the literal translation is, ‘I will cut off the cutters off,’ namely, the Crothim.

Sir Isaac Newton also is of opinion that Creto was peopled from Palestine, as appears from his Chronology, page 13. where he saith, ‘Many of the Phenicians and Syrians, in the year before Christ 1045, fled from Zidon, and from King David, into Asia Minor, Crete, Greece, and Lybia; and introduced letters, music, poetry, the Octeuctes, metals and their fabrics, and other arts, sciences, and customs of the Phenicians.—Along with these Phenicians, came a sort of men skilled in the religious mysteries, arts, and sciences of Phenicia, and settled in several places under the names of Cretes, Idei Dactylis,’ &c.

The Crothi from Palestine who settled themselves in Crete, seem to have given their own name to that island. In their new habitation they continued to be famous archers, (see Tournefort, vol. i. page 83.), and to exercise all the arts which they formerly practised in Palestine; especially that of navigation, which they employed in piracy. They brought with them likewise all the vices of the Canaanites, being exceedingly addicted to glutony, drunkenness, and lust. Withal they were extremely covetous, and notorious liars; in so much that to speak like a Cretian, became a proverb for telling lies and deceiving; and a Cretian lie, signified the greatest and most impudent lie. Epimenides, one of their own poets, and Strabo, a native of Crete, have branded the Cretians as notorious liars; particularly Epimenides, who, in a verse quoted by Paul, Tit. i. 12, charged them not only with lying, but with glutony and idleness. And the apostle, ver. 13. declared, that these vices constituted their true character. In fine, Polybius, lib. vi. tells us, that the Cretians were the only people in the world who forsook nothing, and added nothing to money, whatever way it was gained.—This account of the character of the Cretians, shews the propriety of the apostle’s injunction to Titus, chap. i. 13. ‘Rebuke them sharply, that they may be healed in the faith.’

Tournefort, who visited Crete in the beginning of this century, tells us, vol. i. page 84. that their present inhabitants are more virtuous. The gospel, it seems, hath led them to change their manners.

Crete is now called Candia, from its chief city, which bears that name. In the year 1204 the Venetians took Canaia, the second greatest city in Crete, and with it the whole island. That city they held till the year 1645, when the Turks conquered it, and almost entirely expelled the Venetians from Crete, which they have kept possession of ever since.

After the gospel was planted in Crete by the apostle, and his assistant Titus, it took such deep root there, and spread itself so widely through the island, that it hath subsisted there ever since; and is at present the religion of the natives, who are in general of the Greek church. These, on payment of a stated tribute to the Turks, are allowed the exercise of their religion without molestation.

Tournefort saith, vol. i. p. 23. The environs of Canaia are exceedingly beautiful. From the city, to the nearest mountains, there are great forests of olive trees, interrupted by fields, vineyards, gardens, and rivulets, bordered with myrtles; but two-thirds of the country are mountains. Creto, however, in respect of its size, climate and soil, is one of the finest islands in the Mediterranean; and, were it cultivated with as much care as it was in former times, it would produce all the necessaries and luxuries of life in the greatest abundance; so that the accounts which ancient authors have given of the number of its cities, and of the multitude of its inhabitants, is by no means exaggerated.

Sect. IV.—Of the Time and Place of writing the Epistle to Titus.

Because the apostle desired Titus to come to him at Nicopolis, chap. iii. 12. when he should send to him Artemas or Tychothus to supply his place in Crete, the transcriber, who added the postscript to this letter which our translators have turned into English, hath dated it from and of their disciples, the apostle, when he came into Crete, observed, and opposed by wholesome instructions and sharp rebukes. But well knowing how diligent they were in spreading their errors, Paul left Titus in Crete to restrain them. And that he might have a number of fit persons, clothed with proper authority, to assist him in opposing the Judaizers, and in maintaining the truth, he ordered him, at parting, to ordain elders, that is, bishops and deacons, 'in every city.' But that he might be at no loss to know who were fit to be invested with these offices, and what line of conduct he himself was to pursue in discharging the duties of his ministry, the apostle, when he came to Colosse, wrote to him this letter, in which he described the qualifications of the persons who were worthy to be ordained elders, commanded him to rebuke the Judaizers sharply, and mentioned the errors he was particularly to oppose, the doctrine he was earnestly to inculcate, and the precipice he was to enjoin; that none of the Cretians, whether teachers or people, might fall in their duty through want of information.

By comparing the epistle to Titus with the two epistles to Timothy, we learn, that the Judaizing teachers were everywhere indefatigable in propagating their erroneous doctrine concerning the necessity of obedience to the law of Moses, as the only means of obtaining salvation; and that in the most distant countries they uniformly taught the same doctrine, for the purpose of rendering the practice of sin consistent with the hope of salvation; and that, to draw disciples after them, they encouraged them in sin, by the vicious practices which they themselves followed, in the persuasion that they would be pardoned through the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices. Only, from the apostle's so earnestly condemning the Cretans, and Timothy in Ephesus, to oppose these errors, it is probable that the Judaizing teachers were more numerous and successful in Ephesus and Crete than in other places. However, as Titus was a Gentile convert, whose interest it was to maintain the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses, and a teacher of long standing in the faith, the apostle was not so full in his directions and exhortations to him as to Timothy; neither did he recommend to him meekness, lenity, and patience in teaching, as he did to Timothy, but rather sharpness, chap. i. 13. ii. 13. Perhaps Titus was a person of a soft and mild temper; whereas Timothy, being a younger man, may have been of a more ardent spirit, which needed to be somewhat restrained.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

In the inscription of this epistle, St. Paul asserted his apostleship, not with a view to raise himself in the estimation of Titus, but to make the false teachers in Crete, and all in every age who shall read this letter, sensible that every thing he ordered Titus to inculcate was of divine authority, ver. 1, 2.—And by calling Titus his genuine son by the common faith, he inculcated to the Cretians, not only that he had converted him, but that he was a teacher of the same virtue dispositions with himself, and as such he gave him his apostolical benediction, ver. 3, 4.—Next, he put Titus in mind that he had left him in Crete, to ordain elders in every city where churches had been planted, ver. 5.—And to direct him in that important business, he described to him the character and qualifications necessary in bishops and deacons, that ordaining to these offices none but persons of that description, if they might be able both to instruct the people, and to confute gain-sayers, ver. 6—9.—Es-

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul, a servant of God,
(A) and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus, in order to the faith of the Gentiles, and the acknowledgment of the truth, which is in order to godliness.
2 In hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised before the times of the ages.

3 But hath manifested, in his proper season, (even as) his promise by the preaching with which I am intrusted, according to the commandment of God our Saviour;

4 To Titus, my genuine son (even as) by the common faith; (See Jude, ver. 3. note 4.) Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.

5 For this purpose I left thee in Crete, that thou mightest set in order the thing wanting, and ordain in every city elders, as I commanded thee.

6 If any one be blameless, the husband of one wife, (1 Tim. iii. 2. note 1.) having brought up children, not accused of riotous living, nor untruthful; (1 Tim. iii. 4, 5.)

7 For a bishop should be blameless, as the steward of God; not self-willed, not prone to

Ver. 1.—1. Paul, a servant of God.—In some of his other epistles Paul calls himself Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἡμων ἡγεμόνας, a bondman of Jesus Christ.
2. But the present is the only one in which he calls himself Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἡμων ἑστήκεις, a bondman of God. This appellation he took, probably because the Judases in Crete affirmed that he had apostatized from God, when, as an apostle of Christ, he received into God's church the uncircumcised Gentiles, and thereby freed them from obeying the law of Moses as a term of salvation.
3. An apostle of Jesus Christ.—To distinguish himself from other good men, who are all servants of God, Paul calls himself an apostle of Jesus Christ; one clothed with authority to teach mankind the true religion.

3. In order to the faith. —By translating the preposition εἰς, after Theophylact and Occumenius; because the common translation, which implies that Paul was made an apostle according to the faith of God's elect, is hardly sense. Besides, the preposition εἰς is used, and in every other instance, in Tit. i. 1. signifies in order to.

4. Of the elect of God. —The Gentiles are called the elect, 2 Tim. ii. 10, and an elected generation, 1 Pet. ii. 9; for a reason assigned 1 Pet. ii. 10. note.—Paul was made an apostle of Jesus Christ for the purpose of persuading the Gentiles to believe the gospel.

5. Acknowledgment of the truth which is in order to godliness. —The doctrine of the gospel is generally here called the truth which is in order to godliness, and is to distinguish it from the falsehoods of heathenism, which tended to produce vice; and even to distinguish it from the ordinances of the law of Moses, which were only shadows and obscure representations of true religion, and whose only influence was to purify the flesh. Some are of opinion that by the truth, in this passage, the apostle meant the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the salvation of the Gentiles by faith.

Ver. 2.—1. Which God, who cannot lie, promised. —The promise here referred to is that which God made to Adam and Eve, and their posterity at the fall, when, in passing sentence on the serpent, He said of the seed of the woman, It shall bruise thy head. The same promise was renewed in the covenant with Abraham: In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. —That this was a promise of eternal life to all believers, see Gen. x. sect. 6. See also 2 Tim. i. 9.

2. Before the times of the ages. —An exact translation of the passage would be before eternal times. But that being a contradiction in terms, our translators, contrary to the propriety of the Greek language, have rendered it before the world began. The Greek lexicon observes on Rom. xxi. 26. the true literal translation is before the secular times; referring us to the Jewish judaism, by which times were computed among the Hebrews, as among the Gentiles; they were computed by generations of men. Hence, Col. i. 26. The mystery which was hid

Ver. 3.—1. His promise. —To give, literally his word; namely, of promise. We have the expression complete Rom. ix. 4. ὑπερεχομενος ἀπέληθον γὰρ, for the word of promise was this.
anger, not given to wine, not a striker, not one who makes gain by base methods;
8 But hospitable, (1 Tim. iii. 2, note 7.), a lover of good men, prudent, just, holy, temperate;
9 Holding fast the true doctrine (Acts in John) as he hath been taught, that he may be able, by the teaching which is wholesome, both to exhort and to confute the gainseyers.
10 For there are many unruly and foolish talkers1 and deceivers, especially those of the circumcision, 11 Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole families, making manifest what they ought not, for the sake of worldly gain.
12 One of themselves, a prophet1 of their own, hath said;1 The Cretians are always liars, evil wild beasts, lazy bellies.3
13 This testimony is true; for which cause rebuke them sharply, that they may be healthy in the faith;
14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and precepts of men2 who turn away from the truth.
15 All meats indeed are pure to the pure! but to the polluted and unfaithful,2 nothing is pure; (Acts, 78), for both their understanding and conscience is polluted.
16 They profess to know God,1 but by works

Ver. 8. Prudent.—Zealous. This quality consists in the government of our angry passions, so that on all occasions we live with prudence. It differs from prudence, temperate, which signifies one who hides his lusts, especially those which are gratified by meat, and drink, and women.

Ver. 9. Holding fast the true doctrine.—Sekontos to the doctrine in John. This word should be translated. For the, in the sense of faithful, is only applicable to persons, and is a word of very great meaning. See Ezra vi. 60. There is a great beauty in the word sekeunto the doctrine as here used. It signifies the holding fast the true doctrine, in opposition to those who would wrest it from one. By this character all the Jews in Crete were excluded from being bishops; and in Ephesus were from being deacons. 1 Tim. iii. 2.

Ver. 10.1 Foolish talkers.—Marrabaloi.3 are persons who utter a multitude of foolish and trifling things on the subjects concerning which they speak. The apostle takes the word from the Gentiles.

Ver. 11.1 Who subvert whole families.—In this, and in his epistle to Timothy, severely condemned genealogies, and the fables thereon connected. See Titus i. 9.

Ver. 12.1 One of themselves, a prophet.—This was the poet Epimenides, who, among the Romans, was reputed to have foretold future events. Creto, speaking of him. (Plutarch, lib. 1, says, he was "futura praeconio, et vanitas parum fuitrario,—one who foreknew and foretold future things by ecstasy." Beza, as all poets pretended to a kind of inspiration, the same prophet and poet were used as synonymous, both by the Greeks and Romans. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. vi informs us, that the Egyptians called those prophets who pretended over their sacred rites; and that the apostle did not so far as to give that title to Epimenides, because he was not a prophet. 2. Hitherto, the Crete, &c.—Epimenides. He is called this in his book "Creto;" concerning the passing entire, pag 235. The Crete were universally hated and reviled as liars by the rest of the Greeks, because, as concerning their islands, Divine Leges, vol. 1 p. 150, by showing in their island the tomb of Jupiter, the father of gods and men, they published what the rest of the Greeks concealed in their mysteries; namely, that their gods were dead men. The character given of the Crete by Epimenides was applied with propriety to the apostle to the Judaisers, because they were, verily, liars.

3. Evil wild beasts, lazy bellies.—By calling the Cretei exul in John, the apostle imputed, that they were of a fierce, ravenous, notions disposition; and by adding lazy bellies, he signified that they were lazy gluttons—as averse to action, as wild beasts are after gorging themselves with their prey.

Ver. 12. For which cause rebuke them sharply.—For the word strongly, is given a very strong sense in the Greek, and is used in the passion with which he spake. Reproofs of that sort have little influence to make one healthy, either in faith or practice. It was to consist in the strength of the reasons with which he enforced his reprovs, and in the earnestness and affection with which he delivered them, whereby the conscience of the offenders, being weakened, would drive them bitterly.

Ver. 14.1 Precepts of men.—From the following ver. 15. it appears, that the apostle had now in his eye the precepts of the Judaisers concerning meats clean and unclean; which, although originally the precepts of God, were now abolished under the gospel. Wherefore, if these were any longer enjoined, they were not enjoined by God, but were the "precepts of men." 2. Whodo turn away the truth.—The apostle, by a beautiful figure, represents the truth as offering itself to the Judaisers, and the Judaisers turning it away with contempt.

Ver. 15. All meats are pure to the pure! The word meats is wanting in the original, but must be supplied, the expression being elliptical. See 1 Cor. vii. 12, note. As the Jews reckoned themselves the only holy people on earth, it must have been extremely displeasing to the false teachers of that nation to find themselves represented as polluted like the Gentiles. In other passages also, the apostle gives these ten commandments, with which they anathematized the Gentiles. See Philippi. iii. 2. Before the reader thinks the apostle is not speaking in this, and in the preceding verse, of the Judaisers, who insisted that the precepts of the laws of Moses, concerning meats were still obligatory, he may be supposed to have had in his eye those Ptolemaic Gentiles and Lycian Jews, who, before their conversion, ate any kind of meat, and who, since their conversion, still continued in the same persuasion.

2. And unfaithful.—This is the proper translation of the word unfaithful, because the apostle is not speaking of unbelievers or heathens, but of such believers as were unfaithful to Christ, by living in intemperance and debauchery.

Ver. 15. They profess to know God.—They boast of having the true knowledge of God's will from the Mosaic revelation, and on that pretence they set their doctrine and precepts above other Gentiles, because, as Wolfius remarks, Divine Leges, vol. 1, p. 150, by showing in their island the tomb of Jupiter, the father of gods and men, they published what the rest of the Greeks concealed in their mysteries; namely, that their gods were dead men. The character given of the Crete by they deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and (epi, 293.) concerning every good work (exousia, Rom. 2. 8., note 3.) without discernment.

The apostle having directed Titus to ordain elders in every city, and described the character and qualifications of the persons he was to invest with offices in the church; also, having laid open the bad character and evil practices of the Judaizers in Crete, and ordered him to rebuke them sharply, he in this chapter gave him a short view of the duties of his office, as superintendent both of the teachers and of the people in Crete. He was, in opposition to the Judaizers, to inculcate on the people such precepts only as were suitable to the wholesome doctrine of the gospel, ver. 1. —And with respect to the aged men who were to be appointed, he was to enjoin them to be attentive to the behaviour of those under their care; to be grave in their own deportment; prudent in giving admonitions and rebukes; and spiritually healthy by faith, love, patience, ver. 2. —In like manner, those aged women who were employed to teach the young of their own sex, he was to exhort to a deportment becoming their sacred character. They were neither to be slanderers nor drunkards, but to be good teachers, ver. 3. In particular, they were to persuade the young women who were married to do their duty to their husbands, their children, and their families, that the gospel might not be evil spoken of through their bad behaviour, ver. 4, 5. —On young men he was to inculcate the government of their passions, ver. 6. —But above all, both in teaching and behaviour, Titus was to make himself a pattern of the virtues which he enjoined to others, ver. 7, 8. —And because the Judaizers, to allure slaves to their party, taught that under the gospel slaves are free, Titus was to inculcate on slaves obedience to their masters, diligence in their work, and honesty in everything committed to them in trust, ver. 9, 10. —Withal, to make the Cretan bishops and people sensible of the impiety of the doctrine of the Jewish teachers, concerning the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices in procuring pardon for impious sinners, the apostle declared, that the gospel was given for this very purpose, to teach men that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, they should live soberly, etc. in expectation of a future judgment, ver. 11-14. —Those things the apostle ordered Titus to teach in the plainest and holdest manner, agreeably to the authority with which he was invested as an evangelist, ver. 16.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II. —But do thou ( завет, 55.) inculcate the things which become wholesome doctrine:

1 That aged men, be vigilant, grave, prudent, healthy by faith, love, patience;

2 That aged women, in like manner, be in deportment (ἐμπροσθεν) as becometh sacred persons; not slanderers, not enslaved to much wine, good teachers;

3 That they may persuade the young women to be lovers of their husbands, lovers of their children;

4 To be calm, chaste, careful of their families, good, subject to their own husbands, that the word of God may not be evil spoken of;

5. As becometh sacred persons. —The aged women employed by the church to teach the young are sily called sacred persons, because the office they were employed to discharge was the sacred office; as was showed 1 Tim. v. 16. note 1.

6. Not slanderers. —This was required in the same order of female teachers, 1 Tim. iii. 11.

7. Not enslaved to much wine. —This is a qualification required in the deacons, 1 Tim. iii. 8.

8. Ver. 4. That they may persuade.—So ἀνέποντησε may be translated. See 2 Tim. i. 7. note 2.

Ver. 5. Careful of their families. —The word ἀγαθονομία signifies both those who keep at home, and those who take proper care of their families. In this latter sense I understand it here, with Euner and the Vulgate.

2. That the word of God may not be evil spoken of. —The exhortation to be good wives and mothers, which aged women were ordered, in this passage, to give to the young under their care, is not to be considered merely as a rule by which those women were ordered to themselves who are instructed with the office of teaching others; but young women are more especially directed in their deportment; that by their conjugal affections, their care in educating their children, their chastity, their prudent economy, their sweetness of dispositions, and subjection to their husbands, all founded on the principles of religion, they may do honour to the gospel which they profess to believe and obey.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II. —The fables and commandments of men taught by the Judaizers sicken the soul. But do thou inculcate the practices which are suitable to the wholesome doctrine of the gospel:

1 That aged men, who hold sacred offices, be attentive to the behaviour of their people, venerable in their own manners, prudent in their behaviour, spiritually healthy by faith, love, patience;

2 That the aged women, whom the church employs to teach the young of their own sex, in like manner, be in speech and behaviour as becometh sacred persons employed in sacred offices; not slanderers, not enslaved to much wine, but good teachers.

3 That they may persuade the young women under their care to be lovers of their husbands, performing the duties of marriage from affection, and lovers of their children, by bringing them up religiously;

4 To be of a calm disposition, chaste, attentive to the affairs of their families, good to their domestics, obedient to their own husbands, that the gospel may not be evil spoken of; as, encouraging wives to neglect their husbands and children, on pretence of their attending on the offices of religion.
6 The young men, in like manner, exhort (συμπαράστησιν) to govern their passions.

7 (In all things) make thyself a pattern of good works, (τὸν νόμον, 2 Tim. iii. 16), in teaching shew incorruptness,1 gravity, sincerity,

8 wholesome speech1 which cannot be condemned; that he who is on the opposite side by his passions may be ashamed, having nothing bad to say concerning you.3

9 Servants exert to be subject to their own masters, and in all things to be careful to please, not answering again;

10 Not secretly stealing,1 but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things:

11 For the grace of God1 which bringeth salvation, (ἐπισκέψαταί) hath shone forth2 to all men,

12 Teaching us, that denying ungodliness1 and worldly lusts,2 we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world,

13 Expecting the blessed hope,1 (κατά κατακόπτειν) namely, the appearing of the glory of the great God,2 and our Saviour Jesus Christ.3

Ver. 7. Shew (ἐπιδεικνύοντα) incorruptness, gravity, (κατακόπτειν) sincerity. — Some ancient MSS. and versions want the word which I have translated sincerely: But it is found in the Alex. MS. in the Arabic version, and in some of the Greek commentators. Mill thinks it was first placed on the margin as an explication of ἐπιδεικνύοντα, incorruptness, and afterwards was inserted in the text. But though both words come from the same original, being differently compounded, they may be distinguished in the following manner: Incorruptness, ἐπιδεικνύοντα, may signify that Titus’s doctrine was to be free from all corrupt utterances, taken whether from Judaism or from heathenism; whereas ἔκτοσον, sincerity, may signify that his motives in teaching were to be sincere, — he was not to be taught from the love of money, or fame, or power.

Ver. 8. — Wholesome strong but temperate, that is free from all bitterness. For, as the commentators observe, Titus was a Gentile, having been so much of the uncharitable, uncharitable, bigoted spirit of the Jews, might have been in danger of using harsh language in reproving them, if he had not been thus instructed by the apostle.

2 He who is on the opposite side, — ἐπιδεικνύοντα, supply ἔκτοσον. He means indeed, whether Jews or Gentiles, who are not like to the other.

3 Having nothing bad to say concerning you. — ἐπανασκείπτειν. Some MSS. and versions have here ἐπειδεικνύοντα, concerning you. This is a corruption of the reading shows, as Benson observes, how anxious the apostle was that the doctrine should be unblamed, on account of the misbehaviour either of its teachers or of its professors; see ver. 10. and 1 Pet. ii. 12.

10 Not secretly stealing, — The word ἐπιδεικνύοντα signifies the stealing a part of a thing; the thief not daring to take the whole, for fear of being discovered. It is applied to the fraud of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts xix. 20. The gospel is called 'the grace of God,' either because it is the greatest favour which God hath bestowed on men, or because it teacheth the doctrine of God's great grace or favour to men:

2 Hath shone forth to all men. — The word ἐπιδεικνύοντα properly signifies the shining of the sun, or of the stars, Acts xxiv. 23. The gospel, like the sun, hath shone forth to all men, and giveth light to all. Hence, Christ, the author of the gospel, is called, Luke i. 79, ἀνυπότιστος τὸν θεόν, the day-spring from on high; and Mal. iv. 2. the sun of righteousness. — Hence also Christ called himself, John xiv. 11, the light of the world. —'The shining forth of the gospel to all men is an high recommendation of it, and shews it to be entirely different from all other, if they contained any thing valuable for reforming mankind, being confined to the initiated, the religious, the learned, and the wise. — The gospel likewise differs from the law of Moses, as taught by the Jews, who, by inculcating the wisdom and excellency of that law as the whole of religion, encouraged their disciples to neglect the duties of piety and morality altogether. Whereas, as the gospel teaches us, 'that denying ungodliness,' &c.

15. Ungodliness, — consisteth not only in denying the existence of God, but in denying his perfections, his government of the world, and the retributions of a future state. Also, it consists in neglecting to worship God; in worshipping him by images; in blasphemy, or speaking disrespectfully of his presence, in perjury; in profaning the name of God by cursing and swearing; and in disregarding the manifestation which he hath made of his will in the gospel revelation.

2. Worldly lusts, — namely, gluttony, drunkenness, lasciviousness, anger, malice, revenge, together with the inordinate love of riches, power, and the state. These lusts being productive of nothing but misery to those who indulge in them, the gospel, God's gracious gift, was bestowed on men to rescue them from the dominion of worldly lusts, by teaching them to live soberly, &c.

3. Should live soberly, — ἐπιδεικνύοντα. Sobriety is a habit of self-government, whereby one is able to restrain his passions, and his affections, as often as the gratification of his appetite, and the yielding to the temptations of the flesh, and the pride of life, and the lusts of the soul, and the affections, are in any wise sinful. See 2 Tim. i. 7, note 2.

4. Righteously. — Righteousness consists in abstaining from injuring others in their person, reputation, or fortune; in discharging all the duties belonging to the relations in which one stands to those with whom he is connected, and to the order of God or of society. Righteousness is Everywhere placed; in carrying on one's trade and commerce fairly; in performing covenants and promises fully; in not rendering to every one his due. The Hebrews held it to be a part of righteousness also, to do works of charity to the poor. Psal. xix. 9. 'He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor, his righteousness endures for ever.'

5. And godly, — Godliness being the opposite to ungodliness, described ver. 12. note 1, needs no explanation.

6. In this present world. — Here the apostle intimates, that the present world in which we live is a state of probation for the future world; as is plain likewise from ver. 12.

19. — Expecting the blessed hope. — If this is different from the expectation of the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, as in this clause must be translated by the word and, in which case the blessed hope will mean the hope of eternal life mentioned chap. i. 2. But as this hope is included in the hope of the appearing of Jesus Christ to raise the dead, and to carry his people with him into heaven, the translation which I have given seems more emphatical.

2. Namely, the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. — This, which is the exact literal translation of the clause, κατακόπτειν, is adopted both by the Vulgate and by Beza. — Considered as an Hebraism, the clause almost exactly resembles the words in our Bible, 'The glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.' Nevertheless, the terms were left in ignorance, idiom, and vice. — The gospel likewise differs from the law of Moses, as taught by the Jews, who, by inculcating the wisdom and excellency of that law as the whole of religion, encouraged their disciples to neglect the duties of piety and morality altogether. Whereas, as the gospel teaches us, 'that denying ungodliness,' &c.

Ver. 19. — Ungodliness, — consisteth not only in denying the existence of God, but in denying his perfections, his government of the world, and the retributions of a future state. Also, it consists in neglecting to worship God; in worshipping him by images; in blasphemy, or speaking disrespectfully of his presence, in perjury; in profaning the name of God by cursing and swearing; and in disregarding the manifestation which he hath made of his will in the gospel revelation.
CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

Because the Judaizers affirmed, that no obedience was due from the Gentiles, to the ordinances of the true God to magistrates who were idolaters, and because by that doctrine they made not only the Jewish but the Gentile believers bad magistrates, and exposed them to be punished as evildoers, (see Rom. viii. viii. Il.) the apostle commanded Titus to incultate, and honor, and to esteem them; and to be ready to every good work; to speak evil of no one, to be no fighters, but equitable, shewing all meekness to all men: and for even ourselves were formerly.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1. Put the Cretians in mind of what I have taught them; namely, to be subject to the governments and powers established in Cretos; to obey magistrates though they be heathens; to be ready to perform every good work enjoined by the laws of their country; to speak evil of no one on account of his nation or religion, to be no fighters, but of an equitable disposition, (Phil. iv. 5. note), and to shew the greatest meekness to all men, even to enemies, this behaviour, towards those who profess false religions, because they tend to hurt their reputation, such as railing, reviling, mocking, speaking, whispering, etc., which is an evil speaking, denoting all those tribes of the tongue which proceed either from hatred or from contempt of others, and are neither good nor true.

Ver. 1. To obey magistrates. — The word ὑποκομίζοντας literally signifies to obey those who rule. The dispensation of the Jews towards heathen rulers, see described 2 Cor. xiii. View 1 Tim. ii. 2. The word ἀδικίας, injustice, denotes all those vices of the tongue which proceed either from hatred, or from contempt of others, and are neither good nor true. Titus 3:1-3. foolish, disobedient, erring, slavishly serving divers lusts, and to the delights of other sensual lusts, living in malice and envy, hate, and chiding one another.

4. But when the goodness and the faithfulness of our Saviour was shown forth,

5. He saved us, not in times of old, but in time past, in the regeneration, and the renewal of the Holy Ghost;

6. Which he poured out to us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

7. That being justified by his grace, we might be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

8. (O Lord, 71, 60, 2.) This doctrine is true; but concerning these he says, I command thee to keep it, that the things which we believe in God should take care to promote good works. These are the things honourable and profitable to men.

believing Jews before their conversion is described here; and among them the character of the apostle himself. But any reader who compares what he says of his own behaviour in his conversation, Acts iii. 11, iv. 2, with our, John ii. 27, will hardly think the apostle speaks of himself. Only, being about to say things disagreeable to the Jews, he cloaked himself with them, according to his custom, to prevent their being offended with him. See 1 Thess. iv. 4. The sentiment in this passage is beautiful; namely, that the recollection of our own faults should make us equitable in judging of the faults of others, and prevent us from passing extreme sentences on them, when they fall into sin. In his maxims, see the notes there. Verses 4-7. God our Saviour. The title of our Saviour justly belongs to the Father, because he formed the scheme of our salvation, and sent his Son into the world to accomplish it. John iii. 16. Rom. v. 8. John iv. 17. Verses 8-11. The words used in scripture do not always denote eternal salvation; but it signifies, sometimes the knowledge of salvation, as Rom. viii. 11. note 2, and sometimes obtaining the means of salvation: see Rom. xi. 36. note 1. Here, saved, as signifies, delivered from the ignorance and wicked state in which we were living before we believed the gospel. This deliverance is called justification, ver. 7. See the note there. Verses 12-15. 1. The last of regeneration, or through baptism. Called the beth of regeneration, not because any change in the nature of the baptized person is produced by baptism, but because it is an emblem of the purification of his soul from sin. Hence baptism, in allusion to the colofal, or ceremonial, meaning of baptism, signified to our apostle, Acts xxii. 16. signs, and by baptism, and wash away thy sins. Be baptized in token of thy resolution to forsake thy sins, and among the rest thy sins in persecuting the disciples of Jesus. In the ternus eventus, when joint with baptism, there is an allusion to the pharisaic of the Jewish doctors, who, when they admitted a proselyte into their church by baptism, always spake of him as one born again. Nevertheless the real change in the nature of a believer, which entitles him to be called a son of God, is not effected by baptism, but by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, mentioned in the next clause. Hence our Lord, when the apostleغان had followed him, drew the two together in his discourse to Nicodemus. John iii. 3. Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

9. And the renewal of the Holy Ghost, which on some occasions was shown down on the believing Jews and Gentiles from heaven, and on others was imparted to them by the imposition of the apostle's hands. Acts x. 46, 47. Which he poured out is used in scripture to signify the communication of the spiritual gifts, it denotes that these gifts were imparted, not by the imposition of the hands of men; but immediately from heaven, accompanied with some visible sign or token of which we have instances, Acts ii. 38. 1 Cor. xii. 4. Verses 9-14. Seeing the apostle speaks of himself here as one of those on whom the Holy Ghost was poured out, we are warranted to believe that he received the gift of the Holy Ghost by an immediate influx from heaven, and not by the imposition of the hands of Ananias; and that Ananias's word to Saul, Acts ix. 17. The Lord Jesus hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and he filled with the Holy Ghost, though preceded by putting his hands on the apostle, see note on 1 Cor. xii. 3. Neither is it impossible that Ananias was sent to communicate the Holy Ghost to him by the imposition of the hands; for in that case Paul could not have said, 2 Tim. i. 6. I am in nothing behind the very great apostles. But his meaning is, that he was sent to restore Saul's sight, and by baptism, but that his baptism he might be filled with the gifts of the Holy Ghost immediately from heaven, accompanied with the usual visible sign, which Saul, having received his sight, was to see. Accordingly to this account of the matter, in Christ's commission to Ananias, Acts x. 12 no mention is made of the renewed Ananias, nor of his predicting the future events, as is seen in his prediction of Saul's conversion. The same is the case with the apostle himself, Acts xxii. 16. 18. 1. Being justified. He brought to the Corinthians, and else mentioned by the apostle himself, Acts xxii. 16. 18. 2. Literally, to provide good works. It is necessary to understand this clause literally, to provide good works; that is, to practise them ourselves, and by our example and exhortation to encourage others to practise them, and to argue in their defence against those who speak of them disdainfully as not necessary to salvation. In this, as in other passages of scripture, good works signify virtuous actions in general, but especially charitable and benevolent actions. Thus, Matt. x. 16. Let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works. John xiii. 33. For a good work we obtain glory. 2 Tim. iii. 10. Hence witnesses to good works; that is, that she hath brought up children; that she hath kept her house; that she hath washed the saints' feet; that she hath relieved the afflicted; that she hath diligently wrought every good work. 1 Tim. v. 10. That they be in good works, rejoicing in doing the same; a blessing, as Benson observes, woulds the ministers of the gospel be to the world, if all of them were earnestly seeking to improve their people in good works, and were themselves examples of such works! We have the principle thus expressed, Titus iii. 11. Nevertheless, 1 Tim. iv. 16. But where the commandment, the law, is written, it is one thing, but where the tradition minded in the margin of our Bible, to practise honest works.
9 But foolish questions and arguments, and strife and fighting about the law, resist; for they are unprofitable and false. (See 1 Tim. vi. 4, 2 Tim. ii. 14, 16, 23.)

Ver. 9—1. And genealogies.—The genealogies condemned in this and other passages of scripture, in the opinion of Bengelus, are the absurd genealogies of the Jews, taught by the(Greek) See Col. ii. 2. note. But as the genealogies of the Jews were not invented till long after this apostle was written, I prefer the account given of them in the commentary; the rather that the apostle here joined genealogies with strife and fighting about the law. See also 1 Tim. i. 4.

2. Fighting about the law.—メアテリア及びメアテリア are such disputes about the efficacy and necessity of observance of the law in order to salvation, which the Judaizing teachers in Crete maintained, with great violence, against all who asserted that obedience to the gospel alone was sufficient to salvation.

Ver. 10—1. An heretical man.—See 2 Pet. ii. 1. note 2. where it is shewed, that an heretic is one who, from worldly motives, teaches doctrines which he knows to be false; as the Judasists did, who made the rules enjoined by the law mere necessary to salvation than a holy life. He also is a heretic, who from the same motives makes a party in the church, in opposition to those who maintain the truth. In this sense some understand σκοτεινος, σκοτεινος here; and think the phrase should be translated, 'A man who maketh a sect;' and that σκοτεινος properly is a sect, either in philosophy or religion. In the first age, when the dogmas of the gospel were delivered by the apostle in person, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost; and when the true meaning of these doctrines was not liable to any doubt, because it was ascertained by the apostles themselves, if any teacher taught differently from them, and made a party in the church in opposition to them, he must have done those things contrary to his conscience, either from the love of money, or from a spirit of contention; or from an immoderate propensity to carnal pleasure. Hence, Gal. v. 35. heresy is reckoned among 'the works of the flesh.' Doddridge, by heresy, understandeth denying the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, and the methods and means of salvation, viz. the breaking of the peace of the church. But as the apostle saith, 'He shall be cast out of the church,' I rather think heresy is such an error in opinion as results from pravity in the will. For if a person, after prayer and sincere examination, reject or opposes opinions in religion, according as they appear to him to be true or false, without being biased by various inclinations, can he be blamed, even although he should maintain those opinions with firmness, and suffer for them?

3. After a first and second admonition.—Some copies want the words and second. But the best and greatest number of MSS., together with the Syrian and Vulgate versions, have these words.

See Mill in loc. enegernes do noqoni an admonition which puts a restraint on the person admonished. Titus was not to reject an heretic, till he had tried a first and second admonition to bring him to repentance, and on trial found him incorrigible.

4. Reject. Ἰμβριάζοντα ἐκάθιστος; cast him out of the church. In this matter the apostle himself treated Hymenaeus and Alexander, 1 Tim. i. 20. By this apostolical Canon, an obstinate heretic, after a first and second admonition without effect, is to be cast out of the church, to prevent the faithful from being led astray by his false doctrines and vicious example. This method of treating heretics is worth of attention; for, as Bengel observes, the Spirit of God doth not order heretics to be banished, and their goods confiscated, for less doth he order them to be imprisoned, tortured, and burnt, if they will not retract their errors. He doth not even give allowance to rail at, or speak evil of them. Such methods of treating heretics never proceeded from the council of the apostles, but from the synagogues of Satan. To discover a wicked man as a brother Christian, and to try him, and to cast him out of the church by a public sentence of excommunication, is what the church, and every society, hath a right to do, according to our Lord's rule, Matt. xviii. 17, and is all that should be done in such a case. See 2 Tim. iii. 14.

5. Ver. 11—1. Knowing that such a person is perverted.—Eusebius says, the word διαστημα is commonly applied to buildings, and signifies to be overthrown from the foundation. According to others, it signifies to be turned out of the way. Wherefore, when it is said of an heretic that he is perverted, the meaning is, that he is so utterly deprived that there is no hope of his amendment.

2. Being self-condemned.—Doddridge, who thinks heresy consists in denying the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, interprets self-condemned of the heretic's furnishing by his actions matter of condemnation against himself, just as some are said to condemn others, Matt. xii. 41, 42. Heb. xi. 7. who afford matter for condemnation them. Grotius, Barlow, Hammond, Hallet, Benson, &c. by the heretic's condemning himself, understand his cutting himself off from the church by separation, or otherwise; a punishment which the church inflicts on its faulty or unsound members here. I think this mark of an heretic, that he is self-condemned, inflames that an heretic is one who teacheth erroneous doctrines, knowing them to be erroneous. For as Whitby justly observes, no man who acts according to his judgment, how erroneous soever they may be, is self-condemned by that action.

Ver. 12—1. When I shall send Artemas to thee, or Tychicus.—Tychicus hath been mentioned in St. Paul's epistles to the Ephesians, and to the Philippians: but of Artemas we know nothing: only from this passage it appears that he was a faithful and able teacher, and fit to supply the bishop's place in Nicopolis.

2. Come to me at Nicopolis.—There were cities of this name in Macedonia on the confines of Thrace, and in Epirus and Epirus. The one in Epirus was built opposite to Amphipolis, and was famous Nicopolis, or the city of victory, in memory of the victory which Augustus obtained over Antonius and Cleopatra. It is of opinion that this is the Nicopolis of which the apostle speaks; and that while he wintered there he visited the church there in the course of his journey. See Rom. xix. 19. Other commentators think the apostle meant Nicopolis in Macedonia, situated near Mount Ossa in the confines of Thrace. But without settling that point, I observe, that the apostle's determination to winter in Nicopolis, wherever it was, shows that he was at liberty when he wrote this epistle; consequently that it was written in the interval between his first and second imprisonments.

Ver. 13. Zenas the lawyer, and Apollos.—Zenas is mentioned in this passage only. He is called διάκονος, the lawyer, which διάκονος interprets Ἐρωτικός, a teacher of the law, because he had formerly been of that profession among the Jews. Benson also is of the same opinion; and quotes Matt. xxvii. 58, where one of that profession is called apologist. But if we suppose Zenas was a Roman lawyer, it would seem that Zenas and Apollos were to pass through Crete, either in their way to the apostle, or to some place whither he had sent them. He therefore desired Titus to help them forward on their journey, by supplying them with such necessaries as they were in want of, that they might not be retarded.

Ver. 16—1. Salute them who love us in the faith.—By this description of the persons in Crete to be saluted in his name, the apostle expressly excluded the Judaizing teachers, on whom he put that mark of disrespect, to make them sensible how much he despised and disapproved of their conduct.

2. Grace be with all of you.—By the expression all of you, the apostle intimates that this epistle was intended for all the churches in Crete; the members of which were to be taught the things in this letter, and to be exhorted, and even reproved, agreeably to the directions contained in it.
PREFACE.

SECT. I.—The History of Philemon.

Philemon, to whom this epistle was written, was no stranger to the apostle Paul: for in the first and second verses the apostle addressed all the members of Philemon’s family, as well acquainted with them; and, ver. 19, he intimates that Philemon himself was his convert. Nay, ver. 17. Philemon’s respect for the apostle is mentioned. He was an inhabitant of Colosse, as appears from the epistle to the Colossians, chap. iv. 9, where Onesimus, Philemon’s slave, is called ‘one of them.’ And ver. 17. the brethren of Colosse are desired to say to Archippus, (the person mentioned Philem. ver. 2.) ‘Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received.’—Besides, the ancients believed that Philemon was an inhabitant of Colosse. So Theodoret says expressly in his commentary on this epistle, and tells us that his house was still remaining in Colosse in his time; that is, in the beginning of the fifth century. And Jerome also, in his commentary on this epistle, says, Philemon was of Colosse; and Theophylact calls him a Phrygian, Opera, tom. 2. p. 865. For an account of Colosse, see Preface to Colossians.

Philemon seems to have been a person of great worth as a man, and of some note as a citizen in his own country: for his family was so numerous that it made a church by itself; or at least a considerable part of the church at Colosse, ver. 2.—He was likewise so opulent, that he was able, ‘by the communication of his faith,’ that is, by his beneficence, to refresh the bowels of the saints, ver. 6. 7.—According to Grotius, Philemon was an elder of Ephesus. But Beausobre speaks of him as one of the pastors of Colosse; in which he is followed by Doddridge.—From the apostle’s employing Philemon to provide him a lodging in Colosse, Michellea conjectures that he was one of the descons there.—These authors were led to think Philemon a minister of the gospel, because in the inscription of this letter the apostle calls him his fellow-labourer. But that appellation is of ambiguous significatio; being given not only to those who preached the gospel, but to such pious persons also, whether men or women, as assisted the apostles in any manner while they were employed in preaching. See Rom. vii. 8. 3 John ver. 8.

The ancients differed as much as the moderns in their opinion concerning Philemon’s station in the church. Some of them reckoned him a bishop; but others, fancying that Apphia was his wife, contended that he had no ecclesiastical character whatever; for they began very early to esteem celibacy in ecclesiastical persons. In particular, Hilary the deacon saith expressly that he was one of the laity. Theodoret, Oecumenius, and Theophy- luct seem also to have been of the same opinion. See Whitby’s preface to this epistle.

SECT. II.—Of the Occasion on which the Epistle to Philemon was written.

Onesimus, a slave, on some disgust, having run away from his master Philemon, came to Rome, and falling into want, as is supposed, he applied to the apostle, of whose imprisonment he had heard, and with whose benevolent disposition he was well acquainted, having, as it seems, formerly seen him in his master’s house. Or the fame of the apostle’s preaching and miracles having drawn Onesimus to hear some of the many discourses which he delivered in his own hired house in Rome, these made such an impression on him, that he became a sincere convert to the Christian faith: For the apostle calls him, ver. 9, ‘his son, whom he had begotten in his bonds.’ After his conversion Onesimus shone with the apostle, and served him with the greatest assiduity and affection. But being sensible of his fault in running away from his master, he wished to repair that injury by returning to him. At the same time, being afraid that on his return his master would inflict on him the punishment which, by the law or custom of Phrygia, was due to a fugitive slave, and which, as Grotius says, he could inflict without applying to any magistrate, he besought the apostle to write to Philemon, requesting him to forgive and to receive him again into his family. The apostle, always ready to do good offices, very willingly complied with Onesimus’s desire, and wrote this letter to Philemon, in which, with the greatest softness of expression, warmth of affection, and delicacy of address, he not only interceded for Onesimus’s pardon, but urged Philemon to esteem him, and put confidence in him, as a sincere Christian.—And because restitution, by repairing the injury that had been done, restores the person who did the injury to the character which he had lost, the apostle, to enable Onesimus to appear in Philemon’s family with some degree of reputation, bound himself in this epistle, by his handwriting, not only to repay all that Onesimus owed to Philemon, but to make full reparation also for whatever injury he had done to him by running away from him.

To account for the solicitude which the apostle shewed in this affair, we must not, with some, suppose that Philemon was keen and obstinate in his resentments; but rather, that having a number of slaves, on whom the pardoning of Onesimus too easily might have had a bad effect, he might judge some punishment necessary for a warning to the rest. At least the apostle could not have considered the pardoning of Onesimus as a matter which merited so much earnest entreaty, with a person of Philemon’s piety, benevolence, and gratitude, unless he had suspected him to have entertained some such apprehension.

Many are of opinion that Onesimus robbed his master before he ran off. But of this there is no evidence; unless we think the expression, ver. 18. ‘If he hath injured thee any thing,’ contains an inscription of that sort. But the apostle might mean, injured thee by the loss of his service. The words will fairly bear that interpretation. Why then, as Lardner observes, impute crimes to men without proof?—What the apostle wrote to Philemon on this occasion is highly worthy of our notice; namely, that although he had great need of an affectionate honest servant to minister to him in his bonds, such as Onesimus was, who had expressed a great inclination to stay with him; and although, if Onesimus had remained with him, he would only have discharged the duty which Philemon himself owed to his spiritual father; yet the apostle would by no means detain Onesimus without Philemon’s leave; because it belonged to him to dispose of his own slave in the way he thought proper. Such was the apostle’s regard to justice, and to the rights of mankind!

Whether Philemon pardoned Onesimus, or punished him, is not known. Only, from the earnestness with which the apostle solicited his pardon, and from the generosity and goodness of Philemon's disposition, we may conjecture that he actually pardoned Onesimus, and even gave him his freedom, in compliance with the apostle's injunction, as it is interpreted by some, that 'he would do more than he had asked.' For it was no uncommon thing, in ancient times, to bestow freedom on such slaves as had obtained the esteem and good-will of their masters by their faithful services.

Sect. III.—Of the Authenticity and Use of St. Paul's Epistle to Philemon.

Jerome, in his preface to this epistle, says, "Valunt aut epistolam non esse Pauli; sed istam si Pauli sit, nihil habet quo nos edicare possit. Et plurisque verboribus repudiatum, dum commensum timent scribatur officio, non docendam." But Chrysostom in his preface hath shewed several excellent uses which may be made of this epistle; two of which, as they are of great importance, I shall mention.—The first is, In this epistle the apostle hath left to churchmen an excellent example of charity, in endeavouring to mitigate the resentment of one in a superior station towards his inferior, who had injured him; and in endeavouring to restore the inferior to the favour of the other, which he had lost through his unfaithfulness—and that not only by arguments drawn from reason, but by generously binding himself to repay all the loss which the superior had sustained by the injury of the inferior.—The second use which may be made of this epistle is equally excellent. It sets before churchmen of the highest dignity a proper example of attention to the people under their care, and of affectionate concern for their welfare, which, if it were imitated, would not fail to recommend them to the esteem and love of their people; consequently would give them a greater capacity of doing them good.—I add some other uses; namely, that although no article of faith be professedly handled in this epistle, yet precepts for the regulation of our conduct be directly delivered in it, yet the allusions to the doctrines and precepts of the gospel found in it, may be improved in various respects for regulating our conduct. For it is therein intimated, 1. That all Christians are on a level. Onesimus the slave, on becoming a Christian, is the apostles'son and Philemon's brother.—2. That Christianity makes no alteration in men's political state. Onesimus the slave did not become a freeman by embracing Christianity, but was still obliged to be Philemon's slave for ever, unless his master gave him his freedom.—3. That slaves should not be taken nor detained from their masters, without their master's consent, ver. 13, 14.—4. That we should not confine persons of low estate, nor disdain to help the meanest when it is in our power to assist them, but should love and do good to all men.—5. That where an injury hath been done, restitution is due, unless the injured party gives up his claim.—6. That we should forgive sinners who are penitent, and be heartily reconciled to them.—7. That we should never despair of re-Claiming the wicked, but do every thing in our power to convert them.

The anxiety which the apostle shewed for the welfare of Onesimus, in return for his affectionate services, could not fail to cherish good dispositions in the breast of Philemon.—Nor is it possible, even at this day, so long after Philemon and his slave are both gone, to read this letter without experiencing, in some measure, the same happy effect.

In the mean time, if this epistle had served no other purpose but to shew the world what sort of man the apostle Paul was in private life, it would justly have merited a place in the canon of scripture. For in it the writer hath displayed qualities which by men are held in the greatest estimation; such as an high spirit arising from a consciousness of his own dignity, consummate prudence, uncommon generosity, the warmest friendship, the most skilful address, and the greatest politeness as well as purity of manners; qualities not to be found either in an enthusiast or in an impostor.—Doddridge observes, "That this epistle, considered as a mere human composition, is a masterpiece of its kind. For, if it is compared with an epistle of Pliny, supposed to have been written on a similar occasion, Lib. ix. epist. 21, that epistle, though penned by one who was reckoned to excel in the epistolary style, and though it has undoubtedly many beauties, will be found by persons of taste much inferior to this animated composition of the apostle Paul."

Sect. IV.—Of the Time and Place of Writing the Epistle to Philemon.

That this epistle was written from Rome about the time the epistle to the Colossians was written, may be gathered from the following circumstances:—Like the epistle to the Colossians, this was written when the apostle was in bonds, ver. 1. 10. 13. 23, and when he had good hopes of obtaining his liberty, ver. 22.—Timothy joined Paul in both epistles.—Epaphroditus, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke, joined in the salutations in both.—Lastly, Onesimus, the bearer of this, was one of the messengers by whom the epistle to the Colossians was sent, Col. iv. 9.—But if the epistle to Philemon was written about the time the epistle to the Colossians was sent, it must have been written at Rome in the end of A.D. 61, or in the beginning of 62.

Oucusmus, in the apostle's letter to the Colossians, having been particularly recommended to their notice, Col. iv. 9, it cannot be doubted that they cheerfully received him into their church.—In the Apostolical Constitutions, Lib. viii. c. 4. 6, Onesimus is said to have been bishop of Berea. But that writing is of little authority.—When Ignatius wrote his epistle to the Ephesians, their bishop's name was Onesimus; and Grotius thought he was the person for whom St. Paul interceded. But, as Lardner observes, that is not certain. Mill has mentioned a copy, in which, at the conclusion, it is said, that Onesimus died a martyr at Rome, by having his legs broken.

New Translation.

Ver. 1. Paul, confounded with a chain for Christ Jesus; and Timothy our brother; to Philemon the beloved, and our fellow-labourer;

Commentary.

Ver. 1. 1. Confounded with a chain for Christ Jesus. 1. Aspınis. Mor. This is the genius of the subject, Eph. iv. 21.—Or it may be the genius of possession, and be translated, 'a prisoner belonging to Christ Jesus.' But as the word 'prisoner' does not convey a just idea of Paul's state at that time, 'consp. is more properly translated, 'confounded with a chain.' For an account of the matter in which the apostle was confounded at Rome, see Eph. vi. 20, note. In writing to Philemon, Paul did not call himself an apostle, because he wrote only in the character of a friend, to request a favour, rather than to enjoin what was fit, ver. 8, 9.

2. And Timothy, 1. In the preface to St. Paul's epistle to the Colossians, sect. 1, it was shewed, that the Colossians were converted by Paul. Wherefore, if Timothy acted at that time, it is more properly translated, 'confounded with a chain.' For an account of the matter in which the apostle was confounded at Rome, see Eph. vi. 20, note. In writing to Philemon, Paul did not call himself an apostle; because he wrote only in the character of a friend, to request a favour, rather than to enjoin what was fit, ver. 8, 9.

3. And Onesimus. 1. In the preface to St. Paul's epistle to the Colossians, sect. 1, it was shewed, that the Colossians were converted by Paul. Wherefore, if Timothy acted at that time, it is more properly translated, 'confounded with a chain.' For an account of the matter in which the apostle was confounded at Rome, see Eph. vi. 20, note. In writing to Philemon, Paul did not call himself an apostle; because he wrote only in the character of a friend, to request a favour, rather than to enjoin what was fit, ver. 8, 9.
2 And to Apphia the beloved, and to Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church (see) in thy house:
3 Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.
4 I give thanks to my God always, when I make mention of thee in my prayers,
5 Having heard of the increase of thy charity and faith, which thou hast (see) toward the Lord Jesus, and (us) to all the saints.
6 I pray that the communication of thy faith and charity which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all the saints,
7 For we have much joy and consolation in the love of thee, brother, and of all the saints who are refreshed by thee, brother.
8 (see) Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee what is fit;
9 Yet, for love's sake I rather beseech, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also (see) also one confided in a charge for Jesus Christ:
10 I beseech thee for my bondmen, even Onesimus.
PHILEMON.

11 Who formerly was to thee unprofitable, but now will be very profitable to thee (2sa. 24. 25) even as to me.

12 (On. 6.) Him I have sent back. Do thou (A, 106) therefore receive him; that is to say, make him to be with thee, even as he has been to me since his conversion.

13 Him I have sent back to thee at his own desire. Do thou therefore receive him into thy family; that is to say, receive one who mine own brethren; my son; a part of myself.

14 And so much as to me, I wished to detain him with myself, that (2pe 2. 25) in thy stead he might have ministered to me in these bonds for the gospel.

15 But without thy mind I would do nothing, (1pe 5. 9) that thy good deed might not be as constraint, but as voluntary.

16 (Tyr., v. 61.) Perhaps also for this reason he was separated for a little while, that thou mightest have him for ever.

17 If then thou hold me as a paraker, receive him as myself.

18 And if he hath injured thee in any thing, or oweth thee, place it to my account.

19 I Paul have written with mine own hand, I will repay thee that, I owe thee even thine own self besides.

20 Licked for him. — In this beautiful passage there is a group of the most affecting arguments closely crowded together. On the one hand, we have Philemon's own reputation for goodness; his friendship to the apostle; his respect for his character; reverence for his age; compassion for his bonds; and at the same time an illustation of that obedience which Philemon owed to him as an apostle. On the other hand, we have Philemon's repentance, and return to virtue; his profession of the Christian religion, notwithstanding the evils to which it exposed him; and his being the object of his spiritual father's tenderest affection. In short, every word contains an argument. Philemon therefore must have been exceedingly affected by this moving passage. See Ver. 15 — 17.

21 Ver. 17. — Who formerly was to thee unprofitable. — The apostle, with admirable address, gave in revolt against Philemon's misbehaviour; because he did not choose that Philemon should be exposed to the insults of the heathen on the heinous nature of his slave's offence, lest it might have inflamed his resentment too much.

22 But now I am very willing to go to thee, even as to me. — To show the sincerity of Philemon's repentance, the apostle mentions the expense which he himself had lost of his good disposition, in the many afflictions which he had received from him during his confinement. After such a proof, Philemon could not but be convinced of his wrongs, and of the necessity of restoring to him the liberty of his own authority; and Philemon was pleased with the expense which he had incurred for having restored his freedom to the prisoner, and returned it to him with the utmost tenderness.

23 And now I am even as to me. — As Bengalius observes, by laying aside his apostolic authority, St. Paul had brought himself to a level with Philemon. And now to exult Philemon, and to display that dignity which a man acquires by having obtained a sincere Christian, he called him not his servant, but his brother; or, as it is expressed ver. 17. His very self.

24 Ver. 17. That is to say, mine own brother; one whom I consider as a part of myself; as Bengalius observes, by laying aside his apostolic authority, St. Paul had brought himself to a level with Philemon. And now to exult Philemon, and to display that dignity which a man acquires by having obtained a sincere Christian, he called him not his servant, but his brother; or, as it is expressed ver. 17. His very self.

25 Ver. 18. That in thy stead he might have ministered to me in these bonds for the gospel. — Here the apostle instituted to Philemon, the obligation he was under to assist him with his personal services, who was his spiritual father; and more especially he was to come with a charm for the gospel of Christ.

26 But without thy mind I would do nothing. — From this we learn, that however just our title may be to be bestowed on others, they must not be forced to perform their duty.

27 That thy good deed might not be as constraint, but as voluntary.

28 But otherwise it would not have appeared so clearly to have been bestowed voluntarily, as when Onesimus returned and put himself in his master's power, and was received again into his family. The apostle, therefore, sent him back to Philemon, that receiving him might be known to have proceeded from his own merciful disposition.

29 Ver. 15 — 17. For this reason (2pe 2. 25) he was separated for a little while, a soft expression to denote Onesimus's running away from his master; for it contains an illusion, that this had happened providentially. See the following note.

30 That thou mightest have him for ever. — The word may be translated for life; which Drusus was to be the apostle's mantle. But Eustus thinks it signifies Philemon's having Onesimus as a brother for ever; the relation between Christians as brethren, being to continue in the next world. — The apostle here made the same kind of apology for Onesimus, which Joseph made for his brethren, Gen. 42. 1. "Now therefore he is not come down to give me word before you to preserve life." — The providence of God often brings good out of evil. Yet we should not forget the evil. By telling Philemon, that he would now have Onesimus for ever, the apostle intimated, that he was as profitable to thee, even as to me.

31 Ver. 18. — Also to me. — A slave, a beloved brother. — That Philemon might not be offended at him for calling his fictive slave his brother, the apostle acknowledged him for his fictive brother also; because, from the time of his conversion, Onesimus had the same father with the slave, and with all believers. Next, he told Philemon, that he much more ought to acknowledge Onesimus as a brother, because he stood in that relation to him, in the flesh, as well as in the Lord. — In this passage the apostle teaches us, that love is due to persons in the nearest situations who are eminently virtuous.

32 Both in the flesh and in the Lord. — By calling Onesimus Philemon's brother in the flesh, the apostle meant that he was of the same nation with Philemon; or perhaps some way related to him; as by calling him his brother "in the Lord," he meant that he was now of the same religion with Philemon.

33 Ver. 18. If he hath injured thee any thing. — This is a soft way of expressing the loss which Philemon had sustained by being deprived of his slave's service. See Prov. sect. 2. parag. 3.

34 Ver. 19. I have written with mine own hand, &c. — According to Jerome, this implies, that Paul wrote the whole letter with his own hand. And some moderns, who are of the same opinion, think that he took that trouble to shew Philemon his earnestness to have Onesimus pardoned. But, as that as it may, the apostle's writing with his own hand, that he would repay Philemon for any injury his fictive slave had done him, teaches us the necessity of restitution, in all cases of injury.

35 Then owed to me even thine own self besides. — Lepiosov, &c. — So Eusmius and Raphelius translate the word. The apostle means, that besides pardoning Onesimus, Philemon owed him his very existence as a Christian. Had he not come to him, and turned him from the darkness of heathenism to the light of the gospel, and from the power of Satan to be raised up, he could not have received the forgiveness of his sins, and an inheritance in heaven. What an immense obligation! Yet, rather than be constrained to solicit Onesimus's pardon on account of that obligation, he would
PHILEMON.

20 Yea, brother, let me have profit from thee in the Lord. Refresh my bowels in the Lord. (See ver. 7. note.)

21 Having confidence in thy obedience, I have written to thee, knowing that thou wilt even do (συντονήσων, 55.) more than I ask.

22 But at the same time prepare me also a lodging: for I hope that, through your prayers, I shall be bestowed on you.

23 There salute thee, Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner for Jesus Christ;

24. Mfrck, (see 2 Tim. iv. 11. note.), Aristarchus, Demas, Luke, my fellow-labourers,' himself pay to Philemon every thing Onesimus owed him. After all this, how ungrateful would Philemon have showed himself, if he had refused to grant the apostle’s request?

25 I beseech thee, brother, that thou wouldst have profit from thee. —Epaphras, some commentators think the apostle here alludes to the great kindness Philemon has shewn to him, in sending him the young Christian. Let me have profit from thee in the Lord’s profit, fitting for the Christian profession. Perhaps the apostle in this instance, that if Philemon promised Onesimus does not mean the thing, he himself, for having brought him to the knowledge of God, although he should require it of him to fund his obligation to pay what Onesimus owed him. Observe translate εἰς, ταῖς, I beseech thee, brother.

26. —Types. —Comp. Acts xxvii. 9. —Literally, opposit or quit my bonds. See Rev. xiv. 9. My bonds yearn on Onesimus. Because my anxiety concerning him whom I so tenderly love, by pardoning, and receiving him again into thy family. —Because the apostle had called Onesimus his bondsman, ver. 15, some are of opinion that he here entreated Philemon to receive Onesimus as cheerfully pardoning him. But the first interpretation is more natural.

Ver. 22. —In thy obedience. —By this expression the apostle intimates to Philemon, that being so good a Christian, and as generous a person, he hoped he would consider his doing what was requested of him as a duty, which he owed to Christ, and would perform it with pleasure. Or, if this gloss is not admitted, εἰς εὐλογίαν, here may be translated, obedience.

23. There will do even more than I ask. —According to some commentators, it is here intimated to Philemon, that it would be disagreeable for him to give Onesimus his liberty, and Philemon seemed to think that he should be.obliged to consider the request of the apostle as an imposition.

25. —Prepare me also a lodging. —The apostle having experienced the advantage of the use of a lodging in his house, where he preached the gospel to all who came to him, very prudently desired Philemon to provide for him such another house in Colosse, and not a lodging in Philemon’s own house, as some suppose. It seems he proposed to stay awhile in Colosse, and to spend some time in some frequented part of the city, to receive conveniently all who might desire to have information concerning his doctrine. —Theodoret observes, that the apostle’s resolution to visit Philemon soon, signified to him in this letter, naturally added weight to his solicitation in behalf of Onesimus.

2. Through your prayers. —The efficacy which in scripture is ascribed to prayer, is a great encouragement to the people of God to have recourse to prayer in all their straits, according to the example and connection of prayer in Christ and his apostles. But to render prayer effectual, it must, as James observes, chap. 1. 6. he offered in faith; that is, in a full persuasion of the goodness and power of God, and with an entire submission to his will. The apostle, by expressing his hope that God would grant him his liberty through the prayers of Philemon and his family, hath intimated that they were pious Christians and worthy persons, for whom God had a great regard. On this passage, Whittington justly observes, that if the apostle had not been able to express his hope of obtaining the liberty of Onesimus, he would have expressed his desire for his conversion to Christ, and his apostleship.

24. He afterwards founds the apostle’s second visit to Colosse, from love to the present world. See 2 Tim. iv. 11. note.

25. —He is called the beloved physician. —As for his character, see the note on that verse. He is generally believed to have been the author of the Ephesians. This, it may be useful to add here, concerning the history of the Acts of the Apostles. That, setting aside the consideration of its inspiration, as an history of the first planting of the Christian religion in the world, it is valuable work, both on account of the variety and importance of the transactions recorded in it, and on account of the manner in which they are related. For the circumstances of each transaction are selected with judgment, and told in a simplicity and elegance of language truly admirable. And the whole is comprised in a short but copious narration, which cannot fail to give pleasure to every reader who is a judge of elegant writing. Further, the Acts being an history of persons who travelled through the most civilized and best known provinces of the Roman empire, for the purpose of preaching the gospel, the historian was naturally led to mention a variety of particulars relating to the geography of those countries, their political state and condition at the time, in the person of the inhabitants. The learned, therefore, from the time of the publication of this history, have had an opportunity of examining all these particulars; and, on the most accurate investigation, they have found the statements of this book supported by the contemporary heathen writers of the best credit, whose writings still remain. Nor is this all. The Acts have been found to be written with no little diligence and accuracy, so as to be a full and copious history of this period. From the time of the publication of the history, a number of books have been written on different occasions; by Gasquet, an eminent Jewish doctor; by

Ver. 25. —I am the beloved physician. —Col. iv. 14. For his character, see the note on that verse. He is generally believed to have been the author of the Ephesians.

25 May the gracious influence of our Lord Jesus Christ fill your minds. My sincerity in this prayer I testify, by saying Amen.

the pronoun: Stephen, when arraigned before the Sanhedrim; by the apostle Paul in the synagogue of Antioch, and to the Lystra- nians, and to the senate of the Areopagus at Athens, and to the Sanhedrim: also a letter of Claudius Lysias to the governor Felix; and a speech of the orator Tertullian in accusation of Paul, before the same Felix; Paul's speech to king Agrippa, the chief captains, and principal men of Cæsarea, assembled to hear Paul; Paul's defence, pronounced in the hearing of that august assembly. In all which, the characters, and sentiments, and style of the different speakers, are so distinctly marked, that no one who reads them, and is capable of judging of such matters, can doubt their being genuine.—These circumstances united, form a convincing proof that the history of the Acts was written, as it professeth to be, by a person son who was present at most of the transactions which he hath recorded. And with respect to each of the speeches as he had not an opportunity of hearing, they may have been made known to him by those who heard them, or for a reason which would not insist on this. Luke's history of the Acts of the Apostles contains more internal marks of authenticity than any ancient heathen history extends. So that, considering it merely as a human composition, it is by far the most valuable ancient monument of the kind which the world at present is in possession of.

Ver. 25. Be with your spirit. — If the interpretation of this expression given in the commentary is admitted, it may in some respects be useful to you simply. The word grace, being plural, signifies that the apostle's wish did not respect Philemon alone, but all the persons mentioned in the inscription of this letter.

HEBREWS.

PREFACE.

The authenticity of the epistle to the Hebrews having been disputed, both in ancient and modern times, it will be necessary, before other matters are introduced, to state fairly, and to examine impartially, the arguments on each side of the question, that we may know where the greatest weight of evidence lies. This is the more necessary, not only because the chief doctrines of the gospel are more expressly asserted, and more fully explained in the epistle to the Hebrews than in any other of the inspired writings, but because these doctrines are confirmed in that epistle by testimonies brought from the writings of the law and the prophets. Wherefore, if the authenticity of the epistle to the Hebrews is established, and it is shewed to be the production of an inspired apostle, the peculiar doctrines of the gospel being confirmed therein by the Jewish, as well as by the Christian revelation, they will appear in so clear a light, that the controversies concerning them, which have so long divided the church, ceasing, greater unity of faith and love, it is to be hoped, will at length take place, than hath hitherto subsisted among the disciples of Christ.

Sec. I.—Of the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Although the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews hath in no part of it introduced his own name, we are certain, that the person to whom it was sent were at no loss to know who he was. For in three passages of the epistle, as well as by the messenger who carried it, he made himself known to the Hebrews to be the apostle Paul. The first is, chap. x. 34. 'Ye suffered with me in my bonds;' alluding to some assistance which the Hebrews had given to Paul during his imprisonments in Jerusalem and Cæsarea. See, however, chap. x. 34. note 1. The second passage is, chap. xiii. 18. 'Pray for us.—19. And I the more earnestly beseech you to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.' A request of this kind, from an unknown person, would have been perfectly ridiculous. The third passage is, chap. xiii. 33. 'Know that our brother Timothy is sent away, with whom, if he come soon, I will see you.' For, as Timothy was often called by Paul his brother, (2 Cor. i. 1, Col. i. 1,) and was known, not only in the Gentile countries, but in Judea, to be Paul's constant companion, by telling the Hebrews that his brother Timothy was sent away on some errand, and by promising, if he returned soon, to bring him with him when he visited them, this writer clearly designed himself to be the apostle Paul. But if the Hebrews knew that the letter which they received was written by Paul, we may very well suppose, with Hallet, that as often as they had occasion to speak of their letter, they would speak also of its author; and that the persons to whom they spoke of him would, in like manner, hand down his name to those who came after them.

Since, therefore, the writer of this epistle, from the time it was delivered to the Hebrews, must have been known by tradition to be Paul, it is reasonable to expect that it would have been quoted as his by some of the authors of the first age. Nevertheless, in the most ancient Christian writings now remaining, this epistle is not quoted at all till the end of the second century; at which time it began to be mentioned by some, whilst it was overlooked by others. This silence of the ancients was in a great measure owing, I imagine, to the Hebrews themselves, who were at no pains to make their letter known to the Gentiles, supposing that it had little or no relation to them.—If the reader desires to know who of the ancients have quoted this epistle, and who have neglected to mention it, he will find a full account of both in Hallet's introduction to this epistle, and in Lardner on the Canon, vol. ii. p. 331. — To his account Lardner subjoins the following historical remark: 'It is evident that this epistle was generally received, in the first three centuries. However, it was known to Ireneaus and Tertullian, as we have seen, and possibly to others also.' Tertullian ascribed it to Barnabas; in which opinion he was singular. Lardner adds, "It is manifest that it was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries." called the Hebrews; but that Luke, or some other person, translated it into Greek. Accordingly, Eusebius, in his Eccles. Hist. b. vi. c. 14, saith, Clement of Alexandria "affirmed that the epistle to the Hebrews was Paul’s, and that it was written to the Hebrews in the Hebrew language; but that Luke studiously translated it into Greek, and published it to the Greeks." The same Eusebius, Eccles. Hist. b. vi. c. 25, cites Origen as saying, in his commentaries on the Hebrews, "If I were to shew my opinion, I should say, that the thoughts are the apostle’s, but the language and composition are another’s, who committed to writing the apostle’s sentiments, and who, as it were, reduced into commentaries the things spoken by his master. Wherefore, if any church holds this epistle to be Paul’s, it is to be commended for so doing. For the ancients (i.e. Αρχαιοί άνδρες) did not rashly hand it down as Paul’s. But who actually wrote it (Ordin loc. anec.), writes the latter author, I think, is unknown to God. But an account hath reached to us from some who say that Clement, who was bishop of Rome, wrote this epistle; but from others, that it was Luke, the writer of the Gospel and the Acts."—Clement, likewise, who was born in the year 343, in his book of illustrous men, Art. Paul, saith, "The epistle, called to the Hebrews, is not thought to be his, because of the difference of the argument and style: but either Barnabas’s, as Tertullian thought; or the evangelist Luke’s, according to others; or Clement’s, bishop of Rome, who, as some think, being much with him, clothing and adorned Paul’s sense to his own hands. Moreover, he wrote, as an Hebrew to the Hebrews, in pure Hebrew, it being his own language. Whence it came to pass, that being translated, it hath more elegance in the Greek than his other epistles." Having thus laid before the reader the opinions of some of the ancients concerning the epistle to the Hebrews, I judge it proper now to transcribe, from the 8th page of Hallet’s introduction to Pierce’s paraphrase and notes on the Hebrews, the remarks which he hath made on Origen’s testimony above recited; because they may be applied to all the ancients who have given their opinion concerning the epistle to the Hebrews. "The traditions which Origen mentions, are more to be regarded than his private opinion and reasonings. And as he positively says the ancients did in fact hand it down as Paul’s epistle, so it is plain he laid vast stress on this tradition, since he would not give it up as false, though he had strong temptations so to do. For he was very hard put to it to reconcile this tradition with the style of the epistle, and with other traditions which named Clement or Luke as the writer of it. But rather than give up the former tradition, viz. that it was Paul’s epistle, he would frame such an odd hypothesis as that just now mentioned." Hallet ought to have said, adopt such an odd hypothesis; for it was framed before by Clement of Alexandria, who was Origen’s master and predecessor in the Catechetical school of Alexandria. Hallet goes on: "It is very certain, then, that the churches and writers who were ancients, had one common tradition, that St. Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews. And their testimony to this matter of fact cannot but be of great weight, since those Christians who were with Paul in his imprisonment at Rome, when the Hebrews was composed, must have conversed with the apostles themselves, or at least with their immediate successors." Hallet adds, page 21, "Since this tradition was ancient in the days of Clement of Alexandria and Origen, about 130 years after the epistle was written, it must have had its rise in the days of St. Paul himself, and so cannot reasonably be contested."—Clement of Alexandria flourished about the year 190, that is, about 130 years after the epistle to the Hebrews was written. Origen flourished in the begin-ning of the third century, about 150 years after that epistle was written.—See, however, the remarks which Lardner hath made on the above passage from Hallet’s Introduction, in the third volume of his Credibility part ii. page 253. II. It follows now to be considered, whether the want of Paul’s name in the epistle to the Hebrews, the elegance of its style, and the passages in it which are thought unsuitable to the character of an apostle, are sufficient reasons for concluding, either that it was not written originally by St. Paul, or that our present Greek copy is only a translation of an epistle which was written in Hebrew. And, first, with respect to the want of Paul’s name in this epistle, it may, notwithstanding, have actually been written by him. For in our Canon of the New Testament, there are epistles universally acknowledged to be the productions of an inspired apostle, notwithstanding his name is nowhere inserted in them. I speak of the three epistles of the apostle John, who, for some reasons now not known, hath omitted his name in all of them. His first epistle begins exactly as the Hebrews: And in his other epistles he calls himself simply the Presbyter, or Elder.—It is true, Paul commonly inserted his name in the beginning of his letters; yet in this to the Hebrews he departed from his usual manner, probably for the following reasons:—1. Because the doctrines which he set forth in it being wholly founded by him on the Jewish scriptures, the faith of the Hebrews in these doctrines was to stand, not on the authority of the writer who taught them, but on the clearness of the testimonies which he produced from the scriptures, the propriety of his application of these testimonies, and the justness of the conclusions which he deduced from them. See this explained in sect. 3.—2. As Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, in writing to the Hebrews he did not assume his apostolical character, because it was little respected by the unbelieving Jews and the Judaizing Christians, who traduced him as one who taught the Jews living in foreign countries to forsake Moses, Acts xxi. 21. For which reason, instead of writing to the Hebrews with the authority of an apostle, he in the conclusion of his letter beseeched them to suffer the word of exhortation, chap. xiii. 22, and protested, that in the whole of the doctrine delivered to them, he had maintained a good conscience, ver. 18.—3. This epistle, as shall be shewn by and bye, sect. 2, being designed, not for the believing Jews alone, but for the unbelieving part of the nation also, especially the learned doctors and scribes at Jerusalem, Paul might think it prudent not only to avoid assuming his apostolical character, but even to conceal his name; because, being regarded by the zealots as an apostate from the religion of their fathers, his name, instead of adding weight to the things which he was about to write, would have prejudiced the unbelieving part of the nation to such a degree, that in all probability they would not have read his letter. 2. With respect to the style of the epistle to the Hebrews, though it really were superior to the style of Paul’s other writings, he may notwithstanding have been the author of it.—For, towards the conclusion of his first imprisonment at Rome, when the Hebrews was composed, he may be allowed to have improved his style by use. To pass, however, from this, although both the ancients and moderns have praised the style of the epistle to the Hebrews as singularly beautiful, particularly Lardner, who saith, Can. vol. ii. p. 376, “That this epistle to the Hebrews is bright and elegant from the beginning to the end,” its superiority to all the other epistles of Paul in point of style may fairly be called in question. At least it may be doubted, that its superi-verity is so great as to show, that the person who wrote these was not capable of writing this. For, not to mention that the sublimest passages in the epistle to the Hebrews are those quoted from the Old Testament, I without hesitation affirm, that the epistles to the Ephesians, to the Colossians, to the Galatians, and to Philemon, in respect of sentiment and language, will easily bear to be set in competition with the epistle to the Hebrews; especially the epistle to the Ephesians, concerning which Grotius hath said, that "it surpasses all human eloquence." And yet, strange to tell! the same Grotius hath given it as his opinion, that the excellency of the style of the epistle to the Hebrews is a proof that it was not written by Paul.

But, let any one who is a judge of a subject, whose judgment is not prejudiced by a solecism, examine the examples of elegant, and even sublime writing, produced from Paul’s epistles and discourses in the Prelim. Ess. iii., and let him candidly say, whether he thinks the person who wrote these noble passages, particularly the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, was not capable of writing any part of the epistle to the Hebrews. If our apostle was equal to such an undertaking, is there any thing unreasonable in supposing that, which he hoped the learned Jewish doctors would read, he would be at more than ordinary pains in perfecting his style, to render it more the object of their attention? For he knew, that if they were convinced of the truth of the gospel by the reasoning in this letter, their conversation would smooth the way to the conversion of their brethren, and make the Judaizing Christians in particular, lay aside their attachment to the law of Moses, whereby they had so greatly disturbed the peace of the church.

3. The passages in the epistle to the Hebrews, which many have thought unsuitable to the character of an apostle, have been urged as proofs that this epistle cannot be Paul’s. The following are the arguments:—Heb. ii. 1. ‘On this account we ought to attend the more earnestly to the things which were heard, lest at any time we should let them slip.’—Ver. 3. ‘How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation, which beginning to be spoken by the Lord, was confirmed to us by them who heard him?’—And chap. xii. 1. ‘Laying aside every weight, and that sin which doth so easily beset us, let us run with perseverance the race set before us.’ In these passages, the writer of the epistle, it is said, speaks of himself as one not distinguished, in any respect, from Common Christians. And more particularly in the second passage, according to Grotius and Le Clerc, he speaks of himself as one of those who received the knowledge of the gospel, not from Christ, but from his apostles: Whereas Paul, in his epistle to the Galatians, hath repeatedly asserted, that he received his knowledge of the gospel, not from men, but immediately from Christ himself. To these things Wetstein, Pococke, Lardner, and others, reply, that it is Paul’s manner to join himself with those to whom he writes, especially when going to say any thing dishonourable to them. Thus, Ephes. ii. 3. ‘With whom also we had our conversation formerly, in the lusts of our flesh, doing the inclinations of the flesh, and of the imagination of mind, and were by nature children of wrath, even as others.’ In some passages also of his epistles he ranks himself with the idolatrous Gentiles, Tit. iii. 3; as doth the apostle Peter likewise, 1 Pet. iv. 3. Further, in this epistle to the Hebrews, the apostle speaks of himself, chap. ii. 3, as having received the knowledge of the gospel from him who heard Christ preach the great salvation. What he says is, that the greatest salvation, which was begun to be spoken by the Lord, was confirmed to him by the person who heard Christ; that is, the glad tidings of the great salvation given to Paul by Christ, were confirmed to him by the preaching of the apostles. Now, so far is this from being unsuitable to Paul’s character as an apostle, that, in his other acknowledged epistles, he often appealed to the testimony of the eye-witnesses in confirmation of things made known to himself by revelation. For example, Acts xii. 30, 31; 1 Cor. xvi. 5, 6, 7, 8; 2 Tim. i. 12. ‘Which things have been reported to you by them who have preached the gospel to you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.’ So also Jude appealed to the testimony of his brethren apostles, in confirmation of the things which he wrote in his epistle. See ver. 17.

What hath been advanced under the foregoing heads, must, I think, convince impartial men, that the want of Paul’s name in the epistle to the Hebrews, the elegance of its style, and the passages which are said to be unsuitable to the character of an apostle, afford no presumption that it was not written by him. Wherefore, if there is positive evidence that the epistle to the Hebrews was written by Paul, it ought to be received as his, notwithstanding some modern commentators, justly esteemed for their learning, have attempted to doubt of it.

III. It therefore remains to consider the arguments by which St. Paul is proved to be the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews.

1. The first is, the most ancient, and by far the most universal tradition of the church, hath constantly ascribed this epistle to the apostle Paul. But of this enough hath been said in the first article of the present section, to which the reader is referred.

2. The second argument is.—If an author's method of handling his subjects, together with his manner of reasoning, are sure marks by which he may be distinguished, as all good judges of composition allow, we shall, without hesitation, pronounce Paul the author of this epistle to the Hebrews. For therein we find that overflowing of sentiment, briefly expressed, which distinguished Paul from all other writers. Therein also are abrupt transitions from the subject in hand to something subordinate, but at the same time connected with it, which, having pursued for a little while, the writer returns to his subject, and illustrates it by arguments of great force, couched sometimes in a short expression, and sometimes in a single word; all which are peculiar to Paul. In this epistle, likewise, contrary to the practice of other writers, but in Paul’s manner, we meet with many elliptical expressions, which are to be supplied either from the foregoing or from the following clauses. In it also, as in Paul’s acknowledged epistles, we find reasonings addressed to the thoughts of the reader, and answers to objections not proposed, because, being obvious, the writer knew they would naturally occur, and therefore needed to be removed. Lastly, after Paul’s manner, the author of the epistle to the Hebrews hath subjoined to his reasonings many exhortations to piety and virtue; all which, to persons who are judges of writing, plainly point out the apostle Paul as the author of this epistle.

3. In the epistle to the Hebrews there are many sentiments and expressions which Paul hath used in the epistles acknowledged to be his. For example, Heb. i. 2. ‘Heir of all things;’ and, ver. 3, ‘an image of his substance,’ are parallel to Col. i. 15. ‘The image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature.’—Heb. i. 7. ‘Thou hast made him for a little while less than the angels; thou hast crowned him with glory and honor, and hast set him over the works of thy hands;’ are sentiments parallel to Phil. ii. 6. ‘Being in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient to death, even the death of the cross.’ And therefore God hath exceedingly exalted him, and hath bestowed on him a name which is above every name: 10. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, on earth, and under the earth.'

PREFACE TO HEBREWS.

Eph. i. 20, 21, 22.—What is said Heb. v. 13. about milk as food for babes, but strong meat for full grown men, we have 1 Cor. iii. 2. ‘Milk I gave you, and not meat, for ye were not then able to receive it.'—Heb. viii. 1. ‘What setteth down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens,’ and chap. xii. 2. ‘Setteth down at the right hand of the throne of God,’ are expressions similar to Eph. i. 20. ‘And set him at his own right hand in the heavenly place.’—Heb. x. 1. ‘The law cometh in, and saith, a shadow of good things to come, but the same with Col. ii. 17. ‘Which are a shadow of things to come.’—Heb. x. 33. ‘Ye were made a spectacle, both by afflictions and reproaches.’—1 Cor. iv. 9. ‘We are made a spectacle to the world.’—Heb. xiii. 16. ‘But to do good and to communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased,’ is similar toPhilip. iv. 18, where Paul, after thanking the Philippians for having communicated to the wants of the saints, exhorts the Philippians to ‘do all the good they could, both by word and deed, in connexion with the gospel.’—Heb. xiii. 16. ‘A smell of a sweet savour, a sacrifice acceptable, and well pleasing to God.’—The writer of this epistle, chap. x. 30, quoting Deut. xxxiii. 10. adds the words, ‘saith the Lord.’—Heb. ii. 1. ‘Ye neither in the Hebrew, nor in the LXX, just as Paul hath done in two of his citations from the Old Testament, Rom. xiv. 11. 2 Cor. vi. 17.—Heb. xiii. 18. the writer of this epistle saith, ‘We are fully persuaded we have a good conscience.’ The same declaration Paul made before the council, Acts xxiii. 1. and before Felix, Acts xxiv. 16. and to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. i. 13.—Heb. xii. 14. ‘Follow peace with all men.’—Rom. xii. 18. ‘Live peaceably with all men.’—Heb. xiii. 20. God is called ‘The God of Peace.’ This title is given to God nowhere but in Paul’s writings, Rom. xv. 33. xvi. 20. 2 Cor. xiii. 11.; Phil. iv. 9.; 1 Thess. v. 23.; 2 Thess. iii. 16. ‘The Lord of peace,’ Heb. xiii. 2. 3. 13. there is a beautiful allusion to the athletic exercises, to which there are many similar allusions in Paul’s other epistles.—This remarkable coincidence of sentiments and expressions in the epistle to the Hebrews, with the sentiments and expressions in Paul’s acknowledged epistles, is no small presumption that this epistle is of his writing also.

4. In the epistle to the Hebrews there are interpretations of some passages of the Jewish scriptures, which may properly be called Paul’s, because they are to be found only in his writings. For example, Paul, ii. 7. ‘My son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee,’ is applied to Jesus, Heb. i. 5. just as Paul, in his discourse to the Jews in the synagogue of Antioch in Pisidia, applied the same passage of scripture to him, Acts xiii. 33.—In like manner, the exclamation of Paul, vii. 4. and of Paul, cx. 1. given by Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25. 27. is found Heb. ii. 7. 8.—So also the explanation of the covenant with Abraham, given Heb. vi. 14. 18., is nowhere found but in Paul’s epistle to the Galatians, chap. iii. 6. 9. 14. 18.

5. There are, in the epistle to the Hebrews, doctrines which none of the inspired writers have mentioned, except Paul.—In particular, the doctrine of the mediation and intercession of Christ, explained Heb. iv. 15. 16. vii. 25. 32. are nowhere found in the books of the New Testament except in Paul’s epistles: Rom. viii. 34. Gal. ii. 19. 20.—The title of Mediator, which is given to Jesus, Col. ii. 2. vii. 8. is nowhere applied to Jesus except in Paul’s epistles, 1 Tim. ii. 5. —In like manner, none of the inspired writers except Paul, Heb. vii. 1—4. have informed us, that Christ offered the sacrifices of himself in heaven: and that he did not exercise his priestly office on earth, but only in heaven.

6. In the epistle to the Hebrews we find such elaborate views of the divine dispensation respecting religion, such an extensive knowledge of the Jewish scriptures, according to their ancient and true interpretation, which Paul, no doubt, learned from the celebrated doctors under whose tuition he studied in his younger years at Jerusalem; such a deep insight also into the most recondite meanings of these scriptures, and a disposition to admit the reasonings founded thereon for the confirmation of the gospel revelation, as, without disparagement to the other apostles, seems to have exceeded, not their natural abilities and education only, but that degree of inspiration with which they were endowed. None of them but Paul, who was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and who profited in the Jewish religion and learning above many of his fellow-students, and who, in his ripener years, was intimately acquainted with the learned men of his own nation, Acts ix. 1. 2. 14. xxvi. 4. 5. and who was called to the apostleship by Christ himself, when for that purpose he appeared to him from heaven, may, who was caught up by Christ into the third heaven, was equal to the subjects treated of in this most admirable epistle.

Before the controversy concerning the author of the epistle to the Hebrews is dismissed, it may be proper to mention the argument by which Grotius hath endeavoured to prove that it was written by Luke, or at least was translated by him into Greek from the apostle’s Hebrew autograph. His argument is this: There are in the epistle to the Hebrews some Greek words used in a sense which they have not in Paul’s other epistles, but which are found in that sense in Luke’s writings.—Now, allowing this to be true, Grotius concludes, that Luke is the author, on the following grounds: For every one knows, that the use of a few words in an unusual sense, doth not constitute what is called a writer’s style. Besides, Haldar hath showed that there are also, in the epistle to the Hebrews, words used in an uncommon sense, which are not found in Luke’s writings, but which Paul in his other epistles hath used in that sense. Wherefore, if in the former case it is argu’d that Paul was not the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, it may, in the latter case, be argued with equal reason, that Luke was neither the author nor the translator of that epistle. The truth is, as Haldar observes, ‘There is nothing in the argument either way: and if the argument had not been offered by so great a man as Grotius, it would not have been worth considering.’

Upon the whole, let any one who hath impartially weighed the arguments on the one side and on the other, in this important question, say, whether the facts and circumstances above set forth do not, in a very convincing manner, shew that the tradition preserved in the church from the beginning, concerning Paul’s being the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, is well founded: And whether the church hath not rightly received that epistle into the canon of scripture, as an inspired writing of the great apostle of the Gentiles!

Sect. II.

Of the Persons to whom the Epistle to the Hebrews was sent: Of the purpose for which it was written; And of the Language in which it was originally composed.

I. Clement of Alexandria, Jerome, Euthalius, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and others, were of opinion, that the epistle to the Hebrews was sent to the Jews living in Judea, who in the apostles’ days were called Hebrews, to distinguish them from the Jews in the Gentile countries, who were called Helenaet or Gentiles, Acts vi. 1. ix. 20. x. 20. In this opinion these ancient authors were well founded, because, as Lardner observes, this letter appears to have been written to persons dwelling in one place, Heb. xiii. 10. 23. 34. namely, to the inhabitants of Judea; and to the generation who lived in Jerusalem. For there only the Levitical...
worption, which is so accurately examined in this epistle, was performed: And there the chief priests, elders, and scribes resided, who were best qualified to explain and defend that worship;—best qualified also to judge of the meaning of the ancient oracles quoted in this learned letter, and to determine whether the author’s reasonings therein were just and his doctrine true. Accordingly, this epistle was not directed, like the epistle of James, ‘To the twelve tribes who are in the dispersion’; nor, like Peter’s first epistle, ‘To the sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus,’ &c. But it begins without any address at all; so that not the believing Jews only, but those of the nation who had not believed the gospel, were invited to read and consider it, in Jerusalem or elsewhere.

In confirmation of the assumption that the epistle to the Hebrews was written to the people of Judea, Lardner, Canon, vol. ii. p. 316, takes notice, that in it there are expressions more suitable to the Jews in any other part of the world. For example, chap. ii. 9, 18. The persons to whom this letter was sent, are supposed to have been well acquainted with our Lord’s sufferings and resurrection.—In like manner, chap. vi. 12. For though ye ought to have been teachers, on account of the time, with what follows, applies better to the believers in Judea than to others; because having enjoyed the gospel from the beginning, they were of longer standing in the faith than others.—Chap. x. 32. ‘Call to remembrance the former days, in which, being enlightened, ye sustained a great conflict of afflictions.’ This leads us to the church at Jerusalem, which, after the death of Stephen, suffered a great persecution, Acts viii. 1.

The following passages likewise deserve particular attention: Chap. xiii. 7. ‘Remember your rulers, who have spoken to you the word of God, of whose conversation attentively considering the ending, imitate their faith.’ Theodoret’s note on this verse is, “He intends the saints who were dead, Stephen the protomartyr, James the brother of John, and James called the Just, and many others, who were taken off by the Jewish rage. Consider these, says he, and, observing their example, imitate their faith.” And ver. 17. ‘Obey your rulers, and submit yourselves, for they watch for your souls.’ And ver. 24. ‘Salute all your rulers.’ These directions imply, that this letter was sent to the multitude or laity of some particular church, whose rulers, as Theodoret observes on ver. 24, not needing the instruction contained in it, the writer doth not address them, but their disciples. Now what church could that be, but the church at Jerusalem which was ruled by the apostles, who certainly knew the truth concerning the law; that it was no rule of justification either to Jews or Gentiles; that its priesthood and sacrifices were utterly ineffectual for procuring the pardon of sin; and that the principal use of the Levitical worship was to prefigure the good things to come under the gospel dispensation. For,” to use Lardner’s words, Canon, vol. ii. p. 320. “I am persuaded, that not only James and all the other apostles had exactly the same doctrine with Paul, but that all the elders likewise, and all the understanding men among the Jewish believers, embraced the same doctrine. They were, as I apprehend, the multitude only, (σωσία, pious), or the men of lower rank among them, who were attached to the particularist of the Mosaic law and the customs of their ancestors. This may be urged from what James and the elders at Jerusalem say to Paul, Acts xxi. 30. ‘Thou art the brother, how many thousands of Jews there are who believe; and they will call you to account for the contravention of the law.—What is it therefore! the multitude must needs come together.’—It is hence evident, that the zeal for the law which prevailed in the minds of many, was not approved by James or the elders. That being the case, these recommendations of a regard for their rulers, whether apostles or elders, were very proper in an epistle to the Jews and Judea.” For, as many as they differed in opinion concerning the law from their teachers, they might be apt to think lightly of them, and to disregard their instructions; for which reason the apostle desired their rulers. This circumstance, joined with those already mentioned, sufficiently proves that the epistle to the Hebrews, though designed for the Jews everywhere, was with great propriety directed and sent to the church at Jerusalem; as the ancients above-mentioned believed: in which opinion they have been followed by Bessus, Lightfoot, Pearson, Whitby, Mill, Cappell, Hallet, Lardner, and other learned moderns.

To the opinion, that the epistle to the Hebrews was written to the Jews in Judea, some have objected the words found, Heb. xii. 4. ‘Not yet unto blood have ye resisted, combating against sin.’ This, they think, could not be said of the church at Jerusalem, where there had been two martyrs, namely, Stephen and James. But the answer is, the apostle is speaking of the laity of that church, to whom alone this letter was directed, and not to the rulers, as hath been showed, sect. vi. 9. Of the common people, few, if any, had hitherto been put to death. But they had been imprisoned, and pillaged, and defamed; Acts viii. 1. 3. xxvi. 10, 11. I Thess. ii. 14.—Another objection is taken from Heb. vi. 10. ‘For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.’ “Here again,” says Wall, “we are put upon thinking to what church of Christians this is said. For, as to those of Jerusalem, we read much in Paul’s former letters of their poverty, and of their being ministered to by the Gentile Christians of Galatia, of Macedonia, of Corinth; and in the Acts by the Antiochians: But nowhere of their ministering to any other saints. If it is of them that St. Paul speaks this, it must be meant of ministering to their own poor. For that, indeed, they were famous at first, when the rich men among them sold their lands, and bought the money to the apostles, and they had all things in common, and none lacked. But in the times that had been since that, they were very poor, and were relieved by other churches.” But there is little force in this objection. Ministering to the saints in those days, did not consist solely in helping them with money. Attending on them in their imprisonment; doing them any little offices they stood in need of; speaking to them in a kind and consolatory manner, with such other services as may be performed without money, was and is as real a ministering to the saints, as relieving them with money. And doubtless the church at Jerusalem ministered, in that manner, to one another in their afflictions. Further, although the generality of the members of the church at Jerusalem were reduced to poverty by the sufferings they had sustained, there certainly were among them some in better circumstances, who may have deserved the commendation, that they had ministered, and did still minister to the saints, by giving them a share of their worldly goods.

II. With respect to the purpose for which the epistle to the Hebrews was written, I observe that the things contained in it lead us to understand, That it was written to prove what the learned doctors, and scribes, and elders in Jerusalem strongly denied; namely, that Jesus of Nazareth, whom they had lately put to death, is Christ the Son of God; and the gospel, of which Jesus is the subject and the author, is of divine original and universal obligation. For in this letter, as shall be showed in sect. 3. all the arguments and objections by which those who put Jesus to death endeavoured to set his claim aside, and overturn the gospel, are introduced, explained, and confuted; his title and authority, as a Legate, to aboliish the institutions of Moses, and to substitute the gospel dispensation in their room, is established; the absolute ineffectivity of the Levitical atonements to procure the pardon of sin, is demonstrated; the reality of the sacrifice of himself which Christ offered for sin, together with its efficacy and its acceptableness to God, are clearly proved—and on all these considerations, the unbelieving Jews were exhorted to forsake the law of Moses, and embrace the gospel; and such of the nation as had embraced it, were cautioned against apostasy. Further, as the arguments made use of in this epistle, for explaining and proving the important matters of which it treats, are all taken from the Jewish scriptures, there can be little doubt that it was written for the purpose of persuading the unbelieving Jews everywhere to renounce Judaism and embrace the gospel; as well as for establishing the believing Jews in the profession of Christianity. Being therefore a letter to the whole Jewish nation, the writer intended that the believing Hebrews in Judea, to whom it was sent, should communicate it to their unbelieving brethren everywhere, who chose to read it.

That a writing designed for the conversion of the Jewish nation, should have been calculated, in an especial manner, to convince the learned doctors and scribes who still adhered to the religion of their forefathers, and that it should have been sent to the Jews living in Judea, was highly proper. They were the principal part of the circumcised, from whom this letter could be circulated among the Jews of the dispersion. Besides, the nation in general, it is reasonable to think, would be much guided in their judgment concerning the doctrine taught in this epistle, by the reception which it might meet with from their brethren in Judea; but especially from the scribes and elders at Jerusalem.

III. As to the language in which the epistle to the Hebrews was originally composed, many of the ancients speak of it as having been written by the apostle Paul in the Hebrew. This was the opinion of Clement of Alexandria, and of Jerome, as is plain from the passages quoted above, Sect. 1. parag. 3. Eusebius too was of the same opinion. For in his Eccl. Hist. lib. iii. c. 38, speaking of the epistle which Clement's knowledge, and hence, the name of the church of the Romans, to the church of the Corinthians, he says, 'In it he hath inserted many thoughts from the epistle to the Hebrews, sometimes using the very same words. Plainly shewing that it is not a new writing. Wherefore it is justly ranked with the other writings of the apostle. Now Paul, who was conversant with the Hebrews, having written to them in their native language, say Luke the evangelist, others, this very Clement, translated that writing; which seems the more true, that the epistle of Clement, and the epistle to the Hebrews, exhibit the same kind of style, and that the thoughts in both are not much different.' Here it is proper to remark, that notwithstanding the fathers usually appealed to tradition in support of the ancient facts which they have reported, when they had in their power to make such an appeal, neither Clement, nor Origen, nor Eusebius, nor Jerome, nor any Christian writer of the second and following centuries, who have told us that the epistle to the Hebrews was written by Paul in the Hebrew language, have said, or so much as insinuated, that they learned that important fact from tradition. They delivered it merely as an opinion of their own, formed in the circumstance of the epistle's being written to the Hebrews. This Eusebius acknowledges, in the passage last quoted from his history; as Jerome likewise doth, in the passage quoted from him, Sect. 1. where, speaking of Paul, he says, "Moreover he wrote, as an Hebrew to the Hebrews, in a language all his own;" but, although the fathers who thought the epistle to the Hebrews was originally written in the Hebrew language, have professedly founded their opinion on its being composed for the instruction of the Hebrews, I am inclined to believe they were led into that opinion by the style also of the Greek epistle. For having been informed by tradition, that it was an epistle of Paul, and fancying its style to be more elegant than that of Paul's other epistles, to account for its supposed superior elegance, and at the same time to maintain the tradition which had handed down Paul as its author, they invented the strange hypothesis, that it was written by Paul in Hebrew, and translated by some other person, they could not tell who, into elegant Greek.

The opinion of the ancients, concerning the language in which St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews, being wholly founded on the supposed propriety of writing to the Hebrews in their own language, it will be necessary to inquire a little into that propriety. And, if it was proper for the apostle to write this letter to the Hebrews in their own language, it must have been equally proper for him to write his letter to the Romans in their language. Yet we know that Paul's epistle to the Romans was not written in Latin, the language of Rome, but in Greek: Nay, that all Paul's epistles, and the epistles of the other apostles, were written in Greek, and not in the languages of the churches and persons to whom they were sent. Secondly, The apostolical epistles being intended for the use of the whole Christian world in every age, as well as for the use of the persons to whom they were sent, it was more proper that they should be written in Greek than in any provincial dialect; because the Greek language was then universally understood, especially in the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. So Cicero informs us in his oration Pro Arch. Post. "Græca leguntur in omnibus fere gentibus; Latina sui finibus, exiguis sane, continentur." It may perhaps be objected, that in many countries the common people, of whom the Christian churches were chiefly composed, did not understand the Greek language. True; but in every church there were numbers of persons endowed with the gift of tongues, and of the interpretation of tongues, who could readily turn the apostle's Greek epistles into the language of the church to which they were sent. In particular, the president, or the spiritual man, who read the apostle's Greek letter to the Hebrews in their public assemblies, could, without any hesitating, read it in the Hebrew language for the edification of those who did not understand Greek. And with respect to the Jews in the provinces, Greek being the native language of most of them, this epistle was much better adapted to be written in the Greek language, than if it had been written in the Hebrew, which few of them understood.

Thirdly, It was proper that all the apostolical epistles should be written in the Greek language, because the principal doctrines of the gospel being delivered and explained in them, the explanation of these doctrines could with more advantage be compared as to be better understood, being expressed in one language, than if, in the different epistles, they had been expressed in the language of the churches and persons to whom they were sent. Now what should that one language be, in which it was proper to write the Christian revelation, but the Greek, which was then generally understood, and in which there were many books extant, which treated of all kinds of literature, and which, on that account, were likely to be preserved, and by the reading of which Christians in after ages would be enabled to understand the Greek of the New Testament? This advantage none of the provincial dialects, used in the apostle's days, could pretend to. Being limited to particular countries, they were soon to be discarded; and few if any have been written in them which merited to be preserved, the meaning of such of the apostle's letters as were composed in these provincial languages, could not easily have been ascertained.—Upon the whole, the argument taken from the propriety of St. Paul’s writing to the Hebrews in their own language, is not well founded.

In addition to what hath been said to show that the epistle to the Hebrews was written originally, not in the Hebrew, but in the Greek language, the reader, because this is a matter of great importance, is desired to attend to two particulars. The first is, in our Greek copy of the epistle, there are no internal marks of its being a translation from an Hebrew original. We find few of the Hebrews which abound in the Greek versions of the Jewish scriptures; and such citations as are made from these scriptures are made, not from the Hebrew original, but for the most part from the LXX. Greek version; as most of the citations from the old Testament in Paul’s other epistles likewise are. Would this have happened, if the epistle to the Hebrews had been originally written in Hebrew?—Of this the following are examples.—Heb. viii. 9. ‘And I regard them not.’ In the Hebrew text, Jer. xxxi. 33. it is, ‘Although I was an husband to them.’—Deut. xii. 26. ‘Thou hast prepared me a body.’ In the Hebrew, ‘Mine ears thou hast opened.’—1 Pet. x. 28. ‘If he draw back.’ In the Hebrew, ‘If he faint.’—2 Pet. xi. 31. ‘Worshipped leaning on the top of his staff.’ In the Hebrew, ‘Israel bowed himself on the bow’s head.’—In the Greek epistle, the writer hath interpreted the Hebrew names which he mentions. This he had no occasion to do, if he wrote his epistle in pure Hebrew. And even if he had written it in the Syro-Chaldaic, called in the apostle’s days the Hebrew tongue, the names in the two languages are so little different, that there was no need to interpret them to those who understood the Syro-Chaldaic. Lastly, there are in the Greek epistle to the Hebrews several paronomasias, or Greek words of like sound, placed near each other, which, in the opinion of Spanheim and Wetstein, show that this epistle is an original writing, and not a translation. In like manner, Matthew’s gospel is showed to have been originally written in Greek, and not in Hebrew, as some of the fathers thought, by two elegant paronomasias observed by Wetstein. The one is found, chap. v. 47, 48. (or τὸ χειρὶ τῶν ἀντικειμένων) that is, as Jerome saith, Βεβαις τὰ τῶν χειρῶν. On this Wetstein remarks, "videtur Matthew vocem, τοιαυτον his studio adhibuisse, ut τῶν χειρῶν opponere."—The other paronomasia we have given on p. 16. As to the evidence of which Wetstein remarks, "Eleganter dictur, Togunt faciunt, ut apparent, &c. It is elegantly said, They cover their face that they may appear."—But the fact is, circumstances cannot as well as the epistle to the Hebrews was not originally written in the Hebrew language, is this. No one of the ancient Christian writers, who have told us that this epistle was written by the apostle Paul in Hebrew, has said that he ever saw an ancient Hebrew copy of it. Yet many such there must have been in Judea, and in the neighbouring countries, if it had been originally written in Hebrew. That being the case, it is to be supposed that Origen and Jerome, who were at great pains to procure and publish correct copies of the LXX. and Vulgate versions of the Jewish Scriptures, did not search these countries for a genuine copy of the Hebrew epistle to the Hebrew, which they considered as the original, that they might more, with the copy Greek which was in every one’s hands; and which being thought by them a translation, it was necessary to know if it was a just one! But, notwithstanding the fathers had such strong inducements to search for a genuine copy of the Hebrew epistle, I repeat what I affirmed above, that neither Clement of Alexandria, nor Jerome, nor any of the ancients, who thought Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews in Hebrew, say they ever saw so much as one copy of that original. Therefore agree with Faber, Osiander, Lachmann, Beza, and others learned critics, in their opinion that Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews in Greek: And I am persuaded that our Greek copy of the epistle to the Hebrews is itself the apostle’s original letter; consequently, that the same regard is due to it which is paid to all the other epistles of the apostle Paul.

Sect. III.—Of the Matters handled, and of the Reasons and Proofs advanced, in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

As the Jews had been honoured with the keeping of all the former revelations of God to mankind, it might have been expected that the gospel, which was the explanation and completion of the whole of these revelations, would have been received by them with joy: But it happened otherwise. Most of the Jews adhered to the law of Moses with the greatest obstinacy, because God had spoken it at Sinai by the ministration of angels, in the hearing of their fathers, accompanied with great thunderings, and lightnings, and tempests, and darkness. But the gospel they despised and opposed, because it was spoken in a private manner, by Jesus of Nazareth, whom the rulers at Jerusalem had put to death publicly as a deceiver. Further, in their attachment to the law, and their opposition to the gospel, the Jews were confirmed by observing, that in the law various ceremonies for sin were prescribed by God himself, which they daily performed in the temple at Jerusalem, as a worship highly acceptable to the Deity: Whereas, in the Christian assemblies, they saw no worship of that kind presented to God; no sacrifices of any sort performed, nor any rites of purification performed, for obtaining the pardon of sin. For these reasons they detected the gospel as a manifest impost; especially as it pretended to abolish the law of Moses, which they believed to be of unalterable and eternal obligation.

These arguments being very specious, were no doubt much insisted on by the lawyers and scribes, not only to hinder their countrymen from receiving the gospel, but to shake the faith of those who had embraced it. The apostle Paul, therefore, who was himself a doctor most learned in the law, wrote this excellent epistle to the Hebrews, to prove, that the same God who had given to the fathers of the Jewish nation by the prophet, had in these last days spoken the gospel to all mankind by his Son: Consequently, that these revelations could not possibly contradict each other, although the Son, when he spake the gospel, was clothed with flesh, he was still the brightness of the Father’s glory, and the express image of his substance. That being appointed of God to expiate our sins by the sacrifice of himself, we are cleansed from our sins by that sacrifice, and not by the Levitical sin-offerings:—And that, after offering the sacrifice of himself, he sat down at the right hand of God, as High-priest of the heavenly holy place, and as Governor of the world.

But the appearing of the Son of God in the flesh, his dying as a sacrifice for sin, his officiating for mankind in heaven as a High-priest, and the inefficacy of the Levitical sacrifices, being, as was observed, things contrary to all the religious opinions of the Jews, the doctors, followed by the bulk of the nation, rejected these with abhorrence, on pretense that they overthrew the former revelations. Wherefore, the only possible method by which the unbelieving Jews could be convinced of the truth of these things, was to prove them by testimonies from their own scriptures, in which the sacrifices of God are recorded. This method the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews hath actually followed: for he hath supported all the facts above-mentioned, and all his affirmations, by passages from the writings of Moses and the prophets. Only, to judge rightly of his arguments and conclusions, the reader ought to know, that the passages to which he has appealed were all understood by him in the sense in which the doctors and people of that age understood them. This I think the reader will acknowledge, when he considers that the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews neither assumes the character of an apostle, nor rests his explications of the passages which he hath quoted on the authority of his own inspiration, but delivers these explications as matters universally known and acknowledged, and reasons on the passages which he quotes according to that acknowledged sense. Nor could he with propriety do otherwise. For, if he had offered any novel interpretations, either literal or typical, of the Jewish scriptures, his arguments built on these interpretations would have had no weight whatever, either with the believing or unbelieving part of the nation.—This remark merits the reader’s attention. For if the passages of the Old Testament, quoted in the epistle to the Hebrews, are there applied to the persons and events to which they were commonly applied by the learned doctors of that age, and by the generality of the people, these interpretations and applications cannot be called in question by us. They are the ancient approved interpretations, given perhaps by the prophets themselves to their contemporaries, who handed them down to posterity. This at least is certain, that in the Chaldee paraphrase of Onkelos and Jonathan, written about the time of our Lord’s birth, most of the passages of the Old Testament, which are applied to Jesus in the New, are interpreted of the Messiah. It is no objection to the foregoing remark, that the Jews now give a different interpretation of these passages. Their doctors, after the gospel began to prevail, wishing to deprive it of the evidence which it derived from the Old Testament prophecies, forsook the ancient and commonly received interpretation of these prophecies, and applied them to persons and events of which their fathers never so much as dreamed.—Upon the whole it is evident, that although we were really in doubt of St. Paul’s being the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, we could not call in question any of the doctrines taught in it; because their authority doth not depend on the character or credit of the writer who hath proposed them, but on the passages of the Old Testament by which he hath proved them; on his understanding these passages according to their true meaning; and on the justness of the conclusions which he hath deduced from them so understood. Nevertheless it must be acknowledged, that this epistle, as a part of the canon of the New Testament, will have a still greater authority with Christians, if it is known to have been written by an inspired apostle of Christ.

From the foregoing account of the matters contained in the epistle to the Hebrews, the reader must be sensible, that it exhibits doctrines of great and general use; that it contains profound discoveries concerning the most important articles of our faith; and that it opens to us the sources of our best hopes. Wherefore, like the other Catholic epistles of the New Testament, it might have been addressed, ‘To all in every place who believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.’ Or rather, because in this epistle some of the greatest objections against the gospel are answered, or obviated, it might have been addressed to mankind in general. Yet being written expressly to prove, that all the essential doctrines of the gospel are either contained in the former revelations, though briefly and darkly, or are conformable to them, it was with great propriety addressed to the Jews in particular. For doctrines and proofs of that kind, submitted to the examination of the keepers of the former revelations, if approved by them, could hardly fail to be received by the rest of mankind, with the respect which is due to matters in themselves important, and which are so fully established by both revelations.

As the matters contained in the epistle to the Hebrews are highly worthy of our attention, so the manner in which they are handled is no less so. The arguments advanced in it for supporting the doctrines of the gospel, as we have said, are all taken from the Jewish scriptures. But they are not on that account the less, but rather the more worthy of general regard; being the very best arguments which can be used to convince rational unbelievers. The reason is, the doctrine concerning the dignity of Jesus as the Son of God, and the nature of that dignity; and concerning the sacrifice of himself which he offered to God, and the merit of that sacrifice; and concerning God’s willingness to pardon sinners, and to bestow on them unseparable rewards in the life to come — I say these doctrines are all matters of fact, whose existence can neither be known nor proved but by revelation. And, that the proofs thereof subsist in the Jewish, as well as in the Christian revelation, is a point of admirable wisdom; because it shows, that the gracious purposes of the Deity respecting the human race, were all planned from the beginning; that in every age God gave mankind indications of his merciful designs, and of the manner of their execution; and that there is a strict connexion between all his revelations and dispensations. Hence, when the Son of God appeared on earth, to lay a foundation for the new revelation in his own actions and sufferings, and to fulfil the prophecies relating to himself recorded in the Jewish scriptures, there was such a display made of the connexion subsisting between the divine dispensations, as hath added the greatest strength of evidence, not only to our Lord’s character and pretensions as the Son of God, but to the divine dispensations themselves; which, though different, are not opposite or contradictory, but parts of a great plan formed from the beginning by the wisdom of God, and brought into execution in the different ages of the world, till the whole hath been illustriously completed in the gospel.

Sacr. IV.—Of the Time when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written.

If the apostle Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, the time when it was written may easily be fixed. For the salutation from the saints of Italy, chap. iv. 24, together with the apostle’s promise to see the Hebrews, ver. 23, plainly intimate, that his confinement was then either ended, or on the eve of being ended. It was therefore written soon after the epistles to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, and not long before Paul left Italy, that is, in the year 61 or 62.

In the epistle itself there are passages which show, that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem; particularly chap. viii. 4, ix. 25. x. 11, xii. 10, which speak of the temple as then standing, and of the Levitical sacrifices as still continuing to be offered. To these add chap. x. 32—37, where the apostle comforts the believing Hebrews under the persecution which their unbelieving brethren were carrying on against them, by the prospect of Christ’s speedy advent to destroy Jerusalem, and the whole Mosaic economy.

eview and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

After the manner of the best writers, the apostle begins this most learned epistle with proposing the subjects of which he is about to discourse; namely, four important facts, on which the authority of the gospel, as a revelation from God, is built; and which, if well established, should make unbelievers, whether Jews or Gentiles, renounce their infidelity, and embrace the gospel.

Of these facts the first is, That the same God who spoke the former revelations to the fathers of the Jewish nation, hath in these last days spoken the gospel to all mankind, ver. 1.—This the apostle mentioned first of all, to shew the agreement of the gospel with the former revelations. For if there were any real opposition between the Jewish and Christian revelations, the authority of one of them, or of both, would be destroyed: Whereas those revelations agreeing in all things, they mutually explain, and subserve each other. See chap. iii. note 3.

The second fact of which the apostle proposed to discourse is, That the person by whom God hath spoken the gospel is his Son, in the human nature, who is an effulgence from his glory, and a true image of his substance; by whom also he made the worlds, ver. 2, 3. —Hence it follows, that the author of the gospel is far superior in nature to the angels, by whose ministry God spake the law; that the revelation which he made to mankind is more perfect than the revelation made to the Jews by angels; and that the dispensation founded thereon is a better and more permanent dispensation than the law.

The third fact is, That the author of the gospel, in consequence of his having made the worlds, is Heir, or Lord and Governor of all. And although, after becoming man, he died, yet, being raised from the dead, he had the government of the world restored to him in the human nature, ver. 3, 5. —To the faithful this is a source of the greatest consolation; because, if the world is governed by their master, he certainly hath power to protect and bless them; and every thing befailing them will issue in good to them. Besides, being the judge as well as the ruler of the world, he hath authority to acquit them at the judgment, and power to reward them for all the evils they have suffered on his account. The fourth fact treated of in this epistle is, That the author of the gospel laid down his life a sacrifice for sin, and by that sacrifice made an atonement, of which, when offered, God declared his acceptance, by setting Jesus at his own right hand, ver. 5. —The gospel, therefore, hath a priesthood and sacrifice more efficacious than the priesthood and sacrifices of the law taken together. For an expiation made by a person so great in himself, and so desirous to God as his own Son, and made by the appointment of God, could not but be acceptable to him; consequently it must be a sure foundation for that hope of pardon, by which the gospel encourages sinners to repent.

The authority of the gospel being supported by these four facts, the apostle judged it necessary to establish them on a solid foundation; and for that purpose wrote this learned letter, which he directed to the Hebrews, because, being extremely revelations, they were the fittest judges both of the facts themselves and of the proofs brought from the ancient revelations to support them.

With respect to the first of these facts, namely, that the Jewish and Christian revelations were spoken by the same God, let it be observed, that the apostle did not think it necessary to set forth a separate proof thereof. For as the whole of the epistle was to be employed in shewing, that the doctrines of the gospel, which the Jews considered as contrary to the former revelations, were all taught by Moses and the prophets, it was such a clear proof of the two revelations having proceeded from the same original, that there was no occasion to offer any other.

With respect to the second fact on which the authority of the gospel, as a revelation from God, is built, namely, that the man Jesus, by whom it was spoken, is the Son of God, the apostle, instead of proposing the direct proofs whereby that fact is ascertained, judged it more proper to answer the objections advanced by the doctors for disproving it. And the rather, because the particulars of which the direct proof consisted, had all been exhibited in the most public manner in Judea, where the Hebrews dwelt, and were well known to them, Acts x. 36–42; namely, that God by his Spirit in the hearing of many witnesses, had declared Jesus of Nazareth to be a voice from heaven, at his baptism; and by a like voice at his transfiguration; and by a third voice, in the hearing of the multitude assembled with them; with also, that Jesus had proved himself the Son of God by many miracles, performed in the most public manner during the course of his ministry, and had often appealed to these miracles as undeniable proofs of his pretensions. Above all, that his resurrection from the dead, after the rulers had put him to death as a blasphemer, for calling himself 'Christ the Son of the Blessed,' demonstrated him to be the Son of God. Further, these proofs had often been appealed to by the apostles, Acts x. 38, 39; and to their appeals God himself continually bare witness, by signs, and miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost. The Hebrews, therefore, being well acquainted with the direct evidence on which our Lord's claim to be the Son of God rested, when the apostle affirmed, that 'in these last days God had spoken by his Son,' he in effect told them that he had spoken by Jesus of Nazareth, and at the same time called to their remembrance all the proofs by which Jesus of Nazareth's claim to the dignity of God's Son was established. Nor was it necessary to enter into that matter more particularly, for the sake of others who might read this epistle, as these proofs were soon to be published to all, in the evangelical histories. In short, if the Hebrews in Judea were not convinced that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God, it was not owing to their ignorance of the proofs by which his claim to that dignity was established, but to the objections urged against it, which it seems had much more influence to make them reject Jesus, than the multiplied miraculous attestations above described had to make them acknowledge him as the Son of God.

Of these objections, the most weighty arose from the lofty descriptions given in the scriptures of the nature and dignity of the Son of God. For besides the Hebrews were led to conclude, that the Son of God could not possibly be a man; far less could he be born of a woman, or die. This, with other conclusions of a like nature, being extremely repugnant to the doctors, and strongly urged by the apostles, the apostle rightly judged, that he would more effectually convince the unbelieving Hebrews, by confuting these arguments and objections, than by repeating the direct proofs above mentioned, with which they were perfectly well acquainted already. Accordingly, this is what he does in the second chapter. Only, as these objections were all founded on the accounts given in the Jewish scriptures of the nature and dignity of the Son, the apostle, with admirable address, before he attempted to confute them, introduced in this first chap. ver. 5-14, the principal passages of the Jewish scriptures which the doctors and people applied to the Son of God. For, by thus displaying his transcendent greatness, he gave the objections of the Jews their full effect: At the same time, by applying these passages to Jesus of Nazareth, the author of the gospel, he not only affirmed him to be the Son of God, but raised his dignity and authority to the highest pitch. See chap. ii. 1-3.

His account of the dignity of the Son the apostle begins with telling us, that he is superior to the highest angels, because nowhere is it recorded in scripture, that God said to any of the angels, as he said to his Son, 'My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee,' ver. 5.

—Instead of speaking to them in that manner, when he brought his Son a second time into our world in the human nature, by raising him from the dead, he ordered all the angels to worship him, ver. 6. So that although he became man, and continues to be so, he is still superior in nature to the highest angels.—Further, the apostle observes, that in the greatest things of all, of angels in the scriptures, is, that they are spirits, and God's ministers, ver. 7.—Whereas, by saying to the Son, 'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever,' he hath declared him the Governor of the world, ver. 8, by saying, 'Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated wickedness, therefore God hath anointed thee,' he hath declared the Son worthy of that dominion, ver. 9.—And by saying to him, 'Thou, Lord, in the beginning didst found the earth, and the works of thy hands are the heavens,' the Psalmist hath taught us, that the dominion of the Son is originally founded in his having created the material fabric of the world, ver. 10.—And by adding in the same passage, 'They shall perish, but thou dost remain, and they all as a garment shall grow old,' he hath described the Son's eternal existence, ver. 11, 12—Moreover, God having never said to any of the angels, 'Sitt thou at my right hand,' &c. it is evident, that none of the angels ever received from God any proper dominion over the world, ver. 13.—What interferences any of them have in human affairs, is merely that of servants, who, under the government of the Son, minister for the 'benefit of them who shall be heirs of salvation,' ver. 14.

As the conclusion of this illustration it may be proper to remark, that some of the most peregrine errors that ever disturbed the Christian Church, took their rise from the sublime display of the greatness of the Son of God which is made in the Jewish scriptures. For certain false teachers in the Christian church, probably converts from Judaism, holding the doctrine of their unbelieving brethren, fancied that the great things of the scriptures is, that they are spirits, and God's ministers, &c. Whereas, by saying to the Son, 'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever,' &c. he hath declared him the Governor of the world; and that he was crucified once for the appearance of God was inconsistent with the nature of man. They therefore affirmed, that Jesus Christ had not come in the flesh; that his body was nothing but the appearance of a body; and that he was crucified only for the appearance of God. Of these pernicious tenets we have clear traces in the epistles of John, where they are expressly condemned; and the teachers who maintained them are called antichrists, or opposers of Christ. See Preface to 1 John, sect. 3.

CHAP. I.—1 God, who in sundry parts, and in divers manners, ancientsly spake to the fathers by the prophets,

2 Hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son, whom (as also) he hath constituted heir of all things; through whom also he made the worlds.

3 Who, being an effulgence of his glory, and an exact image of his substance and

Ver. 1.—In sundry parts—Δια ποιημάτων. Pierce add, this word, according to his etymology signifies, 'that God discovered his will in a number of separate communications.' In the manner of pronouncing various communications, or that one part was to be learned from one prophet, and another from another. The apostle observes, that the scripture communicated to us the gospel, and that scripture was spoken all at once by Christ and his apostles, no addition is ever to be made to it in after-times.

2. And in divers manners—This clause doth not refer to the different manners in which God revealed himself to the prophets, such as visions, &c. but to the different ways in which the prophets communicated the different revelations which they received to the fathers. They did it in types and figures, significant actions and symbols, as well as in plain language: whereas the gospel revelation was spoken by Christ and his apostles in one manner only, in plain language.

Ver. 2.—In these last days—Δι᾽ αυτῶν τῶν τελευταίων ἡμέρων. The Greek text here is different from the English version, and reads, 'In the last days of the Mosaic dispensation he spake to the fathers.' The word 'Mosaic' is added by some, to the English version: The expression is by way of contrast, for which reason I have not in the translation ventured to add it; but I have added, as our translators have done, the word his, from the subsequent clause, because, according to the use of the Greek language, such belongs to both clauses. In scripture, the 'glory of God' signifies the perfection of God, for the reason mentioned Rom. i. 23, note 3. Wherefore, when the Son is called 'an effulgence of the glory of his power,' the meaning is, that the divine perfections shine brightly in the Son, even as on one side of the face, the whole face makes on wax by impression. Pierce observes, that the author's design being to distinguish the Son from all other beings, he represents him as immediately derived from God, that is, the Father. Thus, in the first expression, he is ray or splendour from the Father's glory immediately, no one intervening as the minister of this derivation; which is not to be understood as meaning that he was being whatever, they being all derived from him by the Son. The glory of the divine perfections shines forth in other beings, and particularly in the nobility of the angels: but not as it does in the Son; since they are not immediately created by the Father, but mediately, the Son being the agent employed by, and ministering to the Father in making them. Now, this must of necessity make a vast difference between him and the angels being superior to them. Concerning the word ἐμφάνισθη, rendered by our Bibles person, it hath been observed above that it did not obtain that signification till after the Council of Nice. Our translators have rendered it ἐμφάνισθη (as ver. 1), by the substance. If there be any difference between 'an effulgence of the Father's glory,' and 'an exact image of his substance,' the former... upholding all things by the word of his power; and after that he had by himself purged our sins, sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high; unto whom through the Spirit ye are called, who verily did declare the Gospel of God unto you.

For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life.

And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation.

In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;

Forasmuch as through him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father.

For who makest thine angels to sigh, and stablished thine angels?

Who maketh His angels to sigh? Or who considereth how they do stubble?

But now in Christ Jesus ye who once were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

For he is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation; for by him all things were created, both in the heavens and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers, all things were created through him and for him.

And he is the mediator of a better covenant, appointed for a better place.
HEBREWS 10:21-31

21 But when he had come into the world, he said, "Sacrifice and offering you have not desired, but a body you have prepared for me.

22 In the days of old he said: 'I have found a true sacrifice and offering.'

23 The law requires that every high priest be granted the offering for sins, but this one needed no such offering for himself.

24 For if he were not sinless, he could not help others in the matter of sin. Therefore he is the mediator of a new covenant, through which a better offering is brought to God.

25 And in speaking of the old covenant, he says, 'A sacrifice for sin was never offered (HEBREW 9:4, 41, 20), 26 nor had those who were to offer them understand that by means of the sacrifices they were making they were annointing the inward parts of the person who entered into the holy place by sacrificing blood.

27 Therefore, when these priests become uncleann, they have to go outside the camp to make their own offerings.

28 But Christ entered the holy place once for all, not to make offering for sins, but to make himself holy and to purify those who come to God through his blood.

29 For there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, 30 who gave himself as a sacrifice to bring God's people near to God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and be made holy.

31 Since God's love has been revealed in him, we should also love one another.

6 But, instead of calling any of the angels his begotten Son, when God foretells his bringing a second time the first-born into our world, by raising him from the dead, to show that he hath subjected the angels to his will, he saith, Paul. xvii. 7. Yea, worship him, all ye angels of God.

7 Beside, of the angels indeed David saith, Psal. cix. 2. "Who makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire;" that is, the greatest that said of angels is, that they are not bodies, being not clogged with flesh, who serve God with the utmost activity;

8 But to show that the Son is Governor of the world, he saith to him, Psal. xlv. 6. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.

9 By coming to destroy the devil and his host, he shewed the greatest love of righteousness and hatred of wickedness; therefore, O God, thy God (John xx. 17.) hath bestowed on thee as a king, and a priest, and a prophet, endowments whereby thou excellest all thy associates in these offices.

10 And, still farther to display the greatness of the Son above

11 last clause of the verse, naturally leads to apprehend them as compared to winds in the first. I have adopted the common translation, in which the order of the original words is followed, because it shews that the apostle is speaking, not of winds, but of angels.

12 Ver. 8. — To the throne, O God, is for ever and ever, is in the ninetieth Psalm, and is placed at the foot of the table of the LXX. in other places, and in the thirtieth Psalm, and in the twenty-first of the LXX. in the thirty-first Psalm, and in the five hundred and twenty-first of the LXX. It is the twelfth Psalm in the Hebrew, and the second in the LXX.

13 In the song concerning the beloved, Vulgate, pro diem, a title usually given to the Psalm, is, as is usual, placed in the title, and no mention is made in the Psalm of Solomon, from an account of whose history, an expression of which is used for the first time. But this cannot be true; for, besides that we read not of any children Solomon had by Pharaoh's daughter, it is certain that Solomon, who succeeded him, was the Son of Naamah an Ammonitess, 2 Chron. xll. 13; and so far was he from being able to set up his nome to rule over other countries, that it was with great difficulty that his successors kept two tribes of the twelve subject to them, "&c. From all which Pierce concludes, "Certainly a greater than Solomon is here."

14 The Song of Songs is a song of a recitative, relating the story of the love, which is heretofore, that was to be the peculiar and especial property of the Messiah and his Church. It is said to have been written by King Solomon, and as it is the work of a king, it is as if he had written it himself.

15 But it is more likely that the Song of Songs was written by the Hebrews, who were the authors of it, and that it was composed for the use of the people of God, and that the following verse is a declaration, that he should receive the universal kingdom as a reward of that love of righteousness which he shewed in his incarnation and death. See Philippians ii. 8, 9.

16 Ver. 9. Hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness; — Anciently kings, priests, and prophets, were consecrated to their several offices by the ceremony of solemn unguent. The ceremony of the anointing is called in the Psalm "the oil of gladness," because it occasioned great joy, both to the person anointed, and to those who were present at the ceremony. Wherefore, the Son being anointed with the oil of gladness, is to be regarded as the object of a consecration, or of an anointing, or of an anointing of God; to the high offices of universal King, Priest, and Prophet, among whom he is called by way of distinction, that he is consecrated. But the oil with which God anointed or consecrated him to these offices, was not any incorporeal or immediate function external; but internal, with the Holy Ghost...

work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God.' See also John v. 18. and 1 John v. 5. note. In this prejudice the people were confirmed by the sentence of the chief priests, elders, and scribes, who, after a solemn trial, pronounced Jesus guilty of blasphemy, and condemned him to death, because he called himself ' the Christ, the Son of the blessed' God; Mark xiv. 61. A sentence for which there was no foundation, since in their own scriptures it was expressly and repeatedly declared, that the Christ was to be the Son both of Abraham and of David. But the doctors, it seems, understood this in a metaphorical sense. For, when Jesus asked the scribes, how the Christ could be both David's Son and David's Lord, they were not able to answer him a word; being ignorant that the Christ was really to become man, by descending from Abraham and David according to the flesh.

A second objection raised against our Lord's being the Son of God and King of Israel, was taken from his mean condition; from his never having possessed any temporal dominion; and from his having been put to death. These things they thought incompatible with the greatness of the Son of God; and with his glory as the Christ, or king universal, described in their sacred writings. And therefore, when Jesus mentioned his being 'lifted up,' the people objected, John xii. 34. 'We have heard out of the law, that the Christ abideth for ever; how sayest thou, the Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man?' Their notions concerning the temporal dominion of the Christ, and his abiding on earth for ever, the doctors founded on Dan. ii. 44., where the empire of the Christ was foretold under the idea of ' a kingdom which the God of heaven was to set up, and which was never to be destroyed;' but 'which should break in pieces and consume all kingdoms.' Also on Dan. vii. 13, 14. Where 'one like the Son of man' is represented as 'coming in the clouds of heaven,' and receiving 'dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him.' Likewise in other passages, the kingdom and victories of the Christ are described by ideas and expressions taken from the kings and kingdoms of this world: And the Christ himself is called God's king, whom he would 'set on his holy hill of Zion;' and Messiah, or Christ, the Prince. These things led the Jews to fancy, that the Christ was to be a great temporal prince, who would set the Jews free from foreign tyranny, and subject all nations to their dominion; that Jerusalem was to be the seat of this universal empire; and that every individual Jew would have some share in the administration of it. Wherefore, when Jesus of Nazareth refused to be made a king, and disclaimed all temporal dominion, and lived in the greatest poverty, subject to poverty, persecution, and death, they decided his pretensions to be the Christ, Mark xx. 31. 'The chief priests, mocking, said among themselves, with the scribes, He saved others, himself he cannot save. 29. Let Christ, the king of Israel, descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe.' These learned men were ignorant that the kingdom of the Christ is not of this world; that it is established, not by force, but by the power of persuasion, Psalm cx. 5.; that it has for its object the destruction of sin, and of all its abettors, and the establishment of righteousness in the earth; that the victories by which these grand events are brought to pass are all of a spiritual kind; and that the greatness of the Christ consists in ruling, not the bodies, but the spirits of men, by drawing their affections, and influencing their wills. And as the Jews had no conception of these things, so neither did they know that the futility which the subjects of the Christ are to enjoy is not of this world, but of the heavenly country which was promised to Abraham and to his seed by faith.
death he might, according to God's promise concerning the seed of the woman recorded by Moses, destroy the devil who had the power of death, ver. 14—and deliver mankind from the fear of death, by giving them the assurance of pardon and resurrection from the dead, ver. 15. So that our Lord's claim to be the Christ, instead of being overthrown, was strongly established by his birth of a virgin.

A fourth objection was taken from our Lord's being subject to all the miseries and calamities incident to men. This the Jews thought inconsistent with the divine nature of the Christ. But, in answer, the apostle told the Hebrews, that Jesus did not lay hold on angels to save them, but on the seed of Abraham, ver. 16. For which reason it was necessary that in all things he should be made like his brethren whom he was to save; that being their brother, and having the affliction of a brother for the whole human race, he might exercise the office of an high-priest mercifully towards men, as well as faithfully towards God, by making propitiation for their sins after his death, ver. 17. This, however, is not all. He was subjected to affliction and temptation like his brethren, that he might have such a fellow-feeling of their infirmity, and of the difficulty of their trial, as would dispose him in the exercise of his kingly power, not only to succor them when tempted, but, in judging them at last, to make them such gracious allowances as the weakness of their nature, and the strength of the temptations to which they were exposed, may require, ver. 18. These being considerations of great importance, they are suggested a second time, chap. iv. 15.

Such are the answers made by the writer of this epistle to the objections whereby the scribes endeavored to confute the claim of Jesus of Nazareth to be the Christ the Son of God, taken. 1. From his being a man; 2. From his never having possessed any kingdom, and from his having suffered death; 3. From his having become man by being born in the helpless state of an infant; 4. From his having been liable to all the miseries and calamities incident to men. Wherefore, after hearing these answers, the offense of the cross ought, with the Jews, to have ceased for ever. And if any others reject the gospel, on account of the high titles given therein to Jesus, fancying his greatness as the Son of God to be incompatible with his manifestation and sufferings in the flesh, the reasonings in this chapter are highly worthy of their consideration, as they afford a satisfactory solution of their doubts.

17 Hence it was necessary he should be made like his brethren in all things, that he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest in matters pertaining to God, (ver. 14;) in order to expiate the sins of the people.4

of the seed of Abraham, that is, of believers of the human species. The first parents of mankind sinned through weakness of nature and experience; and by their lapses brought death on themselves and on their posterity, notwithstanding their posterity were not necessary to their offence: Whereas the angels, through disobedience to their own condition, and envy of their superiors, perhaps also animated by pride, rebelled presumptuously against God. Wherefore, since they could not plead weakness of nature and innocence in excuse of their sin, nor complain that the sin to which they were doomed to punishment was the act of another, they were justly left by the Son of God to perish in their sin.

Ver. 17.—A merciful and faithful high-priest.1 The Son of God, who made men, no doubt had such a knowledge of their infirmity as might have rendered him a merciful intercessor, though he had not been made flesh. Yet, considering the greatness of his nature, it might have been difficult for men to have understood this. And therefore, to impress us the more strongly with the belief that he is more effectually disposed, from sympathy, to succour us when tempted; and, in judging us at the last day, to make every reasonable allowance for the infirmity of our nature, he was pleased to be made like us in all things, and even to suffer by temptation. 2. The sins of the people]; the people of the Jews, but the people of God of all nations, whether Jews or Gentiles, called in the foregoing verse the seed of Abraham.” Hence John tells us, “he is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world,” (1 John ii. 2. 2. See note 3 on ver. 9 of this chapter.

Ver. 18.—1. Being tempted.1 That the Lord’s life was a continuous scene of temptation, we learn from himself. Luke xxi. 38. “Ye are they who have contended with me in my temptations.”—Christ’s temptations, like those of his brethren, arose from the persecutions and sufferings to which he was exposed, as well as from direct attacks of the devil by evil suggestions such as those mentioned in the history of his temptation in the wilderness.

2. To succour them who are tempted.2 Virgin beth preserves the same sentiment in that passage of the Minde where he makes Dido say, “Non ignara malum succurrere discis.” Lib. i. lib. 69.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Reasonings in this Chapter.

The apostle, in the first chapter of this epistle, having affirmed that Jesus of Nazareth, the person by whom God spake the gospel revelation to mankind, is “God’s son.” Also, in the same chapter, having proved from the Jewish scriptures, that God constituted his Son “the Heir or Lord of all things,” because “by him he made the world.” Moreover, in the second chapter, having answered the objections urged by the Jewish doctors for invalidating the claim of Jesus to be God’s Son, and having thereby given full effect to the direct proofs which established his claim, and which were well known to the Hebrews living in Judea, where they were publicly exhibited—he in this third chapter proceeds to show what is implied in Christ being “the Heir or Lord of all things;” which is the third fact on which the authority of the gospel revelation depends.

A proper account of this matter was necessary. First, Because the title of Jesus to remove the Mosaic economy, and to substitute the gospel dispensation in its place, was founded on the power which he possessed as the Son of God and heir of all things. Secondly, Because many of the Jews, in the persuasion that the law of Moses was of perpetual obligation, and that its sacrifices were real atonements for sin, rejected Jesus as an impostor for pretending to abolish these institutions.—Wherefore, to show the unbelieving Jews their error, the apostle, who, in the first and second chapter had proved the Son of God to be the heir or lord of all things, exhorited the unbelieving Hebrews in this chapter, to consider as truly Christ, the apostle and high-priest of our religion; that is, to consider how great a person he is, that, knowing him to be the Son of God, and heir of all things, they might be sensible that it belonged to him to form and govern the house or church of God, ver. 1.—Next, to convince them that, in forming and governing God’s house, Jesus acted agreeably to the will of his Father, the apostle affirmed, that when he abolished the law of Moses and the Levitical priesthood from the new house or church of God which he built, he was as faithful to God, who appointed him his apostle or lawgiver in his church, as Moses was, when he established the law and the priesthood in God’s ancient house, the Jewish church.

The proof of this affirmation the apostle did not produce on the present occasion, because the Hebrews were well acquainted with it. By voices from heaven, uttered more than once in the hearing of many of them, God had declared Jesus “his beloved son, in whom he was well pleased,” and had commanded the Hebrews “to hear him.” This God would not have done, if Jesus had acted unfaithfully in excluding the law and the priesthood from the house of God which he built. But the apostle told the Hebrews, that although the faithfulness of Jesus was not greater than the faithfulness of Moses in building their respective churches, God counted him worthy of more glory than Moses; he bestowed on him more power in the Christian church than Moses possessed in the Jewish; insomuch as he who hath built the house or church of God, not for his own salvation, but for the salvation of others, hath more honour than the house; and so, being a member of his own church, he was obliged to have recourse to its services, especially its atonements, equally with the rest of the Israelites, wherefore he was shewed to be a sinner like them; consequently he had not, like Christ, more honour than the house, ver. 3.—This, however, is not all. To make the Hebrews sensible of the great power of Jesus, as “the heir or lord of all things;” the apostle observed, that although every society, civil and religious, is formed by the ministry of some person or other, the original of all just power, and the governor of all righteous societies, is God, who, by constituting his Son the heir or lord of all things, hath delegated his authority to him, and empowered him to model and govern these societies as he pleaseth, ver. 4. More particularly, to show that Jesus, as a lawgiver, is superior to Moses, the apostle observed, that the faithfulness of Moses in building the Jewish church, was not that of a legislator who himself framed the laws which he established, but it was the faithfulness of a servant who established the laws which were dictated to him by his Master, without adding to or diminishing aught from them; and who formed the tabernacles, and appointed their services, not according to any plan of his own, but according to a pattern which God shewed to him in the Mount, without presuming to deviate from it in the least, Heb. viii. 5. This faithfulness in building all the parts of the ancient house or church of God, was required of Moses, in order that the things afterwards to be spoken by Jesus and his apostles might be confirmed by the attestation given to them in the figures, and ceremonies, and services of the law, ver. 5. But the faithfulness of Jesus in building the new house of God, the Christian church, was that of a Son in his Father's house, who, being the heir or lord of all, was entitled to remove the Jewish church after it had answered the end for which it was established, and to erect the Christian church on a more enlarged plan, so as to comprehend believers of all nations. Wherefore Jesus, in the exercise of that authority which belonged to him as the lord or governor of all things, having actually abolished the Mosaic economy, and established the gospel dispensation, the apostle, to confirm the Hebrews in the profession of the gospel, assured them, that all who believe in Jesus are as really members of the house or church of God, and as fully entitled to the privileges of the house of God, as the Israelites were who believed in Moses during the subsistence of the Jewish church; provided they firmly hold, and boldly profess to the end of their lives, that hope of pardon and resurrection to eternal life through Christ which they professed at their baptism, ver. 6.

Thus it appears, that the authority of Jesus as a lawgiver is greater than the authority of Moses. He was a lawgiver in his own right; whereas, in establishing the law, Moses acted only ministerially. His institutions therefore might be abolished by God's Son, who, being the heir of all things, hath all power in heaven and earth committed to him, Matt. xxviii. 18. If so, the Jewish doctors fell into a grievous error, when, from some ambiguous expressions in the law, they inferred that it was never to be abolished, and rejected Jesus as a false Christ, because his disciples affirmed that he had put an end to the law and to the priesthood.

The writer of this epistle having thus displayed the greatness of Jesus as the heir or ruler of all things, addressed the unbelieving Hebrews, as an apostle of Jesus, in the words which the Holy Ghost spake to their fathers by David: 'Wherefore, as saith the Holy Ghost, To-day, when ye shall hear his voice, 'tis the voice of God by his Son Jesus commanding you to believe on his Son, and to enter into his church;' &c. ver. 7-11. This exhortation of the Holy Ghost to the Israelites in David's days, the apostle with great propriety applied to the Hebrews of his own time; because if, rejecting Jesus, they refused to enter into the Christian church, God would as certainly exclude them from the rest of heaven, as he excluded their fathers from the rest of Canaan for their unbelief and disobedience. He therefore requested them to take heed that none of them shewed an evil unbelieving heart, either by refusing to obey Jesus, or by apostatizing from him after having believed on him. This, he assured them, would be a real departing from the living God, ver. 12. Then ordered them to exhort one another daily to believe and obey Christ, ver. 13. Assuring them, that they should be partakers of his rest in heaven only if they held fast their begun confidence in him to the end, ver. 14. And told them, that they might know this by its being said to the Israelites in David's time, 'To-day, when ye shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts!' For such an exhortation evidently shews, that faith and obedience are necessary at all times to secure the favour of God, ver. 15. Withal, to make the Hebrews sensible that unbelief and rejection of God are extremely offensive to God, he put them in mind, that by these sins their fathers provoked God, ver. 16. To such a degree, that he destroyed the whole congregation of the disobedient in the wilderness, ver. 17. After swearing that they should not enter into his rest, ver. 18. Thus, says the apostle, we see that they could not enter in, because of unbelief, ver. 19. And by making the observation he hath shewed, in the clearest light, the contagious fatal nature of unbelief; that it is the cause of the disobedience and punishment of sinners in all ages; and so he hath put us on our guard against such an evil disposition.

I have only to add, that the apostle, by exhorting the Hebrews to obey Christ, after describing his supreme authority in the church as its lawgiver, and by setting before them the punishment of the Israelites in the wilderness, hath insinuated, that Christ is judge as well as lawgiver, consequently he hath both authority and power to render all men according to their works; as will appear likewise from the things set forth chap. iv. 1-18.

CHAP. III.

1 Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider attentively the Apostle and High-priest of our confession, Christ Jesus;

2 Who was faithful to him who appointed him, even as Moses also was (w) in all his house.

Ver. 1. 1. Holy brethren.—That the apostle addressed the unbelieving Hebrews more especially, in this and the following chapter, I think probable. 2. Because the idea of abolishing the law by Christ was peculiarly offensive to them: 3. Because, if the believing Hebrews had been addressed, the apostle would have said, 'Consider the High-priest of your confession.'—The unbelieving Jews, in the same sense that the whole nation anciently were called saints, 3. Heavenly calling.—This may signify, as in the commentary, also it may signify, a call given from heaven. See chap. iii. 22.

5. The apostle.—Jesus, as a prophet like to Moses, that is, as a lawgiver; and as an apostle of our confession, agreeably to the meaning of the word apostle, which denotes one sent forth to establish and to preach the word of God. Perhaps also in this name there is an allusion to Christ's own saying, John xvii. 18. As thou (who in me) hast sent me out of heaven, I also (w) have sent them. Jesus, therefore, was his Father's apostle, in the same sense that the Father sent his apostle. He was sent forth by his Father to deliver to mankind the new law, and thereon to build the church of the first-born which is to continue through all eternity. Hence he often spake of himself as 'sent of his Father,' John vi. 34. vii. 39. viii. 42.

4. Of our confession.—As confession is sometimes put for the thing confessed, 'our confession' may mean our religion, of which Jesus is called the Apostle, because he was sent by God to reveal it; and the High-priest, because we receive its blessings through his mediation. See chap. xii. 19.

Ver. 2. 1. To him who appointed him.—To the highpriest. In other passages also, the word ἀρματος signifies to appoint: 1 Sam. xi. 6. 'The Lord that (Heb. made) appointed Moses and Aaron,' namely to be leaders.—Mark iii. 14. ἐπιτεθέντος Ἰησοῦ.—'He ordained (or appointed) twelve.' See also Acts ii. 36.

2. Even as Moses also was in all his house.—This is an exhortation to the testimony which God bore to Moses. However, this expression means, even as Moses was in all his house, that is, even as he was the chief of the people of Israel, when he spake the words of God. Moses was not so, who is faithful in all mine house.' The Jewish church, which Moses was employed to form, being called by God himself his house, because he was present with it, and was with it. In the church, which Jesus was appointed to form, the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 15. See ver. 6 of this chap. note i. The faithfulness of

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III. 1. Since the author of the gospel is the Son of God, I exhort you, holy brethren, who by the preaching of the gospel (a) are partakers of the calling to enter into his holy country, ( Eph. i. 18.) to consider attentively the dignity and authority of the Lawgiver and High-priest of our religion, Christ Jesus;

2 Who, in forming the gospel church, was faithful to God who appointed him his apostle or lawgiver, even as Moses also was faithful in forming all the parts of the Jewish church, God's house at that time.
3 (Acts 9:9.) But he was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he that had formed the house, hath more honour than the house. 4 (Acts 9:1.) Besides, every house is formed by some one; but he who had formed all is God.

5 (Kai, 204.) Now Moses (who) was faithful in all his house as a servant, for a testimony of the things which were to be spoken; 6 But Christ as a son (over) his house, whose house we are, if indeed we hold fast the boldness and the glorying of the hope, firm to the end.

7 Wherefore, as saith the Holy Ghost, To-day (202.) when ye shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, but as they were disciplined of God.

Moses in forming the Jewish church consisted in that, that he did not conceal any of the divine laws on account of their disagreeableness to the Jews; nor did he alter them in the least, but dealt with the whole law as it was spoken to him, and formed the tabernacles and the ritual of the worship, exactly according to the plan showed him. In like manner, Christ’s faithfulness consisted in his teaching the doctrine, appointing the laws, and establishing the worship, which his Father had ordained for the church.

Ver. 2.—1. But he, which hath formed the house, that is, the house of God, as is sometimes used for κατασκευάζω, and is rendered in our Bible Acts xx. 28, 36. He is Lord of all. If it were necessary in this passage to supply any substantive agreeing with ἵππος, ἀποστέλλω, and not ἱππότης, should be the noun supplied; this apostle or lawyer was counted, &c.

3. He that hath formed the house, εἰκόνισε Ἰσραήλ, he that formed Israel, the Hebrew nation, who is, in his house, the head of the house of God, and the church. 0 Where your fathers tempted me, and they proved me, (215.) notwithstanding they saw my works forty years.

10 Wherefore I was displeased (see ver. 17. note 1.) with that generation, and said, They are a very obstinate people; and they have not known my ways.

11 So I swore in my wrath, they shall not enter into my rest.

12 But exhort another (2) to enter, (2) by departing from the living God.

13 But exhort another (2) to enter, (2) by departing from the living God.

2. As in the bitter provocation.—So a more (2) should be translated, on account of the proposition, which increases the sense of the word with which it is compound.—The Israelites provoked God, first in the wilderness of Sin (Pentahostium), when they murmured for want of bread, and had the manna given them, Exod. xvi. 4.—From the wilderness of Sinai they journeyed to Rephidim, where they provoked God a second time, by murmuring for want of water, and insensibly saying, (1) but the Lord among us, not (1) Exod. xvi. 25—, on which account the place was called Massah and Merah, see Gen. xiv. 4, note 1.—From Rephidim they went into the wilderness of Sinai, where they received the law, in the beginning of the third year from their coming out of Egypt. Here Israel provoked God again, by making the golden calf, see Exod. xxiii. 10.—After the law was given, they were commanded to go directly to Canaan and take possession of the promisèd land, Deut. i. 7. 'God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mountain. Turn ye back unto the Lord, and he will take you into the land of the Amorites, and to all the places that the Lord hath promised, and to your inheritance.' (6) This Israelites having received this order, departed from Horeb, and went forward three days' journey, Numb. x. 20. till they came to Taberah, Numb. xii. 5, where they provoked God the fourth time, by murmuring for want of flesh to eat; and for that sin were smitten with a very great plague, ver. 29. This place was called Ethroth-beshanah, because there they buried the people who hastened.—From Ethroth-beshanah they went to Hazereth, Numb. xii. 28, thence into the wilderness of Paran, Numb. xiii. 18. to a place called Kadesh, chap. xiii. 29. Their journey from Horeb to Kadesh is thus described by Moses: Deut. i. 19. 'And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, which we saw by the way of the mountains of the Amorites, as the Lord our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea.' (3) And I said to you, Ye are come unto the mountains of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give unto us; (3) Be still, and know that the Lord is God; and that there is no other beside him. (4) Therefore, having this testimony, that no other god is able to do the like works which the Lord did in behalf of them, and of his inheritance, ver. 39. These, after forty days, returned to Kadesh; and, except Caleb and Joshua, they all died in the wilderness, Numb. xiv. 32, 33. whereby the people were so discouraged, that they refused to go up, and proposed to make a captain and return into Egypt, Exod. xiv. 4. Wherefore, having this testimony, that no other god was able to do the like works, no other god being able to do the like works which the Lord did in behalf of them, and of his inheritance, and of his people, they were out of heart, and ceased from the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea.' In that wilderness the Israelites were more than thirty-eight years; Deut. ii. 14. 'And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years: until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the Lordware unto them. Wherefore, although the Israelites provoked God to wrath in the wilderness, 3, from the day they came out of the land of Egypt until their arrival at Canaan, as Moses tells them, Deut. ii. 7. Their greatest provocation, the provocation in which they showed the greatest degree of unbelief, was in objecting to their trusting to go into Canaan from Kadesh. It was therefore very properly termed the bitter provocation, and justly brought on them the oath of God excluding them from his rest in Canaan. To distinguish this from the provocation at Rephidim, it is called the bitter provocation.' Ver. 9. Where your fathers tempted me.—This, which is the Syriac and Vulgate, is omitted in our English version. 'Where your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years,' says the Syriac and Vulgate, as being rather than our English version, 'When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years,' which is the sense of the text. Where your fathers tempted me, (2) by departing from the living God.

by natural descent, and the other by faith; and that the promise, to give to him and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, being made to both the kinds of his seed, it was to be fulfilled, not only to his natural progeny, by giving them the possession of the earthly Canaan, but also to his seed by faith, by giving them the possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the emblem and pledge.

Upon these principles the apostle affirms, that notwithstanding Abraham's natural seed have obtained the possession of Canaan, there is still left to his seed by faith, consisting of believers in all ages, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, a promise of entering into God's rest; for which reason he exhorted the Hebrews in his own time, to be afraid lest any of them should fall short of that rest, as their fathers in the wilderness fell short of the rest in Canaan, ver. 1.—His affirmation, that in the covenant there is still left to Abraham's seed by faith a promise of entering into God's rest, the apostle establishes by observing, that the promise of the everlasting possession of Canaan being made to Abraham's seed by faith, as well as to his natural seed, his seed by faith have received the good tides of a rest in the heavenly country, typified by Canaan, as really as his natural seed have received the good tides of a rest in Canaan. Only, these good tides did not profit the natural seed in the wilderness, because they did not believe them, ver. 2.—More particularly, to show that all Abraham's seed by faith shall enter into God's rest in the country typified by Canaan, the apostle appealed to the words of God's oath, by which he excluded the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness from his rest: 'So I swear in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest.' For, seeing this oath was sworn, notwithstanding the works of God were finished at the foundation of the world, and the seventh day rest was then instituted, ver. 3.—also seeing that rest was called God's rest, in the passage of scripture where Moses hath said concerning the seventh day, 'And God rested on the seventh day from all his works,' ver. 4.—it follows, that the rest into which God gave the Israelites in the wilderness should not enter, was not the seventh day rest, in regard they were in possession of that rest when the oath was sworn, Exod. xxi. 23. xx. 8.

Next, the apostle observes, that God's oath concerning the rebellious generation in the wilderness, was again mentioned by the Holy Ghost to the Israelites at the time they were in possession of Canaan, when he said to them by David, Psal. xcv. 11. 'They shall not enter into my rest.' ver. 5. Now though the apostle hath not declared the purpose for which he mentioned this repetition of the oath by the Holy Ghost, the strain of his reasoning showed that his design therein was to prove, that notwithstanding the people were then in possession of Canaan, they had not entered into God's rest, according to the full meaning of his promise to give to Abraham's seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; but that there still remained a rest of God to be entered into, of which Canaan was only the emblem and pledge.

This fact the apostle supposed he hath proved to the conviction of his readers; for in the next verse he says, Since, after the Israelites were in possession both of the seventh day rest and of the rest in Canaan, it still remained for some in David's days to enter into God's rest; also, since they who first received the good news of a rest in Canaan, namely, the Israelites in the wilderness, did not enter into that rest through unbelief, ver. 6.—it follows, That if the seed, who in the promise have received the good tides of a rest in the heavenly country, do not believe these tides, they are excluded from that rest by the oath which excluded the unbelieving generation in the wilderness from the rest in Canaan.

Next, the apostle observes, that in the xivth Psalm the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, mentioned a particular time, namely, the time then present, for the entering of the Israelites into God's rest, 'Saying, To-day,' so long a time after they were in possession of the rest in Canaan, 'when ye shall hear his voice' commanding you to enter into his rest, 'harden not your hearts,' ver. 7.—His design in mentioning the exhortation of the Holy Ghost to the Israelites, in David's days, not to harden their hearts when they should hear God's voice commanding them to enter into his rest, the apostle hath not declared. But the strain of his reasoning leads us to believe he mentioned that exhortation to teach us, 1. That the command to the Israelites in the wilderness to enter into God's rest, was not confined to them, but is a command to men in every age to enter into the rest which was typified by the rest in Canaan. 2. That neither the Israelites, nor any of mankind in this life, enter into that rest of God which is principally intended in the covenant.

—Wherefore, having only insinuated these things hitherto in his premises, he now expresses them more directly, by observing, that if Joshua, by introducing the Israelites into Canaan, 'had caused them to rest,' according to the full meaning of God's promise, the Holy Ghost would not after that have spoken of another day for their entering into God's rest, ver. 8.

The reader no doubt observed, that in the foregoing reasoning the apostle hath not drawn the conclusions which followed from his premises, but hath left them to be supplied by the reader, either because they were obvious, or, because the general conclusion which he was about to draw from the whole of his reasoning, comprehended them all; namely, 'Therefore there remaineth a sabbatism to the people of God; in other words—Seeing it appears from the oath, that the rest promised to Abraham and to his seed, according to its principal meaning, was neither the seventh day rest, nor the rest in Canaan, there certainly remains to believers of all nations, the true seed of Abraham and people of God, a better rest, of which the seventh day rest and the rest in Canaan were only the emblems, ver. 9.—Withal, to show that the remaining rest is not to be enjoyed by the people of God in this life, but in the life to come, and to give us some idea of its nature, the apostle adds, 'He who hath entered into God's rest, hath himself also rested from his own works of trital, even as God rested from his works of creation; consequently, he enjoys a happiness like to God's in the contemplation of his past works, ver. 10.—Then, as the improvement of his discourse concerning the rest of God, he took occasion, from the words and meaning of the Israelites in the wilderness, to exhort all who read this epistle to strive to enter into the rest which remaineth to the people of God, lest they fall or die eternally through unbelief, as the unbelieving Israelites died in the wilderness, ver. 11.—Withal, to enforce his exhortation, he described first the perfection of the gospel, by which men are to be judged before they enter into God's rest, ver. 12.—and next, the omniscience of Christ the Judge, who will render to all men according to their deeds, ver. 13.

Such is the account which the writer of this epistle hath given of the Author of the gospel, as the Creator of the world, as the Lawgiver in God's church, as the Conductor of the spiritual seed of Abraham into the heavenly country, the rest of God, and as the Judge of the whole human race.—He next proceeds to speak of him as the High-priest of our religion, and to shew, that as an High-priest he hath cleansed us from our sins by the sacrifice of himself. This, as was formerly observed, is the fourth fact whereby the authority of the gospel, as a revelation from God, is supported.

They who are acquainted with the history of mankind know, that from the earliest times propitiatory were offered by almost all nations, in the belief that they were the only effectual means of procuring the pardon of sin, and the favour of the Deity. In this persuasion, the Jews more especially were confirmed by the law of Moses, in which a variety of sacrifices of that sort, as well as free-will offerings, were appointed by God himself. And as the heathens offered these sacrifices with many pompous rites, and feasted on them in the temples of their gods, they became extremely attached to a form of worship, which so once eased their consciences and pleased their senses. Wherefore, when it was observed that no purgatorial sacrifices were enjoined in the gospel, and that nothing of the kind was offered in the Christian temples, Jews and Gentiles equally were very naturally persuaded to renounce their ancient worship for the gospel form, in which no stenoments appeared, and which, employing men’s reason alone for exciting their affections, was too naked to be, to such persons, in any degree interesting.

It is true, this supposed defect in the gospel worship was concealed for a while by the doctrine of the Judaisers, who affirmed, that the law of Moses being of perpetual obligation, its sacrifices and purifications were still to be performed, even under the gospel. To this doctrine many of the Gentile converts had no objection; for, as they had always expected the pardon of their sins through the offering of sacrifices, it must have appeared to them a matter of indifference, whether these sacrifices were offered according to the heathen or according to the Jewish ritual. But the doctrine of the Judaisers being utterly subversive of the gospel, all the apostles strenuously opposed it, by declaring to the Jews as well as to the Gentiles, that if they sought the pardon of their sins through the sacrifices of the law of Moses, Christ would profit them nothing in his gospel. (Gal. v. 2.)

The zeal with which St. Paul in particular inculcated this doctrine, and the strong arguments by which he supported it, opening the eyes of many, became at length sensible, the testimonies of Judaism, and the prevarications of the Judaisers, had no real efficacy in procuring the pardon of sins. Nevertheless, in proportion to their knowledge of the inefficacy of these sacrifices, their prejudices against the gospel must have become more violent, because its supposed effect more clearly appeared. And it must be acknowledged, that if in the new dispensation there were neither a priest nor a sacrifice, the prejudices both of the Jews and Gentiles would have been well founded: For mankind, constituted of guilty, can hardly be brought to trust in repentance alone for procuring their pardon, but naturally fly to propitiatory sacrifices, as the only compensation in their power to make the offended Deity.

Wherefore, to give both Jews and Gentiles just views of the gospel, the apostle, in this passage of his epistle, affirmed, that although no sacrifices are offered in the Christian temples, we have a great High-priest, having undertaken for our sins, and arisen from the dead; Jesus the Son of God, who at his ascension passed through the visible heavens into the true habitation of God, with the sacrifice of himself; and from these considerations he exhorted the believing Hebrews in particular, to hold fast their profession, ver. 14. —Then, to shew that Jesus is well qualified to be an High-priest, he observes, that though he be the Son of God, he is likewise a man, so that he may be touched with a feeling of our infirmity, since he was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin, ver. 15. —On which account we may come boldly to the throne of grace, well assured that, through the intervention of our great High-priest, we obtain the pardon of our sins, and grace to help us in time of need, ver. 16. —These being the doctrines which the apostle is to prove in the remaining part of his epistle, the 14th, 15th, and 16th verses of this chapter may be considered as the proposition of the subject he is going to handle in chapters v., vi., viii., viii. ix., and x. And as his reasonings are on these, as well as on the subjects discussed in the foregoing part of the epistle, are all founded on the writings of Moses and the prophets, it is reasonable to suppose, as was formerly remarked, that his interpretations of the passages which he hath quoted from these writings, are no other than the interpretations which were given of them by the Jewish doctors and scribes, and which were received by the people, at the time he wrote. See Pref. sect. 2. paragr. 3.

CHAP. IV.—1 Wherefore, let us be afraid, lest a promise of entrance into his rest be left unfulfilled among us, 2 for he that entered into rest, rested his rest, having made the world (as also He which entered in before him) rested his rest: 3 therefore, let us observe in fear to enter into this rest, lest anyone should come short of it.

Ver. 1. Any of you.]—Some MSS., instead of anew, you, have here anew, to which agrees very well with the context. But the common reading is supported by the Syriac and Vulgate versions. —To understand the commentary on this and the following nine verses, the reader should examine the illustration of these verses given in the Verse. Ver. 2. —1. We also have received the good tidings.]—In the original it is, we have been divinized; which is a phrase used likewise Matt. ii. 11. Luke vii. 52. —The word ἐκαίνης in the present voice, signifies to receive any kind of a rest. But by long use it hath been appropriated to one’s receiving the good news of salvation given in the gospel. The persons who in this verse are said to have received the good news of a rest in the heavenly country, are called in the next verse we who believe. Wherefore the apostle is speaking of Abraham’s seed by faith, to whom the possession of the heavenly country was promised in the promise made to Abraham. See Rom. iv. 17. 2. COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 Wherefore, since the Israelites were excluded from Canaan for their unbelief and disobedience, let us be afraid, lest a promise of entrance into God’s rest be left unfulfilled among us. In the covenant, any of you should actually fall short of obtaining it. 2 For we also who believe, being Abraham’s seed, have entered in that promise received the good tidings of a rest in the heavenly country, even as the Israelites in the wilderness received the good tidings of a rest in Canaan. But the good tidings which they heard had no influence on their conduct, because they did not believe what they heard. 3 Wherefore, according to God’s promise, we, the seed of Abraham, shall enter into the rest of God. But it is a rest different from the seventh day rest, seeing he said, concerning the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, So I am in my wrath, they
The works were finished from the foundation of the world. And God completely rested on the seventh day from all his works.

Moreover, in this psalm again, they shall not enter into my rest. (See Hebrews iii. 11. note.)

Seeing then it remained for some one to enter into it, and seeing they who received the good tidings did not enter in (Heb. viii. 29) on account of unbelief:

Moreover, seeing he limited a certain day, saying (Acts 15, 165) by David, To-day, after so long a time; as it is said, To-day, when ye shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

For, if Joshua had caused them to rest, he would not, after that, have spoken of another day.

Therefore, a sabbath remaineth to the people of God.

For he who is entered into his rest hath himself also rested from his own works, (Heb. iv. 9) like as God RESTED from his.

Therefore, let us carefully strive to enter into that rest, lest any one should fall (Heb. iv. 11).

The apostle's argument is to this purpose,—Seeing men are by the oath of God excluded from God's rest on account of unbelief, this implies that all who believe shall enter into his rest.

Notwithstanding the works were finished from the foundation of the world,—God's saying that the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness should not enter into his rest, notwithstanding the works of creation were finished, and the seventh day was instituted from the beginning, is mentioned in this place, to show that the rest from which the Israelites were excluded was not the seventh day rest which they were to have one day in which they might have entered by believing and obeying God.

Ver. 4. God completely limited a certain day, and that day was the seventh. This Moses hath said, Gen. ii. 2. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his works which he had created and made. These words the apostle quotes, because he shows that the seventh day is fully called God's rest; and that the seventh day rest was observed from the creation of the world; God's resting on the seventh day Genesis 2:2-3 explains; The seventh day God rested for the Sabbath is a day of rest (Hebrews 4:9). God's resting from his works of creation, is called 'God's resting from all his works,' because, according to our way of conceiving things, and by reflecting on these things, and on the method of their salvation, they shall be unseasionaly happy. See chap. ii. 4. Note at the end. To this add, that being admitted into the immediate presence of God to worship, they shall, as Doddridge observes, 'pass a perpetual Sabbath, in those elevations of pure devotion which the sublime moments of our most sacred and happy days can never be imperfectly to conceive.'

Ver. 8. For, if Joshua, (Heb. iv. 9).—So terror in this place signifies, being the name given to Joshua in the LXX. translation of the Hebrew scriptures.

Ver. 9. Therefore a sabbath remaineth to the people of God.—The apostle having established this conclusion, by his reasoning on the sayings of the Holy Ghost uttered by the mouth of David, they misrepresent the state of the Israelites under the Mosaic dispensation who affirm, that the Jews had no knowledge of the immortality of the soul, nor of future retributions, given them in the writings of Moses: they had both been removed to them in the covenant with Abraham, as recorded by Moses and explained by the prophets. The apostle in his conclusion, quoted the word Sabbath, Sabbath, for the word sabbaths, rest, good in his premises: but both are proper, especially the word sabbathism in this place, because, by directing us to what is said verse 4. it sheweth the nature of that rest which remaineth to the people of God. It will resemble the rest of the Sabbath, both in its employment and enjoyment. For therein the main shall rest from their work of trial, and from all the evils they are subject to in the present life; and shall collect the labours they have undergone, the dangers they have escaped, and the temptation they have overcome: and by reflecting on these things, and on the method of their salvation, they shall be unseasionaly happy. See chap. ii. 4. Note at the end. To this add, that being admitted into the immediate presence of God to worship, they shall, as Doddridge observes, "pass a perpetual Sabbath, in those elevations of pure devotion which the sublime moments of our most sacred and happy days can never be imperfectly to conceive."—Here it is to be remarked, that the Hebrews themselves considered the Sabbath as an emblem of the heavenly rest; for St. Paul reckoneth Sabbaths among those Jewish institutions which were shadows of good things to come, Col. vii. 17.

Ver. 10. He who is entered into his rest hath himself also rested from his own works, like as God RESTED from his.

Sabbath, Sabbath, for the word sabbaths, rest, good in his premises: but both are proper, especially the word sabbathism in this place, because, by directing us to what is said verse 4. it sheweth the nature of that rest which remaineth to the people of God. It will resemble the rest of the Sabbath, both in its employment and enjoyment. For therein the main shall rest from their work of trial, and from all the evils they are subject to in the present life; and shall collect the labours they have undergone, the dangers they have escaped, and the temptation they have overcome: and by reflecting on these things, and on the method of their salvation, they shall be unseasionaly happy. See chap. ii. 4. Note at the end. To this add, that being admitted into the immediate presence of God to worship, they shall, as Doddridge observes, "pass a perpetual Sabbath, in those elevations of pure devotion which the sublime moments of our most sacred and happy days can never be imperfectly to conceive."—Here it is to be remarked, that the Hebrews themselves considered the Sabbath as an emblem of the heavenly rest; for St. Paul reckoneth Sabbaths among those Jewish institutions which were shadows of good things to come, Col. vii. 17.
For the same example of unbelief:

13. For (ἐν τῷ τεκ. Gk.) the word of God is living and effectual, and more cutting than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the parting of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and a discerner of the devices and purposes of the heart.

14. And there is no creature unapparent in his sight; for all things are naked and open to the eyes of him to whom we must give an account.

15. And we have not an high-priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses; but for such things as our Lord Jesus Christ was a forerunner, being tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin.

Ver. 11. Fall after the same example of unbelief. — The unbelief here said to be the cause of man’s falling under the wrath of God, is that kind of it which respects the immortality of the soul, the reality and greatness of the joys of heaven, the power of Christ to convey those joys, the certainty of death, and the certainty of future punishments, the authority of Christ to judge the world, and his power to dispense rewards to the righteous and punishments to the wicked, the reality and greatness of all these truths, revealed to us in the gospel, being the source of that wickedness which excited in the apostles of Jesus Christ, we ought carefully to cherish the faith of these things, lest, by the want of a firm conviction of them, we be led to live after the manner of the wicked, and God be provoked to destroy us by the severity of his judgments.

Ver. 12. For the word of God. — The apostle having said, ver. 2, ἀρχήν, τοῦ ἱεροῦ, the word which they heard not did not profit them, — the word of God, in this verse, I think signifies the preached gospel, understanding thereby its doctrines, precepts, promises, and threatenings, together with those examples of the divine judgments which are recorded in the scriptures, by which all the operations of the devices and purposes of the heart.

3. And effectual. — This efficacy is described by Paul, 2 Cor. x. 4. ‘The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty in God for destroying strongholds; ’&c. See also 1 Thess. ii. 13, where the word of God is said to ‘work effectually in them who believe.’

4. More cutting than any two-edged sword. — In illustration of this expression Peter hath cited the following verse of Phocylides, οἱ θραύσαντες κόλποι καὶ πόρια προδέους, λείβοντας τοὺς πεταλουθίων, ἐπιδίωτα τοῖς τάσσομεν, in his meaning that the weapons of the apostles are Divine power, given to destroy the enemies of God. As it were, a sword, because it is strong, to resist evil, and to cut asunder the chariots of iron, or the joints of iron, and is pointed with the teeth, or the facies of the teeth, and is not impotent, but has the force of the sharp sword, and is called, ‘a sword, because it is strong, to resist evil, and to cut asunder the chariots of iron, or the joints of iron, and is pointed with the teeth, or the facies of the teeth, and is not impotent, but has the force of the sharp sword.’ — Others translate the clause, ‘of whom we speak.’

5. Piercing even to the parting of soul and spirit. — Here the writer proceeds on the supposition that man consists of three parts, a body, a sensitive soul which he hath in common with the brute, and a rational spirit. The same doctrine is espoused by Paul, 1 Thess. v. 23. See note 2, on that verse. — The power of the word of God, ‘in piercing to the parting of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow,’ is understood by some of the efficacy of the judgments threatened in the gospel, utterly to destroy the whole man. But the case of a person who shall judge the world at the last day, the apostle hath followed; but the case of a person who shall judge the world at the last day, the apostle hath followed; but that he cannot, and receive not my (ἐντῷ τεκ. Gk.) commands, hath one that judgeth him. — I have spoken, and the same shall judge him in the last day. — But to raise the figure, the apostle seems to represent a word which is given by God, and strength, and discernment of the invisible actions, qualities highly necessary in a judge. Nor is this manner of speaking peculiar to Paul; Peter hath likewise represented the word of God as ‘breathing and moving every creature.’ — Ps. 33: 8; and Plato, by a like rhetorical figure, in his Crito, has represented the word of God as breathing and moving every creature; and so the apostle here, — 1 Thess. v. 23; where the word ἐντῷ τεκ. Gk. is used to denote the office of a judge, and so it is in this verse, understood as the word of God which is to be read, and must give an account; namely to Christ. — The apostle, in what any of us should fall, after the example of the Israelites, through unbelief.

14. For the word of God, the preached gospel whereby we are now called to enter into God’s rest, and are to be judged thereupon, is a living and powerful principle, and more cutting than any two-edged sword, piercing not into the body but into the mind, even to the parting of soul and spirit, showing what the passions are animal and which spiritual; and to the separating of the joints also and marrow, laying open the most concealed parts of the animal constitution; and discerning of the devices and purposes of the heart.

15. And we have not an high-priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses; but for such things as our Lord Jesus Christ was a forerunner, being tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin.
HEBREWS.

ONE who was tempted in all points according to the likeness of his nature to ours, without sin. (Heb. ii. 17, 18.)

16 Let us therefore approach with boldness to the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy, and obtain grace for the purpose of reasonable help.

being made flesh, experienced all the miseries and temptations incident to men: consequently he must always have a lively feeling of our infirmity. See Heb. ii. 17. note 1.

2. Tempted in all points according to the likeness...—Ex 33:23. The likeness of our Lord's nature to ours was not an exact likeness; for he was free from that corruption which, as the consequence of Adam's sin, has infected all mankind; as is intimated likewise in the expression, Rom. viii. 5. 'seducing his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh.' Ver. 16. Reasonable help.—Euc. εμπαιομεν σωθησιν. The word signifies help obtained in consequence of crying aloud, or strong crying for it.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines explained and proved in this Chapter.

The priesthood and sacrifice of the Son of God, and the pardon procured for sinners thereby, together with the many happy effects of the pardon thus procured, being matters of the utmost consequence to mankind, the apostle, in this chapter, and what follows to the nineteenth verse of the tenth chapter, hath proposed at great length the proofs by which they are established. And it was very proper that he should be copious, not only in his proofs of these important subjects, but also in his comparison of the priesthood of Christ with the Levitical priesthood, that while he established the merit of the sacrifice of Christ, he might shew the inefficacy of the Levitical atonements, and of all other sacrifices whatever. For as the unbelieving Jews did not acknowledge his apostleship, St. Paul knew that his affirmation of these matters would not be held by them as sufficient evidence. His proof of the priesthood of Christ, the apostle begins in this chapter with describing the office of an High-priest. He is one taken from among men, and is appointed to perform for men all the parts of the public worship of God; and, in particular, he is appointed to offer both gifts and sacrifices for sin, ver. 1. Next, he is a man clothed with infirmity, that from sympathy he may have a proper measure of compassion for the ignorant and erring, ver. 2. And, because he is clothed with infirmity, he must offer propitiatory sacrifices for himself, as well as for the people, ver. 3. This account of the description, character, and office of an High-priest, the apostle applies to Messiah, by observing, that as in the gospel church no man can take the dignity of an High-priest to himself, but only the person who is called to the office by God, like Aaron in the Jewish church, ver. 4.—so the Christ did not, by his own authority, assume the office of High-priest in the house of God; but He bestowed that dignity upon him, who declared him His Son by raising him from the dead, ver. 5.—and who, by so doing, confirmed all the doctrines which he taught, and particularly the doctrine of his shedding his blood for the remission of the sins of many. Further, that God bestowed on Messiah the office of an High-priest, is evident from his saying to him, after he invited him to sit at his right hand, Psal. cx. 4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec;' ver. 6. These clear testimonies from their own scriptures left the unbelieving Hebrews no room to doubt, that Jesus of Nazareth, who by his resurrection from the dead was declared to be 'the Christ the Son of God,' was by his Father's appointment a real Priest.

Having thus proved to the unbelieving Hebrews, that Jesus was made of God an High-priest, the apostle shewed in the next place, that notwithstanding he was the Son of God, he possessed the other qualification necessary to an High-priest mentioned ver. 2. namely, That he was 'able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, because he himself also,' by living in the flesh subject to the temptations and afflictions incident to men, 'was surrounded with infirmity.' In proof of this proposition, the apostle appealed to two facts well known. The first is, That while he lived on earth in the flesh he 'prayed, with strong crying and tears, to him who was able to save him from death.' The second is, That 'he was delivered from fear.' These facts the apostle mentioned, because the one was a proof that Jesus experienced the infirmity and temptations incident to men: the other, that he received help from God, ver. 7. Wherefore, although he was the Son of God, yet being also the Son of man, he learned how difficult obedience is to men, by the things which he himself suffered in the flesh while he obeyed God; consequently, he is well qualified, as an High-priest, to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, ver. 9. And being thus made a perfect High-priest, he became, by his dying as a sacrifice for sin, to all them who obey him, the author of eternal salvation, ver. 9.—as is plain from his being saluted by God 'an High-priest after the order of Melchisedec,' on his return from the earth to heaven, ver. 10.

By calling the speech of the Deity, recorded Psal. cx. 4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec,' a salutation of Messiah as an High-priest, the apostle hath discovered to us a variety of important matters implied in that salutation, of which he connected with, that memorable speech; such as—That being directed to Messiah, it was a declaration, on the part of God, that he had made Jesus an High-priest, not simply like Aaron, but with an oath; that is, in the most solemn manner, and irrevocably.—2. In as much as Messiah was thus saluted on his sitting down at the right hand of God, in consequence of his being invited to do so, Psal. cx. 1. the salutation was given after he had offered the sacrifice of himself, by presenting his crucified body before the presence of God in heaven. See Heb. vii. 3. note 2.—3. This salutation, on such an occasion, being given to Messiah in the hearing of the angelical hosts assembled around the throne of God, to do honour to him on his return from the earth after finishing his ministrations there as a Prophet, and to witness the offering of the sacrifice of himself, as an High-priest, for the sins of the world, it was a declaration from God, that he accepted that sacrifice as a sufficient atonement for the sins of the penitent; that his intercession for such, founded on the merit of that atonement, would be heard; and that God fully approved all his ministrtions on earth. — 4. Seeing, in the salutation, the Deity called Messiah 'a Priest after the order of Melchizedec,' who was a king as well as a priest, he, by that appellation, and by placing him at his right hand, declared him to be not only a High-priest, but the Governor and Judge of the world. — So that there can be no doubt of his procuring salvation for his obedient subjects, through the merit of his death as an atonement. Wherefore, those passages of scripture in which his death is spoken of as a sacrifice for sin, being all literally meant, should by no means be considered, either as figures of speech or as accommodations to the prejudices of mankind concerning the efficacy of propitiatory sacrifices. See chap. ix. 18. note, and Ex. xvii. sect. 2. — Such are the important meanings comprehended in the expression, 'saluted of God an High-priest, after the order of Melchizedec;' as we learn from the apostle's reasoning in the subsequent parts of this epistle.

Accordingly, that mankind may enjoy all the consolations which flow from the right apprehension and belief of the sacrifice and intercession of Christ, the apostle judiciously necessary to search into the deep meaning of the oath by which God constituted Messiah 'a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec.' And to excite the Hebrews to attend to what he was to write in chapter vii. 11-28, concerning the import of the oath, he told them he had many things to say concerning Melchizedec, after whose order Messiah was made a Priest, by which Messiah's priesthood would be illustrated and confirmed. But he found it difficult to make them understand these things, because they were of slow apprehension in spiritual matters, ver. 11. — Therefore, to make them more diligent than they had hitherto been in gaining religious knowledge, he told them plainly, their ignorance of their own scriptures was such, that notwithstanding they ought to have been teachers of others, considering the length of the time they had professed the gospel, they needed to be again taught some of the first principles of the ancient oracles of God; consequently they required to be fed with milk, and not with strong meat, ver. 12. — This, he told them, was a very imperfect state, because every one who uses milk, that is, who knows nothing but the obvious sense of the ancient revelations, and does not enter into their deep meaning, must be very unskilful in the doctrines of the gospel, and is a mere babe in Christianity, ver. 13. — Whereas, the doctrines concealed under the types and figures of the ancient revelations, being difficult to be understood, may be likened to strong meat, the food of grown men, because, when rightly apprehended, they greatly strengthen men's faith, by the light which they throw on the doctrines of the gospel, ver. 14.

New Translation.

chap. v. 1. (Ve) Now, every high-priest taken from among men is appointed to perform for men the things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins:

2 Being able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, because he himself also is surrounded with infirmity.

3 And for that reason he must, as for the people, so also for himself, offer sacrifices for sins.

4 (Kath., 204.) Now, as one taketh (προαίρομαι) this honour to himself but he who is (ἀπολύτης) called of God, as Aaron was,

5 So also the Christ did not glorify himself to be an high-priest, but he who said to him, My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee.

6 As also in another psalm he saith, Thou art a priest for ever, (Zeus) according to the order of Melchizedec.

7 (Or, 61.) He, in the days of his flesh, having offered up both deprecations and supplications, being able to have compassion on the ignorant and erring. For though he be the Son of God, he was subject to affirmed, that Christ was absolutely free from sin, Heb. iv. 15.

Commentary.

chap. v. 1. Now, to show that Christ is a real High-priest, I will describe the designation, the duties, and the qualifications of an high-priest. Every high-priest taken from among men is appointed, by persons having a right to confer the office, to perform for men the things pertaining to the public worship of God, and especially that he may offer both free-will offerings and sacrifices for sins.

2 He must be able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant, and those who err through ignorance, because he himself also is clothed with infirmity; so that he will officiate for them with the greater kindness and solidity.

3 And because he himself is a sinner, he must, as for the people, so also for himself, offer sacrifices for sins. (Lev. xvi. 6.)

4 Now, to apply these things to the Christ, I observe, first, that as in the gospel church no one can take this honourable office to himself but he who is thereto called of God, as Aaron was in the Jewish church:

5 So also the Christ did not glorify himself by making himself an High-priest, but He glorified him with that office, who, after his ascension into heaven, said to him, My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee, to be my Son by raising thee from the dead. (See this argument explained in the Illustration.)

6 As also He glorified the Christ to be an High-priest, who in another psalm saith to him, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec: thou art a human priest, not like Aaron, but Melchizedec.

7 Secondly, as an High-priest, he can compass the ignorant and erring. For though he be the Son of God, he was subject to affirmed, that Christ was absolutely free from sin, Heb. iv. 15.

Ver. 1. Offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins. — Gifts, or free-will offerings, as distinguished from sacrifices for sins, were expressions of gratitude to God for his goodness in the common dispensations of his providence. And because the priests offered both kinds, Paul speaks of himself as exercising the priesthood according to the gospel, by offering the Gentiles in an acceptable manner, through the sanctification of the Holy Ghost, Rom. xv. 16.

Ver. 2. Able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring. — Here, the word προαιρόμαι signifies to feel compassion in proportion to the misery of others; but, according to Eusebius, it signifies to be moderately affected: in which sense Aristotle uses the word, when he says, A wise man ought (προαιρόμαι εκείνου) to have moderate passions, but not to be without passions, as the stoics prescribed. The apostle's meaning is, that an high priest who is not touched with a feeling of the miseries and weaknesses of others, is unfit to officiate for them, because he will be apt to neglect them in his ministrations, or be thought by the people in danger of so doing.

Ver. 3. For himself offer sacrifices for sins. — From this Grotius infers, Christ not only for himself, but for the sake of his sacrifice for sin. But his notion is without foundation, as the apostle hath repeatedly explained when spoken, because ye are dull of hearing.¹

12 For though ye ought to have been teachers, on account of the time, ye have need of one to teach you again certain first principles of the oracles of God, and have become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat.

13 But every one who uses milk only, is unskillful in the word of righteousness;¹ for he is a babe.²

14 But strong meat belongeth to (τὰ κράτα, see chap. v. 9. note) them who are full grown, who by use have their senses exercised² to discern both good and evil. (Deut. i. 39. Isa. vii. 15, 16.)

15 For divers of them are become dull of hearing;—The word χαχαλάσθησθαι signifies persons who walk tardily. Applied to the mind, it signifies persons of slow understanding: also slow-fellows, laggards, idle persons. Heb. vi. 12.

16 Certain first principles of the oracles of God.¹—The word πρότερον signifies the primary, the principal. Thus it is used in Romans xvi. 22. Here it is not the nominative plural, as some translators supposed, but the accusative, govern- ed by προσδέχεσθαι. Wherever, therefore, the literal translation of the clause is, 'Teach you certain elements of the beginning of the oracles of God,'—for the meaning of πρότερον, see 2 Pet. iii. 10. note 2.—The oracles of God, the ancient revelations contained in the writings of Moses and the prophets. Rom. iii. 2. Some of the first principles of these oracles are the apostles had formerly explained to the Hebrews. But being hidden by the doctrine of the cross, they had not understood his explications, or they had forgotten them; and so needed to be taught these first principles a second time.

17 For which Reasons. The apostle calls the gospel 'the word of righteousness,' because therein is revealed 'the righteousness of God by faith.' But Paul, 'the word of righteousness,' understand those passages in the Old Testament which describe the righteousness of faith, or the way of the justified in sinners by faith, and which are quoted in the epistles to the Romans, chap. ii. 6, 7, 5, and to the Galatians, chap. iii. 26. For he is a baby. The apostle compared the Hebrews to babies, not on account of their innocence, simplicity, and teach- ability, qualities which Christ recommended to all his disci- ples; but on account of their weakness and ignorance, for which, considering the advantages which they had so long possessed, they were much to blame. In this sense the word παιδεύσαι is used, 1 Cor. iii. 1—3. as it is likewise Gal. i. 3. The word παιδεύσαι under the institutions of Moses.

18 For this sense see chap. xi. The word διδομένος properly signifies the organs of sense, the eyes, ears, &c. Here it denotes the inward senses, the senses of the mind.

19 Exorcists. See chap. xi. note 2. This metaphor is borrowed from the athletes, who, by often exercising themselves in the work of sport, became fit for engaging in the real combat. Grown Christians, by often exercising their spiritual faculties, become able to distinguish true from false, good from evil, which is false. These spiritual faculties the apostle calls senses, because he had been speaking of babies, who, being unexperienced, were not able, by their senses, to distinguish wholesome food from that which is pernicious.

CHAPTER VI.

Although in the latter verses of the preceding chapter the apostle had reproved the Hebrews for their ignorance of the first principles of the oracles, or ancient revelations, of God, in which the fundamental doctrines of the gospel are contained, he told them here, that he would not now discourse of the principles of the doctrine of Christ, but would carry them on to the perfection of Christian knowledge, by explaining to them the deep meaning of some of the chief ancient oracles; not laying a second time the foundation of repentance from dead works, &c. as taught in the writings of Moses and the prophets, ver. 1, 2.—And because the Hebrews were in danger of being drawn away from the profession of the gospel by their unbelieving brethren, who founded their opposition to Jesus on misinterpretations of the Jewish sacred writings, the apostle told them, he would immediately lead them to the true meaning of the principal parts of those writings, if God permitted him to do it by preserving them from apostatizing till they should have an opportunity to read and consider this letter, ver. 3.—In the mean time, to make them sensible of their danger, and to rouse their attention to those discoveries of the hidden meaning of the ancient oracles which he was about to make to them, he showed them the pernicious nature of apostacy, and the severe punishment to which apostates are subject; however, his repro- chenement of the Hebrews, and his anxiety to preserve them from apostacy, might have led them to think he suspected they were going to renounce the gospel, he mitigated the severity of his reproof, by telling them he hoped better things of them, and things connected with salvation, ver. 9— founding his hope on the righteousness of God, who would not forget those works of love which, with so much labour and danger, they had performed, and were still performing, to the persecuted disciples of Christ in Judentz; nor withhold from them the side of his grace necessary to their perseverance, ver. 10. —Nevertheless he earnestly besought them to shew the same diligence as formerly, in pursuing charitable offices to their afflicted brethren, that his hope concerning them might remain firm to the end, ver. 11—and not to be slothful in the work of their salvation, but to imitate the converted Gentiles, who, through faith in Christ and patience under persecution, were inheriting, in the Christian church, the blessings promised to the seed of Abraham, in the covenant which God made with that father of believers, ver. 12.

Having ascertained, that the converted Gentiles in the Christian church were inheriting the promises in the covenant with Abraham, the apostle, to carry the Hebrews on to perfection, took occasion to enter into the deep meaning of that ancient oracle. And, first of all, by his account of God's covenant with Abraham, it appears that the blessings promised in it, although expressed in types and figures, are the very blessings which are plainly promised in the gospel. Moreover, his care in this particular hath been of no small use in silencing the adversaries of revelation. For by rightly explaining the covenant with Abraham, the apostle hath demonstrated, that the method of salvation by faith, the resurrection of believers from the dead, the general judgment, and the rewards and punishments of a future state, were all made known to the patriarchs and to the Jews, in that greatest of all the ancient oracles of God.

God's covenant with Abraham is often mentioned by Moses. But the fullest account of it is that which he hath recorded, Gen. xvii. 4-8, where all the articles of it are related at large. The apostle, however, did not on this occasion call the attention of the Hebrews to that complete account, but to one more shortly expressed, which he says was confirmed with an oath. His words are, 'When God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no one greater, he swear by himself, saying, In blessing will I bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thee.' This account of the covenant is evidently that recorded Gen. xxii. 13-18, where we are told that God spake these things to Abraham, after he had laid Isaac on the altar with an intention to sacrifice him. For in no other passage of the writings of Moses is God said to have confirmed any part of his covenant with Abraham by an oath, ver. 19, 14.—Concerning the promise, 'In blessing will I bless thee,' it is to be remembered, that in the third and fourth chapters of this epistle, the apostle by a deep train of reasoning hath shewed, that in the covenant God promised to Abraham and to his seed, a rest not only in the earthly Canaan, but in an heavenly country also, of which Canaan was a type. But if Abraham and his seed were to be rewarded with the inheritance of Canaan, as it certainly implied that they were to be blessed with having their faith counted to them for righteousness. Wherefore it was not necessary that the apostle should enter more particularly into the meaning of the promise, 'In blessing I will bless thee.' But, for the illustration of the promise, 'In multiplying I will multiply thee,' he observed, that Abraham, after having patiently waited many years for its accomplishment, at length obtained it, namely, by the birth of Isaac. Nor was it necessary to say anything more for the illustration of that promise; because, by leading the Hebrews to recollect the supernatural procreation of Isaac, they were taught that Abraham was to have a numerous seed by faith, as well as a numerous seed by natural descent. The reason is, the supernatural procreation of Isaac was both an emblem and a pledge, that the power of God would be exerted in making Abraham the father of many nations, by producing in them the same spirit of faith with his; by the participation of which they would be more truly his children, than those whose relation to him was constituted merely by natural descent, ver. 15.

Farther, it is necessary to remark, that the apostle's design in mentioning the two promises which we have been considering, was not to give a full explanation of them, but that he might have an opportunity of declaring what God's intention was in confirming these promises with an oath, ver. 16.—namely, that by Abraham's seed by faith, whom the apostle calls the heirs, the immutability of his purpose to bless them by counting their faith to them for righteousness, and by bestowing on them the inheritance of the heavenly country, ver. 17—that by two immutable things, the promise and the oath of God, in either of which it was impossible for him to lie, the heirs who, by the covenant made with mankind after the fall, have escaped from the curse of the law to lay hold on the hope of pardon and eternal life set before them, might have strong consolation under the convictions of sin and the fears of punishment, ver. 18.—This hope, the apostle assures us, believers of all nations have in every age of the world, as Abraham's seed, for an anchor of the soul firmly fixed in heaven, called the place within the veil, because that place of the Mosaic tabernacle represented heaven, ver. 19.—Lastly, to show that the great blessings of pardon and eternal life promised in the covenant, are bestowed on the heirs through Christ, Abraham's seed, the apostle told the Hebrews, that Jesus, as our forerunner, hath gone before them to plant our hope of these blessings on the sure ground of that effectual and acceptable atonement which he made for the sin of the world by his death: and, that he was well qualified to perform such a service for us, because, by the oath of God, being made an High-priest after the order of Melchisedec, he was commissioned to enter into the holy place where the Deity manifests his presence, to make that effectual atonement for believers which God himself had prescribed, ver. 20.

The intelligent reader, no doubt, hath observed, that the discourse in this chapter is a proper sequel to the discourses concerning the sin and punishment of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness, and concerning the rest which remainedeth to believers, the true people of God, delivered in the preceding third and fourth chapters of this epistle; and that the three discourses, taken together, contain such an explanation of the covenant with Abraham, as leaves us no room to doubt, that therein the principal articles of the gospel revelation were preached to Abraham and to the Jews, as the apostle Paul indeed hath expressly affirmed, Gal. iii. 8. Heb. iv. 2. The covenant with Abraham, therefore, may with great propriety be termed, 'The gospel of the Patriarchs and of the Jews.'

6. (Kes. 211.) And yet have fallen away!

mind which the worshippers of God ought to possess: and of the living on of hands on the sacrifices, as an acknowledgment that the offerer desired death for his own; and of the resurrection of the dead; and of the eternal judgment, so called because its sentence will never be reversed.

3. And this more perfect instruction I will give you, if God permit, by preserving you from apostatizing till ye have an opportunity to read and consider this letter.

4. For it is impossible for us to restore a second time, by repentance, those who have been once enlightened by believing the gospel; and have tasted of the heavenly gifts of freedom from the yoke of the law of Moses, and from the grievous suppositions under which the sacrificial service and the spiritual sacrifices, which is bestowed on Jews and Gentiles under the gospel; and have been made partakers of the gifts of the Holy Ghost at their baptism;

5. And have perceived the excellency of the word of God, the ordinances and promises of the gospel; and have seen the efficacy of the powers of the gospel dispensation in reforming sinners;

6. And yet have renounced the gospel, in the imagination that Jesus was justly punished with death as an impostor, crucifying a second time the sacrifice of God in the person of Jesus Christ, by our transgressions in the posttime. Who were enlightened, have tasted, were made partakers. Wherefore, being an impostor, ought likewise to have been translated, and be reckoned Christian principles. See Heb. x. 22. Besides, the baptism which the Spirit forebode, doth not consist in the baptism of Christ, nor in the baptism of Moses, but in the imposition of hands.
HEBREWS

7. In giving up such wilful sinners as incorrigible, we act as men in cultivating their fields. For the land which drinketh in the rain which oft cometh upon it, and bringeth forth herbs fit for them by whom it is cultivated, receiveth a blessing from God:

8. But that which produceth thorns and briers is reproved, and with to a curse; whose end is to be burned.

9. But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, even things which are connected with salvation; though we thus speak.

10. For God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labour of love which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

11. Yet we earnestly desire every one of you to shew the same diligence, in order to the full assurance of our hope to the end:

12. That ye may not be slothful, (chsp. v. 11. note 2.) but imitators of them which through faith and patience (κατ' εμπειρίαν) are inheriting the promises.

13. For when God made promise to Abraham, (Gen.) since he could swear by (αὐτὸς) no one greater, he swore by himself,

14. Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. (See Esa. vi. sect. 2. No. 3, 4.)

15. And so, having patiently waited, he obtained the promise.

16. (Reg) For men verily swear by the life of the greater.

In token of their renunciation Christianity; yet, being convinced of the truth, they were called Christians in their hearts. Now, however culpable these men may have been for their cowardice and hypocrisy, there was nothing in their case, as in the case of the others, which made it impossible for the ministers of Christ to persuade them to repent. The ministers therefore abused Ignorance, as well as great uncharacteristic, in contending that the apostle had written, 'the repentance of such persons unpersuadable,' and that for their sin, 'as for the sin of those mentioned Heb. x. 25.' no amendment was provided in the gospel.

Ver. 8. — 1. Is nigh to a curse. — 2. As in the blessing mentioned ver. 7. there is an allusion to the promise blessing whereby the earth was rendered fruitful, Gen. ii. 11. so in the curse here mentioned, there is an allusion to the curse pronounced on the earth after the fall, Gen. iii. 17.

2. Whose end is to be burned. — A principal part of the eastern agriculture consists in leading rider water from ponds, fountains, and brooks, to render the fields fruitful. When this is neglected, the land is scorched by the heat and drought of the climate, and so being burned up is altogether sterile. The apostle's meaning is, that no land which is not fruitful under all method of culture, will at length be deserved by the husbandman, and burnt up with drought; so those who apostatize from the gospel, after having believed it to be from God on the evidence mentioned ver. 4. will be justly given up by God and man as incorrigible.

Ver. 8. — 1. We are persuaded better things of you. — This, as Pierce observes, is exactly in St Paul's manner of softening the hard things he found himself obliged to write. See 2 Thess. ii. 3. Eph. iv. 50.

2. Which are connected with salvation. — So the words αὐτοὶ τῶν ἁγίων signify, as Ellicott hath shewed, See Parkhurst.

Ver. 12. — Are inheriting the promises. — The promises made to Abraham and to his seed were. 1. That Abraham should have a numerous seed by faith, as well as by natural descent. 2. That God would be a God to him and to his seed in their generation, by being the object of their worship and their protector. 3. That he would give him the everlasting possession of Canaan. 4. That he would bless all the nations of the earth in him; that is, bless believers of all nations in the birth of Abraham's seed. 5. That he would bless all the nations of the earth in him; that is, bless believers of all nations in the birth of Abraham's seed. 6. That through Christ, likewise, he would bless the nations with the gospel presentation. See Esa. xi. 10. 6. — Four of these promises the believing Gentiles were inheriting at this time the apostle wrote this letter. For 1. They were become Abraham's seed by faith. 2. God was become the object of their worship and their protector. 3. They were enjoying the knowledge of God in the gospel church, and the gifts of the Spirit, Gal. iii. 4. All these blessings were bestowed on them through Christ. — The other promises of Abraham's spiritual seed, not even the Old Testament saints, were inheriting. None of them had attained to the possession of the heavenly country, typified by Canaan; nor was the faith of any of them actually counted to them as righteousness. These blessings can only be obtained after the resurrection and general judgment. Heb. xi. 35. — By observing the facts, the believing Gentiles were actually inheriting the promises, that is, were enjoying the promise of the promise; the four promises already mentioned, the apostle appealed to an undeniable fact, in proof that the believing Gentiles, equally with the believing Jews, were heirs of the promises made to Abraham and his seed. Whence, propitiously, to the Gentiles the greater assurance of this, he shewed them in what follows, that all the promises of the covenant were unalterably confirmed to them by the oath which God swore to Abraham, after he had lifted up Isaac upon the altar, Gen. xxvii. 18, 17. For on no other occasion did God confirm any promise to Abraham with an oath; as was observed in the illustration prefixed to this chapter.

Ver. 13. — Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee. — The blessing promised to Abraham on this occasion, was not only that his faith should be counted to him for righteousness, but that the faith of his spiritual seed should likewise be counted to them for righteousness, as is evident from Gal. iii. 6. The scripture, fore-seeing that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel before to Abraham, saying, Surely blessing shall be upon thee. Gen. xv. 6. And the promise was confirmed to him by an oath, that he should be the father of a numerous and prosperous seed. See Eph. ii. 12. 2. Multiplying I will multiply thee. — In the oath, the expression is, I will multiply thy seed; but the meaning is the same, for Abraham could be multiplied only by the multiplication of his seed. He was to have both a numerical and spiritual seed. The apostle quotes only the first words of the oath; but his reasoning is founded on the whole, and particularly on the promise, Gen. xii. 17. 'And in thy seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.' They shall be blessed, by having their faith counted for righteousness, through the seed Christ. See Esa. xi. 10. 6.

Ver. 15. — And, having patiently waited, he obtained the promise. — Here, by an usual figure of speech, the apostle doubtless means, that the promise itself Abraham obtained when God swore to him, 'Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee,' ver. 13. But the promise itself Abraham obtained the beginning of the accomplishment of God's greater, and an oath (sa, 147.) for confirmation to them an end of all (προτερομένος) contradiction.

17. (☞ 2) Therefore God, willing more abundantly to shew to the heirs of promise the immutability (πώς ἦλθε) of his purpose, (καὶ ἐγέρση λέγει) confirmed it with an oath:

18. That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation, who have fled away to lay hold on the hope set before us,

19. Which we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, (και ἐνν.) because fixed into the place within the vail,

20. Where a forerunner hath entered on our account, even Jesus, made an High-priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedec.

whose vengeance they imprecate if they swear falsely: and so an oath for the confirmation of any doubtful matter, is held by them a proper method of ending all contradiction.

17. Therefore, in accommodation to the convictions of men, God willing more fully to shew to all, in every age and nation, who are the heirs of promise, the immutability of his purpose to count their faith for righteousness, and to bestow on them the inheritance of the heavenly country, confirmed the declaration of his purpose with an oath:

18. That by two immutable things, the promise and the oath of God, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation under the convictions of sin and the terrors of punishment, who have fled away from the curse of the law, like the manslayer from the avenger, to lay hold on the hope of pardon set before us in the promise confirmed by God's oath;

19. Which hope we have as an anchor to which our soul is fastened in this stormy sea of life, both strong and stedfast, because fixed into the place within the vail; that is, into heaven, whither we shall be drawn, by this anchor, as ships are drawn to the place where their anchors are fixed;

20. Into which place a forerunner hath entered on our account, to fix our hope of pardon and eternal life as an anchor, even Jesus, who, being made an High-priest for ever like Melchisedec, can procure pardon for us as a priest, and save us eternally through his power as a king.

promise concerning his numerous natural progeny. Moreover, as the birth of Isaac was brought about supernaturally by the divine power, it was both a proof and a pledge of the accomplishment of the promise concerning the birth of his numerous spiritual progeny. Whereas, Abraham may truly be said to have obtained the accomplishment of the promise concerning his numerous spiritual seed likewise. In any other sense, Abraham did not obtain the accomplishment of that promise. See the illustration of ver. 16.

Ver. 16. An oath for confirmation, &c. This observation teaches us, that both promissory oaths concerning things lawful and in our power, and oaths for the confirmation of things doubtful, when required by proper authority and taken religiously, are allowable under the gospel.

Ver. 17.-1. Therefore. Theophylact saith v. 4 is equivalent to οἵτινες ἐν ἑαυτῷ ἐγέρση λέγει, and the Syriac hath here Quoqopqrmi; and Castalio, Proserp.

2. Confirmed it with an oath. The Vulgate, which is followed by Castalio, translates intreturī text, intreturī jure juramento. But as the expression is sus, and not 自律, that translation cannot be admitted. To remove this difficulty, our translators have put in the margin, 'he interposed himself by an oath:' with which, Pierce saith, the Italian, French, and Low Dutch translations agree. Beta hath 'e'dejudicas juramento, he undertook for by an oath.'—Bytrac. 'ab eis omne no jurisamento.' Translators, in the margin of his translation of the Syriac, hath, ad verbum 'Ligantur quasi falsa.'—Pierce, 'he placed his counsel (or promise) in the middle of an oath.'—But as none of these translations correspond to the words of the original, I think its meaning is better represented in our English translation, which I have adopted, 'he confirmed it with an oath:' for intreturī text, intreturī jure juramento; and intreturī text, intreturī jure juramento, are both used in the Vulgate of the same passage. Hence I have, with some other interpreters, translated, 'he interposed himself by an oath.' He made an oath the mediator, surety, or raiser of his counsel. This sense of the word intreturī text, intreturī jure juramento, is noticed, because it suggests a fine interpretation of chap. 1s. 1s. which see in note 2. on that verse.

Ver. 20. Where a forerunner hath entered on our account; is, 'lias.' A forerunner is one who goes before, to do some service for another who is to follow; in which sense also the Latin word antecedens is used. Var. Lib. 1. 16. Here the allusion is to one sent from a ship to fix its anchor in the place to which it is to be drawn.

2. Even Jesus. Jesus is called our forerunner, first, because he is gone before us into heaven, to open it to us by the sacrifice of himself; and to plant our hope of eternal life there, as an anchor of the soul. Secondly, because, having opened heaven, he remains there as the High-priest of that holy place, to introduce all believers into the presence of God. This shoews in what sense Jesus is an High-priest for ever.' He is so, not by offering sacrifices for ever in behalf of his people, but by interceding for them always, Rom. viii. 34. note 3, and by introducing them into the presence of God by the merit of the one sacrifice of himself, which he offered to God without spot in heaven.

CHAPTER VII.

View and Illustration of the Facts and Reasons in this Chapter.

In the preceding chapter, the apostle proposed to go on with the Hebrews to the perfection of Christian knowledge, as exhibited in the ancient oracles of God; and accordingly in part he executed his purpose by shewing them, That, in the covenant with Abraham, God promised him a numerous seed, both by natural descent and by faith; that he promised to bless him, and his seed by faith, with the pardon of their sins, and with the inheritance of that heavenly country of which Canaan was the type; that he confirmed those promises with an oath, to shew the immutability of his purpose to bestow on them the promised blessings; and that their hope of these blessings was firmly fixed in heaven, as an anchor of the soul, by Jesus, who had entered heaven for that purpose, being made by the oath of God an High-priest for ever, according to the similitude of Melchisedec. To this oath the apostle had appealed, chap. v. 6, in proof that Jesus is a real High-priest; but its import he did not then fully explain. Wherefore, in the last verse of chap. vi. having mentioned a second time that Jesus was made an High-priest according to the similitude of Melchisedec, he, in this with chapter, for the purpose of proceeding with the Hebrews still farther on towards the perfection of Christian knowledge, searched into the deep meaning of the oath, recorded Psal. cx. 4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedec:' and, by accurately examining the particulars concerning Melchisedec related in the Mosaic history, he showed, that Melchisedec was a far more excellent priest than Aaron and all his sons, consequently, that Jesus, whom God made an High-priest for ever according to the similitude of Melchisedec, exerviseth a priesthood more acceptable to God, and more effectual for procuring the pardon of sin, than the priesthood which the sons of Aaron exercised under the law.

The first particular concerning Melchisedec, mentioned by Moses, and taken notice of by the apostle, is, That Melchisedec was a priest of the Most High God. This implies, that he was appointed to the office in such a public manner, that all the worshippers of the true God in Canaan knew him to be a priest of the Most High God. And seeing, at that time, there was no visible church of God set over in which Melchisedec was a priest of the Most High God, the apostle, to shew this, which he did in Psal. cx. 4, that Melchisedec was a real High-priest, shewed, that Melchisedec was a far more excellent priest than Aaron and all his sons, consequently, that Jesus, whom God made an High-priest for ever according to the similitude of Melchisedec, exerviseth a priesthood more acceptable to God, and more effectual for procuring the pardon of sin, than the priesthood which the sons of Aaron exercised under the law.
God every-where who applied to him. In this respect, therefore, Melchizedec was a greater priest than Aaron, and than any of his sons; their priesthood being confined to the single nation of the Israelites. — The second particular mentioned by Moses, and referred to by the apostle, is, That Melchizedec was a king as well as a priest; so had authority to make laws for regulating the morals of the people for whom he officiated as a priest, and power to punish them for their faults. Accordingly, by the righteous exercise of his power as a king, he trained his people to virtue so successfully, that by his neighbours he himself was called Melchizedec, which signifies King of Righteousness, and the city in which his people lived was, on account of their virtuous and peaceable disposition, called Salem, which signifies Peace. Whereas the sons of Aaron, being simply priests, had no authority to make laws, nor power to correct the vices of the Israelites, for whom they officiated. Besides, many of them, instead of being righteous, were persons of a vicious and turbulent disposition, ver. 2. — The third particular concerning Melchizedec which the apostle taketh notice of is, That neither his father, nor his mother, nor his genealogy, is mentioned by Moses. From this it follows, that Melchizedec did not derive either his priesthood, or his fitness for the priesthood, from his parents, but had the office conferred upon him by God on account of the excellence of his character. It was otherwise with the Levitical priests: For although Aaron himself was specially called of God, his sons were made priests, neither by any particular designation, nor on account of the excellence of their character; but merely by their descending in a right manner from parents who were priests, Levit. xxi. 14. and by their being free from bodily imperfections, Levit. xxi. 17-21. — The fourth particular concerning Melchizedec taken notice of by the apostle is, That in the account given of him by Moses, he had neither beginning of days nor end of life, as a priest, fixed by any law of God; so that he did not begin to exercise the priest’s office at a determined age, nor cease to be a priest when supernumerated, as was the case with the sons of Aaron, but exercised the priest’s office all his life; in which respect his priesthood was well fitted to be a type of the perpetual priesthood of the Son of God, ver. 3. — This circumstance, that Melchizedec was a priest all his life, joined with the former, that he was made a priest by God on account of the excellence of his character, shows that his priesthood had for its object to purify the minds of his subjects from sin; an office to which strength of body was not necessary, but maturity of judgment. Whereas the sons of Aaron, having for the object of their ministrations to cleanse the bodies only of the Israelites from ceremonial pollution, by services which required great bodily strength, they were not permitted to begin their ministry till they were thirty years old; nor to continue therein beyond the age of fifty. See Heb. vii. 16, note 1. — The fifth particular concerning Melchizedec, mentioned by Moses, and taken notice of by the apostle, is, That Abraham gave him the tenth of all the spoils of the vanquished kings, notwithstanding he was himself both a prince and a priest. This is a proof from fact, that Melchizedec’s priesthood was not confined to one family or nation, but, for any thing we know, being the only specially appointed priest of the Most High God then in the world, he was an universal priest, ver. 4. — The case was different with the sons of Aaron. For they could not tithe all the worshippers of the true God every-where, nor even all the Israelites, by virtue of their being priests; but they took tithes from their brethren the Levites only, and that by virtue of a particular commandment, mentioned Num. xvi. 24-50, and they did this notwithstanding the Levites were descended from Abraham equally with themselves; all which shewed the limited nature of their priesthood, ver. 5. — But Melchizedec having no relation to the ancestors of the Levitical priests, was not authorized, by any connexion which he had with Abraham, either natural or political, to take tithes of him. Wherefore he received the tithes, merely because by the divine appointment he officiated as a priest for all the worshippers of God in Canaan, of whom Abraham was one. — The sixth particular concerning Melchizedec, mentioned by Moses, and taken notice of by the apostle, is, That Melchizedec, after receiving the tithes, blessed Abraham, notwithstanding he was at that time possessed of the promises, ver. 6. — And, as the less is blessed of the better person, Abraham, by receiving the blessing from Melchizedec, acknowledged him to be his superior, both as a priest and as a king, ver. 7. — Farther, to shew the superiority of Melchizedec to the Levitical priests, the apostle observes, that here, under the Mosaic economy, priests who die, that is whose priesthood expireth when they arrive at a certain time of life, receive tithes; but there, under the patriarchal economy, Melchizedec received tithes, of whom it is testified, that he lived a priest continually, ver. 8. — Likewise he observes, that Melchizedec’s superiority to the Levitical priests was shewed by this, that Levi and his descendants may be said to have been priests to Melchizedec in Abraham, ver. 9. — Because Levi was yet in the loins of his father when Melchizedec met him. And since Levi derived all his dignity from his father Abraham, if, by paying tithes and receiving the blessing, Abraham himself was shewed to be inferior to Melchizedec, certainly his son Levi was in like manner shewed to be inferior to him, ver. 10.

Here the apostle ends his account of Melchizedec, without having pointed out any of the particulars in which he resembled the Son of God, except the one mentioned ver. 3, that he was a priest all his life. Wherefore, that the reader may know in what respects Christ is a priest according to the similitude of Melchizedec, and be sensible of the propriety of God’s making the priesthood of Melchizedec the pattern of the priesthood of his Son, it will be fit in this place to compare the character of Christ, with that of Melchizedec, as described by the apostle in this chapter.

And, 1. Like Melchizedec, Christ is a king as well as a priest. Being the Son of God, and the Priest of the highest dignity, he is the Heir or Lord of all; consequently he hath a right to govern mankind by the laws of his gospel, and power to reward or punish every one according to his deserts. — 2. Like Melchizedec, Christ exercises his government for promoting moral righteousness among his subjects. Accordingly, by his gospel he hath reformed many of his subjects; and will continue to reign till he make truth and righteousness prevail universally among them; and such as are irreclaimable he will destroy. Wherefore, as his government is founded on a better authority than Melchizedec’s, and is carried on with more success, the title of king of righteousness belongs more properly to him than Melchizedec: Also, he is well entitled to be called king of peace, as he came from heaven to produce peace on earth, by reconciling sinners to God and to one another; and to make the reconciled live with God for ever, in a state of perfect peace in heaven. — 3. Like Melchizedec, Christ was not descended from parents who were priests, but he was made a priest by the special designation of God. And his priesthood is of a nature so excellent, that as he had no predecessor, so he can have no companion nor successor in his priesthood. Nor is any such needful, seeing he ever liveth to execute the priest’s office himself. — 4. Christ’s priesthood, like that of Melchizedec, not requiring bodily strength, but maturity of judgment, to execute it properly, it was not limited to the prime of his life; but, like Melchizedec, he is a priest for ever, who exercises his priesthood as long as his people have any need of the priest's office.—3. As Melchizedec was appointed to exercise his priesthood in behalf of all the worshippers of the true God in the countries where he lived, so Christ was appointed to exercise his priesthood, not for any particular nation or race of men, but for all mankind: He is an universal priest. And having offered himself a sacrifice for the sin of the whole world, he hath thereby procured pardon and eternal life for all who repent of their sins; and maketh continual intercession for them in heaven, upon the strength of that meritorious sacrifice. So Christ himself hath declared in his prayer to his Father, recorded John xvii. 2. 'Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give life to as many as thou hast given him.'

The apostle, in the preceding fifth chapter, to show that Jesus the author of the gospel hath made atonement for the sin of the world, which is the fourth fact on which the authority of the gospel revelation rests; having proved that Jesus is a priest; also in this seventh chapter having displayed his greatness as a priest, by describing the character and office of Melchizedec, according to whose similitude he was made a priest, proceeds, in what follows, to answer the argument advanced by the doctors for proving the efficacy and perpetuity of the Levitical priesthood, together with the untenable obligation of the law of Moses. They affirmed the Levitical sacrifices to be real atonements which never would be abolished, because the law was given solely for the purpose of establishing and regulating them; consequently that the law itself would always remain in force. But to show the fallacy of this argument, the apostle, entering into the deep meaning of the oath whereby Messiah was made a priest, reasoned therefore in the following manner. If perfection, that is, the complete pardon of sin, is to be had through the services of the Levitical priesthood, and if these services are always to continue, together with the law by which they were established and regulated, what need was there that another priest should arise of the order of Melchizedec, and not of the order of Aaron? ver. 11.—Certainly the introduction of a priesthood of a different kind from that of Aaron implies, that the services of the sons of Aaron are ineffectual for procuring the pardon of sin, and on that account are to be abolished. But if the priesthood is to be changed, it necessarily followeth that the law is also to cease; since its principal use was to regulate the services and sacrifices of the priesthood, ver. 12. Now, that God resolved to change the priesthood, which by the law was conferred on the sons of Aaron, cannot be doubted, seeing the person to whom God said, 'Thou art a priest for ever,' was of a tribe of which no one ever officiated at the altar, ver. 13.—For it is very plain from Psal. cx. that our Lord Messiah, to whom God said, 'Thou art a priest,' being David's son, hath sprung from Judah, to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning the priesthood as belonging to it, ver. 14.—Further, that the priesthood of the new priest who was to arise, was to be different from that of the sons of Aaron, is still more exceedingly plain from God's saying, that according to the similitude of Melchizedec a different priest arises, ver. 15.—who is made a priest, not according to the carnal commandment of the law, which obliged the sons of Aaron to lay down their priesthood when fifty years old, but because at that age they were not able to undergo those laborious services by which the bodies of the people were to be cleansed from ceremonial defilements; but who is made a priest according to the power of that endless life as a priest which is bestowed on him; because his ministrations being appointed for the purification of the minds of his people from the defilement of sin, required maturity of judgment and experience rather than great bodily strength, ver. 16.—This God himself testified by saying to Messiah, David's Lord, 'Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchizedec,' ver. 17.—From these well-known facts the apostle justly concluded, that it was always God's intention to abolish the law of Moses, after the weakness of its precepts to reform mankind was made evident, and the unprofitableness of its sacrifices for procuring the pardon of sin was showed, ver. 18.—The truth is, the law made no one perfect in respect either of sanctification or of pardon; but the introduction of a better law and priesthood maketh us perfect in both these respects; by which law and priesthood we have access to worship God acceptably, at all times and in all places, ver. 19.

Further, to shew that the gospel with its priesthood is a better covenant than the law with its priesthood, and that it was justly substituted in place of the law, the apostle, entering still farther into the deep meaning of God's oath constituting Messiah a priest for ever, reasoned in the following manner:—In as much as Jesus was made a priest with an oath, importing that God would never abolish his priesthood, ver. 20, whereas the sons of Aaron being made priests without any such oath, their priesthood was liable to be abolished, ver. 21.—it is plain, that the weakness of the law and the unprofitableness of the Levitical priesthood, were manifested by God's declaring his intention to abolish them, certainly the greater excellency of the gospel, and the greater efficacy of its priesthood, are shewed by God's having declared them unchangeable, ver. 22.—This the apostle illustrates more fully, chapter viii, by comparing the two covenants together.—I have only to add, that the apostle's reasoning on this subject is of such a nature, that while it sheweth the excellence of the gospel covenant and priesthood, it removes an objection which might naturally occur to the reader; namely, that since the law of Moses and the Levitical priesthood, which were as really of divine appointment as the gospel covenant and priesthood, have been abolished, what security is there that the latter shall not in their turn be abolished likewise! The greatest security possible! With a solemn oath God declared, in the hearing of the angelical host, that he had made both the one and the other absolutely unchangeable.

In what follows, the apostle observes, that as the weakness of the Levitical ordinary priesthood was shewed by the priests quitting their place of office, after their bodily vigour was gone, so the weakness of the Levitical high-priesthood was shewed by the high-priests being many in number, because they were hindered by death from continuing in their office, ver. 23.—But Jesus, because he liveth for ever in the body, possesseth a priesthood which doth not pass from him to any successor, ver. 24.—Hence he is for ever able to save all, from the beginning to the end of the world, who come to God through his mediation; ever living as an High-priest to make intercession for them with God, ver. 25.—Lastly, He is such an High-priest as the character and circumstances of sinners required, who, being absolutely free from sin, ver. 26.—hath no need annually to make atonement for his own sins, as the Levitical high-priests were obliged to do, ver. 27.—For the law made men high-priests who were sinners; but the oath, which was declared after the law was given, constituted the Son an High-priest, who is in every respect perfect, for evermore, ver. 28.

These great discoveries concerning the dignity of Jesus as a king and a priest, and concerning the power of his government and the efficacy of his priesthood, the apostle was directed by inspiration to make, that by the frequent recollection of them we may be edified and strengthened in our hearts, under all the trials to which we are exposed during our present probationary state.

CHAP. VII.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VII.-1. (Acts. 7.) Now this Melchizedek, king of Salem, priest of the Most High God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him, 2 To whom Abraham imparted even a tenth of all, being first, indeed, by interpretation, king of righteousness, and next also king of Salem, which by interpretation (from the preceding clause) is king of peace; 3 Having neither beginning of days nor end of life; but being made like to the Son of God, he remained a priest all his life.

4 (Heb. 7.) Now, consider how great this Priest was, to whom even Abraham the patriarch, gave a tenths of the spoil.

5 (Ku, 207.) For they verify of the sons of Levi who receive the priesthood, have a commandment to tithe the people according to the law, that is, their brethren, although they have come forth of the line of Abraham. 6 But he which did not derive his pedigree from the progenitors of the sons of Abraham, (see ver. 3. note 2.), and who,

Ver. 1.—I. King of Salem.—According to Josephus, Ant. L i. c. xi. Jerusalem; but according to Jerome, who, on his receiving information from some learned Jews, he was the town which is mentioned Gen. xxii. 18, as a city of Shechem, and which is spoken of, John v. 33, as near to Enon, before which John baptized. This city being in Abraham's way as he returned from Damascus to Sheolom, after the slaughter of the kings, many are of Jerome's opinion, that the northern Salem was Melchizedek's city, rather than Jerusalem, which was situated farther without father, without mother.

2. Priest of the most High God.—By calling Melchizedek 'the priest of the most High God,' Gen. xiv. 18. Moses hath informed us, that there was a priest divinely appointed to officiate for the worshippers of the true God in Canaan, long before the days of Aaron, and before God formed to himself a visible church from any particular family or nation of mankind. The Hebrew word translated priest, sometimes signifies a prince; but the historian hath removed the ambiguity, by adding the words, 'of the most High God.'

3. And blessed him.—In his manner of blessing Abraham, Melchizedek showed himself a priest of the only true God:—Blessed be the most High God, possessor of heaven and earth. Ver. 2. 1. A tenth of all;—as all of the spoil of the vanquished kings, ver. 4. and not a tenth of all, as the gods that had been taken from the kingdom of Sodom and from Lot. For of these Abraham took nothing to himself. —By paying tithes to Melchizedek, Abraham acknowledged him to be a priest of the true God. —It seems he was supernaturally appointed a priest by God, who had shown himself to Abram in the vision of the burning bush, Exod. iii. 11. 12, and had revealed to him his purpose of saving his people.

2. Being first, indeed, by interpretation, king of righteousness, and next also, &c.—In the name of Melchizedek, the key character is, that he was a priest of the most High God by appointment, and not by descent. He was from the first king of righteousness, and the second of Salem, or peace. This was a new order of things, and a new dispensation of grace. And it was not till the most blessed time of the alliance of the new covenant, after the appearance of our Lord, that the Aaronic priesthood was granted for the church of Christ. The Apostle meant to show, that the Melchizedekian or celestial branch of the Jewish religion was of a far purer and more excellent nature, and was in many respects even superior to the Aaronic. The high and glorious order of Melchizedekian holiness and service, prefigured the Messiah to be the great High Priest in his own family; and the great sun of righteousness, who lightens and sanctifies the people, and shatters the darkness and shadow of death.

3. Neither having beginning of days nor end of life;—Melchizedek was a type of the eternal Messiah. Hence the Apostle speaks of the gospel as 'an immobilized age, which was neither before nor after, but which is from everlasting and outside time. Ver. 4. Having no beginning of days, nor end of life. —The time of their priestly ministration was called their days. Luke i. 22. The service of the sons of Kohath, and among the rest the service of the priests, who were all Kohath's sons, was appointed. Num. iv. 2. 3. 10. to begin when they were thirty years old, and to end when they arrived at the age of fifty. Wherefore, when it is said of Melchizedek, that he had neither beginning of days nor end of life, the meaning is this, that neither the beginning of his days, nor the end of his life, as a priest, was limited by any law of God, as the days of the service of the Levitical priests were. For in any other sense it is not true, that Melchizedek had neither beginning of days nor end of life. By thus continuing a priest all his life, Melchizedek greatly exceeded the Levitical priests, and was qualified to represent the Son of God, the happy effect of whose ministrations as a priest is not confined to any one age of the world, but reached far beyond the beginning, and far beyond the end of the world.

4. All his life;—No other original phrase οθονών signifies, being used by an inspired writer to denote the whole of a person's life, as in οθονών Μητρίθης, Bell. Civ. 315. It is used likewise to denote the whole of Christ's life, Heb. x. 12. See also Gen. i. 19. 20.

Ver. 4. 1. Abraham the patriarch. —Here the Greek word ἡμεραίος. This word is very well translated in the Syrian version, 'Camput parhim, the Head of the fathers.'

The tenth of the spoils;—Though the word σπλαγχνιστος signifies the best, whether of the fruits of the earth, or of the spoils of war, the apostle does not mean that Abraham gave only the tenth of the chief spoils:—He gave the tenth of all, and of all sorts of spoils. Ver. 5. Though Abraham gave, he gave out of the best of the spoils. Abraham was himself a priest, for he offered sacrifice when God entered into a covenant with him, Gen. xv. 9. 10. Wherefore, by giving Melchizedek the tenth of all, Abraham acknowledged, that in respect of the extent of his priesthood, as well as in respect of the manner in which the office was conferred on him, Melchizedek was a greater priest than he himself was. Further, seeing among the spoils there were probably cattle, Melchizedek may have offered some of them in sacrifice for Abraham as a thank-offering.

Ver. 5. 1. Have a commandment to tithe the people according to the law, that is, their brethren. —The brethren of the priests whom they tithed were the Levites. This is called a tithing the name of an Israelite, and as the Levites constituted the whole of the people of Israel, this tithing was a tithing of the people:—But the Levites and priests, consisted wholly of the tithes which the Levites had taken from the people, Num. xvi. 24. 31.

Although they have come forth of the line of Abraham;—The apostle mentions this with what goes before, to show that the Levites were allowed to tithe the Levites, not because they were inferior to them, but because these tithes were allotted to them as a part of their maintenance, not as taxes, but for the support of the Levites. And the Levites, then, were not the Levites of the line of Abraham, but the Levites that were maintained out of the tithes, which they were allowed to receive, for the support of the Levites, and the Levites maintained out of the tithes, which the Levites had from the people, Num. xvi. 24. 31.

6. Tithed Abraham;—namely, without any particular command from God so to do; and, being king of kings, and having no occasion to take tithes of Abraham for his maintenance, but chose to take them as a priest, who by divine appointment officiated in holy things for all the worshippers of the most high God in Canaan.
and blessed (ἡ δικαστήριον the holder of the promises.)

7 (Acts 13:13.) Now, without all contradiction, the less is blessed of the better.

8 (Kes. 224.) Besides, how foolish men who die take tithes; but there one testifies of, (Pss. 6, 12.) that he lived! A PRIEST ALL HIS LIFE. (Ps. cxiv. 4.)

9 And as one may say, even Levi, who received tithes, was tithed (Jer. 117.) in Abraham:

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchizedek met him.

11 (Ost. 283.) Moreover, if needful perfection were through the Levitical priesthood, (Ps. 24:6.) because (Pss. 69:18,) on account of if the people received the law, what further need was there that a different priest should arise, according to the order of Melchizedek, and not be called according to the order of Aaron?

12 (Ps. 93.) Wherefore, the priesthood being changed, of necessity there is a change also of the law.

13 (Ps. 91.) For he (Pss. 91.) to whom these things are said, partook of a different tribe, of which no one gave attendance at the altar.

this respect, therefore, he was a fit type of the Son of God; through whose priesthood all the nations of the earth are to be blessed.

2. And blessed:—Melchizedek was directed of God to bless Abraham on this occasion, as an emblem of the blessing of the nations by Christ, who, like Melchizedek, was to be a king as well as a priest, for the purpose of effectually blessing mankind.

3. The holder of the promises:—This circumstance is mentioned to show, notwithstanding God highly honoured Abraham by making the promises to him, as the father or head of all the families, yet he was inferior to Melchizedek as a priest; so it is added in the next verse, 'the less is blessed of the better.'

Ver. 7. The less is blessed of the better. 1. The blessing here spoken of, is not the simple blessing of good to others, which may be done by inferiors to superiors; but it is the action of a person supported by God's interest to bestow good things on another. In this manner Isaac and Jacob blessed their children, under a prophetic inspiration to bestow good things on another. In this manner the priests under the Levitical law blessed the people. In this manner likewise Melchizedek, the priest of the most high God, blessed Abraham.

Ver. 8. One testifies of, that he lived:—The Greek verb, εδόθη here is not the present, but the imperfect of the indicative. See Clement's grammar in ever. It is not testified, Ps. cxiv. 4, that Melchizedek now lived, for less that he lived as a priest. It is only testified that the perfect and perfect tense were ever after the order of Melchizedek, which the apostle terms a testifying that Melchizedek lived a priest all his life; because that was one of the particulars which distinguished his priesthood from that of Aaron, and which rendered it a fit type of the priesthood of the Son of God. See ver. 3, where this is expressly affirmed.

Ver. 9. And as one may say:—Grotius and Raphelius have showed, that the phrase 4 εδόθη, εδόθη was used by the Greeks to soften any seemingly harsh expression which was not to be taken too far, in the same manner as the Latins used their phrase, of the dictum, le clerco, however, hath endeavoured, Art. Cric, vol. i. p. 167, to prove that this phrase should be translated, and to say the truth. But as the apostle's affirmation, that 'Levi was tithed in Abraham,' is not to be taken strictly, I think it more proper, with Grotius and Raphelius, to understand 4 εδόθη εδόθη, as a means of testifying that the grace of the Levitical priesthood was an inferior grace, in comparison of the priesthood of the Son of God.

Ver. 10. He was yet in the loins of his father:—This might be justly said of Levi, who descended from Abraham in the ordinary course of generation; but it cannot be said of Christ, who was born in a miraculous manner without any human father. While therefore the apostle's argument, taken from Abraham's paying tithes to Melchizedek, and his receiving the blessing from him, proves that both Abraham and the Levitical priests, his natural descendants, were inferior to Melchizedek, it does not apply to Christ at all.

Ver. 11. Moreover, applied to priests and sacrifices, denotes the highest degree of those blessings which are grounded by the use of priests and sacrifices; namely, the pardon of sin and the favour of the Deity. See Hab. 2:18.

On account of the people received the law. —Ελθαντικόν. This leads us to chap. ii. 14, where it is said of our Lord, that (ελθαντικόν) the people of flesh and blood: He partook of the flesh and blood of a different tribe.
HEBREWS.

14 For it is very plain, that our Lord hath sprung up from Judah; (Is. 11. 1.) to which tribe Moses spake nothing (Acts ii. 28, 29.) concerning the priesthood.

15 (Acts 22. 24.) Moreover, it is still more exceedingly plain, (Acts 22. 26.) that according to the similitude (see chap. vi. note) of Melchizedek, a different priest ariseth,

16 Who (Lev. 24. 9.) is made, not according to the law of a carnal commandment, but according to the power of an endless life! (See ver. 24.)

17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedek. (Psalm c. 102. 5.)

18 (Acts 24. 2.) Well then, there is a disannulling of the precedent commandment, because of its weakness and unprofitableness.

19 For the law made (Gal. 3. 24.) no one perfect, (see ver. 11. note 1.) but the after introduction of a better hope, wherein we draw near to God.

20 (Kes. 22. 24.) Moreover, in as much as not without an oath (Heb. 7. 22.) Jesus was made a Priest; (from ver. 11.)

21 (For they verily were made priests without an oath, but he with an oath, by him who said to him, The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedek;)

22 By so much was Jesus made (Lev. 21. 7.) the mediator of a better covenant. (See Heb. viii. 6. note.)

Ver. 11.—1. For it is very plain,—Pierce is of opinion, that the proposition isset in the word εὐκράτεις, hath the same signification as in the word εὐκράτεις, ver. 18: and that it may be translated, it is plain before he appeared: a sense which our translators have given to εὐκράτεις, 1 Tim. iii. 16. But if this translation is adopt- ed, essentias must be retranslated under the propriety of the tense.

2. That our Lord sprang up from Judah:—That Messiah was to spring up from Judah, is very plain from the prophecies expressing his descent. And as it is likewise plain, that that part of Messiah's character was verified in our Lord, whose genealogy Matthew and Luke have traced up to king David, from the public tables. For that such tables of their descent were kept by the Jews, Josephus testifieth, V. v. 95, 96. It gives you three successions of our family, as we find them written in the public tables;—by these tables Paul knew himself to be of the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 16.—1. Who is made, not according to the law of a carnal commandment,—The commandment of the law, appointing the sons of Aaron to begin their ministries at thirty years old, and to leave them off at eighty, (see ver. 3. note 3.) is called a carnal commandment, because it regarded the bodily strength of the priests, as the only personal qualification necessary for their ministry. The truth is, the services of the tabernacle were so laborious, that none but persons of vigorous body could be capable of performing them.

2. But according to the power of an endless life, in which the service of Christ was to be established, (see Heb. viii. note 1.) was not necessary. They were intended for expiating not the bodies but the souls of the worshippers, and required vigor of mind rather than of body. Wherefore, possessing an endless life, our Lord was fitted made a Priest for ever. It is true, being a Sacrifice as well as a Priest, it was necessary he should die. But as he continued only a short while in the state of the dead, and arose never to die again, he may truly be said to have an endless life. Besides, it should be considered, that his life as a priest did not begin till after his ascension, when he passed through the heavens into the bosom of all the Saints, with the sacrifice of his crucified body: see Heb. viii. 5. note 3.; and having offered that sacrifice there, he sat down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, (viii. 1.) where he remains the minister of that true tabernacle, making continual intercession for his people: And thus sit- ted, in the heavenly holy place, a Priest for ever, according to the power of his eternal life.

Ver. 18.—1. Because of its weakness.—The weakness of the law in reforming sinners arises from this, that it required perfect obedience to all its precepts under the penalty of death, it gave the Israelites no encouragement to obey, either by promising them the assurance of pardon for their repentance in case of failure. The only source from which the Israelites derived their hope of these things, was the presence of an Advocate. And without this, the law was not a sufficient motive to obedience.

2. And unprofitableness.—Though the apostle affirms, that the law of Moses was unprofitable for the purpose of rendering pious men, it answered every moral end, which he has explained in his apostle to the Galatians, chap. iii. 21.

Ver. 19.—1. The after introduction.—Besa tells us, that the word υπερωνεστη, signifies the bringing in of a thing from a different quarter. But that translation does not express the force of the proposition—It is better to be compared with the following one.

2. Draw near to God.—Under the covenant of the law, the priests, by virtue of the Levitical sacrifices, but not the people, were permitted in their acts of worship to draw near to the manifestation of the divine presence in the tabernacle: but under the gospel covenant, by the sacrifice of Christ, all believers equally are permitted, in their acts of worship, to draw near to the presence of God in the great temple of the universe.

Ver. 20. Not without an oath.—The apostle's reasoning here is founded on this, that God never interposed his oath, except in the certainty and immutability of the thing sworn. Thus he refers to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 15—18. that in his need all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and to the rebellious Israelites, that they should not enter into rest. (Heb. iv. 4, 5, 6.)

1. Wherefore, since Christ was made a priest not without an oath that he should be a priest for ever after the similitude of Melchizedek, that circumstance showed God's immutable resolution never to change or abolish his priesthood, nor to change or abolish the covenant which he established on his priesthood, whereas, the Levitical priesthood and the law of Moses being established without an oath, were thereby declared to be changeable at God's pleasure.

2. If our Lord hath sworn, and will never repent of having made him a priest for ever, then his oath is a law which is immutable.

Ver. 22. The Greek commentators explain this word συνεκροτησαι as a priest.

Ver. 18.—1. Because of its weakness.—The weakness of the law in reforming sinners arises from this, that it required
At this passage a comparison is stated between Jesus as a High-priest and the Levitical High-priests; and as that comparison was justly considered by the apostles as the mediators of the Mosaic covenant, because through their mediation the Israelites worshiped God with sacrifices, and were received by him as his king and political paragon, in consequence of the sacrifices offered by the High-priest on the day of atonement, it is evident that the apostle in this passage calls Jesus the High-priest or Mediator of the better covenant, because through his mediation, that is, through the sacrifice of himself which he offered to God, believers receive all the blessings of the better covenant. And as the apostle had said, it that by the introduction of a better hope (p. 66, 10), we draw near to God, in this very verse, it stands, as Jesus 1πητης ε颧της; rather than 1πητης 1πητης, to denote the effect of his mediation. See verse 24. The word, indeed, following the Vulgate and Beza, have rendered 1πητης, by the word υπηρέτης, a sense which it hath Ecclesiast. xiii. 16, and which naturally enough follows from its etymological meaning. For the person who becomes a saviour for the good behavior of another, or for his performing something stupendous, brings that near to the party to whom he gives the security, he recognizes the two. But in this sense the word υπηρέτης is not applicable to the Jewish High-priests. For, to be a proper saviour, one must either have power to compel the party to perform that for which he has given his security, or, in case of his not performing it, he must be able to perform it himself. This being the case, will any one say that the Jewish High-priests were saviours to God for the Israelites performing their part of the covenant of the law, or to the people, for God's performance of his part of that covenant? As the apostle described the saviour of the new covenant as applicable to Jesus. For, since the new covenant does not require perfect obedience, but only the obedience of faith, if the obedience of faith is not given by men themselves, it cannot be given by another in their room, unless we suppose that men can be saved without personal faith. I therefore infer, that those who speak of Jesus as the saviour of the new covenant, must hold that it requires perfect obedience, which not being in the power of believers to give, Jesus hath performed it for them. But is not this to make the covenant of grace a covenant of works, contrary to the whole tenor of scriptures? For these reasons, I think the Greek commentators have given the true meaning of the word υπηρέτης, in this passage, when they explain it by τροφής, mediator.

24. Of a better covenant.—The common translation of τροφής, of a better testament, I think is wrong; for it implies that the law of Moses is likewise a testament, which it cannot in any sense be called, as shall be shown Heb. 1. 1. note 1. The apostle's reasoning here is to the following purpose: The covenants of which I speak, being founded each on its own priesthood, the covenant which is founded on a temporary priesthood must itself be temporary, and so never can be the means of conferring an eternal paragon; whereas the covenant which is established on an eternal priesthood must be eternal, and have the greatest efficacy at all times in procuring salvation for believers. See verse 20. note.

25. Hath a priesthood which doth not pass from him. Thus the apostle makes this remark on Christ's priesthood, because an office which is held for ever is held with the greatest efficacy, and is more efective than if it were held only for a time. See verse 25. note.

26. He offers, or sacrifices for a sinner always, for the sake of making intercession for them. The nature of the apostle's argument requires, that by Christ's 'always bringing,' we understand his always living in the body. For it is time

27. Besides, Jesus is our High-priest is more powerful than the Levitical high-priests in this respect, that they indeed are many priests, because they are hindered by death, from continuing in the office, but he, because he liveth for ever in the body, by his death, hebron 9. 24, note, hath a priesthood which shall never pass from him to any other person on account of incapacity.

28. On which account he is ever able to save all those who approach to God through his mediation; always living an High-priest (ver. 24.) to make intercession with God for them. When such an High-priest as Christ was suited to our exigencies, who being holy in affection, harmless in conduct, undefiled, separated from sinners, and higher than all the inhabitants of the heavens, the angels; he hath not, like the Levitical high-priests, need from time to time to offer sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the sins of the people. For himself he offered no sacrifice; and for the sins of the people he offered sacrifice only once, when he offered himself.

29. The sons of Aaron needed to offer sacrifice for themselves, because the law constituted men high-priests who have infirmity; but (1 p. 66, 10,) the word of the oath, which was after the law, constituted the Son an High-priest, fitted for executing the office for evermore, by his absolute freedom from sin, and by his endless life.
CHAPTER VIII.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries in this Chapter.

This apostle, in what goeth before, having showed that Jesus, as an High-priest, is superior to all the Levitical high-priests, in as much as, like Melchizedec, he is a king as well as a priest; nay, a more righteous King than even Melchizedec, being absolutely free from sin; he, in this and the following chapter, for the farther illustration of the glory of Jesus as an High-priest, compares his ministrations with the ministrations of the Levitical high-priests, both in respect of the place where he officiates, and in respect of the efficacy of his ministrations.

His discourse on these subjects the apostle begins with observing, that they are matters of greater importance to mankind as sinners, than any hitherto treated of by him; namely, that we have in Jesus such an High-priest as our sinful state required, and as he had described, chap. vii. 20. namely, an High-priest absolutely sinless, and greater than all the angels, who, having offered one effectual sacrifice for the sins of the people, even the sacrifice of himself, sat down at the right hand of the manifestation of the divine presence in heaven, ver. 1.—as the abiding minister or High-priest of the true holy places which the Lord hath formed and not man, ver. 2.—This sitting down of the Son of God, our High-priest, at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, after offering the sacrifice of himself, the apostle hath mentioned chap. 1. 3.; but it was only as a subject to be afterwards handled. He therefore introduced it in this place, in order to a full discussion; and calls it the chief of all the things he had hitherto mentioned, because it implied, first, That the sacrifice of himself which Jesus offered, on his entering heaven after his resurrection, was accepted of God as a sufficient atonement for the sins of the world. Secondly, The sitting of our great High-priest at the right hand of God implies, that he possesses all power in heaven and on earth next to God; so that he is able to defend the people for whom he officiates from their enemies, and is authorized by God to acquit and reward them at the judgment.—Thirdly, That our High-priest did not, like the Levitical high-priests, depart out of the most holy place after finishing the atonement, but abideth there always, as the minister or High-priest thereof, to open that holy place to the prayers and other acts of worship performed by his people on earth, and to their persons after the general judgment.

Of the first of these important matters implied in our high-priest's sitting down at the right hand of God, namely, that he offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, and that that sacrifice was accepted by God as a sufficient atonement for the sins of the world, the apostle treats in this chapter. Of the second, namely, that he possesseth power, as governor of the world, to save his people, and to give them eternal life, he speaks chap. ix. 28. And of the third, that he is the abiding minister of the heavenly holy place, he discourses chap. x. 19-22.

That Christ hath offered an effectual sacrifice for sin, the apostle proves in the following manner: Since every high-priest is constituted to offer both gifts and sacrifices, Messiah, who was constituted by the oath of God an High-priest after the similitude of Melchizedec, must of necessity have had some sacrifice to offer, ver. 3.—And that he must have offered that sacrifice in heaven is certain; because, if the oath of God had respected his being a priest on earth, he could not have been a priest at all: for the only temple of God on earth where he could offer sacrifice, being occupied by priests who officiated according to the law of Moses, which confined the priest's office to the sons of Aaron, Numb. iii. 10. these priests would have hindered Messiah, who was of the tribe of Judah, from ministering as a priest among them. It is plain, therefore, that if Messiah was not appointed to exercise his priesthood in heaven, and did not offer sacrifice there, he never acted as a priest at all; and the oath of God constituting him a priest, hath not taken effect, ver. 4.—Further, to prove that Messiah was to offer sacrifices in heaven, the apostle appealed to the services which the Levitical priests performed according to the law in the inward tabernacle, whose chief use, he tells us, was to be shadows or typical representations of the services to be performed by Christ in heaven. And this affirmation he founds on God's command to Moses,—to make all things, not the tabernacles only with their furniture, but the services of the tabernacles also, exactly according to the pattern shewed him on the Mount, ver. 6.

Next, with respect to the efficacy of Christ's ministrations as an High-priest, the apostle observes, that they are as much more excellent than the ministrations of the Levitical high-priests, as the covenant or dispensation of religion of which he is the Mediator or High-priest, by its better promises, excels the covenant or dispensation of the law, ver. 6.—which the apostle proves to be not without fault, from this circumstance, That if it had contained all the discoveries and promises which God judged necessary to the sanctification and salvation of sinners, he would not have introduced a second covenant or dispensation of religion, ver. 7.—Yet, that a second covenant or dispensation was to be introduced, is evident from God's own words, Jeremiah xxxi. 31-34. in which he promised a new covenant, ver. 8.—altogether different from that which he made with the Israelites after bringing them out of Egypt, ver. 9.—For in the new covenant, Judah and Israel are to have the knowledge of God and of his will set forth, not by dark shadows, as in the old covenant, but in the clearest manner. And the pardon they are to receive under that covenant, is not a political, but an eternal pardon. So that, as was observed ver. 8, it is a covenant established on better promises than the law, ver. 10, 11, 12.—Lastly, the apostle observes, that by saying a new covenant, God hath made the covenant of the law old, and thereby hath intimated, that, as a thing decayed and useless, it is to be put out of sight altogether, ver. 13.—Thus it appears, that the prophet Jeremiah, in the most express terms, hath borne testimony to the superior excellence of the new covenant or dispensation of religion, of which Christ is the minister, mediator, or high-priest; and to God's intention of abrogating the former covenant or dispensation, even the whole body of the law of Moses, with all its ineffectual sacrifices and services.—An argument of this sort, founded on their own scriptures, being so cogent, could not fail to make an impression on the unbelieving Hebrews; and must have concurred such of them to the gospel as retained any candour or love of truth.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VIII.—New, (ser) of the things spoken concerning the priest-Christ, the chief is, That in him we have such an High-priest, that the scribe is, in the manner the Syriac, 'Capitum autem seminum servatur' and the Vulgate, 'Capitulum autem super ver. 1.—1. The chief is 1.—So Chrysostom and Theophylact inter-priest as described chap. vii. 26, who, after offering the sacrifice of himself for us in the true tabernacle, sat down at the right hand of the majesty in the heavens, as having by that sacrifice made a complete atonement, and as an abiding minister of the real holy places, namely, of the heavenly tabernacle, which, being erected by the Lord and not by man, must be unapproachably more magnificent than the Mosiac tabernacle.

3. The sitting down of Christ at the right hand of God, as the minister of the true holy places, is a demonstration that he offered an acceptable sacrifice for sin in heaven. For every high-priest being constituted to offer both free-will offerings and propitiatory sacrifices, it was necessary that this High-priest, who was constituted by an oath, should have some sacrifice which he might offer in heaven, the only place where that sacrifice could be offered.

4. For verily if he were by the oath of God constituted a priest on earth to offer sacrifice, he, who was of the tribe of Judah, could not be a priest, there being, in the only temple of God on earth, priests who offer sacrifices according to the law, which limits the priest's office to the sons of Aaron.

5. Further, that Christ exercises his priesthood in heaven appears from this also, that these priests perform the service of the tabernacles with sacrifices which are representations of the sacrifice and intercession of Christ in heaven; as is plain from this, that Moses, when about to construct the tabernacle, and appoint its services, was admonished of God: See now, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern which was shewed thee in the mount.

6. Since Moses, when about to construct the tabernacle, was commanded to shew in the pattern, that he might see the things which he must offer in heaven, it is evident from the following verse, where we are told, that if Christ were constituted by God's oath a priest on earth, he could not have exercised his office; the priesthood in God's only temple on earth being by God himself limited to the tribe of Levi. From this it follows, that the oath which made him a priest, made him a priest in heaven, and authorized him to offer sacrifices in heaven. Also it follows, that the sacrifice which he was appointed to offer was not the sacrifice of goats and calves, for they could not be offered in heaven, but the sacrifice of himself. Accordingly, that he sacrifice he actually offered in heaven, by appearing before the throne of God in the body wherein he suffered, as shall be shewed, ver. 5, note 5; at the end. And that this was a real offering of himself a sacrifice to God, is evident from the apostle, who after offering death on earth, 'did not enter into the holy places made with hands, the likeness of the true tabernacle, but into heaven itself, there to appear before the face of God on our behalf.' And to show that, by so appearing, Christ offered himself a sacrifice to God, the apostle adds immediately, ver. 20, 'not, however, that he should offer himself after.' Wherefore, Christ's presenting himself in his crucified body before the throne of God, being a real offering of himself a sacrifice to God for us, we are told, Heb. x. 18, to be 'sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once.'

4. That the law in the law the priest's office was strictly limited to the sons of Aaron; and if any others intended themselves into it, they were to be put to death, Numb. iii. 10.

5. Wherefore, Jesus, being of the tribe of Judah, could not offer sacrifice in the temple of Jerusalem.

6. See also, Hebrews xx. 11, 12, "I will not again bear the burden of their sins," and, "I will not again go down to the earth." Wherefore, he sat down at the right hand of God, according to the ordination of Moses in the law of sacrifice and service, where it is said, 'In the presence of God and his senate,' that is, of his people, and the ceremonial service was performed, not by the will of man, as was that of the Levitical priests, but according to the will of God, as was the will of the Lord Jesus Christ, who was ordained of God to be the High-priest of the good things to come, Hebrews vii. 26.

6 Besides, Jesus our High-priest hath now obtained a more excellent ministry, in as much (xxi. 20,) as he is the mediator of a better covenant, which is established upon better promises.

7 For if that first covenant had been faultless, a place would not have been sought for a second:

8 But finding fault, he saith to them, Hold the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah;

priest in heaven. Accordingly the tabernacles are called, Heb. ix. 23, 24, 'the representation of the holy places in the heavens.' And as the holy places were made with hands, so also was the temple in the desert. And as the tabernacle was the type of the church, and the church is the true tabernacle of God, it follows that the temple was the type of the beginning of the kingdom, that is, the promises in the Old Testament.

6:7, 8. The true tabernacle and temple were at Mount Sinai and Jerusalem. The presence of that covenant was manifested by the cloud, which signified the out ward tabernacle, the present vessel, 9:23. The Holy Ghost signified that the way of access into heaven was not yet laid open, while the first tabernacle (that of the tabernacle of Aaron) was still in use, 9:10. The sinoffering was made for a perfect work, to the Lord, but not for his own sin, 10:10.

6:7. For if that first covenant had been faultless, a place would not have been sought for a second. If the first covenant had been perfect, there would have been no need of introducing a second covenant.

6:8. But finding fault, he saith to them, Hold the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the people of God. This promise is contained in Jer. xxxi. 31, Behold, the days come, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; there would have been no need of introducing a second covenant.
HEBREWS.

9 Even a covenant entirely different from the covenant which I made with their fathers, (2 Sam. xxvii. note) at the time of my taking them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt into Canaan, when they did not abide in my covenant, but brake it and violated it repeatedly by their idolatries. Therefore I neglected them; I suffered them to be carried into captivity; saith the Lord.

10 For, agreeably to my promise that in Abraham's seed all nations shall be blessed, this is the covenant which I will make with all nations in future times, saith the Lord: Under the gospel dispensation I will put my laws into their mind, and write them upon their hearts, instead of writing them on stones as under the former covenant; and I will be the object of their worship, and their protector, and they who believe shall become my obedient people, whom I will bless through all eternity.

11 And, comparatively speaking, there shall be no occasion for what was commanded under the former covenant, in which no constant public instruction was provided: They shall not need to teach each other to know the Lord, (Deut. vi. 8,) for all shall know me, from the least of them to the highest of them.

12 (Heb. 8.) Because! I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more.

13 By saying, A new covenant, (ver. 8;) he hath made the former old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to be laid aside as useless. Wherefore, by promising a new covenant, God hath intimated the abrogation of the whole Mosaic dispensation.

CHAPTER IX.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

To show that the Sinaitic covenant was justly laid aside, the apostle judged it necessary to enter into a particular examination of the religious services which it enjoined, and to prove that these were designed, not for cleansing the conscience of the worshippers, but to prefigure the services and blessings of the new or gospel covenant: so that, the latter being come, there was no longer occasion for continuing the former to prefigure... them. This chapter, therefore, is an illustration of chap. viii. 5, where the apostle affirms, that the priests worshipped God in the tabernacle 'with the representation and shadow of the heavenly services.' And it was proper to explain this matter copiously, because it must have had a great influence in weaning the Jews from the Levitical services, and in reconciling them to the abrogation of a form of worship, which, though of divine appointment, was now become useless, having accomplished its end.

The apostle begins with acknowledging that the covenant made at Sinai, of which the Levitical priests were the mediators, had ordinances of worship appointed by God himself, and a sanctuary which was a representation of the world or universe, ver. 1.—In particular, the outward tabernacle with its furniture, and the court belonging to it where the ordinary priests daily ministered, were so disposed as to represent the earth and the air, the habitation of men: And the services of that tabernacle, by sacrifices, washings, and other purifications of the flesh, were an example of the rites of worship which men perform on earth for procuring the pardon of sin and admission into heaven, ver. 2.—But the inward tabernacle, called the holy of holies, or most holy place, was so disposed as to be an image of heaven, the invisible habitation of Deity, ver. 3.—And in it was the ark of the covenant, and the pot with manna, and Aaron’s rod, ver. 4.—And the cherubim overshadowing the mercy-seat, or throne of God; over which, and between the cherubim, the visible glory, which was the symbol of the divine presence, rested, ver. 5.

The tabernacles being thus set in order, the ordinary priests entered daily into the outward tabernacle, performing the service of God, and directing all their acts of worship towards the symbol of the divine presence in the inward tabernacle, hidden from their eyes by the vail: So that the services of the outward tabernacles were a fit image of the worship which men on earth pay to the invisible Deity in heaven, ver. 6.—But into the inward tabernacle, the representation of heaven, the high-priest alone entered, and that only one day in the year; but never without blood, which he offered for his own sins, and for the sins of ignorance, ver. 7.—The Holy Ghost, who appointed this service, thereby signifying, that the way into the immediate presence of God in heaven, the true holy place represented by the inward tabernacle, is not opened to men by any worship offered on earth, nor while the present state of things, represented by the outward tabernacle, subsists, ver. 8.—Which constitution of the tabernacles, and of the worship performed in them, without consulting the concern of the time then present, when both gifts and sacrifices were offered; which could not make the offerer acceptable to the Deity, ver. 9.—because he worshipped only with meats, and drinks, and divers immersions, and rites whose efficacy was to cleanse, not the conscience, but the body of the worshipper, to fit him for the society of the people of God on earth; and which were imposed only until the worship of God should be reformed, ver. 10.—Thus, by the inefficacy of the services performed in the Jewish tabernacles, the Holy Ghost has taught us, that all the rites of stoning, and all the acts of worship which men perform on earth, have no efficacy in the way of merit, to procure for them the pardon of sin and admission into the presence of God in heaven.

Next, in opposition to the ineffectual services performed by the Levitical priests in the holy places on earth, the apostle sets the things which they prefigured; namely, the effectual services performed by Christ in the holy places in heaven.—These services he describes as follows: Christ being appointed by the oath of God, to procure for us the blessings of pardon and salvation, which are to be bestowed through his ministration in the greater tabernacle, ver. 11.—hath entered into the holy place of that great tabernacle, even into heaven itself, neither by the blood of goats nor of calves, but by his own blood or death; and through the merit of that great sacrifice, which he offered by the appointment of God, he hath obtained for us an everlasting remission of sin, ver. 12.—Now, that the shedding of Christ’s blood should have this efficacy, is most reasonable. For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, did, by the appointment of God, redeem the bodies of the offending Israelites from temporal death, and cleanse them in such a manner as to fit them for the tabernacle worship, ver. 13.—how much more reasonable is it, that the shedding of the blood of Christ, who in the whole of his obedience to God was faultless, should have merit sufficient to cleanse the conscience of penitent sinners from the guilt of works which deserve death, and fit them for worshipping God in heaven! ver. 14.—This passage being a description of Christ’s ministry as an High-priest in the true habitations of God, it may be considered as an illustration of chap. viii. 2, where Christ is called ‘a minister of the holy places, even of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man.’

The apostle had affirmed, chap. viii. 6, that Jesus is the Mediator or High-priest of a better covenant or dispensation than the law: But the proof of his assertion he deferred to this place, where it naturally comes in. For, having shewed that the death of Christ hath sufficient merit to procure for penitent sinners the pardon of sin, he subjoins,—For this reason, that his death is so meritorious, he is appointed by God the Mediator of the new covenant, that by dying to procure the pardon of the sins committed under the law of nature, believers of all ages and nations, the called seed of Abraham, may obtain the eternal inheritance, ver. 15.—Accordingly, to shew that the new covenant, in which pardon is promised to penitent sinners, is procured by the death of Christ, the apostle observes, that in every case where God entered into a covenant with men, he made the death of an appointed sacrifice necessary to its ratification; to teach sinners, that all his intercourses with them are founded on the sacrifice of his Son, ver. 16.—Wherefore, authorized by so great an example, men anciently made their covenants firm over dead sacrifices; in so much that a covenant was never of force, while the sacrifice appointed for its ratification lived, ver. 17.—Hence, not the covenant at Sinai was made without blood, ver. 18—20.

—Hence, likewise, the tabernacles when set up, and the whole vessels of the ministry, were at first consecrated for the worship of God, by sprinkling them with the blood of the sacrifices, ver. 21.—and ever after that, all these things were, by appointment of the law, annually cleansed with the blood of the sacrifices offered on the day of expiation. In short, without the shedding of blood, the law allowed no remission on the day of the annual stoning, ver. 22.—Wherefore, seeing God determined not to pardon sinners, nor to open heaven to them without the shedding of the blood of his Son, it was necessary for shewing this, that the Mosaic tabernacles which are the figures of the holy places in the heavens, should be cleansed or opened to the worshipers by the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as emblems of the sacrifice of Christ: But heaven itself was to be cleansed, or opened to believers, by the actual offering of that sacrifice of which the others were the types, ver. 23.—And this was the reason that Christ our High-priest did not enter into the Jewish tabernacles, but into heaven itself, not with the blood of goats and of calves, but with his own blood, now to appear continually, as our High-priest, before the face of God; and by so doing, to make continual intercession in our behalf, ver. 24.—To this purpose, however, it was not necessary that Christ should... offer himself often, as the Jewish high-priest every year made atonement for the sins of the people, by entering into the earthly holy places with the blood of the appointed sacrifices, ver. 25.—For, in that case, Christ must have suffered often since the foundation of the world. But now, at the conclusion of the Mosaic dispensation, he hath appeared upon earth to put an end to the typical sin-offerings of the law by the one sacrifice of himself, ver. 26.—And to the obtaining of his pardon, his dying once was sufficient. For, since God had appointed men to die but once, as the punishment of the sin of the first man, and after death to be judged but once for their own sins, ver. 27.—so Christ being once offered, in order to carry away the sin committed in the world from the beginning to the end of it, (ver. 26.,) that one offering is held by God as a sufficient expiation. And by virtue of that one sacrifice, he will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time on earth without offering any more sacrifice for sin; and he will thus appear to acquit and save his own people by his own sentence as judge, ver. 28.

New Translation.

CHAP. IX.—I. New verily the first covenant (see chap. viii. 7, note 2.) had both ordinances of (אֲהֵבָה וְעֵשֶׁב) worship, and a worldly holy place.

2. For the first tabernacle, which is called Holy, was set in order, in which both the candlestick, and the table and the shew-bread.

3. And behind the second veil (Exod. xxvi. 33, 34.) the tabernacle, which is called Most Holy, was set in order; (from ver. 2; see also ver. 6.)

4. Having the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant covered every where with gold, in which were the golden pot having the manna, and the rod of Aaron which budded, and the tables of the covenant;

Ver. 1.—I. The first covenant.—Many copies read here הַשָּׁבָע הָאָרֶץ, the first tabernacle, which is adopted in the printed editions. But, as that reading does not agree with ver. 2. HS. and Mill prefer the reading of the Alexandrian and other MSS. of good authority, which have הַשָּׁבָע, leaving the reader to supply 'אָרֶץ from the preceding verse.—This reading our translators likewise have adopted.

2. And a worldly holy place.—The Mosaic tabernacle is called כְּפִינְיָאָן בָּאִיר, a worldly holy place, not because it was a holy place on earth, and made of materials furnished from the earth, but because it was a representation of the world, or universe. This appears from ver. 20, where the tabernacle is said to be מַסֵּר בַּאֲרֵי, 'a representation of the holy places in heaven.' And from ver. 7, where the words מַסֵּר בַּאֲרֵי holy places made with hands are called מַסֵּר בַּאֲרֵי, 'types or (resemblances) of the true holy places.' This is confirmed by Josephus, who tells us, Antiq. II. c. 11. that the Mosaic tabernacles were figures of the universe; that the outward tabernacle, which was accessible at all times to the priests, represented the earth and the sea, which are accessible to men; but the inward tabernacle, from which the priests were excluded, represented the invisible habitation of the Deity. See Heb. iv. 5. note.—In like manner Philo, Leg. Alleg. lib. 2. says, 'the tabernacle was a shadow (מַסֵּר בַּאֲרֵי) of the original heaven.' It is true, this account of the tabernacles is not found in the writings of Moses. Nevertheless, since it was generally received among the Israelites, the presumption is, that it was discovered by God himself to Moses, at the time he showed him the pattern of the tabernacles in the mount. But, he this as it may, certain it is that this emblematical meaning of the tabernacles and of their services was adopted by the apostle Paul. For he tells us, Heb. ix. 9, 10, that by the absolute exclusion of the priests and people from the inward tabernacle, the Holy Ghost signified, that the way into heaven, typified by the holy place, was not open to mankind, whilst the first or outward tabernacle was standing; that is, while the earth, typified by the outward tabernacle, subjected—the emblematical meaning of the tabernacles, handed down among the Jews by tradition, seems to have led them to fancy, that every thing relating to the Levitical worship had an emblematical meaning likewise. For Josephus, Antiq. lib. III. c. 11. affirms, that the parts of the high-priest's robe were representations of the different parts of the mundane system. But, by these refinements, the Jews, and some Christians who follow them, have discreetly corrupted the ancient traditional account of the meaning of the tabernacles, and of their services.

Ver. 2. For the first tabernacle.—Here it is proper to observe, that the whole of the apostle's reasoning in this epistle concerning the Levitical worship, is founded on the original institution of the tabernacles and services by Moses, and not on the temple service, as supposed by some. See Hebr. xiv. 1. 2. and our Notes on Exod. xxv. 1. throughout.

2. The candlestick, and the table, and the shew-bread.—Though the apostle does not explain the emblematical meaning of the furniture of the two tabernacles, because, as he tells us ver. 8. it would have lengthened his discourse too much; yet that they had an emblematical meaning, may be gathered from the apostle's allusion, Heb. x. 9. note 3. in the emblematical meaning of the miraculous rendering of the vail of the temple at the death of Christ. Since, then, the outward tabernacle was a representation of the mundane system, we may suppose, with Josephus, that the seven lamps of the candlestick were emblems of the seven planets, whereby our world is inhabited; and that the table with the shew-bread placed on it, was a representation of the productions of the earth, by which the lives of men and beasts are sustained.

Ver. 3. And behind the second veil, which is called Most Holy.—This tabernacle represented heaven, not only because it is the glory of the Lord, or the place of the invisible, but that, when the veil was rent, it was a communication of the eyes of all who live on the earth.

Ver. 4. Having the golden censer.—The apostle may have learned from the priests, that the censer used by the high-priest on the day of atonement was of gold, and that it was led by him in the inward tabernacle, so near to the veil, that, when he was about to enter into the holiest, by putting his hand under the veil he could draw it out to fill it with burning coals, before he entered into the most holy place to burn the incense, agreeably to the direction, Levit. xvi. 12, 13.

2. And the ark of the covenant.—The ark was so called, because the tables of stone on which the covenant, that is, the ten commandments engraven by God himself were put therein, as a memorial of God's having spoken these commandments from Mount Sinai in the hearing of all the people. These tables of the law being as it were hidden from the glory of the Lord, which rested between the cherubim, by the cover of the ark called the mercy-seat, the tabernacle was thereby figuratively taught, that, in the exercises of the divine mercy towards sinners, the law will not be reformed after the manner of their justification: For, at the judgment, men shall not be tried by the rigor of law, but by the gracious new covenant, in which pardon is promised to the penitent.

3. In which were the golden pot having the manna, and the rod of Aaron which budded, and the tables of the covenant.—In the natural order of things, the pot was put into the side of the ark; and that the pot with manna, and Aaron's rod, were laid up before the Lord in the same manner, according to the Leviticus, Exod. xvi. 23. Num. xvi. 33. So that the whole being chap. IX.

And above it the cherubim of glory, overshadowing the mercy-seat; concerning which things we cannot at present speak particularly.

Now these things being thus set in order, the priests go at all times indeed into the first tabernacle, performing the services.

But into the second tabernacle the high-priest alone goeth once every year, not without blood, which he offereth for his own, and for the sins of the people; and into the holy place, not at all, but once in the year, in the day of atonement; for he offered for the sins of the holy place one offering, and for the sins of the tabernacle and of the priests that minister therein, and for the sins of the people 2

The Holy Ghost signifying this, that the way of the holy places was not yet laid open, while the first tabernacle still stood. (see chap. x. 19, 20. xii. 40. note.)

Which was (ὑποθέσεις) a parable, (see 142.) concerning the time which is present, during which both gifts and sacrifices are offered, which cannot, with respect to conscience, make him perfect, who worshipeth God

Thus united, and carried by the Levites at once, might be considered as the ark. The pot with the manna, and Aaron's rod, being placed before the testimony, stood full in the view of the cherubim, whose faces were turned toward the mercy-seat. By introducing these things into the inward tabernacle which represented heaven, and by placing them in the manner described, the Holy Ghost may be supposed to have signified, that in heaven the knowledge and memory of the divine dispensations to mankind, and of God's interpositions in behalf of nations and individuals, will be preserved, and be subject to devout contemplation, not only to the redeemed, but to the angels also, represented by the cherubim overshadowing the mercy-seat. Hence, in allusion to what was signified by the placing of the cherubim with their faces toward the mercy-seat, the apostle Peter, speaking of the sufferings of Christ and of the glory to follow, says, 1 into which things angels earnestly desire to look; 2 1 Pet. i. 12; and Paul, Ephes. iii. 10. That now to the governments, and to the powers of this world, the manifold wisdom of God is made known, through the church. 3

Ver. 5. And above it the cherubim of glory — Cherubim being the name of an angel of God; Gen. iii. 2; the figures called cherubim, placed on either side of the ark of the covenant, with the glory of the Lord resting between them, represent the angels who surround the manifest presence of God in heaven. Those who were there, therefore, were truly the cherubim of glory; that is, the cherubim which had the visible glory of God, in the inward tabernacle, resting between them. By this glory constantly abiding in the inward tabernacle, and by the figures of the cherubim, that tabernacle was rendered according to its pattern in heaven.

On supposition that the Mosaic tabernacles, in which the worship of God was performed according to a certain leaven, were a representation of the universe, it is probable they were set in order after the similarity of the celestial leaven. — That the whole universe is the temple of God; that in this vast temple, there is the most holy place, where the Deity resides, and manifests his presence to the angels who surround him; and that all the intelligent beings who inhabit this vast temple, are placed in it to be happy by worshipping the great Creator, each kind according to the faculties which they possess, Paul, canvill.

That the Deity resides in a particular part of the universe, where he makes his presence known to his intelligent creatures by some transcendent visible glory, is a notion which, as the Spectator observes, No. 693, has prevailed, not among the Jews and Christians only, but among the Greeks and Romans also, who spoke of their Jupiter as residing in Olympus surrounded with inferior deities, among whom the Muses were represented as singing around his throne. In short, the idea of the gods inhabiting a particular place, having prevailed among all nations, whether barbarous or civilized, the universal agreement of mankind in such a notion is, I think, a proof that they derived it from tradition, or that it is a distant resemblance. Either supposition shows its truth; and being confirmed by revelation, why should it be called in question?

In this most holy place, the habitation of the Deity, Jesus, after his ascension, entered, as the apostle assures us, ver. 12; and, by presenting his crucified body there, by the manifestation of the divine presence, called, the throne of the Majesty in the heights; the seat of the glory of the God of Israel, chap. vii. 29, and opened heaven for their reception in the body, after the resurrection and judgment, chap. xiv. 28, note. 1

Ver. 6. Premotion of that tabernacle, which consisted in the burning of the incense at the morning and evening sacrifice, in dressing the lamps, in removing the old and placing the new show-breath, which was a continued offering of the fruits of the earth to God for the whole congregation. Lastly, as the principal part of the service of this tabernacle, the priests brought into it the blood of the sin-offerings, and sprinkled them before the veil. Lev. iv. 6. At all other times they entered into it without blood; for the blood of the burnt-offerings was sprinkled upon the altar, Lev. i. 11.

Ver. 7. 1 Into the second tabernacle the high-priest alone goeth once every year. — From Lev. xvi. it appears that the high-priest entered several times into the most holy place on the day of atonement. Wherefore, must be understood to signify one day, rather than one time.

And the people's sins of ignorance. — The law of Moses enjoined those who had injured their neighbours, either by deceitful dealing, or robbery, or slaying, or perjury, to restore to the injured party all they had gotten by these base methods, together with a fifth part more; and, after such restitution, to offer the appointed trespass-offering to the Lord as their king, on which conditions they were to be pardoned, Lev. vi. 1-7. But this was only a political pardon, granted by God as the head of the Israelitish commonwealth, whereas, by the offender was freed from the civil consequences of the crime merited. Accordingly the atonement was made for him by the ordinary priests, God's ministers, by whom he was represented as king in Israel was carried on. The sacrifices offered by the high-priest on the day of expiation had a quite different effect. They were offered for the whole nation, to make atonement for the sin which they had ignorantly committed during the preceding year, and open the tabernacles to their acts of worship during the succeeding year. And to show this, the high-priest carried the blood of these sacrifices into the inward tabernacle, and sprinkled it before the symbol of the divine presence.

Ver. 8. While the first tabernacle still stood. — As both the tabernacles were destroyed long before this epistle was written, the first tabernacle must mean the thing represented by the first tabernacle, namely the present world; consequently the standing of the first tabernacle means the continuance of this world. Now, the thing which the Holy Ghost signified by the exclusion of the priests and people from the inward tabernacle as long as the outward tabernacle stood, was, that the righteous are not to be admitted to the immediate presence of God in heaven, till after the resurrection and general judgment, when this world is to be destroyed. — Further, by the rites of worship performed in both tabernacles, the Israelites were taught, that the true God, the only object of men's worship, though always present with them, is absolutely invisible to them while they remain on the earth; consequently, that the visible gods of the heathens, were all of them, without exception, false gods.

Ver. 9. — Which was a parable, — That is, signifies an information, either by speech or action, in which one thing is put for another. See chap. xii. 19. note 5.

Ver. 10. During which. — That this is the proper translation of εν αυτω, is evident from the gender of the pronoun, which does not permit it to stand for αντικειμενον, but for αποκαταστασιν, time. — The Alex. MS. and the Vulgate read εν υπερ ευς, in which tabernacle. And that reading our translators have followed.

3. Which cannot, with respect to conscience, make him perfect, — As Pierce remarks, Cerebral impurities, and all the effects of sin (bodily, mental) were done away by these gifts and sacrifices; but moral evils, which burdened the conscience upon which the soul of guilt was felt, could not be removed thereby. This doctrine Paul精平蒲注: Acts xiii. 39. — By him all who believe are justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.

10 But Christ being come, an High-priest of the good things which are to be through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this creation; 11 Using not the blood of goats and calves, but his own blood; 12 Sanctifying the flesh with the blood of Christ, and offering himself without fault to God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to work the living God.

18. Hence not even the first covenant!(see chap. viii. 7. note 2) was dedicated without blood.

19. For when Moses had spoken every precept (πάντα τὰ πράξεις) to the law to all the people, taking the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet woad, and hyssop, he sprinkled both the book itself, and all the people.

20. Saying, This is the blood of the covenant, which God hath commanded me to make with you.

21. (Ex. 24.) Moreover, both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the sanctuary, he in like manner sprinkled with blood.

22. And almost all things, (πάντα) according to the law, are cleansed with blood (μετὰ αἵματος), but without the shedding of blood there is no remission.

23. There was a necessity, therefore, that the representations indeed of the holy places (from ver. 24) in the holy covenant; and that in every other respect I differ from them in translating and in explaining this difficult, and, if I may be permitted to say so, this hitherto ill understood passage.

Ver. 19. Not even the first covenant. — In the original, the word covenant is wanting; and our translators, by supplying the word testament, have, as has the Syriac, the Septuagint, and the Latin Vulgate, and many commentators, misconstrued the verb of which the author is speaking, a testament; than which nothing can be more incongruous. See chap. ix. 15. note 1. The word testament is supplied not testament, but covenant.

[1] Heb. xx. note 1. — By using this word, the apostle perhaps intended to signify, that the Sinaitic covenant was a renewal of the covenant under which our first parents were placed at their creation. See Heb. viii. 7. note 2. However, as the common translation is sufficiently literal, I have retained it; though some, perhaps, may prefer Chrysostom's interpretation, ἡ θησαυρομενή συναγωνία, τὸ εἰς τὸ αἰώνιον οἰκονόμισθαι συναγωνίαν.

Ver. 20. — Every precept. — The precepts of the law which Moses read to the people on this occasion, were those contained, Exod. xx. xxii. xxxiv. as is evident from Exod. xxiii. 3.

2. The blood of calves and goats. — That calves and goats were sacrificed at the making of the Sinaitic covenant, may be gathered from Exod. xxiii. 8, where it is said, they offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings of oxen, (κρέατα ἐδόθη μέτα τοῦ), calved unto the Lord. For cattle of that sort, in their second year, may be called calves or oxen indiscriminately. See chap. xii. note 1. — And with respect to the goats, though they are not mentioned by Moses, yet as these animals were used in the annual solemnities, the apostle may have inferred that they were sacrificed on this occasion, as well as calves or oxen, or he may have been informed of it by tradition.

3. The high priest. — Because much blood was needed to sprinkle the people, it is supposed that water was mixed with it to increase its quantity, and that the apostle joined this, with the other particulars here mentioned, from tradition. — And it is necessary to observe, which in the eastern countries is a shrub, rendered the dispersion more easy. Besides, on other occasions, the blood of the sacrifices was ordered to be sprinkled in that manner, Lev. vi. 5.

4. He sprinkled both the book itself. — I suppose the book contained the precepts which Moses read in the audience of the people, Exod. xix. 7 and that it was laid on the altar and sprinkled, to represent God as a party to the covenant. This not being mentioned in the history, the apostle must have learnt it either from tradition or from inspiration.

5. And all the people. — In Exod. xix. 7, and that it was laid on the altar and sprinkled, to represent God as a party to the covenant. This not being mentioned in the history, the apostle must have learnt it either from tradition or from inspiration.

6. Nor the outward form. — In Exod. xx. 6, and that it was laid on the altar and sprinkled, to represent God as a party to the covenant. This not being mentioned in the history, the apostle must have learnt it either from tradition or from inspiration.

Ver. 22. — In all things. — This is an expression, because some things were cleansed with water, and some with fire, Num. xxx. 22. and some with the ashes of the red heifer, Nu. vi. 9. — And without the shedding of blood there is no remission. — This quasifinal expression is used, because some things were cleansed with water, and some with fire, Num. xxx. 22. and some with the ashes of the red heifer, Nu. vi. 9.

2. And without the shedding of blood there is no remission. — The apostle means, no remission granted in the day of atonement.

23. For because God would not admit sinners into heaven without shedding the blood of his Son, to make the law-servants sensible of this, it was necessary that the tabernacles, the representations of the holy places, should be purified. The reason which speaks here of the sprinkling of the tabernacle and vessels of the sanctuary, when they were first consecrated; the order for which we have Exod. xx. 9, and that there is a only appointed that they should be anointed with oil, yet Lev. xi. 29 where the execution of the order is related, we are told, not only the altar, but the altar, by putting blood on its horns, and by sprinkling it round about with blood, ver. 24, we may believe that the blood was sprinkled in like manner. Besides, Josephus, who was himself a priest, and who no doubt was informed by his predecessors, says expressly, Antiq. l. ii. c. 8. Hultsch, edit. "Moses consecrated for God's service the tabernacle and all the vessels of it, anointing them with oil, and the blood of bulls and rams." — Ver. 22. — 1. Almost all things. — This quasifinal expression is used, because some things were cleansed with water, and some with fire, Num. xxx. 22. and some with the ashes of the red heifer, Nu. vi. 9.

2. And without the shedding of blood there is no remission. — The apostle means, no remission granted in the day of atonement. Because some, who do not understand the nature of the law of Moses, fancy that a real portion of sin was obtained by its solemnities, it will be proper to inquire into that matter. The stonisms on the 10th of the 7th month were made for the people, and the effect of the stonisms made for the people is thus described! Lev. xvi. 30. "On that day shall the priest make an atonement for you; to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." But this cleansing of the people from all their sins could not possibly have any reference to the expiation of the transgressions of the law, which the priest could not have cleansed, whether perversity or not; consequently he could not be a cleansing the people's conscience, but was only expiating them from those civil penalties which God in the character of their chief magistrate would have imposed on them, breaking the laws of the state, unless these stonisms had been made. A remission of that kind all the people of the congregation might receive; and it was the only remission which a body so often received through the sacrifice mentioned. Besides, the shedding of the blood of beasts could have no influence in procuring an eternal pardon for sinners, in the way either of substitution or of example. Being void of reason, beasts are not capable of being punished; and the less, of being punished in the room of mankind. In like manner, beasts being incapable of sinning, their sufferings can never considered as examples of punishment. The apostle, therefore, had good reason to say, Heb. x. 4. "It is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins." Yet the shedding of their blood was fully prescribed in the Levitical ritual, as it prefigured the real atonement through which God was to forgive mankind their transgressions. From the inefficacy of the annual stonisms, made on the 10th of the 7th month by the high priest, to procure for the people the eternal pardon of their sins, it follows that the daily stonisms made by the ordinary priests had no greater efficacy in procuring the pardon of sins. The efficacy which the annual stonisms had in cleansing the holy places, is described. See note 1. on that verse.

Ver. 23. — 1. They must be cleansed. — The apostle speaks of the annual cleansing of the tabernacles, which was performed in the following manner: The high priest carried the blood of the appointed sacrifice into the tabernacle, where he sprinkled it on the mercy-seat seven times, and seven times before the mercy-seat on the floor. This is termed, Lev. xi. 6. "Likewise also he did for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel." By the same rite the tabernacles of the congregation, and the altar, ver. 10. But the tabernacles and altar being best
HEBREWS.

Holy places in the heavens, (see chap. ix. note 3), should be annually cleansed, that is, opened to the prayers and people, by the sacrifice of bulls and goats, as types of the sacrifice of Christ; but the heavenly places themselves, by a sacrifice more effectual than these.

24. (Or see, 93.) Therefore Christ hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, (whereas the images of the true holy places; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God, on our account.

25. (Or 16, 100.) Yet, however, that he should offer himself often, as the high-priest entered the holy places every year with other blood;

26. For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world; but now once, at the conclusion (two years) of the ages, he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offerings by the sacrifice of himself.

27. But as it is appointed to men once to die, and, after that, the judgment,

28. Even so Christ being once offered, (chap. viii. 3, note), in order to carry away the sins of many, will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time, without sin-offering, in order to salvation.

noble of moral pollution, their uncleanness must have been of a ceremonial kind, as it is expressed ver. 16, by their remaining among the people in the midst of their uncleanness; that is, contracted by the worship performed in them by the priests during the preceding year. Wherefore, the cleansing and purifying of these things imposed their being fain not to go forward in the service of God; and, in particular, that the tabernacles were opened to the prayers and other acts of religious worship, to be performed by the priests and people during the course of the succeeding year.

For, according to God's general design in giving the law, by purifying with blood these copies of the holy places in heaven, and in separating them from all the rest of his universe, he himself opened to them through the blood of Christ, that on account of the shedding of his blood, God hath from the beginning accepted, and will to the end of the world accept, the worship which passeth from men everywhere on earth offer to him; and that he will receive them into heaven after the general judgment.

29. But the heavenly holy places themselves, by sacrifices better than these.—The one sacrifice of Christ, by which heaven is opened, (see ver. 22, note.) The heavens being here meant, to give dignity to that sacrifice, the plural is used instead of the singular; for the whole creation everywhere taught, that Christ offered but once sacrifice, chap. x. 12.

30. The images of the true holy places. —And in the Mount, Moses had seen the ark, the type of this tabernacle, and of the services be performed in them, shewed Moses. Hence the tabernacles, with their services, which he formed according to that model, are called antitypes or image of that model; consequently images of heaven itself, and of the services to be performed by Christ as the high-priest of the heavenly holy places; of all which the model shewed to Moses in the Mount was a shadow or dark representation.

31. That Christ's appearing in the body in which he suffered death, before the manifestation of divine presence in heaven, was a real offering of himself a sacrifice for us, is evident from the apostle's adding, in the following verse, that it was not necessary that he should offer himself often, as the high-priest entered into the holy places annually. Wherefore, according to St. Paul, the manifestation of the Jewish high-priest in the Mosaic tabernacles from year to year was a continued emblem of Christ's entering once for all into heaven with the sacrifice of himself, and of his continually offering there for us by virtue of that sacrifice; and of his procuring us access to God.

And, for equally white on earth, together with the image of our sins and admission into heaven after the general judgment.

32. Not, however, that he should offer himself often.—The atonement made by Christ being founded on the sovereign pleasure of God, Heb. ii. 25, it was to be made according to the sovereign point of God. Wherefore, Christ having made that atonement only once, it follows, that no more atonement was required by God, in order to his pardoning the sinner, in all ages and nations. See the following note.—That Christ offered himself a sacrifice, not on the cross, but in heaven, by presenting his crucified body there before the manifestation of the divine presence, see proved Heb. vi. 3, note; and ver. 26.

33. For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world.—Such an atonement is not necessary to the pardoning of sinners, and to their admission into heaven, that Christ should offer himself in heaven once, that is, annually, as the high-priest entered every year into the holy places on earth with the blood of bulls and goats to make atonement for the people; because, saith he, in that case, Christ must often, that is, every year, have suffered death since the foundation of the world, which is absurd. It is reasoning merits the reader's particular attention, because it supposes two facts which are of great importance. The first, that the fall of Adam to the end of the world, no man will be pardoned but through Christ's having offered himself to God a sacrifice for sin. The apostle's reasoning evidently implies this. For if sinners may be pardoned without Christ's offering himself a sacrifice, his offering himself but once as would not be in itself so meritorious, and far less his offering himself often, as the apostle affirms. The second fact is, that in the apostle's reasoning is, that although Christ offered himself only once; and at that on the conclusion of the Mosaic dispensation, that one offering in itself is in no want of merit, and of such efficacy in procuring pardon for the penitent, that its influence reaches backwards to the beginning of the world, and forwards to the end of it, on which account Christ is with great propriety termed, Rev. xviii. 6. A Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, so that his atonement also in the foundation of the world, in this passage, is not to be taken strictly, because the necessity of Christ's offering himself once was, as it were, written in the very foundation of the world; this in the Mosaic dispensation, that one offering in itself is not mean, and of such efficacy in procuring pardon for the penitent, that its influence reaches back to the beginning of the world, and forwards to the end of it.

2. To abolish sin-offerings. —And this saith, this Greek word, as used to denote the removing or forbearing the service, is rendered away, sin, in this verse signifies sin-offerings, as it doth likewise ver. 25. See 2 Cor. vi. 21. note 1. After Christ offered the sacrifice of himself, the typical sin-offerings of the law being no longer of any use, were abolished. This great event was expressly foretold, Dan. ix. 24.

34. It is appointed to men once to die. —The apostle does not say appointed to all men once to die: Because man's access to God is open at all times, and he may approach to God in any manner at any time. But it is not said appointed to all men once to die: Because man's access to God is open at all times, and he may approach to God in any manner at any time.

35. To carry away the sins of many. —So I translate many. Surprising that the apostle alludes to the scope-good, "which bare all the impieties of the congregation unto a deep and abiding," if this word is translated bear the sins, as it is in I Pet. iii. 14. The meaning will be the same in effect; namely, that Christ was once offered to make atonement for the sins of many. 1. Pet. ii. 21. note 1.

4. Will, in them who wait for him, appear a second time. —The return of Christ from heaven to earth at the last day, is here compared to and regarded by the apostle as just the same thing as the coming of Christ to judgment, immediation to which the apostle refers in the next verse. It is the same thing as the coming of Christ to judgment, immediation to which the apostle refers in the next verse.
CHAPTER X.

In the preceding chapter, the apostle, for displaying Christ's dignity as a High-priest, having illustrated his affliction, chap. viii. 7. that the Levitical priests worshipped God in the tabernacle, with the representations of the services to be performed by Christ in heaven; also, having contrasted the inefficacious services performed by these priests in the tabernacle on earth, with the effectual services performed by Christ in heaven; and the covenant of which they were the mediators, with the covenant of which Christ is the Mediator; and the blessings procured by the services of the Levitical priests in the earthly tabernacle, with the blessings procured by the services performed by Christ in heaven; he, in the beginning of this tenth chapter, as the necessary consequence of these things, infers, That since the law contains nothing but a shadow, or emblematical representation, of the blessings to come through the services of the greater and more perfect heavenly tabernacle, and not these blessings themselves, it never can, with the same emblematical sacrifices which were offered annually for ever by the high-priests on the day of atonement, make those who came to these sacrifices perfect in respect of pardon, ver. 1. — This important conclusion the apostle established still more strongly by observing, that if these sacrifices had made the worshippers perfect in respect of pardon, they would have ceased to be offered; because the worshippers being once cleansed, that is, pardoned, would no longer have been distressed with the consciousness of their sins, and with the fear of punishment, ver. 2. — Nevertheless, that the consciousness of their sins as unpardonable still remained, even after these sacrifices were offered, is evident from this, that in the annual repetition of these sacrifices, the people's sins for which atonement had formerly been made, were remembered; that is, confessed as still unpardonable, ver. 3. — Moreover, in further proof of his conclusion, the apostle affirmed it to be impossible in the nature of things, that the shedding of the blood of bulls and of goats, creatures not capable of sinning, should, either as substitutions or as examples of punishment, (see Heb. ix. 22, note 2.) take away the sins of moral agents, ver. 4. — Wherefore, after the Israelites believed that the sacrifices of beasts were real atonements, the Deity, to shew them the folly of that notion, inspired the writer of Psalm xl. to foretell what his Son was to say to him when coming into the world to make a real atonement for the sins of men; namely this, The sacrifices of bulls and of goats, and the offerings of the fruits of the earth, though of thine own appointment, thou dost not command any longer, on account of their inefficacy, and on account of the superstitious use which hath been made of them: But thou hast prepared me a body, that I may die a real sacrifice for sin, ver. 5. — Whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings thou hast no pleasure in, now, ver. 6. — Wherefore I said, Behold I come into the world, to do O God, thy will, in bruising the head of the serpent, which is written concerning me in the beginning of the book of the law, ver. 7. — On these words of Messiah the apostle remarks, that having first said to God, Send forth thy Son, and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings which are offered according to the law, thou dost command, neither art thou pleased with them, ver. 8. — And next, seeing he hath said, Behold I come to do thy will, thou wilt, by dying as a sin-offering; it is, therefore, that God hath taken away his first commandment, the sacrifices of the law, and hath abolished these sacrifices, that he might establish his second commandment, pointing his Son to die in the human nature as a sacrifice, to render the sinless perfect in the dispensative, ver. 9. — By which second commandment, therefore, are sanctified through the offering of the body of Christ once, ver. 10. — From this memorable passage, the 10th Psalm we learn, that the only real expiation for sin which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his own Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices which he pointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly said and that under the gospel dispensation there might remain in the view of mankind no sacrifice having any pretension to take away sin but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God himself, as the meritorious cause of our pardon.

In what follows, the apostle applies to the sacrifices offered by the ordinary priests daily in the outward tabernacle, the argument by which he had proved the insufficiency of the sacrifices offered annually by the high-priest in the most holy place; namely, that the repetition of it them showed their inefficacy, ver. 11. — Whereas Christ, through the whole of his life, having offered but one sacrifice for sin, set down at the right hand of God, as having completely finished the expiation, and as taken possession of the government of the universe, ver. 12, 13. — Wherefore, by the one sacrifice of himself, Christ hath perfected for ever the sanctified; that is, hath obtained an eternal pardon, together with admission into heaven, for all them who have an interest in that sacrifice by faith and repentance, ver. 14. — This the Holy Ghost testifies in the before-mentioned account of the covenant of which Christ is the Mediator, ver. 15. — Where, among other things, God promises that the sins and iniquities of his people he will remember no more, ver. 17. — Now, where a complete pardon is granted, certainly no more offering for sin is needed, ver. 18.

Here the apostle concludes his admirable reasonings concerning the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ. But before we dismiss the subject, it may be proper to remark, that although the apostle's arguments are formed principally to show the inefficacy of the sacrifices of Judaism, yet being equally applicable to the sacrifices of heathenism, they must have been of great use for convincing the Gentiles, that those among the dii whom they had hitherto relied were utterly inefficient for procuring the favour of the Deity. — Moreover, the apostle having proved that the Levitical sacrifices and services blessings which were to come through the services of Christ in the heavenly tabernacle, and not the very substance of these blessings, it never ceases, with the same kind of sacrifices which the high-priest offered yearly for ever, make those who come to these sacrifices perfect in respect of pardon.

2. Since, if these sacrifices could have made the worshippers perfect in respect of pardon, being once offered, they would not have ceased from being once again offered because the worshippers, being once pardoned, should have had no longer uncleaness in their conscience on account of the sins for which the atonement was made.

3. Nevertheless, in these sacrifices annually repeated, and in the confession of sins made over the scape-goat, a remembrance of all the sins of the people was made, as not pardoned. Lev. xvi. 21.

4. Besides, it is impossible, in the nature of things, that the blood of bulls and of goats should procure the pardon of sins, either in the way of substitution or by example. (See Esai. vii. sect. 1. art. 2, 3 and Whitby’s note on Heb. x. 14.)

5. Wherefore, to show this, when coming into our world, Messiah said to God, ‘The sacrifice of bulls and of goats, and the offering of the fruits of the earth, thou dost not now command, but a body thou hast prepared me, that by dying I might make the atonement prefigured by these sacrifices.

6. The whole burnt-offerings, and the sin-offerings, appointed in the law, having become the occasion of superstition, thou art not pleased with them.

7. Then I said, Behold I come into the world, to do, O God, thy will, (suppose i) which is written concerning me in the volume of the book.

Ver. 7.—I. When coming into the world, he said—Because the apostle here affirms, that Messiah, when coming into the world, spake the 6th and the following verses of Paul; and because David could in no sense say that God did not desire sacrifice and offering from him, it is the general opinion that the Psalms is a prophecy of Christ, and that it cannot be applied to David at all. For though it be said, ver. 12, “Mine iniquities have taken hold of me,” these iniquities may be “the iniquities of us all,” laid on him by the Lord, Isa. lii. 6; so that they become his by imputation. Or, by a necessity of the case for the effect, they may be the sufferings which Christ bare for the sins of the world. To this sense the precedent and subsequent expressions in the Psalms naturally lead, ver. 11, “Innumerable evil have compassed me about.” Therefore my heart melteth me. This is Messiah’s coming into the world means has come from heaven into our world, we learn from himself, John xvi. 38. “I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world.”

Also he hath told us for what end he came into our world. Matt. xxviii. 11. “The Son of man is come to save that which was lost,” namely, by giving himself to the lost sinner; “in the courts of the Gentile country, through believing and obeying the gospel. Of this the continued possession of Canaan, secured to the Israelites by their obedience to the law, was a shadow. Wherefore, the good things which Christ hath obtained for believers, through his mediation in the heavenly tabernacle, being not procured, but only typified by the ministrations of the high-priests in the tabernacle on earth, it was fit that these shadows should be done away, as the things of which they were shadows were accomplished. Therefore the circumstance of their offering these sacrifices yearly, shows that the apostle had in his eye the sacrifices which the high-priest offered annually on the tenth of the seventh month.

Ver. 2.1 Would the apostle have ceased?—That this is the proper translation of the clause Mill has shewed; in which he follows Delitzsch and Theophylact, who affirm that it ought to be translated interrogatively. The Syriac and Vulgate want the negative participle here.

2. Because the worshippers, the people who came to the tabernacle to worship on the last of the seventh month, called the kaddish, ver. 1.

3. It is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.——Mich. viii. 7. The word kaddish properly signifies the head or top of a pillar; and sometimes the pillar itself, as the temple of Solomon has shewed on this verse. Hence it was used by the LXX. to denote a volume, or roll, not being of the cylindrical form. In the common translation of this verse, Messiah is represented as saying, “In the volume of the book it is written about me, Behold I come to do thy will, O God.” But as this speech is nowhere written in the book of the law, the translation which I have given, arising from the right construction of the Greek phrase, is more consonant to the sense of the word kaddish, which Mill has shewed, than any other

8 On the foregoing remarkable passage I reason thus.—The only begotten, who knew the will of his Father, (John i. 18.), on coming into the world, first having said, Certainly sacrifice, and offering, and burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, notwithstanding they are offered according to the law, thou dost not will, neither are pleased with;

9 Next, seeing he hath said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will; He taketh away the first WILL, (from ver. 10.), that he may establish the second.

10 By which will (is) that we are the sanctified, through the offering of the body (ver. 5.) of Jesus Christ once.

11 And indeed every priest standeth daily ministering, and offering often the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. (See ver. 2, 4.)

12 But he, having offered only one sacrifice for sins through his whole life, sat down at the right hand of God;

13 (To mean) Thenceforth waiting till his enemies be made the footstool of his feet.

14 (Ver. 93.) Wherefore, by one offering, he hath perfected (see Heb. v. 9, note.) for ever the sanctified. (53.)

15 And even the Holy Ghost testifieth this to us, (ver. 94.) according indeed to what was before mentioned; (chap. viii. 10, 12.)

16 This is the covenant which I will make with them after these days, saith the Lord: I will put my laws in their hearts, and write them upon their minds;

17 And their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more.

18 Now, where remission of those is, no more offering for sin is needed.

19 Well then, brethren, having (suggereos or adopted; namely, 'Then') I said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will (empty i) which is written concerning me in the volume (or, another translate συνέφασσε, in the top or beginning) of the book; namely, while alive. Ver. 8. Which are offered according to the law.—This clause is not in the Psalm; but it is added by the apostle, to show that, notwithstanding those offerings were originally of divine appointment, they were all to be laid aside when Messiah came into the world and offered himself as a sin-offering. Wherefore, that the reader may be enabled that they are the apostle's words, and not the words of the Psalm, they must be read in a parenthesis, before the clause, 'then dost not will,' to show that that clause refers to the four kinds of offerings mentioned in the Psalm.

20 Ver. 10.—Sanctified by the offering of the body.—The Levitical sacrifices were made by the frequent offering or sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifices in the holy places: But the sanctification of believers is made by the offering or presenting of the crucified Jesus Christ in heaven once, whereby his death on earth was manifested:—see chap. viii. 5. note 5. has part of the note.

21 Or Jesus Christ once. 1—Thus, by the express testimony of the Jewish scriptures, the apostle hath proved, that as the Levitical sacrifices were at first established by divine authority, so they are now abolished by the same authority. Also, that, by the express will of God, the sacrifice of Christ was appointed from the beginning the only propitiation for the sins of men. And it must ever be remembered, that the will of God is the true foundation on which any propitiation for sin can be established. Wherefore, since the death of Christ, God made the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, it being established on the foundation of his will, and secure from all the objections raised against it, either by erring Christians or by obstinate infidels, or on account of our not being able to explain the reasons which determined God to save sinners in that method, rather than in any other. See Heb. ii. 18. note 4.
HEBREWS.

CHAP. IX.

10 But Christ being come, an High-priest of the good things which are to be brought in the greater and more excellent tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this creation;

11 Hath entered once into the holy places (that is, the tabernacle), not once to offer himself without, but once to offer himself for us a holocaust, and an eternal sacrifice, (see Lev. xi. 25, 31.) and of calves, (Lev. iv. 2, 18.) but by his own blood, having obtained us an eternal redemption. (See Eph. ii. 13.)

13 For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer, sprinkling the polluted, (Num. xix. 9.) sanctify to the cleansing of the flesh,

14 How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without fault to God, set apart your conscience from dead works to work the living God? (See ver. 9, note 3.)

15 (καὶ ἐκ τῶν) And for this reason—of

Ver. 10—1. Only with meats and drinks—that is, worshipped only with sacrifices, which consisted of the flesh of such clean animals as might be eaten, and with the fruits of the earth; and both as compared with drink-offerings. Agreeably to this account of the gifts and sacrifices with which God was worshipped in the tabernacle, they are called ‘the meat of God’s house.’—In translating ἐσπαργασίαν, I have here followed Pierce, v. 2.—See hath this signification, Luke i. 20. Matt. iv. 4. Col. iii. 9.

2. Ordinances concerning the flesh.—ἀπεσπάστας, literally, ‘a breeder of the flesh;’ things of the flesh, not the spirit, righteousness.

3. Implyed. 1. All sacrifices cannot agree with αἰνεῖτε, which is in the passive case, we must with Pierce supply αἴνεσθε, which ordinances were laid on the Jews as a burden. Hence Peter said to the Jews, Acts x. 10, ‘Now therefore why tempt ye God, speaking of the spirit, but speak as men, according to the truth of the matter?’—These ordinances respecting the purifying of the flesh, were imposed and continued until the time of reformation, to show that all the gifts and sacrifices which were offered on earth, could not introduce the sinner, as a pardoned person, into the presence of the Deity.

Ver. 11—1. But Christ (ἐσπαργασίαν) being come. The particle ἐν, at the beginning of this verse, being used in its adversative sense, showeth, that the apostle was stating a comparison between the Levitical high-priests and Christ.

2. The high-priest of good things which are to be through the greater and more perfect tabernacle. In this translation I have followed the order of words in the original; because, in that order, they afford a sense suitable to the apostle’s design: which was to show, that Christ’s mission was so great, and Christ’s offerings so greatly superior to those of the sons of Aaron, both in respect of the tabernacle in which he officiates, and in respect of the efficacy of his ministrations. He officiates in the greater and more excellent tabernacle not made with hands, called, Heb. viii. 2, the true holy place which the Lord pitched and not man. And, the good things of which Christ is the high-priest or Mediator, are all the blessings included in eternal redemption. See ver. 12. These blessings are here said to be through the greater and more excellent tabernacle, that is, as I understand it, through the services of the greater and more excellent tabernacle which Christ as a High-priest performed; namely, his dying on earth, and his presenting his cruified body before the throne of God in heaven, as a sacrifice for sin. But Bess, Pierce, and others, read the first clause of the verse by itself, thus, ‘But Christ being come, an High-priest of good things to come,’ join what immediately follows with the beginning of ver. 14. In this manner, ‘through a greater and more perfect tabernacle hath entered into the holy place.’—understanding the greater and more perfect tabernacle, our Lord’s human nature. In support of this union, Bess saith, that his human nature may as properly be called tabernacle, according to the phrase used, as the막 on tabernacle, the holy of holies, or the holy place. For the same reason, Pierce saith, that Christ entered into the holy place through his own human nature as through a tabernacle. He entered into heaven clothed in his humanity, and not through a tabernacle; but, on that supposition, he did not carry his human nature with him into heaven.

12-13. And of calves.—Pierce observes, that the Hebrew word (Lev. vii. 3.) here translated calves, properly signifies bullocks of the second year; and that being so young, they might be called calves, which is the I.X.X. translation. Besides, we have ‘calves of a year old’ mentioned Micah vi. 6.; and the apostle in the following verse, calls this blood ‘the blood of bulls.’—See chap. ii. 18.

2. But by his own blood.—The essence of the sacrifice consisted in its death. But because its death was effected by the shedding of the animal’s blood, and was shewing by sprinkling it in the holy places, the high-priest was said to enter into the inner tabernacle by the efficacy of the blood, that is, of the death of the victim, manifested by its blood which he carried with him. In like manner Christ is said to have entered, as a High-priest, into the holy places in heaven by his own blood; that is, by the merit of his own sufferings taken completely. For he shed his blood when he suffered in the garden, when he was scourged, and when he was crowned with thorns, as well as when the nails were driven into his hands and feet on the cross, and the spear was thrust into his side.

3. Having obtained for us an eternal redemption—namely, from the grave, and from future punishment, followed by admission into heaven, there to live eternally with God in unapproachable felicity. These are the good things said, ver. 11. to be through the service of Christ in ‘the greater and more perfect tabernacle.’

Ver. 13. Sanctify to the cleansing of the flesh.—The things mentioned, sanctified the bodies of the priests, not by any natural accuracy, for they rather defiled them, but by the appointment of God, who, considering them as acts of obedience, was pleased to sanctify them, in order to restrain the civil punishment which, as their political ruler, he had a right to bestow on the polluted priests. Now, by this sacrifice the apostle intimates, that both by the appointment of God and by its own efficacy, antithetical to the procuring an eternal salvation to sinners. See Rom. vii. 1. art. 3, and Whiston’s note on Heb. x. 14. The sentiment expressed in this and the following verse observes attention, not only for its strength in the proof, but because it is a beautiful illustration of the apostle’s doctrine, Heb. viii. 7. that the Levitical services were all shadows of heavenly things. For, the sanctification effected by the legal rite, being the sanctification of nothing but the body, it was in a religious light of little use, unless in it was a representation and pledge of some real exaltation. Now what real exaltation of sin is there in the whole universe, if the sanctification of Christ is excluded? We must therefore acknowledge that the Levitical rites which sanctified the flesh, derived their whole virtue from their being, as the apostle affirms, figurative representations of the real exaltation which Christ was to make in heaven for sanctifying the soul of the sinner.

Ver. 14.—1. Who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself. A number of Mss. together with the Vulgate version, instead of οὖσαν μὴν εἶχεν κατά σέ, but the Nymphæus hath here, ὡσπερ οὐκ ἠκοίμητος εἰς αἰνεῖτε. Besides, the common reading is found in no Mss.—Christ is said to have offered himself through the eternal Spirit, because he was raised from the dead by the Holy Ghost, 1 Pet. i. 18.; consequently he was enabled by the Spirit to offer himself to God; that is, to present his human nature before the throne of God in heaven. See Heb. vii. 5.; note 6.

2. To worship the living God.—The living being is given to worship God, to signify the greatness of his power, which might deter sinners from approaching him in acts of worship, if they were not assured of pardon through the blood of Christ. Forgiving the blood or death of Christ this efficacy, was a proper reward of his obedience to death.
of the new covenant he is the Mediator or High-priest, by whom its death being accomplished for obtaining the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant, believers of all ages and nations, as the called seed of Abraham, (Rom. viii. 48, 49), may receive the promised eternal inheritance.

For where a covenant, there is a necessity that the death (in Isa. lx. 1) of the appointed sacrifices should be brought in.

17 For a covenant is confirmed with dead sacrifices, seeing it has never hitherto been in force whilst the appointed sacrifices lived.

Ver. 15-1. Of the new covenant.—See Heb. viii. 7. note 2. The word יְהוָה, here translated covenant, answers to the Hebrew word שָׁוא, which is used in the writings of the evangelists and apostles, except in the history of the institution of the supper, and in Col. iii. 22 and in the passage under consideration: In which places, copying the Vulgate version, they have rendered יְהוָה the word testament. Even עָנָס, the old testament, 2 Cor. iii. 7. 11. is in the King James, the first testament. Heb. vi. 18. must certainly be the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, as is evident also from Heb. x. 28. On this supposition it may be asked, 1. In what sense of the word is the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, with the required perfect obedience to all its precepts under the penalty of death, and allowed to no mercy by any sinner, however penitent, can be called a testament, which is a deed conferring something valuable on a person who may accept or refuse it as he thinks fit? 2. The word לֶאֱכָל, the transaction at Sinai, in which God promised to continue the Israelites in Canaan, on condition they refrained from the wicked practices of the Canaanites and observed his statutes, Lev. xi. 9. can in no sense be called a testament. 3. If the law of Moses is a testament, and if, to render that testament valid, the death of the testator is necessary, as the English translators have taught us, ver. 16. 1. the same arguments which were procured by the death of Christ, and are most forcibly noticed, it has any validity which as a testament it is thought to have received by the death of Christ, when he revived again on the third day.— 4. The things affirmed in the common translation of ver. 15. concerning the new testament, namely, that it hath a mediator; that that mediator is the testator himself; that there were transgressions of a former testament, for the redemption of which the mediator of the new testament died; and, ver. 16. 1. that the first testament was made by sprinkling the people in whose favour it was made with blood; are all things quite foreign to a testament. For it was ever in the practice of any nation, that a testament needed a mediator. Or that the mediator was the testator of his own testament? Or that it was necessary the testator of a new testament should die to redeem the transgressions of a former testament? Or that any testament was ever made by sprinkling theilogues with blood? These things have nothing to do with the New covenant. They had mediators who assisted at their making, and were sureties for the performance of them: They were commonly ratified by sacrifices, the blood of which were sprinkled on the parties. Where, if any former covenant was injured by the party, satisfaction was given at the making of a second covenant. 5. By calling Christ the mediator of the new testament, our thoughts are turned away entirely from the view which the scriptures give us of his death as a sacrifice for sin: Whereas, if he is called the Mediator of the new covenant, which is the true translation of נְשָׂעַת וְשַׁעַר, that appellation directly suggests to us, that the new covenant was procured and ratified by his death as a sacrifice for sin. Accordingly Jesus, on account of his being made a priest by the oath of God, is said to be 'the Priest or Mediator of a better covenant' than that of which the written covenants were the mediators—1. I know that the Greek Lexicon commonly signifies a testament; yet since that is a word of a secondary translation, 2. I mean, the word τίμημα, from τίμω, signifies a covenant. The word יְהוָה, in writing Greek, should have been rendered נְשָׂעַת וְשַׁעַר, in the sense of the ancient, and probably properly signifies a covenant, by the word יַכְבִּד, in writing Greek, that word should have been rendered ἐξανατολησθέν, for the ancients have acknowledged by their version of Heb. x. 16. To conclude, nobody need be perplexed by the consideration. For the first covenant may be translated a covenant, and seeing, when so translated, these verses make better sense, I am sensible of no inconvenience in the scope of the apostle's reasoning, than if it were translated a testament, we can be at no loss to know which translation of יָכְבִּד in these verses ought to be preferred. Nevertheless, the absurdity of a phraseology in which the readers have been long accustomed, without attending distinctly to its meaning, I am sensible of no inconvenience. The apostle having, in ver. 15. showed that Christ's death was necessary as a new covenant, the Mediator, that is the procurer and ratifier of the new covenant, be in the 16th and 17th verses observed, that since God's covenants with men were all ratified by sacrifice, to shew that his intercourse with them are founded on the sacrifice of his Son, it was necessary that the sacrifice of his Son, which the apostle has observed might be made for him, and should be ratified by his Son's actually dying as a sacrifice.

The faithfulness of the common translation of the 16th, 17th, 18th, 20th, and 21st verses of this chapter appearing to me to be a matter of no small importance, inasmuch as this part of the apostle's subject has not been so well attended to, I have thought it necessary to make that observation.
18 Hence not even the first covenant! (see chap. viii. 7. note 2) was dedicated without blood.

19 For when Moses had spoken every precept (verse 22) in the law to all the people, taking the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet powder, and boughs, he sprinkled both the book itself, and all the people.

20 Saying, This is the blood of the covenant, which God hath commanded me to make with you.

21 (Lev. 10.) Moreover, both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry, he in like manner sprinkled with blood.

22 And almost! all things, (verse 23) according to the law, are cleansed with blood: (see verse 23, note 1) and without the shedding of blood there is no remission.

23 There was a necessity, therefore, that (see verse 24) the representations instead of the holy places (from verse 24) in the heavens; and that in every other respect it differ from him, both in its outward appearance, in the manner of its setting forth, and, it may be permitted to say, in this, that thereby it was made unapproachable.

24 Ver. 18. Not even the first covenant. — In the original, the word covenant is wanting; and our translators, by supplying the word covenant, when not found in the Ninth Covenant, or law of Moses, of which the apostle is speaking, a testament; that is, that which could not be more incongruous. See chap. 12. note 1. The word to be supplied is not testament, but covenant.

25 For almost! all things, (verse 25) being hallowed, were hallowed by being consecrated in the blood of those who were sacrificed.

26 For nothing is purified without blood; and it is the blood of Jesus that purifies us from every sin.

27 Ver. 19. Every precept, etc. — The precepts of the law which Moses read to the people on these occasions, were those contained in Exodus xx. xxii. xxiii. xxiv. as is evident from Exodus xxiv. 5. The blood of calves and goats. — That calves and goats were sacrificed at the making of the Mosaic covenant, may be gathered from Exodus xxiv. 5, where it is said, they offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings of corn, (LXX. φιλοθείαν καὶ προσφορὰν, calves), into the Lord. For cattle of that sort, in their second year, may be called calves or oxen indifferently. See chap. 12. note 1. And with respect to the people, though they are not mentioned by name, yet as these animals were used in the annual sacrifices, the apostles may have inferred that they were offered on these occasions, as well as calves or oxen, or he may have been informed of it by tradition.

28 Ver. 20. Blood and water. — Because much blood was needed to sprinkle the people, it is supposed that water was brought with it, in proportion to the quantity of the former. And the apostle adds, saying with the other particulars mentioned, from tradition. — Wool and hyssop, which in the eastern countries is a shrub, rendered the dirt unpolluted; and from this doctrine, on other occasions, the blood of the sacrifices was ordered to be sprinkled in that manner. Lev. xxvi. 6. 8.

29 He sprinkled both the book itself. — I suppose the book containing the precepts which Moses read to the people, 'Exodus xx. 7. and that it was laid on the altar and sprinkled to represent God as a party to the covenant. This not being mentioned in the history, the apostle has made it appear either from tradition or from inspiration.

30 And all the people. — In Exodus it is the people. Neither of these expressions, however, means, that every individual Israelite was sprinkled; but that those who stood round the altar, and nearest to Moses, were sprinkled, and that this was considered as a sprinkling of the whole. Or, since we are told, release and sprinkled, as if when covenants were made, they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, we may suppose the covenant at Sinai was made in the same manner; and that the people, or some of each tribe, passed between the parts of the sacrifices, and were sprinkled as they passed, in token that they all consented to the covenant.

31 Ver. 20. This is the blood of the covenant. — In allusion to these words of Moses, where it is said, he sprinkled the memory of his dying as the sacrifice by which the new covenant is ratified, he said, "This is my blood of the new covenant which is shed for many, for the remission of sins." Where, in representing Christ's death as a sacrifice for procuring the remission of sins, he applied it, as if sprinkled on the mercy-seat seven times, and seven times before the mercy-seat on the floor. This is in accordance, Lev. xix. 30. As the blood of the new covenant, Paul followed his Master, when he called Christ's blood, Heb. xii. 28. The blood of this covenant, which we are sanctified as being fit to appear in the presence of God as pardoned persons.

32 Ver. 21. Because from the beginning God ratified his covenant by sacrifice, to preserve among men the expectation of the sacrifice of his Son, hence not even the covenant of Sinai was made without sacrifice. Ver. 22. For when Moses had read every precept in the book to all the people, taking the blood of the calves and goats, which had been offered as the sacrifices of ratification, with water, and scarlet, and boughs, he sprinkled both the book itself, and all the people, in token of the consent of both parties to the covenant. Ver. 23. Saying, while he sprinkled the people. This is the blood whereby the covenant which God hath commanded me to make with you is ratified, both on his part and on yours. See verse 15. note 1.

34 Moreover, to prefigure the efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ to render his acts of worship acceptable, both the tabernacle, and the altar, and the mercy-seat, and all the vessels into which Moses in like manner sprinkled with blood, after they were made and set in order. Ver. 24. And, for the same reason, almost all things, according to the law, are annually fit for the worship of God by sprinkling them with blood. See Lev. xvi. 16. 19. 33. In short, to show that pardon is procured through the blood of Christ, without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin granted by the law. Ver. 25. Seeing God would not admit sinners into heaven without shedding the blood of his Son, to make the Israelites sensible of this, it was necessary that the tabernacles, the representations of the temple.

35 Ver. 21. He in like manner sprinkled with blood. — The apostle speaks here of the sprinkling of the tabernacle and vessels of the ministry, when they were first consecrated, the order for which we have Exodus xiii. 9. And thorough it is only appointed that they should be anointed with oil, yet Lev. xvi. 15. where the execution of the order is related, we are told the altar is sprinkled with blood by pouring blood on its horns, and by sprinkling it round about with blood; ver. 26, we may believe all the other vessels were purified in like manner. Besides, Josephus, who was himself a priest, and who no doubt was informed by his proconsul as rayon, Annu. ib. c. 8. Jou. ed. — Moses consecrated for God's service the tabernacle and all the vessels of it, anointing them with oil and the blood of bulls and rams. See verse 25—2. Almost all things. — This qualified expression is used, because some things were cleansed with water, as one with fire, Num. xxxi. 22. and some with the ashes of the red heifer, Num. xvi. 19—20.

36 Ver. 22. And without the shedding of blood there is no remission. — The apostle means, no remission granted on the day of atonement, because some who do not understand the nature of the law of Moses, deny that a real pardon of sin was obtained by its sacrifices, it will be proper to inquire into that matter. The atonements on the tenth of the seventh month were made for the people, and for the holy place. And the effect of the atonement there made for the people is thus described: Lev. xvi. 30. 'On that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you from all your sins before the Lord.' But this cleansing of the people from all their sins could not possibly have any reference to the punishments of the life to come, because the atonement was made for all the people of the congregation, and, as it is said, Lev. xvi. 14, that the blood of the animals were used in the annual atonement, the priests may have inferred that they were offered on this occasion, as well as calves or oxen, or he may have been informed of it by tradition. For because much blood was needed to sprinkle the people, it is supposed that water was brought with it, in proportion to the quantity of the former. And the apostle adds, saying with the other particulars mentioned, from tradition, — Wool and hyssop, which in the eastern countries is a shrub, rendered the dirt unpolluted; and from this doctrine, on other occasions, the blood of the sacrifices was ordered to be sprinkled in that manner. Lev. xvi. 4. 8.

37 Ver. 23. He sprinkled both the book itself. — I suppose the book containing the precepts which Moses 'read in the audience of the people,' Exodus xx. 7, and that it was laid on the altar and sprinkled, to represent God as a party to the covenant. This not being mentioned in the history, the apostle has made it appear either from tradition or from inspiration.

38 Ver. 24. And all the people. — In Exodus it is the people. Neither of these expressions, however, means, that every individual Israelite was sprinkled; but that those who stood round the altar, and nearest to Moses, were sprinkled, and that this was considered as a sprinkling of the whole. Or, since we are told, release and sprinkled, as if when covenants were made, they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, we may suppose the covenant at Sinai was made in the same manner; and that the people, or some of each tribe, passed between the parts of the sacrifices, and were sprinkled as they passed, in token that they all consented to the covenant.

39 Ver. 25. This is the blood of the covenant. — In allusion to these words of Moses, where it is said, he sprinkled the memory of his dying as the sacrifice by which the new covenant is ratified, he said, 'This is my blood of the new covenant which is shed for many, for the remission of sins.' Where, in representing Christ's death as a sacrifice for procuring the remission of sins, he applied it, as if sprinkled on the mercy-seat seven times, and seven times before the mercy-seat on the floor. This is in accordance, Lev. xix. 30. As the blood of the new covenant, Paul followed his Master, when he called Christ's blood, Heb. xii. 28. The blood of this covenant, which we are sanctified as being fit to appear in the presence of God as pardoned persons.
HEBREWS.

Holy places in the heavens, (see chap. ix. 1. note 2.), should be annually cleansed, that is, opened to the priests by the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as types of the sacrifice of Christ; but the heavenly holy places themselves, by a sacrifice more effectual than these.

24. Therefore Christ, our High-priest, hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, (arrows) the images of the true HOLY PLACES; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God, on our account.

20. (v. 16.) Not, however, that he should offer himself often, as the high-priest entered into the holy places every year with other blood.

21. For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but that this was not necessary, appears from the fact itself; for now once, at the conclusion (true sum) of the ages, he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offerings2 by the sacrifice of himself.

22. And, as far as he is appointed to men once to die, and, after that, the judgment,

23. Even so Christ being once offered, (chap. vii. 3. note), in order to carry away the sins of many, will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time, without sin-offering, in order to salvation,

24. For the uncleanness of the holy places, (see v. 11., note), must be cleansed by these SACRIFICES; but the holy places themselves, by sacrifices better than these.

25. (v. 27.) Therefore Christ hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, (arrows) the images of the true HOLY PLACES; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God, on our account.

26. For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but this was not necessary, appears from the fact itself; for now once, at the conclusion (true sum) of the ages, he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offerings by the sacrifice of himself.

27. And, as far as he is appointed to men once to die, and, after that, the judgment,

28. Even so Christ, being once offered in order to carry away the guilt of the sins of many, justice required no more sin-offering for them: and therefore he will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time on earth, without dying as a sin-offering, in order to salvation, and to be revealed to them in judgment and in mercy, to bestow on them the kingdom and the judgment, to bestow on them the kingdom and the mercy.

29. For the uncleanness of the holy places, (see v. 11., note), must be cleansed by these SACRIFICES; but the holy places themselves, by sacrifices better than these.

30. (v. 27.) Therefore Christ hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, (arrows) the images of the true HOLY PLACES; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God, on our account.

31. For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but this was not necessary, appears from the fact itself; for now once, at the conclusion (true sum) of the ages, he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offerings by the sacrifice of himself.

32. And, as far as he is appointed to men once to die, and, after that, the judgment,

33. Even so Christ, being once offered in order to carry away the guilt of the sins of many, justice required no more sin-offering for them: and therefore he will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time on earth, without dying as a sin-offering, in order to salvation, and to be revealed to them in judgment and in mercy, to bestow on them the kingdom and the judgment, to bestow on them the kingdom and the mercy.

34. For the uncleanness of the holy places, (see v. 11., note), must be cleansed by these SACRIFICES; but the holy places themselves, by sacrifices better than these.

35. (v. 27.) Therefore Christ hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, (arrows) the images of the true HOLY PLACES; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God, on our account.
The latter, after coming out of the most holy place, made a new anointing, in the presence of the people, for himself and for the people, Lev. xxvii. 31, which showed, that the former anointing was not real, but only typical; whereas Jesus, after having made anointing in heaven with his own blood, will not return to the earth for the purpose of making himself a sacrifice a second time: but, having procured an eternal redemption for his people by the sacrifice of himself once offered, he will return for the purpose of declaring to them who wait for him, that they are pardoned, and of bestowing on them the great blessing of eternal life. Which aboulution and reward he, being surrounded with the glory of his Father, Matt. xxvii. 51, will give in the presence of the assembled universe, both as their king and their priest. And this is the great salvation which Christ himself began to preach, and which was confirmed to the world by them who heard him, Heb. ii. 3.

The form in which the high-priest and the ordinary priests were to cleanse the people after burning the incense in the tabernacle, is prescribed Num. vi. 25—28. And that he did so, after the people after they burned the incense, we learn from Luke i. 8, where it is said, while Zacharias executed the office of a priest in the order of their course. According to the custom of the priest's order, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. 10. And the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of incense. 27. And the people waited for Zacharias; and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple—; they waited to receive from him the prescribed blessing.

CHAPTER X.

In the preceding chapter, the apostle, for displaying Christ's dignity as an High-priest, having illustrated his affirmation, chap. viii. 7, that the Levitical priests worshipped God in the tabernacle, with the representations of the services to be performed by Christ in heaven; also, having contrasted the ineffectual services performed by these priests in the tabernacle on earth, with the effectual services performed by Christ in heaven; and the covenant of which they were the mediators, with the covenant of which Christ is the Mediator; and the blessings procured by the services of the Levitical priests in the earthly tabernacles, with the blessings procured by the services performed by Christ in heaven; he, in the beginning of this tenth chapter, as the necessary consequence of these things, infers, That since the law contained nothing but a shadow, or emblematical representation, of the blessings to come through the services of the greater and more perfect heavenly tabernacle, and not these blessings themselves, it never can, with the same emblematical sacrifices which were offered annually for ever by the high-priests on the day of atonement, make those who came to these sacrifices perfect in respect of pardon, ver. 1.—This important conclusion the apostle established still more strongly by observing, that if these sacrifices had made the worshippers perfect in respect of pardon, they would have ceased to be offered; because the worshippers being once cleansed, that is, pardoned, would no longer have been distressed with the consciousness of their sins, and with the fear of punishment, ver. 2.—Nevertheless, that the consciousness of their sins as unpardoned still remained, even after these sacrifices were offered, is evident from this, that in the annual repetition of these sacrifices, the people's sins for which atonement had formerly been made, were remembered; that is, confessed as still unpardoned, ver. 3.—Moreover, in further proof of his conclusion, the apostle affirmed it to be impossible in the nature of things, that the shedding of the blood of bulls and of goats, creatures not capable of sinning, should, either as substitutions or as examples of punishment, (see Heb. ix. 25, note 3,) take away the sins of moral agents, ver. 4.—Wherefore, after the Israelites believed that the sacrifices of beasts were real atonements, the Deity, to shew them the folly of that notion, inspired the writer of Psalm cx. to foretell what his Son was to say to him when coming into the world to make a real atonement for the sins of men; namely this, The sacrifices of bulls and of goats, and the offerings of the fruits of the earth, though of thine own appointment, thou dost not command any longer, on account of their ineffectuality, and on account of the superstitious use which hath been made of them: But thou hast prepared me a body, that I may die a real sacrifice for sin, ver. 5.—Whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings thou hast no pleasure in now, ver. 6.—Wherefore I said, Behold I come into the world, to do, O God, thy will, in bruising the head of the serpent, which committed mischief in the beginning of the book of the law, ver. 7.—On these words of Moses the apostle remarks, that having first said to God, Sacrifice, and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, which are offered according to the law, thou dost not command, neither art thou pleased with them, ver. 8.—And next, seeing he had said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will, by dying as a sin-offering; it is evident that God hath taken away his first command appointing the sacrifices of the law, and hath abolished these sacrifices, that he might establish his second command, appointing his Son to die in the human nature as a sin-offering, to render the malicious purpose of the devil abortive, ver. 9.—By which second command, therefore, we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once, ver. 10.—From this memorable passage of the 21st Psalm we learn, that the only real expiation for sin which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices which he appointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly laid aside, that under the gospel dispensation there might remain in the view of mankind no sacrifice having any pretension to take away sin but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God himself, as the meritorious cause of our pardon.

In what follows, the apostle applied to the sacrifices offered by the ordinary priests daily in the outward tabernacle, the argument by which he had proved the inefficacy of the sacrifices offered annually by the high-priest in the most holy place; namely, that the repetition of them showed their inefficacy, ver. 11.—Whereas Christ, through the whole of his life, having offered but one sacrifice for sin, sat down at the right hand of God, as having completely finished the expiation, and as taken possession of the government of the universe, ver. 12, 13.—Wherefore, by the one sacrifice of himself, Christ hath perfected for ever the sanctified; that is, hath obtained an eternal pardon, together with admission into heaven, for all them who have an interest in that sacrifice by faith and repentance, ver. 14.—This the Holy Ghost testifies in the before-mentioned account of the covenant of which Christ is the Mediator, ver. 15.—where, among other things, God promises that the sins and iniquities of his people he will remember no more, ver. 17.—Now, where a complete pardon is granted, certainly no more offering for sin is needed, ver. 18.

Here the apostle concludes his admirable reasoning concerning the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ. But, before we dismiss the subject, it may be proper to remark, that although the apostle's arguments are formed principally to shew the inefficacy of the sacrifices of Judaism, yet being equally applicable to the sacrifices of heathenism, they must have been of great use for convincing the Gentiles, that those atonements on which they had hitherto relied were utterly ineffectual for procuring the favour of the Deity.—Moreover, the apostle having proved that the Levitical sacrifices and offerings were instituted to be representations of the sacrifices which Christ was to offer, and of the services which he was to perform in heaven, may we not infer, that the sacrifices of beasts were instituted by God at the beginning of the world for the same purpose? See Heb. xi. 4. note 4. And therefore, although these sacrifices could not take away sin, the appointment of them at the beginning, and the regulation of them afterwards in the Levitical ritual, were matters not unworthy of God: Being shadows of the priesthood, sacrifices, and intercession of Christ, they preserved the knowledge and expectations of these great subjects among mankind, and more especially among the Israelites. Besides, when Christ, the High-priest appointed by the oath of God, actually came, a great lustre of evidence was thrown on his character and ministries, by their having been prefigured in the Levitical institutions.—In short, though the apostle had denied that the sacrifices of the law were real stonements, yet, by shewing the Jewish institutions in their true light, he hath preserved to them their whole importance; and by comparing them with the better institutions of the gospel, he hath made us sensible how preferable the substance is to the shadow, which therefore was with propriety done away under the gospel.

The apostle having finished the doctrinal part of his letter, proceeds, in the remaining part, to shew what influence the belief of Christ's dignity and power as the Son of God, and of the efficacy of his mediation as the Apostle and High-priest of our confession, ought to have on our temper and conduct. Having by the sacrifice of himself not only made a sufficient stonement for our sins, but procured for us the new covenant, we have, through the blood of Jesus, boldness in death, which is now become the entrance into the true holy places where God dwelleth, ver. 19.—This entrance Jesus hath made for us, a way new and living into the holy place, the habitation of God, through the veil of his flesh: so that death, instead of leading us away for ever from the presence of God, as it was originally intended to do, carries us into his presence to live with him eternally in unseparable happiness. Wherefore, being a new and living way into the presence of God, death is stripped of all its terrors; and believers need not be afraid to die, ver. 20.—Also, having now a great Priest, always residing in heaven, the true Aaron or temple of God, to present the prayers and other acts of worship which we offer on earth, ver. 21.—we ought to approach God with a truly devout heart, in the full assurance of being accepted through the mediation of Christ, so be our hearts are cleansed by repentance from an evil conscience, ver. 22.—Besides, our bodies having been washed with the pure water of baptism, we ought to hold fast that confession, for Christ which we then so solemnly made, without regarding the evils which such a confession may bring on us, ver. 23.—And when in danger of being drawn away from the profession of the gospel, by the false reasonings and corrupt example of unbelievers, we should consider attentively the behaviour of our brethren, who have suffered for their faith and for their love to Christ and to his people, that we may excite one another to love and good works, ver. 24.—and should not, through the fear of our persecutors, leave off the assembling of ourselves together for the worship of God, as the custom of some is; but rather shew one another to persevere in the profession of the gospel: the rather, because we see the day of our deliverance from our persecutors approaching, ver. 25.—The apostle was the more earnest in this exhortation, because, if one wilfully renounces the gospel after having openly professed it, there remaineth no sacrifice by which that sin can be pardoned, ver. 26.—To such apostates there remaineth nothing but a dreadful expectation of the judgment and fiery indignation of God, which will devour them as his adversaries, ver. 27.—For if the dispensers of Moses' law were put to death without mercy, although it was only a political law, ver. 28.—of how much sorer, punishment, think ye, shall he be counted worthy, who, by renouncing the gospel, tramplers under foot the Son of God! &c. ver. 29.—The punishment of such an apostate will be heavy and inevitable: for we know the irresistible power of him who hath said, The punishment of the wicked belongeth to me: I will repay them according to their deeds. Moreover, God having promised to avenge his people of their oppressors, he will certainly punish severely those who have insulted his Son and Spirit, ver. 30.—And it is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the living God as an enraged enemy, ver. 31.

This exhortation to beware of renouncing the gospel, the apostle with great propriety pressed on the Hebrews in this part of his epistle, notwithstanding in the preceding sixth chapter he had displayed the heinous nature and dangerous consequences of apostasy. For after that display, having at great length described the efficacy of Christ's death as a propitiation in procuring the pardon of sin, and explained the gracious nature of the new covenant procured by Christ's death, he naturally supposed that the Hebrews were sensible of the guilt from which they would contract, if they renounced the gospel in which these great blessings were made known and offered to mankind. Вithal, having described the terrible punishment which awaits apostates, he could not doubt of their being sensible of their danger. Wherefore, to strengthen the good impressions which he charitably supposed his discourse had made on them, he desired them to call to mind the joy which they felt when they first believed the gospel; the courage and constancy with which they then suffered for their faith; the kindness which they shewed to their persecuted brethren; their sympathizing with him in his bonds; and the heavenly temper with which they took the spoiling of their goods, ver. 32, 33, 34.—and exhorted them, after having suffered so much for their faith, not to cast away their courage, which, if he told them, would secure to them a great reward with which they took the spoil of their goods, ver. 35.—provided they continued to suffer patiently while they were doing the will of God by maintaining their Christian profession, ver. 36.—Besides, their troubles would not be of long duration; for Christ according to his promise, would in a little time come and destroy the Jewish state, whereby the power of their persecutors would be broken, ver. 37.—And, to give his exhortation the greater weight, he put them in mind of what God had said by Habakkuk, namely, 'The just by faith shall live: But if he draw back, my soul will not be well pleased with him,' ver. 38.—Least, however, the Hebrews might have inferred, from the earnestness of his exhortation, that he suspected they were about to apostatize, he expressed his hopes that they would not be of the number of those who draw back to their eternal perdition, but of the number of those who would continue to believe to the saving of their soul, ver. 39.

CHAP. X.—Wherefore, the law containing a shadow only of the good things that were promised, Chap. X.—Wherefore, since the law, in the services of the high-priests in the outward tabernacle, contains a shadow only of the

Commentary.

Ver. 1.—Wherefore. As the things mentioned in this verse are the proof at all of the doctrine contained in the preceding chapter, but an inference from that doctrine, our translators, by giving the particle כָּל, in the beginning of the verse, to casual significance, have entirely altered the scheme of the apostle's discourse, and have led the reader away from its true meaning. But the illustration.

2. The law containing a shadow. —The word כָּל, shadow, some to come, and not the very (same) image of these things, never can, with the same sacrifices which they offered yearly forever, make (you seems perfect) those who come to THEM perfect.

2 Since, being offered, would they not have ceased? because the worshippers, being once Forgiven, should have had no longer conscience of sins.

3 (Acts, 81.) Nevertheless, in these a remembrance of sins is made yearly. (See ver. 17.)

4 (Ezra, 91.) Besides, it is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. (See chap. ix. 23, note 2.)

5 (Acts) Wherefore, when coming into the world, he saith, (Ps. xli. 6,) Sacrifice and offering (as Cor. ii. 1, Tim. iii. 4, etc.) thou dost not command, but a body thou hast prepared.

6 Whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings thou art not pleased with.

7 Then I said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will, (supply 1) which is written concerning me in the volume of the book. 2 blessings which were to come through the services of Christ in the heavenly tabernacle, and not the very substance of these blessings, it never can, with the same kind of sacrifices which the high-priest offered yearly forever, make those who come to these sacrifices perfect in respect of pardon.

2 Since, if these sacrifices could have made the worshippers perfect in respect of pardon, being once offered, would they not have ceased from being again offered? because the worshippers, being once pardoned, should have had no longer any unceasing in their conscience on account of the sins for which the atonement was made.

3 Nevertheless, in these sacrifices annually repeated, and in the confessions of sins made over the scape-goat, a remnant, once for all the sins of the people is made yearly, as not pardoned. Lev. xvi. 21.

4 Besides, it is impossible, in the nature of things, that the blood of bulls and of goats should procure the pardon of sins, either in the way of substitution or by example. (See Es. vii. sect. 1, art. 2, 3 and Whittby's note on Heb. x. 14.)

5 Wherefore, to show this, when coming into our world, Messiah saith to God, The sacrifice of bulls and of goats, and the offering of the fruits of the earth, thou dost not now command, but a body thou hast prepared me, that by dying I might make the atonement prefigured by those sacrifices.

6 The whole burnt-offerings, and the sin-offerings, appointed in the law, having become the occasion of superstition, thou art not pleased with them.

7 Then I said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will with respect to the bruising of the head of the serpent, by dying as a sin-offering, which is written concerning me in the volume of the book of the law. Gen. iii. 15.

These verses denotes the outlines of a picture roughly drawn with chalk, such as painters make before they apply the pencil to produce an exact resemblance, called here, because, the image, of what intended to represent. But others more justly think the word shadow is used in the sense which it has Col. ii. 17, which are (are) a shadow of things to come; but (but) the body in Christ. 3 According to this sense of the word, a shadow is that obscure resemblance of any body which it makes by the interposition of the ray of sunlight; whereas, image, denotes the substance or body itself which occasions the shadow. Wherefore, the very image, in the subsequent clause, denotes the things themselves which are to come through the ministration of Christ. Accordingly, in the Syriac version it is, Et non substantia, sed imago. This also is the interpretation which Chrysostom and Theophylact have given of the passage. The good things of which the law contained only a shadow were, the cleansing of the minds of believers from evil dispositions, by the doctrines of the gospel, and by the influences of the Spirit of God. Of this the washings and purifications of the bodies of the Israelites is a figure. The texts in the law were a shadow. 5 The real atonement for sin which was made by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ is beheld. Heb. x. 6. 7 Of this the Levitical atonements made by the offering of beasts was a shadow. 5 The spiritual atonement which Christ made by the sacrifice of himself. Of this the political pardon obtained for the Israelites, by the atonement which the priests made by the sacrifice of beasts, was a shadow. 5 Access to worship God on earth through the blood of Christ, with the hope of acceptance. Of this the disfranchisement which the Israelites were by right of the tabernacle of the congregation, through the blood of the Levitical sacrifices, was a shadow. 5 The eternal possession of the heavenly country, through believing and obeying the gospel. Of this the confession of Canaan, secured to the Israelites by their obedience to the law, was a shadow. Therefore, the good things which Christ hath obtained for believers, through his mediation in the heavenly tabernacle, being not procured, but only typified by the instruements of the high-priests in the tabernacle on earth, it was fit that these shadows should be done away from the things of which they were the shadows were accomplished.

5 Name sacrifices which they offer yearly. The circumstance of their offering these sacrifices yearly, shows that the apostle had in his eye the sacrifices which the high-priest offered annually on the tenth of the seventh month.

Ver. 8. 1 Would they not have ceased? That this is the proper translation of the clause Mill has showed; in which he follows Demasianus and Theophylact, who affirm that it ought to be translated interestingly. The Syriac and Vulgate want the negative part which is here.

2 Because the worshippers. The people who came to the tabernacle to worship on the fast of the seventh month, called in this verse, the worshippers, and even insinuated in them that the heathens, being sensible of the impossibility of the atonement by means of blood, had recourse to human sacrifices, in the imagination that they were more satisfactory. 1 Micah vi. 8. Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-borne for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?

Ver. 9. 1 When coming into the world, he saith, etc. Because the apostle here affirms, that Messiah, when coming into the world, spake the 6th and the following verses of Psal. xli. and because David could in no sense say that God did not desire sacrifice and offering from him, it is the general opinion that the Psalm is a prophecy of Christ, and that it cannot be applied to any other person, than Christ. 3 Mine iniquities have been hold of me, etc. These iniquities may be 'the iniquities of us all,' laid on him by the Lord, Isai. lii. 6, so that they became his by imputation. Or, by a ministering of the cause for the effect, they may be the sufferings which Christ bare for the sins of the world. To this sense the precedent and subsequent expressions in the Psalm naturally tend on, ver. 12. Innumerable evils have compassed me about. Therefore my heart was glad. 7 That Messiah's coming into the world means his coming from heaven into our world, we learn from himself, John xvi. 30. 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world.' Also he had told us for what end he came into our world, Matt. xvii. 11. The Son of man is come to save that which was lost; namely, by giving himself to death for lost sinners; as is insinuated likewise in the passage under consideration.

2 But a body thyself hast prepared me, 1 Ex. xxv. 8, xxvi. 30. This is the LXX. translation; but in the Hebrew it is, Mine ears thou hast opened; Thou hast made me perfectly obedient to thee. So the phrase signifies Is. i. 5. 'The Lord hath opened mine ears; and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back.' And sealing the Son of God, by being made flesh, 'took of the seed of a slave,' Philip. ii. 7, or obedient servant, the expression, Thou hast prepared me a body, is equivalent to say, 'Thou hast opened mine ears, and both phrases signify, Thou hast made me thy obedient servant.' This reconciliation of the passage is founded on the ancient phraseology, in which slaves were called ouc: dvo, bodies, because they were as implicitly directed by the will of their masters, as the body is directed by the mind. See Rev. xviii. 13. The LXX. therefore, have given the true sense of Psal. xli. 6, in what may be called a free translation, which the apostle hath adopted for the sake of perspicuity. If this solution is not admitted, we must suppose that the Hebrew copies, which the LXX. and the apostle used, had a reading in this passage different from that found in the copies now existing.

Ver. 7. Whole burnt-offerings. These were such sacrifices as were wholly consumed by fire on the altar, without the priests receiving any share thereof.

Ver. 7-11. Which is written concerning me. It was written concerning Christ in the book of the law, Gen. iii. 15. The seed of the woman shall bruise thy head! The serpent's head. It was also written, And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. 1 In the volume of the book. 2 The word volume properly signifies the shaft or top of a pillar, and sometimes the column itself, as Wusten has shewed on this verse. Hence it was used by the LXX. to denote a volume, or roll of writing in cylindrical form. In the common translation of this verse, Messiah is represented as saying, 'In the volume of the book, Behold I come to do, O God.' But as this speech is nowhere written in the book of the law, the translation which I have given, arising from the right construction of the words, should be

8 On the foregoing remarkable passage I reason thus:—The only begotten, who knew the will of his Father, (John i. 18.), on coming into the world, first having said, Certainly sacrifice, and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, (which are offered according to the law,) thou dost not will, neither art pleased with;

9 (Tori) Next, (supp. t.) seeing he hath said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will; He taketh away the first will, (from ver. 10.), that he may establish the second.

10 By which will (is he prepared) we are the sanctified, through the offering of the body (ver. 5.) of Jesus Christ once.

11 And indeed every priest standeth daily ministering, and offering often the same sacrifices, which never can take away sins. (See ver. 4.)

12 But he, having offered only one sacrifice for sins through his whole life, sat down at the right hand of God; (See Heb. vi. 13.)

13 (To more) Thenceforth waiting till his enemies be made the footstool of his feet.

14 (Targ. 93.) Wherefore, by one offering, he hath perfected (see Heb. v. 9. note 1.) for ever the sanctified. (53.)

15 And even the Holy Ghost testifieth THIS to us, (verse 24. 94.) according indeed to what was before mentioned (chap. viii. 10. 12.)

16 This is the covenant which I will make with them after these days, saith the Lord: I will put my laws in their hearts, and write them upon their minds;

17 And their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more.

18 Now, where remission of these is, no more offering for sin is needed.

19 Well then, brethren, having (explained as) adopted; namely, Then I said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will, (supply i.) which is written concerning me in the volume (or, as others translate, in the beginning of the book) of the law; namely, of the law.

Ver. 8. Which are offered according to the law.—This clause is not in the Psalm: but it is added by the apostle, to show that, notwithstanding these offerings were originally of divine appointment, they were all to be laid aside when Messiah came into the world and offered himself as a sin-offering. Wherefore, that the reader may be sensible that they are the apostle’s words, and not the words of the Psalm, they must be read in a parenthesis, before the clause, “this dost not will,” to show that that clause refers to the four kinds of offerings mentioned in the Psalm.

Ver. 10.—1. Sanctified by the offering of the body.—The Levitical sanctifications were made by the offering or presenting of the crucified body of Jesus Christ in heaven once, whereby his death on earth was manifested. See chap. viii. 5. note 6. last part of the note.

2. Of Jesus Christ once.—Thus, by the express testimony of the Jewish scriptures, the apostle hath proved, that as the Levitical sacrifices were at first established by divine authority, so they are now abolished by the same authority. Also, that, by the express will of God, the sacrifice of Christ was appointed from the beginning, the only propitiation for the sins of men. And it must ever be remembered, that the will of God is the true foundation on which any propitiation for sin can be established. Wherefore, since the death of Christ is by God made the propitiation for the sin of the world, it rests on the foundation of his own eternal and perfect redemption; and the object of its efficacy is to reconcile us to God, by erasing Christians or by obliterating invariable, external marks of our sins, and so to explain the sinner which has determined God to save sinners in that method, rather than in any other. See Heb. ii. 10. note 6.
Christ's priesthood, all believers having boldness in death, the entrance into the habitations of the dead, by the blood of Jesus; 20 Which entrance (from ver. 19.) he hath dedicated for us through the body of his flesh, into the real, true holy place, through the veil, that is, through his flesh, by the rending of which he hath opened us this new way; 21 Also, having a great Priest in heaven, the true house of God, who presents our addresses to the Father, and is able to help us when tempted; 22 Let us worship God with a sincere heart, in full assurance of salvation through faith in Christ's death as an effectual sin-offering; 23 And being washed in body with the clean water of baptism, wherein we professed our faith in Christ as our only High Priest, let us hold fast the confession of our hope of salvation through his ministrations, unmoved by the threats of our persecutors; for faithful is he who has promised. 24 For, if terrified by the evils which attend the profession of worshipping God, as the custom of some is who are afraid of persecution from unbelievers, but harbouring another; and this so much the more, as from the signs of the times we see the day approaching, in which the power of your unbelieving brethren will be broken, they will be compelled to offer sacrifice, and all things which by nature are not sacrifices.
ceived the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, 27 But some dreadful expectation of judgment, and a fiery anger which shall devour the adversaries. 28 (He) Any one who disregarded the law of Moses died without mercy, (Num. xvi. 30.), by two or three witnesses: (Deut. xvii. 6.)

29 Of how much sorer punishment, think ye, shall he be counted worthy, who hath trampled under foot the Son of God, and reckoned the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unclean thing, and hath insulted the Spirit of grace? 30 For we know him who hath said, (Deut. xxi. 22.), Vengeance belongeth to me, I will repay, saith the Lord. And again, (ver. 28.) The Lord (saith) will judge his people.

31 It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

32 But call to remembrance the former days, in which, being enlightened, ye sustained a great combat of afflictions;

33 Partly, indeed, whilst ye were made a spectacle both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly whilst ye became companions of them who were so treated.

The gospel, we renounce it contrary to our conscience, after having attained to the knowledge and belief of the gospel, there remaineth to such persons no more sacrifice for sins; 27 But some dreadful expectation of the judgment remaineth, and a punishment by fire, the effect of God's anger, to devour all the adversaries of God, whether secret or open. 28 The justice of never pardoning them who wilfully apostatize from the gospel, will appear to you, Hebrews, from this, That any one who presumptuously disregarded the law of Moses, though but a political law, was put to death without mercy, if convicted by two or three witnesses.

29 If so, how much sorer punishment, think ye, shall be counted worthy, who, by wilfully renouncing the gospel, hath trampled under foot the Son of God as an impostor, and reckoned his blood, whereby the new covenant was ratified, and the apostate himself was expelled from the worship of God, that had been sanctified; and hath maliciously opposed the Spirit, the author of the miraculous gifts.

30 The character of God makes the punishment of apostates certain: For we Jews know how powerful and terrible he is who hath said, Punishment belongeth to me, I will repay, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord will avenge his people of their oppressors. If so, he will not avenge his Son, and Spirit, and the disciples of his Son, of those who insult him! 31 To fall into the hands of an enraged enemy is dreadful; but it is far more dreadful to fall into the hands of the living God, whose power no enemy can resist.

32 He not terrified by your persecutors; but, to encourage yourselves, call to remembrance the former days, in which, being newly enlightened with the gospel, ye courageously sustained, with God's assistance, a grievous persecution from your unbelieving brethren; 33 Partly, indeed, whilst ye were made a public spectacle, (see 1 Cor. iv. 9. note 2.), as malefactors in a theatre, both by the reproaches cast on you as atheists for deserting the institutions of Moses, and by the afflictions which befell you on that account; and partly, whilst ye kept company with and comforted them who were treated in the same cruel manner.
84 For ye even suffered with me in my bonds,1 and the spoiling of your goods ye took with joy, knowing in yourselves2 that ye have a better substance in heaven, even a permanent substance.

85 Wherefore, cast not away your boldness, which hath a great retribution.

86 Ye have need, however, of perseverance, (see 1 Thess. i. 3. note,) that when ye have done the will of God, ye may receive the promise.

87 For yet a very little while, and he who is coming1 will come, and will not tarry.

88 Now, the just by faith shall live:1 (kaves) But if he draw back, my soul will not be well pleased with him.2

89 But we are not of them who draw back unto destruction, but of faith (se wymenon jovyn) to the salvation of the soul, Matt. x. 39.

Ver. 84.1—Ye even suffered with me in my bonds.—To suffer with others, is to feel grief on account of their sufferings, and to expose one's self to trouble in relieving them. Those charitable offices the Jewish believers performed to the apostle, during his two years imprisonment in Jerusalem and in Caesarea.—The Alexandrian, and Clmssian MSS., two of Stephen's MSS., and the St. Urs. Lat. read here ye ymhnyn, 'with the prisoners.' The Syriac version hath 'Et dividit volubile oves gui vani sunt.' Also the Vulgar, 'Et vincit compassat estia.' This reading Estius, Gravis, Wengelin, Mill, Bengelius, and others approve. Nevertheless, as the common reading is supported by the greatest number of ancient MSS., the other reading, though found in the MS., and versions above mentioned, is of the less authority, that the Alexandrian, St. Germain, and some other copies, were very lately corrected by the Vulgar version, as was aboved, Gen. Pref. p. 2.—For these reasons I think the common reading is genuine, and ought to be retained; especially as the other reading may have been introduced into the Vulgar and other versions by some one in the early ages, who thought St. Paul was not the author of the epistle to the Hebrews.

85. Knowing in yourselves.—This may be explained by Rom. viii. 18. 17. Or the translation may run thus: 'Knowing that ye have for yourselves a better substance,' better goods and possessions, 'in heaven.'

Ver. 87. He who is coming will come.—Though the apostle in this verse uses some words of the prophet Habakkuk, chapt. ii. 3, he doth not introduce them as a quotation from him containing a prophecy of any coming of Christ. This being the case, the commentators might have argued that the prophet did not mean there were any such things as these words, as they stand in Habakkuk, may be interpreted of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem. In the passage where they are found, the prophet exalted the Jews in trust in God for deliverance from the Chaldees, by putting them in mind of the faithfulness of God in performing his promises concerning his continuance of his covenant and his promises, resisted the greatest temptations and seductions; the Hebrews, being preserved in imminent dangers, performed the most difficult acts of obedience, and at length obtained a distinguished reward. This beautiful discourse, therefore, may be considered as an animated display of the triumphs of faith over the allurements and terrors of the world.

And, first of all, to show that this noble grace of faith is attainable by men in every age and country, the apostle tells us, that it consists in such a firm persuasion of the things which God hath declared and promised, as clothes them with an evidence equal to that of sense, ver. 1.—and as examples of this faith in the declarations of God, Abel, Enoch, and Noah, are mentioned, who were all so firmly persuaded of the truth of the things made known to them by God, that they regulated the whole tenor of their lives by them, ver. 3. 7.—Next, to show that Habakkuk's prophecy this clause stands before the clause, 'the just by faith shall live.' But the apostle altered the order of the clauses, for the sake of subjoining the observation in ver. 95.

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle, in the end of the foregoing chapter, after mentioning the persecutions to which the Hebrews were exposed, had comforted them by suggesting a remarkable saying of the prophet Habakkuk; 'The just by faith shall live.' In this chapter he illustrates that saying, by bringing into the view of the Hebrews examples from their own scriptures, of persons who, by a strong faith in God and his promises, resisted the greatest temptations and seductions; the Hebrews, being preserved in imminent dangers, performed the most difficult acts of obedience, and at length obtained a distinguished reward. This beautiful discourse, therefore, may be considered as an animated display of the triumphs of faith over the allurements and terrors of the world. And, first of all, to show that this noble grace of faith is attainable by men in every age and country, the apostle tells us, that it consists in such a firm persuasion of the things which God hath declared and promised, as clothes them with an evidence equal to that of sense, ver. 1.—and as examples of this faith in the declarations of God, Abel, Enoch, and Noah, are mentioned, who were all so firmly persuaded of the truth of the things made known to them by God, that they regulated the whole tenor of their lives by them, ver. 3. 7.—Next, to show that Habakkuk's prophecy this clause stands before the clause, 'the just by faith shall live.' But the apostle altered the order of the clauses, for the sake of subjoining the observation in ver. 95.
that it was promised to him chiefly as the type and pledge of a better country, ver. 9, 10.—In like manner Sarah, Abraham's wife, to whom God promised that she should be 'the mother of nations,' lived long in the faith of that promise, though it was not performed to her till she was ninety years old, when she brought forth Isaac, who became the father of children innumerable, ver. 11, 12.—All these patriarchs died without receiving the country that was promised to them, yet they died in the faith that they should receive it; and, by confessing themselves strangers and pilgrims on the earth, they declared, that in the promise they looked for a better country than Canaan, even an heavenly country; consequently, that they expected to be raised from the dead to enjoy that better country. See Essay v. Sect. 3. art. 4. ver. 13-16.—Moreover, Abraham, when tried by the command to offer up Isaac, the very son for whom he had waited so long, and by whom he was to have the numerous seed, obeyed without hesitation, firmly believing that after his son was burnt to ashes on the altar, God would raise him from the dead, ver. 17-19.—The same Isaac, and his son Jacob, and his grandson Joseph, when dying, expressed the strongest faith in the promise of God. Particularly Joseph did so: For before his death he commanded the Israelites, at their departure from Egypt, to carry his bones with them into Canaan, ver. 30-32.

Farther, the apostle describes the faith of the Israelites in Egypt; and especially of Moses, who, although educated in the court of Egypt, when he came of age, through the faith which he had in God's promises to Abraham and to his seed, refused to be called any longer the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and thereby at once renounced all the grandeur and pleasures of the court of Egypt, which, as the son of Pharaoh's daughter, he might have enjoyed; choosing rather to be evil treated with the people of God, than to enjoy the temporary pleasures of sin, ver. 23-26.—By faith Moses carried the Israelites out of Egypt, not afraid of the wrath of Pharaoh, who pursued them with the armies of Egypt, ver. 27, 28.—By the same principle, the Israelites were emboldened to pass through the Red Sea, which the Egyptians essaying to do, were drowned, ver. 29.—And with respect to the Israelites who entered into Canaan, although their fathers disbelieved and disobeyed God in the wilderness, they went round Jericho sounding their trumpets, in the firm faith that the walls thereof would fall down by miracle, according to God's promise, ver. 30.—By faith also Balaam received the Israelites spelt of peace, and did not perish with the unbelievers when Jericho was sacked, ver. 31.

Many likewise of the Israelish judges, prophets, and kings, were most remarkable for their faith. But because to speak of every individual separately would have been tedious, the apostle introduces them in one group; and, in a noble strain of eloquence, celebrates their fortitude, their victories, and their rewards, all obtained through the influence of their faith, ver. 32-34.—Not forgetting to mention some women, whose faith was honoured with particular marks of the divine approbation, ver. 35.—And having thus praised the ancient worthies, for the great actions which they performed through faith in God and in his promises, and for the signal deliverances which they obtained, the apostle speaks with equal rapture of the representative figures, persecutions, tortures, and deaths, which others in later times endured for the sake of religion; so that they were as illustrous for their passive, as the former were for their active virtues, ver. 35-38.

His animated description St. Paul finishes with observing, that the patriarchs, and kings, and prophets, and righteous men, whose heroic actions, and suffering virtues, and great deliverances, he had celebrated, have not yet obtained the promised inheritance. But he accounts for the delay by informing us, that it is God's intention to reward the whole spiritual seed of Abraham at once, by introducing them all in a body into the heavenly country, after the resurrection and judgment; because in this open manner to put them in possession of the inheritance, in the faith of which they lived and died, will render the dispensations of God to mankind, and his power and veracity in the performance of his promises, most illustrious in the eyes of the whole universe, ver. 39-40.

This admirable discourse, though more immediately designed for the instruction and consolation of the Hebrews, is most valuable on account of its use to the church in every age. For, in the first place, By putting in mind that Abel was declared a righteous person by God himself, that Enoch pleased God, and that Noah became 'an heir of the righteousness which is by faith,' we are taught, that the justification of mankind by faith did not begin in Abraham, but was the method appointed for the salvation of sinners from the beginning of the world. Secondly, By shewing that faith hath for its object, not the discoveries alone of the will of God made by reason and conscience, the apostle hath displayed the Catholic nature and influence of faith, and hath taught us that men of all ages and countries, and under all dispensations, may obtain such a degree of faith as is pleasing to God. This instruction was very necessary to those of the Hebrews who were unwilling to allow that the Gentiles might be saved by faith, without obedience to the law of Moses. Thirdly, By celebrating the great actions and sufferings of the ancients, the apostle hath taught us, that faith is by no means an impotent speculative belief of the doctrines, whether of natural or of revealed religion, but an active principle, which leads to the greatest fortitude in doing, and patience in suffering, every thing which God commands: in which account of faith Paul is supported by James, who hath in so many words taught that faith without works is dead, Ver 3--Fourthly, By calling faith the confidence of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, we are taught, that it is faith which gives to the invisible and distant things of the life to come, set forth in the promises of God, the power of operating upon our mind as if they were actually present to our senses. Lastly, From this account here given of the faith of Abraham, and of his immediate descendants, we learn, that these ancient patriarchs knew that the promise of giving to Abraham and to his seed all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, was a promise, not of the earthly country alone, but of a far better country, even an heavenly, of which the earthly country was only a type and a pledge; and that, as they all died in the firm expectation of inheriting that better country, they died in the belief of their resurrection from the dead. Wherefore the views and expectations of the people of God, even in the most ancient times, though not so full and clear, were not in substance different from the views and expectations which believers now entertain through the more perfect revelation of the gospel.

New Translation.

Commentary.

CHAP. XI. New faith is the confidence of things hoped for; and persuasion of the reality of the blessings hoped for in consequence of them. Faith gives a present substance to the future things which are hoped for. Things hoped for:—namely, the immortality of the soul, the the evidence of things not seen. 4

2 (Rev. 21, 8.) And for this (τοῦτον) the ancients were borne witness by the God.

3 By faith we understand that the worlds were produced by the command of God; so that the things which are seen, were not made of things which did appear. 4

4 By faith Abel offered to God a sacrifice greater than Cain; God testifying this upon his gifts. (Gen. 4, 24.) By faith Enoch was translated, being made perfect. (Gen. 5, 24.)

5 By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death. Thus was he made perfect. (Heb. 11, 5.)

6 God's promise, and the evidence of the matters of fact not seen, which revelation informs us have happened, are yet to be seen in the world.

2 And for this faith the ancients, namely Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and the rest, were borne witness by God, as justified and accepted persons.

3 By faith in the divine revelations, we understand that the worlds were produced by the command of God from nothing; so that the things which are seen, the things with which the world, were not made of things which then did exist, but without any pre-existent matter to form them of.

4 By faith understanding and believing what was said concerning the seed of the woman, which was bruised the head of the serpent, Abel, which is greater than Cain: for with a humble penitent heart he offered a sin-offering, on account of which he was declared to be righteous; God testifying this upon his gifts. 5 And the sacrifice of Abel, though dead, he still speaketh.
might not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him; for before his translation it was testified that he pleased God.

6 But without faith it is impossible to please God. For he who cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

7 By faith Noah, when he prepared an ark for the salvation of his family, by which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

8 By faith Abraham, when called to go out into a land which he should afterwards receive as an inheritance, obeyed, and went out, not knowing whither he went going.

9 By faith they sojourned in the land of promise, as strangers and pilgrims, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise:

Ver. 6. — 1. By faith Enoch. — Moses, by telling us that 'Enoch walked with God,' shows us that his faith consisted in an habitual recollection of the being and perfections of God, and in a constant sense of the divine presence. See ver. 27. And was not found. — This implies, that Enoch was privately translated, as Elijah afterwards was, 2 Kings x. 17, and that his relations and friends searched for him, but did not find him. The place to which those good men were translated is not told. But their translation in the body is recorded for an example, to assure believers that in due time they also shall live in the heavenly country in the body. Enoch's translation by faith is mentioned by the apostle, not as an instance of being translated into heaven, as he was, without dying, but to excite them to imitate his faith, in the assurance of being admitted into heaven in the body after the resurrection. 2. For before his translation it was testified that he pleased God.

— The apostle's account of Enoch is formed on Gen. v. 24. Enoch walked with God, and was not found; for God had translated him. The LXX. have thus rendered, ἡ δικαιοσύνη τῆς ἀλληλούχου ἐν τῷ ξύλω ἔχοντες, ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ τῆς καταστάσεως. And Enoch pleased God, and was not found, because God had translated him. This renders the apostle's faith adopted, because although it be not literal, it is sufficiently exact. For, 1. The Hebrews expressed that virtue of conduct in men which is pleasing to God, by the phrase of their 'walking with God,' as we learn from the account which Moses gave of Noah's faith after the walk of Enoch, and Noah walked with God. Wherefore, when the apostle tells us that it was testified of Enoch before his translation that he pleased God, he in effect repeated Moses's testimony, that before his translation Enoch 'walked with God.' — For Enoch, by saying Enoch 'walked with God,' meant that God had translated him, he not being the first who had so translated in the LXX. as was not, which Moses had used; he was not found on earth. — 2. Moses, by saying 'God took him,' plainly means that God took Enoch away from the earth in the body. This the LXX. and the apostle have very properly expressed by the phrase, 'translated him.' — To Enoch he translated his new state, his body, no doubt, was extended in the manner the bodies of the righteous will be, who at the second coming of Christ are alive on the earth.

Ver. 8. — 1. But without faith, &c. — The apostle, after his account of Enoch's pleasing God, adds, 'But without faith it is impossible to please God,' to show, that though no particular revelation is mentioned, which Enoch is said to have believed, yet from Moses telling us that he walked with, or pleased God, it is certain that his faith in the doctrines of religion discoverable by the light of nature, and which are mentioned in this verse, must have been very strong, since it led him habitually to walk with God so as to please him. 2. Must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him. — By representing to his hearers, and by representing the government of the world, as objects of faith, the apostle taught us, that the truth of natural religion is equally the object of faith with the truths of revelation. And his doctrine is just. For the doctrines by which the truth of nature is supported, are being of the same kind with the evidence which supports the truths of revelation, namely, demonstrative but probable evidence, the persuasion produced by that kind of evidence in matters of natural religion, is as really faith as the persuasion which the same evidence produces in matters of revelation. Further, the faith of persuasion of the truths of natural religion which men attain, being as much the effect of attention, impartial search, and prayer, as the faith which they attain of the truths of revelation, it is as much a matter of duty, and so pleasing to God, as the faith of the merit of revelation. See the View prefixed to Rom. xi. paras. 10 and 11. and Essay vi. sect. 2.

Ver. 9. — 1. Prepared an ark. — Hallet thinks the ark, whose bottom was flat, and which had no helm, was conducted by the same extraordinary providence which sent the deluge, and was then beside him, by the ministry of angels. 2. For the salvation of his family. — Here salvation denotes a temporal deliverance.

3. By which, &c. — The gender of the relative permits it to stand either for Noah's faith, or for the ark which he prepared.

— Enoch, following Ebram and the Grecian sages, prepared a vessel among the Gentiles, and prepared the ark which he saved from the destruction of the world by a deluge, 2 Pet. ii. 5. instead of being murdered by fear, turned the whole course of the history. 3. And became heir of the righteousness which is by faith. — The faith of Noah is prefigured, and as much to assure us that they who believe and obey God shall be safe in the midst of a fallen world, while the wicked shall be condemned and destroyed.

Ver. 8.— 1. Abraham, when called. — This call is not mentioned in the history. Yet it is certain that Abraham left Chaldea by the call of God; for God said to him, Gen. xv. 7. I am the Lord that brought thee out of the midst of a fallen world, while the wicked shall be condemned and destroyed.

5. And became heir of the righteousness which is by faith. — This I think shows that it is, in the former clause, does not mean by which ark. — For the apostle would hardly say that Noah by the ark became heir of the righteousness which is by faith. He became an heir of that righteousness by his religious fear, which led him to build the ark. — Here he signifies to be the possession of the righteousness by faith. The faith of Noah is prefigured, and as much to assure us that they who believe and obey God shall be safe in the midst of a fallen world, while the wicked shall be condemned and destroyed.

6. But without faith it is impossible, in any dispensation of religion, to please God. For he who worshipeth God acceptably, must believe that he exists, and that he will reward all them who sincerely worship and obey him, and who persevered in piety and obedience to the end of their life.

7. By faith Noah, when he received a revelation concerning the destruction of the world by a deluge, as he who never had ever seen, being seized with religious fear, prepared an ark, according to God's command, for the saving of his family; by which religious fear he condemned the inhabitants of the old world, to whom, with his family, he preached the revelation which sent the deluge, and which was by the ministry of angels.

8. By faith in the divine promises Abraham, when called to go out from his kindred and country, namely, Ur of the Chaldees, into a land which he should afterwards receive as an inheritance, obeyed, and relying on the power and veracity of God, went out, although he did not know the country to which he was going; nor whether it was a good or bad country.

9. By believing that Canaan was promised to him and to his seed only as the type of a better country, he acquired no possessions in Canaan except a burying-place, and the cave of Machpelah; but he sojourned in the land which was promised to him as his country belonging to others, dwelling in moveable tents with Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise:

CHAP. XI.

10. For he expected the city having foundations, of which city the builder and maker is God, to be established; and to have an unchangeable inheritance; whither he had made his promises.

11. By faith even Sarah herself received strength for the conception of seed, and that she should have children, as at the time of age, by reason of which promise she obtained Isaac. (See Gen. xxv. 11.)

12. All these obtained a figure of things not made, that they might see the heaven and earth, which are as yet to be, and which are visible at the sight of the unseen, which is invisible. (See Acts x. 36.)

13. And these all obtained strength of the promise, and were not delivered; for they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

14. (Ex. xix. 2.) They spake such things as this: they were earth's inhabitants, and not of it. (See Ps. cxvii. 14.)

15. (Ker. 120.) For truly, they had that they had promised, and the angels were their helpers. (See Gen. xiv. 18.)

16. (Ezra x. 22.) For seeing this afar off, and being persuaded of it, and embracing it with love, they had promised that they would see their father's country.

17. (Ker. 120.) For truly, if they had not promised, they could not see it. (See Ps. lxxxvi. 38.)

18. (Ker. 121.) For truly, if they had not seen it afar off, and been persuaded of it, and embraced it, they had promised that they would see their father's country.

And these all obtained a figure of things not made, that they might see the heaven and earth, which are as yet to be, and which are visible at the sight of the unseen, which is invisible. (See Acts x. 36.)

truly if they had longed after that country from which they came out, they might have had an opportunity to have returned to it.

16 But indeed (οὕτως, see 1 Tim. iii. 1. note 1) they longed after a better country, even an heavenly: for God is not ashamed of them to be called their God, (γενέσεως, 90.) because he hath prepared for them a city. (See ver. 10.)

17 By faith Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac: he who had received the promises, offered up even his only begotten.

18 (Ὑπό τοῦ γὰρ) Concerning whom it was said, (ἰμάχων, ἵππων, 36.) Surely by Isaac a seed shall be to thee: (κύριου οὖσα, 55.)

19 (Υἱὸς πρεσβύτερος) Reasoning that God was able (παραγόμενον, 90.) to raise him even from the dead, from whom he received him, even (αὐτὸς, 90) for a parable.

Ver. 15—1. For truly, if they had remembered from which they came out—The apostle does not mean a bare remembrance of that country, but a true remembrance, or a longing after it. Such a remembrance, or such a longing after it, united to the last moments of this mortal man, is more than ever indulged. Abraham, in particular, considered the very thought of returning into Chaldea, as a renewal of his infancy in Canaan. He was sensible of the interest of the promises of God; and therefore he made his steward Eliezer swear, that on no pretense whatever he would carry Isaac into Chaldea, Gen. xxiii. 6. This absolute renunciation of Chaldea, notwithstanding God gave Abraham ownership in Canaan, is simply to be inferred from what is before said, Acts vii. 5. In a stronger proof of his knowledge of the true meaning of the promises, and of his faith in them. 2. They might have had an opportunity to have returned.1—The Clermont MS. with the Syriac and Vulgate versions read here ὧν, ἥταν δίκτυα αὐτῶν, they had an opportunity. What is said in this verse shows that the apostle in ver. 13 does not speak of the antecedent believers, but of Abraham and his immediate descendants. Ver. 16. Is not ashamed of them to be called their God.—Sykes thinks the clause, καὶ ἐγένετο, should be translated, does not make them ashamed in being called their God. According to either translation, this passage is a beautiful illustration of our Lord's reasoning with the Scribes, and an allusion to it: Matt. xxii. 31. But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken by you of God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob? 2Cor. xi. 7. I will establish my covenant with them, and they shall no more beremembered; neither shall they be grieved any more, neither shall any one be的日子 in covenant with them, or remember their reproach any more, says the Lord. Ver. 17. By faith Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac: he who had received the promises, offered up even his only begotten.2—But if Abraham, at God's command, was willing himself to play his own son, how much more willing shall we be to part with our beloved children and friends, when God has given them to us? Ver. 18. Surely by Isaac a seed shall be to thee (κύριου οὖσα, 55.) in whom all the families of the earth shall be blessed. Ver. 19. Reasoning that God was able to raise him even from the dead, he received him, being hindered from slaying him, even in order to his being a type of Christ.
20 By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau, with respect to things to come.

21 By faith Jacob, when dying, blessed each of the sons of Joseph, and worshipped, leaning on the top of his staff.

22 By faith Joseph, when ending his life, made mention concerning the departing of the children of Israel, and gave commandment concerning his own bones. (Gen. i. 25. Exod. xiii. 19.)

23 By faith Moses, when born, was hid three months; by his parents, because they saw the child beautiful; and were not afraid of the king's commandment.

24 By faith Moses, when he was grown up, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter;

25 Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to have the temporary fruition of sin.

26 Estimating the reproach of Christ greater than the preciousness of all wealth. Ver. 20. By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau. Here the apostle discovers a fact, which may also be gathered from the circumstances mentioned in the history; namely, that in blessing the sons Isaac was moved by a divine impulse. Before these children were born, God had determined to make the younger of them the root of his visible church and people. And in provocation of the divine resolution, when the younger son, excluding himself to be the elder, espoused the blessing: Isaac in giving it was inspired by God to foretell that the person to whom he spoke should enjoy all the blessings belonging to the first-born. And as in uttering these blessings he felt himself inspired, (see Gen. xlv. 23,) he trembled exceedingly when he discovered his mistake, being greatly distressed for Esau, whom he knew God had deprived of his birthright. But he would not retract what he had been moved by the Spirit to foretell, although Esau brought him with tears to do it. On the contrary, knowing that he had spoken the blessing by inspiration, he confirmed it, (Gen. xlv. 23.) I have blessed him, yes, and he shall be blessed. Moreover, Isaac being absolutely certain that the blessings which he had foretold by inspiration to Esau as well as to Jacob would be bestowed on them, the apostle was warranted to affirm that Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau by faith.

The guilt which Jacob used to procure the blessing, has been greatly condemned, and indeed hardly admitted of an excuse. But the blame thrown on God by the Jews for raising that blessing to Jacob is certainly groundless, since it cannot be alleged that God ought not to bestow temporal blessings on any person who has committed a sin to procure them. Before these children were born, or had done either good or evil, God had determined to make the younger twin the root of his visible church and people: And for so doing there were good reasons, which Paul hath explained, Rom. ix. 10-16. Also, having communicated his determination to Rebecca when she inquired concerning the bringing up of the children in her womb, no doubt she thought it her duty to hinder her husband from attempting to counteract the divine determination. Wherefore, she was to assume the appearance of Esau, perhaps by representing to him the revelation which was made to her, and which it is probable she had related to him. In all this, however, she acted contrary to her duty. For which reason Jacob, fearing the deceit, if discovered, might provoke his father to curse him, refused to do what his mother desired, and was not persuaded therefor took the curse upon herself, Gen. xxvi. 11. Thus he is the curse, my son. See Heb. xi. 19, note 3. Ver. 21. By faith Jacob, when dying, that is, when near his death: For through he was sick when he blessed the sons of Joseph, Gen. xlvi. 1. He did not die then, but lived to call all his sons together, to tell them what should happen to them in the last days. Gen. xlv. 4.

27 Each of the sons of Joseph;—namely, by foretelling that two tribes should spring from these two sons; and that the tribe of Joseph should be more powerful than the tribe of Manasseh.

28 And worshipped, leaning on the top of his staff. In the history which Moses hath given of Jacob's requiring Joseph to swear that he would bury him in Canaan, Gen. xlvi. 31, the circumstance of Jacob leaning on the top of his staff is mentioned. The same circumstance is said by the apostle, in this verse, to have happened after Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph, Gen. xlvi. 11. Wherein as Moses hath introduced the history of Jacob's blessing the sons of Joseph after his history of the oath, we must suppose that Jacob worshipped, and was encouraged to do so, by the staff, which he is probable, considering his great age and pious, and that in giving an account of Jacob's blessing to the sons of Joseph, Moses may have omitted that circumstance, as thinking it needless to mention it twice. In the common translation into Hebrew, and into Greek, where Joseph's expressing that he would bury his father in Canaan, is recorded, it is said, He swore unto him; and Israel bowed himself upon the bed's

HEBREWS.

29 By faith in the divine revelation, Isaac foretold to Jacob and Esau the blessings which were to be bestowed on them and their posterity.

30 By the like faith, Jacob, when near his death, Gen. xlvi. 29. blessed each of the sons of Joseph; and, in token of his faith in the promises concerning their possessing Canaan, worshipped God leaning on the top of his staff.

31 By faith in God's promise of giving Canaan to Abraham and to his seed, Joseph, when ending his life, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel out of Egypt, as a thing certain; and to preserve the knowledge and expectation thereof among the Israelites, he commanded them to carry his bones with them into Canaan.

32 By faith in the promises of God, Moses, when born, being circumscribed, was not circumcised, according to the custom of his nation, being afraid that he would be cast out as an unclean thing, because they saw the child beautiful, and pressed he might be the person appointed to deliver them; and were not afraid of the king's commandment to give up their children to be killed, Exod. i. 22.

33 By faith in the promises of God, made known to him by his brethren, Moses, when he was grown up, resolving to join himself to his people, refused to be called any longer the son of Pharaoh's daughter.

34 Choosing rather to suffer persecution with the people of God, than, as the son of Pharaoh's daughter, to have the temporary fruition of the pleasures of sin in the court of Egypt.

35 Estimating the sufferings of Christ, as of surpassing worth, for the sake of the glory that should follow. Ver. 29. By faith in the promises of God, made known to him by his brethren, Moses, when he was grown up, resolving to join himself to his people, refused to be called any longer the son of Pharaoh's daughter;
Christ to rise among them, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed, greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he looked off from them to the reward which he expected in the life to come.

27 By believing that God would deliver his people, notwithstanding the number and power of their oppressors, Moses left Egypt with the Israelites, not being afraid of the wrath of Pharaoh, who he knew would pursue them: For he courageously persevered in his purpose, as expecting aid from the invisible God.

28 By faith in the promise of God, that the first-born of the Egyptians should be destroyed, but those of the Israelites spared, Moses appointed the passover, and the dashing of the blood of the paschal lamb on the door-posts of the Israelites, Exod. xii. 7. That the angel who destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians might not touch theirs.

29 By faith they passed through the Red Sea, as by dry land, which the Egyptians essaying to do, were drowned.

30 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, having been encompassed seven days.

31 By faith Rahab the harlot was not destroyed with the unbelievers, having received the spies in peace. (See James ii. 25. note.)

32 And what shall I say more for the time would fail me to speak of Gideon, and Barak, and Samson, and Jephthah, and David also, and Samuel, and the prophets.

33 Who through faith subdued kingdoms;

Ver. 26.1. Greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.—It is here said, that if Moses had continued in the court of Egypt as the son of Pharaoh’s daughter, he might have had the free use of the king’s treasures, and therewith might have procured to himself every sensual enjoyment.

27. By the resurrection.—So the word is rendered, signifying, being used to denote either reward or punishment, Heb. ii. 2. Here it signifies reward; not however the possession of Canaan, which Moses was going with the Israelites, nor any pleasures he could enjoy in Canaan; for every thing of that sort might have had in every greater perfection in Egypt; but it was the joys of the heavenly country, of which the possession of Canaan promised to Abraham and his seed was only a type.

Ver. 28. — By faith he left Egypt, &c. —The circumference of his new country, the land of Canaan, as he left Egypt, shows that the apostle does not speak of Moses’ departure into Midian, (for then he was in great fear, Exod. xi. 4, 16,) but of his departure with the Israelites; which he mentions before he speaks of the entrance of the passover, because his design being to illustrate the power of faith by examples, it was not necessary to propose these in the exact order of time.

2. The invisible God.—By this epiphany the true God, whom the Israelites worshipped, was distinguished from the apostle by the visible gods of the Egyptians.

Ver. 28. He who destroyed the first-born might not touch theirs. —That the sacrifice of the passover was an emblem of the sacrifice of Christ, we learn from John, who tells us, chap. xii. 36. that the injunction, Exod. xii. 46. ‘neither shall ye raise a bone thereof;’ was given to prepare, that when Christ should be put to death, none of his bones should be broken. If, so, the effect of the passover mentioned in this verse, was an emblem of the salvation of the people of God through the shedding of Christ’s blood. Hence Christ is called our passover, and is said to be sacrificed for us. 1 Cor. v. 7. See note 2. on that verse.

Ver. 29. Were drowned. — If it is probable from the history, Exod. xiv. 20—29 the sea returned, and overwhelmed the Egyptians, while the Israelites were passing, and before they arrived at the opposite shore, it would require no small degree of faith to support them under the noise of the rushing waters, and the dreariness of the Egyptians while drowning.

Ver. 30. Having encompassed seven days. — As the land of Canaan belonged to the Israelites by a grant from God the possessor of heavens and earth, so it was proper that the first city which rested on them should be taken in such a manner as to demonstrate the truth of their title. And therefore God did not order them to attack Jericho with engines of war, but ordered the priests, his immediate ministers, to carry the ark, containing the tables of his covenant, round the city daily for seven days. When this was done, the trumpets of rams’ horns, as summoning the inhabitants in the name of the God of Israel to surrender the armed men going before, and the reedallow following. And, on the seventh day, having surround-wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions,

34 Quenched the strength of fire, escaped the edges of the sword, waxed strong from sickness, became valiant in battle, overturned the camps of the aliens.

35 Women received their dead (Egypt) by a resurrection, and others were beaten, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection.

36 And others had trial of mockings, and scourgings, and moreover of bonds and imprisonment.

37 They were stoned, they were sawn under, they were tempted, they died by the slaughter of the sword, they were cast into the midst of the sheepskins, being destitute, afflicted, maltreated;

38 (Ps. 67) Of these the world was not worthy: They wandered in deserts, and mountains, and in caves and holes of the earth.

39 Now all these, though borne witness to an account of faith, have not received the promises, but these have obtained them, of whom we make mention, a great cloud of witnesses, for they are not yet come short of the faith, whereunto they were called, who were accounted worthy of the kingdom.

HEBREWS.

CHAP. XI.

in the possession of Canaan, subdued the neighbouring idolatrous kingdoms, performed the righteous actions commanded them by God, and in reward, obtained promises, and stopped the mouths of lions.

34 Were unhurt by the strongest fire,—he means Shadrach and his companions, whose faith is recorded Dan. iii. 17,—escaped the edges of the sword,—Moses escaped the sword of Pharaoh, Exod. xvii. 4. Elijah that of Jezreel, and David that of Saul—waxed strong from sickness, as did Henekiah, Is. xxxviii. 21,—became valiant in battle, and overturned the camps of the enemies,—Gideon overturned the camp of the Midianites, and Jonathan that of the Philistines.

35 Women received their dead children alive by a resurrection, as did the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 21, and the Shunammite, 2 Kings iv. 34,—there were beaten to death, not accepting deliverance, on the condition offered, that they might obtain a better resurrection.

36 And others, like Jeremiah, (Jer. xxiii. 10,) had experience of mockings, and scourgings, and moreover they were festered, and imprisoned in filthy dungeons.

37 Others were stoned to death, as Zocheriah, (2 Chron. xxiv. 21;) they were sawn under, they were tempted, they died by the slaughter of the sword, (1 Sam. xvii. 10. 1 Kings xix. 10.) They wandered about in sheepskins, and in neediness, being afflicted, maltreated by those to whom they delivered the messages of God.

38 Of these the world was not worthy: Yet they wandered by day in deserts, and by night lodged in caves and holes of the earth; as Elijah, and the hundred prophets hid by Obadiah, and David, 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.

39 Now all these, though they have justified the higher renown among men, along with the better approbation of God on account of faith, have not received the promises, but these have obtained them, of whom we make mention, a great cloud of witnesses, for they are not yet come short of the faith, whereunto they were called, who were accounted worthy of the kingdom.

This punishment Eliasar suffered, 2 Mac. vi. 19, 22.
3. Not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection.—Perhaps the persons here meant are those whose history we have in 2 Mac. vii. The 'better resurrection,' which they expected, was a resurrection to a better life than the children obtained, who in the former part of the verse are said to have been raised from the dead. For that the Jews believed in the resurrection of these persons is evident from 2 Mac. viii. 11. 12. 14. 23.
4. Mockings, and scourgings, and moreover of bonds and imprisonments.—Elias was mocked by Ithamar, and Elias by the children from Bethel. See also 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16. Jerusalem was beaten by Psaahur, Jerem. xx. 5. and by the princes, chap. xxvii. 15. Scourging in the synagogues was a very common punishment. And with respect to imprisonment, Joseph was cast into prison; Jerusalem was let down into a dungeon full of mice, chap. xxvii. 10.
5. And the prophet Micah was imprisoned by the king 2 Kings xxv. 20.
6. Sawn under.—This punishment is mentioned 2 Sam. xill. 11. as then in use. And Ezekiel tells us the King of Caldea used it, Calv. cap. 27. Moreover, Jeremiah on Is. xlvii. 2 speaks of it as a certain tradition, that Isaiah was 'sawn under with a wooden saw.' A punishment which, says Josephus, was inflicted on him by Manasseh, who was a cruel as well as an idolatrous prince.
7. They were tempted.—Alberti thinks, that instead of ζημιωτατοι, they were tempted, the apostle wrote ζημιωται, they were stricken, Obser. Philol. p. 430. Others think they were beaten, or cast into the midst of the sheepskins, as in the case of Gideon.
8. They were cast into the midst of the sheepskins, namely, with red hot irons; or burnt alive. Others propose other readings. But all the senses of the sacred text are conjecture, without the authority of any MS. or version, deserve no regard. Whaley contends, that the clause 'they were tempted,' is an interpolation. But Hackett, in his note on the verse, defends it at great length, and declares himself of Mr. Whaley’s opinion, that there is no reason whatever for altering the present reading.—Among the sufferings of good men are reckoned 'the fiery darts of the wicked ones,' Eph. vi. 16. that is, peculiarly strong temptations of the devil, arising from the wrong thoughts which he suggests; and therefore they well deserved, in this place, to be ranked among the heavy sufferings of the people of God.
9. In sheep skins.—2 Mac. xii. 4. Of this sort was Eliasar’s mantle, which afterwards Eliasa wore. For the LXX. call it ἐγγέμαρτος, a sheep’s skin, 2 Kings ii. 13. Hence Elias is called an ἀργυρός σκύλος, 2 Kings ii. 8. Not so much on account of his beard, as on account of this wearing a mantle of sheep’s skin with the wool on it. The ancient prophets commonly went about in such garments, being mortified to all the luxury of the world, and from Zechariah’s apparition it appears that the false prophets imitated them in their dress, to gain the more credit.
10. Women received, &c.—The Syriac hath here referred to women their dead.
11. Others were beaten.—See above, note 3. According to Periplus the meaning is, that they were not only cast into the midst of the sheepskins, but were beaten with clubs, so as to occasion extreme pain. But Justin thinks the word signifies simply to be put to death, without manner of cruelty, in a manner suited with great force: 1 Sam. xix. 13. LXX. παθόντες τον υγιήν κατά την προσφοράν αὐτῶν, and on that account Justin is less likely to make an objection, than if the text had been read with clubs, because it is used to denote stoning with great force: 1 Sam. xxxiii. 13. LXX. κατὰ τὴν προσφορὰν αὐτῶν καταστροφὴν μεγάλην ὑποκαταστείλας.
account of their faith and great actions, have not yet received the heavenly country promised to Abraham and to his seed.

The reason is, God having foreseen, that by the gospel he would bestow some better means of faith and of being made perfect, by becoming Abraham's spiritual seed, resolved, that the ancients without us should not be made perfect by receiving the promised heavenly country. For he determined that the whole spiritual seed of Abraham, raised from the dead, shall be introduced into that country in a body at one and the same time, namely, after the general judgment.
there to live with God for ever—expressed ver. 14. of this chapter by their seeing God; and were to associate with him, and with the spirits of just men made perfect, and with Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to enjoy all the blessings procured by the shedding of his blood, ver. 18-24.

In the beginning of this epistle, the apostle had affirmed that the same 'God who spake to the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son Jesus.' And this affirmation he had established in the progress of the epistle, by removing all the objections which the unbelieving Jews brought to set aside the claim of Jesus to be the Son of God. In this place, therefore, as the improvement of his doctrine concerning the sonship of Jesus, the apostle exhorted the Hebrews to beware of disbelieving God, who was speaking to them by his Son, and commanding them to obey his gospel. And to enforce this exhortation, the apostle put them in mind of what befell their fathers in the wilderness, when they refused to obey God's command to go into Canaan. If, said he, the Israelites did not escape unpunished, who in Kadesh disobeyed the oracle which Moses delivered from God, ordering them to go up immediately and take possession of the promised inheritance, we who have that example of disobedience and punishment before our eyes, shall much less escape unpunished, if we turn away from God speaking the gospel to us from heaven by Jesus, who now sits at his right hand as the governor of the world, ver. 25. But because to embrace the gospel was in effect to relinquish the law, and because the unbelieving Hebrews were greatly prejudiced against the gospel on that account, the apostle, to persuade them to forsake the law and embrace the gospel, quoted a prophecy of Haggai, in which God, who gave the law, declared that he would set it aside, and put an end to the kingdom of the Jewish princes who supported it, and also destroy the heathen idolatry and kingdoms of the heathen rulers by whom it was upheld: 'His voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once I will shake not the earth only, but also the heaven,' ver. 26. Haggai adds, chap. ii. 6. 'And the sea and the dry land. 7. And I will shake all nations; and the desire of all nations shall come.' That this is a prophecy of the abrogation of the law of Moses, and of the destruction of the heathen idolatry, we learn from God himself, who thus explains what he meant by the shaking of the heavens and the earth, Hag. ii. 21. 'Speak to Zerubabel, governor of Judah, saying, I will shake the heavens and the earth. 32. And I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen.' For from this it is plain, first, That the shaking of the heavens, at the coming of the desire of all nations, means, that at his coming the throne of the kingdom of the Jewish princes who supported the law of Moses was to be overthrown; next, That the shaking of the earth means, that the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen princes who upheld idolatry, was to be destroyed by the preaching of the gospel. Further, seeing in the expression, Hag. ii. 6. 'Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth,' there is a reference to a former shaking of the earth, namely, that which happened at the giving of the law, the interpretation given, Hag. ii. 21, 22, of the shaking of the heavens and the earth, by the preaching of the gospel after the coming of the desire of all nations, leads us to consider the shaking of Mount Sinai, at the giving of the law, as the metempsychial, as it were, of the destruction of the heathen idolatry by the introduction of the law of Moses.—The apostle, for the further information of the Hebrews, told them that the promise, 'Yet once I will shake the heavens and the earth,' implied, that the things shaken and overthrown were to be removed, in order that the things not to be shaken, the Christian church and gospel form of worship, may remain firmly established to the end of time, so that there are to be no more changes made in the religion of the world, ver. 27.

Having finished his address to the unbelieving Hebrews, the apostle directed his discourse to such of the nations as professed the gospel, saying, Whereas, we having received a dispensation of religion which is never to be altered, ought to hold fast the gift of that most excellent dispensation, whereby we can worship God acceptably with reverence and religious fear, ver. 28—For, under the gospel, God is as much a consuming fire to them who disobey him by infidelity, or who affront him by apostasy, as he was to the rebellious Israelites under the law, ver. 29.

CHAP. XII.—Wherefore, even we having so great a cloud of witnesses placed around us, laying aside every weight, and the sin easily committed, let us run (it) with perseverance the race set before us. 2. Looking off to Jesus (στόχον Χριστοῦ) the captain and perfecter of the faith, who, for the joy which was set before him, endured the lingering agencies of the cross.

Commentary.

CHAP. XII.—Wherefore, even we, like the combatants in the Grecian games, having so great an assembly of witnesses placed around us, laying aside every weight of worldly hopes and fears, and the sin easily committed, let us run with perseverance the race appointed us: 2. Looking off from the ancients to Jesus, the leader and rewarder of the faithful, who, for the joy of bringing many sons into glory which was set before him, endured the lingering agencies of the cross.

Ver. 1.—Having so great a cloud.—Both the Greeks and the Romans used the word cloud to express a great number of people. See I Peter iv. 17, note 4. Capel thinks the metaphor is taken from flocks of birds flying in the air like clouds: Isa. lx. 5. Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows? See also Ezek. xxxvi. 9.

2. Of witnesses.—Because at the celebration of the games the victors in the morning combat did not receive the prizes till the evening, but stood at the side from cramps resulting from the preceding combat, the apostle, in allusion to that custom, by an high rhetorical figure, represents the ancient patriarchs, and prophets, and judges, and kings, and captains, and righteous men, mentioned in the preceding chapter, who had been victorious in their own combat, as standing round the Hebrews, and observing how they acquitted themselves in the Christian race. By using this figure, however, the apostle did not mean to insinuate, that the saints in the other world know what we are doing in this; but to teach us to think of them often; that by the recollection of their trials and virtues we may stir ourselves up to greater diligence in our Christian course.

3. The joy which was set before him.—Bona secunda, literally, which stirs up contentiously around one, to allure him or, the self-glorified sin—the sin which is well adapted to one's circumstances and inclinations, consequently is easily committed; in opposition to στόχον, that which hath no recommending circumstance, or which is destitute of ornament.

4. Let us run with perseverance the race set before us.—It is thought that the Hebrews were not acquainted with the Olympic and other sacred games of the Greeks; we may suppose the apostle alludes to the games which Herod instituted in imitation of the Greeks, in some of the cities which he built in Judæa, of which he was the first to compete and to become a judge. See II Macc. vi. note 5. The assembled spectators, and the acts of the games, were not to determine who were the conquerors, and to make them perfect as combatants, by bestowing on them the prizes for which they had contended.

5. Who, for the joy which was set before him.—The phrase για την ευτυχίαν, is by some translated 'who, instead of the joy,' understanding thereby the joy of governing the world, possessed from the beginning by right of creation; or according to enured the cross, despising the shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. 3 (Ps. 22.) Wherefore, attentively consider him who endured such contradiction from sinners against himself; that ye may not be weary, being faint in your souls. 4. Not yet into blood have ye resisted, combating against sin.

5 (Ps. 22.) Besides, have ye forgotten the exhortation which (hominem) teaches with you as with children. (Prov. iii. 11.) My son, do not think lightly of the Lord's chastisement, neither faint when thou art rebuked (et) of him: 6. For whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. (See Rom. iii. 19.) 7. If ye endure chastisement, God behareth towards you as HIS children, for what son is there whom HIS father doth not chastise?

8. But if ye be without chastisement, of which all sons are partakers, certainly ye are bastards, and not sons.

9 (tresp.) Further, we have had fathers of our flesh, who chastised us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of our spirits, and live?

10 For they verily, (την, 295.) during a few days, chastised us according to their own pleasure, but he for OUR advantage, (κατα την κατάστασιν) in order that OUR partaking of his holiness.

11 Now no chastisement indeed, for the present, seemeth to be MISTER of joy, but of sorrow: Nevertheless, afterwards, it returns the peaceful fruit of righteousness to them who are trained by it.

12 Wherefore, bring to their right position others, the joy of his human art, which he parted with, choosing to endure the cross. But in my opinion both pleasure is improper, because the apostle speaks of a joy which Jesus was not in possession of, but which was set before him as the reward of his sufferings. - The joy before him, is contrasted with the race set before us. ver. 1.

2. Endured the cross... The example of Christ's sufferings and reward in so poor a manner as to amuse his disciples to imitate him in suffering, that like him they may be rewarded. Ver. 3. Attentively consider him... Krauchen Schilling observes, that the word σκοπεῖν being used to denote the accurate observation of arithmetical and geometrical proportions, signifies to consider Christ with the greatest of accuracy of observation. Thus the Hebrews were to do, that they might understand the difference between Christ and them: For, by attending to what the Son of God endured from sinners, they would not think much of the calamities, the scoffing speeches, and the persecutions, which they endur from our unbelieving brethren, nor be so discouraged by them as to faint or renounce the gospel. Ver. 4. Combating against sin... Here the alteration is from running to fighting with the cross, or to wrestling. Ver. 5. Consider... properly signified, and so it is rendered in Acts xvii. 30. He himself entering into the synagogue, (κατα την κατάστασιν) presented with the Jews. Ver. 6. On whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth... This passage of scripture, by placing the dispensations of Providence in a just light, banishes that gloom which the discord and intercessies prevailing in the world are apt to occasion. We are here in a state of education, under the tuition of God; who presents us the office of a good and beneficial Father. By the various afflictions of life, he teaches us the virtues necessary to fit us for discharging the duties, and for enjoying the pleasures, of heaven. May every afflicted person firmly believe this!

3. And scourgeth every son whom he receiveth... This is the LXX. translation of Prov. iii. 12. which Hallet thinks more near than the common version. Ver. 4. For he saith... signifies either as a father, or as a master; in which latter sense it is translated in the Arabic, Hebrese. 469—endured the shame of suffering as a malefactor, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. See chap. viii. 1. note 3.

3. Wherefore, attentively consider the dignity of Jesus your leader, who, before he was thus rewarded, patiently endured such calamity, opposition, and persecution from sinners against himself, that ye may not be weary, being divested in your minds through the continuance of the persecution. 4. Your sufferings are far short of those which Christ endured. For not yet hath the blood of any of you been shed in combating against your wicked persecutors. See Pref. sect. 2. paragr. 4.

5. Besides, have ye forgotten the exhortation in which God reasoneth with you as with his children? My son, do not think lightly of the Lord's chastisement, as they who regard affliction as things accidental; neither, through too quick a feeling of the chastisement, nor by considering it as a token of God's anger, fall into despair when thou art rebuked of him.

6. Instead of being tokens of God's anger, afflictions are proofs of his love: For whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth, and sharply corrects for his faults every son whom he adopteth.

7. If ye endure affliction, know that God behareth towards you as HIS children, giving you such corrections as must be of great advantage to you. For what legitimate son is there whom his father never punisheth for his faults?

8. But if ye live without that chastisement whereof all the sons of God are partakers, certainly ye are treated as bastards whose education is no object of their father's care, and not as the genuine sons of God.

9. Further, we have had fathers of our bodies, who chastised us for our faults, and yet we loved and obeyed them: shall we not much rather, from affection and gratitude, be in subjection to the Father of our spirits, when he corrects us for our faults, to fit us for living with him forever?

10. This submission is due to the Father of our spirits, because he corrects us with more prudence and affection than our earthly fathers. For they verily, during the few days of our childhood, chastised us according to their own will governed by passion, but he, always for our advantage, that we might partake of his holiness; it being necessary to our living with him eternally, that we be holy.

11. Now no chastisement, indeed, whether from God or man, at the time it is inflicted, is the cause of joy, but of sorrow; Nevertheless, afterwards, it gives as a reward the peaceful fruit of righteousness to them who are properly disciplined by it.

12. Wherefore, bring into the posture of action your arms which...
11 Peace with all men, and holiness, without which no one shall see the Lord; 12 carefully observing, lest any one come short of the grace of God, lest some bitter root springing up trouble you, and by it many be polluted; 13 lest there be among you any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one meal gave away his birthright.

14 And ye know, that (Gen. 25:31) although afterwards he wished to inherit the blessing, he was reproved, for he found no place of rest in the possession of the arms of Jacob and the knee of Isaac. His meaning was, he cannot inherit the favor of your veneration, unless you accept his counsel; and yet, if you accept it, you will derive inestimable good for the future. But, we must understand this metaphor in a spiritual sense, because the words themselves, "blessings," here denoteth the grace of God, of which Esau was deprived, without which no one shall see the Lord; it is the grace, therefore, that he would have obtained, had he persevered in the path of righteousness. There is, however, another meaning, as he himself explicates, by the use of the words. "Lest some bitter root springing up trouble you, and by it many be polluted" — that is, lest there should be among you any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one meal gave away his birthright.

15 Brethren, if any of you err from the truth, one that is a perfect in the faith should receive him, unless he consent to sin or speak according to the doctrine of Satan.

16 Let us not be like Esau, who for one meal gave away his birthright, for which Jacob obtained the favor of the Lord.

17 And he so prophesied, that as the lame man was not at the prayer-tent, as the sick man was not in the hospital, so no one shall see the Lord except he has the grace of God. But his doctrine is, that none of you shall be numbered in the elect unless you have the grace of God, which Esau lost because he gave away his birthright, and thus he, by leaving the grace of God, separated himself from the Lord.

18 Brethren, if any of you err from the truth, one that is a perfect in the faith should receive him, unless he consent to sin or speak according to the doctrine of Satan.

21. And so terrible was that manifestation of the divine presence which appeared, that Moses cried to God, I am exceedingly afraid and quake.

22. But ye shall come to a place where ye shall be safe from the manifestation of God, the place of the heavenly city, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, in your worship shall associate with ten thousands of angels.
23 To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, who are written in heaven, and to the God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect;

24 And to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling which spoaketh better things than that of Abel.

25 Take care that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they shall not escape who refused him that spake as it were in ordinary time, much more shall not they escape who receiveth not him that speaketh in the power of the resurrection.

26 For even the angels, that cannot be cleansed through the blood of animals, make request through the Spirit of prayer for the souls of the saints.

27 Pray for me also, that the message may be graciously received by me as I speak in the Spirit of Christ for the edification of the church of God.

28 For I am already being poured out as an offering, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me on that day, and not to me only, but also to all them who have loved his appearing.

28 Wherefore, we having received a kingdom not to be shaken, let us hold fast the assurance of our gospel: without hands—things of an inferior and imperfect nature; that the things not to be shaken, are things of a superior and perfect nature.

CHAPTER XIII.

View and Illustration.

This chapter begins with an exhortation to the Hebrews to exercise love to the brethren, hospitality to strangers, and compassion to the imprisoned and afflicted: charity likewise is recommended, together with disinterestedness, and a careful imitation of their teachers, whose trial was ended, and who had shewed great fortitude in suffering for their faith, ver. 1-8.

Next, the Hebrews were desired to beware of being tossed about with those discordant doctrines which were introduced by foreign, that is, unauthorized teachers; especially those pernicious doctrines, concerning the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices to procure the pardon of sin, which the Judaizing teachers inculcated with great earnestness. Their giving heed to these errors the apostle was anxious to prevent, because, if they trusted to the Levitical atonements for pardon, they would lose the benefit of the sacrifice of Christ. This, the apostle told them, their own law taught them figuratively, by prohibiting the priests and people to eat of those sacrifices whose blood was carried into the holy places to make atonement. And being unwilling to quit the subject, he added, that because the carcases of the sin-offerings were ordered to be burnt without the camp as things unclean, ver. 11. So Jesus, who sanctified the people with his own blood, suffered as a malefactor or unclean person without the gates of Jerusalem, ver. 12. These particulars the apostle mentioned, to show, that all the Levitical sin-offerings were types of Christ, whose example in suffering ignominy and punishment for men he desired the Hebrews to imitate from gratitude, by willingly suffering reproach and persecution for his sake, ver. 13. And this they might do the more easily, as they knew they had no continuing city here, but were seeking one in the life to come, ver. 14. In the mean time, he exhorted them to worship God, not in the Jewish but in the Christian manner, by offering through Christ the sacrifices of praise to God continually, ver. 15. and to be zealous in doing good works, because worship, accomplished with such works, are sacrifices far more pleasing to God than the sacrifices of beasts, ver. 16.

Again, because the Hebrews, through the prejudices of their education, were in danger of not hearkening to their teachers when they inculcated the true doctrines of the gospel, he ordered them to be obedient to their spiritual guides, and to esteem them highly as persons who watched for their souls, ver. 17. And requested them to pray for him, because he assured them that he had maintained a good conscience in all the things he had written to them, ver. 18. Then gave them his apostolical benediction in a most elegant form, ver. 20, 21 and besought them to take in good part the instruction contained in this letter, which he acknowledged was a short one, considering the variety and importance of the subjects he had handled in it, ver. 22.

Having thus finished his exhortations, the apostle informed the Hebrews that he had sent away Timothy on some important business, but promised, if he returned in time, to bring him with him when he visited them, ver. 23. In the mean while, he desired them to present his salutation to all the rulers of their church; meaning, I suppose, the apostles and elders at Jerusalem: also, in his name, to salute all the brethren and saints; and sent them the salutation of the brethren in Italy, ver. 24. Then concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction in a more short form, ver. 25.

3 Remember them who are in bonds, as jointly bound, and them who suffer evil, as being yourselves also in the body. 1

4 Let marriage be honourable among all, and the bed undefiled. (3, 105.) For fornicators and adulterers God will judge.

Hebrews. 3

3 By your prayers and good offices assist them who are in bonds for their religion, as equally liable to be bound for that good cause; and them who suffer any kind of evil, as being yourselves also in the body, subject to adversity.

4 In opposition to the notions of the Essenes, let marriage be esteemed a honourable state among all ranks, and let adultery be avoided. For fornicators and adulterers, though not punished by men, God will severely punish, as invaders of their neighbour's dearest rights.

5 However poor ye may be, let no immoderate love of money be seen in your dealings; being contented with what things ye have. In every difficulty rely on God. For, when he apostatized, Joshua, to conduct the Israelites, he himself said, (Josh. i. 5.) As I was with Moses, so will I be with thee, I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. 3

So that when afflicted, but especially when persecuted, we may say with the Psalmist, (Ps. cxvii. 6, LXX.) The Lord is my helper, and I will not be afraid of any evil that man can do to me in opposition to him.

7 Remember your teachers who have preached to you the word of God; of whose conversation attentively considering the ending, imitate their faith in the doctrines, and precepts, and promises of the gospel, when ye end your conversation, ye may be supported as they were.

8 Jesus Christ, yesterday and to-day, is the same powerful, great form of men, supposed to them to be men on a journey, and though with them, invited and entertained them with the greatest liberality and love, without knowing them to be angels. This is more, not to raise in us the expectation of entertaining angels, but to make us sensible that the unknown persons, in whom we show kindness, may be persons of the greatest worth, and may be to us, as the angels were to Abraham and Lot, be the occasion of great blessing.

3. 3 Being yourselves also in the body. The precepts contained in this and the following verses, but especially the precept in this verse, on account of the simplicity, brevity, and beauty of the language, and the strength of the reasons added to support them, may be compared with the most elegant of the precepts of Epictetus, or of any of the most famed heathen philosophers; and on the comparison they will be found persons of far exceed them all. 3. 4. 4. 1. Let marriage be honourable. I have supplied the word of love, as the preceding and following verses, in the imperative mood.

2. 5. 2. For fornicators. This is in the Vulgate translation, Fornicatorem censum. 3. 1. — Let your behaviour. The word censum is used likewise by Plato, and other Greek writers, to denote one's manner of living.

2. 6. 6. 1. And being contented with the things ye have. The apostle did not mean by this to preserve the Hebrews, or any person, from using lawful means forbettering God, and especially their circumstances; but that he laboured with that loving concern in the use of vulgar means, yea, by forswearing the immediate love of money, and returning contentment with the things which are the fruits of our own labour and the possession and exercise of various duties, richer than from the enjoyment of riches. The argument, ver. 6, by which the apostle enforces his precept, leads me to think that he means contentment with our lot, whatever it may be. In this large sense the apostle's concern is expressed in the Scripture, (Ps. cxxvii.) to an excellent illustration of the apostle's precept: Say ye, 'There never was any system before's that of Christianity, which could so effectually produce in the mind of man the virtue I have been hitherto speaking of. In order to make us content with our present condition, many of the ancient philosophers tell us that our discontent only hurts ourselves, without being able to make any alteration in our circumstances; others, that whatever evil befalls us is derived to us by a God's necessity, in which the wise themselves are subject; while others very gravely tell the man who is miserable, that it is necessary he should be so as to keep up the harmony of the universe, and that the schemes of Providence would be troubled and perplexed were he otherwise. These, and the like considerations, rather silence than satisfy a man. They may show him that contentment is unreasonable, but are by no means sufficient to relieve it. They rather give despair than consolation. In a word, a man might reply to one of these comforters, as Augustus did to his friend who advised him not to think of death, for the person whom he loved, because his grief could not be with him. — It is for that very reason, said the emperor, that I suffer. — Religion bears a more tender regard to human exalted nature. It prescribes to a very miserable man the means of bettering his condition; say, it shews him, that the bearing of his afflictions as he ought to do, will naturally end in the removal of them. It makes him easy here, because it can make him happy hereafter. — Upon the whole, a contented mind is the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in the present world; and if in the present life his happiness arise from the solemnity of his duties, it will arise in the best from the gratification of them." The same author, in the same essay, as a proper means of acquiring the virtue of contentment, advises a man. 3. 1. — To set the good things which he possesses in opposition to those which he does not possess. For thus he will be sensible, that the things which he enjoys are many more in number, and of greater value, than those which he would for, and for the want of which he is unhappy. 3. 2. Under affliction, to reflect how much more unhappy he might be than he really is. The former consideration leads to those who are in easy circumstances; this regard to those who are under the pressure of some misfortune. To much it will be an alleviation of their sufferings to compare them with those of others. He adds, that Bishop Fell, who wrote the life of Dr. Hammond, said, that good man, who laboured under a complication of disturbances, used, when he had the good upon him, to thank God that it was not the stone; and when he had the stone, that he had not both these distempers upon him at the same time. 3. 3. Himself hath said, — Aveque regis legatus, This utter regis is of much greater authority than the utter regis of the Vulgate. And by quoting it on this occasion the apostle signifies his faithful accant of God, in those difficulties to which he is exposed, may apply to himself God's promise to Joshua, while he endeavours to do his duty.

4. Utterly break they. 1. The multitude of the negative epithets, and their position in the original, render this passage exceedingly emphatical and beautiful. — This promise David repeated to Solomon, 1 Chron. xxviii. 9. See also Esai. xix. 17. 3. Ver. 6. — Taking courage we may say, — God's promise to Joshua and to David, and their expression of their gratitude, but applied by the apostle to the Hebrews, it teaches us, that God's promises to individuals, and their expressions of their faith and trust in them, are recorded in scripture for the encouragement of the people of God in every age. 3. 2. I will not fear what man can do to me. As a remedy against the immediate fear of evil from men, and especially from the promise here, which every good man may apply to himself, namely, that the Lord is his helper, the apostle advice to consider, First, that, what he fears may not come to pass. No human scheme can be so accurately projected but some little circumstance intervenes and changes it. The apostle also reminds them of the heart of man at his pleasure, and understands the thoughts have before, may by thousand accidents or an immediate change in the occasions of men, discover the most subtle project, and turn it to the benefit of his own account. In the next place, we should consider, though the evil we imagine should come to pass, it may be much more supportable than it appeared to be. As there is no prosperous state of life without its calamities, so there is no adversity without its benefit. The evils of this life appear like rocks and precipices, rugged and barren at a distance, but at our nearer approach we find little fruitful spots and refreshing springs, mixed with the hardiness and deformities of nature. In the last place, we may comfort ourselves with this consideration, that as the thing feared may not touch us, so we may not fear what we fear. Our lives may not extend to the dreadful point which we have in view. He who knows all our sufferings, and will not suffer us to be tempted beyond our strength, is often pleased, in his tender mercy, to separate the soul from its body and sin, and after that we are delivered from the hand of sin, we shall partake of the fruits of their flocks. 2. Of whose conversation attentively considering the ending. — See ver. 17 note I. — This remembrance of the dead saints, with admiration of their virtues, and with a desire to imitate them, is the only worship which is due to them from the living.
9. Be not tossed about with various and foreign doctrines. (See Ephes. iv. 5.) For it is good that the heart be established by grace, not by meats, through which they have not been profited who walk in them.

10. We have an altar, of which they have no right to eat who worship in the tabernacle.

11. For, of those animals whose blood was brought as a sin-offering into the holy places by the high-priest, the bodies are burnt without the camp.

12. Therefore, Jesus also, that he might sanctify (see Heb. ii. 10) the people (Lev. 16.) with his own blood, suffered without the gate.

13. Wherefore, let us go forth, (See, 294.) with him out of the camp, bearing his reproach.

14. For we have not here an abiding city, but we earnestly seek one to come. (Chap. xi. 10.)

Verse 9. Jesus Christ, yesterday and to-day, the same. — Because Jesus Christ sometimes signifies the doctrine of Christ, (Acts v. 12.) i Cor. ii. 2.) (Ver. iv. 5.) Be not tossed about with various and foreign doctrines. (See Ephes. iv. 5.) For it is good that the heart be established by grace, not by meats, through which they have not been profited who walk in them. — 9. For it is good that the heart be established by grace, not by meats, through which they have not been profited who walk in them.

Verse 10. We have an altar, of which they have no right to eat. — Here, by a metaphorical language, the altar is put for the sacrifice, as plain from the apostle’s adding, of which they have no right to eat, the sacrifice-belonging to those who believe, is the sacrifice of himself, which Christ offered to God in heaven for the sins of all the world, and the eating of that sacrifice doth not mean the corporal eating thereof, but the partaking of the pardon which Christ hath procured for sinners by that sacrifice.

Verse 11. For, of those animals whose blood was brought as a sin-offering into the holy places by the high-priest, the bodies are burnt without the camp. — But though their interpretation contains an excellent sentiment, others, more justly in my opinion, understand this of the nature, rather than of the doctrine of Christ, especially as the 1st verse, the phrase here used, is that for which the immortality of the Son is expressed, Heb. i. 12. But them art (1:1:) the same. — The apostle uses many individual, yet most important ones. — Here, by a metaphorical language, the altar is put for the sacrifice, as plain from the apostle’s adding, of which they have no right to eat, the sacrifice-belonging to those who believe, is the sacrifice of himself, which Christ offered to God in heaven for the sins of all the world, and the eating of that sacrifice doth not mean the corporal eating thereof, but the partaking of the pardon which Christ hath procured for sinners by that sacrifice.

Verse 12. Therefore, Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people, with his own blood, suffered without the gate. — Therefore Jesus also, that he might be known to sanctify the people of God with his own blood sprinkled before the throne of God in heaven, as it is said, they suffered without the gate of Jerusalem, as the bodies of the sin-offerings were burnt without the camp.

Verse 13. Wherefore, let us go forth, (See, 294.) with him out of the camp, bearing his reproach. — Wherefore, let us go forth, without the camp, bearing the reproach of being malefactors.

Verse 14. For we have not here an abiding city, but we earnestly seek one to come; namely, the city of the living God, of which I speak to you, chap. xii. 22.
15 And though persecuted by our unbelieving brethren, through him, as our High Priest, let us offer up the sacrifice of praise continually to God, for his goodness in our redemption, and the fruit of our lips, by confessing openly our hope of pardon through Christ, to the glory of God's perfections.

16 But, at the same time, to do good works, and to communicate of your substance to the poor, do not forget; for with such sacrifices God is especially delighted. See Phil. iv. 18. note 3.

17 Follow the directions of your spiritual guides, and submit yourselves to their admonitions, for they watch over your behaviour for your good of your souls, as those who must give account. Obey them, therefore, that they may do this with joy, and not with murmuring; for that would be unprofitable for you.

18 Pray for us; for we are confident that we have good conscience, willing in all things to behave well.

19 And I the more earnestly beseech you to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 Now may the God of peace, who brought back from the dead our Lord Jesus the great Shepherd of the sheep, e. through the blood of the everlasting covenant, 21 Make you fit for every good work, to do his will, producing in you what is acceptable in his sight through Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

22 Now I beseech you, brethren, suffer this word of exhortation, for I have written to you (as I supposed) briefly.

23 Know that our brother Timothy is sent away, with whom, if he come soon, I will see you.
EPILLOGUE

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLES.

I. That Christianity was not a story set on foot amidst the confusions which attended and immediately preceded the destruction of Jerusalem; when many extravagant reports were circulated, when men's minds were broken by terror and distress, when amidst the tumults that surrounded them inquiry was impracticable. These letters shew incontestably, that the religion had fixed and established itself before this state of things took place.

II. Whereas it hath been insinuated, that our Gospels may have been made up of reports and stories which were current at the time, we may observe, that with respect to the Epistles it is not applicable at all.

III. These letters prove, that the converts to Christianity were not drawn from the barbarous, the mean, or the ignorant set of men, which the representations of infidelity would sometimes make them. We learn from letters, the character not only of the writers, but, in some measure, of the persons to whom they are written. To suppose that these letters were addressed to a rude tribe, incapable of thought or reflection, is just as reasonable as to suppose Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding to have been written for the instruction of savages. Whatever may be thought of these letters in other respects, either of diction or argument, they are certainly removed as far as possible from the habits and comprehension of barbarous people.

IV. St. Paul's history, I mean so much of it as may be collected from his letters, is so implicated with that of the other apostles, and with the substance indeed of the Christian history itself, that I apprehend it will be found impossible to admit St. Paul's story (I do not speak of the miraculous part of it) to be true, and yet to reject the rest as fabulous. For instance, can any one believe that there was such a man as Paul, a preacher of Christianity in the age which we assign to him, and not believe that there were also at the same time such men as Peter, and James, and other apostles, who had been companions of Christ.
during his life, and who after his death published and avowed the same things concerning him which Paul taught? Jude, and especially Jerusalem, was the scene of Christ's ministry. The witness of his miracles lived there. St. Paul by his own account, as well as that of his historian, appears to have frequently visited this city; to have carried on a communication with the church there; to have associated with the rulers and elders of that church, who were some of them apostles; to have acted, as occasions offered, in correspondence, and sometimes in conjunction with them. Can it be after this be doubted, but that the religion, and the general facts relating to it, which St. Paul appears by his letters to have delivered to the several churches which he established at a distance, were at the same time taught and published at Jerusalem itself, the place where the business was transacted, and taught and published, by those who had attended the founder of the institution in his miraculous, or pretended miraculous ministry?

"It is observable, for so it appears both in the Epistles and from the Acts of the Apostles, that Jerusalem, and the society of believers in that city, long continued the centre from which the missionaries of the religion issued, with which all other churches maintained a correspondence and connexion, to which they referred their doubts, and to whose relief, in times of public distress, they remitted their charitable assistance. This observation I think material; because it proves that this was not the case of giving out accounts in one country of what is transacted in another, without affording the hearers an opportunity of knowing whether the things related were credited by any, or even published in the place where they are reported to have passed.

"V. St. Paul's letters furnish evidence (and what better evidence than a man's own letters can be desired?) of the soundness and sobriety of his judgment. His caution in distinguishing between the occasional suggestions of inspiration, and the ordinary exercise of his natural understanding, is without example in the history of human enthusiasm. His morality is everywhere calm, pure, and rational, adapted to the condition, the activity, and the business of social life, and of its various relations; free from the over-scrupulousness and squalor of superstition, and from (what was more perhaps to be apprehended) the abstractions of quietism, and the sorceries or extravagancies of fanaticism. His judgment concerning a hesitating conscience, his opinion of the moral inefficacy of many actions, yet of the prudence and even duty of compliance, where non-compliance would produce evil effects upon the minds of the persons who observed it, is as correct and just as the most liberal and enlightened moralists could form at this day. The accuracy of modern ethics has found nothing to amend in these determinations.

"What Lord Lyttelton has remarked of the preference accorded by St. Paul to inward rectitude of principle above every other religious accomplishment, is very material to our present purpose. In his first epistle to the Corinthians, chap. xiii. 1-3. St. Paul has these words:—Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Is this the language of enthusiasm! Did ever an enthusiast prefer that universal benevolence which comprehended all moral virtues, and which, as appeared by the following verses, is meant by charity? St. Paul has these words, I say, I prefer that benevolence (which we may add is attainable by every man) to faith and to miracles, to those religious opinions which he had embraced, and to those supernatural graces and gifts which he imagined he had acquired, nay, even to the merit of martyrdom! Is it not the genius of enthusiasm to set moral virtues infinitely below the merit of faith, and, of all moral virtues, to value that least which is most particularly enforced by St. Paul, a spirit of candour, moderation, and peace! Certainly neither the temper nor the opinions of a man subject to fanatic delusions are to be found in this passage."—Considerations on the Conversion, &c.

"I see no reason, therefore, to question the integrity of his understanding. To call him a visionary, because he appealed to visions, or an enthusiast, because he pretended to inspiration, is to take the question for granted. It is to take for granted that no such visions or inspirations existed; at least it is to assume, contrary to his own assertions, that he had no other proofs than these to offer of his mission, or of the truth of his relations.

"One thing I allow, that his letters everywhere discover great zeal and earnestness in the cause in which he was engaged; that is to say, he was convinced of the truth of what he taught; he was deeply impressed, but not more so than the occasion merited, with a sense of its importance. This produces a corresponding animation and ardor in the exercise of his ministry. But would not these considerations, supposing them to be well-founded, have benched the same place, and produced the same effect, in a mind the strongest and the most sedate?

"VI. These letters are decisive as to the sufferings of the author; also as to the distressed state of the Christian church, and the dangers which attended the preaching of the gospel. See Col. i. 24.; 1 Cor. xv. 30, 31, 32; Rom. viii. 17, 18, 35, 36.; 1 Cor. vii. 25, 26.; Philip. i. 29, 30.; Gal. vi. 14, 17.; 1 Thess. i. 6.; 2 Thess. i. 4.

"We may seem to have accumulated texts unnecessarily; but besides that the point which they are brought to prove is of great importance, there is this also to be remarked, that the manner in which the author draws the reader by the argument on the occasion; that the notice which is taken of his sufferings, and of the suffering condition of Christianity, is perfectly incidental, and is dictated by no design of stating the facts themselves. Indeed they are not stated at all; they may rather be said to be assumed. This is a distinction upon which we have relied a good deal in the former part of this treatise; and where the writer's information cannot be doubted, it always, in my opinion, adds greatly to the value and credit of the testimony, &c.

"In the following quotations, the reference to the author's sufferings is accompanied with a specification of his time and place, and with an appeal for the truth of what he declares to the knowledge of the persons whom he addresses, 1 Thess. ii. 2. 2 Tim. iii. 10, 11.

"I apprehend, that to this point, as far as the testimony of St. Paul is credible, the evidence from his letters is complete and full. It appears under every form in which it could appear, by occasional allusions and by direct assertions, by general declarations and by specific examples.

"VII. St. Paul in these letters asserts, in positive and unequivocal terms, his performance of miracles, strictly and properly so called: Gal. iii. 5. 1 Cor. ii. 4. 5. 1 Thess. i. 5. Heb. ii. 4. Rom. xv. 15. 16. 9 Cor. xii. 12.

"Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you, in all patience, by signs and wonders and mighty deeds. These words, signs, wonders, and mighty deeds, (γενέμα, καὶ χάριτα, καὶ δυνάμεις,) are the specific appropriate terms throughout the New Testament, employed when public sensible miracles are intended to be expressed. This will appear by consulting amongst other places the following texts: Mark xvi. 20. Luke xxii. 43. Acts ii. 22. 1 Cor. xii. iv. 48, 54. xi. 49. Acts ii. 23. iv. 30. v. 12. vi. 8. vii. 16. xiv. 3. xvi. 12. And it cannot be shown, that they are ever employed to express anything else. Further, these words not only denote miracles as opposed to natural effects, but they denote visible, and what may be called external miracles, as distinguished, First, from inspiration. If St. Paul had meant to refer only to secret illuminations of his understanding, or secret influences upon his will or affections, he could not with truth have represented them as signs and wonders wrought by him, or signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds wrought amongst them. Secondly, from visions. These would not by any means satisfy the force of the terms, signs, wonders, and mighty deeds; still less could they be said to be wrought by him, or wrought amongst them; nor are these terms and expressions anywhere applied to visions. When our author alludes to the supernatural communications which he had received, either by vision or otherwise, he uses expressions suited to the nature of the subject, but very different from the words which we quoted. He calls them revelations, but never signs, wonders, or mighty deeds. 'I will come,' says he, 'to visions and revelations of the Lord;' and then proceeds to describe a particular instance; and afterwards adds, 'lest I should be exalted above measure, through the abundance of the revelations, there was given me a thorn in the flesh.'

"Upon the whole, the matter admits of no softening qualification or ambiguity whatever. If St. Paul did not work actual, sensible, public miracles, he has knowingly in these letters borne his testimony to a falsehood. I need not add, that in two also of his quotations he has advanced his assertion in the face of those persons amongst whom he declares the miracles to have been wrought."

"Let it be remembered, that the Acts of the Apostles describe various particular miracles wrought by St. Paul, which in their nature answer to the terms and expressions which we have seen to be used by St. Paul himself."

"Here then we have a man of liberal attainments, and in other points of sound judgment, who had addicted his life to the service of the gospel. We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, travelling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, encountering every extremity of danger, assaulted by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beat, stoned, left for dead; expecting wherever he came a renewal of the same treatment and the same dangers, yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next; spending his whole time in the employment, sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety; persisting in this course to old age, unaltered by the experience of perverseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion; unsubdued by anxiety, want, labour, persecution; unwearyed by long confinement; undismayed by the prospect of death. Such was St. Paul. We have his letters in our hands; we have also a history purporting to be written by one of his fellow-travellers, and appearing, by a comparison with these letters, certainly to have been written by some person well acquainted with the transactions of his life. From the letters, as well as from the history, we gather, not only the account which we have stated of him, but that he was one out of many who acted and suffered in the same manner; and that of those who did so, several had been the companions of Christ's ministry, the ocular witnesses, or pretendors to be such, of his miracles and of his resurrection. We moreover find this same person referring in his letters to his supernatural conversion, the particulars and accompanying circumstances of which are related in the history, and which accompanying circumstances, if all or any of them be true, render it impossible to have been a delusion. We also find him positively, and in appropriate terms, asserting that he himself worked miracles, strictly and properly so called, in support of the mission which he executed; the history meanwhile recording various passages of his ministry which come up to the extent of this assertion. The question is, whether falsehood was ever attested by evidence like this? Falsehoods, we know, have found their way into reports, into tradition, into books; but is an example to be met with of a man voluntarily undertaking a life of want and pain, of incessant fatigue, of continual peril; submitting to the loss of his home and country, to stripes and stoning, to tedious imprisonment, and the constant expectation of a violent death, for the sake of carrying about a story of what was false, and of what, if false, he must have known to be so?"—Hors Paulianus, chap. xvi. p. 405–423.
JAMES.

PREFACE.

The following seven epistles have commonly been called Catholic Epistles; but for what reason, commentators are not agreed. Hammond’s account of the matter seems as probable as any; namely, that the first epistle of Peter, and the first of John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the name of Catholic, or universally acknowledged, and therefore canonical epistles, to distinguish them from the epistle of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and the epistle of Jude; all which were for a while doubted of, and by many not considered as a rule of faith. But their authenticity being at length acknowledged by the generality of the churches, they also obtained the name of Catholic or universally received Epistles, and were esteemed of equal authority with the rest. Whitby, however, seems to adopt the account which Oecumenius hath given of this matter; namely, that these epistles were denounced Catholic, because all of them, except the two short epistles of John, were written, not to people dwelling in one place, but to the Jews dispersed through all the countries within the Roman empire.

Here it is proper to observe, that as we judged it necessary to establish the authenticity of Paul’s epistles to the Hebrews, because of all his epistles it alone was called in question, so we judge it necessary to establish the authenticity of the five epistles above mentioned, because they were doubted of by many in the first age. In the preface, therefore, to each of these epistles, I will explain the grounds on which the church hath now received them into the canon of scripture; and the rather, because it will show how generally all Paul’s epistles, except that to the Hebrews, were acknowledged and received as his from the very beginning. See sect. 2. paragraph 2. of this Preface.

The testimonies of the ancients, by which the authenticity of the books of the New Testament, and more especially of the Catholic epistles, is established, have been carefully collected, and most fairly proposed by the excellent Lardner, in the supplement to his Credibility, &c. From that valuable work I have transcribed the testimonies of the greatest importance for establishing the genuineness of the Catholic epistles, and have marked the pages where they are to be found. But, in some cases, having abridged Lardner’s account, I have not marked the places from which I have taken the particulars. But the reader who desires more full information, will easily obtain it by consulting the three vols. of his Supplement, which treat of the Canon of the New Testament, where also he will find the judgment of authors, both ancient and modern, concerning the above-mentioned doubted epistles, either accurately recited, or the places of their works distinctly referred to, in which they have given their opinion concerning them.

Sect. I.—The History of James, the Author of the Epistle which bears his name.

In the catalogues of the apostles, given Matt. x. 2, Mark iii. 16, Luke vi. 14, Acts i. 13, we find two persons of the name of James. The first was the son of Zebedee, Matt. x. 2; the second, in all the catalogues, is called the son of Alphaeus. One of these apostles is called, Gal. i. 19. ‘the Lord’s brother.’—Wherefore, as there were only twelve apostles, and as James the son of Zebedee, so far as we know, was in no respect related to our Lord, the apostle called James the Lord’s brother must have been James the son of Alphaeus, called also James the less, or younger, whose relation to Christ will appear by comparing Mark xv. 40, with John xix. 25. In the former passage, Mark, speaking of the women who were present at the crucifixion, says, ‘There were also women looking on afar off, among whom were Mary Magdalene, and the mother of James the less, and of Joses and Salome.’ In the latter passage, John, speaking of the same women, says, ‘There stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother’s sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene.’ Wherefore, our Lord’s ‘mother’s sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas,’ mentioned by John, is, in all probability, the person whom Mark calls ‘Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joses;’ consequently, her sons James and Joses were our Lord’s cousins-german by his mother. And as the Hebræans called all near relations brethren, (compare Gen. xiii. 8, with Gen. xi. 27. and Gen. xxii. 12. with ver. 15.,) it is more than probable, that James the son of Alphaeus, who was our Lord’s cousin-german, is ‘James the Lord’s brother’ mentioned Gal. i. 19. Three circumstances confirm this opinion: 1st, James and Joses, the sons of Mary our Lord’s mother’s sister, are expressly called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3.—2d, James the son of our Lord’s mother’s sister, being distinguished from another James by the appellation of the less, Mark xv. 40, there is good reason to think that he is the James whom Mark in this catalogue distinguishes from James the son of Zebedee, by the appellation of the son of Alphaeus. It is true, Mary the mother of James and Joses is called the wife of Cleophas, John xix. 25. But Cleophas and Alphaeus are the same names differently pronounced, the one according to the Hebrew, the other according to the Greek orthography.—3d, Of the persons called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. three are mentioned in the catalogues as apostles; namely, James, and Simon, and Judas. They, I suppose, are the brethren of the Lord, who are said, as apostles, to have had a right to lead about a sister, or a wife, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 5.—Jerome likewise thought James the Lord’s brother was so called, because he was the son of Mary our Lord’s mother’s sister. “Jacobus, qui appellatur frater Domini, cognomento justus, ut nonnulli existimant Josephi ex aliqua uxor, ut aeterni mili videtur, Marne sororis matris Domini (cujus Joannes in libro surneminit) filius, post passionem Domini a apostolis Hierosolymorum episcopos ordinatus, unam tantum scriptam epistolam, quam de septem Catholicis est.” Art. Jacobus.—Lardner, Canon. vol. iii. p. 65. says, Jerome seems to have been the first who said our Lord’s brethren were the sons of his mother’s sister; and that his opinion was at length embraced by Augustine, and has prevailed very much of late, being the opinion of the Romanists in general, and of Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, and many of the Protestants. On the other hand, Origens, Ephraemius, and other ancient writers, both Greeks and Latins, were of opinion, that James the Lord’s brother was not the son of the Virgin’s sister, but of Joseph our Lord’s reputed father by a former wife, who died before he espoused the Virgin. Of the same opinion were Vossius, Baumgarten, and Cav.

mentioned in scripture as apostles, and as the most ancient Christian writers have given James the Lord's brother the surname of the Just, there is no reason to believe that there was any third person of the name of James, who was so numbered with that apostle. The manner in which the writer of this epistle is distinguished from the others is by his epithet, the Just. Thus Tertullian, Epiphanius, the same bishop cited by Eusebius, and many others, adhere to this view. See Euseb. E. H. lib. ii.—Lard. Com. vol. iii. p. 26.

III.—Of the Authenticity and Authority of the Epistle of James.

BAXA in his preface to this epistle tells us, that in the Syriac version, (I suppose he means the second Syriac), the general title prefixed to the Catholic epistles is, "The three epistles of the three apostles before whose eyes the Lord transfigured himself." Wherefore, according to that translator, the author of this epistle was James the son of Zebedee; in which opinion he hath been followed by the Arabic translator, and by some modern commentators. But, on that supposition, the epistle of James must have been written the first of all the epistles; namely, before the year 43 or 44; for in one of these years James the son of Zebedee was put to death by Herod, Acts xii. 2. The errors, however, and vices reproved in this epistle, shew it to be of a much later date, being the very errors and vices which gave occasion to the epistles of Peter, and John, and Jude, which all agree were written towards the conclusion of the lives of these apostles. Besides, there are passages in the epistle itself, which imply, that at the time it was written the destruction of Jerusalem was at hand. For these reasons, Jerome's opinion formerly mentioned, page 581, ought to be adopted, who tells us, that this epistle was written by James, who was called the Lord's brother, because he was the son of Mary the sister of our Lord's mother.

That this epistle was anciently esteemed a part of the sacred Canon, we learn from Eusebius, whose words I will quote. E. H. lib. iii. c. 26. "Here it will be proper to enumerate, in a summary way, the books of the New Testament which have been already mentioned. And, in the first place, are to be ranked the four sacred Gospels; then the book of the Acts of the Apostles; after that are to be reckoned the Epistles of Paul; in the next place, that called the First Epistle of John, and the first of Peter; after these is to be placed, if it be thought fit, the Revelation of John, the opinions of the ancients concerning which I shall in due season explain. Now these are among the acknowledged books. Among the contradicted, but yet well known to many, or approved by many, are that called the Epistle of James, and that of Jude, and the second and third of John; whether they were actually composed by the Evangelist, or by another of the same name." From this passage it appears, that in the beginning of the fourth century, the seven Epistles called Catholic were well known, and received by many, though some of them were not received by all. Farther, the same author (E. H. lib. ii. c. 33.) writes as follows: "Thus far concerning James, the writer of the first Epistle called Catholic. But it ought to be observed, that (τοιούτου) it is thought spurious." By which Eusebius does not mean that it was in this time thought a forged writing, but that it had not been universally received by the church, as is evident from the reason which he subjoins: "For as much as there are not many of the ancient writers who have quoted it, as neither that called Jude's, another of the epistles named Catholic. However, we know that these also are commonly used," that is, publicly read, "in most churches with the rest." From this passage it appears, that notwithstanding the epistle of James was doubted of by some, and not often quoted by the ancients, it was in Eusebius's days generally received, and publicly read in the churches of Christ.

That the epistle of James was early esteemed an inspired writing, is evident from the following fact: That, while the second epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which was made in the beginning of the second century for the use of the converted Jews, the epistle of James hath found a place therein, equally with the books which were never called in question. This is an argument of great weight. For certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity than the converted Gentiles, to whom it was not sent, and who, perhaps, had no opportunity of being acquainted with it till long after it was written. Wherefore, its being received by the Jewish believers is an undeniable proof that they knew it to be written by James the apostle. Whereas, the ignorance of the Gentile believers concerning this epistle, is not even a presumption against its authenticity.

That the converted Gentiles had little knowledge of the epistle of James in the first ages, may have been owing to various causes; such as, That it was addressed to the Jews, and that the matters contained in it were peculiar to the Jews. For, on these accounts, the Jewish believers may have thought it not necessary to communicate it to the Gentiles. And when it was made known to them, they may have scrupled to receive it as an inspired writing, for the following reasons:—1. The writer does not in the inscription take the title of an apostle, but calls himself simply, 'James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' 2. Many of the ancients, by calling the writer of this epistle James the Just, have rendered his apostleship doubtful. 3. As they have done likewise, by speaking of him commonly as Bishop of Jerusalem, and not as an apostle of Christ.—It is little wonder, therefore, that this epistle was not generally received by the converted Gentiles; consequently that it was not often quoted by them in their writings. But afterwards, when it was considered that this epistle was from the beginning received by the Jewish believers, and that it was translated into the Syriac language for their use; and that Paul, though an apostle, sometimes contended himself with the appellation of a servant of Christ,' Philip. i. 1. Phil. i. 1. and sometimes took no appellation but his own name, I Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1.; and that the apostle John did not in any of his epistles call himself an apostle—not the title which the author of the epistle of James had to an apostle was no longer doubted, but he was generally acknowledged to be 'James the son of Alpheus,' the Lord's brother; and his epistle, after an accurate examination, (see Preface to 2 Peter, sect. i. paragr. 2.), was received into the canon as an inspired writing. So Estius tells us, who affirms, that, after the fourth century, no church nor ecclesiastical writer is found, who ever doubted of the authority of this epistle. But, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of scripture, published, whether by general or provincial councils, or by Roman bishops or other orthodox writers since the fourth century, constantly number it among the Canonical scriptures. See Whitby's Preface.

With respect to what is remarked by Eusebius, that there are not many ancient writers who have quoted the epistle of James, learned men have observed, that Clement of Rome hath quoted it four several times. And so does Ignatius in his epistles to the Ephesians, sect. 10. 12. 17. 30. And Origen in his 18th Homily on Genesis, sect. 5. That it was not more generally quoted by the ancients, besides the things already mentioned may have been owing to the following reasons—

PREFACE TO JAMES.

1. Being written to the whole Jewish nation, to correct the errors and vices which prevailed among them, the Gentiles may have thought themselves little concerned with it, and may have been at no pains to procure copies of it; by which means it was not at first so generally known among them as some other books of scripture.—
2. The seeming opposition of the doctrine in this epistle, the doctrine of Paul concerning justification by faith without works of law, may have occasioned it to be less regarded by the most ancient writers; just as in later times it was on the same account rejected by Luther, who, to show his contempt of it, called it (epistola straminia) a strawy or chaffy epistle.

To conclude, the authority of the epistle of James as an inspired writing, is abundantly established, in Mill's opinion, by the apostles Paul and Peter, who have in their writings many sentiments and expressions similar to those contained in this epistle. For example——

James i. 18. Having willed it, he hath begun it by the word.

James i. 3. Knowing, that the proving of your faith worketh patience.

James i. 23. And be ye doers of the law, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.

James iv. 1. Come they not hence, even from your lusts, which war in your members!

James iv. 7. Resist the devil, and he will flye from you.

James iv. 10. Be humbled in the presence of God, and he will lift you up.

James iv. 12. Thou, who art thou that condemnest another?

James v. 20. Will cover a multitude of sins.

Sccr. III.——Of the Persons to whom the Epistle of James was addressed.—Of the Time and Place where it was written and delivered.—And of the Death of James.

I. Beca thought the epistle of James was written to the believing Jews dispersed all over the world.
This likewise was the opinion of Cave and Fabricius. Grotius says, it was written to all the people of Israel living out of Judæa; in which he is followed by Wall. But Lardner, with more probability, thinks it was written to the whole Jewish nation in Judæa, and out of it, whether believers or not. This opinion he builds on the inscription of the epistle, which runs thus:—"James, a servant of God, and of Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes," that is, to the whole Jewish nation, in whatever part of the world they were living. For no description of that can be more comprehensive than the twelve tribes; and though it be added, who are in the dispersion, the expression, he thinks, includes the Jews living in Judæa, who, since the Romans subdued them, might be considered as dispersed even in Judæa itself. Or, if this sense of the expression is not admitted, it can imply no more but that the apostle's letter was chiefly intended for the Jews in foreign countries; consequently, it does not exclude the Jews in Judæa, who were the writer's peculiar charge; and to whom, as shall be shewed immediately, some things in the epistle more especially belong. Next, that this epistle was designed for the unconverted as well as the converted Jews, is plain from this, that the apostle did not in the beginning of it wish the twelve tribes' peace and peace from Jesus Christ,' but gave them only a general salutation, or wish of health; neither did he conclude his letter with any Christian benediction, as he would have done if the whole of his letter had been intended for believers. Farther, that this epistle was designed in part for the unbelieving Jews, appears from some passages which belong more particularly to them.
For example, chap. iv. 1—10, where the writer speaks of wars and fightings among them, in which, being actuated by their lusts, they killed one another. These things cannot be said of the believing Jews, but must be understood of the mutinies and insurrections which the unbelievers, especially the zealots, raised both in Judæa and in the provinces, and which brought on the war with the Romans; also chap. v. 1—5, where James describes the miseries which were coming on the persons to whom he writes, and which fell heaviest on the unbelieving Jews in Judæa; and mentions their condemning the just One, who did not resist them, and insinuates, that these miseries were coming on them for that crime.
Lastly, the whole of the third chapter, in Whitby's opinion, may have been intended for the unbelieving as well as the believing Jews, the name of brethren being applicable to both, when used by a writer of his own nation.

II. With respect to the date of this epistle, they who think it was written by James the son of Alpheus, fix it to the year 63; because the wars and insurrections, which ended in the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, are reproved in it, and the coming of Christ to destroy Jerusalem, and break the power of the unbelieving part of the nation, is said, chap. v. 8, to be near. Later than that year the epistle of James cannot be dated, if the opinion of Theodoret be admitted, who tells us, that what is said in the epistle to the Hebrews, which was written in the end of the year 62, or the beginning of the year 63, refers, among others, to the martyrdom of James the Just, chap. xiii. 7. 'Remember your rulers, who have spoken to you the word of God; and, attendively considering the ending of their conversation, imi-itate their faith.'

Joseph, the Jewish historian, is supposed to have spoken of the death of James the Just in the following passage: "Ananus the younger, who had just before been nominated high-priest, was haughty in his behaviour, and extremely daring. He was of the sect of the Sadducees, who are above all other Jews severe in their judicial sentences. As therefore Ananus was such a man, his, he thought he had a fit opportunity, because Festus was dead and Aibinns was yet upon the road, calls a council, and bringing before them 'the brother of Jesus who is called Christ, whose name was James,' and some others, he brought an accusation against them as transgressors of the law, and delivered them to be stoned to death; by which means he offended some of the mildest Jews in the city, and such as were most exact observers of the law." Ant. lib. 20. cap. 8. Genev. Edit. If the words,
'the brother of Jesus who is called Christ,' are genuine, this passage will fix the death of James to the year 63, after Festus was dead, and before Albinus came into the province. But many learned men, and among the rest Le Clerc, Aru Crisic. Part III. sect. 1. cap. 14. and Lardiner, Can. vol. ii. p. 51, think these words are an interpolation. The ancient Christian writers give a different account of the death of James: They think he was killed, not in consequence of a judicial trial, but in a popular tumult, the occasion of which Eusebius thus explains, E.
H. i. 3. c. 23, "When Paul had appealed to Caesar, and had been sent to Rome by Festus, the Jews, who had aimed at his death, being disappointed in that design, turned their rage against James the Lord's brother, who had been appointed by the apostle bishop of Jerusalem,
"d¢c. Lardner conjectures that the death of James was partly occasioned by the offence taken at his epistle; in which are not only sharp reprobations of the unbelieving Jews, for the crimes committed by them, but also affecting representations of the dreadful calamities coming upon them." Can. iii. p. 93. By laying these facts and circumstances together, we cannot be much mistaken in suspecting, that James wrote his epistle after the mutinies and insurrections which brought on the war with the Ro-manes were begun, and before Jerusalem was besieged;
consequently in the beginning of the year 62, or in 61, a short time before James's death. This is Lardner's opinion, p. 99. But Mill and Fabricius think it was written in the year 60, a year or two before his death.
As the apostle James commonly resided in Jerusalem, for the purpose of superintending the affairs of the church there, it is reasonable to think he wrote his epistle in Jerusalem, and delivered copies of it both to the believing and unbelieving inhabitants of that city, who, no doubt, circulated it among their brethren in distant countries, by means of such of them as came up to Jerusalem annually to the feast of Pentecost.

Sect. IV.—Of the Design of the Apostle James in Writing his Epistle.

Many of the converted Jews having formerly been of the sect of the Pharisees, who held the doctrines of fate and of the decrees of God, brought into the church these doctrines alone, but the errors which the corrupt part of the nation had built on them; such as, that God is the author of sin, and that whoever professes the true religion is sure of salvation, whatever his temper or practice might be. In these mistaken notions the converted Jews seem to have been confirmed by certain passages of Paul's epistles, which they wrested to their own destruction. For example, Rom. i. 38. where it is said, that God
'delivered the Gentiles to a reprobate mind—Rom. vii.
17. 'It is no more I who work it out, but sin dwelling in me.' See the note on that verse.—Rom. ix. 19. 'Whom he will he will harden.'—ver. 21. 'Hath not the potter power over the clay?' &c.—chap. xi. 8. 'And the rest are hindered, as it is written,' &c. It seems the Judaizers in the Christian church, not willing to acknowledge that, according to the terms of the Hebrew language, 'God is said to do what he permits,' inferred from the passages just now mentioned, that the sinful actions of men being all deceived by God, there is no resisting his will; and that the temptations by which men are seduced to sin, being all appointed of God, he is actually the author of men's sins. Further, Paul's doctrine of justification by faith without works of law, being considered by the Judaizers as a confirmation of their favourite tenet, that nothing is necessary to salvation but the knowledge and profession of the true religion, many of them affirmed, that men are sanctified and made acceptable to God by knowledge alone.
These false teachers corrupted the gospel in this manner, that by rendering it acceptable to the wicked, they might increase the number of their disciples, and draw money from them to spend on their lusts. See Pref. to Jude, sect. 4.

From these pernicious doctrines flowed that extreme corruption of manners found among some sects of Christians in the first ages; and particularly among the Simo-ners, Nicolaitans, and other heretics of Jewish extraction, of which there are evident traces in the apostolical epistles. (See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3.) From the same polluted source issued those manifold crimes, for which the unbelieving Jews were infamous and intolerable everywhere, about the time of the breaking out of the war which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the nation. See the Illustrations prefixed to 2
Pet. chap. i. and ii.

In this state of the Jewish nation and of the Christian church in the latter period of the first ages, it became absolutely necessary that the apostles of the circumcision who were then alive, should exert their authority in confuting errors, which were not only ruinous to the souls of men, but most dishonourable to the character of God as the Governor of the universe. Wherefore, to expose the dangerous nature of these errors, and to guard the faithful against them, the apostles Peter, (see Pref. to 2 Pet. sect.
5.), and James, and John, (see Pref. to 1 John, sect. 5.), and Jude, (see Pref. to Jude, sect. 4.), wrote the seven epistles called Catholic. So Augustine informs us in his opinion having sprung up, even in the apostles' days, by misunderstanding Paul's arguments, Peter, John, James, and Jude aimed in their epistles principally at this end, to vindicate the doctrine of Paul from the false consequences charged upon it, and to shew that faith without works is nothing worth; but indeed Paul does not speak of faith at large, but only of that living, fruitful, and egagelical faith which he himself saith worketh by love. As for that faith void of good works, which these men thought sufficient to salvation, he declares positively against it."— And having mentioned that Peter says some passages of his brother Paul's epistles had been wrested by unlearned men, Augustine observes, that Peter calls it wresting, because Paul was in truth of the same opinion with the apostles, and held eternal life impossible to be obtained by any faith which had not the attainment of a holy life," Benson's translation in his note on 2 Pet. i. 9.

But although all the Catholic epistles were written to confute the corrupt doctrines and practices of the unbelieving Jews, and of the Judaizing Christians, in none of them are these doctrines more strongly opposed than in this epistle of James. For the sentiments which it contains are excellent, the doctrines which it inculcates are perfectly just and conformable to the spirit of the gospel, the precepts which it enjoins have all a tendency to advance the perfection and happiness of human nature.
Moreover, the arguments by which the practice of religion and morality are enforced, are most cogent and affecting, and the language in which they are expressed is beautiful.
From all which it follows, that this writing is the production of a person of an enlarged understanding, and of great goodness of heart, which, as Lardner observes, is the very character ascribed to James our Lord's brother, by all the Christian writers who have made mention of him.
CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations contained in this Chapter.

This object of this epistle being to persuade the whole body of the Jewish nation to forsake the many errors and vices into which they had fallen, the apostle first directed his discourse to such of them as were Christians, who, it would seem, were becoming impatient under the persecution they were suffering for their religion; and the rather, because their unbelieving brethren had endeavored to persuade them, that the evils under which they labored were tokens of the divine displeasure. For they applied to individuals those passages of the law in which God declared he would bless and prosper the Israelitish nation, or curse and afflict it, according as it adhered to or forsook the law of Moses. Wherefore, to enable the Jewish Christians to judge rightly of the affliction they were enduring, and to reconcile them to their then suffering lot, the apostle, in the beginning of his epistle, exhorted them to rejoice exceedingly in affliction as a real advantage, ver. 2.—Able, which is so insinuated by God to produce in them patience, ver. 3.—And if it produced patience, it would contribute to the perfecting of many other virtues in them, ver. 4.—In the second place, the apostle exhorted them to pray for relief, in order to enable them to make a proper use of their afflictions, and assured them, that God was most willing to grant them that, and every other good gift, ver. 5.—Provided they asked these gifts sincerely, ver. 6.—Thirly, that the poor among the brethren might be encouraged to bear the hardships of their lot patiently, and that the rich might not be too much cast down when they were stript of their riches and possessions by their persecutors, he represented to the poor their great dignity as the sons of God, and the excellent possessions they were entitled to as the heirs of God: On the other hand, the rich he put in mind of the emptiness, instability, and brevity of all human grandeur, by comparing it to a flower whose leaves wither and fall immediately on their being exposed to the scorching heat of the sun, ver. 9.—Fourthly, to encourage both the poor and the rich to suffer cheerfully the loss of the transitory goods of this life for Christ's sake, he brought to their remembrance Christ's promise to bestow on them, in recompense, a crown of life, ver. 12.

The apostle next directed his discourse to the unbelieving part of the nation, and expressly condemned that impious notion by which many of them, and even some of the Judaizing teachers among the Christians, pretended to vindicate their worst actions, namely, that God tempts men to sin, and is the author of the sinful actions to which he tempts them. For he assured them, that God neither seduces any man to sin, neither is himself seduced by any one, ver. 13.—But that every man is seduced by his own lusts, ver. 14.—Which being indulged in the mind, brings forth sin; and sin, by frequent repetition being nourished to maturity, brings forth death at length to the sinner, ver. 15.—Wherefore he besought them, not to deceive themselves by the impious notion that God is the author of sin, ver. 16.—He is the author of every good and perfect gift, and of nothing but good, and that immediately, ver. 17.—Further, that such of them as professed the gospel might be brought to a right faith and practice, he desired them, as learners, to be teachable, and to be zealous of a good name among the ends, and submission to the apostles of Christ, who had brought them the word; and to be slow in delivering their opinion on matters of religion, lest they might say something that was dishonourable to God; and by this means to be angry with those who differed from them, ver. 19, 20.—And to lay aside all those evil passions which they had hitherto indulged, and which hindered them from receiving the word with meekness, ver. 21.—Then exhorted them to do, rather than hearers only of the word, ver. 22.—Because the person who contents himself with hearing the word, is like a man who transiently beholds his natural face in a glass, then goes away, and immediately forgets his own appearance, so that he is at no pains to remove from his face any thing that is disagreeable in it, &c. ver. 23, 24.

The apostle, having thus exhorted the Jews to be doers of the law, proceeded to mention certain points of the law, which persons who pretend to be holier than their neighbors are apt to neglect, but which merit the attention of all who are truly religious: And, first, he recommended the bridding of the tongue—that virtue being a great mark of perfection in those who possess it, and the want of it a certain proof that such a person's religion is false, ver. 36.—An exhortation of this kind was peculiarly suitable to the Judaizing teachers, who sinned exceedingly with their tongue, both by inculcating erroneous doctrines, together with a most corrupt morality, and by reviling all who opposed their errors. The second point of duty which the apostle recommended was, kind offices to orphans and widows in their affliction, because such good works are in the sight of God a principal part of true religion, ver. 27.

New Translation.

Chapter 1. 1 James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes who are in the dispersion—health.

Chapter 1. 1 James, a servant of God, (see Rom. i. 1. note 1.), and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes who are dispersed among the Gentiles—health.

Ver. 1.—1. A servant of God. James called himself 'a servant of God,' as well as 'of Jesus Christ,' for the sake of the unconverted Jews, who, because he was a servant of Christ, thought he was not a servant of God.

2. To the twelve tribes. That the twelve tribes were actually in existence when James wrote his epistle, will appear from the following facts. 1. Notwithstanding Cyrus allowed all the Jews in his dominions to return to their own land, many of them did not return. This happened according to God's purpose, in permitting them to be carried captive into all the nations and parts of the world. For he intended to make himself known among the heathens, by means of the knowledge of his being and perfections, which the Jews in their dispersion would communicate to them. This also was the reason that God determined that the ten tribes should never return to their own land, Hos. i. 6. viii. 9. ix. 13. 15. 17.—2. That, comparatively speaking, few of the twelve tribes returned to continue them to make doctrine, but continued to live among the Gentiles, appears from this, that in the days of Antiochus, one of the successors of Cyrus, who reigned from India to Ethiopia, over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, either in. 8. the Jews were dispersed among the people in all the provinces of his kingdom, and their laws were diverse from the laws of all other people, and they did not keep the king's laws. So that, by adhering to their own usages, they kept themselves distinct from all the nations among whom they lived. 2. On the day of Pentecost, which happened next after our Lord's ascension, Acts ii. 5. 9. 'There were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men out of every nation under heaven.'—3. In the case of the apostles, so long as they were the Jews, and so widely dispersed through all the countries of the world. 4. When Paul travelled in Asia and Europe, he found the Jews so numerous, that in all the world it were cities of the Gentiles they had synagogues in which they assembled for the worship of God, and were joined by multitudes of proselytes from among the heathens, to whom likewise he preached the gospel. 5. The same apostle, in his speech to King Agrippa, affirmed that the twelve tribes were there existing, and that they served God day and night, in expectation of the promise made to the fathers, Acts xxvi. 6. 8. Josephus, Ant. i. 13. c. 12. tells us that one region could not contain the Jews, but they dwelt in most of the flourishing cities of Asia and Europe, in the island and continent, not much less in number than the heathen inhabitants. From all which it is
2. My brethren, instead of placing your happiness in great worldly prosperity, count it a most joyful event when ye fall into divers trials.

3. Knowing that the proving of your faith by persecution and affliction, worketh out in you patience, and to the salvation of your souls, which from many other virtues will flow:

4. Let patience, therefore, operate fully, that ye may be perfect and complete, deficient in nothing.

5. If any of ye be deficient in wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given to him.

6. But let him ask in faith, (and he shall not be at all irresolute:) for he who is irresolute, is like a wave of the sea, driven of the wind, and tossed.

7. (Tuf. 97.) Now, let not that man think he shall receive any thing from the Lord.

8. A man of two minds is unstable in all his ways.

9. (2s, 104.) Moreover, let the brother who is lowly, and his exaltation:

10. And the rich in his humiliation: for, as a flower of an orchard, (1 Pet. i. 24, note,) he shall pass away.

11. For the sun riseth with a burning heat, and withereth the herb; and the flower thereof falleth down, and the beauty of his appearance perisheth: so also the rich man shall wither in his ways.

Evidently, the Jews of the dispersion were more numerous than Christianity, as the Jews in Judea; and that James very properly inculcates the necessity of the Jew to the twelve tribes which were in the dispersion; seeing the twelve tribes really existed, and do still exist, although not distinguished by separate habitation as they were ancients in their own land.

3. Health.-Luther and Cajetan, who believed James to be no apostle, and rejected his epistle, called this a naked manner of salvation unworthy of an apostle, because it was not a wish of grace and peace, but only of health (καθάρισθαι). The apostle John, however, in the second epistle, used this salvation. It is the salvation likewise which the angel gave to Mary, Luke i. 38. Nay, this naked salvation of James is the only salvation, as they are pleased to term it, which was used by the Council of Jerusalem in their letter to the convert Gentiles, Acts xv. 22. And as that letter was dictated by James the author of this epistle, it is beautiful to observe the same form of salvation used in both.

5. When ye fall into divers trials.-The word ἁγιασμός, which in our Bible is translated temptation, does not signify here what is commonly meant by temptations; for these we are directed to pray against. But it denotes trials by affliction and persecution. To these, God, by whose providence they come, exposes men, not to lead them into sin, but to afford them an opportunity of exercising and improving their virtues. Affliction, however, and persecution, contrary to God's intention, often prove temptations to sin through the influence of men's lusts. Because afflictions have a natural influence to improve man's virtue, our Lord declared those 'blessed who are persecuted for righteousness' sake,' Matt. v. 10. and exhorted such, ver. 12. to rejoice and be exceeding glad. These sentiments the apostle James, I doubt not, had in his eye, when he exhorted the Jews Christian to 'count it all joy when they fall into divers trials.'

6. And complete.-Or, perfect. This word is applied to such living creatures as have all the members which belong to their kind. (Ver. v. 29.) Note 1. Here it signifies that the virtue proper to the new creature, which the brethren already possessed, was to be complete both in principle and in practice.

8. A man of two minds. The word ἀνδρόμενος, in the common acceptance of the word, denotes a sound practical judgment concerning things to be done or avoided. But in scripture it signifies that an assembly of virtues which constitute true religion. See chap. iil. 17. μυριομενος, in the same, a man of large understanding. These spiritual gifts which Christ promised to his disciples to enable them to defend the gospel, Luke xxi. 11, 12. But I rather think the practical wisdom to improve one's afflictions is meant, as expressed in the commenetary.

9. Not at all irresolute. One of the senses of ἀναιρονται is to be in doubt; to be divided in one's own mind, consequently to be irresolute. Parkhurst's Dictionary.

7. Receive any thing from the Lord.-The man who is not fixed in his resolution to pursue virtue and avoid vice, but wavers between the two, can never ask God's assistance sincerely, and therefore cannot expect to receive from God what he asks. See Ex. xiv. 13. and chap. iv. 3. applied to persons atrociously wicked.

10. In all his ways. Having no fixed inclination either to virtue or vice, he halts between the two; and, pursuing no steady plan of conduct, he will neither do good from his vices, though he sometimes restrains them, nor acquire any measure of virtue, though he sometimes pursues it. So that in the passage the apostle speaks of those Jews who were not resolved whether they should adhere to the law or to the gospel.

11. Temptation in this verse, being opposed to ἀγαινομένος, signifies the humility of the rich man, by his being stripped of his riches and possessions, of his liberty, and even by his being liable to lose his life on account of the gospel. Here, therefore, the apostle advises the rich to glory when they lose the uncertain riches of this life, for the sake of maintaining such excellent possessions as truth and a good conscience, with the favour and approbation of God. - Grosnus and Le Clerc, by supplying ἀπογιασθήμενος, translate the clause thus: Let the rich be ashamed of his meanness; that is, of the emptiness and uncertainty of the enjoyments in which he delights. But the translation I have given agrees better with the scope of the passage.

12. He shall pass away. The apostle's argument is, that the rich who lose their possessions for righteousness' sake, lose things comparatively of small value, and which, according to the course of nature, they must soon part with, though they do not suffer persecution.

11. And the beauty of wisdom, the face of the appearance therof. The Greek word is applied metaphorically to things insignious, to denote their external form or appearance. Thus the face of the earth, the face of the heavens, &c.

2. Wither in his ways. As ἑτοιμασθήμενος signifies a way or journey, (Luke xiii. 22.) some are of opinion, that the word may here be translated 'shut with his own hands.' But it is more likely, meaning those journeys which the rich Jews, who were commonly merchants, made for the sake of carrying on their traffic. But as in scripture, one's way is put for his actions or course of life, (ver. 8.) I think these signify the rich man's course of life; a sense which agree well with the context. Wherefore, the correction proposed by Erasmus, ex, ver. 9, 10 velut, being here, and without the authority of MSS. is justly rejected. One MS. mistakenly read by Mill, reads here ἀνακαίνισθαι, in a richer or abundance. But being a single authority, it is of little value.
2 Blessed is the man who sustaineth trial, (see ver. 13, note.), for, becoming an approved person, he shall receive the crown (see 1 Cor. ix. 25, note 2.) of life, which the Lord hath promised to them who love him; and 13 Let no one who is tempted say, Certainly I am tempted (Greek) by God. For God is incapable of being tempted by evil things, (4, 101.), and he tempteth no one.

14 But every one is tempted of his own lust, being drawn away and enticed by it.

15 And lust having conceived, bringeth forth sin; and sin being perfected, bringeth forth death.

16 Be not deceived, my beloved brethren:

17 Every good gift, and every perfect free gift, is from above, descending from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning.

18 Having willed it, he hath begotten us by the word of truth, in order that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath.

Ver. 13. Say I am tempted of God—Diēngexomai, to tempt, sometimes signifies to try, in order to discover the disposition of a person, or to improve his virtue, ver. 12. In this sense, God is said to have tempted or tried Abraham, and the Israelites. Not that he was ignorant of the dispositions of either of them. In the same sense the Israelites are said to have tempted or proved God. They put his power and goodness to the trial, by entertaining double concern- ing him. Here, to tempt, signifies to solicit one to sin, and actually to seduce him into sin, which is the effect of temptation or solicitation. See ver. 11. In this sense the devil tempts men. And because he is continually employed in that infamous work, he is called, by way of eminence, ἡ ὑπερανωτέρος, the tempter. It is in this sense we are to understand the saying in the end of the verse, that God is incapable of being tempted, that he is not enticed to sin by evil things, and that he seduces no one to sin. God having nothing either to fear, or evil being an instinct, whether man or angel, can give birth to or seduce him. Further, his infinitely perfect nature admitting no evil thought or inclination, he is incapable of being tempted.

Ver. 18. Having willed it, he hath begotten us—And here, to willed, the roots of which is to make by will, to make with will, to make after will, or by will, to make freely, as that which is done by free-will. The idea is, he made us after his own will, and for his own satisfaction.
20. For the wrath of man doth not work out the righteousness of God.
21. Wherefore, putting away all filthiness, and the overflowing of maliciousness, embrace ye with meekness the implanted word, which is able to save your souls.
22. (a) And be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.
23. For if any one be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like a man who beholds his natural face in a looking-glass:
24. For he looketh at himself, and goeth away, and immediately forgets what kind of person he was.
25. But he who looketh narrowly into the perfect law, which is of liberty, and continueth; he not becoming a forgetful hearer, but a doer of it, worketh, the same shall be blessed in his actions.
26. If any one among you thinketh to be religious, who bridleth not his tongue, but deceiteth with his own heart, of this person the religion is false.
27. Pure religion before God, and undefiled, with God even the Father, is this, (a) (a) (a) To take care of orphans and widows in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted among the world. (See 1 Tim. v. 4.)

James 1:20-27

20. Besides, persecution raised by the wrath of man, does not work out in others the faith which God counts to men for righteousness.
21. Wherefore, putting away all filthiness, and the abounding of maliciousness which leads men to persecute those who differ from them, embrace ye with a teachable disposition the doctrines of the gospel, as now implanted in the world by us apostles; which doctrine is able to save your souls.
22. Ye Jews are at no pains in performing the duties of piety and morality, because ye think knowledge will save you. But, ye doers of the word, not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.
23. For if any one be a hearer of the gospel, and does not practice its precepts, he is like a man who, from custom or by accident, views his natural face in a looking-glass, without any intention to wipe off the spots that may be on it;
24. For he looketh at himself, without taking notice of the spots on his visage, and, going away, immediately forgets what kind of appearance he had, without removing from his face what is foul.
25. But he who, with an intention to correct his errors, looketh narrowly into the perfect law of liberty, and does not go away as the other doth, but continueth to look into it, that he may know himself; he not becoming a forgetful hearer, but a careful doer of the work which it enjoins, the same shall be blessed of God in his endevours to become good.
26. If any one among you thinketh to be religious, who restraineth not his tongue from railing against those who differ from him in religious opinions, but deceiteth himself with the notion, that railing, as a mark of zeal, is acceptable to God, of this person the religion is false.
27. Hypocrisy place religion in performing the external duties of devotion, but pure religion, and that which is not defiled with worldly mixtures, in the esteem of God, even the Father, does not consist in forms, but is this.—To take care of orphans and widows in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted by the vices of the world.
CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

The manners and customs of the Hebrews being different from those of all other nations, the jurisprudence of the heathens could not be applied for determining the controversies which arose among the Jews in the provinces. The Romans therefore allowed them, not only in Judea, but in all the countries of the empire, to determine their controversies about matters of property by their own law and practice. So Josephus informs us, and gives us copies of several decrees of the emperors to that effect. See 1 Cor. vii. 4. Hence the apostle, in mentioning the right practice which the Jewish converts who thought themselves religious were to maintain, insisted particularly, in the first part of this chapter, on their observing justice and impartiality in judging such causes as by the Roman law, or by the consent of parties, they were allowed to determine. And this he did, the rather, because the unbelieving Jews were now become very partial and unjust in their decision as judges. Nor were the believing part of the nation altogether blameless in that respect. But partiality in judgment being directly contrary to the gospel, the apostle severely reproved both the one and the other for showing any disposition to favour rich litigants, though they were only by giving them a better or more honourable seat in their synagogue, than that allotted to their poorer opponents, ver. 1, 2, 3, 4.—This partiality to the rich, and contempt of the poor, he told them, was extremely improper to the disciples of Christ, especially as they knew, in all the countries the poor had showed a greater disposition to receive the gospel than the rich, ver. 5—and that the rich unbelieving Jews were great persecutors of the Christians, and dragged them to the heathen tribunals to get them punished, ver. 6.—Therefore, to prevent partiality in judgment for the future, the apostle recommended to them that unfeigned benevolence towards all men, which Christ hath enjoined as his commandment, and which on that account may be called the royal law, ver. 8-13. This passage of the epistle, so far as it related to the Christians, was intended for the instruction of the bishops and rulers, and other gifted persons in the church, whose office it was to determine those controversies about worldly matters which arose among the brethren. See 1 Cor. xii. 28. note 2, and the Life of Paul, Proofs and Illustr. No. 2.

Many of the Jews, influenced by the prejudices of their education, attempted to excuse their unjust judgments and other evil actions, by the care with which they performed some other of the precepts of the law, which they considered as of more importance than the rest. Hence the question of the lawyer, Matt. xxii. 36. "Master, which is the great commandment in the law?" Wherefore, to set them right in this matter, the apostle assured them, that though they kept all the other precepts of the law, if they habitually offended in any one of them, they became guilty of all, ver. 10—because the precepts of the law being all enjoined by one and the same authority, he who habitually transgresseth one precept, disregards the authority of the lawgiver, and showed himself ready to transgress any other precept in the like circumstances, ver. 11-13.

Another great error into which the Jewish Christians had fallen in the first age, and which had made them negligent of good works, was this: They fancied that the speculative belief of the doctrines of the gospel, to which they gave the name of faith, was sufficient to save them, however deficient they might be in good works; an error which has prevailed in modern times likewise. Wherefore, to shew that one's assenting with his understanding to truth, will not save him, unless it leads him to perform good works, the apostle compared the faith of such a believer to the benevolence of a man, who in words expresses abundance of kindness to the naked and the hungry poor, yet gives them none of the things necessary to the body, ver. 14-18. For the same purpose he remarked, that even the devils believe speculatively that God exists; but will not be saved by their faith, though it be real, as appears by their trembling when they recollect God's justice and power. The reason is, they are so utterly depraved that their faith hath no influence on their temper and conduct, ver. 19.—Farther, more fully to prove that good works are necessary to justification, the apostle appealed to Moses himself, who hath declared that Abraham and Rahab were justified on account of the good works which their faith prompted them to perform, ver. 20-25. In this appeal there was the greater propriety, that Paul, whose doctrine the Jews pretended to espouse, in his epistle to the Romans and Galatians, had built his doctrine of justification by faith, upon the account which Moses had given of the justification of that just believer.

His discourse on justification James concluded with a saying, which must impress every intelligent reader with the strongest conviction of the necessity of good works in order to salvation, 'As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also,' ver. 26.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II.—1 My brethren, do ye not hold the faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ with acceptance of persons?

2 For if there enter into your synagogue a man having golden rings on his fingers, and a man having a slave in company with him, will ye not judge, and hold the faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of God and judge of the world, with acceptance of persons, contrary to that faith, and contrary to the law itself? Lev. xiv. 15. Deut. xvi. 19.

CHAP. II.—1 My brethren, do ye not, in judging causes, hold the belief of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of God and judge of the world, with acceptance of persons, contrary to that faith, and contrary to the law itself?

COMMENTS.

Ver. 1.—1. Do ye not hold, &c.]—That this clause is rightly translated the faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ with acceptance of persons, because the clause is not an affirmative proposition, it does not agree with what is contained in the following verse.

2. The faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ—In construing δικαιοσύνης and δικαιοσυνιασίας in this verse, I have followed the Septuagint translation, which hath a sense more suitable to the subject. The word δικαιοσύνης signifies the peculiar character of God, the one who is just and the judge of the world. The glory of our Lord Jesus Christ consists in being the Son of God, and the governor and judge of the world visible and invisible. The faith of this glorious character cannot be held consistently with partiality in judgment, which Christ hath prohibited, and will severely punish; or, faith of the glory, &c. may be an Hebrewism for 'the glorious faith' of the gospel enjoined by our Lord Jesus Christ; or the glorious faith of which he is the object. The faith of the gospel may justly be called glorious on account of the great truths of the spiritual gifts and miraculous powers with which it was accompanied in the first age. See 2 Cor. iii. 7-9. notes.

3. With acceptance of persons.]—εἰς ἀνθρώπους. This word signifies regard shown to persons, not on account of their real worthiness, but on account of their circumstances. The glory of our Lord Jesus Christ consists in being the Son of God, and the governor and judge of the world visible and invisible. The faith of this glorious character cannot be held consistently with partiality in judgment, which Christ hath prohibited, and will severely punish; or, faith of the glory, &c. may be an Hebrewism for 'the glorious faith' of the gospel enjoined by our Lord Jesus Christ; or the glorious faith of which he is the object. The faith of the gospel may justly be called glorious on account of the great truths of the spiritual gifts and miraculous powers with which it was accompanied in the first age. See 2 Cor. iii. 7-9. notes.

Ver. 2. If there enter into your synagogue,—The word ἱεραρχεῖσθαι sometimes denotes an assembly of persons, sometimes the house in which such an assembly is held. Here, 'your synagogue' does not mean a Jewish synagogue, but the house or room where the with splendid clothing, and there enter likewise a poor man with dirty clothing;

3 And ye look upon him who hath the clothing which is splendid, and say to him, Sit thou here (παρέχω) honourably! and say to the poor man, Stand thou there, or Sit here at my footstool:

4 (καί, 918.) Verily, do ye not make a difference within yourselves, and are become judges possessed of evil thoughts?

5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world to be (see Eph. i. 4. Greek) rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them who love him!

6 But ye despise the poor. Do not the rich exceedingly oppress you, and themselves drag you to the judgment-seat?

7 Do not they blaspheme that excellent name which is named upon you?

8 If now indeed ye fulfill the royal law, according to that scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, (see Rom. xiii. 9. note), ye do well. (However, if, as upper judges, ye do not obey the excellent law of Christ the great king, according to that scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, (Rom. xiii. 9. note), ye do well: ye will be guilty of no partiality in judgment.

9 But if in judging, ye accept persons, ye work sin, being convicted by the law as transgressors.

10 For whoever shall keep the whole law, (προεκτετήσατε) hath become guilty of all.

11 For he who commanded, Do not commit adultery, hath commanded also, Do not kill. Now, if thou commit not adultery, but kill, thou hast become a transgressor of the law.

Christians assembled for worship. And as the Jews held courts of judicature in their synagogues, (see Virgil's Deo Vero. Synag. Bk. ii. part i. c. 11. p. 174. Luke rch. 10. 12), and there also punished offenders by scourging, (Matt. z. 17. Acts xxii. 11.), it is probable that the first Christians, holding court for determining civil causes in the places where they assembled for public worship, called these 'your synagogues.' For, that the apostles spoke not of their assembly, but of the places where their assembly was held, is evident from his mentioning the litanies sitting in a more honourable or a less honourable place of the synagogue.

Ver. 2. Sit thou here honorably. - Of the chief or most honourable seat, transgressors our Lord speaks Matt. xxii. 6, where he rebuked the scribes and Pharisees for loving to sit in these seats.

Ver. 3. Verily, do ye not make a difference. - This is the literal translation of the phrase ἐν διαφορᾷ, as is plain from Acts xvi. 9, where it is so rendered. Accordingly, the Syriac hath, 'An non discerimus fecisse apud nos.'

2. Within yourselves. - ἐν ὑμῖν, is rendered within yourselves, Matt. iii. 9.

3. And are become judges possessed of evil thoughts. - Do I have rendered ἡμῖν δικαιοσύνης τιμήτως δικαιοσύνης, because it is the generic of possession. See Ex. xiv. 48. Beza. Suppose, supposing the apostles to be speaking of the synagogues as a place of worship, think he reproved the teachers for allowing more concern to have the rich Jews converted than the poor. But if that had been the apostle's design, what he says, ver. 6, is not an argument in favour of it. For the power and malice of the rich unbelief, Jews was a good reason for the Christian teachers endeavouring, by innocent compliance, to bring about their conversion, rather than that of the poor.

Ver. 6. Chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith. - Our Lord and his apostles preached the gospel to the poor, who at first received it more readily than the rich, being the greatest conformation to the multitudes of life. That the gospel should have been first preached to the poor, and first received by them, was wisely ordered: Because it showed that the spreading of the gospel through the world, was owing not to human policy but to the power of God. Among the Gentiles, the unbelief of the rich against the gospel were not so great as among the Jews. Hence more persons of rank and education among the Gentiles were converted than among the Jews, his meaning is, that all the commandments being equally enjoined by God, the man who despises the authority of God, so far as to break any 12 In judgment, to speak and so act as those ought to do who know that they shall be judged by the gospel, which forbids all partiality in judgment:

13 For the gospel teaches, that at the last judgment, according to the strictness of law, without mercy, will be to him who in his dealings showed no mercy: But at that day mercy will triumph over judgment to him who showed mercy.

14 To show you the absurdity of relying on the profession without the practice of the gospel, I ask, What advantage is it to him, my brethren, if any one say, he hath faith, but hath not works? Can this faith save him?

15 (Aes. 106.) For if a brother or a sister be naked, (Aes. 206.) or destitute of daily food, 16 And any one of you say to them, Depart in peace; be ye warmed, and be ye filled; yet give them none of the things needful for the body, what is the advantage?

17 So also faith, if it hath not works, is dead; being by itself.

18 (Aes. 76.) Also, one may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: show me thy faith without thy works; and I will shew thee my faith by my works.

19 Thou belief that there is one God; thou dost well: (see ver. 8, note 2.) Even the devils believe this, and tremble.

20 (Aes. 104.) Besides, wouldest thou know, O false man, that faith without works is dead!

21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had lifted up Isaac his son upon the altar?

22 Thou seest that his faith co-operated one of them habitually, would in the like circumstances of temptation and opportunity certain reproofs; consequently in the eye of God he is guilty of breaking the whole law; that ye shall not commit the sin of Israel, and of doing away with the person of the Saviour. The增设 Jewish doctrine mentioned in the preceding note, and which is condensed e. m. in Jer. 24. 4, the apostle James, it is to be feared many who profess the gospel still entertain.

Ver. 12. Do speak, and so do, as those who shall be judged, &c. —By giving this precept after the declaration ver. 11. the apostle teaches us, that the gospel requires obedience to all the laws of God without exception.

Ver. 13. For judgment without mercy, &c. —Judgment, which is the primary signification of the word κρίνω, suits this passage better than the fiction, δικαιοσύνη, condensation, which is Bessar's translation; not to mention that judgment without mercy is certainly condemnation to sinners. —If they who have shewed no mercy shall be condemned, much more shall they who have dealt unjustly with others. Perhaps the apostle, in writing this, had our Lord's account of the judgment in his eye, in which he introduces himself as condemning the wicked for neglecting works of charity and mercy. See ver. 15, 16.

Ver. 14. Can this faith save him? —This question demonstrates, that James is not treating of the justification of the believer in the eyes of men, as some fancy, but of that justification which will issue in his eternal salvation. See ver. 16, note.

Ver. 15. Be naked, that is, ill clothed or wanting some of his clothes,—so the word naked signifies in most languages. See the Jewish Antiquities prefixed to my Harmony, page 194.

Ver. 16. If he hath not works, is dead. —In this passage James teaches, that good wishes, which work no real benefit to our neighbour, and an assent to truth, which produces no obedience to God, are things akin, and of like value.

Ver. 17. Show me thy faith without thy works. —Most of the printed editions of the Greek New Testament read here, 'Show me thy faith by thy works;' which Mill thinks is the true reading, and explains the apostle's reasoning in this manner: 'If I show me thy faith by thy works,—it is the only way thou canst show it; but so long as there be no works to produce, thou canst not show thy faith: I will prove that I have faith by my works.' The reading which our translators have adopted is that of the Alexandrine, and of some other MSS., which read here καὶ χαρά. The Syriac also, and the Vulgate versions, have 'some operations, without faith.' Besides, this reading is confirmed by ver. 22, where the phrase καὶ χαρά sometimes signifies the offering of a sacrifice, or a living sacrifice; and here used in its primary use of sacrifices: 'living sacrifice: For Isaac was not actually offered. Yet because, by suffering him up and laying him on the altar, Abraham showed himself to be fully determined to stay him, God considered that action, and spake of it, as a real offering of Isaac.
with his works; and (a) by works his faith was perfected.2

23 (καί, 212.) And so that scripture was confirmed1 which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness: and he was called the friend of God.3

24 Ye see, therefore, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.4

25 And in like manner, also, was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, having secretly received the messengers, and having sent them away by another road?5

26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without works is dead.6

James.

Ver. 22.—1. Faith co-operated with his works.—As in many passages of scripture, so in this, the word only is wanting, and must be supplied in the following manner, to render the sense complete:—'His faith only co-operated with his works.' For the apostle is reasoning, not to prove that faith is necessary to justification; that was allowed on all hands; but to show that faith does not justify any man by itself. ver. 17; 21. The meaning therefore is, that Abraham's faith did not by itself justify him, but only co-operated with his works in procuring him the promise of justification, as appears plainly from ver. 24. Yet, because this is one of the passages of scripture whose meaning is much contested, I have not ventured to insert the word only in the translation. See Jas vi. sect. 2, where this subject is handled as great length.

2. And by works his faith was perfected.—The command to offer Isaac for a burnt-offering, Gen. xxii. 2, appearing directly contrary to the promise, Gen. xxi. 12. It may seem silly the seed be called, Abraham's faith was thereby put to the severest trial. Yet it was not staggered by the seeming contrariety of the divine revelations. Abraham reasoned with himself, as St. Paul informs us, Heb. xi. 12, that God was able to raise Isaac even from the dead, and, firmly believing that he would actually do so, he set himself to obey the divine command without the least suspicion. James, therefore, had good reason to say, that Abraham's faith co-operated with his works in procuring him the promises confirmed with an oath; because it was his faith in God which enabled him to perform the difficult works requisite to the offering of Isaac as a burnt-offering. He had equally good reason to say, by works his faith was perfected, or rendered complete; because, if, when tried, he had refused to obey, his would not have been a complete faith.

In this passage James hath declared, that faith and works are inseparably connected as cause and effect; that faith as the cause necessarily produces good works as its effect, and that good works must flow from faith as their principle; that neither of them separately are the means of our justification; but that when joined they become effectual for that end. Wherefore, when in scripture we are said to be justified by works, it is works accompanying good faith. On the other hand, what we are said to be justified by faith, is said to be so by faith accompanied with good works.

Ver. 23.—And so that scripture was confirmed.—The word καί, it has been said, in Matt. vii. 11, 'cause not to dissolve the law and the prophets, καί to confirm as revelation from God.

2. Abraham believed God, &c.—This passage of scripture contains two assertions: 1. That Abraham believed God; 2. That his believing God was counted to him for righteousness. By the offering of Isaac scripture was confirmed, or proved to be true in both its parts. For, 1. By offering Isaac, in the firm expectation that God would raise him from the dead, and fulfil in him the promise of the numerous seed, Abraham showed that he believed God in the firmest manner. 2. By offering Isaac, Abraham had the promise, that God would count his faith to him for righteousness at the judgment, renewed and confirmed in a solemn manner with an oath. Now it deserves notice, that the confirmation of the scripture by the offering of Isaac, mentioned in this passage, did not happen till many years after it was said that Abraham's faith was counted for righteousness: for this shows, that no man's justification, not one act, but a continued course of faith and obedience, is necessary. See Rom. iv. 3 note 1, and James ii. 18, last part of the note.

3. And he was called the friend of God.—This honourable title is well illustrated in the case of Rahab, Judges, xii. 2. He who works God's work, is God's child and heir. He who worships God from love, meditates on his law, and preaches, and walketh in the path of his will, not from any worldly consideration, nor from fear of evil, nor the hope of procuring good to himself, but doth the truth because it is the truth, and that at length he may obtain the greatest felicity. This is the highest degree of excellence, and which every good man does not arrive at. But it is the degree which our father Abraham attained to, when the blessed God called his friend, because he served him pure of heart.7

Ver. 24. In like manner also, was not Rahab the harlot justified by works proceeding from faith in the true God, (Josh. ii. 1—11,) having secretly received and concealed the spies, and having sent them away by a different road from that which she knew their pursuers would take.

25 And in no way but by faith accompanied with works can any one be justified. For as the body without the soul, though a real body, is without life and all enjoyment; so also faith without works, though a real assent of the understanding, is dead—hath no power to procure justification.
CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

From the writings of Paul, but especially from his epistle to the Romans, we learn that the Jews valued themselves highly on the knowledge of the true God, and of his will, which they derived from the divine revelations of which they were the keepers, and set themselves up everywhere as teachers of the Gentiles. Annoyed by the same spirit, many of the Jews who had embraced the gospel, were exceedingly desirous of the office of teachers in the Christian church. But the apostle James, well knowing that some of them still believed the observance of the law of Moses necessary to salvation; that others had not shaken off the prejudices of their education; and that not a few still followed the bad practices to which they had been accustomed in their unconverted state, earnestly dissuaded them from becoming teachers, by representing to them the punishment to which they exposed themselves, if they either perverted the doctrine, or concealed the precepts of the gospel, ver. 1. Next he intimated, that their ancient prejudices might lead them, as teachers, to offend in many things; but, at the same time, to make them attentive to their own conduct, he told them, that if they did not offend in word, by teaching false doctrine and by uttering bitter speeches against those who differed from them in religious matters, it would be a proof of their having attained a great degree of virtue, ver. 2. Then, to make them sensible how dangerous it was to sin with the tongue, he showed them, by the power which bits in the mouth of horses, and helms in ships, have to turn these great bodies whithersoever their governor please, that the tongue, though a little member, is capable of producing prodigious effects, either good or bad, as it is used, ver. 3, 4, 5. And gave as an example, the mischief which the inconstant use of speech often produces in society, ver. 6. Adding, that though human ingenuity had been able to subdue all kinds of wild beasts, birds and sea-monsters, the tongue is so unruly a thing that no one hath been able to subdue the tongue of others, ver. 7, 8. And to shew the unruliness of the tongue, the apostle mentioned, that with it we bless God, but with it also we curse men made in the image of God, ver. 9. Moreover, the aspersion of employing the tongue for such contradictory purposes, he displayed by remarking, that no such contradictions were to be found in any part of the natural system, ver. 10-15.

To his description of the mischief occasioned in society by an unbridled tongue, James subjoined an earnest exhortation to such of the Jews as pretended to be wise and intelligent, to make good their pretensions by shewing their works all done with the meekness of wisdom. In this exhortation, he seems to have had those of them especially in his eye who set themselves up as teachers; and the rather, because they all valued themselves on their wisdom and knowledge, Rom. ii. 10-20. So that, by calling them wise and intelligent, he prudently used an argument which he hoped would draw their attention, ver. 13.—On the other hand, he told them, that if they taught either the law or the gospel with bitter anger and strife, after the example of some of their bigoted brethren, they lied against the truth; because such a conduct was a contradiction to the religion which they pretended to teach, ver. 14. and was no part of the wisdom which cometh from above, to which they laid claim; but was earthly, animal, and demoniacal, ver. 15. Besides, bitter anger and strife never fail to produce tumult and every evil work, ver. 16. Then he recommended to them the wisdom which is from above, by displaying its many amiable qualities, ver. 17. together with its efficacy in producing in those whom they instructed the good fruit of true faith, by means of a peaceable behaviour towards them.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—1. Do not become many of you teachers, my brethren, knowing that he shall receive the greater (pluralis) punishment.

2 For in many things we all stumble. If any one stumble not in word, he is a perfect man, able to rule even the whole body.

3 Behold, into the mouths of horses we put bits, to make them obedient to us, and we turn about their whole body.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1. Do not become many of you teachers, my brethren. That office requires a knowledge which few possess, unless they are inspired. And if we err, we shall receive the greater punishment on account of our being teachers.

2. For in many things we all stumble. If any one stumble not in word, he is a perfect man, able to rule even the whole body.

3. Behold, into the mouths of horses we put bits, to make them obedient to us, and we turn about their whole body.

Ver. 1.—1. Do not become many of you teachers. The great desire which the Jews, to whom this letter was written, had to become teachers in the church after their conversion, and to inculcate the obligation of the law of Moses, is remarked. 1 Tim. i. 7. There is a great number of teachers in the church, desiring to teach the people of the law. These teachers of the law in the Christian church were the great corrupters of the gospel. 2. We shall receive. He joins himself with the persons to whom he wrote, to mitigate the harshness of his reproach.

Ver. 2.—1. We all stumble. This is a metaphor taken from the practice of putting a slip in a horse's mouth, called a bit, so as to make the horse stumble, without falling; as is plain from Rom. xi. 20. A mistake is a slip. Have they stumbled so as to fall?—Wherefore, as in scripture walking denotes the course of a man's conduct. Stumbling, in this passage, signifies those lesser failings in duty to which common Christians are liable. For it was in that character, and not in the character of an inspired apostle, that James, to mitigate the harshness of his reproach, ranked himself among the persons to whom he wrote.

2. If any one stumble not in word, he is, &c. The apostle's meaning, according to Grotius, is, If any one does not teach false doctrine, he is able to rule the church, called in other passages the body. But as the apostle is speaking of the vice of the tongue in general, which he had reproved chap. 1. 26. I am of opinion, that by stumbling in word, he means those sins or evil speaking which the Judaizing teachers uttered against their opponents, as well as the uttering of erroneous doctrine and precepts.

3. He is a perfect man. Not perfect in an absolute sense; for in that sense no one can be perfect. But he is a man of great virtue; a man perfect in comparison of others. For it is reasonable to believe, that one who is strictly conscientious in his words, will be proportionately careful of his actions.

4. Able to rule even the whole body. The word οὐσίως properly signifies to hold in and turn about a fiery high-mediated horse by means of a strong bridle. Here it is applied metaphorically, to denote the restraining of our passions by means of a firm resolution. Thus the body in this passage signifies the passions and appetites of the body, and not the church, as is evident from ver. 8.
CHAP. III.

JAMES.

4 Behold also the ships, which, though they be so great, and are driven by hard winds, are turned about by a very small helm whithersoever the force of the director will. 1

5 So also the tongue is a little member, yet it worketh mightily. 1 Behold how much wood a little fire kindleth !

6 (And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity, even the tongue is placed among our members, that maketh the whole body of the body to sin, and after the pattern of the world.) 1

7 (For) every nature of wild beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of sea-monsters, is tamed, and is harnessed, and is leashed by the human nature:

8 But the tongue of men no one can tame; it is an unruly evil thing, full of deadly poison. 1

9 (For) with it we bless God, even the Father, and with it we curse men, who are made like unto the likeness of God.

10 Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be: for if we love and bless God, we will love and bless men also, seeing they were made after his image.

11 Dost any fountain send forth water both sweet and bitter ?

12 Can a fig-tree, my brethren, produce olives? or a vine figs? so no fountain can yield salt and sweet water.

Ver. 4. The force of the director willth.]—This is the literal translation of της ρουσίας, as in the 20th verse, where the verse is quoted. For της ρουσίας is the word for steering the helm; and μοίραν signifies the force which he exerts in turning it from side to side; and ἔστοιχος, which expresses the will of the director, is specifically ascribed to the force which he exerts in steering.

Ver. 5. It worketh mightily. ]—The word μοίραν is compounded of two words which signify a great neck; consequently it contains an allusion to a horse, in who walking proudly raises his neck: and so does the same when he exerts his force, the word is very properly translated, worketh mightily. The meaning is, that the tongue, though a small member, hath great power in governing the body; that it is efficacious and active. Democritus explains μοίραν thus,—Μοίραν ἔχειν κατά τό αὐτόν αὐθαυστικήν, It makes good good and evil.

2. How much wood. ]—The Greek word λίβανος a denotes a mass or heap of any kind of matter, but especially of wood. The Latin used materia in the same sense. Curritus, 1 b. 6. 6. "Multa materiae excitantur miles."

Ver. 6. And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity. ]—This is a metaphor of the same kind with a sea of troubles, a deluge of wickedness. The Syriac translation of this clause is, It makes the mouth violent. And the word λίβανος is the word, which, in Whitaker’s opinion, makes both the sense and the similitude clear. But it changes the similitude, by making the wicked world the fuel; whereas the apostle represents the body as the fuel. And therefore commentators think this clause was originally a marginal note, which afterwards was inserted in the text by some ignorant transcriber. A world of iniquity is, that is, a great collection of wickedness. This the apostle says the tongue is, because there is no iniquity which an unbridled tongue is not capable of producing; either by itself, when it curses, rails, teaches false doctrine, and speaks evil of God and men; or by means of others, whom it excites, commands, terrifies, and persuades, to commit murders, thefts, and every evil work.

2. That speaketh the whole body. ]—In this and in what follows, the similitude of the fire and wood is carried on. For as the fire put among the wood, first speareth or blackeneth it with its smoke, and then setteth it on fire, so the tongue speareth and blackeneth the whole body, and setteth on fire the natural frame.

3. And setteth on fire the natural (wheel or frame.) ]—So τοῦ φύλου τοῦ σώματος, chap. 1. 18. τοῦ ἁλοῦ τοῦ σώματος. For ἀλού the natural face. ]—The wonderful mechanism of the human body, and its powers of action, and of being affected by the soul, is in this passage aptly represented by the wheels of a machine which work on each other. The mechanism of the tongue is, in first setting and then destroying both the bodies and the souls of men, arises from the language which it frames, whereby it is like a fountain’s passageway to such doctrines, that being no longer under the direction of their reason, they push them on to such silliness as are destructive both of their body and soul. So, Emler, Alberti, and others, by the natural wheel, understand the successive generations of men; one generation begets the other, as his who directs the helm; and ἄλογον signifies the force which he exerts in turning it from side to side; and ἔστοιχος, which expresses the will of the director, is specifically ascribed to the force which he exerts in steering.

Ver. 7. For every nature of wild beasts, &c. ]—In translating this verse I have followed Beza. The phrase χαλκώσθης, every nature of wild beasts, &c., means the strength and ferocity of wild beasts, the swiftness of birds, the poison of serpents, the exceeding great force of sea-monsters. These have all been overcome by the art and ingenuity of man, so that they have been made subservient to his use and pleasure.

Ver. 8. But the tongue of men no one can subdue. ]—This translation arises from the right construction of the original, in the following manner: To τῆς ρουσίας, τοῦ ροπομολογίου τοῦ σώματος. Besides, it gives a more just sense than the common translation, which represents the apostle as saying, that no one can subdue his own tongue. The tongue of other men no one can subdue: but certainly a man can subdue his own tongue. Democritus reads the clause interrogatively, And can no man subdue the tongue? It is an unruly evil.
13 Is any one wise and intelligent among you? Let him show, by a good conversation, his works with meekness of wisdom.

14 But if ye have bitter anger and strifes in your hearts, do not boast and do not against the truth.

15 This is not the wisdom which cometh from above, (chap. i. 17.), but is earthly, animal, demonic.

16 For where anger and strifes, there tumult, and every evil work.

17 But the wisdom from above is first indeed pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be persuaded, full of compassion and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.

18 (v. 104.) Besides, the fruit of righteousness (w) with peace, is sown by them who practise peace.

JAMES.

13 Though ye cannot subdue other men's tongues, ye may bridle your own. I therefore say, Is any teacher among you wise and intelligent? Let him show, by a good conversation, his works and actions as a teacher performed with the meekness of wisdom.

14 But if ye have bitter anger and strifes in your hearts against your opponents, and express those bad dispositions by speech, do not boast of these things as wisdom, and give the lie to true religion, which forbids them.

15 This outrageous method of spreading religion is not the wisdom which cometh from God, but is earthly policy suggested by your animal passions, and belengeth to demons, who inspire you with it.

16 For where there is bitter anger on account of opinions, and strifes in maintaining them, there tumult and every evil work subsist.

17 But the wisdom from God, which ought to guide the teachers of religion, is first indeed unmixed with error and passion; then peaceable, leading men to maintain peace: it renders men gentle towards others; and easy to be persuaded to forgiveness; it is full of compassion towards the afflicted, and of the good fruits of charitable actions; without partiality in judgment, and without hypocrisy.

18 Besides, the good fruit of true faith, with peace, the effect of true faith, is sown in the hearts of others most effectually, by those teachers who maintain peace in society.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

Tax crimes condemned in this and the following chapter were so atrocious, and of so public a nature, that we can hardly suppose them to have been committed by any who bare the name of Christians. Wherefore, as this letter was directed to the whole Jewish nation, it is reasonable to suppose, that the apostle, in writing these chapters, had the unbelieving Jews, not only in the provinces, but in Judea, chiefly in his eye; who, it is well known, were now become desperately wicked.

Some time before the breaking out of the war with the Romans, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jewish commonwealth, the Jews, as Josephus informs us, (Bell. l. ii. c. 17. 19. 51. Geneva edit. 1633.), on pretence of defending their religion, and of procuring for themselves the freedom from foreign dominion, and that liberty which they thought themselves entitled to as the people of God, made various insurrections in Judea against the Romans, which occasioned much bloodshed and misery to their nation. The factions likewise into which the more zealous Jews were now split, had violent contentsions among themselves, in which they killed one another, and plundered one another's goods. In the provinces likewise the Jews were become very turbulent; particularly in Alexandria, Egypt, Syria, and many other places, where they made war against the heathens, and killed numbers of them, and were themselves massacred by them in their turn. To these attempts against the heathens the more zealous Jews were led by this false opinion, that the precepts of their law, which required them to extirpate the Canaanites, obliged them to kill idolaters, and destroy idolatry everywhere. Accordingly it is certain, that in the period we are speaking of, the Jews were in the state in the midst of which God abhorred, that they were unable to remove, and neglected no opportunity of attacking the heathens, when they thought they could do it with success.

This being the state of the Jews in Judea, and in the provinces, about the time the apostle James wrote his epistle to the twelve tribes, it can hardly be doubted, that the wars, and fightings, and murders, of which he speaks in the beginning of chap. iv., were those above described. For, as the apostle composed his letter in the year 62, after the confusions were begun; and as the crimes committed in these confusions, although acted under the colour of zeal for God and for truth, were a scandal to any religion, it certainly became him, who was one of the chief apostles of the circumcision, to condemn such insurrections, and to rebuke, with the greatest sharpness, the Jews who were the prime movers in them. Accordingly this is what James hath done. For, after recommending the practice of peace to the teachers of religion, he began this chapter with asking the Jews, whence the wars and fightings were among them came! And by adding, "Come they not from your lusts which war in your members?" he isustated, that although they pretended in these things to be guided by zeal for the glory of God, and for the salvation of the heathen, the true spring of the whole was their own lusts. Their love of power and wealth made them anxious to have many proselytes, by whose influence they hoped to have some share in the government of the cities where they lived, or at least to enjoy some lucrative public offices. They even endeavoured to terrify the heathens, by their wars and massacres, into a compliance with their desires, ver. 1. Yet when he told them, they never could succeed in converting the heathens, and destroying idolatry, because they did not use the methods proper for these ends. They neither prayed to God for assistance and success, nor expressed meekness towards those whom they wished to convert, ver. 2. Besides, they acted from wicked motives. They wished to make proselytes, merely that they might draw money from them to spend on their lusts, ver. 3. Nay, they followed the heathens in their corrupt manners, that, gaining their friendship, they might with the more ease persuade them to embrace Judaism, ver. 4. In all these things they were condemned by their own scriptures, and also by the practice of the apostles of Christ, who propagated true religion milsty, and without rage, ver. 5, 6. He therefore exhorted them to subject themselves to God, and to resist the devil, by whom they were excited to follow the turbulent courses he had condemned; and assured them that if they resisted the devil, he would flee from them, ver. 7. Then counselled them to worship God, not by rites and ceremonies, but with their spirit; assuring them, if they did so, that God would accept and bless them. In this the apostle tacitly reproved the unbelieving Jews for the zeal they showed in persuading the heathens to embrace the rites of Moses, while they were at no pains in persuading them to lead holy lives. Farther, the zealots he ordered to cleanse their hands from blood and rapine, and to purify their hearts from evil passions, before they presumed to worship God, ver. 8. Withal, to rouse the whole of them, if possible, to repentance, he foretold the dreadful miseries which were coming upon them; and called on them to mourn bitterly for their sins, ver. 9, 10.—By this severe rebuke and threatening, in which the apostle used great authority and plainness, he intended not only to bring the unconverted Jews to a right sense of things, but also to prevent the believing part of the nation from joining them in the riots and insurrections which they raised on pretence of religion. Then, addressing both sorts, he forbade them to speak evil of one another on account of their differences in religion, because it was an usurpation of God's prerogative, as Lord of the conscience, and only Judge of men, ver. 11, 12.

Lastly, because many of the unconverted Jews who followed commerce, in laying their schemes, neither took into their view the brevity and uncertainty of human life, nor the supremacy of God in directing all events, but spoke and acted as if all things had depended on their own pleasure, the apostle rebuked them for their irreligious temper and vain speeches, and directed them in what manner to express themselves concerning their schemes respecting futurity, ver. 13—17.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IV.—1 Whence the wars and fightings which ye carry on among yourselves, and against the heathens? Come they not hence, even from your lusts which war in your members? (See Rom. vii. 23. 1 Pet. ii. 11.)

1 Ye strongly desire; and have not; ye kill, and are zealous, and cannot obtain; (see ver. 3. note); ye fight and war, but have not, because ye ask not.

3 Ye ask, and do not receive, because ye ask amiss wickedly, that ye may spend upon your own lusts.

Ver. 1.—1. Whence the wars, &c. Here, and in the following chapter, James uses the rhetorical figure called apothemata, addressing the Jews as if they were present, whereby he hath given his discourse great strength and vivacity. What these wars were, see in the illustration.

2. Even from your lusts.—Literally, your pleasures; pleasures, the effect, being put for lust, the cause.

3. Lusts which war in your members. This, as Bengelius remarks, is of the wars which kings carry on against kings, and nations against nations. Their ambition to extend their territories, their love of greatness and riches, their resentment of supposed injuries, all the effect of lust, engage them in war.

Ver. 2.—1. Ye strongly desire. —For this sense of desire, see Rom. vii. 7. note. According to Whitby, the strong desire which the Jews indicated was that of the heathens, and of recovering their liberty. But as the apostle says, they did not obtain what they strongly desired, because they did not ask it of God. I rather think what they strongly desired was, to make proselytes to the Jewish religion, as a pledge to the Messiah's kingdom, where they expected to pass their lives in the enjoyment of every kind of advantage.2

2. Ye kill, and are zealous. —The Jews, in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, were greatly enraged against their brethren who had become Christians, caused many thousands in Rome, that Claudius found it necessary for the peace of the city to banish them all. See Pref. to Romans, sect. 3. Yet I do not think the apostle had these confusions in his eye here. The murderers of which he speaks seem to have been those committed by the zealots, whose rage often carried them to murder the heathens, and even those of their own nation who opposed them. Accordingly, to shew who the persons were to whom he spake, the apostle adds, see Acts, &c. (Acts 21:27, Acts 21:27) , and are zealous.

3. Ye fight and war. —According to Bengelius, ye kill and are zealous, is the action of individuals against individuals; but this, ye fight and war, is the action of many against many.

4. But ye have not, because ye ask not. —Since the persons to whom the apostle is speaking failed of their purpose, because they did not pray to God, it shews that some of their purposes at least were laudable, and might have been accomplished without anger of God. Now this will not apply to the Judaizing teachers in the church, who strongly desired to subject the converted Gentiles to the law of Moses. As little will it apply to those who covered riches. The apostle's declaration agrees only to such of the unconverted Jews as endeavoured to bring the Gentiles into the bonds of the Jewish religion and worship of the true God. So far their attempt was commendable, because, by converting the Gentiles, they preserved them for receiving the gospel; and if for this they had asked the assistance and blessing of God sincerely, they might have been successful in their purpose.
James 4. Chap. IV.

but to draw money from them, that ye may spend it upon your lusts.

4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity against God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God.

5 Do ye think that the scripture (certain scriptures) speaketh falsely? Any doth the Spirit who dwelleth in us (certain scriptures) strongly incline to rage?

6 No. But he giveth greater grace. (see 122. 2.) For he saith, 'God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.'

7 Therefore be ye subject to God. Resist the devil, and he shall flee from you. (See 1 Pet. v. 9. Eph. vi. 11.)

8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners, and purify your hearts, ye men of two souls. (See chap. i. 8. note 1.)

9 Be exceedingly afflicted, and mourn, and weep: And let your laughter be turned into mourning, and your joy into sadness.

Ver. 2. Ye do not receive, because ye ask wickedly, that ye may spend upon your lusts;—what other sense can we understand of this in the Jews praying for the good of this life, which they did not receive, because their prayer was to spend them in the gratification of their lusts. But though such a prayer had been allowable, the apostle scarcely would have spoken of it here, as it had no connexion with his subject. His meaning in my opinion is, that they prayed for success in converting the heathens, not from any regard to the glory of God and the salvation of the heathen, but from a desire to draw money from them, when converted, to spend on their own lusts.

Ver. 4. Ye adulterers and adulteresses,—Because God himself represented his relation to the Jews, as his people, under the idea of a marriage, and because the prophets, in conformity to that idea, represented the holiness of the Jews as adultery, it is supposed by some, that James called those Jews who acted inconsistently with their religion adulterers and adulteresses in a spiritual sense; but others more properly understand this application literally, because holiness was a sin from which the Jews had long been entirely free; but to adultery, and the other sins of the flesh, they were exceedingly addicted. See Rom. ii. 1 note 1 and James v. 6. note 2. The Spirit and the flesh, the word adulteres; and Estius thinks it was added to the text by some invidious translation of Christian his epistle addresses the females. Still perhaps the word should be omitted; Proleg. No. 406.

Ver. 8. 1. Do ye think the scripture speaketh falsely?—The apostle moiety would speak so, particularly, that the friendship of the wicked, which is purchased by following them in their evil courses, is enmity against God; and when it denounces the wrath of God against such men. Here James has in his eye those passages of the Jewish scriptures, where the things mentioned are declared sin and denounced as deadly, either directly or by implication, particularly Ex. v. 5. 6. 7. 8. 8. 1. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. The minds of the Jews was enmity against God. And by calling these words scripture, he hath, like Peter, 2 Ep. iii. 16, testified that Paul wrote his epistles by inspiration. That the Greek word (a true signifies falsely, see 1 Thess. ii. 1. note 1.

And both the Spirit. I have followed Glassius and Whiby in supplying the word and at the beginning of this clause, to show that the apostle puts two separate questions to the Jews. For, if the whole is considered as one question, it will imply, as Whiby observes, that the scripture speaks what is contained in the latter clause; which I do not find it hath anywhere done. Reza, however, supposed that the scripture is represented as saying those words, which the apostle alludes to Gen. viii. 21. The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth. But that text does not appear to have any respect due to the clause in question. This passage of the scripture being very difficult, I am not certain that I have attained its true meaning.

3. The Spirit who dwelleth in us.—The apostle propounded to the Jews the mild method of spreading the gospel, which he and his brethren, by the direct inspiration of the Spirit of God, followed, as an example to be imitated by the Jews in spreading their religion among the heathens.

4. Strongly incline to rage.—I have translated the Greek word (a true, in this clause, by the English word rage, because the word which answers to it in the Hebrew hath that signification, Job x. 2. Exek. xxvii. 11. and there are other scriptures used both through the pen of the New Testament, in the sense of the corresponding Hebrew words. Hence likewise is of opinion, that it signifies anger; for he hath translated the passage thus, 'Do ye think the scripture speaketh falsely? The Spirit that dwelleth in us is ready to be angry.' But as the scripture does not anywhere say this, it is more proper to separate the verse into two questions, as I have done. If rage is thought an unusual sense of the word (true, it may be translated madness; a sense which it hath Matt. xxvi. 38. Mark xvi. 10. See Fausbroke's Dictionary.

Ver. 6. For he saith, &c.—The Spirit saith this, Prov. iii. 34. 'Surely he scorneth the scorners, but he giveth grace to the lowly.' The apostle's quotation of this passage, though somewhat different in the words, is the same in the sense with the original. For scorners, in scripture, are proud insolent wicked men; and to resist such persons, by rendring their schemes abortive, and by humbling them, is emphatically called a scorning of them. The Zebah, for whom this passage of the epistle is intended, are flatly called scorners, because they held the heathens in the state of business contempt; and fancying themselves, by the precepts given to their fathers concerning the Canaanites, bound to exterminate them from the land, they do not scruple to kill the heathens when it was in their power to do it. In quoting Prov. iii. 34. James hath substituted the LXX. translation, as sufficiently accurate.

Ver. 7. Resist the devil, &c.—Benson's note on this is good. 'We may chase away the devil, not by holy water, the sign of the cross, or any superstitious charm, but by steady virtue and resolute goodness.'

Ver. 8. 1. Draw nigh to God.—Persons who came to the tabernacle to worship, were said to 'draw near to God,' as the symbol of his presence rested there. But this was only a drawing nigh to God with the body. They more truly draw nigh to God, who draw nigh to him with their spirits, by a serious and solemn reflection of his presence, perfections, and blessedness; and by exercising those pious affections which are due to him. And whosoever worship God in that spiritual manner, is justly said to draw nigh to God, and will be accepted of him, in whatever place he worshippeth him.

2. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners.—The priests prepared themselves for performing the services of the tabernacle by washing and cleansing their bodies. In like manner the people, had they prayed, always washed their hands. In both cases the rite was emblematical, denoting that purity of heart and life which is necessary to render men's worship acceptable to the Deity. Further, he extends in this passage being put for all the members of the body used in the composition of sin, the apostle's injunction, according to its emblematical meaning, imports that under the gospel we must worship God by cleansing our bodies from outward filthiness, but by holiness of heart and life. Accordingly, because our Lord hath declared that out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, &c. James adds, 'and purify your hearts.' This, with other exhortations of the like kind found in scripture, imply, that in matters of religion and virtue men must cooperate with the grace of God by their own earnest endeavours.

Ver. 9. And your joy into sadness.—This was used by Homer, Iliad ii. 450. 546. to denote the depression of mind observable in persons overwhelmed with a sense of guilt, or sorrow, and manifested by hanging down the head. This was the disposition of the publican who went up to the temple to pray, Luke xlii. 10.

10 Be humbled in the presence of the Lord, and he will lift you up.

11 Speak not against one another, brethren. He who speaketh against his brother, and condemneth his brother, speaketh against the law, and condamneth the law. But if thou condemnest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.

12 There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and condemn another. Thou, who art thou that condemnest another?

13 Come now, shall we say, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go to such a city, and will obtain our merchandize, and get gain?

14 Who do not know what shall be to-morrow? For what is your life? A smoke that appeareth for a little while, and then disappeareth.

15 Instead (vi. 73.) of which ye ought to say, If the Lord will, and we shall live; (Jas. 4, 18.) certainly we will do this or that.

16 But now ye boast of your proud speeches; all boasting of this sort is bad.

17 (Osr. 262.) Wherefore, to him who knoweth to do good, and doth it not, it is to him sin.

Ver. 11.—1. Speakst against the law?—that is, in Bengelius’s opinion, against the law of Moses. But why not the law in this passage be the gospel, called twice in this epistle the law of liberty? Bengelius says this is the last time the law of Moses is mentioned in the New Testament.

Ver. 12.—1. There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy. This description of the lawgiver shows, that the apostle is not speaking of Moses and his law, but of Christ and his gospel. Being therefore the sole lawgiver in the Christian church, the snares among the converted Jews had no power to make laws for themselves. For the same reason, neither the bishop of Rome, nor any collection of men met in council, have power to make any laws binding on the consciences of the least, any more than they have power to deliver over to perdition those who refuse to obey their laws. The power of saving and destroying, though they have impossibly assigned that power, belongs to Christ alone. His own laws he hath declared in the scriptures, and for any man, or body of men, to add to or take from what is there declared, is a degree of presumption which Christ the great lawgiver will by no means suffer to go unpunished.

Ver. 13.—1. Thou art that who condemnest another? This question strongly displays the arrogance and folly of men condemning one another for any matter pertaining to conscience, since they cannot punish them whom they condemn.

Ver. 16.—1. Wherefore, to him who knoweth to do good, and doth it not, it is to him sin. This is an interjection calculated to excite attention.

Ver. 16.—1. Wherefore, to him who knoweth to do good, and doth it not, it is to him sin. Many MSS. have the verses in this verse in the subjunctive mood. But other MSS. with some printed editions, have them in the indicative. The sense, however, is the same; for the subjunctive hath often the signification of the indicative.

Ver. 16.—1. A smoke verify it, which appeareth for a little while, and then disappeareth. In the writings of the heathen moralists and poets, there are many beautiful descriptions of the levity and uncertainty of human life. Homer, Iliad vi. compares the successes of war, after the outward slaughter, and then fall in autumn, and new ones come forth in the following spring. We find the same thought more elegantly expressed, Ecclesiastic. xiv. 18. As of the green leaves on a thick tree, some fall and some grow, so is the generation of flesh and blood: One cometh to an end, and another is born. The sudden spring compares the life of man in a flower of the field, chap. xli. 6. ‘All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth, because the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it. But the word is life.’ So likewise our apostle, chap. i. 10, 11. But in no author, sacred or profane, is there a finer image of the brevity and uncertainty of human life than this given by James, who hath likened it to ‘a smoke which appeareth for a little time, then disappeareth’ while men are looking at it.

10 Be humbled in the presence of the Lord, on account of your sins, and he shall lift you up, by bestowing on you pardon and salvation.

11 Speak not against one another, brethren, on account of your opinions in religion. He who speaketh against his brother, and condemneth his brother in matters pertaining to conscience, speaketh against the law both of Moses and of Christ, which forbids that kind of speaking; and condemneth the law itself. But if they condemn the law, they are not a doer of the law, as thou oughtest to be, but a proud arraigner of it.

12 There is but one lawgiver, who hath power to save the obedient, and to destroy the disobedient. Thou, who art thou that condemnest thy brother, and thereby artest the preceptive of Christ?

13 Attend ye, ye irreverent men, who forget your depending on God, say, as if all events were in your hand, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go to such a city, and will obtain our merchandize, and get gain.

14 In this confident manner ye speak concerning futurity, who do not know what shall happen to-morrow. To-morrow ye may die.

15 Instead of which ye ought to say, If the Lord will, and we shall live; certainly we will do this or that, seeing all future events depend on God alone, and not on your pleasure.

16 But now ye boast of your proud speeches; all boasting of this sort is bad.

17 Being taught by your own scriptures that all things are ordered by God, ye have no excuse for your proud speeches. Wherefore, to him who knoweth to think and speak rightly concerning futurity, and doth it not, to him is sin.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

This unbelieving Jews being exceedingly addicted to sensual pleasures, and very covetous, were of course grosser oppressors of the poor. Wherefore, to terrify these wicked men, and if possible to bring them to repentance, St. James, in the most lively colours, set before them the miseries which the Romans, the instruments of the divine vengeance, were to bring upon the Jewish people, both in Judea and everywhere else, now deserted of God for
New Translation.

Chap. V.—1 Come now, ye rich men, weep, boil, on account of your miseries which are coming upon you. 2 Your riches are putrefied, and your garments are moth-eaten. 3 Your gold and silver are eaten with rust, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall rise up against you in the last days. 4 (Ve) Alas! The hire of the labourers who have reaped your fields, which is fraudulently kept back by you, crieth; and the cry of the reapers have entered into the ears of the Lord of Hosts. (Rom. ix. 29, note 2.)

Ver. 1. Weep on account of your miseries which are coming upon you.—The Syriac translation of the last clause of this verse is, ' arrestsu veqenur ruqer vaukam.' The miseries of which the apostle speaks, were those in which the Jews were to be involved in their war with the Romans, and which, by the signs pointed out in our Lord's prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, James, who wrote this letter in Judea, knew were at hand; miseries from famine, pestilence, and the sword. These fell heinous no doubt on the Jews in Judea. But they extended also to the Jews in the province of Bithynia, when Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans, the Jews in the provinces within the empire, and also out of its bounds, sent help to their brethren in Judea. So Dion Cassius tells us, lib. 66.—The reader, who desires a particular account of those calamities which then befell the Jews, may read Josephus's history of the war, where he will find scenes of misery not to be paralleled in the annals of any nation.

Ver. 2. Your riches are putrefied.—(Ve) This circumstance shows that the apostle speaks of stores of corn, wine, and oil, which, like the rich fool mentioned Luke xii. 18, they had amassed probably by rapacious and fraud. In this manner the Syriac translator understood the passage; for he translates it, 'corruptum sunt of the corn.'

Ver. 3. Your garments are moth-eaten.—In the eastern countries, the fashion of clothes did not change as with us. Here persons of fortune were in use to have many garments made of different costly stuffs, which they laid up as a part of their rich store. See Gen. xiv. 22, Judges xiv. 12, 13. 2 Kings v. 2. This appears also from Q. Curtius, who tells us, lib. v. c. 6, that when Alexander took Persepolis, he found in it a great treasure of all sorts of rich matters, consisting not only of gold and silver, but of garments, books, ingeminamodus. 2. Ver. 3. 4. And in a manner of things will be a witness against you. The circumstances of their corn, &c. being putrefied, and of their gold and silver being eaten with rust are mentioned to show that they had not been properly used, but covesiously hoarded. And by a strong poetical figure, the rust of their gold and silver is represented both as a witness against them, and an execrator to deter them: it will bear witness to their covetousness, and punish them by raising the most acute pain in their conscience.

2. Treasured up misery in the last days.—In the original this clause is elliptical. In Vitringa's edition of the Vulgate it is, 'The avarice of the rich.' The Syriac translator, construing with this clause, hath 'permu avaritiae volubilis in die ultimum.' And the commentators who by the last days understate the day of judgment, have adopted that translation. But, as the apostle is speaking of the last days of the Jewish commonwealth, and of the miseries which were then to fall on the nation, and particularly on the rich men, I think with Whitby that the object was a great richness, which was fraudulently kept back; and that the whole clause means, 'the cry of the miseries that are fraudulently kept back by you, crieth;' and that the whole clause means, 'treasure up wrath.' Rom. ii. 6.—This denunciation, though applied here to the unbelieving Jews in the apostle's days, is in general in its intention, and ought to be seriously attended to by all in every age who hoard riches unjustly, and who either spend them in immorality, or spend them luxuriously. It is in reality a treasuring up to themselves misery against the day of judgment.

Ver. 4. The hire of the labourers, &c. crieth, and the cries of the reapers.—Here a twofold cry is mentioned, the cry of the hire, and the cry of the reapers themselves, to mark more strongly the greatness of the injustice committed. In this apostrophe there is an allusion to Deut. xx. 15. 'At that day shalt thou give him his hire, lest he cry against thee to the Lord.' By representing the cries of the reapers defrauded of their hire, as entering into the ears of the Lord of hosts, the apostle intimates, that the great Ruler of the universe attends to the wrongs done to his creatures, and is affected by them, as tender-hearted persons are affected with seeing others miserable; and that he will in due time avenge them by punishing their oppressors. Let all oppressors consider this.

Ye have lived luxuriously on the earth, and have been wanton; ye have fatted your hearts, as (o, 154.) for a day of slaughter.

Ye have condemned, ye have killed the Just One; who did not resist you.

Wherefore, be patient, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman, who expecteth the precious fruit of the earth, is patient concerning it, till it receive the early and the latter rain.

Be ye also patient: Strengthen your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

Grieve not against one another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: Behold the Judgestandeth before the door.

Take, my brethren, the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord for an example of suffering evil, and of patience.

Behold we call them blessed who are patient. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and ye have seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is very compassionate and merciful.

But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, nor by the earth, nor yet by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay.

Ver. 5.—Ye have lived luxuriously.—Do not take this literally. The great sin of the rich is not that they eat well and wear fine clothes, but the sin of the rich is that they live by the labor of others. See 1 Tim. vi. 7. The Jews were so noted for lasciviousness, that Tactius calls them "projectivists ad libidinem genem," a nation exceeding all others in all kinds of debauchery. See also Matt. xvii. 21. Ver. 6.—Ye have fatted your hearts, as a day of slaughter.—"Your hearts are so full of sensuality as if you had fattened them, in order to sacrifice them to the gratification of your lusts."—Westcott. Ver. 8.—Be patient: Strengthen your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.—The common affairs of life, the exercise of patience cheerfully. Behold the husbandman, who expecteth the precious fruit of the earth, is patient concerning it, till it receive the early and the latter rain. Behold, the husbandman, who expecteth the precious fruit of the earth, is patient concerning it, till it receive the early and the latter rain.

Behold we call them blessed who are patient. Ye have heard of the patience of Job under his heavy sufferings, and ye have seen the happy end which the Lord put to them; and that the Lord is very compassionate and merciful to his people, even when he afflicteth them most.

But above all things, my brethren, swear not falsely concerning your faith, to free yourselves from punishment, neither by heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay. Ver. 9.—Ye have fatted your hearts, as a day of slaughter.—"Suck the flesh of their own body, to make their flesh fat in a day of slaughter."—Westcott.

To shew the subjection, where the prophets were proposed as an example of patience in suffering, it is an allusion to Christ's words, Matt. v. 11. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you; as is plain from his adding, ver. 12. Rejoice: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you. To shew the subjection, I have translated δοξαζομενοι literally, 'we call them blessed.' Benefice observes, that the Papists, to authorize their practice of makingRain, have in their version translated this clause, 'we bless those who have suffered with constancy.' See 2 John, ver. 6. note 2.

Ye have heard of the patience of Job:—After mentioning the prophets, namely, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the rest, as examples of patience under sufferings, the apostle brings in the example of Job, a Gentile, who was remarkably patient under the heaviest afflictions, and was highly rewarded. His design in this was to shew the suffering believing Jews that their lot was not different from that of the most eminent servants of God; that if it were a heavy lot to the Gentile, it was a much heavier one to the Jew, and that his lot was not like that of Job in the body. If the Gentile was so patient under great sufferings, it became them then to be equally patient, as being better instructed than he was. This passage of scripture, as well as Ezek. xiv. 14,where Job is mentioned with Noah and Daniel as one eminently righteous, shews that Job was a real person, and that his history is not aondrous fable, but one of many supposed. A fabulous person certainly would not have been mentioned by the apostle as an example to be followed.

Ye have seen the end of the Lord:—This is the guiltless of the agent. Ye have seen in the history of Abraham the good man, what a happy termination the Lord put to his sufferings.
nor by any other oath: But let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay, that ye may not fall under condemnation.

14 Is any one sick among you? let him send for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, after anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.

15 And the prayer of faith will save the sick man, and the Lord will raise him up: and if this be not the case, let him have forgiveness of sins for his unbelief.

16 Confess your faults one to another, and pray for one another, so that ye may be healed. (See 1 John v. 20. note 3.) The inquired prayer (James, 69.) of the righteous man avail much.

17 Elias was a man of like infirmity with us. And he prayed fervently (80.) that it by some, that James in this passage forbids the brethren to make indirect vows for the purpose of delivering themselves out of their affliction; because a practice of that sort showed great ignorance of the character of God, and great impatience. This is doubtless a good sense of the passage. Yet I rather think it forbids them, when brought before the tribunals of their persecutors, to deny that they had oathed with; which some of them, it seems, thought they might do with a safe conscience. It is the oath of one of them, which were reckoned not binding. For that the Jews thought some oaths obligatory and others not, appears from our Lord's condemnation of that false morality, recorded Matt. x. 31.

2. That ye may not fall (85.) under condemnation. —This, which is the reading of the common edition, and of some ancient MSS., particularly the Alexandrian, and of the Syriac, Vulgate, and other versions, was adopted by our translators. But Beza, Bengel, and others, on the authority of the greatest number of MSS., prefer we should transcribe into hypocryst. This latter reading Mill hath inserted in his edition; yet in his Protegcne he prefers the other, No. 1295. —The apostle in this passage sets the condemnation of God threatened in the declaration against false swears, in opposition to the condemnation of men, which the brethren might escape who sincerely called the name of the Lord.

In this, and what goes before, the apostle advises us to employ ourselves in such private religious exercises, as may effectually subdue our present circumstances and frame of mind. When rendered cheerful, by contemplating the manifestations which God hath made of his presence in the works of creation, providence, and redemption, or by any blessed coming of Christ to the minds of his people, to the thought of the end, we are to express our joy, not by drinking and singing in false jocund songs, but by thanksgiving, and by the offering of sacrifices, and by praising God for all his mercies. See Eph. v. 19. On the other hand, when afflicted and oppressed, we are to pray; that being the best means of producing in ourselves patience and resignation. But as the prayer concerning prayer in addition does not imply that we are not to express our joy in suffering according to the will of God, by singing psalms as Paul and his did in the fall at Philippi.

Ver. 14. — 1. Send for the elders of the church; namely, where the sick person lives. See 1 Tim. v. 17, note 1, for an account of the elders. —In the first age the spiritual gifts were dispensed in such plenty, that no church was without these gifts; and particularly, in every church there were some who possessed the gift of miraculously healing the sick.

2. Let them pray over him: that is, with their hands laid on him. This is what is called 'the prayer of faith,' ver. 15. See and pray for: also the places; also the notes on the parallel passage, 1 Cor. xiv. 14, 15.

3. Having anointed him with oil. —Although the rite here prescribed is not mentioned in the account which the Evangelists have given of Christ's commission to his disciples to heal the sick, Matt. x. 8. Luke x. 9, it is probable he appointed it then. For in the account given of the execution of that commission it is said, Mark vi. 13. 'They anointed with oil all that were sick, and healed them.' The anointing the sick oil with was not prescribed, either by our Lord or by his apostles, as a necessary rite, but as a sensible token to the sick person himself, and to those who were present, that a miracle of healing was going to be performed. Where no miracle is to be performed, to use anointing, as a religious rite, is a vain superstition. (See 1 John v. 16. note 5.)

The prayer for faith, the prayer of praise, the prayer of scripture, faith sometimes signifies the spiritual gifts in general, Rom. xi. 31. sometimes the gift of working miracles, 1 Cor. xii. 8. xil. 8, and sometimes the gift of healing diseases, Acts iii. 16, in which sense it is to be understood here. The gift of working miracles was called faith, because they were always performed in consequence of an impression made by the Spirit on the mind of the person who was to perform them, having to undertake the miracle, and were given to him a full persuasion that it would be performed. Wherefore, the prayer of faith is that prayer which the elder, moved by the spirit of God, was to make for the recovery of the sick, in the full persuasion that the Lord would raise him up. See 1 John v. 16. note 1.

Ver. 15. — 1. Confess your faults one to another. —In sickness we are to confess our faults one to another, not because we have power to grant pardon of sin to each other, but, diseases being often inflicted as the punishment of particular sins, (1 Cor. xi. 30,) when the sick are made sensible, in the course of their disease, that they have injured their brethren, they ought to shew to them repentance, by confessing these sins to them, and by asking their pardon. This passage of scripture, therefore, affords no foundation for the Popish practice of auricular confession to the priest. Besides, mutual confession being here enjoined, the priest is not made the medium by this precept to confess to the people, as the people to the priest; not to mention, that confession in general is not enjoined here, but confession to the injured party only, agreeably to our Lord's direction, Matt. x. 25; and, when acknowledged as a fault, we are to be sought, forgiven, and for the party who injured him, that he may be healed. See the following note.

2. And pray for another, that ye may be healed. —Here four things are observable: —1. That this confession was to be made, not by a person in health that he might obtain eternal life, but by a sick person that he might be healed: 2. That this direction was addressed to women as well as to men; for the prayer to pray for another, and even for the men, whether laity or clergy, who have injured them; 3. That there is a special reason in this case for private intercession, either by the priest, or by any other person; 4. Absolution, in the sound sense of the word, being nowhere mentioned in this passage as being necessary to the absolution of the promises of pardon which are made in the gospel to penitent sinners, every one who understands the gospel doctrine may, as Benser observes, declare these promises to penitent sinners, as well as any bishop or priest whatever; and the one hath no more authority to do it than the other: nay, every sincere penitent may expect absolution without the absolution of any person whatever; whereas the inpri pate have no reason to expect that blessing, although absolved by all the priests in the world.

3. The untroubled prayer of the righteous man avail much; namely, to obtain health for the sick. Because this is called the prayer of faith, the prayer of praise, the prayer of scripture, faith sometimes signifies the spiritual gifts in general, Rom. xi. 31. sometimes the gift of working miracles, 1 Cor. xii. 8. xil. 8, and sometimes the gift of healing diseases, Acts iii. 16, in which sense it is to be understood here. The grace and strength of faith, through natural instinct, suffered as we do, from diseases, losses, temptations, persecution, &c.
might not rain; and it did not rain upon the land for three years and six months.\(^3\)

18 And again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain, and the land brought forth its fruit.

19 Brethren, if any one among you is seduced from the truth, and any one turn him back;\(^1\)

20 Let him know, that he who turneth a sinner back from the error of his way, will save a soul from death,\(^2\) and will cover a multitude of sins.\(^3\)

either that the drought was brought on, or the rain sent, in consequence of Elijah’s praying; but it is manifest, that both happened through his prayer; for, 1 Kings xvi. 1. we are told that Elijah knew where it was, that rain should come, and he prayed, and according to his word, it rained. That is, as James hath explained it, according to his inspired prayer for drought, or for rain.\(^3\)

3. And it did not rain upon the land for three years and six months.—This is the period which our Lord likewise says the drought continued, Luke iv. 25. It is said indeed, 1 Kings xvii. 1.
That in the third year the word of the Lord came to Elijah, namely, concerning the rain. But this third year was computed from the time of his going to live at Zarephath, which happened many days after the drought began; as is plain from this, that he remained at the brook Cherith till it was dried up, and then went to Zarephath in the country of Sidon, 1 Kings xvii. 7. 8. Wherefore, the three years and six months must be computed from his discovering the drought, at which time that judgment commenced.

Ver. 18. And again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain.—Of this second prayer there is an inscription in the history, 1 Kings xvii. 42. where we are told, that ’he cast himself down on the earth, and put his face between his knees;’ for that was the posture of an humble and earnest supplicant. Besides, Moses’s praying is expressed by his ’falling on his face,’ Num. xvi. 4.

Ver. 19. And any one turn him back.—This teaches us, that it is the duty of those who persevere in the path of truth, to endeavour, by friendly admonition and by good example, to turn back those who have wandered into error through the viciousness of their own disposition. See 2 Thess. ii. 12.

Ver. 20. 1. Will save a soul from death.—What greater motive can there be to excite the virtuous earnestly to exert themselves in accomplishing the reformation of their erring brethren?

2. And will cover a multitude of sins.—The covering of sins is a phrase which often occurs in the Old Testament, and always sig-ifies the pardoning of sin. Nor has it any other meaning here. For merely it cannot be the apostle’s intention to tell us, that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way will conceal, from the eyes of God’s justice, a multitude of sins committed by the person who does the charitable office, if he continues in them. Such a person needs himself to be turned from the error of his way, in order that his own soul may be saved from death. Peter hath a similar expression, 1 Pet. iv. 8. ‘Love covers a multitude of sins;’ not, however, in the person who is possessed of love, but in the person who is the object of his love. It disposes him to forgive his sins, see Prov. x. 12.—Atterbury, however, (Opera, vol. i. p. 46,) and Scott, (Christ. Life, vol. i. p. 356,) content, that ‘the covering a multitude of sins’ includes also, that the pious action of which the apostle speaks, engageth God to look with greater indulgence on the character of the person who performs it, and to be less severe in marking what he hath done amiss.

I. PETER.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—The History of Simon, whom our Lord enamed Peter.

Simon was a native of Bethsaida, a town situated on the western shore of the lake of Gennesareth. He was by trade a fisherman, and had a brother named Andrew; but whether he was elder or younger than Simon, is not known. Their father was named Jonas or John; and probably was of the same occupation with his sons. Andrew was a disciple of John Baptist, John i. 35, 41, and heard him point out Jesus as ‘the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.’ This good news Andrew communicated to his brother Simon, and brought him to Jesus; who, foreseeing the fortune he would exercise in preaching the gospel, honoured him with the name of Cephas or Peter, which is by interpretation a stone or rock, John i. 42.

Andrew and Peter, now became the disciples of Jesus, often attended him. Yet they still followed their trade of fishing occasionally, till he called them to a more constant attendance, promising to make them ‘fathers of men,’ Mat. iv. 19. Afterwards, when he chose twelve of his disciples to be with him always, and to be his Apostles, Peter and Andrew were of the number. About that time Peter had left Bethsaida, and had gone to Caperna-num with his wife, who is thought to have been of that town. From Andrew’s accompanying his brother thither, and living with him in the same house, it may be conjectured that their father was dead. With them Jesus also abode, after he took up his ordinary residence in Capernaum; for he seems to have been pleased with the disposition and manners of all the members of the family.—

This house is sometimes called Peter’s house, Matt. viii.
14, and sometimes the house of Simon and Andrew, Mark i. 29.—Thus, as Lardner observes, it appears that before Peter became an apostle he had a wife, was the head of a family, had a boat and nets, and a furnished house, and maintained himself by an honest occupation.
To these things Peter alluded when he told his Master, ‘Behold we have left all and followed thee!’ What shall we have therefore?’ Matt. xix. 27. —The apostle Peter seems to insinuate, that Peter’s wife attended him in his travels after our Lord’s ascension, 1 Cor. ix. 5.

Peter, now made an apostle, showed on every occasion the strongest faith in Jesus as the Messiah, and the most extraordinary zeal in his service; of which the following are examples.—The night after the miracle of the loaves, when Jesus came to his disciples sailing on the sea, they were affrighted, supposing that they saw a spirit. But Peter, taking courage, said, ‘Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water. And he said to him, Come,’ Mat. xiv. 26.—The next day, when many of our Lord’s disciples, offended at his discourse in the synagogue of Caspermann, left him, Jesus said to the twelve, 'Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? for thou hast the words of eternal life; and we know, and are sure, that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' In returning this answer, Peter was more forward than the rest, because his faith was strengthened by the late miracle of his walking on the water. — The same answer Peter gave, when Jesus in private asked his disciples, first, what opinion the people entertained of him? next, what was their own opinion? Matt. xvi. 16. 'Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Having received this answer, Jesus declared Peter blessed on account of his faith; and in allusion to the signification of his name, added, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church: and I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven.'

Many think these things were spoken to Peter alone, for the purpose of conferring on him privileges and powers not granted to the rest of the apostles. But others, with more reason, suppose, that though Jesus directed his discourse to Peter, it was intended for them all; and that the honours and powers granted to Peter by name, were conferred on them all equally. For no one will say, that Christ's church was built upon Peter singly. It was built upon the foundation of all the apostles and prophets: Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone. As little can any one say, that the power of binding and loosing was confined to Peter; seeing it was declared afterwards to belong to all the apostles, Matt. xviii. 18. John xx. 23. See Preface to I Timothy, Sect. 5. Art. 1, 2. To these things add this, that as Peter made both his confessions in answer to questions which Jesus put to the whole assembly, these confessions were certainly made in the name of the whole. And therefore what Jesus said to him in reply was designed for the whole without distinction; excepting this, which was peculiar to him, that he was to be the first who, after the descent of the Holy Ghost, should preach the gospel to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles; an honour which was conferred on Peter in the expression, 'I will give thee the keys,'

Peter was one of the three apostles whom Jesus admitted to witness the resurrection of Jairus's daughter, and before whom he was transfigured, and with whom he retired to pray in the garden the night before he suffered. He was the person who, in the fervour of his zeal for his Master, cut off the ear of the high-priest's slave, when the armed band came to apprehend him. Yet this same Peter, a few hours after, that denied his Master three different times in the high-priest's palace, and with oath. After the third denial, being stung with deep remorse, he went out and wept bitterly. This offence therefore Jesus pardoned. And to testify his acceptance of his lapsed but penitent apostle, he ordered the women to carry the news of his resurrection to Peter by name; and appeared to him before he showed himself to any other of his apostles: and, at another appearance, he confirmed him in the apostolic office, by giving him a special commission to feed his sheep. — From that time forth Peter never faltered in his faith; but uniformly shewed the greatest zeal and courage in his Master's cause.

Soon after our Lord's ascension, in a numerous assembly of the apostles and brethren, Peter gave it as his opinion, that one should be chosen to be an apostle in the room of Judas. To this they all agreed; and, by lot, chose Matthias, whom, on that occasion, they numbered with the eleven apostles. See Prelim. Essay I, Art. 1. On the day of Pentecost following, when the Holy Ghost fell on the apostles and disciples, Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice, that is, Peter, rising up, spake with a loud voice, in the name of the apostles, as he had done on various occasions in his Master's life-time, and gave the multitude an account of that great miracle, Acts ii. 14. — When Peter and John were brought before the council, to be examined concerning the miracle wrought on the impotent man, Peter spake. It was Peter who questioned Annas and Sapphira about the price of their lands; and, for their lying in that matter, punished them miraculously with death. It is remarkable also, that although by the hands of the apostles many signs and wonders were wrought, it was by Peter's shadow alone, that the sick, who were laid in the streets of Jerusalem, were healed as he passed by. Lastly, it was Peter who made answer to the council, for the apostles not obeying their command to preach no more in the name of Jesus.

Peter's name was now become so great, that the brethren at Joppa, hearing of his being in Lydda, and of his having cured Eneas miraculously of a palsy, sent, desiring him to come and restore a disciple to life named Tabitha, which he did. — During his abode at Joppa, the Roman centurion Cornelius, directed by an angel, sent for him to come and preach to him. On that occasion, the Holy Ghost fell on Cornelius and his company, while Peter spake. — Peter, by his zeal and success in preaching the gospel, having attracted the notice of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Herod Agrippa, who, to please the Jews, had killed James the brother of John, still farther to gratify them, cast Peter into prison. But an angel brought him out; after which he concealed himself in the city, or in some neighbouring town, till Herod's death, which happened about the end of the year. Some learned men think Peter at that time went to Antioch or to Rome. But if he had gone to any celebrated city, Luke, as L'Enfant observes, would probably have mentioned it. Besides, we find him in the council of Jerusalem, which met not long after this to determine the famous question concerning the circumcision of the Gentiles. — The council being ended, Peter went to Antioch, where he gave great offence by refusing to eat with the converted Gentiles. But Paul withstood him to the face, rebuking him before the whole church for his puerility and hypocrisy, Gal. ii. 11—13.

From the foregoing history it appears, that Peter very early distinguished himself as an apostle; that his Master greatly esteemed him for his courage, his zeal, and his other good qualities; that he lived in peculiar habits of intimacy with Peter, and conferred on him various marks of favour in common with James and John, who likewise distinguished themselves by their talents and good dispositions. But that Peter received from Christ any authority over his brethren, or possessed any superior dignity as an apostle, there is no reason for believing. All the apostles were equal in office and authority; as isplain from our Lord's declaration, 'One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.' The only distinction among the apostles, was that which arose from personal talents and qualifications, a distinction which never fails to take place in every society. Because, if one distinguishes himself by his superior ability in the management of affairs, he will be respected in proportion to the idea which his fellows entertain of him. In this manner, and in no other, Peter, whose virtues and talents were singularly conspicuous, acquired a pre-eminence among the apostles; but it was only of the sort founded on personal esteem. And therefore, in their meetings to deliberate on any important affair, the brethren may have wished to hear him speak first; and he commonly did so: but that was all. In like manner, in their intercourse with their adversaries, Peter often spake in the name of such of the apostles and brethren as were present; which they willingly allowed, perhaps desiring to think him best qualified for the office. The Evangelists also, who wrote their gospels a considerable time after Peter had raised himself in the esteem of the apostles and brethren, added his suffrage to his character, by mentioning him first in the catalogues which they gave of the apostles. And as two of them were themselves apostles, by acknowledging, in that manner, their respect for him, they have shewn themselves entirely free from envy. Lastly, it appears from Peter's epistles that he did not think himself superior in authority to the other apostles. For if he had entertained any imagination of that sort, insinuations of his superiority, if not direct assertions thereof, might have been expected in his epistles, and especially in their inscriptions. Yet there is nothing of that sort in either of his letters. The highest title he takes to himself, in writing to the elders of Pontus, is that of their fellow-elder, 1 Pet. v. 1.

To the foregoing account of Peter's rank among the apostles, I will add from Lardner on the Can. p. 102, that Cassian, supposing Peter to be older than Andrew, makes his age the ground of his precedence among the apostles: And that Jerome himself says, 'The keys were given to all the apostles alike, and the church was built on all of them equally: But, for preventing dissension, precedence was given to one. And John might have been the person; but he was too young; and Peter was preferred on account of his age.' See the Pref. to James, sect. i. paragr. 3.

In the history of the Acts, no mention is made of Peter after the council of Jerusalem. But from Gal. ii. 11, it appears, that after this council he was with Paul at Antioch. He is likewise mentioned by Paul, 1 Cor. i. 12. iii. 23, from which Pearson infers, that Peter had been in Corinth before the first epistle to the Corinthians was written. But this does not follow. In these passages Paul speaks of certain Jews in Corinth, who had been converted by Jesus and Peter. But he does not say they were converted in Corinth: Probably their conversion happened in Judea. If Peter had preached in Corinth before Paul wrote to the Corinthians, he would not have said, 'I have planted, Apollon hath watered;' overlooking the labours of Peter. — When Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, it may be presumed that Peter was not in Rome. For in that epistle Paul alludes many of the brethren there by name, without mentioning Peter. Further, during his two years' confinement at Rome, Paul wrote four letters to different churches, in none of which is Peter mentioned. Neither is any thing said or hinted in these epistles, from which it can be gathered that Peter had ever been in Rome. Probably he did not visit that city till the time of Paul's second mission.

It is generally supposed, that after Peter was at Antioch with Paul he returned to Jerusalem. What happened to him after that is not told in the scriptures. But Eusebius informs us, that Origen, in the third tome of his Exposition on Genesis, wrote to this purpose, "Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia: And at length, coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards; because the salvation of the church at Mytilene is sent in it. But their opinion is not supported by the testimony of ancient writers." Lardner, Can. vol. iii. p. 169, saith, "It seems to me, that when he (Peter) left Judea, he went again to Antioch the chief city of Syria. Thence he might go into other parts of the continent, particularly Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, which are expressly mentioned at the beginning of his first epistle. In those countries he might stay a good while. It is very likely that he did so; and that he was well acquainted with the Christians there, to whom he afterwards wrote two epistles. When he left those parts, I think he went to Rome; but not till after Paul had been in that city, and was gone from it."

Many ancient writers have said that Peter was crucified at Rome, while Nero persecuted the Christians. And their opinion has been repeated by learned men, both Papists and Protestants. Some, however, particularly Scaliger, Salmassius, Fred. Spanheim, and others, deny that Peter ever was at Rome. If the reader wishes to see the evidence from antiquity, on which Peter's having been at Rome rests, he will find it fully set forth by Lardner, (Can. vol. iii. c. 18.), who concludes his inquiry as follows: "This is the general, uncontrived, disinterested testimony of ancient writers in the several parts of the world, Greeks, Latins, Syrians. As our Lord's prediction concerning the death of Peter is recorded in one of the four Gospels, it is very likely that Christians would observe the accomplishment of it: which must have been in some place. And about this place there is no difference among Christian writers of ancient times. Never any other place was named beside Rome; nor did any other city ever glory in the martyrdom of Peter. — It is not for our honour, nor for our interest, either as Christians or Protestants, to deny the truth of events ascertained by early and well attested tradition. If any make use of such facts, we are not accountable for it. We are not, from a dread of such abuses, to overthrow the credit of all history; the consequence of which would be fatal."

Sect. II. — Of the Authenticity of the Epistles of Peter.

Though some doubts were entertained concerning the second epistle of Peter, the authenticity of the first was never called in question; being universally acknowledged as Peter's from the very beginning. In proof of this, Lardner has shown, Can. iii. p. 216, that Peter's first epistle was referred to by Clement of Rome, by Polycarp, and by the martyrs of Lyons: that it was received by Theophilus Bishop of Antioch, and quoted by Papias, Irenaeus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian; which last calls it, "The epistle to the inhabitants of Pontus." Wherefore, there can be no doubt that the first epistle of Peter was all along received as an inspired writing by the whole Christian church.

Eusebius says just now mentioned, in the following passage: E. H. lib. ii. c. 3. "One epistle of Peter, called his first, is acknowledged. This the presbyters of ancient times have quoted in their writings, as undoubtedly genuine. But that called his second, we have been informed, by tradition, has not been received as a part of the New Testament. Nevertheless, appearing to many to be useful, it hath been carefully studied with the other scriptures." It is evident, therefore, that in the time of Eusebius great regard was awed even to the second epistle of Peter by many Christians who esteemed it genuine: for, as Le Clerc, quoted by Benson, very well observes, "If it had not been Peter's, it would not have seemed useful to any man of tolerable prudence; neither ought it to have been carefully studied with the other scriptures, seeing the writer in many places pretends to be St. Peter himself. On the very account that it was a forgery, it would be vociferous; as it is a thing of the worst example, for any man to forge another's name, or pretend to be the person he is not, and what ought not to be pardoned." The reader will find another passage in the Preface to James, sect. ii. paragr. 3, in which Eusebius has spoken of the epistles of Peter.

From a passage in Origen's Commentary on Matthew, quoted by Eusebius, E. H. lib. vi. c. 35, it appears that Origen acknowledged Peter's second epistle. "Peter, on whom the church is built, hath left an epistle universally acknowledged. Let it be granted that he also wrote a second; for it is doubted of."—Jerome, in his book of illustrious men. Art. Peter, says, "Peter wrote two epistles called Catholic, the second of which is denied to be his, because of its differing in style from the former."—This difference shall be examined in the Preface to the second Epistle, sect. i. towards the end.

Estius observes, that whoever desires to know the agreement of Peter's doctrine with Paul's, ought to examine the sentiments and precepts contained in this epistle, which he will find so exactly the same with Paul's, that it will be impossible for him to doubt, that the doctrine of both proceeded from one and the same Spirit of God.

Sect. III.—Of the Persons to whom Peter's First Epistle was written.

Eusebius, Jerome, Didymus of Alexandria, and many of the ancients, were of opinion that Peter's first epistle was written to the Jewish Christians scattered through the countries mentioned in the inscription. And their opinion is adopted by Beza, Grotius, Mill, Cave, Tillmont, and others. But some of the ancients thought this epistle was written to Gentiles also. See Lardner, Coffin, iii. p. 225. Biske, in his prologue to the Catholic epistles, says, St. Peter's epistles were sent to such as had been proselyted from heathenism to Judaism, and after that were converted to the Christian religion. The author of Misc. Sacra and Benson contend, that Peter's first epistle was written to proselytes of the gate; but Wetstein that it was written to the Gentiles. Hallet and Sykes argue that both epistles were written to the Gentiles. Lardner thought Peter's epistles were sent to all Christians in general, Jews and Gentiles, living in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, &c. So likewise Estius and Whitby.

In this diversity of opinions, the only rule of determination must be the inscription, together with the things contained in the epistle itself. From 2 Pet. iii. i. it appears, that this epistle was sent to the same people as the first. Wherefore, since its inscription is, 'To them who have obtained like precious faith with us,' the first epistle must have been sent to believers in general. Accordingly the validation, 1 Pet. v. 14, is general; 'Peace be with you all who are in Christ Jesus.' So also is the inscription; 'To the Sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus, &c., elected according to the foreknowledge of God,' 1 Pet. i. 1. For the appellation of sojourners does not necessarily imply, that this letter was written to none but Jewish believers. In scripture, all religious men are called sojourners and strangers, because they do not consider this earth as their home, but look for a better country. (See Gen. xxxiv. 9. Psal. xxxix. 12. LXX. Heb. xi. 13.) Wherefore, in writing to the Gentile believers, Peter might call them sojourners as well as the Jews, and exhort them, chap. i. 17. 'To pass the time of their sojourn here in fear,' and chap. ii. 11. 'Beseech them, as travellers, to abstain from fleshly lusts.' Further, the Gentile believers in Pontus, &c. might be called sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus, although none of them were driven from their native countries. For the dispersion may signify, that they lived at a distance from each other in the widely extended regions mentioned in the inscription; and that they were few in number, compared with the idolaters and unbelievers among whom they lived. In this sense, the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem are said to have been dispersed through Judae and Samaria, by the persecution raised after the death of Stephen, Acts viii. 1. Lastly, the appellation elected, which is added to the name of strangers of the dispersion, does not imply that none but Jewish believers are meant. All who profess the gospel, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, are in scripture said to be elected; that is, made the visible church and people of God. It may therefore be allowed, that the expressions sojourners of the dispersion, elected, &c., comprehend the Gentile Christians of Pontus, as well as the Jewish; especially seeing they are said to be elected according to the foreknowledge of God. For that is a plain allusion to God's promise, of blessing all nations in Abraham's seed.

Secondly. There are things written in this Epistle which are peculiar to the Gentiles, and cannot be understood of the Jews. For example, chap. i. 14. 'As obedient children, do not fashion yourselves according to the former lusts, in your ignorance.' This, as Lardner observes, might very properly be said to persons converted from heathenism, but not to the Jews, who from their infancy knew the true God by means of the Mosaic revelation. Besides, nowhere in the New Testament are the Jews represented as living in ignorance or darkness.—Chap. i. 18. 'Ye were redeemed from your foolish behaviour, delivered to you by your fathers.' This might be said of the Gentiles rather than of the Jews, if by foolish behaviour the apostle meant the worship of idols, who in scripture are termed μητριακα, Acts xiv. 15. For the idolatrous worship practised by the Gentiles was delivered to them by their fathers. But if, by foolish behaviour, he means disobedience, it might be said of the Jews as well as of the Gentiles, that that behaviour was delivered to them by their fathers.—Chap. i. 20. speaking of Christ, the apostle says, Who 'was manifested at these last times for you, 31, who through him believe in God who raised him up from the dead.' This could neither be said to Jews nor to proselytes, as Benson supposes. For their belief in God was founded on the revelations made by the prophets, and not on the revelations made to them by Christ. But it well agrees to the Gentiles, who, till they were enlightened by the gospel of Christ, had not the least knowledge of the true God. Besides, no one say, that Christ was manifested for the Jews and proselytes only.—Chap. ii. 10. 'Who formerly were not a people, but now are a people of God.' This applies to the Gentiles only. See Rom. ix. 24, 25. —Chap. iv. 8. 'For the time which hath passed of life, is a sufficient time for us to have wrought out the will of the Gentiles, having walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excesses in wine, revelings, banquetings, and shamefaced idolatries.' Though Peter in this passage joined himself with the persons of whom he speaks, it does not follow, either that he was guilty of idolatry, or that the persons with whom he joined himself were Jews. Idolatry is a crime, which the Jews, ever since their return from Babylon, had avoided, and which Peter never was guilty of. Neither had he ever wrought the will of the Gentiles, by walking in lasciviousness, &c. This passage, therefore, is addressed to the Gentile Christians alone, with whom the apostle joins himself, to avoid giving them offence, and to render his discourse the more persuasive.

The passages which appear inconsistent with the supposition that this epistle was written to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews, are the two following.—Chap. ii. 9. 'But ye are an elected race, a kingly priesthood, an holy nation, a purchased people.' These honourable appellations, it is true, were in former times appropriated to the Jews, the ancient people of God. But they belong now to all believers, to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews. And this is what the apostle here declares; as is plain from his adding, 'That ye should declare the perfections of him who hath called you from darkness into his marvellous light, who formerly were not a people, but now are a people of God.' &c.—Chap. iii. 13. 'Have patiently borne the outrages among the Gentiles contemned.' &c. But the Gentiles here are the unbelieving Gentiles; a sense which the word has, 1 Cor. x. 32, ‘Giving offence neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God.’

Upon the whole, I agree with those who think the first epistle of Peter was written to the whole body of Christians who resided in the counties of Pontus, Galatia, &c. and that whether they were of Jewish or Gentile extraction.

Sec. IV.—Of the Apostles Peter’s Design in writing this Epistle; and of the Matters contained in it.

It is well known, that anciently, in proportion as the Christians multiplied in any country, their sufferings became more general and severe. In the latter part, therefore, of the first age, when the rage of the Jews and Gentiles was exceedingly stimulated by the prevalence of the gospel, the apostles of Christ, who were then alive, considered themselves as especially called upon to comfort and encourage their suffering brethren. With this view the apostle Peter wrote his first epistle to the Christians in Pontus, &c. wherein he represented to them the obligations the disciples of Christ were under to suffer for their religion; and suggested a variety of motives to persuade them to suffer cheerfully.

The enemies of the Christians, to enrage not only the magistrates against them, but all who had any regard to the interests of society, represented them everywhere as atheists and enemies of mankind, because they would not comply with the common idolatry, nor obey the heathen magistrates in things contrary to their religion. They calumniated them also as movers of sedition, and as addicted to every species of wickedness. To wipe off these foul aspersions, Peter, in this epistle, earnestly beseeched the brethren of Pontus, &c. to behave both towards the magistrates and towards their heathen neighbours in a blameless manner, and to be remarkable for every virtue; that by their general good behaviour they might make their enemies ashamed of the calumnies which they uttered against them.—Withal, that they might know how to conduct themselves on every occasion, he gave them a particular account of the most important duties of civil and social life. Wherefore, though this epistle had an especial reference to the circumstances of the Christians in the first age, it is still of great use for enforcing the obligations of morality, and in promoting holiness among the professors of the gospel. Moreover, it contains some deep mysteries, not so plainly discovered in the other inspired writings; such as, 1. That it was the spirit of Christ which spake anciently in the Jewish prophets, chap. i. 11, and particularly in Noah, chap. iii. 19,—2. That the ungodly men of the old world, to whom Noah preached, are neither annihilated nor punished; but are at present spirits in prison, reserved to judgment and punishment. 3. That the water of the flood, which bare up Noah and his family in the ark, and preserved them from perishing, was a type of the water of baptism, and of its efficacy in saving those, who, besides being washed with that water, give the answer of a good conscience, agreeable to the true meaning of baptism. 4. That the devil goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may swallow up; consequently, that evil spirits are now employed in tempting men; and that their purpose in tempting them is to destroy them, chap. v. 8.

As the design of this epistle is excellent, its execution, in the judgment of the best critics, does not fall short of its design. Ostervald says of the first epistle of Peter, “It is one of the finest books of the New Testament;” and of the second, “That it is a most excellent epistle, and is written with great strength and majesty.” Erasmus’s opinion of Peter’s first epistle is, “It is worthy of the Prince of the apostles, and full of apostolical dignity and authority.” He adds, “It is forcible, pithy, serious, diffusa,” sparing in words, but full of sense.”—Lardner observes, that Peter’s two epistles, with his discourses in the Acts, and the multitudes who were converted by these discourses, are monuments of a divine inspiration, and of the fulfilment of Christ’s promise to Peter and Andrew, ‘Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.’

Peter’s epistles, therefore, being of great and general use, and so excellently composed, should, like the other inspired writings, be read and studied by Christians in every age, with the utmost care; not only for comforting them under affliction, but for directing them to a right behaviour in all the different relations of life.

Sec. V.—Of the Place and Time of writing Peter’s First Epistle.

From Peter’s sending the salutation of the church at Babylon to the Christians in Pontus, it is generally believed that he wrote his first epistle in Babylon. But as there was a Babylon in Egypt, and a Babylon in Assyria, and a city to which the name of Babylon is given figuratively, Rev. xvi. xvii. namely Rome, the learned are not agreed which of them is the Babylon meant in the salutation.

Pearson, Mill, and Le Clerc think the apostle speaks of Babylon in Egypt. But if Peter had founded a church in the Egyptian Babylon, it would have been of some note. Yet, if we may believe Lardner, there is no mention made of any church or bishop at the Egyptian Babylon in any of the writers of the first four centuries; consequently, it is not the Babylon in the salutation.—Erasmus, Drusius, Beza, Lightfoot, Basnage, Beausobre, Cave, Wetstein, and Benson think the apostle meant Babylon in Assyria. And, in support of this opinion, Benson observes, that the Assyrian Babylon being the metropolis of the eastern dispersion of the Jews, Peter, as an apostle of the circumcision, would very naturally, when he left Judea, go among the Jews at Babylon; and that it is not probable he would date his letter from a place by its figurative name. But Lardner says the Assyrian Babylon was almost deserted in the apostle’s days; and adds, Can. vol. iii. p. 246. “If the Assyrian Babylon was not now subject to the Romans, but to the Parthians, which I suppose to be allowed by all, it cannot be the place intended by Peter: For the people to whom he writes were subject to the Parthians; and the time of writing this epistle, he must have been within the territories of the same empire, 1 Eph. ii. 13, 14. ‘Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord’s sake; whether it be the king, as supreme, or unto governors sent (from Rome) by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well.’ Again, ver. 17. ‘Honour the king? or rather the emperor. If St. Peter had not now been within the Roman territories, he would have been led to express himself in a different manner when he enforced obedience to the Roman emperor.—St. Peter requires subjection to governors sent by the emperor; undoubtedly meaning from Rome. I suppose that way of speaking might be properly used in any part of the empire. But it might have a special propriety if the writer were then at Rome.” To these particulars I add, that Peter’s letter was only directed to the inhabitants of the Lesser Asia.

Whitby, Grocius, and all the learned of the Remish communion, are of opinion, that by Babylon Peter means figuratively Rome, called Babylon by John likewise, Rev. xvii. xviii. And their opinion is confirmed by the general testimony of antiquity; which, as Lardner observes, is of no small weight.—Eusebius, E. H. lib. ii. c. 18. informs us, that Clemens, in the sixth book of his Histories, PREFACE TO I. PETER.

To comfort the brethren of Pontus, &c. under their sufferings, St. Peter put them in mind of the glories of that inheritance of which they were the heirs, by thanking God for giving them the certain hope of a new life after death, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, ver. 3.—In order that they may be capable of enjoying that incorruptible, undefiled, and everlasting inheritance, which was preserved in heaven for them who, by the power of God, are guarded through faith to salvation, ver. 4, 5.—This, he said, might be matter of great joy to them, though they suffered persecution. Then, to reconcile them to their sufferings, he suggested various powerful persuasions: such as, that their sufferings would soon be over; that they were necessary to try and improve their faith; that the improvement of their faith would be of greater value to themselves and to the world, than the finest gold, and would procure them great honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ. All these arguments the apostle comprised in two short verses, 6, 7.—Then addressing their strongest feelings, he told them, that though they had never seen their Master, they loved him; and that though they did not see him now, yet believing him to be the Son of God, they rejoiced in him with joy unspeakable, ver. 8.—Knowing, that from him they would assuredly receive the reward of their faith, even the eternal salvation of their souls, ver. 9.—And to show the greatness and certainty of this salvation, he observed, that it had been foretold and accurately searched into by the prophets, who testified before the sufferings which Jesus Christ was to undergo for our salvation, and the glories following his sufferings; and that the angels desired to look attentively into these things, ver. 10, 11, 12.—By mentioning the sufferings of Christ, and the glories following, the apostle insinuated, that if his disciples suffered patiently and courageously, after his example, they might expect to be rewarded as he was.

NEW TRANSLATION.

To comfort the brethren of Pontus, &c. under their sufferings, St. Peter put them in mind of the glories of that inheritance of which they were the heirs, by thanking God for giving them the certain hope of a new life after death, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, ver. 3.—In order that they may be capable of enjoying that incorruptible, undefiled, and everlasting inheritance, which was preserved in heaven for them who, by the power of God, are guarded through faith to salvation, ver. 4, 5.—This, he said, might be matter of great joy to them, though they suffered persecution. Then, to reconcile them to their sufferings, he suggested various powerful persuasions: such as, that their sufferings would soon be over; that they were necessary to try and improve their faith; that the improvement of their faith would be of greater value to themselves and to the world, than the finest gold, and would procure them great honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ. All these arguments the apostle comprised in two short verses, 6, 7.—Then addressing their strongest feelings, he told them, that though they had never seen their Master, they loved him; and that though they did not see him now, yet believing him to be the Son of God, they rejoiced in him with joy unspeakable, ver. 8.—Knowing, that from him they would assuredly receive the reward of their faith, even the eternal salvation of their souls, ver. 9.—And to show the greatness and certainty of this salvation, he observed, that it had been foretold and accurately searched into by the prophets, who testified before the sufferings which Jesus Christ was to undergo for our salvation, and the glories following his sufferings; and that the angels desired to look attentively into these things, ver. 10, 11, 12.—By mentioning the sufferings of Christ, and the glories following, the apostle insinuated, that if his disciples suffered patiently and courageously, after his example, they might expect to be rewarded as he was.

COMMENTARY.

The apostle having thus comforted the persecuted brethren to whom he wrote, by recalling to their remembrance the great objects of their faith and hope, he exhorted them to hope strongly for the blessings that were to be brought to them at the revelation of Jesus Christ, ver. 13.—And, as became the children of God, the heirs of these great blessings, to avoid the lusts which they formerly indulged while unconverted, ver. 14.—And to imitate God in his holiness, ver. 15, 16.—And, from the consideration of the future judgment, to live in the fear of God, ver. 17.—Knowing that they were redeemed from their wicked manner of living, not with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as a sin-offering appointed by God himself before the foundation of the world, that their hope of pardon might be firmly founded in the unchangeable purpose of God, ver. 18-31.—Next, the apostle told the Christians of Pontus, that, seeing they had purified their hearts from fleshly lusts by receiving the gospel, and had attained sincere brotherly love, he hoped they would love one another always from a pure heart, as brethren, ver. 21—a relation in which they stood to each other, by being born again as sons to God, through the incorruptible seed of the word: so that the poorest and meanest believer is not only the brother of every other believer, but he is a more noble and estimable person than the greatest prince on earth, who is not like him a son of God, ver. 22.—And in proof of this Peter observes, that the noblest earthly descent, and the highest titles of honour, are short-lived, like the flowers of the field, ver. 26.—But, that the more honourable nobility which is founded on the belief of the word of Christ, whereby men are made partakers of the nature of God, continues through all eternity, ver. 25.
I. PETER.

2 According to the foreknowledge of God the Father, to his people, through sanctification of the Spirit, in order to their giving place to the gospel and to their being brought to the hope of eternal life, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, as a token of their being admitted into the gospel covenant: May grace and peace be multiplied to you. See Rom. i. 7, notes 3, 4.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy hath begotten us again to a living hope, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

4 To an inheritance incorruptible, and unchangeable, and unfading, preserved in the heavens.

5 Who by power of God are guarded, through faith, to the salvation prepared to be given.

The one of these was called Pontus simply, and sometimes the Cappadocian Pontus already described. The other was called Cappadocia in Asia, and the Great Cappadocia and Cappadocia Procon. Cappadocia says the inhabitants of Great Cappadocia were called Lycaonians, and Lycaonia. Lycaon, archon, and the prince reigned immediately preceding him. Cappadocia was divided into ten districts, five of which were in Pontus, and five more remote. To these the Romans added, as an eleventh district, that part of Cilicia which lay to the west of Taurus. Of this district the chief city was Mazaca, afterwards called Cesea, and near it was the village Dacca, where Eupomus is said to have been born. The rest of Cilicia lying beyond the Taurus, was bounded by the mountains on the west and north, but by the south by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the east by the Euphrates, which separated it from Armenia. The province of this ridge of mountains are so arid, that Alexander, with his troops, abandoned his kingdom to the Romans. Thus, like his predecessors, he held court in Pergamum, a city of Mytilus. But when the Romans took possession of his dominions, they made Ephesus the seat of their government, which they administered first by a Praetor, and then by a Proconsul. According to Sienus, the Roman province called Asia comprehended Lydia, Phrygia, Bithynia, Phrygia, Boeotia, Arcadia, Lydia, Lucania, and Pisidia, all of which are on this side of the Taurus. But Bithynia, Pamphylia, Galatia, and Lydia, although on this side of Taurus, were not comprehended in the Roman province; for Lydia was given to the Rhodians, and the rest were governed by their own Tarsiers, after whose extinction their countries were formed into a province distinct from that of Asia.

The countries on the other side of Taurus, namely, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Cilicia, were possessed by the kings of Syria, Alexander's successors.

Bithynia.—This country was anciently called Beroea, from the Beroeans, who inhabited it before they were expelled by the Thracians, Bithynians, and Thracians. On the west it was bounded by the Thracian Bosphorus, and a part of the Propontis; on the south, by the river Rhadimus and Mount Olympus; on the north, by the Bithynian Sea, on the east, its boundaries were fixed differently by different geographers. Pliny extends Bithynia to the river Farther, and other geographers think it extended that part of Phrygia and Thrace which lay on the Black Sea, but the southern part he ascribes to Galatia.

This Bithynia was Neopamphylia, a city famous, not only under the kings of Bithynia, but under the emperors, particularly Diocletian, who had a palace there, the burning of which occasioned the tenth general persecution of the Christians. This ancient city in this country, situated on the Bosphorus, which divides Asia from Europe, was famous for the council which met in it, and condemned the Eucharian heresy.

From the foregoing account of the countries mentioned in the inscription of Peter's first epistle, it appears that it was written to the Christians who were dispersed throughout all the countries of the Lesser Asia. In these countries the apostle Paul had often preached, and had gathered many churches, to whom he afterwards wrote letters which still remain, and of which Peter hath made honourable mention, 2 Epis. iii. 16, 17.

6. Elect.—In the original, the word elected is prefixed to strangers of theDispersion: 'yet, as it stands in concord with: 'according to the foreknowledge of God,' it must in the translation be joined therewith, as in the English version. —The soujourners of the Dispersion, were elected, according to the foreknowledge of God, not because they were elected to eternal life. A letter differs, and it is a different thing; as the Dispersion, could not be, because no one could be certain of his election to eternal life, till it was declared by the act of God. The context seems to shew, that the apostle wrote all, with propriety, said to be elected, according to the foreknowledge of God, because he had foreseen their good actions, and Gentiles indiscriminately were made the visible church and people of God, as泽 of all the other countries of the Dispersion, by their believing the gospel. In this sense the word elected is used in other passages of scripture. See 1 Thess. i. 1, note 2.

Ver. 2.—According to the foreknowledge of God.—God's foreknowledge of all things, relates to his people, was revealed in the covenant with Abraham. This the apostle mentions, to show the Jews that this prophecy cannot be opposed to the subject. Gentiles made no introduction into the church of God: he determined from the beginning to make them people. See Rom. xi. 2. By faith, then, you have been made to have faith; and 1 Pet. i. 20, to whom is the whole Jewish nation the sacrifice of Christ is said to be foreknown since the foundation of the world.

6 (Acts 17. 67.) On account of this, be exceeding glad, though for a little while ye are made sorry by divers trials; 7 that the trying of your faith, much more precious than gold, which perisheth, though proved by fire, may be found to praise, and honour, and glory, at the revelation of Jesus Christ: 8 Whom having not seen ye love; on whom looking ye believe; and believing, ye greatly rejoice in him with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

9 Receiving the reward of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.

10 Concerning which salvation the prophets, being wont to prophesy, did long before the time, that in these last days God should shew his holy Spirit unto his apostles; 11 searching diligently what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ who was in them, did signify, when he testified before the sufferings of Christ, and the glorification of Christ. 12 To whom it was revealed, and not to us, as to these things, not concerning these things, which things have now been reported to you by them who have preached the good news, and at what time the means of proclaiming it were to be accomplished, not among them, but among you; and these things were preached by the apostles as actually come to pass; 13 as the above-mentioned particulars, concerning the salvation to be revealed in the last time, do not agree to the deliverance of the Corinthians from the destruction of Jerusalem, but to any salvation of believers in general from eternal death, by a committal of a Messiah to his people, which is now to come, when this salvation is to be revealed; and that time is called the last time, because it will be the concluding scene of God's dispositions relating to our world.

3. On whom not now looking.—Here [verse 6] renders the sense of verse 5 by virtue of the preposition εἰς, which goes before in this clause.

4. Not believing;—This is an allusion to our Lord's words to Thomas, John x. 25: "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." 5. And full of glory; —In support of this translation, Justin observes, that the particle αὕτη [αὕτως] is put for the adjective. But then it is difficult to imagine that the Spirit of Christ who inspired them did signify, when he foretold the sufferings of Christ, and the glories which were to follow to him and to mankind after these sufferings.

12 In consequence of their searching, 13 to whom it was revealed, not concerning themselves and their contemporaries, but concerning us, they foretold these things; which things have now been reported to you, as come to pass among us, by the apostles and other witnesses.
1PE 4:12 Therefore, being girded with the armor of truth, and honest in all your behaviour, 13. Eye-witnesses have preached the gospel to you with the power of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, Acts ii. 3, 4. Into which things, angels earnestly desire to look attentively. 14. As obedient children, do not fashion yourselves according to the former lusts, in your ignorance; 15. But as he who hath called you is holy, be ye also holy in all your behaviour. 16. (Acts, 132.) For it is written, ye holy, (vut, 254.) because I am holy. 17. And seeing ye call on the Father, who, without respect of persons, judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear; 18. Knowing, that not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, ye were redeemed from your foolish behaviour delivered to you by your fathers; 19. But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot; 20. Forasmuch as before the foundation of the world, but manifested in these last times for you. 21. Who through his blood believe in God, who raised him up their gods to be the patrons and preservers of all kinds of vice, the religious worship which they paid to their gods must have had a pernicious influence in corrupting their morals. Not so the worship which Christians paid to the true God, who, being perfectly free from evil, and the author as well as the possessor of moral excellence, is worthy of the imitation of his intelligent creatures. Besides, obedience is necessary to qualify us for living with God in his eternal kingdom. 2 Cor. vii. 1. 18. Especially as ye know, that not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, ye were redeemed. 20. The sacrifice of Christ was appointed of God, indeed, before the foundation of the world; but was offered in these last times of the Mosaic dispensation for you. 21. Who through his gospel believe in God, who raised him up their gods to be the patrons and preservers of all kinds of vice, the religious worship which they paid to their gods must have had a pernicious influence in corrupting their morals. Not so the worship which Christians paid to the true God, who, being perfectly free from evil, and the author as well as the possessor of moral excellence, is worthy of the imitation of his intelligent creatures. Besides, obedience is necessary to qualify us for living with God in his eternal kingdom. 2 Cor. vii. 1. 18. Especially as ye know, that not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, ye were redeemed. 20. The sacrifice of Christ was appointed of God, indeed, before the foundation of the world; but was offered in these last times of the Mosaic dispensation for you.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Directions in this Chapter.

Ye being of great importance in the first age, that the disciples of Christ, by a holy and virtuous behaviour, should confute the calumnies of their adversaries, who charged them with all manner of crimes, the apostle Peter earnestly exhorted the brethren of Pontus, from the consideration of their character and dignity as the children of God, described in the preceding chapter, to lay aside all malice, guile, hypocrisy, envyings, and calumnies, things utterly inconsistent with brotherly love.

Ver. 1. — And, as new-born babes, by the undiluted milk of the word of God, to nourish the divine nature in themselves to maturity.

Ver. 2. — That they might be fit to be built into the temple of God, as living stones, upon the foundation Christ.

Ver. 3. — Agreeably to what Isaiah foretold, ver. 6. — And to encourage them he observed, that to all who believe, the great honour belongs of being built into the temple of God, as consistent parts thereof; whereas all who refuse to believe in Christ are not only dishonourable but miserable.

Ver. 4. — That they are to be broken in pieces by Christ, the stone against which they stumble.

Ver. 5. — Next, he told both Jews and Gentiles, that by their believing on Christ, being built up in a temple for the worship of God, all the honourable titles formerly appropriated to the Jews, as the visible church of Christ, from the dead, and gave him the glory of sitting at his own right hand, as Saviour and King, that your faith in him, and hope of eternal life, might be founded in the power and veracity of God.

Ver. 6. — Wherefore, having purified your souls by obeying the truth through the influence of the Spirit, this sentiment Peter delivered in the council, Acts xv. 8, 9., so as to have attained an unfeigned love of your Christian brethren, ye will without doubt love one another, not from a carnal passion, but from a pure heart continually.

Ver. 7. — Having all been regenerated as sons to God, not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, namely, through the word of the living God, which, with its offspring, doth not, like the corruptible seed, with its offspring, remaineth not, but in the present life, the incorruptible seed together with the new and noble nature which it conveys to them who are born from it, remaineth only during the present life, the incorruptible seed, together with the new and noble nature which it conveys to them who are born from it, will remain through all eternity.

Ver. 8. — All flesh is as grass; the word ἀλατον μόνος denotes not only grass, but all kinds of herbs; and among the rest those which have stalks and flowers. Nay, it seems to be used for all. Matt. vi. 30. — This is a quotation from Isa. vi. 6., where the preaching of the gospel is foretold, and recommended from the consideration that every thing which is merely human, and among the rest the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory and greatness, their honour, riches, beauty, strength, and eloquence; as also the arts which men have invented, present works; but he that exerciseth all, decay as the flowers of the field. But the incorruptible seed, the gospel, called by the prophet (the word of the Lord) shall be preached while the world standeth; and the divine nature, which is the instrument of conveying to believers, will remain in them to all eternity. — Jesus likewise hath illustrated the brevity and uncertainty of human life, with its glory, by the same figures, chap. i. 11. See also chap. iv. 14. note.
om bestowed on them by the gospel was a spiritual, not a political freedom; and ordered them not to use that freedom as a cloak for wickedness, but to behave as the servants of God, who enjoined them to obey their earthly masters, ver. 16. — Next, because the Jewish zealots affirmed, that no obedience was due from the people of God to the emperor, or any other prince who was not of their religion, and who did not govern them according to the law of Moses, the apostle commanded them to pay to all men the honour which was due to them on account of their rank, or office, or personal merit; to love the brotherhood; to fear God; and to honour the emperor.

Having thus enjoined such of the Christians as were freemen to obey the heathen magistrates in all things consistent with their obedience to Christ, St. Peter proceeded to direct such of them as were slaves to obey their masters in the same manner, with all reverence, whether they were believers or unbelievers, and whether they were gentle in their manners or froward, ver. 18. — assuring them, that it was an acceptable thing to God if a slave, from a principle of religion, suffered bad usage patiently, ver. 19, 20. — And that they were called to patience under unjust sufferings, from the example of Christ, who, though he was a person of such dignity and power, submitted to suffer wrongfully for our sakes, leaving us, when he returned to heaven, an example that we should follow his steps, ver. 21. — Farther, that the example of Christ in suffering injurious treatment patiently might make the deeper impression upon them, he gave them an account of his innocence, sincerity, willingness to forgive injuries, and self-government, ver. 22, 23. — and of the end for which he suffered, namely, that we, being freed from the dominion of sin, might have faith counted to us for righteousness, who have been healed by Christ's stripes, ver. 24. — Lastly, by observing that the sojourners of the dispersion had been as sheep going astray, but were now returned to the shepherd and overseer of their souls, he insinuated the obligation which lay on them to obey and imitate Christ, their shepherd and overseer, in all things, ver. 25.

New Translation.

Chap. II. — 1 Wherefore, laying aside all malice, and all guile and hypocrisies, and evanings, and all evil speakings, 2 As new-born babes (carnally desire the unadulterated milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby. 3 (Eph. 4:22.) Because, indeed, ye have tasted that the Lord is good.

4 To whom coming as to a living (50) stone, rejected indeed (iv.) of men, but chosen (vaxp) by God, and precious,

5 Ye also, as living stones, are built up a

Ver. 2. — 1. As new-born babes (1) — Wolffius observes, that the Jewish doctors were wont to call new-born prostates little children, and new-born before. The apostle Peter gave the Christians of Pontus the latter appellation, perhaps, because many of them were but newly converted.

2. The unadulterated milk of the word (iv.) — Because the offering of our bodies living sacrifices to God is called, Rom. 12. 1. xapvexav tivv xariav, our 'reasonable worship,' some critics, following the Vulgate version, translate atvexav maXXa in this passage, 'the unadulterated rational milk.' But as xvexav is often used in scripture, of the milk of God, before the translatio; in our English Bible is perfectly just. — By adding the epithet xalvexav, unadulterated, the apostle bids us understand that the milk of the word will not nourish the divine nature in those who use it, if it is adulterated with human mixtures.

3. That ye may grow thereby (iv.) — In the former chapter the apostle told the Christians of Pontus, that they were born again of the incorruptible seed of the word. Here he told them, that the word is also the milk by which the new-born grow to maturity. The word, therefore, is both the principle by which the divine life is produced, and the food by which it is nourished.

Ver. 3. Tasted that the Lord is good (iv.) — Vulgate, dulce, sweet. Thus an allusion to Psalms xcv. 8. 'O taste and see that the Lord is good.' The goodness of the Lord, which the new-born taste in the milk of his word, is his goodness in promising to forgive their sins, and to raise them from the dead, and to bestow upon them the incorruptible inheritance, and to give them in the present life every thing necessary to prepare them for enjoying that inheritance.

Ver. 4. — 1. To whom coming as to a living stone (iv.) — Here St. Peter had in his eye Isai. xxii. 16. where the formation of the Christian church, for the spiritual worship of God, is foretold under the image of a temple which God was to build on Messiah as the foundation-stone of the real; 'because I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation.'

This prophecy here is applied to the Church of Christ being a living stone, to show that the temple of which he is the foundation is built of living men, and represents their entrance into the Christian church by their coming to this living stone, to be built thereon as living stones. Ver. 2. to show that this stone, when it is useful, is as precious as living stones, are built up a spiritual temple. — The laying this precious corner-stone is emblematical of the union of Christ with his church; and the word living may be understood literally, so as to distinguish the Christian church, the spiritual temple of Christ, from the temple of the ark, the temple of idols, and from the temple of Jerusalem, which were built of nothing but dead materials.

Ver. 4. — 1. Ye also, as living stones (iv.) — Because the Hebrews used the epithet living to denote excellence, (Ezra iv. 50.) living stones in this and the preceding verses, to denote the mean excellent stones. Nevertheless, as the Christian church is built upon Christ and his apostles, and this stone as his meaning, he adds, ver. 5. 'Ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual temple.' The laying this precious corner-stone is emblematical of the union of Christ with his church; and the word living may be understood literally, so as to distinguish the Christian church, the spiritual temple of Christ, from the temple of the ark, the temple of idols, and from the temple of Jerusalem, which were built of nothing but dead materials.

Commentary.

Chap. II. — 1 Seeing ye are born again through the incorruptible seed of the word, laying aside every guile, and hypocrisy, and kind of guile, not excepting flattery and insincere compliments, and hypocrisies in religion, and envyings of the prosperity of others, and every kind of evil speaking.

2 As new-born children of God carnally desire the unadulterated milk of the gospel doctrine, that ye may grow thereby to the proper stature and strength of the children of God.

3 This desire will be strong in you, because indeed ye have tasted in the unadulterated milk of the word, that the Lord Jesus, in what he hath already done, and in what he is still to do for you, is good to you.

4 To whom coming by faith as to a living foundation-stone, rejected indeed of the Jewish builders, the chief priests and scribes, but chosen by God to be the chief corner foundation-stone of his temple, and therefore a precious stone.
I. PETER.

1. A spiritual temple.—The word ἱερατής, priest, often signifies a temple. See 1 Tim. iii. 16, and note 2 on Eph. ii. 21. Where it is allowed in what sense the Christian church is the temple of God.

2. A holy priesthood.—That is, the Christian church. The Lord Jesus himself is the chief priest; and the church is the people of God under his presidency. See 1 Peter iii. 12, 13, and note. The church is a spiritual temple; and a holy priesthood, appointed by God to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God, through Jesus Christ.

3. Ye are also a holy priesthood, appointed by God to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God, through Jesus Christ, who is the Mediator between God and man. Hebrews used active verbs to express merely the permission of a thing, Ex. iv. 4, we may understand the sense. The Christian church is the spiritual temple of God; the key of David has been given to the new posterity, and the knowledge of the father's hungry has been given to the children. That the disciples were permitted to stumble, and fall, and be broken; but on whomever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

Ver. 9.—Declare the perfections. [Apoc. iii. 15, Literally, the perfections, make all known.]

Ver. 10.—All a holy priesthood, and a rock of offence. [A rock of offence; that is, a stumbling-block. A hindrance to the progress of many, because they are not willing to believe in Christ; and therefore they stumble at his testimony, and are not willing to believe in him.]
called you from darkness into his marvellous light, 10

10 If ye formerly were not a people, but now are a people of God; who had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

11 Beloved, I beseech you, as sojourners and travellers, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul. (Rom. vii. 23, note.)

12 Have your behaviour among the Gentiles comely, (chap. iii. 16,) that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, when they behold some of your good works, they may glorify God in the day of visitation.

13 Be ye subject, therefore, to every human creation of magistrates, for the Lord's sake; whether to the king as supreme,

14 Or to governors, as sent by him, for the punishment indeed of evil-doers, (is) but praise of them who do good.

15 For so is the will of God, that by doing good ye put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.

16 LIFE is a free man; yet do not use your freedom (ελευθερίας ὑμῶν) as a covering of wickedness. But LIFE is bondman of God.

17 Honour all your superiors: Love your Christian brethren: Fear God: Honour the emperor as the minister of God for good to the people, by protecting the virtuous and restraining the vicious.

18 Household servants, be subject to your own lords with all reverence, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward, the wisdom, goodness, justice, and truth of God, who hath called you; in allusion to Is. lxxi. 21. LXX.

2 Called you from darkness into his marvellous light.—Darkness was the peculiar characteristic of the state of the Gentiles: Acts xxvi. 19. 'To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light.' This, with verse 10, shows plainly that the sojourners of the dispersion, to whom Peter wrote this epistle, were many of them Gentiles believers. The light of the gospel is called marvellous light, because of the many wonderful things it discovered. —Deissm. says, 'The cloud of glory was a marvellous light to the Israelites in their passage through the wilderness. Christianity is a more excellent light, to guide us through the wilderness of this world to the heavenly country.'

5. Ver. 10—Who formerly were not a people, but now, &c.—This is a quotation from Hosea ii. 23, where the conversion of the Gentiles is foreshadowed, as the apostle Paul informs us. See Rom. i. 28, note 1, 2.

6. Who had not obtained mercy.—Any great favour bestowed on men by God is called mercy: In particular, mercy, Rom. xi. 31, signifies the great favour of being introduced into the visible church.

11. As sojourners and travellers, abstain.—The settled inhabitants of a country are anxious to acquire riches, to purchase land, and to build houses. But they who stay but a few weeks in a country, or who only travel through it, are not commonly solicitous to secure to themselves accommodations which they are so soon to leave. In the same manner, believers being only sojourners on earth, and travellers to a better country, ought not to place their happiness in the enjoyment of those objects by which the lusts of the flesh are gratified, and which are peculiar to this earthly state, but in securing themselves possessions in the heavenly country, the proper habitation of the righteous.

12. Of your good works.—namely, your obedience to the just laws of the state, your submission to magistrates, and your patience and meekness when unjustly punished.

3. May glorify God in the day of visitation.—that is, in the time of persecution. For a time of great affliction and suffering is called 'a day of visitation,' Isa. x. 2. And when God afflicts, he is said to visit, Jer. vi. 15. It is well known, that the patience, fortitude, and meekness with which the first Christians bare persecution for their religion, and the forgiving disposition which they expressed towards their persecutors, made such an impression on the heathens who were witnesses to their sufferings, that many of them glorified God by embracing the gospel.

13. Every human creation of magistrates.—So I supply and translate ἡ ἀνθρωπίνη θέλησις, because both Greeks and Romans called the appointment of magistrates a creation of them. In this passage the abstract word 'creation' is put for the concrete, the person created; just as governments and powers are put for the persons exercising government and power. The phrase 'human creation of magistrates' was formed by St. Peter with a view to condemn the principles of the sects, who maintained that obedience was due to no magistrates but to those who were appointed by God, as the Jewish kings had been.

14. Whether to the king—that is, to the emperor. For though at Rome the name of king was obscure, the people of the provinces gave that name to the emperor. John xix. 15. Acts xix. 17.—At the time this epistle was written, Nero was the emperor, and it was his nature to exalt himself, "to be called the son of God." See Pref. sect. 6. para. 2. From the precepts given in this and the preceding verse we learn, that it is the duty of Christians residing in foreign, and even in idolatrous, countries, to obey the laws of these countries in all things not sinful, without considering whether the religion of the magistrate and of the state be true or false.

15. Put to silence.—This properly signifies to muzzle a beast to hinder it from roaring, or from barking, I Tim. v. 10.

16. Live as freemen.—The Jews lived in their having been at all times freemen; that is, in having been always governed by their own laws. John viii. 33. In this sense, the precept live as freemen means, live according to the rules of your religion, free from complying with the established idolatry.

17. A covering of wickedness.—Though πεπονθέντες often signifies maliciousness, it also signifies wickedness in general. In this passage it means disobedience to magistrates, as is plain from the subsequent verse.

17. Honour all your superiors.—As the adjective ἀνθρωπικός hath no substantive expressed, the word to be supplied is not ἐν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, men, but ἐκ τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, all having dignity or power.

18. The honour which you owe to magistrates and other superiors, consists not only in paying them outward respect according to the custom of the country, but in giving due obedience to their commands, in so far as it can be done consistently with our duty to God, whom we are bound, in the first place, to honour and fear.—This verse is a beautiful instance of the fervent literal style, in which a great deal is expressed in the fewest words possible.

18. Household servants, be subject to your own lords.—See Col. iii. 22, note. The slaves who were employed in the house, were more exposed to suffer from the vices and bad temper of their masters than those in the field. Whereas, to humble them to their lot, the apostle called them domestics rather than slaves. In imitation of the Romans, who, as Macedonians, were not slaves away all envy from the masters, and all reproach from the slaves, called the former Πατέρων οἰκονομοί, the latter Παροικοί. See Par. 11. 3. 8.
19 For this is an acceptable thing, (see ver. 20, note 3.), if any one, from conscience of God’s command, sustains sorrows, suffering unjustly.

20 But what praise is due, if, when ye commit faults and are buffeted, ye bear it patiently? Yea, if when ye do well, and suffer, ye bear it patiently, this is an acceptable thing with God.

21 (1 Pet. 2:15). Besides, to this ye were called: (ver. 256.) for even Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow in his footsteps:

22 Who did no sin, neither was guile found (see Philip. ii. note 1.) in his mouth; being reviled, he did not return revile in return; when he was reviled, he did not threaten, but committed (Syrac. causam suam) his cause to him who judgeth righteously.

23 He himself bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being freed from sins, should live to righteousness. (Tatian. model.) By whose own stripes we are healed.

24 For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned to the shepherd and overseer of your souls.

25. But also to the forward. — In this verse the apostle establishes one of the noblest and most important principles of morality, namely, that our obligation to public duties does not depend either on the character of the person whom they should be performed, or on their performing the duties they owe to us, but on the unalterable relations of those, established by God.

VER. 19. Suffering unjustly. — The apostle had before in view those punishments which, according to the customs of that age, tyrannical masters were allowed to inflict on their slaves, however justly they may be called. But what praise is due, if, when ye commit faults and are buffeted, ye bear it patiently? Yea, if when ye do well, and suffer, ye bear it patiently, this is an acceptable thing with God.

VER. 21. — Besides, to this ye were called: for even Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow in his footsteps:

VER. 22. Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. — The word ἄθλος signifies reward; here it is for that praise which follows great and noble deeds, and which is the spring of renown.

VER. 23. Do well. — Among other instances of well-doing, the apostle places this, that the Christian slaves refrain from joining in the licentious reveling of their masters.

VER. 24. For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned to the shepherd and overseer of your souls. — This is an acceptable thing. — I have here followed Beza, who supposes that Church is put for Church by a common Hebraism. Others translate the word here and in ver. 19. by beauty, so as to imply that God, the Supreme Judge of beauty in characters, is delighted with the spectacle of a slave suffering punishment for acting conscientiously.

VER. 25. — But also to the forward. — This is an allusion to Isaiah’s account of Messiah, chap. iii. 9. “Because he had done no violence, neither was any decree in his mouth.” Our Lord’s absolute freedom from sin is asserted by the other inspired writers also. (2 Cor. v. 21. Heb. vi. 20. 1 John iii. 5.) It was asserted likewise by himself once and again. John viii. 46. xiv. 33, and it is fully verified by the history of his life. — The apostle mentions guilt, because slaves are at their fates to tell lies to screen themselves from punishment.

VER. 26. Who, when he was reviled, did not revile in return: when he suffered, he threatened not. — Christ was exceedingly reviled, and evil treated by the Jews. They said he was possessed with a devil. They called him a Samaritan, a glutton, a wine-huber, a blasphemer, a demoniac, one in league with Beelzebuth, a perverter of the nation, and a deceiver of the people. In the high-priest’s palace, his judges spit in his face. The servants, covering his face, anointed him with the palm of his hand, and in derision of his pretensions to inspiration, bade him prophecy who it was that smote him. In the common hall, the soldiers crowned him with thorns, put a reed into his hand, and mock him therewith, and bowed the knee, saying, Hail, King of the Jews. While hanging on the cross, the chief priests, with the scribes and elders, mocking him, said, ‘He saved others, himself he cannot save.’

But, though he could both have saved himself, and destroyed them, he did not threaten to punish them: on the contrary, he prayed for the cross for forgiveness to his murderers. He said once indeed to the Jews, ‘Ye are of your father the devil, and the works of your father ye do.’ This, however, was no reviling speech, but a true description of their character, and a prediction of their murdering him. These reproves he forebore in his last sufferings, lest they might be thought to have proceeded from resentment.

VER. 21. — Besides, to this ye were called: for even Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow in his footsteps:

VER. 22. Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; when he was reviled, he did not threaten: but committed (Syrac. causam suam) his cause to him who judgeth righteously.

VER. 23. He himself bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being freed from sins, should live to righteousness. (Tatian. model.) By whose own stripes we are healed.

VER. 24. For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned to the shepherd and overseer of your souls.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Directions delivered in this Chapter.

That the brethren might know how to behave in the various relations of life, the apostle in this chapter first of all commanded the Christian women in Pontus, who were married, to obey their own husbands, although they were heathens; that by their cheerful submissive behaviour they might allure their husbands to embrace the gospel, ver. 1.—when they found it had such an happy influence on the temper and behaviour of their wives, ver. 2.—With respect to their dress, the apostle ordered all the women who professed the gospel to adorn their minds with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, rather than their bodies with ornaments of gold and silver, and costly apparel, ver. 3.—proposing to them the example of the godly women in ancient times, who adorned their minds with the female virtues, being subject to their own husbands, ver. 5.—Such as Sarah, who obeyed Abraham, and showed how greatly she respected him by calling him her lord, ver. 6.

Then turning his discourse to husbands, the apostle ordered them to live with their wives, in the performance of all the duties of the married state, suitably to the more enlarged views which the gospel gave them of these duties; and, in the treatment of their wives, to have a regard to the weakness of their bodily frame, ver. 7.—Next, addressing the disciples in general, he ordered them, in their intercourse with one another, to be sympathizing, tender-hearted, and courteous, ver. 8.—never returning evil for evil, nor railing for railing, but, on the contrary, blessing; that they might obtain the blessing of inheriting the heavenly country, according to Christ’s promises, ver. 9.—and David’s declaration concerning those who desire to enjoy life and see good days, ver. 10, 11.—He told them farther, that the divine protection is promised to the righteous; but that the anger of God is threatened against the wicked, ver. 12.—Besides, to forgive our enemies is the way to disarm them, and restrain them from hurting us, ver. 13.—Then returning to the subject of suffering, he told them, that if they suffered for righteousness’ sake, they were happy, as Christ declared Matt. v. 10—13.—And exhorted them not to be terrified by the threatenings of their persecutors, ver. 14.—but to be always prepared to give with calmness an answer to every one who asked a reason concerning their hope of an eternally happy life in the body after death. This hope the Christians were to profess, more especially when their enemies were putting them to death; because the heathens, who heard them on these occasions declare their hope, perceiving that it was what supported them under their sufferings, and made them fearless in death, could not avoid being curious to know what the foundation of that hope was whose influence was so powerful, ver. 15.—also, because the declaration of their hope at such a time, might induce some of the heathens to embrace the gospel, who, with admiration, beheld their courage in suffering death.

Because the disciples of Christ, on account of their aversion to idolatry, and of their deserting the temples of the heathen deities, were represented as atheists, seditionists, persons, and the most profligate of mankind, the apostle exhorted the brethren of Pontus, while they resisted idolatry, and refused obedience to the sinful commands of the heathen magistrates, to maintain a good conscience in every part of their behaviour; that their persecutors, who spoke loudly against them as evil-doers, might be put to shame, ver. 16.—Besides, if they were to suffer, it was better for them to suffer as good-doers than as evil-doers, ver. 17.—And lest their enemies might conclude from their sufferings that they were wicked persons, or at least persons with whom God was displeased, the apostle observed, that Christ, though a most righteous person, and greatly beloved of God, had been put to death as an evil-doer; but was demonstrated to be innocent of the crime laid to his charge, by his resurrection from the dead. This example showed the brethren that sufferings are no mark of God’s displeasure; and that, if they suffered with Christ, their innocence should be made manifest at least in the end, when, being raised from the dead as Christ was, they should be brought to God to enjoy eternal life with him in heaven, ver. 18.—Further, to prove what he had affirmed, ver. 12, that God protects the righteous, and will severely punish the wicked, the apostle, as an example of both, observed, that Christ, 2 Pet. iii. 6, by God’s command, brought a flood on the old world and destroyed the ungodly, to whom, without success, he had preached by his Spirit, speaking in his prophet Noah; but saved Noah and his family by that very water with which he destroyed the ungodly, ver. 19, 20.—That the purpose for which St. Peter appealed to these ancient facts was what I have mentioned, is evident, not only from what is said ver. 20, but from 2 Pet. ii. 5, where, after mentioning God’s saving Noah while he brought the flood on the world of the ungodly, he adds, ver. 9, ‘The Lord knoweth to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished.’—Further, that the brethren might be in no doubt concerning the apostle’s design in mentioning the salvation of Noah and his family, he assured them, that the salvation of those eight persons by the water of the deluge, is a type of the salvation of believers from death by the water of baptism, through the resurrection of Christ: Which baptism, he told them, consists not in the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but in the answer of a good conscience, ver. 21.—Then, to make the righteous, on whom the eyes of the Lord continually look, certain of deliverance out of temptation in the present world, and of eternal salvation in the world to come, and at the same time to fill the wicked, against whom the face of God is set, with a just dread of the future judgment, the apostle declared, that Christ our Master, since his resurrection, hath gone into heaven, and is now at the right hand of God as Governor and Judge universal; every creature in the universe, whether good or bad, being put in subjection to him, ver. 22.
I. PETER.

3 Then when they behold the chast behaviour joined with reverence.

7 In like manner, husbands, cohabit with your wives, according to knowledge, giving honour to the wife as the weaker vessel, and as joint heirs of the grace of life, in order that your prayers be not hindered. (Eph. 5:22, 25.)

8 (To 4:12, supp. here.) Finally, be all of one mind, sympathizing one with another, sympathy being love which binds, not hatred, but concord, or unity, or peace.

2 Ver. 2. Joined with reverence.—Eph. 5:33. This is similar to Paul's precept, Eph. 5:21. 'And the wife see that she (προσκυνησε η θεον) reverence her husband.'

3 Ver. 3. Let not the outward adorning only.—The word only is supplied here, agreeably to the known pharnomena of scripture, and to the nature of the passage, except. For, we cannot suppose that the apostle forbids Christian women to adorn themselves with apparel suitable for public station, any more than our Lord forbids his disciples to labour for the meat that perisheth, John vi. 27. His meaning in that precept certainly was, that the disciples were not to labour for the meat which perisheth only, but also for the meat enduring to everlasting life. I therefore mean the province of the precept now in question is, to show that women are not to adorn their bodies only, but chiefly their minds; because a mind adorned with the different graces proper to the female character is such, by attracting esteem, secure a lasting love; whereas the adorning of the body catcheth the fancy of the vain and foolish only, and causeth no real affection, at least in the breasts of the wise, and is Thum. ix. 10. notes, where the same directions are given concerning the dress of women, with this addition, that instead of adorning themselves with jewels and costly attire, they ought to adorn themselves with good works, by which the apostle intimates, that works of charity performed to the distressed with the necessary money for purchasing ornaments of gold, and costly attire, will render woman more beautiful in the eye both of God and man, than if they were decked with all the vain ornaments in which the lightest part of the sex delights.

4 Ver. 4. The hidden man of the heart.—In scripture the heart is represented as the seat, not only of passion and affection, but of intelligence, reason, and will; Luke xiv. 23. 'O fools and slow of heart to believe all the prophets have spoken.' The heart, therefore, is what St. Paul calls 'ἐννοιαν,' the inward man, Rom. vi. 16. In like manner St. Peter calls the female mind the (hidden or invisible) man of the heart, as opposed to the outward man or body.

5 Insensible ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.—Meekness consists in the bearing of provocation patiently; but quietness, in abstaining from giving provocation, especially by bitter language. This meek and quiet spirit is called an insensible ornament, because it does not, like ornaments of gold and silver, grow out of fashion by age, nor ugly by wearing, but preserves its beauty always; in this respect, it is much more reliable than the other. In illustration of the sentiment contained in this verse, 'Psalms' will write as follows: 'Even must all the short-lived beauties, the shapes, features, and most elegant and rich ornaments of the mortal body, which attract the eyes and admiration of vain mortals, fade away and lose their charm, when compared with the heavenly graces of a pure and temperate, the insensible ornament and beauty of the soul, which are ever amiable, and of high value in the eye of God the sovereign Judge of what is good and beautiful.' (Sacred Chans. vol. i. p. 164.)

6 Ver. 5. Calling him Lord.—Gen. xviii. 12. The argument in this verse is founded on the manner of the ancients, who, by giving titles of respect to their superiors, acknowledged their own inferiority. Wherefore, by mentioning the reverence with which Sarah spake of Abraham, the apostle intimates, that she entertained the highest respect for him, and a just sense of her own subjectness to him.—By the Israelitish women, Sarah was considered as an illustrious pattern of a dutiful wife.

8Ver. 6. Whose daughters ye have become.—Sarah being constituted by God the mother of all believers, Gal. iv. 26, even as Abraham was made their father, the believing women were constituted as Sarah, by the grace of God, to the glory of God, a new Sarah, to whose zeal for the salvation of souls, and in the service of the poor, and the afflicted, the Church of God is committed. For she, by her faith, her chast behaviour, and the box of her virtues, became her children, though not descended from her. This the Gentile women would consider it an inestimable blessing, especially as they had been taught by the Jews to keep on themselves as uncouth on account of their being Gentiles by birth.

3 And are not afraid of their fear.—It is worthy of notice, that the apostle enjoined wives to be in subjection to their husbands, by giving them against the fear of sin, especially that of idolatry, either from a desire to please their husbands, or from any dread of offending them.

7 Ver. 7. Giving your honour to the wife.—In scripture, honour is used to signify maintenance, because to supply any one with the necessaries and conveniences of life, was considered in ancient times as doing him honour. Accordingly the Greeks, in reward of eminent services done to the community, decreed maintenance at the public expense to those who had performed them services.

5 As the weaker vessels.—The Greek word ευρασιας being used to denote the human body, 1 Thes. iv. 6, it may here be translated body or person. By assigning as the reason why honour should be given to the wife, that she is weaker than the husband in body, the apostle hath intimsted, not only that he ought to afford her a competent share of the necessaries and conveniences of life, but such relief from bodily labour as his circumstances will allow; all which is most reasonable, considering the many bodily labours that women are subject to in the breeding, bearing, and nursing of children.—Adam showed his indulgence to Eve, by allowing her to give names to their children.

6 Joint heirs of the grace of life.—The word here translated grace, is rendered a gift, 1 Cor. xiv. 5. In the translation of the Greek, according to which St. Peter's meaning is, that, by God's original grace, the woman being a joint heir with man of the gift of life, is equally entitled with man to all the innocent enjoyments of life, Gen. i. 28, 29. This interpretation is confirmed by the clause, 'for then shall the fear of man be not hindered.' For faith is given to the wife, family quarrels will cease, and family prayers will not be neglected.
Not returning evil for evil, or railing for railing, but, on the contrary, ye bless; knowing that ye are called, that ye might inherit the blessing.

10 For he that is merciful to enjoy life, and to see good days, let him restrain his tongue from evil, and his lips from speaking deceit.

(Pr. xxiv. 12.)

11 Let him turn away from evil, and do good. Let him seek peace, and pursue it. (Rom. xii. 18.)

12 For the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open upon their supplication; but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil.

(1 Sam. xii. 24.)

13 Besides, who is he that will do evil to you, if ye be imitators of the good One?

14 Nevertheless, although ye even suffer for righteousness’ sake, blessed are ye. (2 Esd. 106.) Therefore, do not fear their fear; neither be troubled;

15 But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be always prepared for giving an answer, with meekness and reverence, to every man that asketh of you a reason (why) for the hope which is in you. (See the illustration of this verse given in the View.)

16 (Eusebius) Hold fast a good conscience, that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may be put to shame who arraign you; your good behaviour in Christ:

17 For it is better, as well-doers, to suffer, word given in the commentary seems to be its true meaning, because uniformity in religious opinions being scarce possible, and not at all necessary, cannot be the subject of a divine precept. See Rom. xii. 16. xx. 2, 1 Cor. i. 10. Phillip. i. 2.

18 Tender-hearted, literally of good heart. See Es. vi. 24. The meaning is, Move with compassion on beholding the weaknesses and disadvantages of others, and do what ye can to assist them.

19 To this ye were called,—namely, to bless them who curse you. The heathen made you understand that the blessing is a mark of their hatred and ill will; but the Christian finds in it the true kindness of the heart; you were called to bless them, and to contribute to your own salvation.

20 For it is better to suffer for righteousness’ sake, than for unrighteousness. (2 Esd. 106.) Therefore, do not fear their fear; neither be troubled; but sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be always prepared for giving an answer, with meekness and reverence, to every man that asketh of you a reason (why) for the hope which is in you; that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may be put to shame who arraign you; your good behaviour in Christ:

21 For it is better, as well-doers, to suffer, word given in the commentary seems to be its true meaning, because uniformity in religious opinions being scarce possible, and not at all necessary, cannot be the subject of a divine precept. See Rom. xii. 16. xx. 2, 1 Cor. i. 10. Phillip. i. 2.
I. PETER

if the will of God (sune) appoints us, than as evildoers to suffer.

18 For even Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but made alive by the Spirit.

19 By which also (συναντά την εὐδοκίαν, 57.) he was preached to the spirits in prison;

20 Who formerly were disobedient, when the patience of God waited in the once for all to the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing, in which few, that is, eight souls, were effectually saved by water.

21 To which water afterwards, the antitype baptism (I do not determine, like the fallen angels, (James v. 5.), “unmake the judgment of the great day.” In the Syrian version the clause is thus translated, “Animadverunt filios Israele: futuros in sepulchro.”—by the spirit in prison,” 1. 3. Harrington understands Noah who was to be kept alive in the ark. But it doth not appear that they were disobedient.

22 For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord.

23 Ver. 17. If the will of God appoints us.—The apostle adds this to show that the wicked can do no evil to believers but by the permission of God.

Ver. 18.—1. For even Christ hath once suffered for sins.—In the sufferings of Christ we have a clear proof that sufferings are no evidence of the wickedness of the sufferer, nor ought blame to be laid at the cause for which he suffers. Moreover, in the resurrection of Christ we have a clear proof that the sufferings of good men are not inconsistent with the perfections of God. For he will save them who are kept alive; his effectual resurrection from the dead, accomplished after the example of Christ’s resurrection. Wherefore, the sufferer of God, through Christ’s resurrection, affords to all who have lost the use of their life, a pure ground of consolation and hope that God will raise them up in the last day.

23 But made alive by the Spirit.—As Christ was conceived in the womb of his mother by the Holy Spirit, (Luke i. 35.) so he was raised from the dead by the same Spirit; on which account he is said, (Tum. iii. 16.) to have been justified by the Spirit; and (Heb. xi. 14.) to have offered himself without fault to God “through the Eternal Spirit.”—It is the true resurrection of Christ is ascribed to the Father, (1 Cor. vi. 14.) to the Son, (2 Pet. i. 20.) and to the Holy Spirit. Not that there is any consistency with Peter’s affirmation in this verse: for the Father may, with the strictest propriety, be said to have done what the Spirit did by his appointment; especially as it was done to show that God acknowledged Jesus to be his Son. What our Lord said concerning his own resurrection, John ii. 19. “Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up,” is to be understood in the same sense. For having told the Jews, John x. 16, “I have power to lay down my life, and have power to take it again;” he added, “this commandment I received of my Father.”—Christ’s resurrection being an example as well as a proof of our resurrection, was raised by the agency of the Spirit, perhaps to show, that we shall be raised by the same power exercised agreeably to the will of God and of Christ: on which account the resurrection of the dead is ascribed sometimes to the Father, Acts xxii. 31. Cor. xi. 14. Heb. x. 39. but more frequently to the Son, John v. 25, 36, 40. 1 Cor. xv. 26, 42, 54. 2 Thess. iv. 16.

Ver. 19.—1. By which also he was preached to the spirits in prison.—On this passaige, hath produced examples from the scriptures, and from Hymenaeus, to shew that the phrase, “he was preached, is a phraseon for ‘he preached.’” See 1. Cor. iv. 7. Among the examples from scripture, the clearest and most direct is Eze. ii. 16. “Having abjured, &c. 17. (κα τις τε παραδειγματισθηςων άνθρωπων, e) and came and preached peace to the people who were afar off, and to them who were nigh.” For it is certain that our Lord, after his resurrection, did not go personally to the Gentiles to preach to them: he preached to them by his apostles only. But if Christ is said by Paul to go and do, and what he did by his apostles, he may with equal propriety be said by Peter, to go and do, what he did by his prophet Noah. See 1. Cor. xi. 12. 8.

3. To the spirits in prison.—Some commentators, supposing that it is here meant the apostles of the antitype, that were on earth in the flesh when Christ preached to them by his Spirit speaking in Noah; but they are now spirits in prison, be his passion in Noah; but they are now spirits in prison,

24 For even Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but made alive by the Spirit.

25 Who formerly were disobedient, when the patience of God waited in the once for all to the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing, in which few, that is, eight souls, were effectually saved by water.

21 To which water afterwards, the antitype baptism (I do not determine, like the fallen angels, (James v. 5.), “unmake the judgment of the great day.” In the Syrian version the clause is thus translated, “Animadverunt filios Israele: futuros in sepulchro.”—by the spirit in prison,” 1. 3. Harrington understands Noah who was to be kept alive in the ark. But it doth not appear that they were disobedient.

22 For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

Two apostles have told the brethren of Pontus, that it was better to suffer death as well-doers than as evil-doers; also, having insinuated, that the dignity and power with which Christ is invested to enable him to save his people was the reward of his sufferings—he begins this chapter with the same resolution to suffer death for the gospel, which Christ manifested when he suffered death for calling himself the Son of God; and gave this reason for their doing so, that the person who is firmly resolved to suffer death rather than renounce his religion, hath freed himself from the dominion of sin, ver. 1.—so that he does not live the rest of his life according to the inclinations of his persecutors, but according to the life of God, ver. 2.—But, the time past of their life, he told them, was sufficient to have complied with the will of the Gentiles, by walking in lasciviousness, &c., ver. 3.—And although their heathen acquaintance might be surprised at what they did not still accompany them in these vicious courses, and might revile them on that account, they were not to be moved thereby, ver. 4.—These wicked men shall be called to an account for their crimes, and be punished, ver. 5. They were likewise to consider, that the gospel had been preached to the dead Gentiles for the very purpose of assuring them, that, although for their faith they might be condemned to death in their fleshly body by men, they shall at the last day be raised and rewarded in their spiritual body, ver. 6.—Further, he gave them that, the end of all things, the end of the Mosaic dispensation and of the Jewish state, was at hand; so that the power of the unbelieving Jews, their greatest persecutors, would soon be broken. And from that consideration, he exhorted them to continual sobriety and watchfulness, ver. 7.—and to comfort one another under their sufferings by mutual love, which would lead them to overlook each other's faults, ver. 8.—and to be hospitable, for he is ready to exercise their spiritual gifts for each other's benefit, ver. 9, 11.—Next, he told them they were not to think it strange, that God had permitted so hot a persecution to fall on them: It was for the trial of their faith, and the improvement of their virtues, ver. 12.—that their reward might be the greater at the revelation of Jesus Christ, ver. 13.—Besides, if they were reviled for the name of Christ, they were happy for this reason, that the spirit of Christ resting on them, and strengthening them to suffer, would be a spirit of glory to them in the eyes of their persecutors, ver. 14.

About the time the apostle wrote this letter, the unbelieving Jews, especially the zealots, were raising great disturbances, both in Judea and in the provinces; and, in these confusions, they murdered their brethren who were of a different faction, and plundered their goods. These fanaticism, fancying that no obedience was due from the people of God to idolatrous princes, paid no regard to the heathen laws and magistrates, but were guilty of the grossest outrages in the countries where they lived, by which they often brought on themselves punishment. Wherefore, to prevent the Jewish Christians from joining their unbelieving brethren in these outrages, the apostle exhorted them not to bring punishment on themselves as murderers or thieves, &c. because to suffer for such things was extremely disgraceful, ver. 15. But if any of them suffered as a Christian, he was not to be ashamed, but rather to glory in it, ver. 16. In the mean time, lest the Jewish believers might have entertained harsh thoughts of God on account of their sufferings, the apostle told them, the time was come in which the Jews, the ancient household of God, were to be punished as a nation, for all the crimes committed by them from the beginning; that the Jewish Christians were to be involved in the general punishment; and that it was proper to begin at them, as a part of that devoted nation, notwithstanding they were now become the house of God; because the justice of God would be the more illustriously displayed thereby. However, to terrify their persecutors, he observed, that if the punishment of the nation was to begin at the Jews who were become the house of God by believing in Jesus, the punishment of those Jews who obeyed not the gospel of God would be most terrible, ver. 17. And that if the righteous, the Jewish believers, would be saved with difficulty from perishing in the impending destruction, the ungodly and sinners of the nation could not hope to escape, ver. 18. Lastly, he told the brethren, that in this general calamity some of them who were in Judea, when God's judgments fell upon the nation, might suffer death by the will of God, they ought on that occasion to commit their lives in well-doing to him, as to a faithful Creator, ver. 19.

CHAP. IV.—1. Christ then having suffered for us in the flesh, do ye also arm yourselves with the same resolution of suffering death for him who was called; because he who hath resolved to suffer death in the flesh for Christ, having overcome the strongest temptation, hath thereby freed himself from the solicitations of sin: (2) So that he no longer liveth his remaining time in the flesh agreeably to the corrupt inclinations of his persecutors, but agreeably to the will of God, who hath commanded him to shun idolatry, and all the vices practiced by idolaters. (3) For reason teaches us, that the time which hath passed of our life is too much to have fully performed the corrupt inclinations of the Gentiles, having long walked in all kinds of lasciviousness, base passions, excessive drinkings of wine, revellings, (wine-drinkings,) and abominable idolatries, and all the shameful vices connected therewith. (4) On account of your former life they wonder that ye shun your company, and do not run with them into the same slough of dissoluteness, reviving you on that account as unsoiled, and making you objects of all eyes. But be not troubled at their speeches: They shall give an account to them of him, who, by the commission and power which he received from God, is prepared to judge the living and the dead. COMMENTS.

CHAP. IV.—1. Having suffered for us in the flesh, (1) namely, death; which both the present and continuous evildoer, which rendered his death to the flesh latter. (2) Arm yourselves with the same mind, (3) Christ having suffered in the flesh, and becoming an example of the same, arm yourselves against our persecutors with the same mind; to arm ourselves with the same resolution to suffer all the evil to which we are exposed in the body, and particularly to suffer death, when called by God to do so for our religion. (4) For he who hath suffered in the flesh, (5) The apostle having exhorted the brethren of Pontus to arm themselves with the resolution of suffering death in the flesh, he considered that resolution as an actual suffering of death; just as God considered Abraham's resolution to offer Isaac as the actual offering of him, Gen. xxi. 18. That this is the apostle's meaning is evident from ver. 2, where the person who hath suffered death in the flesh is represented as still living in the flesh. (6) Hath rested from sin, (7) So the phrase πεπαραγεμένος λοιμος literally signifies, the preposition συν being understood. He hath been made to rest from temptation to sin, consequently from sin itself. For if a man hath overcome the fear of torture and death, no weaker temptation will prevail on him to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. This happy efficacy of arming themselves with the resolution of suffering for Christ, the apostle explained to the brethren of Pontus to excite them to adhere to that resolution. (8) For the time that hath passed of life is a sufficient time, (1) The word προηγομένος, translated sufficient, being in the masculine gender, the word with which it agrees is προηγομένος, time, which, though not expressed, must in the translation be supplied from the preceding clause, as I have done. The phrase is a sufficient time, is a soft expression which conveys the strongest meaning; namely, that it is too much for the particulars of their lives to have wrought out the will of the Gentiles; and that whatever time they spent in so doing, was too much. See an example of this figure, Ezek. xlvii. 8. 2. Having walked in lasciviousness, (1) This is an example of the accusations absolute. See Rom. iv. 27. Lasciviousness, as distinguished from lust, denotes outward actions of a base kind—fornication, adultery, incest, sodomy; whereas lust consists in improper desires usually cherished. (2) Banquetings, (3) ἐσπαρτών, banquetings, according to Eustathius, were those meeting in which the heathens awoke with each other who should continue longest to drink; consequently the original word might be translated drinking matches. But as excesses in wine are mentioned in the preceding clause, our translators supposed that ἐσπαρτών was put for ὕπαρτημα, a word which ancients signified feasting; which, when they consumed too much time, or occasion intemperance, are certainly blamable. (4) Ver. 6.—1. They wonder. (5) The Greeks used the word ἐπιδεικνύσεως, to express this admiration and wonder with which a stranger is struck, who beholds any thing uncommon or new. (6) Run with them. (7) Here the apostle alludes to the practice of the votaries of Bacchus, who ran about the streets and fields like mad people, committing every sort of excess. (8) The same slough of dissoluteness. (1) The word ἕμερας, signifies a collection of water, a mire pool. This other word, ἐπικritis, signifies a disgraceful course of life. Luke xv. 12. The metaphorical expression, 'slough of dissoluteness,' strongly marks the deplorable state and misery of living in the vices mentioned ver. 3.; vices which the heathens practised in the temples of their gods as worship. (9) Ver. 6.-To judge the living and the dead. (1) From the following verse it appears, that by the dead the apostle meant the Gentiles, said, in other passages, to be dead through ignorance and sin; consequently, by 'the living we are to understand those who, by their profession of the gospel, are reputed to be alive.' Rev. iii. 1. 'Thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead.' See also 1 Tim. v. 6. The living and the dead, therefore, are the same men, so that they might to have wrought the will of the Gentiles; and that whatever time they spent in so doing, was too much. See an example of this figure, Ezek. xlvii. 8. 10. Ver. 6.-1. That although they might be condemned indeed by men in the flesh—According to the common translation of this might live ETERNALLY by God in the spirit.⁴

7. (Acts 103.) Now the end of all things hath approached. Be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayers. (See ch. v. 18. note.)

8. And, above all things, have fervent love to one another; for love will cover a multitude of sins. (See James v. 20. note 2.)

9. Be hospitable (see 1 Tim. iii. 2. note 5.) to one another without murmuring.

10. Let every one, according as he hath received (grace) a spiritual gift, minister it (be as). to one another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

11. If any one speak, let him speak as the oracles of God require. If any one minister, let him do it as he is called. (1 Cor. xiv. 1.)

12. Be beloved, and the fire of persecution now raging among you, which is appointed to your trial of your faith, as if something happened to you which never happened to the men of God before.

13. (Acts 303.) But seeing ye partake of the sufferings of Christ, rejoice also at the revelation of his glory. (Chap. i. 7. note 2.) ye may rejoice, leaping for joy.

14. If ye be reproached (s) for the name of Christ, ye are happy, because the Spirit of glory and of God rests upon you. (Keramos. 229.) By them indeed he is evil spoken of, but (verse 15) ye be praised.

15. Therefore, let none of you pass over the passage, the apostle is represented as saying that the gospel was preached to the dead Gentiles, in order that they might be confirmed by men in the flesh. But as this cannot be the apostle's meaning, suppose there is here an elision of the word 'although' as is plain from the adversative particle 'eis,' which follows. See 1 Cor. iv. 169. I have therefore ventured to supply it in the translation.

16. Yet they might live eternally by God in the spirit. — As St. Paul, supra, has here prevented the righteousness of, so he does not. (1 Cor. iv. 1.) It is not an animal body, it is raised a spiritual body, we may be by the flesh here understand the animal body in which we are now, and by the spirit, the spiritual body which the righteous are to receive at the resurrection. This interpretation makes one of the darkest passages of the New Testament most intelligible. However, although given were taken literally in this clause, yet as flesh in the former clause does not signify the body separate from the spirit, but human nature as it consists of flesh and spirit, as the spirit in which we are to live after death, does not signify the spirit separate from the body in which the saints are to be raised, but their spirit united to an immaterial incorruptible body. In the same manner, 'the resurrection of souls,' chap. i. 9. is not to be understood of a revival of the sole exclusive of the body, but a revival of both. Knatchbull supposes and translates this verse in the following manner: "that (Gk.) they who live according to the spirit in the spirit may live." But the translation I have adopted is more easy, and gives a sense of the passage more analogous to the scripture phrasing.

17. (Ver. 5.) This is the end of all things hath approached. — That is, the end of the dispensation of the law, and of the whole Jewish economy, as proved, Prov. 10. 2. ch. 2. About a year after the war with the Romans began, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state, Peter, who had heard his Master's prophecy concerning these events, and conforming the sign of their approach, had good reason to say, that they had approached. It will be said, perhaps, that the concern for the welfare of the Jews was but a little interest in the destruction of the Jewish state. Yet as the Jews were the bitter persecutors of the Christians, in all the countries where they had any power, it must have been a great consolation to the brethren wherever, to be assured that the power of the chief persecutors was about to be utterly broken. Also, to know that the law of Moses was soon to be abolished, and that God had prevented the Gentiles from receiving the Jewish rites.

2. Be ye therefore sober. — This word has a double purport; it means both the passions of the mind and the exterior acts of the body with wisdom. When applied to the mind, as in this passage, it signifies to be mastered by provocation: when applied to the body, it signifies to be temperate in the use of meat and drink, and other sensual gratifications.

3. And watch unto prayers. — This is the advice our Lord gave to his disciples when he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, Luke xxi. 28.-The word 'watch' signifies to be alert and in search. In this passage it signifies to watch, because it follows a word which signifies to be sober: and both are necessary preparations for those works, and to those who may have occasion to go to Jerusalem, the apostle recommended as the best means of avoiding the calamities that were coming on it.

4. Ver. 11. — If any one speak, let him speak as the oracles of God require. — Let him speak nothing but that which is good and helpful to his fellow-men, and let him speak with gravity and earnestness. — For the meaning of 'speak,' see, Rom. iii. 2. note 2. Heb. v. 12. note.

5. Ver. 12. — To whom be the glory. — It is uncertain whether the relative 'whom' refers to God or to Christ. Understood of Christ, this doxology is perfectly proper, being given to him Rev. i. 6.

6. Ver. 13. — The word 'burning.' burning, denotes the grievous persecution which the Christians in Pontus, &c., were suffering for their faith. The metaphor is bold but noble. It represents them as having fire cast on them for the trial of their faith, as gold is tried by fire, chap. i. 7. to which the apostle alludes. This figure in a lively manner expresses the painful and dangerous nature of their trial.

7. Ver. 14. — If ye be reproached. — To an ingenuous mind, reproach is often worse than the spilling of goods, or even than bodily pain. Wherefore, to comfort the brethren put them in mind of Christ's words, Matt. v. 11. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, &c.

8. The Spirit of glory and of God rests upon you. — This is an allusion to Isaiah li. 3. The Spirit of glory, which rested on the persecuted disciples of Christ in the first instance, was a spirit of forbearance, enabling them to suffer the greatest evils without shrinking; a spirit which the brethren greatly admired. For which reason, when they put the first Christians to death for refusing to worship idols, they were so struck with the correctness of their surnames and benedictions, whereby they suffered, that it led many of them to think well, both of any power, and as they must have been a great consolation to the brethren wherever, to be assured that the power of the chief persecutors was about to be utterly broken. Also, to know that the law of Moses was soon to be abolished, and that God had prevented the Gentiles from receiving the Jewish rites.

9. Be ye therefore sober. — This word has a double purport; it means both the passions of the mind and the exterior acts of the body with wisdom. When applied to the mind, as in this passage, it signifies to be mastered by provocation: when applied to the body, it signifies to be temperate in the use of meat and drink, and other sensual gratifications.
I. PETER.

16 However, I HAVE ONE SUFFER AS A Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him even glorify God on that account.

17 (2 Pet. 2:20.) Indeed the time is come, that punishers must begin at the house of God; and if it begin first (so?) at us, what will the end be of them who obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if the righteous with difficulty can be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner (which are future of the Induc. Med. voc.) show themselves?

19 (2 Tim. 3:1.) Wherefore, let even those who suffer by the will of God, (1 Pet. 5:13.) commit (that he may go now) their own lives to him in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator.

2. At the house of God.—So the believing Jews are called, because they were now become the family and people of God, in the room of the unbelieving Jews. See the illustration of this verse in the View.

20 With difficulty (as the word is here signified) can be saved:—That the apostle is not speaking here of the difficulty of the salvation of the righteous at the day of judgment, will be evident to any one who considers 2 Pet. 3:11. This there shall be no salvation to them that he judged by the Spirit of salvation, and were delivered from the unrighteousness of the flesh. What he speaks of, is, the difficulty of the preservation of the righteous at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet they were preserved; for as Christ promised, Matt. xxiv. 12. But the ungodly and wicked Jews were saved neither in Judea nor anywhere else.

21 Let even those who suffer by the will of God, (1 Cor. 5:1.) commit their own lives to him in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator, who can and will most certainly restore their lives to them at the resurrection.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Precepts given in this Chapter.

Because the knowledge and good behaviour of the people depend in a great measure upon the kind of instructions which they receive from their teachers, the apostle in this chapter addressed the elders, that is, the bishops, pastors, rulers, and deacons, among the brethren of Pontus, &c. ver. 1.—Exhorting the bishops, in particular, to feed the flock of God committed to their care faithfully; and to exercise their episcopal office, not as by constraint, but willingly; not from the love of gain, but from love to their Master and to the flock, ver. 2.—And not to lord it over God's heritage, but to be patterns of humility and disinterestedness to their people, ver. 3.—This exhortation to bishops to feed Christ's flock, was given with much propriety by Peter, who had himself been appointed by Christ to feed his lambs and his sheep. Next, because the faithful performance of the bishop's office was in that age attended with great difficulty and danger, the apostle, to encourage the bishops, assured them, when that chief Shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory that faileth not away, ver. 4.—The distinguished reward which Christ is to bestow on those who have suffered for his sake, being a favourite topic with our apostle, he introduces it often in this epistle.

2. Over the heritages of God.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. V.—1. The elders, &c.

Commentary.

CHAP. V.—1. The elders who are among you, in your different churches, I exhort in what follows: who are a fellow-shepherd, &c., witnessing the sufferings of Christ in the garden and on the cross, and a partaker of his glory of governing the world by the gospel, which glory to be manifested at the last day. 2. Feed the flock of God which is committed to your care, faithfully exercising the bishop's office, not constrained thereto by men, but willingly, from a sense of the excellence of the office, neither for the sake of base gain, but for good disposition, 3. Neither as lording it over your flocks, which are the heritages of God: but being patterns in the flock in distress, hunger, and charity to the poor. 4. And to encourage you, know that when the chief Shepherd shall appear to judge the world, ye who have discharged your duty to your flocks faithfully, shall receive from him the crown of glory which fadeth not away. 5. For the like reason, ye the people subject yourselves to the elders, receiving their instructions and reproofs with humility. 6. Be humble, therefore, under the strong hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time. 7. Cast all your anxieties on him, because he careth for you.

Ver. 1.—1. The elders. An elder, as a name of office, belonged originally to bishops, presbyters, teachers, and deacons. Acts xxv. 36. Jas. i. 17. 2. Whom am a fellow-shepherd. Here Peter shewed his great modesty, for though he was one of the chief apostles, he took the title of elder only. And to render his exhortation acceptable to the elders of a people, he called himself their fellow-shepherd. The commentators justly observe, that if Peter had been the principal bishop of the apostles, as the Popes affirm, he would have taken this place, and that in the ascension of his magnificence, certainly he had assumed to himself that high prerogative. The circumstances of Peter's being a fellow-shepherd, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, are more mentioned to give weight to his exhortation. 3. And a witness of the sufferings of Christ. One of the purposes for which Christ chose twelve of the disciples, to be with him always, that having heard his discourses, and seen his miracles, and sufferings, they might be able to testify these things to the world, as what they themselves had heard and saw. Wherefore, as witness, in this passage signifies not only one who was present at a transaction, but who testifies it afterwards. 4. A partaker of the glory which was to be revealed. The glory to be revealed is Christ's glory of governing the world by his gospel. 5. Exercising the bishop's office, not by constraint, but willingly. In the first age, when the profession of the gospel exposed men to persecution, and when the persecution fell more especially on the bishops, it might easily be imagined, that some who were appointed to that office, would undertake it unwillingly: perhaps, because they were not disposed to do the duties thereof diligently. Or, because they were not willing to suffer. In such cases, the apostle very properly advised persons to decline the office. 6. But from good disposition. So I have translated πρόφανον, because it is opposed to the desire of base gain, mentioned in the preceding clause; and the following, willingly, mentioned likewise in the preceding clause. In the Syriac version, this word is translated into corese. Benson's observation on this verse is, 'How severely are they who feed themselves and not the flock: who take the patrimony of the church, and commit the care of souls to others, whom they allow a very small share of that plenty which they have for doing little.' 7. Neither as lording it over the flock. This is a strong word, denoting that tyranny which the men of this world often exercise, when they have obtained offices of power. K

8 Be sober, be vigilant! because your adversary the devil is walking about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may swallow up.

9 How resist, steadfast in the faith, knowing that the same kinds of sufferings are accomplished in your brethren who are in the world.

10 And may the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after ye have suffered a little, (see 6:5, 6,) himself make you complete, support, strengthen, settle you.

11 (Aerv) To him be the glory, and the dominion of the universe, ascribed by us, for ever and ever.

12 (Bav) By Silvanus, a faithful brother as I conclude, I have written to you in few words, exhorting you, and strongly testify- ing; this is the true grace of God in which ye stand.

13 The church which is at Babylon, elected jointly with you, and Mark my son salute you.

14 Salute one another with a kiss of love. (See Rom. xvi. 16, note 1.) Peace be to you all who are in Christ Jesus. Amen.

15 Being reduced to want by the persecution they were suffering, and of their being tempted thereby to renounce the gospel, the apostle exhorted them to be only moderately solicitous to avoid these dangers, and to cast their sacred care on God.

Ver. 8. Be sober, be vigilant.—This advice the apostle had given before, chap. iv. 7. (See note 2. there.) But he renews it now, and adds a new reason, 'That the devil is going about seeking whom he may swallow up!' As the word σκέπασθαι literally signifies; being used concerning solids as well as liquids. It strongly expresses the insatiable rage of the enemy of mankind to hinder their salvation, and to snatch them away from his holy God. For he sometimes attacks the person of God's people, though not visible; and sometimes by his servants, the other evil spirits who are in league with him; and sometimes by wicked men his subjects, whom he incites to tempt them by the terror of persecution. This account of the devil's malice is given with great propriety by Peter, to whom our Lord said, 'Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, but he may ass you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee.' Peter likewise had good reason, as Doddridge observes, to recommend watchfulness, since he had fallen so shamefully himself, notwithstanding this warning from his Master.—Romans understand the unbelieving Jews, who persecuted the Christians with great fury.

Ver. 9. Him resist, steadfast in the faith.—To show the efficacy of faith in enabling us to resist temptation. Paul calls it a shield, Eph. vi. 16, 'wherewith the darts of the wickedness,' &c.

Ver. 11. To him be the glory, &c.—By this doxology Peter expressed his firm persuasion that the devil hath no title to any honour from men, nor any dominion in the universe, nor power to tempt men, but by permission from God.

Ver. 12. 1. By Silvanus, a faithful brother.—Silvanus by whom this letter was sent, is, as Oecumenius supposes, the person of that name who joined Paul in writing to the Thessalonians, he is the Silas who is called, Acts xx. 22, 'a chief man among the brethren,' and ver. 32, 'a prophet; and being Paul's constant companion in travel, after the defection of John Mark, he doubtless accompanied the Galatians and the other countries of the Lesser Asia mentioned in the inscription, so, being well known to the brethren in these parts, he was a fit person to carry this letter. He is called here by Peter a faithful brother.' And without doubt he must have been an excellent person, and very zealous in the cause of the gospel; who attended Paul so many painful journeys undertaken for the service of Christ, and who on this occasion was willing to go into Pontus, Galatia, &c., with Peter's epistle to the churches in these widely extended countries. Probably, after Paul's death, Silas attached himself to Peter as his assistant, and reconciled himself much honoured by this commission to carry the apostle's letter into the Lesser Asia, which he executed faithfully.

2. A faithful brother as I conclude.—Peter having become intimately acquainted with Silvanus only since Paul's death, 'he concluded him to be a faithful brother;' from his mouth was coming very strongly the counsel of God in which ye stand.
II. PETER.

PREFACE.

Sec. 1.—Of the Authenticity of the Second Epistle of Peter.

In the Preface to the epistle of James, (sect. 2. initio), and in that to 1 Peter, (sect. 3. initio), the doubts which the ancients entertained concerning the authenticity of five of the seven Catholic epistles, are faithfully declared. But at the same time it is proved, that the doubted epistles were very early known, and well received by many. On this subject it is proper to put the reader in mind, that these epistles were rendered doubtful by a circumstance mentioned in the Gen. Pref. p. 1. namely, that the doubted epistles are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which is supposed to have been made in the second century. But the only conclusion that can be drawn from the omission is, that the author had not seen those epistles, or rather that they were not generally known when he made his version. Now this might easily happen, if it is probable, he was a Syrian Jew. For Syria being at a great distance from Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, the proconsular Asia and Bithynia, to whose inhabitants the epistles under consideration were originally sent, it would be a considerable time before copies of them were dispersed among the people from whom the Syriac version of the New Testament was made, so that the author might think it useless to translate them.

With respect to the doubts which some entertained of these epistles, after they came to be known, they serve to prove that the ancient Christians were very cautious of receiving any books as canonical, whose authority they were not perfectly assured of. For as Wall, Crit. Notes, vol. iii. p. 356. very well observes, “They not only rejected all the writings forged by heretics under the names of the apostles; but if any good book, affirmed by some man or by some church to have been written and sent by some apostle, was offered to them, they would not, till fully satisfied of the fact, receive it into their canon.” Wherefore, though the five epistles above-mentioned were not immediately acknowledged as inspired writings, in the countries at a distance from the churches or persons to whom they were originally sent, it is no proof that they were looked on as forgeries. It only shows that the persons who doubted of them had not received complete and uncontestable evidence of their authenticity; just as their being afterwards universally received is a demonstration, that, upon the strictest inquiry, they found them the genuine productions of the apostles of Christ whose names they bear. For the churches to whom these letters were sent, hearing that doubts were entertained concerning them, would no doubt of their own accord, as well as when asked concerning them, declare them to be genuine. And their attestation made public, joined with the marks of authenticity found in the epistles themselves, in time established their authority beyond all possibility of doubt. The truth is, such good opportunity the ancient Christians had to know the truth in this matter, and so well founded their judgment concerning the books of the New Testament was, that, as Lardner observes, no writing which was by them pronounced genuine, hath since their time been found spurious; neither have we at this day the least reason to think any book genuine which they rejected.

Thus much was necessary to be said concerning the five doubted-of epistles in general. With respect to the second epistle of Peter in particular, it remains to point out the marks of authenticity contained in the epistle itself, which, with the attestations of the churches to which it was sent, have fully established its authority.

1. And first it is observable, that the writer styles himself Symeon Peter; from which we conclude that this epistle is the work of the apostle Peter. If it be objected, that the apostle's name was Simon not Symeon, the answer is, that although in Greek this apostle's name was commonly written Simon, the Hebrew form of it was Symeon; for in the history of Jacob's sons it is so written. Besides, this very epistle is called Symeon, Symeon, Acts xv. 14. Next, it is objected, that in the first epistle, which is undoubtedly the apostle Peter's, he styles himself, not Simon Peter, but Peter simply. But I observe, that Luke hath called this apostle Simon Peter, chap. v. 6.; and that John hath given him that name no less than seventeen times in his gospel; perhaps to shew that he was the author of the epistle which begins, ‘Symeon Peter, a servant, and an apostle,’ &c. Further, though in the inscription of the first letter, Peter's surname only is mentioned, because by it he was sufficiently known, he might in the inscription of the second, for the greater dignity, insert his name complete; because he intended authoritatively to rebuke the false teachers who had already risen, or were to rise. Upon the whole, Symeon Peter being the same with Simon Peter, no objection can be raised against the authenticity of this epistle on account of the name.

2. The writer of this epistle expressly calls himself in the inscription an apostle. He does the same chap. iii. 2.; and in other places he ascribes to himself things which agree to none but to Peter the apostle. For example, chap. l. 14. ‘Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me;’ alluding to John xxi. 19. where we are told that Jesus signified to Peter by what death, when old, ‘he should glorify God.’—Chap. i. 16. this writer affirms, that he was one of the three apostles who were with Jesus at his transfiguration, when a voice from God he was declared to be ‘his Son, the beloved.’—Chap. iii. 15. this writer calls Paul ‘his beloved brother,’ in allusion no doubt to his having given Paul the right hand of fellowship: withal he commends his epistles as scriptures, that is, divinely inspired writings. The writer therefore, having thus repeatedly taken to himself the name an character of an inspired apostle, if he was an impostor, he must have been the most profligate of men.

3. By calling this his Second Epistle, chap. iii. 1. the writer intimates that he had written to them formerly. He intimates the same thing chap. l. 12—15. and, by so doing, shews himself to be the same Peter who wrote the first epistle. The method which Grocius has taken to elude the force of this presumption, shall be considered afterwards.

4. The matters contained in this epistle are highly worthy of an inspired apostle; for besides a variety of important discoveries, (see sect. v.), all tending to display the perfections of God and the glory of Christ, we find in it exhortations to virtue, and condemnations of vice, delivered with an earnestness and feeling which shew the sust "it to have been incapable of imposing a forged writing upon the world; and that his sole design in this epistle was to promote the interests of truth and virtue in the world.

II. But in opposition to these internal marks of authenticity, and to the testimony of all the ancient Christian writers since the days of Eusebius, who with one voice have ascribed this second epistle, as well as the first, to the apostle Peter, Salmasius, and other learned moderns have argued, that because its style is different from the style of the first epistle, it must have been written by some impostor who personated the apostle Peter. This objection shall be fully considered immediately. At present suffice it to say in the general, that if this was a writing forged in the name of an apostle by any impostor, we should certainly find some erroneous tenet, or false fact, asserted in it, for the sake of which the forgery was attempted. Yet nothing of that kind appears in the second epistle of Peter; nothing inconsistent with the doctrine taught in the other writings, which by all are acknowledged to be divinely inspired; in a word, nothing unsuitable, but every thing consonant, to the character of an inspired apostle.

This argument appeared so strong to Grotius, that although, on account of the difference of the sentiments and style observable in the two epistles, he would not allow the second epistle to be Peter's; he did not venture to call it the work of an impostor, but supposed it to have been written after the destruction of Jerusalem by Symeon, who succeeded James, our Lord's brother, in the bishopric of Jerusalem. And because the inscription, with the other particulars in the epistle relating to the writer of the character, are utterly inconsistent with Grotius's opinion, he uses a method of removing these difficulties, unworthy so learned a critic, as well as so good a man. Without the least authority from any ancient MSS. or versions, he confidently affirms that the inscription is interpolated, and that originally it was Symeon, a servant of Jesus Christ.

With the same unauthorized boldness he proposes to expunge the words our beloved brother, which precede the word Paul, chap. iii. 15.—And with respect to the words which this writer says he heard coming from the excellent glory, when he was with Jesus on the holy mount, chap. i. 16. Grotius affirms, 'that if some more ancient MSS. could be found, it might thence appear, that those words were added in this place, as other words in other places, by those who were willing to have this passage for an epistle of Peter.' But I reply, That if the texts of ancient books are to be altered, at the pleasure of every rash critic, for the sake of supporting some groundless conceit, there will be no such thing as the genuine text of any ancient book whatever. Wherefore, if liberties of this kind are not to be taken with profane authors, far less are they to be allowed in settling the text of the books of scripture, whose authority depends on our having, not the conjectural emendations of fanciful critics, but the very words of the inspired authors themselves.

With respect to the insinuation, that the author of this epistle wrote the first also, contained in the expression,

'This second epistle, beloved, I now write to you,' chap. iii. 1. Grotius says, that the two preceding chapters are the first epistle, and that the second epistle begins with the words, 'This second epistle,' &c. But as in no ancient MS. or version of this epistle is it so divided, and as no author ancient or modern hath spoken of its having been at any time so divided, Grotius's opinion merits no regard.

III. With respect to the objection against the authenticity of the second epistle of Peter, taken from its style being different from the style of the first, it is to be observed, that in the second epistle the opinion of many learned men this diversity is found only in the second chapter of the second epistle; the style of the first and third chapters being pretty much akin to the style of the first epistle. Wherefore, if the first and second epistles of Peter are thought to have been written by different authors, because the style of the second epistle differs in one chapter from that of the first, we must think that the second epistle itself was written by two different authors, because the style of its first and third chapters differs from that of the second. Yet no such conclusion ought to be drawn in either case; as it is well known that an author's style is regulated by the subjects of which he treats. If these are grand and interesting, they naturally suggest animated and sublime expressions; such as those in the first and third chapters of the second epistle, in which Peter describes the transfiguration of his Master, with the august circumstances which attend it; also the creation of the world, its past demolition by water, and its future destruction by fire.—On the other hand, if the subjects treated of raise an author's indignation and abhorrence, he will use an austerity of style, expressive of these feelings. Of this kind is the style of the second chapter of the second epistle.

For the apostle, whose love to his Master was great, and who had the feeding of Christ's sheep committed to him, regarding the false teachers as the most flagitious of men, wrote that chapter against them with a bitterness which he would not have used in correcting teachers who had served through simplicity. Moreover, in describing the character, and in foreseeing the miserable end of these impostors he adopted the bold figures and lofty expressions peculiar to the eastern writers, as even coming short of what might with truth be said concerning them.

—Wherefore, since the diversity of style in the two epistles of Peter can be so well accounted for, even on supposition that they were written by the same author, there is no reason to fancy with Grotius, that the second epistle was written by Symeon bishop of Jerusalem; or with Jerome, that Peter made use of different interpreters for the purpose of turning his Syriac epistle into Greek; or with bishop Sherlock to suppose, that Peter in his second epistle, and Jude in his epistle, copied some ancient Jewish writer, who described the false teachers of their own time, and denounced the judgments of God against them.

SECT. II.—Of the Time when the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

When Peter wrote his second epistle, he was old, and near his end: Chap. i. 14. *Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me.' Besides, chap. iii. 14, he speaks as if he had then seen all Paul's epistles: 'As also our beloved brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, hath written to you, 16. as indeed in all his epistles,' &c. If Peter had seen all Paul's epistles when he wrote this letter, it is probable that Paul was then dead. Nay, it is thought that Paul was dead when Peter wrote his first letter; at least if he wrote it from Rome, as most of the ancient Christian writers testify, (see 1 Peter, Pref. sect. 5.) The reason is, when Paul wrote his second to Timothy from Rome, a short while before his martyrdom, though he mentioned many who were then with him, he spake nothing in that letter of Peter; an omission which, if Peter had been in Rome at that time, could not well have happened. Wherefore, if Peter wrote his first epistle from Rome, he must have done it after Paul's death; consequently not sooner than the end of the year 66, or the beginning of the year 67, about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem. For Paul was put to death in the twelfth year of Nero, answering to A. D. 64.

With respect to the second epistle, which, as we have
PREFACE TO II. PETER.

Sect. III.

Penn, was composed a little before Peter's death, it seems to have been written from Rome likewise not long after the first. For, as Lardner, Can. iii. p. 253. observes, "It is not unlikely, that, soon after the apostle had sent away Silvanus with the first epistle, some came from those countries to Rome, where there was a frequent and general resort from all parts, bringing him an account of the state of religion among them, which induced Peter to write a second epistle, for the establishment of the Christians among whom he had laboured; and he might well hope, that his last words and dying testimony to the doctrines which he had received from Christ, and had taught for many years with unshaken steadfastness, would be of great weight with them." Indeed it seems to make that circumstance his apology for writing a second letter to them so soon after the first. See chap. i. 15, iii. 1. — If the second epistle of Peter was written not long after the first, we may date it in the year 67 or 68, while the persecution against the Christians raged at Rome, and when Peter had an immediate prospect of suffering martyrdom, as the Lord Jesus Christ had shewn him.

It was mentioned, No. 2, that Grotius supposed this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. But if his opinion be true, it will destroy the authenticity of the epistle as an inspired writing, seeing the only ground on which he rests his opinion is chap. iii. 12, where he says the writer speaks of the end of the world as then at hand: 'Expecting, and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, in which the heavens being set on fire shall be dissolved,' &c. For as, according to him, it was a common opinion in the first age that the end of the world was to succeed the destruction of Jerusalem, he supposed the writer of this epistle could not exhort the Christians to 'expect and earnestly desire the coming of the day of the Lord,' &c. unless Jerusalem had been then destroyed. But an exhortation of this sort is no proof that the writer, whoever he was, thought the end of the world was then at hand. He knew the contrary, as is plain from chap. iii. 3, where he expressly foretells, that 'scorners will come in the last days; saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep,' &c. In the last days, the scoffers, on account of Christ's long delaying to come, would ridicule his promises, and his disciples' expectation of that grand event. It being thus evident that the writer of this epistle did not think the end of the world was then at hand, (see 2 Thes. Pref. sect. 3.), his exhortation to expect, and earnestly desire the coming of the day of the Lord, does not imply that the day of the Lord's coming to destroy the world was then at hand, but that being kept hid from all mankind, and absolutely uncertain, believers ought always to be prepared for it. And as at that day the living are to be changed, and the dead to be loosed from the bands of death, and the whole crowned as victors, it ever was, and till it happen, ever will be, the object both of their earnest desire and of their firm hope. Grotius's argument, therefore, to prove that this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, taken from chap. iii. 12, being a misrepresentation of that text, founded on a false fact, is not of the least value.

Sect. IV.—Of the Occasion on which the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

For this see the quotation from Lardner, sect. 2, penult paragraph. See also the Preface to James, sect. 4, and the Illustrations prefixed to chapters i. and ii. of this epistle.

Sect. V.—Of the Matters contained in the Second Epistle of Peter.

The Spirit who revealed to Peter, that false teachers and corrupt doctrine would greatly disturb the peace and purity of the church in after-times, directed him to publish these discoveries in a second epistle to the brethren of Pontus, &c. and to accompany them with the plainest and most express declarations of the chief doctrines and precepts of the gospel; and to assert the high character, the power, and the coming of Jesus the author of the gospel; that at whatever time these false teachers appeared, and this epistle was read, the faithful might discern the impiety of their tenets, by comparing them with the true doctrines of the gospel set forth in this epistle, and steadfastly resist them.

In speaking of the matters contained in the second epistle of Peter, I must omit observing, that in it, as in the first epistle, there are discoveries of some important facts, and circumstances, not mentioned at all, or not mentioned so plainly, by the other inspired writers. Such as, 1. That our Lord was transfigured for the purpose of exhibiting, not only a proof of his greatness, and power as the Son of God and Judge of the world, but an example of the glory in which he will come to judgment: an example also, of his power to transform our corruptible mortal bodies, at the resurrection, into the likeness of his own glorious body, as it appeared in his transfiguration. 2. That the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire, was intended to be an example of that destruction by fire from the presence of the Lord, which will be inflicted on the wicked after the judgment. Compare Jusev. ver. 7.—3. That in the last age of the world scoffers will arise, who, from the stability of the present mundane system, will argue that the world hath existed as we see it from eternity, and that it will continue for ever. —4. That after the judgment, this earth with its atmosphere shall be set on fire, and, burning furiously, the elements shall be melted, and the earth with all the works of God and man thereon shall be utterly destroyed—That after the present heaven and earth are burnt, a new heaven and a new earth shall appear, into which, according to God's promise, the righteous shall be carried, there to live in unspeakable happiness; an event which Peter himself, in his discourse to the Jews, Acts iii. 21, hath termed 'the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.'

From the foregoing account of the discoveries made in the second epistle of Peter, the attentive reader must be sensible, that they are more grand and interesting than even those contained in the first epistle; and that to the foreknowledge and declaration of them, a degree of inspiration was necessary, superior to that required in the writing of the first epistle. Consequently, that the matters exhibited in the second epistle are every way worthy of an apostle of Christ really inspired, such as this writer expressly affirms himself to have been, and of which there can be no doubt.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

In the latter part of the apostolical age many false teachers arose, among whom the Nicolaitans and the Simonians were the most remarkable. These, as Jude tells us, ver. 4. 'perverted the grace of God to lasciviousness.' They perverted the doctrine of the gospel concerning men's being justified of free grace by faith, without the works of law, so as to make it a pretence for gratifying the lusts of their flesh without restraint. And to gain credit to their impious explications of the doctrines of the gospel, these impostors denied the authority of the apostles of Christ, and arrogated to themselves an illumination and authority superior to theirs. Nay, they denied the authority of Christ himself, chap. ii. 1. And having thus set themselves up as the only inspired teachers, (Jude, ver. 16, 19,) they assured their disciples, that being justified by faith without works, believers are under no obligation, either to abstain from sin, or to do what is morally good; that Christ hath purchased for them a liberty to gratify all their passions and appetites; and that Christ will not judge and punish them for so doing, nor for any sin whatever.

These doctrines, being extremely agreeable to the corruptions of the human heart, were embraced by many in the latter part of the first age. Wherefore, to stop the mouths of these false teachers, who were now gone abroad among the churches, and to prevent the faithful from being seduced by them, and to establish them in the belief of the things which the Lord himself had taught, and which his apostles had delivered in his name, Peter wrote this second epistle, in which he brought these things to their remembrance.

And, first of all, in opposition to the calumnies of the false teachers, he assured the brethren to whom this epistle was directed, that Christ had gifted to his apostles every thing necessary to quälify them for leading mankind to a godly life, and for making them partners of the divine nature. He had bestowed on them inspiration to know the true doctrines of the gospel, and authority to declare them to the world. From this it followed, that the teachers who pretended to possess a greater illumination than the apostles, or greater authority, were impostors, ver. 3, 4. And because these seducers taught their disciples, that morality was of no use in procuring salvation, Peter, by his apostolical authority, commanded all who profess the gospel, to add to their faith courage, and to courage knowledge, &c. ver. 5-7. Declaring, that these excellent dispositions would make them fruitful in good works, ver. 8. That if they were deficient in these things, they were blind, notwithstanding their pretentions to illumination, ver. 9. Moreover, the practice of good works the apostle recommended to them from this important consideration, that thereby, and not otherwise, they would make their calling and election firm, ver. 10. —and have an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of the Saviour, richly or honourably ministered to them, ver. 11. These things, he told them, he would not cease to call to their remembrance while he was in life, although they knew and believed them already, ver. 12, 13. —Withal, being sensible that he was soon to die, he proposed, by committing his instructions to writing in this epistle, to put it in their power, after his decease, to have them always in remembrance as his dying words, ver. 14, 15. In the mean time, to give the faithful the fullest assurance of the truth of all the things which the apostles with one consent had delivered to the churches, and which in part he was now going to write; more particularly, to give them a perfect assurance of Christ's being the Son of God, and of his coming to judge the world, which the infidels of that age loudly denied, St. Peter told them, that in making known the power and coming of Christ, he and his brethren apostles had not published a fable cunningly devised by Christ, and credulously received by them. They had the clearest evidence of their Master's power and coming set before them visibly, in the honour and glory which he received from the Father when he was transfigured in their presence, and a voice came to him from the excellent glory saying, 'This is my Son the beloved, with whom I am well pleased.' This voice, said he, we Peter, and James, and John, heard distinctly, being with him on that occasion upon the holy mountain, ver. 16-18. —He added, by these proofs of our Master's greatness, of which we were beholden, we and all mankind have the ancient prophecies concerning the resurrection of the dead, and the judgment of the world, as well as our Master's prophecies concerning these events, made more firm. Wherefore, it is your duty to give heed to the prophetic word thus confirmed, as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day of judgment itself dawn, and Christ the morning-star of that day arise in your hearts, by his personal appearance from heaven, ver. 19. —Knowing this first, as a circumstance necessary to confirm you in the belief of the ancient prophecies, that no prophecy of scripture is of the prophet's own invention, ver. 20. —but that all the prophets speak their prophecies by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHR. 1. —1. Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, (see 1 Pet. v. 1. note 2,) to them who have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.

VER. 1. —1. Precious faith. — Faith is called precious, because it is more essential to men's happiness than all the things they esteem most precious.

2. Of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. —The Dative noun with the Genitive case. On what authority our translators have rendered this, 'Of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ,' I know not. Perhaps they pointed the Greek text thus: ὄμω τῆς οὐρανοῦ, but the propriety of the language does not admit of that punctuation. Some understand this passage as signifying, that Jesus Christ is both our God and our Saviour. But others are of

COMMENTARY.

CHR. 1. —1. Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to all, both Jews and Gentiles, who have obtained like precious faith in the gospel with us believing Jews, through the righteousness of our God, who, by the prophets, promised that blessing to all nations; and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath called us thereto.
II. PETER

2 May good dispositions, and happiness temporal and eternal, be multiplied to you, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord.

3 (I. 319.) Certainly his divine power hath gifted to us all things which are necessary to life and godliness, through the acknowledgment of him who hath called us (Jas.) to glory and courage.1

4 (Ji s.) By whom1 the greatest, even precious promises? are gifted to us, that by these ye might become partakers of the divine nature, feeing away from the corruption1 which is in the world through lust.

5 (Kaiwma noratai, 107.) And for this very reason indeed, giving all diligence, join (e) to your faith? courage; 2 and to courage, knowledge; 3

6 And to knowledge, temperance; 4 and to temperance, patience; 5 and to patience, godliness; 6

7 And to godliness, the love of the brethren; 7 and to the love of the brethren, love 8 to all men.

1. Comment: The passive voice is used, in order to give prominence to the power of God, in contrast to our natural capacity. The progressive and perfect tenses are used throughout, as a marked contrast to the present tense of the passive voice. The idea of growth and development is emphasized, as well as the need for continuous effort and diligence.

2. Comment: The word "diligence" ("γυμνασμός") refers to active effort and perseverance. The idea is that we must actively cultivate these virtues in our lives, rather than passively relying on them.

3. Comment: The word "courage" ("παράστασις") implies a boldness and confidence in the power of God. The idea is that we must be willing to stand up for our faith in the face of adversity.

4. Comment: The word "knowledge" ("γνώση") refers to a deep understanding of the truths of God. The idea is that we must strive to deepen our understanding of God and his ways.

5. Comment: The word "temperance" ("σωφροσύνη") refers to self-control and moderation. The idea is that we must learn to control our desires and impulses.

6. Comment: The word "patience" ("πάθος") refers to the ability to endure suffering and hardship. The idea is that we must learn to endure the trials of life with grace.

7. Comment: The word "godliness" ("θεολογία") refers to the reverence and worship of God. The idea is that we must learn to honor and worship God in all that we do.

8. Comment: The word "love" ("λάβα") refers to a deep affection and concern for others. The idea is that we must learn to love others in a way that reflects the love of God.

Ver. 2. The knowledge, &c.—So γνώσις signifies, ver. 3. What an high value Peter put on the knowledge of God and of Christ, may be known, not only from his account of its efficacy in producing good dispositions and inward peace in men's minds, but from his exhortation, ver. 5, to add to their faith knowledge, (see note 1. on that verse,) and from the advice with which he concludes this chapter, chap. iii. 18. "Grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour."1 This knowledge our Lord likewise highly recommends, John xvi. 3. "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." Ver. 3. —All things which are necessary to life and godliness— that is, to a godly life. The things gifted by God's divine power to the vessels of his grace, in order to bring men to a holy life, were:

1. A complete knowledge of the doctrines of the gospel.—2. A mouth to preach and defend this doctrine, which our adversaries should not be able to resist.—3. Wisdom to direct them to behave as children sent into the world of God, Luke xii. 4—5. Miracle power, to confirm their doctrine and mission.

Ver. 4. —Joined to faith. —The apostle, 1 Epist. v. 1. denotes the apostolic office by the word glory. 3. And courage.—So I have translated the word αἰσθήσις, because courage is one of the spiritual gifts bestowed on the apostles, to fit them for their work. Accordingly, we find two of them praying for courage, 1 Thess. iv. 9, 10. Others translate τῆς αἰσθήσεως, by his glorious power.

Ver. 4. —By whom.—If the third verse is read as a paronomasia, the antecedent to the plural relative αὐτος will be, God and Jesus. Nevertheless, chap. iii. 6. note 1. at the end, where it is showed, that according to the Hebrew idiom a plural relative may have a singular antecedent; consequently, Jesus our Lord may be intended. Ver. 5. Peter. Two or three MSS. have it here.

2. Precious promises.—The apostle means all the promises of the gospel, which he calls great, because the things promised are the grandest that can be conceived by the human mind; such that they give the benefit of faith to all that believe in Christ, even the resurrection of the dead, the judgment of the world, &c. He likewise calls them precious, because of their efficacy to make us partakers of the divine nature; a possession noore precious than all the riches in the universe.

3. From the corruption.—This name the apostle gives to vicious actions in general, because they tend to destroy both the souls and the bodies of men.

Ver. 5. —Join. —Join. —Join hand in hand with your faith, courage; and with courage, knowledge, &c. Others, because ταυτά γινεσθαι and ταυτά γινεσθαι signify the same, suppose the clause should be translated, "minister or supply by your faith courage;" &c. In like manner, the sense ταυτά γινεσθαι is used in ver. 11. of this chapter.

2. Comment: The idea is that we must actively cultivate these virtues in our lives, rather than passively relying on them. The idea of growth and development is emphasized, as well as the need for continuous effort and diligence.

3. Comment: The idea is that we must learn to endure the trials of life with grace. The idea is that we must learn to honor and worship God in all that we do. The idea is that we must learn to love others in a way that reflects the love of God.

4. Comment: The idea is that we must learn to withstand the attacks of the enemy. The idea is that we must learn to withstand the attacks of the enemy. The idea is that we must learn to withstand the attacks of the enemy.
For these things being in you, and abounding, make ye to be neither slothful nor unfruitful! in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 (1 Thes.. 98.) But he who hath not these things is blind, shutting his eyes, and taking up a forgiveness of the purifications of his old sins.

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, earnestly endeavour to make your calling and election sure! For, doing these things, ye shall never at any time fall.

11 (1 Thes.. 97.) And thus there shall be richly ministration of the grace of God into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

12 Wherefore, I will not neglect to put you always in remembrance, concerning these things, although ye know, and are established in the present truth. (See 1 John ii. 21.)

13 Yes, I think it be, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance;

14 Knowing that the putting away of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me. (1 Ep. i. 5. 13.)

15 (2 Cor. 2. 10.) Therefore I will carefully endeavour, that ye may be able, through faith, to read these things after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance.

16 For (see the view and Illustration here) we have not followed cunningly devised fables, as those who are travailing in the heathen churches concerning the appearances of their gods on earth, when we made known to you (1 Ep. i. 5. 13.)

the revelators, observed on this passage, That the Spirit of God hath, by Peter, established this only bulwark of Iniquity whereby an entrance into the kingdom of God is obtained.

Ver. 9. Slothful or unfruitful. The apostle, in the preceding verses, having recommended the acquisition of virtuous dispositions, he in this tells us, that these dispositions must lead us to good works.

Ver. 9. 1. Is blind. Good things, being the natural fruits of the knowledge of Christ, the person who pretends to the knowledge of Christ, and does not do good works, is blind with respect to the nature of the Christian Church. The Jews, though very holy in their actions, may be able, through faith, to read these things after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance, the more so as eye geometrical seeing.

Ver. 9. 2. To shut the eyes. According to Bochart, this word comes from vis, vis, to shut. The apostle uses this word, to show the blindness of which he speaks was wilful.

3. The purification of his old sins. His expression, which is an allusion to baptism, together with Ananias's words to Paul, Acts xxii. 16. Art, be baptized, and wash away thy sins, is thought by many to imply, that in baptism the guilt of former sins is washed away. But Paul himself hath taught the sound meaning of Ananias's words. Heb. x. 22. Having your hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and your bodies washed with pure water. Besides, Peter in his 1 Epist. iii. 19, tells us expressly, that baptism is not the washing away of the flesh of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God; in which respect it resembles circumcision, which is not that which is outward, but of the heart, by cutting off all irregular passions and species. The washing in baptism, therefore, is not a real, but an emblematical washing of the sinner from the guilt of his sins; which emblem, as it contains a promise of pardon, will be realized to the sinner, if he gives the answer of a good conscience, and not otherwise. For, as the washing of the baptized person in the water is an emblem of his death, the raising him out of the water is an emblem of his resurrection to eternal life if he forswakes his sins.

10. Make your calling and election sure. The original word Δικαίωση signifies firm. The Vulgate version is, that by good works ye make your calling and election firm. And Benn tells us, that he found the same reading in two Greek MSS. As man's election to eternal life cannot be made more firm than it was at first, and our calling is once put before election, it is reasonable to think that the apostle is speaking of the brethren's calling and election to be the church and people of God, which they were made firm by adding to their faith courage, &c. especially as it is said, if ye do these things, ye shall never at any time fall! namely, from your election. Accordingly, the word "falsi" is used to signify the rejection of the Jews as a nation, and their falling from their privileges as the people of God, Rom. xi. 11.

Ver. 11. Everlasting kingdom. Since we are told, 1 Cor. xv. 26. that after the judgment Christ will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, we must not think the kingdom here spoken of shall enter after the judgment is called the everlasting kingdom of Christ, because it will for ever be governed by him. The kingdom of Christ being the genius of the agent, and not of possession, means the kingdom which Christ erected by what he did in the earth, and which by the government which he will have in heaven, he will at length fully establish. This kingdom is fully called everlasting, because after it is delivered up to the Father, it will remain in continuance throughout all eternity. Some MSS. Instead of un, read an, read un. The MSS. after 1588, made this alteration. But the common reading is best supported.

Ver. 13. As long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up. Here the apostle seems to apostrophe to the brethren for writing a second letter to them so soon after the first. Hence his manner is correspondent to the meaning of the word tabernacle, to intimate that the soul is a distinct substance from the body, that its continuance in the body has not its limits from that its departure is easy.

Ver. 15. But may be able. After my decease, to have these things always in remembrance. The apostle's care in this was highly commendable; because the most important truths, if they are not remembered, have no influence on the mind. The grace in this passage, as Benson remarks, is beautiful. He proposed to put the brethren in mind of some revealed truths with which they were acquainted; he proposed to do this, not once or twice, but always, so long as he lived; nay, he proposed to put them in remembrance of these things after his death. Therefore the ministers of the gospel, following Peter's example, ought to insist most on the things which are of most importance to their people, though they are already well instructed in them; the influence of truth depending, not so much upon the knowledge, as upon the frequent recollection of it.

Ver. 16. We have not followed cunningly devised fables. The word "παποιαίως" is, in its bad sense, denotes, as Benson remarks, that which hath a false appearance of wisdom and knowledge, especially the apostle's using the term "παποιαίως". "Bosmighem". In the end of the verse, it is probable, that the cunningly devised fables of which he speaks, were those concerning the appearance of the heathen gods.
the power, and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were (ἐπιθύμων) beholders of his greatness, 3

17 (Acts 3:24) When indeed he received from God the Father honour and glory, a voice of this kind being brought to him from the majesty, thus saith the Lord, I AM THY FATHER, THOU ART MY SON, THIS DAY I HAVE BEGOTTEN THEE. This is why the heavens were opened, (v. 143,) with whom I am well pleased. 3

And this voice we heard from heaven, being with him (v. 169,) on the holy mountain. 5

19 (Kai, 212.) And so we do have the prophetic word (chap. iii. 2.) more firm, to which ye do well to take heed, as to a lamp shining in a dark place (morepo) the morning-star rise in your hearts; 6

20 Knowing this first, that no prophecy of scripture is of private invention, 6 on earth in human forms, which the heathen priests had contrived to grandise their particular temples, and which the legislators some nations had adopted for the purpose of supporting the public religions. To gain the greater credit to these fables, the priests and sages of many nations called the mysteries of the gods, in which the fabulous appearances of the gods were represented as more divine than human. But one particular show alone none but the fully initiated were permitted to see. Hence they were called κεκρυμένα, beholders. See the note on the next verse. The sense of this passage the apostle, I suppose, understood in this sense, that the account which he and his brethren gave of Christ's transfiguration, was not a cunningly devised fable, like those exhibited in the heathen mysteries, but a real transaction of which they were κεκρυμένα, beholders.

Ver. 15.—The initiated into the mysteries were called κεκρυμένα, beholders, because they were admitted to behold a shines image which represented the supreme God, and heard an hymn in which his attributes were described and celebrated. In opposition to these vain mysteries, St. Peter places the much more grand and important mystery of the transfiguration, in which, as our Lord told the κεκρυμένα, there was exhibited both a visible example and a proof of the glory, wherein as the Son of God he will appear at the last day to judge the world, Matt. xvi. 27. In our Bible κεκρυμένα is translated eye-witnesses; but the proper term for eye-witnesses is εἰδωλοσ, Luke i. 2.

3. Of his greatness.—The change which our Lord produced in his own body, when he transfigured himself, so that his face shone as the sun, and his garments became white as the light, by his body shining through them, together with the voice which came to him from the magnificent glory, is called by Peter his ἀκαίρετα, mysterious greatness, both because the transfiguration was not a thing that could be conceived and proved by man's power to change our corruptible body into one incorruptible, and because the voice was a declaration from God, assuring the κεκρυμένα beholders that his Son is his Son. These beholders were three in number and to each of them, that the credit of so great a miracle might not rest on the testimony of one person only, but be supported by the unanimous testimony of a sufficient number of credible witnesses. The appearing of Moses and Elijah at the transfiguration, was not only an honour done to Jesus in his humble state, but a proof from fact, that the dead have notlost their existence, and that God's beloved Son hath the keys of Hades and of death. Neh. 1:28. In the transfiguration, therefore, having not only an image of the power and glory with which Christ will return to raise the dead and judge the world, but a proof that he will actually return and accomplish those great events, the promise of his coming is worthy of the highest credit.

Ver. 17.—A voice of this kind being brought to him. The voice was not addressed to Jesus, but to the three apostles. Nevertheless, as it speak of Jesus in his hearing, it might be said to have been brought to him.

2. From the magnificent glory. — ἐνδοξία, greatness. This was different from the glory in which Moses and Elijah appeared, Luke vii. 28, being the glory of God, which Stephen beheld, Acts vii. 56, and the glory of the Lord in which Christ will come to judgment, Mark viii. 38. At the transfiguration, it had the appearance of a bright and shining cloud. Matt. xvi. 5, which by the Jewish doctors was called the σκόνη, but in the Old Testament it is termed the face of God; and by St. Paul, the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power. 2 Thess. i. 10. This glory, or shining cloud, appeared to the patriarchs when the Lord was about to make his will manifest or his purpose known. In a particular, this glory appeared to Moses at the bush, and on Mount Sinai, the giving of the law. Hence it came to be said to have conversed with God 'face to face.' Exod. xix. 11. It accompanied the Jews in their journeys from Egypt and through the wilderness, in forms like a pillar of cloud or fire to show them the way, and to keep their bright names soothed by the cloud which attended it. See 1 Cor. xii. 2.

3. When it appeared to Paul on the road to Damascus, it shone with a brightness above that of the sun. But in its greatest splendour it cannot be looked on with mortal eyes. Hence it is called, 1 Tim. vi. 16. ὁ ἐπιθύμων, 'the light which no man can approach.'

3. With whom I am well pleased. — He beard the apostle, I suppose, understood in this sense, that the account which he and his brethren gave of Christ's transfiguration, was not a cunningly devised fable, like those exhibited in the heathen mysteries, but a real transaction of which they were κεκρυμένα, beholders.

Ver. 18.—We heard from heaven, — that is, from God: For in this, as in all other passages, heavens signifies God. Luke xx. 22. I have sinned against heaven. Besides, from the voice itself is evident that it was uttered by God: 'This is my Son, the beloved,' and being directed to the three disciples, they could not but attend to it, and know that it was their Master of whom these words were spoken.

2. In the holy mountain.—Peter calls this mountain holy, on account of the appearance of God thereon at the transfiguration. In this he was authorized by God himself, who, when he appeared to Moses at the bush, ordered him to call the name of that place Jehovah, Exod. xxxii. 30. Concerning the mountain on which our Lord was transfigured, see Harmony, XII. 3. p. 301.

Ver. 19.—I have the prophetic word (ἐπιθύμων) more firm. — This, which is Origen's translation, is the true literal translation of the passage, as Benson hath shown by examples from Socrates and Josephus. Besides, the Greek word ἐπιθύμων signifies to confirm or make firm, 1 Cor. i. 8. 2 Cor. i. 21. Coll. ii. 7. Heb. ii. 3. and vi. 11, an oath (ἵππος) for confirmation. That the word of the prophecy was thus made more firm by the addition of judgment dawn, and Christ, surrounded with the glory of the Father, appear like the morning-star, which, by assuring you of his coming, may be said to arise in your hearts.

20 To receive comfort and direction from the prophetic word, ye must know this first, that no prophecy of scripture is of the prophet's own invention.
II. PETER.

21. For even, at any time, was prophecy brought by the will of man, but the holy men of God spake, being moved by the Holy Ghost. (See 2 Tim. iii. 16.)

Critics and dictionary writers give uncommon meanings to words, on no other authority but that which the sense of the passages where they are found leads to that meaning. See Virgil and Lowth tell us, Psalms Deus. Isaiah, p. 35. In particular, what other reason had the Greek commentators for interpreting μορφηνας, 1 Cor. vii. 25. ἀπεκδηλωθη, Acts xxii. 25. as if it were a substantive? What other reason had our English translators for rendering Luke iii. 15. ναην, κατατηρεται, exact no more than that which is appounded you; and for rendering ταρα, 1 Cor. xi. 10, a veil; and παράνομος, 1 Cor. xv. 12, a spiritual gift; and for translating εἰρήνην, 2 Cor. xi. 8, I have not been chargeable? However, not to rest the true prospect of these great evils might have grieved the faithful too much, as if God had forsaken his church, he observed, by way of preface, that in the Jewish church there were false prophets, even as among the disciples of Christ there were to be false teachers, who, in a covert manner, would introduce most destructive heresies, denying even the Lord who bought them, ver. 1—and by their vicious manners would occasion the gospel to be evil spoken of, ver. 2—These false teachers a Jude describes as in part actually come when he wrote his epistle, and mentions their perverting the grace of God into lasciviousness. Both apostles, I suppose, spoke of the Nicolaitanes, whose deceased our Lord hated, Rev. ii. 6, 15, and of the pestilent sects which sprang from them; namely the Gnostics, Carpocratians, and Mandarists. See I John, Pref. sect. 3. Further, St. Peter foretold that these teachers, actuated by an insatiable love of gain, would make merchandise of the people with feigned words; but should at length suffer condign punishment, ver. 3.—Of these feigned words, the most destructive it seems were, their confidently affirming that God is so good that he will not punish men for their sins. For in contradiction of that pestilent error, Peter appealed to the punishment of the angels who sinned, and of the old world, and of Sodom and Gomorrha, as clear proofs from facts, that, sooner or later, God will not spare impenitent sinners, ver. 4, 5, 6.—By what other feigned words the false teachers were to make merchandise of the people, Peter has not so plainly inculcated; but from his appealing to the punishment of the antichristians and Sodomites, in proof that heretical teachers and their disciples shall not escape, and from what he says ver. 10, and downwards, concerning the practices of these men, it may be presumed that they were falsehoods, contrived to make the indolence of their lusts consistent with their hope of salvation.

If this was the nature of their doctrine, it accounts for the great success of these teachers in making disciples; for, with the bulk of mankind, instructors are most acceptable when they flatter the multitude in their vices.

But lest it might be alleged, that the flood which destroyed the old world, and the fire which fell on the cities of the plain, were natural events, in which the wicked were no more concerned than the righteous, St. Peter, in describing the destruction of the antichristians, the Sodomites, took care to mention the deliverance of Noah and Lot, as evident proofs that these punishments fell on the wicked by the immediate interposition of God, ver. 7, 8.—And from the whole he draws this conclusion: The Lord is able and willing to deliver the godly, and to reserve the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished, ver. 9.—So that the righteous have no reason to fear that they being involved with the wicked in the everlasting destruction which in the end is to fall on them.—Further, that the faithful might know who the false teachers and wicked men are that shall be punished at the judgment, the apostle told them, they are those especially who go after the flesh in the lusts of pollution, and who despise government, that is, the wholesome laws of the countries where they live, and speak evil of magistrates, ver. 10.—These teachers by which false teachers in all ages have been distinguished; for their errors have constantly ended in the gratification of their lusts; and they themselves have always hated laws and magistrates, because they restrained and punished their ways. But the apostle justly observed, that persons of this stamp, by their own corruptions, destroy themselves, both in the present and future life, ver. 12.—Then described the roaring of the false teachers at the love feasts of the church, together with their lasciviousness, ver. 13, 14.—And by remarking that they followed in the way of Balaam, he instanced, that in opposition to their own knowledge and conscience, they, for the sake of drawing money from their disciples, taught them to indulge themselves in all kinds of sensuality, ver. 15, 16.—Next, because these teachers never delivered any instructions really useful, the apostle compared them to wells without water, and to clouds driven by the wind which yield no rain, ver. 17.—While in the mean time, to draw disciples after them, they boasted of the excellency of their doctrine, by which they permitted those to live in lasciviousness, who, by receiving this gospel, had separated themselves from the wicked heathens, ver. 18.—But of the miserable state into which they brought their disciples, by promising them liberty from the restraint of all laws human and divine, these teachers were glaring examples; being themselves slaves to their own lusts, which is a much worse condition than to be under the restraint of good laws, ver. 19. He therefore told the disciples of these teachers, that if, after fleeing away from the pollution of heathenism by professing the gospel, they were again entangled in the same pollutions through the base arts of their teachers, they would become even more vicious than formerly, ver. 20. So that it had been better for them never to have known the way of righteousness, than having known it to forsake it, ver. 21.

For, in that case, they would be like dogs, who turn again to their own vomit, and to the washen sow, which returns to its wallowing in the mire, ver. 22.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II.—But there were also false prophets among the people, even as among you there will be false teachers, who will privily introduce destructive heresies, denying the Lord that bought them, bringing on themselves swift destruction.

2 And many will follow their destruction,1 (if so) on account of whom the way of truth will be evil spoken of.2

3 And through covetousness they will make merchandise of you, by fictitious tales.3 To the profit of whom the heads of old (Judg. ver. 4) lingereth not,4 and their destruction slumbereth not.

4 For if God did not spare the angels who sinned, but, with chains of darkness confining them, ver. 1. Privily introduce. 2. So the word ἀφελείας properly signifies, as in a sense the use of the verbal noun ἀφελώ, privately brought in, Gal. 4:1; Judges upon the same compositional signification; in the same sense; a word very rare, ver. 4. Certain ungodly, as (ἀρρένων) have crept in. By using the word under consideration, Peter imitated, that the heresies of which he spake were to be introduced under the colour of true doctrine, in the dark as it were, and by little and little, and so that the people would not discern their real nature.

3. Destructive heresies.—Literally, heresies of destruction. This is what grammarians call the positive of the agent, heresies which cause destruction. The word translated heresy hath a middle significative in scripture, as well as in profane authors; for, as it signifies a departure from the established doctrine of the church, so it signifies any system of opinions in philosophy or religion, whether true or false, which a person hath chosen to adopt. Thus Paul said to king Agrippa, Acts xxxi. 19. after the most straight (τροχόν, ἄρρεν) sect of our religion, &c.; but by Peter, in this passage. It is used to signify opinions known to be false, taken up to gratify pride, ambition, covetousness, lust, or other evil passions. Hence Paul tells Titus, chap, iii. 11, that an heretic is self-confounded; which he could not be if heresy were merely an error of judgment. Being, therefore, an error of the will, it is reckoned among the works of the flesh, Gal. v. 19, and the heretic himself is to be smitten and avoided, Rom. xi. 21. Destructive heresies known to be false, taken up and spread for the sake of gain, are justly declared to be destructive, because they will bring destruction both on them who teach and on them who receive them. But if one is sincerely persuaded of the truth of the opinion he has embraced, and if he be a person of influence or the gratification of his vicious inclinations are thereby promoted, his heresy or wrong opinion is his madness, rather than his weakness; and God, who knoweth the heart, will make the allowances which are necessary in such a case.

2. Destructive heresies. 3. By fictitious tales. 4. A similar example is given in chap. v., where some of the prophets foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, but they were false prophets, and the city was not destroyed.

5. Will be evil spoken of. 1. There is a clear sentence in this single sentence there is a clear prediction of the iniquitous practices of these great merchants of souls, the Roman clergy, who have raised all crimes, even the most atrocious, at a fixed price; so that, if their doctrine be true, whoever pays the price may commit the crime, without hazarding his salvation.

6. By fictitious tales. 7. For the true meaning of the word heresy is not given, as above, see note 4. In the sense here used, heresy is properly the doctrine of the heretics, who are those that have been cured of the errors of the true church, and who have afterwards been received into the church, but who have continued in their error, and have not been converted to the truth, but have continued in their error, and have not been converted to the truth. See the parallel passages in Acts ix. 20, xxvii. 4, ii. 1. The former treatise. What the fictitious tales were, by which the false teachers would make merchandise of the people, is not said. But from the apostle's reference to the degradation of the angels who sinned, and the destruction of the angels of the dispensation of Moses and Solomon, to prove that God will not spare delinquent sinners, it is probable they were of such a kind as to make the people believe that God is so good that he will not punish men severely for indulging their natural appetites, and committing a few sins which do him no harm. Perhaps also, he had in view the fables concerning the visions of angels, and the miracles performed at the sepulchres of departed saints, which the false teachers in the early ages, and the monks in later times, fabricated, to gain credit to those impious doctrines by which the spirit of God was not consistent with the hope of salvation, and drew money from people.

5. The punishment threatened of old lingereth not. 1. God having at the beginning condemned the first sinners, Adam and Eve, to death, that ancient condemnation belongs to all sinners, and will fall heaviest on those who not only are wicked themselves, but by false doctrine and false excise others to be wicked. The apostle therefore justly declared, that the condemnation threatened of old belonged to false teachers; and, by a beautiful perspicuity, represents it as having long ago begun its journey towards them; and, since it neither lingereth nor slumbereth, it will certainly overtake them. Thus, while the apostle asserts the justice of God, he declares his patience: He is now to punish, that sinners may have time to repent; but if they continue impenitent, he will without fail punish them at last. 2. God did not spare the angels who sinned. 1. The angels seem to have been placed originally in a state of trial. Those who stood are called in scripture the holy angels. The same idea is expressed in the angels of the apostles, of like John viii. 44, and Jude ver. 6, as a thing well known. Perhaps it was handed down by tradition, that the memory of it seems to have been preserved among the heathens in the table of the Titans warning against the God. What the sin of the angels was, is not well known. Jude speaks in a general way of their own principality, but left their proper habitation. Hence their them in Tartarus, delivered them over to be kept for judgment; 5. And did not spare the old world, but saved Noah, a preacher of righteousness, the eight person that was saved, when he brought the flood upon the world of the ungodly; 6. And having reduced to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, punished them with an overthrow, placing them an example to those who afterward would live ungodly; 7. And rescued righteous Lot, exceedingly grieved by the lewdness of the behaviour of the lawless, will he spare them? (See ver. 4. note 1.) 8. For that righteous man, dwelling among them, by seeing and hearing tormented his righteous soul from day to day with their ungodly works. 9. The Lord knew ahead to rescue the godly out of temptation, (4. 101.) and to keep in ward the unrighteous, to the day of judgment, to be punished. (Vulg. crucians.) 10. And especially those who go after the sin by many is thought to have been pride, and a discontent with their station. See 1 Tim. iii. 6. note 2. But whatever it was, considering their high intellectual power, they might easily have avoided it; and therefore God did not spare them, as he spared Adam and Eve, who, on account of the greatness of the temptation spread for them by the evil angels, and their own inexperience, were fit objects of mercy. 2. To these Jude ver. 6. note 3. of darkness, confining them in Tartarus. This is a literal translation of θαλαπῶσαι, θελαπῶσαι, θελαπώσας, θελαπώσας. The word Tartarus is not found in the LXX, nor anywhere in the New Testament but here. Its meaning therefore must be sought for among the Greeks. Homer represents Tartarus as a deep place under the earth, Iliad v. line 12. In like manner Hesiod speaks of Tartarus as a place far under ground, where the Titans are bound with chains in thick darkness, Theogony, line 119. 718. But on other occasions the Greek writers speak of Tartarus as in the air, and at the extremity of the earth, beyond the region of Maestor. Hence the epithet θαλαπώσας, θαλαπώσας, θαλαπώσας, θαλαπώσας. The Jews, as appears from Job ii. 8. thought the fallen angels, or at least some of them, were permitted to wander up and down on the earth, and to torment men. This was the opinion of the evangelists likewise, who speak of the devil's tempting our Lord, and of Peter, who represents the devil as a roaring lion walking about. Acts 2. Eph. 6. 12; and the opinion of Paul, who intimates that evil spirits have their habitations in the air, Eph. ii. 2. 11, 12. Therefore, seeing the Greeks thought the evil angels were confined in Tartarus, it was natural for Peter, when writing to his fellow-countrymen, to express concerning the confining of the evil angels in the air, or wherever else they are shut up to cut the place of God's judgment. 3. The Titans, the enemies of the gods, were confined, Tartarus, it was natural for Peter, when writing to his fellow-countrymen, to express concerning the confining of the evil angels in the air, or wherever else they are shut up to cut the place of God's judgment. 4. The addition of the word Maestor, although his idea of Tartarus was different from that of the Greeks. Peter's expression, 'chains of darkness,' and Jude's, reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, are not inconsistent with the fact asserted by the other inspired writers, that the evil spirits are confined in our atmosphere; for, in comparison of the regions out of which they were cast, our air is a place of darkness. Or darkness and chains of darkness may be understood metaphorically, as denoting the horror and misery of the state in which the evil spirits now are. See ver. 17. Because it is said, Rev. x. 2. that Satan is cast (καταλαμβάνεται) into the abyss, and Luke xi. 31. that the devils besought Jesus 'that he would not command them to go out into the abyss,' Latins infer that Tartarus and Hell are the same; and that the greatest part of the angels who sinned are confined there, though some of them are allowed to roam about on the earth, tempting men. For more concerning Tartarus as a place of punishment, see Pope's note on line 10. of his translation of the Sept of the book of the Psalms. 5. Delivered them over to be kept for judgment; Jude, ver. 5. 6. The judgment of the great day. From this it follows, that the angels who sinned are not at present suffering the punishment due to them for their crimes, but, like men, they are kept in distance in the air, till the time come when they are to be punished with the wicked of the earth, whom they have seduced. This was the opinion of all the Christian writers for five centuries, as Whitby, by many shows; and it is agreeable to our Lord's doctrine, who calls the fire into which wicked men are to be cast, fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Ver. 8. 1. But saved Noah (σαθροῦ) a preacher of righteousness. 2. By calling Noah a herald of righteousness, Peter intimates that all the times Noah was preaching the ark, he proclaimed, notwithstanding their high rank, but, with chains of darkness confining them in Tartarus, delivered them over to be kept for judgment and punishment; 5. And did not suffer the wicked inhabitants of the old world to go unpunished, but saved Noah, a preacher of righteousness, the eighth person who was saved, when he broke the flood upon the earth on which the ungodly dwelt, and destroyed them all, though they were so many in number, 1 Pet. iii. 20. 6. And having reduced to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, punished their inhabitants with a great fire, setting them a typical example of that dreadful punishment by fire which he will inflict on the wicked at the last day, to deter those who in after-times would live ungodly; 7. And, to show his regard to good men, rescued righteous Lot, who had been exceedingly grieved by the lewdness of the behaviour of the lawless Sojourners;—will he, do ye think, suffer those ungodly teachers to go unpunished, who by their false doctrine destroy themselves? 8. Lot was justly delivered when the Sojourners were destroyed; for that righteous man, dwelling among them, was so far from imitating them, that, by seeing their base actions, and hearing their lewd speeches, he tormented his righteous soul from day to day with their ungodly works. 9. From the preservation of Noah and Lot, with their families, ye may be sensible that the Lord is willing to avenge the godly out of temptation; and from the example of the angels who sinned, that he will keep in ward the unrighteous to the day of judgment, to be punished. 10. And especially God will punish those who go after the flesh to the antediluvians the destruction of the world by a flood, that from the dread of that impending judgment God might be brought to repentance; like as Noah proclaimed to the Ninevites the destruction of their city for the same purpose. 2. The eighth who was saved.—Pearson on the Creed, p. 119, translates this, 'the eighth preacher of righteousness.' Supposing that Enoch, (Gen. v. 24,) from whom Noah was descanted, was the first preacher of righteousness, and that all the rest who were concerned in this affair, were likewise preachers of righteousness. But there is not any evidence that the interceding persons were preachers of righteousness, and therefore the translation I have given seems more natural. For in the arcs were Noah, and his sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons, Gen. viii. 16. in all eight persons. Bryant, Mythol. vol. ii. bash shewn, that the knowledge of the flood, and of the eight persons who were saved, had been preserved among the different nations of mankind by tradition; that in the ancient heathen writings there is mention made of the saved eight; that the hill where the ark rested is called the hill of the eight; and that a village near that hill bears the same name, Themoseum. See Hammond. 3. The world of the ungodly.—The antediluvians were called ungodly, because they had lost all knowledge of God, were universally addicted to idolatry, and lived in the glutification of the lusts of the flesh, Gen. vi. 2. 3. Those likewise were the sons of the false teachers of whom Peter speaks. Ver. 6. 1. The cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. The sin of Sodom was unnatural lusts, Gen. xix. 5. and pride with fulness of bread, (luxury,) and abundance of idleness, and turning the truth into unrighteousness, (swn. and hard-heartedness towards the poor, Ezek. xvi. 49. Jude, ver. 7. 2. Placing them an example.—Because the word used here is παραδείγματος, παραδείγματος, and παραδείγματος, this signifies, Acts xvi. 35. The multitude of the inhabitants of the old world, and of the cities of the plain, was in the eye of God no reason for not destroying them. He destroyed them all at once. On the other hand, a few godly persons among them were not overlooked by God because they were few, but were saved by an especial interposition of his power. This last observation Peter makes, to show that, notwithstanding God permits evil teachers to arise and deceive many, he will preserve the sincere from being led astray by them, and strength will destroy them out of the midst. Keeping the unrighteous in ward to be punished at the day of judgment, we are taught, that the punishment inflicted on the wicked in this life will not hinder them from being punished in the next.
II. PETER.

through unnatural lust, and who despise the government both of God, and man, hating to be restrained thereby: and being audacious, self-willed, they do not fear to revile magistrates when they punish them for their crimes.

11 Whereas the holy angels, who are greater in strength and power than the angels who sinned, when they complained of them, do not bring an accusation against them in reviling speech before the Lord; but set an example of temperate language, which mankind ought to imitate.

12 But these false teachers, like natural wild beasts made for capture and destruction, speaking evil, (v. 166.) of matters which they do not understand, shall be utterly destroyed by their own corruptions.

13 Receiving the due reward of unrighteousness, They reckon riot which is in the day, pleasure. They are spots and causes of reproach, living in riot by their own deceits, when they feast, with you.

14 They have eyes full of adultery, and which cannot see from sin: They allured whole souls. They have an heart exercised in covetous practices. (See Eph. iv. 19. note 2.)

Children of the curse. (Mal. xxv. 41.)

15 Having forsaken the straight way, they have wandered, following in the way of Balaam son of Beor, who loved the hire of unrighteousness; (see Numb. xxii. 32.)

The principal part of their punishment will be that which they shall suffer after the judgment.

Ver. 15-1. Those who go (εἰσερχομένοι) after the flesh,-Jude, ver. 7. after strange flesh. This is a periphrasis for sodomy.

2. They despise government. Since δικαίως, dignities, persons in high offices, magistrates and rulers, are mentioned in the following clause, it is natural to suppose that δικαίως signifies the office of magistrates, or rather the exercise of their office-they hate the persons of those who God and men carry on by righteous laws.

In this passage the apostle had an eye to the false teachers of the Jewish nation, whose principles led them to despise the heathen magistrates, and even to revile and resist them. See Rom. xiii. Ilustration.

Ver. 11-1. A reviling accusation. Εὐθυμίας ἐστιν. The accuser of the angels signifies to utter speech, whether true or false, which hurts the reputation of another. Here is signified such speaking against of that kind, expressed in bitter language.

2. Against them.-One MS, supported by Vulgate, reads here οἰκείως, against one another, which is a notion given a good meaning. But the common reading are, them, is better supported, and may be retained, because it is no uncommon thing in scripture to introduce a relative, the antecedent of which is not expressed; see Rom. iv. 95. Or οἰκείως may be read with the spirit auster, thus, οἰκείως; in cases which the translation will not be examined. To this temperate manner of speaking concerning the angels who sinned, the holy angels were very different. These, by the word of God, and by the reverence for God. It is probable the apostle had in his eye Michael's contest with the devil, mentioned Zech. iii. 1. To which also Jude refers, ver. 9. For angels, the plural, signify one angel here. See iv. 81.

3. Before the Lord. 1.-It as is generally supposed, this is an allusion to Zech. iii. 1. 2. "Before the Lord" means, before the angel of the Lord.

Ver. 12. But these, as (ἐπίκαιροι) natural irrational animals. The epithet natural is given here to wild beasts, to signify that they act always according to their natural dispositions; and that the false teachers, whom the apostle compares to them, were like them furious, rapacious, lustful, and revengeful; and, on account of the mischievous nature, were to be taken and destroyed. For in these things the false teachers resembled wild beasts, and not in reviling laws and magistrates; unless we suppose the apostle means, that in so doing they were actuated, like wild beasts, by the impulses of their passions. See Jude, ver. 10. note.

13 And causes of reproach. Jude, R. J. in this translation I have followed Justin, because the οἰκείως, which signifies a reproach, is here put for a cause of reproach.

2. Living in riot. This word properly signifies (deficient) to live in sensuous pleasure, especially that of eating and drinking carried to excess.

3. By their own deceits, when they feast with you.-Τοποθητοῦσιν. They plant them (in sensuous) pleasures. The primitive Christians were used to feast together before they celebrated the last supper. The Lord's supper, because it was instituted by Christ after he had eaten the passover with his disciples, see 1 Cor. vii. 11. note 1. These previous suppers were called, Jude, ver. 13.

οἰκείως, love feasts, because the rich, by feasting their poor brethren expressed their love to them; see Jude, ver. 12. note 2. On these occasions the false teachers and their disciples were guilty of much lewdness. For, as is mentioned in the next verse, they affronted themselves by looking lasciviously on the married women, whom they had defrauded, without being afraid of God or men, and they left men's households in order that they might hang out with the sensual palm of the sensual, sensual men, who have no fixed principles of virtue, making them believe the Lord's supper was instituted to promote carnal love. Besides being lewd, they are excessively covetous: They are heirs of the curse which Christ will pronounce on the wicked.

15 Having forsaken the straight path of virtue, these teachers have wandered, following in the crooked path of Balaam the son of Beor, who loved the hire of unrighteousness, promised him by Balaam to such a degree, that he resolved to curse the Israelites whether God gave him permission to do so or not.

2. The son of Beor. -He is called by Moses the son of Beor; and his city was Peor. Numb. xxii. 32. But either Balaam's father had two names, or, as Althuswth and Lightfoot conjecture, the apostle adopts the Chaldaic orthography, in which letters are often changed, as in this name 6ηε is changed to 6ηεν. 2. Who loved the hire of unrighteousness. When Balaam was first sent for to curse the Israelites, Balaam, it is said, had obtained permission by the rewards of divination in their hand, ver. 7.; and, therefore, when God forbade him to go, he easily consented to go, ver. 16. Balaam was permitted to go without further opposition; doubtless because he had at that time had none of his wicked projects, and was determined to do nothing but by God's order. Nevertheless, his love of the hire still continuing, he again resumed his wicked projects, and endeavored, by repeated sacrifices and enchantments, to obtain permission to curse the people, that he might obtain the hire, chap. xxix. 1. And when these were ineffectual, though he so far obeyed God that he blessed the Israelites, it was no dictate of his heart, but a suggestion of the Spirit of God, who hearkened to him, to stop his movement, and return to his parents. He left them, and the Lord's Berak. Balaam, being so far obeyed, became so far influenced by God that, on the hire of the curse, he cursed the Israelites, not distinctly of his own heart, but by that of God, because so far as he was influenced by God, he was influenced to do the will of God. The Lord's Son, because it was intended by the curse of God on the Israelites, he counseled Balak to mistrust them to formulation and fidelity, by means of the Midianitish women.
II. PETER.

16. But he received a rebuke for his own transgression, (καταγγελίας) the dumb beast, speaking in man's language, forbade the madness of the prophet. 17. These teachers are wells without water; clouds driven by a tempest, (τὰ κατακλύζοντα) for whom the blackness of darkness is reserved for ever:

18. (Acts 28.) Because, speaking great swelling words of false doctrine, they allure by the lusts of the flesh, even by lasciviousness, those who have actually fled away from them who are living in error.

19. They promise them liberty, (λατρείας) themselves being slaves of corruption. (See on ch. i. 4, note 3.) For by what a man is overcome, by that also he is enslaved.

20. (Acts 28.) Now, if, having fled away from the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, being again entangled in these they are overcome, the last state of them is worse than the first.

21. (Acts 28.) Therefore it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, having known it, to turn away from the holy commandment delivered to them by the apostles of the Lord and Saviour, chap. iii. 2.

Numb. xxii. 16. Rev. ii. 14. Now, in giving that advice Balaam acted most unrighteously, as he did it in contradiction to the will of God's purpose concerning the Israelites, which irrevocably Numb. xxii. 16. He therefore gave the advice, not in the persuasion that it would be effectual, but merely to gain the promised hire, which therefore is called 'the hire of unrighteousness.' In speaking, Balaam, from that miracle at least, ought to have understood that the whole of the whole Balaam's whole prophetic was a rebuke from God of his foolish project. But the thoughts of the riches and honours promised him by Balak so occupied his mind, that nothing of that sort occurred to him till the angel showed himself, and reproved him for his perverted insinuations. That Balaam's speech should have spoken on this occasion cannot be thought incredible. 'God opened her mouth,' that is, made such a change in her nature as fixed her in committing such execrable and execrable speech, and, either by her own operation, or by the operation of an angel, directed the speech to utter what she said. There is therefore no necessity to suppose, either that the speech was formed in a few moments with reason, or that the particulars relating to her were presented to Balaam's imagination in a dream, as Haimondes believed, or that, according to the system of the metaphysicians, she was animated by a human soul. The whole transaction, on the supposition that it was miraculous, is rational and consistent.

2. The madness of the prophet.—The apostle terms Balaam's resolution to curse the Israelites without the divine permission madness, because it could have no effect but to bring the curse of God upon himself. Though Balaam is termed a soothsayer, Josh. xii. 6, and said to have used enchantments, Numb. xxiv. 1, Peter clearly calls him a prophet, as account of God's speaking to him, giving him a very remarkable prophecy, recorded Numb. xxiv. 15. However, being a very bad man, he may often have feigned communications with the Deity, to draw money from the multitude. Perhaps the only communications he ever had with God were on this occasion; and they may have been granted to him, that by uttering them in the name of God, he might be known to the multitude. See Numb. xxiv. 15. Ver. 17.—Wells without water; clouds driven by a tempest,—There being few wells and little rain in the eastern countries, it was a grievous disappointment to a thirsty traveller to come to a well that had no water. The husbandman was equally disappointed to see the clouds which gave him the prospect of rain, but ending in a tempest, instead of refreshing, destroyed the fruits of the earth. By these comparisons, the ostentation, hypocrisy, levity, and presumptuousness of the false teachers, are set forth in the strongest colours. See Jude 12 note 5, 6.

3. Fled away from them who are living in error.—The word κατανικήσας is rightly construed with κατασκοπεῖτε, them who are living, because it governs the accusative. See ver. 19. And a very considerable difference is to be observed between the terms κατανικήσας and κατανικήσας, the former being used of them who have once sinned, but the latter of those who are inconstant, or those who continue in sin, even when once they have been enticed from death to be made alive. Just. Inst. Sb. i. 16. 3. It was one of the stotoral parables, that the wise man is the only free man, and that all wicked men are slaves. This maxim the apostle adopts and supports in its sound sense, by unanswerable argument; namely, that the man who is conquered by his lusts hath no freedom left him, but must, as a slave, obey all their dictates. Hence our Lord said to the Jew, who boasted of their freedom, John viii. 34. 'Whoever committed sin is in the slave of sin.' Of the slavery in which every wicked man lives, St. Paul hath given a lively picture, Rom. vi. 19—30. Ver. 20. The pollutions of the world.—What these are, Peter hath described in 1 Epist. iv. 3. The word ἁγιασμοι, in the language of the ancient physicians, signified the infection of the plague. It is here used to denote sin in general; but more especially the sin of lasciviousness, on account of its infectious nature and its productive consequences. Ver. 21.—Better for them not to have known the way of righteousness,—because their sin would have been less, and their punishment lighter. If a man abandons himself to the pollution which he hath once walked in, he sins knowingly and wilfully. This our Lord declared to be worthy of many stripes—See Heb. vi. 6. 5. 25., where the dangerous nature of the sin of apostasy is described. See also James iv. 17.

The holy commandment delivered to them.—Bishop Sherlock understands this of some directions drawn up by the apostles, and delivered to the Christians, concerning their conduct with respect to the false teachers of that age. But I rather understand it of the commandment delivered by the apostles in their epistles, concerning the moral conduct of Christians in general. — See what is meant in scripture by delivering, tradition, &c. Col. ii. 6. note.
II. PETER.

22. But the saying of the true proverb hath happened to them: The dog is turned again to his own vomit; and the washed sow to wallowing in the mire.

Ver. 22. The dog is turned again to his own vomit. — As applied by the apostle this proverb signifies, that although the persons spoken of had at their baptism promised to renounce their wicked practices, and perhaps had begun to do so, yet, as the corruptions of their nature still remained, they returned to their former actions, with more greediness than ever. Blackwell says this proverb, "with great propriety and strength, marks out the sensuality and odious manners of wretches enslaved to sensual appetites and carnal lusts; and the extreme difficulty of reforming vicious and irreverent habits." Secr. Censure, vol. ii. p. 52.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries in this Chapter.

The apostle informed the brethren, that his design in writing both his epistles, was to bring to their remembrance the doctrines and precepts delivered by the prophets and apostles; because it was the most effectual method of preserving them from being seduced by false teachers, ver. 1. — Wherefore, as one of the greatest of these men’s errors was, their denying the coming of Christ to judge the world and destroy this mundane system, he desired the brethren to recollect what the holy prophets anciently had spoken, together with the commandments of the apostles of Christ to their disciples, to prepare for and to expect these events, ver. 2. — But lest they might think Christ was to come to judgment immediately, he told them they were to know this, that in the last age of the world scoffers will arise in the church itself, who, though they may pretend to believe the revelations of God, (see ver. 5.) will be infidels at heart, ver. 3. — and who, because Christ’s coming was so long delayed, will ridicule the promise of his coming as a mere fable, and from the permanency of the mundane system, without any alteration since the beginning, will argue that there is no probability of its being ever destroyed, ver. 4. — But to shew the fallacy of these reasons, the apostle observed, that such atheistical Christians are wilfully ignorant of Moses’s doctrine concerning the making of the heavens and the earth of water, and concerning the earth’s subsisting by water through the power of the word of God, ver. 5. — and concerning the destruction of the old world by the same word of God, through his overflowing it with water, ver. 6. — Wherefore, the world having been once destroyed, as well as made, by the word of God, there is a possibility that it may be destroyed by him a second time. This conclusion following clearly from the Mosaic history, the apostle did not think it necessary to mention it. But to shew the certainty of the destruction of the mundane system, he assured the brethren, and all mankind, that the world is no more to be destroyed by water but by fire; being defended from dugs, and kept safely to be destroyed by fire at the day of judgment, ver. 7. — This argument being founded on experience, was unanswerable.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III. — I. Beloved, this second epistle I now write to you, in which I epistles I stir up your sincere mind (e, 163.) to remembrance;

2. To recollect (ver 8.) the words before spoken by the holy prophets, (chap. i. 12. 19.), and the commandment of us the apostles

CHAP. III. — I. Beloved, this second epistle I now write to you, in which two epistles my design is to stir up your sincere mind to the practice of every virtue, by bringing to your remembrance some things which ye know;

2. Even to recollect the predictions before spoken by the holy prophets, Enoch (Jude, ver. 14. 15.), David (Psalm 1. 1—6. 1xxxv. 8.), and Daniel (zix. 2.), concerning the power and coming of Christ

Ver. 1—1. In which. — Ver 3. Because the antecedent second epistle, implies that Peter had written a first, he puts the relative in the plural, to shew that he speaks of both his epistles.

2. Your sincere mind — Eiraxvov. The apostle calls their mind sincere, to signify that he believed they had a real love of truth and goodness.
of the Lord and Saviour. (See ver. 11, 12.)

3 Knowing this first, that scoffers will come in the last of the days, walking after their own lusts.

4 And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? For from the time of the greatest, the fathers have fallen asleep, all things continue as at the beginning of the creation.

5 (1 Thess. 5.) But this wilfully escapes them, that the heavens were ancienly, and the earth (Eccl. 1:11) through water created, and the earth exists by the word of God.

6 (2 Pet. 3:10, 11.) By whom the heavens were in former times flooded with water perished.

Ver. 3.—1. Scoffers will come in the last of the days. When the apostle wrote this passage, there were Epicureans and others among the Gentiles, and Marcionites, who ridiculed the promises of the gospel concerning the resurrection of the dead, the general judgment, the destruction of the earth, and a future state of reward and punishment. Wherefore, seeing the scoffers of whom Peter speaks here would have fallen asleep, all things continue as at the beginning of the creation of the world, it is probable that they were to arise in the church itself. Accordingly they are reproved, ver. 5. For being wilfully ignorant of the Mosaic history of creation and of the deluge. And Jude, ver. 18, says the scoffers separated themselves from amongst them, and were not sanctified, and had not the spirit, though they pretended to be inspired. The evil of scoffing at the doctrines and promises of the gospel may be learned (1 Pet. 1:21), where scoffing at religion is represented as the highest stage of impiety. The prediction of the apostles shows that they come by the permission of God, who, no doubt, will bring good out of that evil.

2. The heavens were in former times flooded with water and perished. This is different from vev'ay eysa in Gen. 6:5, 'famine times,' and from evay eysa, 2 Tim. iii. 1, 'latter times.' See the note on that verse. It is different likewise from 'vev'ay eysa in 1 Pet. i. 10, 'in the last of the times.' Perhaps it means the last part of the days of the world, the duration.

3. Walking after their own lusts. Here the apostle has laid open the source of sinfulness, and of men's scoffing at religion. As Beza says, 'They may protest to religion, but they are governed by sense and appetite; and they take refuge in infidelity, and scoff at religion, to make themselves easy in their vices.'

Ver. 4. Where is the promise of his coming? For from the time of the greatest, the fathers have fallen asleep, all things continue as in the beginning of the creation. This seems to be the promise of the coming of the Lord. The promises of the ages are the expectations of the saints. The sense of the word is, After this, there was a second coming of Christ; and then he will reward every man according to his works. See also John xiv. 1. This promise was given by the angel of our Lord's ascension, Acts i. 11. This same Jesus, who is taken from you into heaven, will come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. By representing Christ's promised coming as a delusion, the scoffers set themselves and others free from all fear of future judgment, and render the righteous the hope of reward.

5. But this wilfully escapes them, that the heavens were anciently, and the earth through water created, and the earth exists by the word of God. The apostle's meaning is, That the scoffers, who, from the stability of all the parts of the universe, argue against the creation and destruction of the earth, that, according to Moses, the heavens, and the earth were made of water, and through water the earth subsisted, and all by the word of God. See John i. 3.

6. By whom the heaven was created, being overthrown with water, perished; although he was two thousand years old.

Chap. III.

1. to judgment: also the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour, to prepare for that event, which we delivered to you as his commandments.

2. But that your faith in the prophetic word may not be shaken, you are to know this first of all, that scoffers will come in the last part of the days of the world, walking after their own lusts.

4. And saying, where is his promised coming to raise the dead, and to destroy the earth? For from the time of the death of the first race of men, all the parts of the mundane system continue as they were at their first creation. Christ's coming, therefore, is a delusion.

5. But this wilfully escapes the scoffers, who, from the stability of all the parts of the universe, argue against the creation and destruction of the earth. If the heavens were anciently, and the earth made of water, and through water the earth subsisted, and all by the word of God. See John i. 3.

6. By whom the heaven was created, being overthrown with water, perished; although he was two thousand years old.
chap. iii.

7 But (is no guem) the present heavens and the earth, by the same word, are treasured up, being kept for fire (2) against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men. (See Whitby's note on this verse.)

8 But this one thing, let it not escape you, beloved, that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

9 The Lord who hath promised, doth not delay in the manner some account denying: but he exercises long-suffering towards us, not desiring that any should perish; but that all should come to repentance.

his Word, just as in chap. iii. 1, the phrase, this second epistle, is above referred to in chap. iii. 17, where this second epistle is properly spoken of, by the relative he in the plural.

12 drowneth with water, perished;—that is, lost its primitive constitution and form, by which means, and by the alteration made in its atmosphere, it became a tabulation [a healthy and fruitful], and less pleasant than formerly; it may be gathered from the shortening of the life of man after the flood, and the present appearance of the earth, which is the subject of our text.

ver. 7—1. By the same word].—The common reading here is not so. The word 'by' is not a good sense by. Our translators have followed the leading reading of the Alexandrian and some other MSS., and of the Vulgate, 'and by the same word,' which is supported by the MSS. 2. as the same word, by the same word. See Mill.

13 Here the apostle hath in his eyes God's oath to Noah, 'not to destroy the earth any more by a flood.' Gen. xi. 11: also his declaration, Gen. viii. 20, that while the earth remained, seed-time and harvest, &c., should not cease. Wherefore, the earth is not always to remain; but it is not to be destroyed by a deluge. It is kept from floods, to be destroyed by fire.

1. Against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men.]

—In reference to Hammond and other critics as to whether we understand this prophecy as a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, it will be proper here to inform the reader, that in support of their interpretation they appeal to the ancient Jewish prophecies, where, as they contend, the revolutions in the political state of empires and nations are foretold in the same forms of expression with those introduced in Peter's prophecy. The following are the prophecies to which they appeal. (1) 2 Kings xiii. 4, where the destruction of Jerusalem is foretold under the figures of dissolving the host of heaven, and of rolling the heavens together as a scroll, and of the falling down of all their host as the leaf falleth from the tree. (2) Ezek. xxii. 7, where the destruction of Egypt is described by the figures of dissolving the heavens and shaking the earth, and by the falling down to the earth of the stars of the morning. (3) The second coming of the Jewish nation is thus predicted: 'I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth; blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.'—Amos vii. 13. (4) 'The Jews is introduced saying, 'In that day will I cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day,' &c. But in ezek. ii, the overthrow of Judaism and heathenism is thus foretold. 'Yea once and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea and the dry land.'—Lk. xxi. 31. The Lord, in his prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, has the following expressions. Matt. xxiv. 29. After the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. Now it is remarkable, that in these prophecies none of the prophets have spoken, as Peter has done, of the entire destruction of this mundane system, nor of the destruction of any part thereof. They mention only the 'rolling of the heavens as a scroll,' the 'shaking of the earth, and of the stars of the morning, or the sun,' whereas Peter speaks of the utter destruction of all the parts of this mundane system befriended by fire. This difference affords room for believing, that the events foretold by the prophets are different in their nature from those foretold by the apostle; and that they are to be figuratively interpreted, while Peter speaks of the literal destruction of the same.

shall pass away with a great noise, and 13 Nevertheless, according to his promise, we expect new heavens and a new ground are given to various other events; and therefore Hammond, Lightfoot, and of the apostle of the destruction of Jerusalem, because he calls the event of which he speaks the day of the Lord; build their opinion on a very weak foundation. See ver. 6, note 1, and ver. 7, note 3, and Whetstone's preface to this epistle, toward the end.

2. — calling the atmosphere of air which surrounds this earth the heavens, the apostle followed Moses, Gen. 1. 6.

3. Shall pass away. — The passing away of the heavens and earth, do not mean that it will be removed to another part of space, or that they will be annihilated; but that, being burnt, their form and substance will be changed, as the constitution or form of old things was by the flood.

3. The word translated in the context of 2 Pet. 3:5-6, “heavens” from παρθένον, shew, and states, and describes any local noise, such as that occasioned by the rattling of chariots, the blowing of a storm, &c. Accordingly Eusebius translates it, ‘in stormy weather, with a storm;’ the thundering noise occasioned by the burning of the whole heavens or atmosphere, as understood in ver. 10. It will be terrible beyond description, may be conjectured by considering what a noise is made by the destruction of the most illustrious bodies that are in heaven, to the thunderers, or which are set in combination in a storm.

3. And the elements burning (πυρισθεν) shall be dissolved.

4. The word translated, signifies the first principles or constituent parts of any thing. Hence it denotes the principles of science (Heb. 11. 12) as well as the principles of body. It signifies, in the sense of the apostle, those parts upon which the constitution of the body is founded; also the Mosaic form of religion, Gal. iv. 3, 9.; and the heavenly worship. Col. 1. 18, note 3. — Word of elements here understood is the planets, because he thinks it improper to say that fire, which is itself an element, is to be burnt. In support of his opinion he gives some examples, in which the word denotes the planets, and as it comes from παρθένον, to cast or, in order, as soldiers do, he thinks it may have been given to the planets on account of their regular courses. But as the destruction occasioned by the flood was that of the earth and air only, it is probable that the destruction of the heavens and earth by fire, which is set in opposition to it, will be of the earth and air only. Elements, by the elements, understands the elements are still the same, but the atmosphere of the heavens of which a globe is composed. But as the meaning of these is mentioned ver. 12. I am of opinion that in this verse that air which is composed of the earth, water, the sulphurous vapour of the clouds, and whatever else floats in the air, together with the air itself immediately, will be burnt and separated.

5. The works thereof shall be utterly burned. — A system of worlds; for, chap. 1. 19, 20. — So πε πώς, evidently signifies upon, not in the holy mountains. We are not certain from this expression, whether the whole earth only are to be consumed in the conflagration, or whether the conflagration will penetrate to the centre of the globe, and reduce the whole to one homogeneous mass of burning matter. — See a description of the order in which the conflagration will proceed, 2 Thess. 1. 8, note 1. — Or, not in the holy mountains. — For the difference between the earth and the heavens, see the note on ver. 10.

6. Nevertheless, according to his promise, // we expect new heavens and a new earth. And such commentaries as were formerly observed, contend, that the description which St. Peter hath given of the conflagration, is to be understood of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish polity. But the propriety of that interpretation, whether the words upon the earth only are to be consumed in the conflagration, or whether the conflagration will penetrate to the centre of the globe, and reduce the whole to one homogeneous mass of burning matter, is, that it is not the surface of the earth, with all that is on it, which is to be burnt, but some have imagined, but the whole globe of the earth.

7. Some commentators, as was formerly observed, contend, that the description which St. Peter hath given of the conflagration, is to be understood of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish polity. But the propriety of that interpretation, whether the words upon the earth only are to be consumed in the conflagration, or whether the conflagration will penetrate to the centre of the globe, and reduce the whole to one homogeneous mass of burning matter, is, that it is not the surface of the earth, with all that is on it, which is to be burnt, but some have imagined, but the whole globe of the earth.

8. And this all things, — In other words, if.

9. The apostle, in describing the destruction of the heavens and earth by fire, means this earth only with its atmosphere, as in the description of the destruction of the old world by water, he meant only the destruction of the then earth and air. I now add, that in all probability Moses in his history describes the creation of our planetary system only; for, though, Gen. 1. 18, he says, "And God spake, and the lights of the firmament were made," the work was, found in the latter clause, are not in the original. Taylor therefore thinks the translation should be, ‘the lesser light to rule the night, with the stars;’ that is, with the stars, they having been made long before; for it is the opinion of many, that the stars are much more ancient than the earth, and shall remain after it is destroyed.

10. What more have we followed Catul-
14 Wherefore, beloved, expecting these things, diligently endeavour to be found of him spistles and irreproachable, in peace.

everlasting preparata and consummation of the creature, i.e. the existence of the new heavens and the new earth, and the happiness that shall be after the destruction of the present heavens and the earth, where there shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor any more adverse thing; and by representing the animals in this new world, as entirely stripped of all their natures and qualities, and living in peace with one another, he hath taught us, that in the new creation there shall be nothing to hurt or to offend. This creation of the new heavens and the new earth, our apostle, in his sermon to the Jews, hath called the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, Acts iii. 21. 4

5 See Esa. x. sect. 6, towards the end. 5

So that this is the view of the former note 6 explained what the new heavens and the new earth are, it may be proper to observe, that the communications which the apostle made to the church of the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem by the new heavens and new earth, understand the peaceful state in which the Christians were to live after the destruction of Jerusalem. But to overturn that interpretation it needs only to be observed, that there was no such alteration in the state of the disciples after the destruction of Jerusalem, as is meant to be called a new heavens and a new earth; for they were as much persecuted as ever, for near three hundred years, till Constantine embraced the gospel. Others, by the new heavens and the new earth, understand that the world that will never have an end, and the Millennium, which is supposed to take place before the general judgment. But to confute this opinion I observe, 1. That our Lord himself hath expressly told us, that his disciples are not to be received into the place for beseach other for they are to live as around that he came again: 7—2. That the Millennium of St. John is a state peculiar to the martyrs who have suffered death for Christ; whereas the ‘new heavens and the new earth, as Whitley observes, are the common expectation of all Christians, who are therefore admonished, ver. 14, to ‘endeavour earnestly to be found of Christ spistles and irreproachable, in peace.’—3. That the apostle, speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, by the new heavens and the new earth, by a confusion, represents it, ver. 7, as contemporary with ‘the day of judgment and destruction of Jerusalem;’ and that he speaks of the destruction of the wicked as to happen at the end of the world: Matt. xxv. 39. ‘So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth and shall separate the wicked from among the just, and cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.’ Ver. 1, 7, 13. ‘And ye shall be hated of all men for my name’s sake; but he that endureth unto the end shall be saved. Ver. 10. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to everlasting damnation.’—4. That there is no expression of the destruction of Jerusalem by the new heavens and the new earth, and the happiness that shall be after the destruction of the present heavens and the earth, which is spoken of in the New Testament, ‘there are some more matters hard to be understood.’ It is true the Alexandrians, and others oth-
II. PETER.

WHEREAS the morals of men are corrupted, and as bring destruction upon themselves. See Chap. i. View. also Chap. ii. View.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, for-knowing these things, be on your guard; lest being corrupted with others (verse, Eph. iv. 14.), by the deceit of the lawless, ye fall from your own steadfastness.

18 But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him as glory both now and (verse) unto the day of eternity. Amen.

[son to the torture, to make him confess some crime laid to his charge, or reveal some secret which he knows. Applied to writings, it signifies, by separate criticisms and unconnected sentences of words, to make a passage speak a meaning different from what the author intended: hence in our language we have the expression, to torture words. Of this vice they are most commonly guilty, who, from pride of understanding, will receive nothing but what they can explain; whereas the humble and teachable receive the declarations of revelation according to their plain, grammatical, and constrained meaning, which is it their only care to attain by reading the scriptures frequently, and with attention.

7. As they also do the other scriptures. [Here Peter expressly acknowledges the divine inspiration by which Paul wrote all his epistles: for, as far as Paul was inspired, his writing could not have been called scriptures by any inspired apostle. The affection with which Peter, on this occasion, speaks of Paul, and the honorable testimonies which he bore to his writings, deserves great praise. He had been formerly rebuked by Paul before the brethren at Antioch, for refusing to keep company with the Gentiles conversant. But whatever remonstrances he might have entertained of that affect not at the beginning, he had long ago laid it aside; and on cool reflection, it is probable, that, instead of thinking ill of Paul, he now admired him for his bold and steady maintaining of the truth.

Ver. 17. For knowing these things, be on your guard. [Here St. Peter teaches, that one great purpose for which the prophets were inspired to forestall the corruptions which were to arise in the church, and the evils which were to beset the sincere disciples of Christ, was to put them on their guard against these corruptions, and to arm them with firmness to bear persecution.

18. But, instead of becoming unstable, grow ye in grace daily, and in the knowledge of the doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory ascribed by us disciples, both now and until the day of eternity. Amen.

I. JOHN.

PREFACE.

Sect. 1.—The History of John the Apostle.

John, the writer of this epistle, and of the gospel which bears his name, was the son of Zebedee, a fisher, who had a boat and net and hired servants, Mark i. 20, and followed his occupation on the Sea of Galilee.—From Matt. xxviii. 55, compared with Mark xiv. 40, it appears that the name of Zebedee's wife was Salome; for, in the former of those passages, she is called 'the mother of Zebedee's children,' who in the latter is named Salome.—Zebedee had another son whose name was James, and who seems to have been elder than John. Both of them were fishermen like their father, and assisted him in his business till they were called to follow Jesus.—They seem all to have lived in one family in the town of Bethsaida, which being situated near the Sea of Galilee, was a convenient station for fishermen.

Because the mother of Zebedee's children is mentioned among the women who followed Jesus from Galilee to the last passover, ministering to him, as related Matt. xxvii. 56. Lardner conjectures, that Zebedee was then dead, and that the two brothers lived in separate houses. For when our Lord, upon the cross, recommended his mother to John, it is said, John xix. 27. 'From that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.' Perhaps John and his mother Salome lived together.—Theophylact was of opinion that John's mother was related to our Lord: and Lardner, whom I have generally followed in giving John's history, supposes that that relation encouraged her to ask the two chief places in Christ's kingdom for her sons; and that it was the occasion of our Lord's committing the care of his mother to John. But there is no evidence in scripture of Zebedee's children being related to our Lord by their mother.

John had not the advantage of a learned education; for we are told, Acts iv. 13, that the council perceived Peter and John were unlearned men. Nevertheless, like the generality of the Jewish common people of that age, they may have been well acquainted with the scriptures, having often heard them read in the synagogues. And as, with the rest of their countrymen, they expected the coming of the Messiah about that time, they lent a willing ear to the Baptist, when he published that Messiah was actually come, though the people did not know him, John i. 26. Afterward, when the Baptist pointed out Jesus to his disciples, ver. 29. 'as the lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world,' he said to them, ver. 33. 'I know him not to be Messiah, but he who sent me to baptize with water, the same said to me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he who baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.' 34. And I saw and bare record, that this is the Son of God.' If the sons of Zebedee were of the number of those to whom John testified that Jesus was the Son of God, we may believe they attached themselves early to him, and were among those who are called his disciples, and to whom he manifested his glory at the marriage in Cana, by turning water into wine, John ii. 11.

After the miracle in Cana, the sons of Zebedee seem to have followed their ordinary occupation, till Jesus called them to attend on him constantly, as mentioned Matt. iv. For the evangelist having related the calling of Peter and Andrew, adds, ver. 21. 'And going on from thence, he saw other two brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them, and they immediately left the ship and their father, and followed him; namely, when he went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the good news of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people.'

Some time after this, Jesus chose twelve of his disciples to be with him always, that they might be eye and ear-witnesses of all he said and did, and be qualified to testify the same to the world; and, in particular, qualified to bear witness to his resurrection from the dead. These chosen persons Jesus named apostles; and the sons of Zebedee being of that number, he supposed them Boanerges, or sons of thunder, to mark the courage with which they would afterwards preach him to the world, as Christ the Son of God. How well James fulfilled his Master's prediction, may be known from his being put to death by Herod Agrippa, not long after our Lord's ascension, on account of his boldly testifying of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead; so that he became the first martyr among the apostles. Cave, in his life of James, says, the sons of Zebedee had the surname of Boanerges given them, on account of the impetuosity of their tempers. And it must be acknowledged, that they showed too much anger in their proposal to have the Samaritans destroyed by fire from heaven, because they refused to receive Jesus, as he was going up to Jerusalem to worship: Luke ix. 54. 'Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elijah did?'

But although James and John showed improper zeal on the occasion mentioned, they were highly esteemed by their Master for their other good qualities; as appears from this, that all the apostles, they only, with Peter, were admitted by him to be the witnesses of the resurrection of Jairus' daughter, and of our Lord's transfiguration, and of his agony in the garden. John more especially was so much beloved of Jesus, that he was called the disciple whom he loved. His benevolent disposition John manifested in this his first epistle, by the frequency and earnestness with which he recommended mutual love to the disciples of Christ. With benevolence, John joined great fortitude and constancy in his attachment to his Master: For he only of the twelve attended him during his crucifixion, and saw the blood and water issue from his side, when the soldier pierced it with a spear; and, I doubt not, was present when his body was laid in the sepulchre, and saw the sepulchre closed with a stone. He, with Peter, ran to the sepulchre, when Mary Magdalene brought word that the Lord's body was taken away. He was present also when Jesus showed himself to his apostles, on the evening of the day of his resurrection; and on the eighth day thereafter. He, with his brother James, was present when Jesus showed himself to his disciples at the Sea of Tiberius; and to the five hundred on the mountain in Galilee, mentioned Matt. xviii. 16. Moreover, he was present with the rest of the apostles, when our Lord ascended into heaven from the mount of Olives. So that, with the greatest propriety and truth, he could begin his first epistle with saying, 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen, &c. we declare unto you,' referring to his gospel, in which he hath narrated the crucifixion, miracles, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the living Word; his appearances to his disciples after his resurrection; and, last of all, his ascension into heaven. To conclude, John was one of the one hundred and twenty upon whom the Holy Ghost descended, on the day of Pentecost which immediately followed our Lord's ascension.

After the effusion of the Holy Spirit, John displayed the greatest boldness in maintaining his Master's cause, when with Peter he was brought before the council, and was strictly charged not to teach in the name of Jesus. For, on that occasion, he made the noble answer recorded Acts iv. 19. 'Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you rather than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have heard and known.'

We are told, Acts viii. 14. that 'when the apostles who were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they went to them Peter and John, that they might receive the Holy Ghost.' It seems none could confer that gift but apostles.

From Gal. ii. 9. it appears that John was present at the council of Jerusalem, which met a. d. 49 or 50 to determine the great question agitated in the church of Antioch, namely, whether it was necessary to the salvation of the believing Gentiles, that they should be circumcised.—And if, as is probable, John had his ordinary residence in Jerusalem till that time, he had his share in working the many signs and wonders, which are said to have been done by the hands of the apostles, Acts ii. 43. iv. 33. v. 12.

We are told, Rev. i. 9. that John was banished to the Isle of Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus. In that island he was favoured with the visions, which he hath recorded in his book of the Revelation.

The foregoing particulars concerning John, are all mentioned in the New Testament. The fathers in their writings add, that John lived to a great age; that he spent the latter part of his life mostly at Ephesus, the metropolis of the province of Asia; that the Roman emperor Domitian banished him to Patmos about the year 95; consequently after the destruction of Jerusalem. But Grotius and Sir Isaac Newton place John's banishment to Patmos, the former in the reign of Claudius, the latter in the reign of Nero; consequently before the destruction of Jerusalem. And in support of their opinion they allege some testimonies of later writers, together with other particulars. But Lardner, Can. vol. i. p. 359—377, hath shewed, that these things are insufficient for establishing the early date of John's banishment. He therefore adheres to the common opinion, that John was banished to Patmos by Domitian's edict for prosecuting the Christians, published in the latter part of his reign, A. D. 95. Domitian died September 18, A. D. 96, and was succeeded by Nerva, in the first year of whose reign, if not sooner, John being released, returned to Ephesus, where, according to the annalists, he died in the third year of the emperor Trajan, answering to a. D. 100. Or, as Jerome explains it, he died in the 68th year after our Lord's passion; which was the third of Trajan. Wherefore, if Lamps's opinion is well founded, that John was born in the same year with his Master, he must have been an hundred years old when he died.

The time of John's leaving Judea is unknown. But as in Luke's history of Paul's travels John is not mentioned, and no salutation is sent to him in any of the epistles which Paul wrote from Rome to the churches of Asia, nor in his epistles to the Ephesians, nor in the epistles which in the latter part of his life he wrote to Timothy in Ephesus, it is reasonable to think that John was not at Ephesus while Paul was alive. I therefore am of their opinion who suppose, that John remained in Judea, from the time of the council of Jerusalem, till he saw Jerusalem encompassed with armies, and observed the other signs of its approaching destruction foretold by his Master; that he then fled into Asia, and coming at length to Ephesus, he fixed his ordinary residence in that city, and abode there till his death, as all the ancient Christian writers testify. Because none of these writers say our Lord's mother went with John into Asia, Cave, Lassarre, and Lardner, conjecture that she died before John left Judea.
PREFACE TO I. JOHN.

The other particulars, said by the ancients to have happened to John after he settled at Ephesus, it is needless to mention; as some of them are not sufficiently attested, and others of them are embellished with circumstances evidently fabulous. Yet, if the reader is desirous to know what ancient authors have reported concerning our apostle after he went into Asia, he will find the passages of their writings, in which these things are mentioned, quoted by Lardner, Canon, vol. i. beginning at page 349.

Sect. II.—Of the Authenticity of the First Epistle of John.

The authenticity of any ancient writing is established, first, by the testimony of contemporary, and of succeeding authors, whose works have come down to us; and who speak of that writing, as known to be the work of the person whose name it bears. Secondly, by the suitableness of the things contained in such a writing, to the character and circumstances of its supposed author; and by the similarity of its style to the style of the other acknowledged writings of that author. The former of these proofs is called the external evidence of the authenticity of a writing; the latter, its internal evidence. Where these two kinds of evidences are found accompanying any writing, they render its genuineness indubitable.

The external evidence of the authenticity of John’s first epistle shall be laid before the reader in the preface to the second epistle, sect. i. by shewing that the earliest and best Christian writers have all, with one consent, and without any hesitation, ascribed the first epistle to him. And their testimony is confirmed by this circumstance, that the Syrac translator who omitted the second epistle of Peter, the second and third epistles of John, and the epistle of Jude, because some doubts were entertained concerning them in the first age, or perhaps because they had not come to his knowledge, hath translated John’s first epistle as an apostolical writing of which there never was any doubt.

In this preface, therefore, we shall state the internal evidence of the authenticity of the first epistle ascribed to John, by shewing, first, in respect of its matter, and secondly, in respect of its style, that the same is perfectly suitable to the character and circumstances of its supposed author. In respect of the matter or subject of the epistle under consideration, the writer of it hath discovered himself to be John the apostle, by introducing a number of sentiments and expressions found in the gospel, which all Christians from the beginning have acknowledged to be the work of John the apostle.

Sect. II.

From the above comparison of the first epistle of John with his gospel, there appears such an exact agreement of sentiment in the two writings, that no reader who is capable of discerning what is peculiar in an author's turn of thinking, can entertain the least doubt of their being the productions of one and the same writer. Further, since John hath not mentioned his own name in his gospel, the want of his name in the epistle is no proof that it was not written by him; but rather a presumption that it is his, especially as he hath sufficiently discovered himself to be an apostle, by affirming, in the beginning of the epistle, that he was an eye and ear-witness of the things which he hath written concerning the living Word.

2. The style of this epistle, being the same with the style of the gospel of John, is that by which he marks his authorship. In his gospel, John doth not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing, but to strengthen his affirmation, he denies its contrary. In like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary. See John i. 20, iii. 35, v. 24, vi. 22. The same manner of expressing things strongly, is found in the epistle. For example, ch. ii. 4. 'He who saith, I have known him, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.'—Ver. 27. 'The same unction teacheth you concerning all things, and is truth, and is no lie.'—Chap. iv. 2. 'Every spirit which confesseth Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is from God.' And every spirit which doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God.'

In his gospel likewise, John, to express things emphatically, frequently uses the demonstrative pronoun οὗτος. Chap. i. 19, οὗτος, 'This is the testimony.'—iii. 19, οὗτος, 'This is the condemnation, that light.' &c.—vi. 22, οὗτος, 'This is the work of God.'—ver. 40. οὗτος, 'This is the will of him.'—ver. 50. οὗτος, 'This is the bread which came down from heaven.'—xvii. 3, οὗτος, 'This is the eternal life.' In the epistle, the same emphatic manner of expression is found, chap. i. 5, ii. 25. 'This is the promise.'—iii. 23, οὗτος, 'This is his commandment.'—v. 3, οὗτος, 'This is the love of God.'—ver. 4. 'This is the victory.'—ver. 6. οὗτος, 'This is he who came by water.'—ver. 14. 'This is the boldness which we have with him.'

Such is the internal evidence on which all Christians from the beginning have received the first epistle of John, as really written by him, and of divine authority, although his name is not mentioned in the inscription, nor in any part of the epistle.

Sect. III.—Of the State of the Christian Church at the time John wrote his First Epistle; and of his design in writing it.

The apostle John, having lived to see great corruptions, both in doctrine and practice, introduced into the church, by many who professed themselves the disciples of Christ, employed the last years of his life in opposing these corruptions. For he wrote his three epistles, to establish the truths concerning the person and offices of Christ, and to condemn the errors then prevailing contrary to these truths. Also to repress the lawful practices, for the sake of which these errors were embraced. Besides, he considered that his testimony to the truths concerning the person and offices of Christ, together with his direct condemnation of the opposite errors published to the world, in his inspired writings, would be of singular use in preserving the faithful from being seduced by the false teachers and other corruptions of Christianity, who in future ages might arise and trouble the church. See the Preface to James, sect. i.

The heretical teachers who infested the church in the first age, finding Messiah called in the Jewish scripture, God, and the Son of God, thought it impossible that he could be made flesh. In this sentiment, these teachers followed the Jewish chief priests, elders, and scribes, who being assembled in full council, unanimously condemned Jesus as a blasphemer, because being a man, he called himself Christ the Son of the blessed God. See 1 John v. 5. note. Upon this decision, one class of the ancient false teachers founded their error concerning the person of Christ. For, while they acknowledged his divinity, they denied his humanity; that is, the reality of his appearing in the flesh, (see 1 John v. 5, v. 1.); and contended, that his body was only a body in appearance, that he neither suffered nor died, and that he did none of the things related of him in the gospel. He seemed indeed to do these things, which, in their opinion, was a sufficient foundation for the evangelists to relate them as done by him. But their reality, as matters of fact, they absolutely denied. More particularly, having affirmed that he died only in appearance, they denied his having made a propitiation for the sins of the world by his death, chap. ii. 2. They likewise denied, that he arose from the dead and ascended into heaven. In short, according to them, the things ascribed to Jesus in the gospels were altogether imaginary. This was the opinion of Basilides, and of all the heretics in the first age to whom the fathers have given the name of Docetae, or Phanumiatice; but who by the apostle John are more emphatically called Antichristis, chap. iv. 3. because they were opposers of Christ as come in the flesh. By pretending that Christ suffered death only in appearance, the Docetists endeavoured to avoid the ignominy of the crucifixion of their Master, and to free themselves from that obligation to suffer for their religion, which was laid on them both by Christ's precept and example.

On the other hand, the Cerinthians and Ebionites adopted a doctrine concerning the Christ, which, though contrary to that just now described, was equally erroneous. They acknowledged the reality of the things written in the gospels concerning Jesus: But like many in modern times, who admit nothing as true which they are not able to comprehend, they denied that Jesus was the Christ or Son of God, chap. ii. 22. because they could not reconcile the things which happened to him with their ideas of the Son of God. This class of heretics were said by the fathers, οxab τον λογαριαστήν, to dissolve Jesus. See chap. iv. 3. note. For they affirmed that Christ entered into Jesus at his baptism in the form of a dove, but flew away from him before his passion.—B. Horsley, in Lect. 14. to Dr. Priestley, saith, "The Cerinthians held, that Christ being restored to Jesus after his resurrection, it rendered the man Jesus an object of divine honours." They believed, it secures, that Jesus was originally and essentially a man; and that whatever divinity he possessed was adventitious, consequently was separable from him. The former sort of false teachers having denied the humanity, and the latter the divinity of our Lord, the apostle John, to confirm all the disciples in the belief of the truth concerning the person and offices of Christ, wrote this his first epistle, in which he expressly asserted that 'Jesus Christ is the Son of God,' chap. i. 1. 3. 7. iv. 15. and that he came in the flesh. See chap. iv. 3. note.

Here let it be observed, that the opinions of the Docetists, on the one hand, and of the Cerinthians on the other, concerning the person and offices of Christ, make it probable that the apostles taught, and that the first Christians believed Christ to be both God and man. For if the Docetists had not been taught the divinity of Christ, they had no temptation to deny his humanity. And if the Cerinthians had not been taught the humanity of Christ, they would have been under no necessity of denying his divinity. But fancying it impossible that both parts of the apostle's doctrine concerning the Christ could be true, the one class of heretics, to maintain his divinity, thought themselves obliged to deny his humanity: and the other, to maintain his humanity, supposed it necessary to deny his divinity,—To this argument, by which it is rendered probable that the apostles taught, and the first Christians believed, Jesus Christ to be both God and man, the Socinians perhaps will reply, that the members of the church of Jerusalem being called Ebionites by the ancients, is a proof, not only that the church of Jerusalem held the opinion of Ebion concerning the mere humanity of Christ, but that the apostles who planted and instructed that church held the same opinion: because it is natural to suppose, that the faith of the teachers and of the disciples on this article was the same, consequently that the apostles themselves were Unitarians. Nevertheless, from the account which Origen hath given of the brethren of the church of Jerusalem, who tells us we were called Ebionites by the ancients, it appears that this name, as applied to the Hebrew Christians, by no means leads to these conclusions. For in his second book against Celsus, sect. 1. in answer to the Jew, who alleged that the Jewish Christians, being deceived by Christ, had forsaken the laws and institutions of their fathers, and gone over to a different name and manner of living, Origen affirmed, "That they had not forsaken the law of their fathers, but lived according to it, being named from the poorness of the law; (he means, named Ebionites); for a poor person is called by the Jews Edon. Hence, those of the Jews who received Jesus are called Ebionites." The Jewish believers, therefore, according to Origen, were called Ebionites, not because they held the opinion of Ebion concerning the mere humanity of Christ, but because they adhered to the law of Moses, and expected only the poor temporal rewards which were promised in that law; whereas, the proper Ebionites were those who had a low opinion of the person of Christ. So Eusebius informs us, E. H. lib. iii. c. 27. "The ancients called them Ebionites, who entertained a poor and low notion of Christ; for they thought him only ἄρσε ποιῶν ἀνθρώπου a simple and common man." Farther, admitting that the argument taken from the appellation of Ebionites, which was given by the ancients to the members of the church of Jerusalem, was well founded, it would not prove that all, or even the greatest part of them, held the doctrine of the mere humanity of Christ. For comprehending the whole body of the Hebrew Christians under the appellation of Ebionites, Origen himself acknowledged in the third section of the same second book, that he wrote incorrectly, since he there distinguishes the Hebrew Christians into three sects, one of which, he tells us, discarded the law entirely; consequently they were not Ebionites, but orthodox Christians. The same distinction Jerome hath made in his commentary on Isaiah xi. 1, 2, 3, where he speaks of Hebrews believing in Christ, and, as a class of people distinct from them, mentions Nazarenes, who observed the law, but despised the traditions of the Pharisees, thought highly of Paul, and held the doctrine of our Lord's divinity. See also his Comment. on Isaiah viii. 14—21. More than this, although it was granted, for argument's sake, that the brethren of the church of Jerusalem generally believed the doctrine of Christ's mere humanity, it will not prove that the apostles by whom they were instructed were of the same opinion, unless we think the Hebrew Christians could not be entered by false teachers to forsake their first faith. This, it is presumed, no one will affirm who recollects that the Lucardenses are an example of a whole church declining from its first faith, even in the days of the apostles, Rev. iii. 14—16. Lastly, in this question it is of importance to know, that the doctrine of the proper Ebionites concerning the mere humanity of Christ was deemed here-
Sect. IV. PREFACE TO I. JOHN.

7 It is clear that our Lord had good reason to say of the Nicolaities, Rev. ii. 6, that, "he hated their deeds," and also their doctrine," ver. 15.

The licentious doctrines and abominable practices of the Nicolaities, being adapted to the corrupt inclinations of the wicked, were eagerly embraced by many in the latter part of the apostle John's days. He therefore judged it necessary, in this epistle, to condemn these doctrines and practices in the plainest and strongest terms. See chap. i. 8–10. ii. 1–3. iii. 4.—For a more particular account of the Nicolaity, taken from Moehl, see Preface to the Colossians, sect. 2, paragraph 3, from the end.

Sect. IV.—Of the Time when, and the Place where, John wrote his First Epistle.

Groutius, Hammond, Whitby, and Benson think John wrote his first epistle before the destruction of Jerusalem. Benson fixes it to A. D. 68, answering to the 14th year of the emperor Nero, not long before the destruction of Jerusalem. This opinion he founds on chap. ii. 18. where the apostle says,

Young children, it is the last hour, by which Benson understands the last hour of the duration of the Jewish church and state. But Lampe, who supposed this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, thought the apostle might say 'it is the last hour,' not only before, but after Jerusalem was destroyed.—Wall, in his note on these words, after mentioning that Groitus and Hammond interpreted them of the time immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, which happened a. d. 69, adds, “Nor are St. John's words like those of any one who was foretelling that event, but rather of one who was speaking of the present state of the Christian religion.”—The commentators who suppose this epistle was written before Jerusalem was destroyed, appeal likewise, in support of their opinion, to chap. ii. 13. ‘Fathers, I write to you, because ye have known him from the beginning.’ For this, they think, could be said only to persons who had been and conversed with Christ; of which description there might be many alive at the time Jerusalem was destroyed.

Other commentators assign a much later date to this epistle.—Mill and Le Clerc place it A. D. 91 or 92.—Basnage a. d. 98.—Beaunebray and L'Enfant in the end of the first century, when John was very old; on which account they think he called himself, in his second and third epistles, The Elders.—Dr. Pin was of the same opinion.—Whiston thought this and the other two epistles were written a. d. 81 or 82.—Lampe places the first epistle after the Jewish war was ended, and before the apostle's exile into Patmos.—Lardner also places it after the Jewish war, a. d. 80, or later.

My opinion is, that John wrote his first epistle before the destruction of Jerusalem.—1. Because the expression, ‘it is the last hour,’ may more naturally be understood of the last hour of the duration of the Jewish state, than of any later period; especially since the apostle adds, 'and as ye have heard that the antichrist cometh, so now there are many antichrists; whence we know that it is the last hour,' plainly alluding to our Lord's prediction concerning the false teachers who were to arise before the destruction of Jerusalem.—2. The expression, 'Ye have known him from the beginning,' applies better to the disciples, immediately before Jerusalem was destroyed, than to the few who may have been alive at the late date assigned to this epistle; for, thirty-five years after our Lord's ascension, when Jerusalem was destroyed, there may have been many living who had seen and conversed with him during his ministry on earth; whereas, in the year 98, or even in 95, there could not be many alive who were of that description.

In proof, however, of the late date of John's first epistle, it is alleged, that the heretics, who are said by the ancient fathers to have propagated the errors and practised the vices condemned in it, did not arise till after the destruction of Jerusalem. But though it were true that Basilides, Cerinthus, and the rest, who are mentioned by the fathers as holding the errors and following the vicious practices condemned in this epistle, did not arise till after Jerusalem was destroyed, the errors and vices for which they were infamous, certainly existed in the church before that catastrophe. For James speaks of them as prevalent in his time. See the preface to his epistle, sect. 4. And John represents the false teachers, whom he terms anti-christs, as the very persons who were foretold by Christ to arise before Jerusalem was overthrown, 1 John ii. 18. I am therefore of opinion, that Basilides, and the rest, were mentioned by the fathers, not because they were the authors of the heresies ascribed to them, but because they propagated them with great industry and success.

As we do not know the precise time when, neither do we know, with any certainty, the place where, John wrote his first epistle. Groitus thought it was written in Patmos, during the apostle's exile there, which place he places before the destruction of Jerusalem. But if it was written before that event, which I think is the truth, it is more reasonable to suppose, that it was penned in Judea about the time the apostle observed the encompassing of Jerusalem with armies, and the other signs of its approaching destruction foretold by his Master, which led him to conclude that the last hour of the Jewish state was come, and to write this letter, to prevent the Christians in Judea from being seduced by the false Christs and false teachers, who, according to our Lord's prediction, had arisen. If I am right in this conjecture, the persons addressed in the second chapter, under the denomination of little children, young men, and fathers, were the Christians of different standings in the church, who were living in Judea and the neighbouring countries at that time, for whose salvation the apostle had the most anxious concern; especially as he speaks of the persons he calls fathers as having seen Christ. However, they were not the only persons for whom this epistle was intended. It was written for the benefit of Christians in general, to preserve them in the truth, and to prevent them from following the vicious practices of the false teachers, who had then arisen, or who might afterward arise. But of these things more in the following section, where the opinions, both of the ancients and moderns, concerning the persons to whom John's first epistle was written, shall be explained.

In this question it is of some importance to observe, that if John wrote his first epistle in Judea, about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and delivered it to the Christians living in that country, as I suppose he did, it will account for its being universally received as his, in the first age, notwithstanding it appeared without any inscription, and did not bear his name in any part of it. For, as he lived among the people for whom it was more immediately intended, and delivered it to some of them personally, they must all have known it to be his. Besides, after he settled at Ephesus, he had frequent opportunities, during his long sojourn, to acknowledge that epistle as his in the presence of persons who inquired concerning its authenticity, and who no doubt reported his acknowledgment to others. Thus, the testimony of the brethren in Judea, to whom this epistle was originally delivered, joined with the apostle's own acknowledgment, published in Asia by the Christians there, could not fail to establish its authenticity, in such a manner as to occasion its being universally received as his, both by the church and the apostle's successors. But the second and third epistles of John being written in the latter part of his life, he did not survive long enough to establish their authenticity universally by his own acknowledgment. Besides, being written to private individuals, we may suppose they remained some time concealed in their possession, and did not come abroad, so as to occasion much inquiry concerning them, whilst the apostle was alive. This, I suppose, was the reason that the second and third epistles of John were doubted of by many in the early ages; whilst the first was received universally as his, immediately on its publication.

Sect. V. — Of the Persons for Whose Use the First Epistle of John was written.

Lardner, Can. vol. iii. p. 273. saith of this epistle, "As the writer does not at the beginning prefix his name, nor anywhere else mention it in the epistle; so neither does he describe or characterize the persons to whom he writes, by the name of their city or country, or any such thing."

Augustine, Cassiodorus, and Bede inform us, that the first epistle of John was anciently called The Epistle to the Parthians, as if it had been written to the Jewish believers in the country of Parthia; which Eustius saith lay between the Tigris and the Indies. For in that country, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xxiii. c. 12, there were many Jews, of whom it is probable some were converted to Christianity; for Luke, speaking of the Jews who came to Jerusalem to worship at the feast of Pentecost which immediately followed our Lord's ascension, and who heard the apostles preach after the Holy Ghost had fallen on them, mentions, first of all, Parthians.

Eustius, following the tradition preserved by Augustine, was of opinion, that as Peter wrote his epistle to the strangers of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, so John wrote his first epistle to the strangers of the dispersion in Parthia and the neighbouring countries; and to persons of all ages in these countries, as he himself testifieth, chap. ii. 13, 14, 18, because he had a concern for the salvation of all. Whiston, in his commentary on John's epistles, saith, "None of these three epistles of St. John were written to the Parthians, as some later Latin writers have supposed, but rather to the Christians or churches of Asia near Ephesus. This opinion he supports, 'by the perfect silence of all true antiquity as to St. John's ever preaching in Parthia; and from the account which we have in Eusebius from Origen, that Parthia was St. Thomas's province, and Asia St. John's; as also from the account in the Recognitions, ix. 29, that Thomas really preached the gospel in Parthia, without a syllable of St. John there to assist. All which,' says he, 'makes it plain, that this pretended direction of any of St. John's epistles to the Parthians, stands on no good authority at all. And it is not improbable that the occasion of this error was barely a false reading in some ancient manuscript, where άπεξαγωγή to the Parthians, was read for άπεξαγωγή to the virgins, which latter inscription might easily be applied to the first epistle; for as it is chiefly addressed to young Christians, yet uncorrupted both as to fleshly and to spiritual formations, such as in St. John's revelations are called άπεξαγωγή to the virgins; so was the second epistle anciently affirmed by some to be written to the virgins; as we learn from Clement of Alexandria in Cassetorius, that is, as Lardner observes, from Clement's Adumbrations on the Catholic Epistles, translated by order of Cassiodorus. But, as L'Enfant has remarked, there is nothing in the second epistle which suits virgins more than other Christians. Oecumenius, in his comment upon the last verse of this epistle, says it was written to the whole church in general. And in the proem to his commentary upon the second epistle, he calls the first a catholic epistle, and says, 'That epistle is not written to a certain person, nor to the churches of one or more places, as the blessed Peter's to the Jews in their dispersion; nor as James before him to the twelve tribes of the Jewish people; but he writes to all the faithful in general, whether assembled together or not: for which reason there is no inscription to that epistle, as there is to the other two. 'To me, therefore,' said Lardner, 'it seems, that this epistle was designed for the churches of Asia under St. John's inspection, and for all other Christians into whose hands it should come.' Lunce says, 'We easily admit that Jewish believers are specially regarded in this epistle. Nevertheless we think, that St. John directed it to all believers of his time in general; forasmuch as there appears not in it any expression of limitation.'—Nevertheless, chap. ii. 2. 'He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but even for those of the whole world,' seems to intimate, that this epistle was intended chiefly, though not exclusively, for the Jewish believers in Judea and the neighbouring countries. To this opinion Oecumenius likewise inclines; for in his note on chap. ii. 2. he thus writes, "This John said, either because he wrote to Jews, and intended to show that the benefit of repentance was not restricted to them, but extended to Gentiles also; or else that the promise was not made to the men of that time only, but likewise to all in future times.'

CHAPTER I.

It is remarkable, that the apostle begins this epistle with a confusion of those corrupt teachers, whom he afterwards calls Antichrist, but who were named by the ancient fathers Doceta, because, as was observed, Pref. sect. 3. they affirmed, that Christ had not come in the flesh, and that the things which were related concerning him by the evangelists, were not really done and suffered by him, but were transacted in appearance only: For he assures us, that the evangelists and apostles testified to the world nothing concerning the life of the Word in the flesh, but what they had heard with their ears, and seen with their eyes, and handled with their hands; founding their attestation on the evidence of their own senses, ver. 1. — So that the apostles, who accompanied the Word during his abode on earth, bare witness to his life in the flesh, as it was plainly manifested to their senses, ver. 2. — and that they declared these incontestable facts to the world, that all who received them might have fellowship with the apostles, through their believing the truth. This, he told them, would be a great honour to them, because the apostle's fellowship was with the Father of the universe, and with his Son Jesus Christ, ver. 3. — John mentioned the honouredness of being in the fellowship of the Father and of his Son Jesus, because the heathens boasted to the believing Jews and Gentiles of the honour which they derived from their fellowship in the Eleusinian and other mysteries. But these were far inferior to the Christian fellowship in this respect, that the heathen gods, the supposed heads of the heathen fellowships, were mere non-entities, 1 Cor. viii. 4.; or, if any of them were real beings, they had no power in the affairs of the world;
whereas the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ, the head of the Christian fellowship, governed the whole affairs of the universe without control. These things, concerning the heads of the Christian fellowship, the apostle told them he wrote, that their joy in being members of such an honourable and powerfully protected fellowship might be complete, ver. 4. Further, that the believing Jews and Gentiles might know the advantages also which they enjoyed in the Christian fellowship, he told them, This is the message which we apostles have received from Christ, and which we declare to you, the initiated into our fellowship, That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all: He is goodness and truth, without any mixture of evil or error. Wherefore, the discoveries made in the gospel, to the initiated into the Christian fellowship, concerning the nature and perfections of God were very different from any and superior to, the boasted discoveries made to the initiated in the heathen mysteries, who were made to believe that their gods practised every sort of vice, and that their votaries worshipped them acceptably by imitating in their vices, ver. 5. To show that the character and manners of the initiated into the fellowship of God, were of a very different nature from those of the initiated into the heathen fellowships, the apostle declared, that if any one pretended to be a member of the fellowship of God, who lived in wickedness, he lied, and was no member of the fellowship of God, who is infinitely holy, and admits none but the holy into his fellowship, ver. 6. In the mean time, to encourage the disciples of Christ to imitate the head of their fellowship, in his moral perfections, the apostle assured them, That if they walked in holiness as God is holy, they would certainly have fellowship with God, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son would procure them pardon for all such sins as they might fall into, not presumptuously, but through human infirmity. Such is the nature of the Christian fellowship, and such its unanswerable advantages, ver. 7.

To his account of the motives offered in the gospel, to the members of the fellowship of God to live in holiness after the example of God, the apostle subjoined an express condemnation of the corrupt doctrine of the Nicolaitans, described Pref. sect. 3. toward the close. For he declared, That whatsoever man he hath no sin to be cleansed from, deceiveth himself, and the true Christian doctrine is not in him, ver. 8. He therefore advised every one to confess his sins to God, who, agreeably to his promise published in the gospel, and to his own righteousness, will cleanse penitent sinners from all pollution and punishment of all their sins, ver. 9. Further, he declared, If any one affirmeth that he hath no sin to be cleansed from, he strives to make God a lie; who, as the apostle observes in the beginning of the next chapter, hath sent his Son to be a propitiation for the sins of the world, ver. 10.

NEW TRANSLATION.

Chap. 1.—1 That which was from the beginning,1 which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have contem- plated,2 and our hands have handled,3 concerning the living Word,4 was the Father,5 and was manifested to us.

Vers. 1.—1 That which was from the beginning—As the apostle is here describing, not the Word simply, but the living Word, the Son of God made flesh, he doth not say, ἐν οἴνοις, in the beginning, as John 1:1, but ἐν οἴνοις, from the beginning, a phrase used in other passages to denote the beginning of the gospel. See John xvii. 27. Acts xix. 4. John 1:6. 2 John 3:6. 3 John 1:4. "That which was from the beginning, which the apostle hath heard and saw, and contempleted, and handled, was the life of the Word in the flesh, together with his doing all things celestial, the things of which he was the creator and sustainer. Now, here, in his baptism, his passion, his resurrection, his ascension, his manifestation in the wilderness, his preaching, his miracles, his transfiguration, his ascension in the garden, his trial and condemnation by the Jewish council, his death on the cross, his resurrection from the dead. Also the eye-witnesses conversing with him, and handling his body after his resurrection, his eating and drinking with them at different times, and his ascending into heaven in a shining cloud, while they looked on." 2. Which we have seen with our eyes, which we have contemplated.—The expression ἐπεστράφη, which we have seen, is different from ἐπεστράφης. For the latter, as distinguished from the former, denotes the apostle beholding attentively, and considering at leisure, the life of the Word in the flesh; his words, his actions, his sufferings, and all the other particulars by which he manifested the reality of his life in the flesh. To mark this difference in the expressions, I have translated ἐπεστράφης, which we have contemplated. 3. And our hands have handled.—In this John attempts to explain Christ's words to his disciples, when he appeared to them after his resurrection, Luke xxiv. 39. "Handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as thou see me have."—On many other occasions the disciples had an opportunity of handling their Master, and knowing that he had a real body. For example, when he washed their feet; when he took Peter by the hand to prevent him from going to Cæsarea; as he walked on the water; when the disciples gave him the loaves and fish, and when he, after multiplying them, put them into their hands, to be distributed to the multitude. John, in particular, had an opportunity of feeling Christ's body, when he leaned on his breast during the last supper. John xiii. 24. 4. Concerning the living Word.—By ἐν οἴνοις, from the beginning, literally, concerning the word of life. But the expression is an Hebraism, which, as the context sheweth, ought to be translated, concerning the living Word. See Eas. iv. 18.—The sentiment in this clause John hath expressed more fully in chap. i. 14, speaking of the Word, he saith, In him was life, and the life was the light of men. And, ver. 14. The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and we beheld his glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. The discourse which the apostle condenses in this and the following verse, is mentioned 2 Epist. vii. 7. Many deceivers are entered into the world, who do not confess that Jesus Christ is the Son of God: this is Antichrist. See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3. paragr. ii.; also 1 John iv. 3. note 1. In opposition to that pernicious doctrine, which overthrew the gospel entirely, John solemnly affirmed, that what he and his brethren apostles published to the world concerning the real manifestation of the Word or Son of God in the flesh, and concerning his actions and sufferings in the flesh, all actually happened: That having heard him speak, and seen him die, and handled him, both before his death and after his resurrection, they could not be mistaken in believing that he really appeared in the flesh. Ver. 2.—1 The life.—By this expression Benson understands Christ himself, the author of eternal life, chap. v. 11. But as the apostle adds "that they had seen the life of the Word in the flesh," it is not intended to be understood as being in them, as some have supposed, but he means that they had beheld him. 2. Was manifested.—ἐξεστηκεν. This word is applied, not only to our Lord's appearing in the flesh, but to his second appearing at the end of the world. Chap. ii. 28. See note 2. on that verse, and 1 Pet. i. 7. note 2. 3. And declare to you that life which is eternal, which was with the Father, and was manifested to us.—The apostle declares, that eternal life, which was manifested to the apostles, some understand that immortal life of blessedness which was brought to light and promised in the gospel to believers. But as that life is said to have been with the Father, it must mean either the eternal life or existence of the Father himself, or of some other person. Now, since the eternal existence of the Father could not be manifested to the apostles by revelation, which presumes the existence of a person, the life which is eternal must be that which the Word, or Son, possessed with the Father before the world was; and which, was manifested to the apostles at our Lord's baptism and transfiguration, when, by a voice from heaven, God declared him his beloved Son: It was manifested likewise by God's raising Jesus from the dead.—That this ver. 2. is a parenthesis, is evident from the repetition of the words of the first verse in the beginning of the third.
3 That which we have seen and heard we declare to you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and our fellowship (i) truly is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.

4 And these things we write to you, that your joy may be complete.

5 (Kue, 224.) Moreover, this is the message which we have heard from him, and declare to you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.

6 If we say, (i Cor. 600.) Certainly we have sinned.

Ver. 3. - I. That which we have seen and heard. - John has affirmed this in the first verse, he repeats it here, to show that he and his brethren apostles were the persons to whom Christ said, Matt. xix. 16. Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear. Further, because the apostles, by hearing and seeing, had been taught concerning their Master, John tells the elders of the Jews, Acts iv. 23. No one should be surprised that the apostles were called by the Holy Spirit, namely, the doctrine, miracle, resurrection, and ascension of their Master, John writes to his brother with the view of judging his Father, to whom he was to return to judge his brethren also.

2. We declare to you. - As I am of the opinion of those who think that a considerable time has elapsed between the destruction of Jerusalem and the apostles' journeys, I suppose he here alludes to his own gospel, in which he had related the particulars whereby the Word was proved and had been made man.

3. That ye also may have (κοινωνια) fellowship with us. - In order to gain the good will of the Gentiles, the apostles did not maintain any connection or relationship with the world among the pagans, and the apostles, not only to the Jews, but to the heathens also, the Gentiles, and the Thracians, the Romans, and the other nations.

4. And these things we write to you. - Witness also, that your joy may be complete. - The meaning of this is that the joy may be complete, which the apostle spoke of, that in him is no darkness at all, for it is the joy of the Father and of the Son, and of the Spirit. For this reason, John writes the more in the fourth verse, that the joy may be complete. Therefore, the apostle said, (i) [note: insert the correct reference to the verse here], that in him is no darkness at all, and, consequently, he writes to his brother, in order to gain the good will of the Gentiles also, that in him is no darkness at all.
fellowship with him, (see. 211,) although we walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth.

7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin. 3

8 If we say (see ver. 6, note) that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, (see note 3.) so that he can forgive sins to us, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. (See ver. 7, note 3.)

10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make (Ecc. iv. 1.) him a liar, and his word is not in us.

the meaning of which, according to Bengelius, is, If we endeavour to persuade oneself another, for the sin of all sin by his blood. 3

Ver. 7.—But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light,—The apostle doth not say, as he walketh in the light, but he is in the light, to show that God is essentially and perfectly holy.

3 We have fellowship with one another. As the apostle is speaking here, not of the fellowship which Christians have with each other, but with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, fellow- 4 ship (not association) with one another must mean fellowship or intercourse between the head and the members of the community. This fellowship consists in the Father's bestowing blessings on us through the mediation of Christ, and in our receiving these blessings from the Father and the Son with thankfulness. In some MSS., the reading here is o dvav, with him. But it makes no alteration in the sense.

And the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.) —As the apostle in this passage represents our being cleansed from all sin as the effect of our walking in the light, it is evident, that by our being cleansed from all sin, we do not mean our being delivered from the power but from the punishment of sin; a distinction which had been procured by the blood or death of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice. Accordingly, Christ's blood is said, Heb. ix. 14, to cleanse the conscience of sinners from dead works; that is, from those works which always accompany the consciousness of having done works which deserve eternal death. Our actual deliverance, however, from punishment, is not accomplished in the present life; but it is promised in the gospel to all who walk in the light; and that is sufficient. But there is a cleansing from all sin in another sense, which is begun in the present life by the blood of Christ, who, hav-morality. For the apostle, in opposition to that impious doctrine, declared that whoever keepeth God's injunction to obey Christ's precepts, in that man, the love and gratitude which he oweth to God is carried to perfection; and that such a person may thereby know that he is in the fellowship of God, ver. 5. And with respect to fellowship with Christ, the apostle declared, that he who saith he abideth in fellowship with Christ, ought to live in the holy manner in which Christ lived while he was on earth, ver. 6.

Next, the apostle told his disciples, that, in enjoining them to obey Christ's precepts, he wrote no new commandment, but an old commandment given by Moses in the law, who ordered the Israelites to hearken to the prophet whom God was to raise up from among their brethren, like to him, ver. 7. But he wrote a new commandment, when he enjoined them to walk even as Christ walked; because it implied that they were to lay down their lives for one another, (chap. iii. 16), as Christ laid down his life for them, ver. 8. And because some of the Jews, like the initiates in the heathen mysteries, thought themselves enlightened persons, notwithstanding they were void of love to the rest of mankind, and even hated them, the apostle told them, that the person that thought himself enlightened, and yet hated his brother, was still in darkness, notwithstanding he called himself a Christian, ver. 9. But he who loveth his brother, in such a manner as to do him every good office if his power, is in the light; he is a truly enlightened person, and there is nothing in him to occasion his falling into sin, ver. 10. Then, to impress his disciples the more strongly with a sense of the obligation they were laid under by the light to love one another, the apostle repeated the sentiment which he had delivered in ver. 9, that he who hateth his brother is in the darkness of ignorance, and doth not know whither that conduct will lead him, because the darkness of ignorance hath blinded the eyes of his understanding, ver. 11.

Having finished these subjects, John told all the brethren in general, that he was going to write a precept which he knew would be agreeable to them, because their sins were to be forgiven through Christ, ver. 12. Accordingly, first of all addressing such of them as were of long standing in the church, whom on that account he called fathers, he said he would write to them the precept of which he spake, because they had known Christ from the beginning, consequently they would know that what he should write to them was Christ's precept. Then, turning his discourse to those who were in the vigour of the Christian life, whom therefore he termed young children, what he was going to write would, he believed, be approved by them, because they were acquainted with the will of the Father, ver. 13. However, before he wrote the precept of which he spake, he told the fathers, that he had written to them the precept of walking as Christ walked, because they had known Christ from the beginning. The same precept he had written to the young men, because they were strong in the Christian virtues through the doctrine of God abiding in them, and because they had already overcome the wicked one, ver. 14. Having thus roused the attention of the old, the middle-aged, and the young, John told them his precept was, not to be in love with the men and manners of the world, neither with the things which the men of the world pursue; because, if any one loveth the world much, the love of the Father is not in him, ver. 15. Besides, the evil affections towards the things of the world, which subsist in the minds of idolaters and unbelievers, do not proceed from the Father, as wicked men falsely suppose, who on that account fancy they may safely gratify them; but they are raised in them by the things of the world, ver. 16. Further, though wicked men propose to make themselves happy, by the unrestrained enjoyment of the things which are in the world, they delude themselves; for the world, together with the things which it contains, and the lusts which are gratified by these things, passeth away; they are all of a short duration: But he who doth the will of God, by not indulging worldly lusts, shall abide in happiness through all eternity, ver. 17.

At the time John wrote this letter, the Christians in Judea and in the neighbouring countries were greatly harassed by the unbelieving Jews, in the tumults which they excited immediately before their last war with the Romans. Wherefore, to comfort more especially the newly converted under these sufferings, he assured them, that it was the last hour of the duration of the Jewish state; so that the power of their persecutors would soon be broken. And to prove that it was the last hour, he put them in mind that Christ, in his prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, had mentioned the appearance of many false prophets as a sign of the impending ruin. Wherefore, since many false teachers, whom the apostle called antichrists, because they were opposers of Christ, (ver. 22), were then going about deceiving many, they might from that circumstance know it was the last hour of the Jewish commonwealth, ver. 18. These false teachers, the apostle observed, had gone out from them, having been once in the Christian church; but they were not of the number of the teachers who were commissioned and inspired by Christ: for if they had been of that number, they would have remained with the apostles. But they were permitted to depart from the society of the apostles, that they might be known to be impostors who taught false doctrine, ver. 19. However, as many of the disciples had the gift of discerning spirits, and could judge with certainty both of teachers and of their doctrine, there was the less occasion to caution them to beware of these deceivers, ver. 20. The apostle therefore added, I have not written to you because ye know not the truth concerning the life of the Word in the flesh, but because ye know it, and know also that the false teachers affirm an abominable lie, in direct contradiction to the truth, when they said that Christ did not come in the flesh, neither did any of the things related of him, ver. 21. Who then, said he, is the liar or false prophet foretold to arise before the destruction of Jerusalem, but he who denieth that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh? They are antichrists, who deny the Father's testimony that he hath sent his Son in the flesh, and the Son's testimony that he actually came in the flesh, ver. 22. Whosoever denieth Jesus to be the Son of God coming in the flesh, doth not acknowledge the Father's testimony, delivered at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus, ver. 23. Therefore, said the apostle, let the belief of the Father's testimony concerning his Son, which ye have heard from the beginning, abide in you, that ye may abide in the fellowship of the Son and of the Father, and thereby obtain eternal life, ver. 24. For this is the promise which the Son hath made in the Father's name, to them who abide in his fellowship; namely, that they shall obtain eternal life, ver. 25.

In apology for his writing with such earnestness against the teachers who endeavoured to deceive them, he told them he had written these things to them, ver. 26. notwithstanding he knew they possessed the gift of discerning spirits, and had no need that any one should teach them, unless it was to confirm them in the belief of what they were taught by their own gifts. Wherefore, said he, as your own gifts have taught you that those teachers are antichrists, reject their doctrine, and hold fast the truth concerning Christ, ver. 27.—I say little children, by holding the truth concerning the Son, and prevailing holiness, abide in his fellowship, when he appears to judge the world we may have confidence of your being accepted, and may not be put to shame by the errors and vices of our disciples, ver. 28.

—This excellent discourse the apostle concluded by saying to them, If ye have a just idea of the righteousness of God, ye will know that every one who resembles God by working righteousness, is begotten of him; he is a child of God, ver. 29.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II. 1 My little children, these things I write to you, that ye may not sin. (1 John 2:1) If any one hath sinned, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the just one.

2 And he is a propitiation (ver. 280.) for our sins; and not for ours only, but even for those of the whole world.

3 And by this we know that we have known him, if we keep his commandments.

4 He who saith, chap. i. 6, note., I have known him, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in this man.

5 But whosoever keepeth his word, truly this man of God is perfected. By this we know that we are in him.

6 He who saith he abideth in him, ought

Ver. 1.—1. My little children.—The word παῖδις, being the diminutive of τραχύς, is a tender and affectionate appellation, denoting, as Lardner observes, paternal authority, love, and concern, in which the character of an apostle, John might have used in any period of his life; but in this epistle it seems to imply, together with sacerdotal authority, advanced age.

2. These things I write, chap. i. 10, that no man is without sin, it is plain, that he were not sinning, the apostle meant, either their not sinning habitually, or their not sinning willfully. He wrote the things contained in the preceding chapter in order to prevent them from sinning, because the consideration, that God is faithful to forgive our sins, and to cleanse us from them, suggested chap. i. It must have a powerful influence on every good man, to make him solicitous to avoid sin, as far as human infirmity will permit.

3. We have an advocate with the Father.—Some critics observe that παράκλητος, advocate, here answereth to πατριαρχός, patron, among the heathens; but this is a mistake thinks the subject of this appellation may be illustrated by the custom of tribunary states, who were wont to have certain council persons resident in the courts of the princes to whom they were tributaries, who negotiated their affairs, vindicated their rights, and protected their interests with the reigning powers.—Concerning the intercourse of Christ for his people, see Num. viii. 34, note. Matt. xii. 32. Note. 4. Jesus Christ the just one.—This appellation is given to our Lord as the Messiah, in different places of the New Testament, to denote either that he was just or righteous in calling himself the Christ, and the Son of God, (see Janes v. note 1), or that he was absolutely free from sin. It is introduced in this place to make us sensible of the dignity of our advocate, and of the efficacy of his intercession on our behalf, founded on the merit of his death.

Ver. 2.—And he is a propitiation for our sins.—The words ἡ αὐτοκτόνησις, is nowhere found in the New Testament but in this passage and in chap. iv. 10. But it occurs often in the LXX. translation of the Old Testament, where it signifies a sacrifice of atonement. Thus, Lev. vi. 6, 7, Num. v. 8. אׁשׁ לְעָתַיָא לִמְצַמְצִים לִפְנֵי אָנַּה לְעָתַיָא in a ram for a sin offering; and Ezek. xii. 27. עָתַיָא לִמְצַמְצִים is to offer a sin offering.—In considering the death of Christ as a sacrifice for sin, John, like the other apostles, followed his Master, who, in the institution of his supper, directed his disciples to consider it as designed to bring to their remembrance his blood 'shed for many, for the remission of sins.'

And not for our only, but even for those of the whole world.—This circumstance is by the whole world understood, the whole world of the elect. But nowhere else in scripture doth the word signify this applicat. This appellation is given, either to the wicked of the world, (1 John ii. 10, note 1), or to mankind in general, in which latter sense John uses it here, to show that Christ is a propitiation, not for the sins of the Jew only, but also for the sins of all mankind. See Occumtorus's excellent gloss on this verse, Pref. to this Epistle, sect. 5. This phrase, which so often occurs in John's writings, is founded on our Lord's discourse, John xlv. 10, 11, and particularly in chap. v. 20, 21. He who hath commandments and keepeth them, he is he who loveth me; and I John v. 3. 'This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments.' 3. By this we know that we are in him.—To be in Christ, is to be a member of that society, fellowship, or church, of which Christ is the head, and to enjoy all the blessings peculiar to that society; and, in particular, to be the object of Christ's love. See ver. 6, note 1. This is called, chap. i. 3, a having fellowship in the name of Christ, and with his Son Jesus Christ. But this explains the expression doctus, which is one's union with Christ by affection and interest; because the force of love is such, that it is often in each other's thoughts. Some enthusiasts fancy, that he is in Christ means a personal union with him by a mixture of substances: an error which hath led enthusiasts into many extravagances. See ver. 9, note 1.

Ver. 2.—1. He who saith he abideth in him, ought

so as to walk, even as he walked, 1

Brethren, I do not write a new commandment to you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

(1 John 2:18) On the other hand, I write to you a new commandment, which is true (1 John 2:18) concerning him and concerning you.

For the darkness is passing away, and the light which is true now shineth.

He who saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness, and walketh in the darkness, and doth not know whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes, in Christ, is to be the object of Christ's love, and to abide in Christ, is to continue in his love, by keeping his commandments. See chap. iv. 15. note 2. — It seems to be the false teachers boasted of their abiding in Christ, merely through the power of knowledge. But to overturn that pernicious doctrine, our apostle appeals to Christ himself, who, in the words just now quoted, declared the keeping of his commandments to be the sole mark of procuring his rest, and abiding in it. — Though the phrase, abide in Christ, he taken from the symbology of the vine and its branches, mentioned, John x. 16., which are substantially united, it does not signify a personal union with Christ, as was hinted ver. 3. note 3, but that union of sentiment, affection and will, which subsists between him and all his real disciples, the members of his fellowship.

He that walketh in the light, the darkness cannot abide in him. — He that walketh in the light, knows not where he goeth.

He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness, and walketh in the darkness, and doth not know the moral end of such a course of life; for the darkness hath blinded his eyes, the eyes of his understanding.

He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is not in the true light, and hath not the true knowledge of God, because such persons have no love for their brethren, but love one another, as I have loved you.

Ver. 3. — He that saith he is in the light, and walketh not as Christ walked, he is in darkness. — He that walketh as Christ walked, the light is already in him, and his darkness is passing away.

Ver. 4. — He that saith he is in the light, and loveth not his brother, is in darkness. — He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness, and walketh in the darkness, and doth not know the moral end of such a course of life; for the darkness hath blinded his eyes, the eyes of his understanding.
12 Little children, I write to you, because sin is forgiven you (1 John 2, 112) on account of his name. (1 John 4, 51.)

13 Fathers, I write to you, because ye have known him from the beginning. Young men, I write to you, because ye have overcome the wicked one. Young children, I write to you, because ye have known the Father.

14 Fathers, I have written to you, because ye have known him from the beginning. Young men, I write to you, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

15 Love not the world, neither the things which are in the world. If any one love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

16 For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world.

17 Now, the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: But he who doth the will of God, abideth for ever.

18 Little children, I write to you, because ye have known him, the Son of God. If any one love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

19 Children, I write to you, because ye have known the doctrine which ye have learned, and which ye have received of me. And that is the promise which is in him, which is in you, and which ye have received from me, a promise which is indeed from the world, but not of the world.

12 Dear children, I write to you the precept which I shall mention immediately, (ver. 15.), because sin shall be forgiven you on account of Christ at the judgment, if ye repent and forsake your sins.

13 Old Christians, I write to you what follows, ver. 15., because ye have known Christ—his doctrine, and precepts, and manner of life—from the beginning, and must know, that what I am going to write is his precept. Vigorous Christians, I write to you the following precept, because ye have already overcome the wicked one, having resisted his strongest temptations to apostasy. New converts, I write to you the same precept, because, though ye have not seen Christ, ye have known the Father: Ye have known his willingness and power to strengthen you.

14 Old Christians, I have written to you to walk even as Christ walked, ver. 6., by loving your brethren as he loved you, ver. 8., because ye have known him from the beginning. Vigorous Christians, I have written to you in all the Christian virtues through the world of God abiding in you, and ye have already overcome the devil.

15 What I write to you all is this: Do not love the persons and practices of the world; neither the things which are in the world. If any one love the world—if he enters into friendship with idolaters and infidels, and is fond of things which they pursue—the love of the Father is not in him.

16 For whatever evil affection subsists in idolaters and unbelievers, namely, the lust of the flesh after sensual pleasures; and the lust of the eyes after magnificence in houses, equipage, and the pride of life, founded on titles, offices, and riches—is not of the Father, but is of the world. These evil affections are not produced in us by the Father, but by the things of the world exciting them in us.
by the Father, but by the rule of the darkness of this world. The apostle mentions the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, those three inseparable affections of the source of the greatest part of the wickedness which exists among men.

Ver. 15. Young children, as it is the last hour.—necessarily, of the duration of the Jewish church and state. God will soon destroy the Jewish commonwealth; so that the power of your persecutors will speedily be broken. Some, by 'the last hour,' understand the last hour of the world: but that none of the apostles fancied the end of the present invisible system was at hand when they wrote their epistles, see proved in the 3d section of the Preface to 2 Thessalonarians.

2. And as ye have heard, and the antichrist cometh.—The word σουτίς, antichrist, is nowhere found but in John's first and second epistles. It may have two meanings. For, if the proposition were, as σουτίς ἀνυπόκτως, denotes in place of, the same signifies who you put instead of the place of Christ; consequently antichrist is a substitute: but if the proposition denotes opposition, antichrist is one against Christ. The persons to whom this epistle was written, had heard of the coming of antichrist in both senses of the word. For the first sort of antichrists were forsooth by our Lord, Matt. 24. 11. 'Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many.' The second sort were forsooth Matt.
12. 'Many false prophets shall rise, and deceive many.' From which John hath written, vers. 11. of this chapter, and chap. iv. 2 and 2 Epist. vers. 7. I am inclined to think, that by antichrist he means those false prophets or teachers, who were forsooth by our Lord to arise about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and who were so great in number. Some of these denied the humanity of Jesus Christ, others of them denied his divinity: and as both sorts opposed Christ, by denying the coemption of the world through his depth, I suppose it is often called by John the apostle, for an antitype, whereon the scripture speaks the hierophants.

Vers. 20. Ye are not of the world.—The apostle, in the singular number, saith, Paul called the false teachers collectively by the antichrist, in the singular number, but John speaks of these teachers as individuals, he calls them many antichrists, in the plural number.

3. As ye have heard from the beginning abide in ye. If what ye have heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father.

18 Young children, it is the last hour. And as ye have deeded, so now are many antichrists; 2 whom we know that it is the last hour.

19 They went away from us; but they were not of us: for, if they had been of us, they would have abode with us; but they went away, that they might be manifested that they were not of us all.

20 (Kou. 305.) But ye have an unction from the Holy Spirit; (chap. iii. 24.) and know all things.

21 I have not written to you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth.

22 Who is the liar? but he who denieth that Jesus is the Christ! He is the antichrist, who denieth the Father and the Son.

23 Whosoever denieth the Son, doth not acknowledge the Father.

24 Therefore, let what ye have heard from the beginning abide in you. If what ye have heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the fellowship of the Son and of the Father, chap. i. 2.
CHAP. II.

25 (1 John, 20.) For this is the promise which he hath promised to us, even the life which is eternal.

27 (1 John, 21.) Although the unction which ye have received from him (verse 20) abideth in you, and ye have no need that any one should teach you; (verse 20) unless as the same unction teacheth you concerning all things, and is truth, and is no lie. (1 John, 20.) Wherefore, as it hath taught you, (verse 13.) abide in it.

28 (1 John, 20.) Now, therefore, little children, abide in him, that when he shall appear we may have confidence, and may not be put to shame by him at his coming. (See 2 John, verse 8.)

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The apostle, in the last verse of the preceding chapter, having declared that every one who worketh righteousness hath been begotten of God, and is his son, begins this chapter with an explanation, expressive of his high admiration of the love of God in calling those who work righteousness his children, although they are not acknowledged to be such by the men of the world, because wicked men have no just notion of the character of God, ver. 1. Then, to explain the ground of his admiration, he described the dignity and happiness to which the children of God will be raised, at the appearing of Christ to judge the world: They shall be like Christ, because they shall see him as he is, and shall live with him for ever, ver. 2. Now, this being the greatest honour and felicity of which mankind are capable, every one who hath the hope of seeing Christ, and of becoming like him, and of living with him for ever, is careful to purify himself from evil affections and wicked actions, as Christ is pure, that he may be qualified to associate with Christ, ver. 3. This naturally led the apostle to condemn a second time the impious doctrine of the Nicolaitans and Simonians, who affirmed, that every action being free to those who have the knowledge of God, such will not be punished for their actions, however vicious they may have been. See chap. i. 6. note. For, in opposition to these heretics, the apostle declared, that whoever worketh sin shall certainly be punished, because sin being a transgression of the law of God, without doubt God will support the authority of his law by punishing severely the transgressors of it, ver. 4. Besides, that he will punish obdurate sinners: God hath showed, by sending his Son to take away the punishment of sin from those only who repent. For since the Son of God was free from sin himself, he would not die to procure for his disciples a liberty of sinning, ver. 5. From this it follows, that whatever abideth in the fellowship of Christ, and is the object of his love, doth not sin habitually. Whosoever sinneth habitually, though he may have seen Christ in the flesh, hath not seen him in his true character, neither hath known his will, ver. 6. Wherefore, my beloved children, let no teacher deceive you, by affirming that the speculative belief of the gospel will make you righteous in the sight of God. He alone who habitually worketh righteousness, is righteous in the sight of God, and will be accepted with him; even as Christ himself was righteous, by keeping his Father’s commandments, and abode in his love, ver. 7. He who worketh sin, instead of being a child of God, is a child of the devil; for the devil hath sinned from the beginning of the world. Now, the evil nature of sin, and its malevolence to God, may be known from this, that the Son of God was manifested in the flesh to destroy the works of the devil; namely, sin, and all the miseries which flow from sin, ver. 8. Having described the character of the children of the devil, together with the evil nature of their works, the apostle explained the character of the children of God, and taught the faithful how to distinguish them from the children of the devil. Whosoever is begotten of God doth not sin habitually, because God’s seed, the doctrine of the gospel, abideth and operateth in him constantly. Such a person cannot sin habitually, for this very reason, that he is begotten of God, ver. 9. By this sure mark, therefore, the children of God and the children of the devil are distinguished. Whosoever doth not practise righteousness habitually is not begotten of God, neither he who doth not love his brother, so as both to do him good and to abstain from injuring him, ver. 10. And to impress them strongly with a sense of the obligation which lay on them, as the disciples of Christ, thus to love their brethren, John put them in mind, that the message which the apostles brought from Christ, and delivered to them from the very first, was, that they should love one another, ver. 11. And not behave like persons begotten of the wicked one, as Cain was, who slew his brother from envy and hatred, because his own works were evil and his brother’s good, ver. 12. Having this example of the hatred which the wicked bear to the righteous recorded in the scripture, the faithful were not to wonder that the wicked hated them. It hath been the lot of the righteous, from the beginning of the world, to be hated and persecuted of the wicked, ver. 13. And to animate them to bear these evils courageously, he told them, if they loved their brethren, they might know certainly that they had passed from death to life—they were sure of eternal happiness hereafter; whereas the person who loveth not his brother, remaineth under the condemnation of death, ver. 14. Because every one who hateth his brother is a man-slayer, like Cain; and unless he repenteth, he is incapable of eternal life, ver. 15. Further, to prevent them from thinking that the only operation of love is to restrain one from injuring his brother, the apostle told them, that as by this we have known the great love of Christ to us, that he laid down his life for us, we ought to shew our love to our brethren, by laying don down our lives for them when called in providence to do so, ver. 16. "Whosoever, therefore, hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother in necessitous circumstances, and yet doth not give him somewhat to relieve him, such a hard-hearted person hath no love to God, ver. 17.
"For from this consideration, the apostle affectionately exhorted his disciples not to put off their needy brethren with good words only, but to shew the reality of their love to them by relieving their necessities, and even by doing them acts of beneficence, as occasions required, ver. 18."
By such a conduct alone, they would know themselves to be of the fellowship of the true God, and have confidence in his presence as his acceptable worship-ners, ver. 19. But if our own conscience condemneth us, as wanting in love both to God and man, because we refuse to relieve our needy brethren in their distress, certainly God, who is a more perfect and impartial Judge than our conscience, and knoweth all things, will much more condemn us, ver. 20. "Whereas, if our conscience doth not condemn us as deficient in our love to our needy brethren, we may have confidence with God that we are accepted of him, and are the objects of his love, ver. 21.
"And whatever we ask, agreeably to his will, we shall receive; because, by relieving our brethren in their straits, we keep his commandments, and do those things which are pleasing to him, ver. 22. "For this is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of Jesus Christ as his Son, and that we should love one another, as he gave commandment to us by his Son, ver. 23. Now, he who keepeth God's commandments abideth in his fellowship, and God abideth in him, as the principle of his spirual life and strength. And by this we know that God abideth in us, even by the gifts of the Spirit which he hath given us, ver. 24.

2. That we should be called the children of God. —Since God effectually makes us what he calls us, by calling believing his children, he certainly maketh them his children, and entitliththem to all the honours and privileges of his children. The apostle having declared, in the last verse of the preceding chapter, that all who work righteousness are the begotten sons of God, he naturally thought of the great hopes, honours and advantages which belong to the begotten, or true sons of God; but, being dazed with the grandclarities of the power of God's providence, and unable to express them in their whole extent, he cries, out, Behold how great love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the children of God! One particular, however, he mentions in the following verse, which may serve to give us some notion of the felicity of the children of God:
namely, that when Christ shall appear to reward every one accord-

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—Behold how great love the Father hath bestowed on us Jews and Gentiles who work righteousness, chap. ii. 29. that we should be declared the children of God! Those who pretend to be the sons of the heathen gods, are readily acknowledged as such by idolaters. But for this reason the idolators world doth not acknowledge us as the sons of the true God, because it doth not acknowledge him.

2 Beloved, though despised and persecuted by the world, even now we are the children of God. But it doth not yet appear how glorious, both in body and mind, we the children of God shall be.
However, we know, that when Christ shall appear to judge the world, ch. ii. 28., we shall become like him, Phil. iii. 21. for we shall see him as he is, and be for ever with him.

3 And every one who hath this hope of seeing Christ, and of being like him, and of living with him, is careful to purify himself from sin, even as he is pure from sin, that he may be fit to live with him for ever.

Ver. 4. —1. Every one who worketh sin. —Irrasse signifies both how great, and of what kind. Accordingly Estius translates it here Quantumus ofiitum.

tually makes us what he calls us, by calling believing his children, he certainly maketh them his children, and entitliththem to particular, however, he mentions in the following verse, which may serve to give us some notion of the felicity of the children of God:

namely, that when Christ shall appear to reward every one according to his works, the children of God shall be like him.

Ver. 2. —1. We know that (ver. 32.) the subjective for the future) when he shall appear:-I have followed our English translators in supplying the pronom he before the words shall appear, to prevent the reader from taking είσοδον αὐτών improperly, as because hath done, who translates the clause then it shall appear. In this passage the apostle evidently speaks of Christ's appearing to judge the world; for nowhere in scripture is God said to appear so as to be the object of man's sight. John iv. 12. "No one hath seen God at any time." I am therefore of opinion, that the nominative to είσοδον is Κύριος, when Christ shall appear.

2. We shall be like him. —namely, both in body and mind. For, Phil. iii. 21. "He will re-fashion our troubled body in order that it may become like form with his glorious body." And with respect to our mind, we shall be made like him in holiness, by seeing heirs with Christ." —Like him, doth not import equality, but similarity to Christ.

3. For we shall see him as he is. —We shall behold him in the glory which he now enjoyeth with the Father, and shall abide with him through all eternity. For the apostle doth not speak of a transient sight of Christ, but alludes to Christ's words which he hath recorded in his gospel, John xvi. 22. Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me. —That the apostle is speaking of an abiding sight of Christ, is plain, because a transient view would not be a reason for our being like him; whereas, if we are to live for ever with Christ, our bodies must be fashioned like his; since corruptible bodies cannot inherit or enjoy the kingdom of God. And with respect to our minds, the seeing of Christ as he is cannot be supposed effectual for making us like him, unless it is abiding sight, which, by fostering in our minds the exciting us to continued endeavours to become like Christ in his moral excellencies, will assuredly produce that happy effect, by the judgment, the wicked are to have a transient sight of Christ as he is, but they will not thereby be made like his mind.

Ver. 3. —1. Every one who hath this hope of seeing Christ, and of being like him, and of living with him, is careful to purify himself from sin, even as he is pure from sin, that he may be fit to live with him for ever.

4 Every one who committeth sin habitually, committeth also the transgression of law. For sin is the transgression of law.

5 (Kai. 234.) Moreover, ye know that he was manifested that he might take away our sines: And sin is not in him. 1 Moreover ye may know the certainty of sin from this, that the Son of God was manifested, that he might take away both the power and the punishment of our sines.

6 Whosoever abideth in him, (chap. ii. 6, note 1.) doth not sin. 1 Whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither hath known him. 2

Little children, let no one deceive you; He who worketh righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous. (chap. ii. 29.)

8 He who worketh sin (see ver. 4, note 1.) is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.  1 For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, 1 that he might destroy the work of the devil. 1

9 Whosoever hath been begotten of God (chap. ii. 29, note 1.) doth not work sin; 1 because his seed abideth in him: 1 and he cannot sin. 1 because he hath been begotten of God. 1

10 By this the children of God are discovered, and the children of the devil: whosoever worketh not righteousness, is not begotten (from ver. 9.) of God; neither he who loveth not his brother. 1

1. Worketh also the transgression of law.—Arma properly signifies a word of comformity in law, consequently might be translated transgression of law. According to 1 Tim. 1. 9 it is translated in our Bible the transgression.—The apostle’s meaning is, that no one should think lightly of his sins, because every sin, even the least, being a violation of the law of God, if not repented of, will most certainly be punished. The Niceneans and other heretics in the first age, fancying that knowledge sanctified the worst actions, affirmed that no man who possessed knowledge will be punished for any action whatsoever. See Pref. sect. 3. at the end. In opposition to this pernicious doctrine the apostle declared, that as the malignity of sin lieth in being a transgression of the law of God, to maintain the authority of his own government, God will most certainly punish him who worketh the transgression of law; that is, who continueth to transgress his law.

Ver. 5. He was manifested that he might take away our sins.—In the Old Testament, ‘to take away sin,’ signifies to procure the pardon of sin; and in this sense the phrase is used John 1. 29. Behold the Lamb of God, (κατατέλθη τὸ αἷμα του Χριστοῦ,) that taketh away the sin of the world; 3 and let ii. 27. Whosoever hath sinned, (κατατέλθη τὸ αἷμα του Χριστοῦ, liven up) bare our sins in his own body on the tree. See the note on that verse. Now, dear reader, if John seems to offer a more enlarged meaning to the phrase take away our sins, agreeably to the sense of the word, αἴματος, which signifies to lift off a load of any kind with which one is oppressed; evil he inserts the phrase, Its meaning in it appears to be, that Christ was manifested in the flesh, and died, for the purpose of taking away the power as well as punishment of sin. This likewise is the doctrine of Paul, 1 Th. i. 10. ‘God hath delivered us from all iniquity, and purify himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify himself to a peculiar people zealous of good works.’ The same idea of purifying, which men derive from the knowledge of the atonement made for sin by the death of Christ, is here attributed to the Word, to the Word as the Word, and as such, on many other accounts, saith Christ by his death hath taken away our sins; and so, like the other apostles, he hath built the necessity of holiness on the doctrine of the atonement.

2. And sin is not in him.—If so, our likeness to him consisteth in our ceasing from sin.

Ver. 6. 1. Whosoever abideth in him doth not sin.—Here αἴματος signifies that sin hath not sinned habitually; see plan from ver. 9, where it is said by way of application, ‘whosoever is begotten of God (κατατέλθη τὸ αἷμα του Χριστοῦ) doth not work sin;’ doth not continue in the practice of sin. See ver. 4, note 1.

1. Whosoever abideth in him hath not seen him, neither hath known him. 1—probably some of the heretical teachers condemned by the apostle in this epistle, to make their disciples believe that their opinions were derived from Christ, boasted of their having seen and conversed with him during his ministry on earth; consequently that they were the only true disciples of the Saviour. But the apostle assured his children, that if these teachers who so boldly continued in sin, had ever seen or conversed with Christ, they had utterly mistaken both his character and his doctrine.

Ver. 7. 1. Let no one deceive you. 1 This implies that some pretenders to inspiration had endeavoured to deceive the brethren by teaching what the disciples had not taught, and what is not of God. 1 And being a solemn address to John’s disciples, it shows the importance of the matter which I introduced.

2. He who worketh righteousness is righteous. —Ο ἁγιός, see ver. 4, note 1. —The apostle doth not mean, that he which is righteous in the sight of God is necessary that one be perfectly righteous; but that to be accounted righteous by God, we must endeavour to work righteousness habitually. This kind of righteousness, consisting in sincere endeavours followed by a corresponding general practice, brièvilia, with the assistance of the Spirit of God, may be obtained; but it is not a perfect righteousness, otherwise their salvation would not be of Grace, but of debt.

Ver. 8. 1. For the devil sinneth from the beginning,—that is, hath sinned. For as the present tense demotes continuance of action, it implies what is passed of that action as well as what is present. The devil sinneth at the beginning when he entered into the body of a serpent, or assumed the appearance of a serpent, and seduced our first parents to eat the forbidden fruit: and he hath continued to sin ever since, by tempting mankind to sin.

2. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested—See 1 Pet. i. 17, note 1. John ii. 28, note 2. The Son of God was manifested; that is, was made the object of men’s senses by being clothed with flesh. For if he had not been clothed with flesh, he could not have done and suffered what was necessary for destroying the works of the devil.

3. That he might destroy the works of the devil.—Here, demolish that horrible fabric of sin and misery, which the devil with such art, and industry, and malice, hath reared in this our world. From this text some have argued, that all moral and pernicious sin will at length be extinguished from the universe.

Ver. 9. 1. Whosoever is begotten of God doth not work sin.—See ver. 6. note 1. By translating ἀναφέρων ἐν μορφήν doth not work sin, according to the true import of the phrase, we are drawn from this text, to prove the sinless perfection of the saints in the present life, is precluded.

2. Because his seed abideth in him.—The word of God is called—1 Pet. i. 23. ‘the incorruptible seed by which the spirit of immortality is communicated to us.’ This seed is said by John to abide in those who are begotten of God, perhaps in allusion to Psal. cxi. 11. ‘I have laid thy word in my heart, that I am not ashamed there.’ Or by the seed of God the apostle may mean, that principle of faith which is wrought by God in the hearts of believers; and by which they are said, chap. v. 4, to obtain the victory over the world.

3. And he cannot sin, (as he is not habitually;) because he hath been begotten of God.—That is, being begotten of God, (κατατέλθη τὸ αἷμα του Χριστοῦ,) he cannot sin habitually; sin is, from the reason subjoined, ‘because he hath been begotten of God.’ For since the apostle in the beginning of the verse had said, whosoever hath been begotten of God (κατατέλθη τὸ αἷμα του Χριστοῦ) doth not work sin, because his seed abideth in him, it is evident, that when he saith in this clause, ἀναφέρων ἐν μορφήν, he uses the word αἰματος in the sense of αἴματος, so that John did not mean in this verse to say of any of those who have been begotten of God, that he is perfectly good. But the apostle assured his children, that they have been begotten of God, that they never commit single acts of sin, I think no plain from chap. i. 8, where he affirms of them that without repentance, if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth of God is not in us. ‘On verses 8, 9, 10, of this chapter, Justinian and Iulianus founded their doctrine, that a good man may live without sin. But these texts, according to their true meaning, give no constancy to such a doctrine.

Ver. 10. Neither he who believeth not his brother. 1 Although, in the first age, the disciples of Christ called each other beloved, 1 11 For this is the message which ye have heard from the beginning. That we should love one another;

12 Not as Cain was, (see, 219,) who slew his brother. And on account of what did he slay him? Because his own works were wicked, and his brother's righteous. 13 Do not wender, my brethren, (a, 127,) that the world hateth you.

14 We know that we have passed away from death to life, because we love the brethren. 2 He who loveth not his brother, abideth in death.

15 Every one who hateth his brother is a man-slayer: and ye know that no man-slayer hath eternal life abiding in him.

16 By this we have known the love of God, that (among) he laid down his life for us. (a, 206.) therefore we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

17 Whosoever, therefore, hath the goods of this world, and seeth his brother having need, (see, 211,) and yet shutteth up his bowels from him, how abideth the love of God in him!

18 My little children, let us not love in word nor tongue only, but in deed and in truth; for our brethren which have the world do entice us.
I. JOHN.

LET US LOVE THEM IN DEED AND IN TRUTH, BY RELIEVING THEM IN THEIR STRAINS.

19 For by this we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him.

20 But if our heart condemn us, (con. 260.) certainly God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.

21 Beloved, if our heart doth not condemn us, we have confidence with God.

22 And whatsoever we ask receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do the things which are pleasing in his sight.

23 (Kai, 207.) For this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and should love one another, as he gave commandment to us.

24 (Kai, 204.) Now, he who keepeth his commandments abideth in him, and he in him; and by this we know that he abideth in us, even by the Spirit which he hath given to us.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines inculcated in this Chapter.

Because the Gnostics and other heretics, in the first age, to gain the greater credit to their erroneous doctrines, assumed to themselves the character and authority of Christ. (Pref. sect. 3. and 4.) John put his disciples in mind, chap. ii. 27, that they had an unction from the Holy Spirit, by which they were enabled to judge with certainty both of teachers and of their doctrine. He therefore, in this chapter, commanded the disciples in general, not to believe rashly every teacher who pretended to be inspired; and exhorted such of them as were endued with the gift of discerning spirits, to try the inspiration by which any teacher pretended to speak, whether it was from God or from evil spirits, that after trial they might make their real character known to the church, because many false teachers and pretenders to inspiration were gone forth into the world, ver. 1. 20.

However, because a number of the brethren whom these teachers addressed had not themselves the gift of discerning spirits, and perhaps had not an opportunity of consulting any spiritual man that had the apostle, to secure them from being deceived by impostors, desired them in such cases to consider, whether the teacher who came to them pretending to be inspired, held the great and fundamental doctrines, which all the teachers really inspired of God maintained, namely, "That Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh." For if any teacher, calling himself inspired, taught that doctrine, his inspiration might be acknowledged to be from God, ver. 2. — On the other hand, such inspired teachers as did not hold that doctrine, were not inspired of God, but of the devil, and were the anichristi or deceivers foretold by Christ to come before the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 3. Moreover, to encourage such of the disciples as had not the gift of discerning spirits to try every teacher pretending to inspiration by the marks which he had mentioned, the apostle observed, that some of the brethren being rightly instructed of God, had already, by applying these marks properly, detected and confuted certain impostors who had come to them, ver. 4. — who, being worldly men, speak from worldly principles, and were listened to by those wicked men who resembled them in their corrupt maxims and practices, ver. 5. — From this, John took occasion to mention another mark by which the disciples might distinguish teachers really inspired, from those who were not so. We apostles, said he, are proved to be from God by the miracles which we perform. Therefore, every teacher who is instructed of God acknowledges our authority; but the teacher who is not from God rejecteth our authority. By this mark also ye may know what teachers have stood by the inspiration of the Spirit of God, and what by the inspiration of evil spirits, ver. 6.

Having thus taught the brethren how to distinguish the real inspirations of the Spirit of God, both from those which were feigned, and from those which came from evil spirits, the apostle, in an oblique manner, condemned those heretical teachers who made the whole of a Christian's duty to consist in the speculative knowledge of God without any regard to the right practice. For he enjoined mutual love on all Christians, from these considerations, that it deriveth its origin from God, and that every one who loveth his brother, and no one else, hath been begotten of God, and knoweth God, ver. 7. — Withal, that his affirmation might make the deeper impression on his readers, the apostle, according to his manner, denied its contrary: He, said he, who doth not love his brother, whatever he may pretend, doth not know God; for God is love, ver. 8. — and by this manifested his love to us, even by sending his Son, the only begotten, into the world, made flesh, that we might live eternally through him, ver. 9. — Further, the apostle observed that God greatly enhanced his love to men in sending his Son to save them, by this circumstance, that they did not love God first, but he loved them so exceedingly that he gave his Son to die as a propitiation for their sins, ver. 10. — And from this he inferred, that if God so loved them, they ought from love and gratitude to him to love one another, ver. 11. — Next he told them, that although no man hath seen God at any time, because he is not an object of men's senses, yet if we love one another, God really abideth in us by virtue of his nature communicated to us; and by that great blessing, the love which he bears to us is carried to perfection, ver. 12. — Now, because the sending of Christ into the world to die a propitiation for the sins of men, was the greatest evidence of God's love to them, the apostle, to give us the fullest assurance of that fact, appealed to the miraculous gifts of the Spirit.

Commentary.

CHAP. IV. 1 Beloved, do not believe every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they be from God: because many false prophets are gone forth into the world.

2 By this ye know the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth Jesus Christ hath come in the world.

Ver. 1. Beloved, do not believe every spirit, 1 John ii. 26. — Every spirit means every teacher who pretends to be inspired, and to be inspired by the Spirit of God, as is plain from the latter part of this verse, "many false prophets are gone forth into the world." These false prophets are called Antichrist, and in the plural number Anichristi, 1 John ii. 18. See the 22 note on that verse.

4 F
the flesh, is from God. 3 And every spirit that doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God. And this is that spirit of Antichrist which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already. 4 Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them (viz.) because greater is he who is in you, than he who is in the world. 5 They are of the world, therefore they speak from the world, and the world (saws. 45.) hearteneth them. 6 We are of God: who knoweth God, who is the Son, and that he hath given us eternal life.

L. JOHN.

CHAP. IV.

3 And every spirit that doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God. And this is that spirit of Antichrist which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already. 4 Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them (viz.) because greater is he who is in you, than he who is in the world.

Ver. 2. Every spirit that doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God. And this is that spirit of Antichrist which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already.

Ver. 3. And by this other mark ye may know when the Spirit of God is not in a teacher: Every spirit speaking in a teacher which doth not confess Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and hath come in the flesh, is not from God. And this is that spirit which speaketh in the false prophet Antichrist, which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already. 4 Ye are taught of God, little children, and have detected and destroyed these false prophets; because more wise and powerful is God, who is present with you and instructeth you, than the devil, who is present with, and instigateth the false prophets who are now in the world.

5 These false teachers belong to the wicked world, therefore they speak from worldly principles; and the wicked part of the world listeneth to them with pleasure.

6 We apostles belong to God, as is evident from the miraculous works which we have done in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.
harkeneth to us. He who is not of God, harkeneth not to us. By this we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for love is from God. And every one who loveth hath been begotten of God, and knoweth God.

8 He who doth not love, doth not know God: for God is love. (See ver. 16.)

9 By this the love of God (w. 163.) to us was manifested, that God sent forth his Son, the only begotten, into the world, that we might live through him.

10 In this is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent forth his Son to be a propitiation for our sins.

11 Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another.

12 No one hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God abideth in us, and his love (w. 163.) to us is made perfect.

13 By this we know that we abide in him, and he in us, because he hath given us the gifts of his Spirit.

14 Now (ταξινομεῖς) we have beheld and heard.

Ver. 6-1. We are of God. — The apostle having appealed, chap. iii. 24, to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, which God at the first bestowed on the apostles, and still continued with them as proofs of his abiding with them; also, in the beginning of chap. iv. having insisted that the doctrine which they taught whatever it was by the inspiration of the Spirit, he in this verse expressly asserts, that he and his brethren were commissioned by God to teach the world; and that all Christians were bound to acknowledge their authority and receive their doctrine; and that if any teacher did not acknowledge their authority, it was a proof that he did not belong to God.

2. He who knoweth God. — By the great pains which the apostle takes here, and in ver. 7, 8, and chap. iii. 3, 4, to show who the persons are who know God, he proves on the one hand that he and his brethren and other false teachers of the first age in his eye, who, by blinding the whole of Christendom, with the speculative knowledge of God, which they inculcated, encouraged their disciples in all manner of licentiousness.

3. Harkeneth to us. — This mark, by which John directed his disciples to judge of teachers, is not to be understood of their harkening to the apostles personally, but of their receiving their doctrine with that submission which was due to persons inspired by the Spirit of God. Therefore, though the apostles be all dead, yet as they still speak in their divinely inspired writings, John in this passage declares, that their writings are the test by which the disciples of Christ, since the decease of the apostles, are to judge both of teachers and of their doctrine.

Ver. 7. Beloved, let us love one another. — The frequency and earnestness with which the apostle in this epistle inculcated the love of our brethren of mankind, is very remarkable. The greatest part of the present chapter and of chap. iii. is employed in pressing that duty. See also chap. ii. 10. We may therefore believe, that some in early age professed themselves the disciples of Christ, who were deficient in love. Possibly they were Jewish converts, who, by the rite of their law having been cut off from all familiar intercourse with heathens, considered them as unclean persons who were hated of God. And therefore, instead of regarding them with any degree of esteem, they despised and hated them as enemies; and thought themselves warranted by their law in so doing. Thus I think appears from our Lord's words, Matt. v. 13. Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thy enemy. Wherefore it is not improbable, that some of the Jewish converts, retaining their ancient prejudices, considered it as still their duty to hate the heathens. And some of them who pretended to be teachers, no doubt taught their disciples the same lesson; and perhaps extended it to those who did not agree with them in their religious opinions; see chap. iv. 20. But this doctrine being contrary to the doctrine of Christ, John was at great pains to condemn it. Ver. 8. — He who doth not love, doth not know God. — See ver. 6, note 2. The same word of the apostle speaks, to the love of which he speaks, the love of the brother speaks, the love of the neighbour, as is plain from the reason subjoined, God is love. He who doth not love his neighbour with the love of benevolence, doth not know God. He hath no just knowledge of the character of God, whose benevolence extends to all, even to the evil and unthankful, and who in this ought to be imitated by all who know him. bear witness, that the Father hath sent forth his Son to be the Saviour of the world.

15 Whosoever will confess that Jesus is the Son of God,1 God abideth in him, and he in God.2

16 And we have known and believed the love which God hath to us. God is love; (see ver. 8, note 2.) (Kes. 208.) Wherefore he who abideth in love, abideth in God, and God in him. (See ver. 15, note 2.)

17 By this the love is perfected (2Jo, 241.) in us, so that we can have boldness in the day of judgment,1 because as he is, so are we in this world.2

18 Fear is not in love; but perfect love casteth out fear.1 (1Jo, 106.) Wherefore, he who feareth is not perfected in love.

19 We love him, because he first loved us. (See chap. iii. 16.)

20 If any one say, (2Jo, 280.) Certainly I love God, (2Jo, 211.) and yet hate his brother, he is a liar: For he who loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

21 (Kes. 234.) Moreover, this commandment we have from him, That he who loveth God, loveth his brother also.

Ver. 15.—1. Whosoever will confess that Jesus is the Son of God.—For the meaning of this, see ver. 2 note. Some commentators by 'confessing that Jesus is the Son of God,' understand an outward profession of faith in the gospel. But, notwithstanding that profession of one's faith in the first age exposed him to persecution, I hardly think the apostle on that account would say of such a person, that 'God abideth in him, and he in God.' See Rom. x. 16 note 1.

2. God abideth in him, and he in God.—See chap. ii. 6, note 1. The expressions 'God abideth in him, and he in God,' occur often in this epistle, and must be understood differently, according to the characters of the persons to whom they are applied. If spoken of teachers, as in ver. 12, 15 of this chapter, and perhaps in chap. ii. 17, their meaning is, that these teachers are helpful to God in teaching the true doctrines of the gospel, and are sustained and beloved of God; but if spoken of private persons, as in chap. ii. 6, 6, 10, 17, they mean one's abiding in the belief of the doctrines, and in the practice of the precepts of the gospel, and his enjoying the love of God.

Ver. 17.—1. So that we can have boldness in the day of judgment.—The persons of whom the apostle speaks may well have boldness in the day of judgment, because by loving God and their neighbour, being the children of God, they will not be condemned by their Judge.

2. Because he is, so are we in this world.—2Jo, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258. The verb in this clause being of the present tense, the relative he must be understood of God, who is represented ver. 11, as the object of our imitation in his love to mankind. If the reader is of opinion that Christ is meant, and that the words in this world stand connected only with the words see are, but with the words he is, the translation must run, 'as he was, so are we in this world.'—According to this translation likewise, the sentiment expressed is perfectly just.

Ver. 18.—1. The love which the apostle calleth perfect, is love to mankind cherished from a regard to the will of God, and exercised habitually, as opportunity offers, in the disinterested manner in which God exerciseth his love to us. This love, though not perfect in its degree or measure, may be called perfect, because it proceeds from a right principle, and operates habitually in leading the person in whose heart it lodgeth, to do his neighbour all the good offices in his power.

2. Casteth out fear.—As the apostle speaks in the preceding verse, of one's having boldness in the day of judgment, fear in this verse certainly means 'fear of the judgment,' that is, fear of being condemned at the judgment. This fear, perfect or strong love to mankind casteth out of a man's mind, because, as the apostle declared, chap. iii. 14. 'We know that we have passed away from death to life, because we love the brethren.'—It is a great recommendation of any quality, that it renders a man a child of God, ver. 7, and gives him such an entire assurance of God's love, as banisheth from his mind all fears with respect to his happiness in a future state. This love to our brethren effectually doth, and therefore it ought to be carefully cherished. Some interpreters give a different explanation of this verse as follows: 'There is no fear of what one may lose or suffer by loving his brother perfectly; but perfect love casteth out all such fear; for such fear hath its root in it. Wherefore, he who thus fears what he may lose or suffer by loving his brother, is not perfected in love.' But as this interpretation doth not show, how the torment which is in fear is a reason for its being cast out by perfect love, as the interpretation in the commentary doth, I think it should not be admitted.

Ver. 20. And yet hate his brother.—Here the apostle, if I mistake not, glances at the character of some of the heretical teachers, mentioned ver. 7, note, who, being Jewish converts, had brought with them into the Christian church that malignant spirit which in Judaism they had cherished towards the heathens, and perhaps considered it an expression of their love to God, to hate and persecute all who were not of their way of thinking in religious matters. The same spirit hath too much prevailed in the sects of modern times. But, thanks be to God, this antichristian spirit is gradually passing away.
CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Sentiments, Discoveries, and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having, from various considerations, inculcated the love of mankind in general, and even of enemies, goeth on in this to speak of the obligation we are under to love, in a more particular manner, all who are the sincere disciples of Christ. And first, to shew that such are worthy of being loved, he declares, that every one who believeth Jesus is the Christ, is born of God. He saith, not he that seeth the light of God, and that is more truly a Son of God than any Jew who claims that high relation, merely on account of his descent from Abraham, John viii. 39. Next, to shew the obligation which we owe to God, and to the disciples of Christ, he observes that every one who loveth God the begetter, will love also the begotten of him: he will love good men because they resemble God in his moral qualities, ver. 1. That is, that they might judge with certainty of their own character, he told them, the best method of knowing, whether from love to God they truly loved the children of God, was to consider, whether from love to God, they loved the brethren of Christ, what he commanded them to perform, ver. 2. For, said he, this is the natural expression of our love to God, that we keep his commandments. And his commandments are not burdensome to the children of God, because they are agreeable to their inclinations, ver. 3. And because, by the power of their faith, they are able to overcome all the temptations which the world lay in their way to induce them to break the commandments of God, ver. 4.

But that we may know who the children of God are who overcome the world, and what their faith is by which they obtain that victory, the person who overcometh the world by the power of faith, is he who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God, sent into the world to bestow eternal life on all who believe, ver. 5. And such a person's faith in Jesus as the Son of God is well founded: for he was demonstrated to be the Son of God by the water and blood, even Jesus the Christ was proved to be God's Son, not by the water alone, but by the water and the blood. For at his baptism with water, Jesus was declared to be God's Son by a voice from heaven. The same was declared by the shedding of his blood, that is, by his death: for by his resurrection from the dead, God demonstrated him to be his Son. Now it is the Spirit who, by the water and the blood, beareth witness to Jesus as the Son of God. For, by descending on him in a visible shape at his baptism, he pointed him out to the Baptist (John i. 33, 35.) and to the surrounding multitude, as the person concerning whom the voice from heaven spake. In like manner, the Spirit bare witness to Jesus as the Son of God by the blood; for it was the Spirit who raised him from the dead, ver. 6.

The apostle, having thus declared how Jesus came into the world, and was declared to be the Son of God by the water and the blood, proceeds to inform us, that there are three in heaven, and three on earth, who are continually witnessing something concerning Jesus, which he does not explain till ver. 11. Where he tells us that the facts which they attest are, that God hath given us eternal life, and that this life is through his Son. Now, the three in heaven who bear witness to these important facts, are the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, ver. 7. And the three on earth who bear witness to the same facts, are the Spirit, and the water, and the blood. All these witnesses, the apostle tells us, agree in one and the same testimony, ver. 8. And because they attest these facts by the appointment of God, he calls the joint testimony of the three in heaven and of the three on earth, the witness of God; and observes, that if we receive the testimony of men, and without hesitation rely on it, even in the most important matters, the witness of God is of much greater force to establish what he attesteth concerning his Son, ver. 9. especially as he who believeth on the Son of God hath the thing witnessed by God begun in himself, whereas he who doth not believe God's witness concerning his Son, devours to make God a liar, ver. 10. To this account of the witnesses in heaven and on earth, and of the credibility of their testimony, the apostle at length subjoins a declaration of the important facts which he has stated, namely, that God will bestow eternal life on believers, and that this life is to be bestowed on them through his Son, ver. 11. Then repeats what he had hinted, ver. 10. that he who believeth Jesus as the Son of God, hath the eternal life which God hath promised to bestow through his Son assured to him by the grace and virtues which his faith produces in him; whereas he who doth not acknowledge Jesus as the Son of God, cut off from the eternal life, ver. 12. Lastly, the apostle told them who believed on the name of the Son of God, that he had written these things to them concerning the coming of Jesus into the world, attested to be the Son of God by the water and the blood, and concerning the three in heaven and the three on earth who are continually bearing witness to Jesus, and concerning the facts which they attest, namely, that God hath promised to give believers eternal life through his Son, that they might be assured of obtaining eternal life through him, and that they might continue to believe on his name, ver. 13.

John had told them, chap. iv. 17. that if they imitated God in his beneficence, it would give them boldness in the day of judgment. Here he assured them, that, even in the present life, they who believe on Jesus have this boldness with the Father, that if they pray to him for any thing according to his will, he hearkeneth to them, ver. 14. and granteth them what they ask, because they are the disciples of his Son, ver. 15. This assurance the apostle gave to the spiritual men in particular, and perhaps it was applicable to them only, telling them, That if any of them found a brother labouring under a bodily disease, inflicted on him for some sin he had committed, and if, from the signs of repentance which the sick shewed, the spiritual man had reason to think his sin was not to be punished with bodily death, he might, on account of his faith in God's promise, ask his recovery, if moved to do so by an impulse of the Spirit: and God, in answer to his prayer, would grant a miraculous recovery to such a sick person, the temporal punishment of whose sin was not a disease to end in death. At the same time, by observing that there was a sin unto death, for the removing of which he did not direct any spiritual man to pray, he insinuated that they were to pray for a miraculous recovery of the sick sinner only in the case of his having repented of the sin for which he was punished, ver. 16. And to shew this more clearly, he added, though every unrighteous action, especially those by which our neighbour is injured, is sin, there is a great difference in sins, according as they are repented of or obstinately continued in: For there is a sin not directly punished with the punishment of which the sinner may be delivered, because he hath repented, ver. 17. However, to prevent them from falling into mistakes in judging what sins were unto death and what not, he told them, that no one who hath been begotten of God sinneth habitually, because such
New Translation.

Chap. V. — I. Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, hath been begotten; of God: and every one who believeth in the begotten, loveth also the begotten of him.

3. By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and they are not burdensome.

4. ( çev. 254.) Because all that is begotten of God overcometh the world. And this is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith.

5. Who is it that overcometh the world, but he who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?

Commentary.

Chap. V. — I. Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, and abideth in his fellowship and doctrine, hath been begotten of God: for he is our true Son of God, than if he were descended from Abraham. And every one who loveth God the begotten, loveth also the begotten of him: loveth all who bear his image.

3. By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and from love to him obey his commandments; especially his commandment to love one another.

3. For this is the natural expression of our love to God, that we keep his commandments; which is not a burdensome thing to the begotten of God, because his commandments are agreeable to their inclinations, and because all that is begotten of God overcometh the temptations which the world layeth in their way, to induce them to break God's commandments. And this victory over the world, we the begotten of God obtain through the influence of our faith.

5. That ye may know who it is that overcometh the temptations of the world, and what the faith is by which that victory is obtained, he is one who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God.

Ver. 1. — I. Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, — This is not to be understood of mere speculative belief, but of such a firm persuasion, as influenceth the person who is possessed of it to obey Jesus implicitly, from a sense of his authority as the Christ, or Son of God, sent into the world to save mankind.

2. Hath been begotten of God. — See chap. ii. 29. Note 1. where this translation of γεννησθαι is supported. — The believing Jews thought themselves the children of God, because they were descended from Abraham by Isaac, and possessed the knowledge of the true God: and some even of the believing Jews built their title to that high honour on the same foundation. But the apostle saith, not that both, that God having at length Jesus to be the Christ, the only thing under the时代中国 Dispensation which made men his children, was their believing on Jesus as the Christ or Son of God, and their love to the children of God.

3. Every one who loveth the begotten, loveth also the begotten of him. — By this we know that we love God, when we love the children of God, and keep his commandments. But, not to mention that this construction is forced, it represents the apostle as giving a mark by which we may know when we love God; whereas his intention is to show how we may know when we love the children of God in a right manner. Now this was necessary to be showed, since men may love the children of God because they are their own, and not because they are bound to them in the same manner with themselves, or because they are mutually united by some common bond of fellowship. But love proceeding from these considerations, is not the love of the children of God which he requires. By what mark then can we know that our love to the children of God is of the right sort? Why, saith the apostle, by this, by which we may know that we love the children of God in a right manner, when we love God, and from love to him obey his commandments, especially his commandment to love his children; for this is that which proceeds from love to God, from a regard to his will, and which leadeth us to obey all his commandments of God in ordinary cases. For his commandments suffer the loss of liberty, the spoiling of goods, torture, and death, in times of persecution, must be accepted. — To a good man in ordinary circumstances, the keeping of God's commandments is easy, being the delight of his soul.

4. And this is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith. — Our faith is the cause of our victory over the world. The power of faith in enabling men to triumph over temptations layeth in their way by the things of the world, and by the wicked men of the world, is finely illustrated by examples, of which there were, that before the coming of Christ the children of God, by believing the things which he discovered to them, whether by the light of natural reason or by particular revelations, resisted the greatest temptations, sustained the bitterest sufferings, and performed the most difficult acts of obedience, and thereby obtained a great and lasting fame. — But now that Christ hath come, and made the gospel revelation to persons and by his apostles, the faith of the children of God by which they overcome the world, hath for his object all the doctrines and promises contained in that revelation, and particularly the great doctrine which is the foundation of all the rest, namely, that Jesus is the Son of God, and saviour of the world, as the apostle observes in the following verse 6.

Ver. 5. — I. All that is begotten of God overcometh the world. — John speaketh, the nester gender, to comprehend all sorts of persons, males and females, old and young, Jews and Gentiles, free men and slaves.

2. And this is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith. — Our faith is the cause of our victory over the world. The power of faith in enabling men to triumph over temptations layeth in their way by the things of the world, and by the wicked men of the world, is finely illustrated by examples, of which there were, that before the coming of Christ the children of God, by believing the things which he discovered to them, whether by the light of natural reason or by particular revelations, resisted the greatest temptations, sustained the bitterest sufferings, and performed the most difficult acts of obedience, and thereby obtained a great and lasting fame. — But now that Christ hath come, and made the gospel revelation to persons and by his apostles, the faith of the children of God by which they overcome the world, hath for his object all the doctrines and promises contained in that revelation, and particularly the great doctrine which is the foundation of all the rest, namely, that Jesus is the Son of God, and saviour of the world, as the apostle observes in the following verse 6.
1. JOHN.

6 We have good reason to believe that Jesus is the Son of God.
   For this is he who was proved to be the Son of God by his baptism.
   John 1:34. It was then that the Holy Spirit, who was in the form of a dove, came down upon Jesus.
   And it was declared God's Son by a voice from heaven, but also by death, when the same thing was demonstrated by his resurrection from the dead: And it is the Spirit who is to bear witness in heaven.

7 (Acts 26.) Further, there are three who bear witness in heaven: the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; and the three from printed editions, have been stated with the greatest fidelity and accuracy by Mill in his long note at the end of John's first epistle, where he observes, that this verse is wanting in all the ancient Greek MSS. of the New Testament which have come down to us except a few which shall be mentioned immediately. It is wanted likewise in the first Syrian, and other ancient versions, particularly the Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopic, and in many of the present Latin MSS., with a reference to the description of St. Paul, 2 Corinthians 12. In his account of the manuscripts, few of the Greek writers lived before the close of the first century, and in the absence of the New Testament, which was the basis of all their work, it is evident that this verse was not in their copies.

The only proof, therefore, of the authenticity of the verse and the communis opinio, is that it was included in the ancient Peshitta and Syriac Greek copies (for others of them want this verse), for which the Spanish divines formed the Complutensian edition of the Greek Testament, and with which they were furnished by P. Lovi of Lucca. In a short note, Mill says, that in the Complutensian edition, No. 1000. "Inscripta in prologue Codex ecatium vetustissima apud sanctos saeculorum, quae tamquam spectacula veterum theologorum saevi Leo decimius, quaeque probabile significavit, conjugat etiam eum Exartam 18. A Greek copy, called "The Gospel of the Hebrews," which contains the Epistle of Barnabas, is said to be the original authority of which he inserted this verse in his edition anno 1525. The fact that it was so preserved in this copy explains the absence of this verse in the Apostolic Constitutions, which was written before 150.

Mill in his account of the manuscripts, few of the Greek writers lived before the close of the 1st century. All Stephen's MSS. being seven in number, which contain the Catholic apocrypha, have this verse; only three in the texts of Westcott and Hort, and one in that of Tischendorf. three are one: these three are one in respect of the unity of their testimony.
And there are three who bear witness on earth to the truth I am going to mention, ver. 11. the Spirit, the water, and the blood.
And these three witnesses on earth agree in one and the same testimony.
See vs. 7, note 6.
If we receive the testimony of men, the witness of God is greater. (Cor., 36, 1.)
Now, this is the witness of God which he hath borne by the witnesses in heaven and on earth, concerning his Son.

To us there is (c. 6, 1) one God the Father. Besides, it was not to John's purpose to speak here of the earthly witnesses only, in respect either of their nature or of their number. I am therefore of opinion, that when he wrote in v. 7, in Spirit, in truth, he meant only that they are one in respect of the agreement of their testimony, conformably to the use of the phrase, 1 Cor. iii, 8, where in 8, signifies, not only of number, but of design.

L. JOHN

1. (But before I declare what the thing witnessed is, I must take notice, that he who believeth on the Son of God hath the thing witnessed by God begun in himself. But he who believeth not God’s witness concerning his Son, hath endeavored to make him a liar, by refusing to believe the witness which God hath witnessed concerning his Son.)

2. (Kai, 204.) Now this is the witness, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is (v. 167) through his Son. (See chap. iv. 9.)

3. (O οὐκον.) Who he acknowledgeth the Son, hath this life. He who acknowledgeth not the Son of God, hath not (v. 71) this life.

4. These things have been written to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life; and that ye may continue to believe on the name of the Son of God.

5. And this is the blessedness which we have (καιρος) with him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, we know that he will hear us, according to his name, the Father.

Verily, verily, I say unto you, the works that I do shall I do also, and greater works shall I do, because I go unto my Father. Whatever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. (14.) If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it.—Also chap. xvi. 22. Verily, verily, I say unto you, whatever ye shall ask the Father in his name, he will give it you. (same verse)

9. Herein ye have nothing in any name; ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. — Now, since in the first mentioned passage, Christ promises that his apostles should do greater miracles than he himself did upon the earth, and that whatsoever they should ask in his name, he would give it them; the meaning plainly is, that whatever miracle they should ask for the confirmation of their mission as his apostles, he would do it. In like manner, when he promised, in the second mentioned passage, that whatsoever they should ask the Father in his name, he would give it them; and then said to them, Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full; it cannot be doubted, that the things he directed them to ask of the Father, were miracles for the manifestation of his authority over the Son of God, and for the successful propagation of the gospel, whereby their joy as his apostles would be rendered complete. For these declarations and promises were the foundations of the blessedness which the persons of whom John speaks, were to enjoy in the divine favor. If they asked any thing according to his will, he would hear them. That John is speaking of their ministerial prerogatives, is evident from ver. 16. Where he saith, Let him ask, and God will give us eternal life, to show the certainty of our obtaining that great blessing through his Son. (See ver. 16.)

10. Ver. 12. (O οὐκον.) Who he acknowledgeth the Son hath this life.)

11. As the word οὐκον is used in the sense of acknowledging by our speech, (chap. iii. 19.) I am of opinion the scope of the passages directs us to take it in that sense here. For notwithstanding the word "acknowledgeth" in the last clause of this verse is used in its ordinary signification, it is no uncommon thing in scripture to find the same word used in different senses in the same passage.

12. And that ye may (ματαιεύοντες) continue to believe. — This is the true translation of the clause: For in John's style τυπτέω often signifies continuing to believe. John ii. 11, 12, 15, 33.

13. Now this is the blessedness which we have with him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, he will hear us. — It is commonly thought that this and the following verse is spoken of Christians in general, to assure them, that if they ask any thing necessary to their own salvation, God will grant it to them.

14. In this sense Rados understood the apostle. See his note on these verses, where he describes the qualification, according to the will of God. Nevertheless, from verses 16, 17, it is plain that this apostle is limited to such sorts of asking, as are of our asking spiritual blessings for ourselves, but of our asking "life for a brother" who hath sinned against me unto death. (chap. v. 11.) Other persons, therefore, think John, in these verses, directs Christians in general to pray for the eternal peace of each other's souls. But as no such prayer will be granted to a person who asks another, a better interpretation will be suggested by observing, that in this direction there is an allusion to the promises which our Lord made to his apostles, and which John himself hath recorded in his gospel, chap. xvi. 22. Verily, verily, I say unto you, the works that I do shall I do also, and greater works shall I do, because I go unto my Father. Whatever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it. — Also chap. xvi. 22. Verily, verily, I say unto you, whatever ye shall ask the Father in his name, he will give it you. (same verse) say concerning it, that he should ask; 4.

17 All unrighteousness is sin! (Kas, 205.)
But there is a sin unto death.

18 We know, that whosoever hath been begotten of God doth not sin, (Asa, 78.) because he who is begotten of God (zwh) guardeth himself, and the wicked one doth not hold him fast.

19 We know that we are begotten of God! (Kas, 205.) But the whole world lieth (αβ, 176.) under the wicked one.

20-3: Moreover, we know that the Son of God (Asa) hath come, and hath given us understanding, that we might know the true God! (Asa, 86.) and we are (αβ, 176.) under the true God by which we know Jesus Christ. This is the true God, the eternal life.

ing that grace is as expressly promised to follow the anointing of the sick, and the elder's prayer for their recovery, as the forgiveness of their sins! — Or, if he be so cured, because of them whose sacrament of extreme unction hath been dispensed, few have been sincere penitents! I suppose the Papists will affect the mother of these, as they would a great disbarren of their church. And therefore, till they produce some satisfactory reason for God's not raising up the sick now, as formerly, according to his promise, after they have been anointed and prayed for by the priest, we must believe that these beliefs are a testimonial to which the grace or pardon and salvation are not annexed.

The foregoing three arguments demonstrate, that the anointing of the sick with oil, and the praying for their recovery, were not appointed to be a permanent office in the church, which every priest may perform, and every professing Christian who is sick may des- cend, as the efficient means of procuring the plenary pardon of the sick. These rites were peculiar to the first age, being appointed, not for procuring an eternal pardon of sins to the sick, but a miraculous recovery from some mortal disease which had been inflicted on them as the temporal punishment of their sins. And no proceeding can answer these rites with efficacy, except those who have the gift of healing diseases miraculously. The directions therefore which the apostles have given concerning these rites, were not intended for the instruction of the ministers of religion in every age, but merely to teach those who in the first age were endowed with the gift of healing diseases miraculously, in what cases and for what ends they were to exercise that gift. See the preceding note 2.

Here a saying, which Bengelius hath quoted from Whitaker, may be introduced as a fit conclusion of this important controversy. "Let them, saith he, beoint with oil who can procure health for the sick, and let those who cannot, abstain from the vain symbol."

5. There is a sin unto death. — From the account of the sin unto death, given in note 1, the reader will easily perceive that 'the sin unto death' is a sin obstinately continued in, or at least not particularly repented of, the punishment of which is therefore to extend to the everlasting. This the spiritual man knowing, is a clear demonstration of the world not being inwardly moved of the Holy Ghost to pray for his recovery, the apostle in this verse gives the subsequent case favorable in him, in such a case, as to ask it of God.

6. We do not say concerning that, that he should ask; 4. — Doccridge, who understands this of our praying for repentance and pardon in behalf of obstinate sinners, thinks the apostle's meaning is, 'I do not say that he should pray with a full assurance of being heard.' But as there is neither precept nor example in scripture, authorizing us to pray for pardon to obstinate sinners, the only thing we can pray for in their behalf is, that God would grant them repentance. And if he hear us in that request, their pardon will follow. — On this subject, Doccridge's reflection is both pious and benevolent. "Let us not," saith he, "too soon pronounce the case of a sinner hopeless; but rather subject ourselves to the trouble of some fruitless attempts to reclaim him, than omit any thing where there may be a possibility of succeeding."

Ver. 11. All unrighteousness is sin! — By unrighteousness the apostle means, to transgress the commandments of God and sin, a violation of the law of God. See chap. iii. 4. Perhaps by making this observation here, the apostle intended to intimate to the sick sinner, that to rend his repentance sincere, restitution must be made to every one whom he hath injured by his unrighteousness; in which case his sin, as the apostle adds, will not be unto death. Ver. 16. And he saith, for sinning in a supreme, for = ποιεσθαι = to be done, as well as to touch. Thus John xxvii. 14. ἐάν ὠν, He held not; for I do not yet see it. — Mor, "on touch signifies to John iv. 25, "to ἄξονα, for in translation, between the two clauses of the sentence in this manner, 'And we are in him who is true,' etc., they have inserted the word without the authority of any ancient MS., the critics who make εἰς, with reference to the act of the apostle, think their opinion ought to have weight to a matter of such importance—Yahweh, Philos. Sacr. p. 714, tells us that Athensius, in the council of Carthage, disapproving of this, called this text of John a written demonstration, and added, That as Christ said of the Father, John xviii. 7, That they might know that the only true God; so John said of the Son, 'Thou art the true God and eternal Life.' And that we are begotten of God. — In the original it is, we know that we are εἰς ναί, and that expression being elliptical, must be completed from ver. 18 by supplying προς ἐν προς ἐν, as I have done in the translation. See chap. iii. 5, note 1.

5. But the whole world lieth (αβ, 176.) under the wicked one.

10. Moreover, we know that the Son of God (Asa) hath come, and hath given us understanding, that we might know the true God! (Asa, 86.) and we are (αβ, 176.) under the true God by which we know Jesus Christ. This is the true God, the eternal life.

6. We do not say concerning that, that he should ask; 4. — Doccridge, who understands this of our praying for repentance and pardon in behalf of obstinate sinners, thinks the apostle's meaning is, 'I do not say that he should pray with a full assurance of being heard.' But as there is neither precept nor example in scripture, authorizing us to pray for pardon to obstinate sinners, the only thing we can pray for in their behalf is, that God would grant them repentance. And if he hear us in that request, their pardon will follow. — On this subject, Doccridge's reflection is both pious and benevolent. "Let us not," saith he, "too soon pronounce the case of a sinner hopeless; but rather subject ourselves to the trouble of some fruitless attempts to reclaim him, than omit any thing where there may be a possibility of succeeding."
I. JOHN.

To be the true God. For these facts Glassius appeals to Athanasij Opt. tom. 3. p. 765.

Ver. 21. Little children, keep yourselves from idols.—For the meaning of the word ὀνομασία, ὅθεν, see 1 Cor. viii. 4, note 2.—The apostle cautioned his disciples against going with the heathens into the temples of their idol gods, to eat of their feasts upon the sacrifices which they offered to these gods, and against being present at any act of worship which they paid to them, because, by being present at the worship of idols, they participated in that worship; as is plain from what St. Paul hath written on that subject, 1 Cor. viii. 1 and x.—The exhortation to the brethren to keep themselves from idols, also with that this epistle was intended for the converted Gentiles everywhere, as well as for the Jews in Judea, to whom I suppose it was first sent.

II. JOHN.

PREFACE.

Sect. 1.—Of the Authenticity of John's Three Epistles.

The internal evidence of the authenticity of the three epistles commonly ascribed to John, having been explained in the Preface to the First Epistle, sect. 1, this section shall be employed in setting before the reader what is called the external evidence, arising from the testimony of contemporaneous and of succeeding authors, who speak of these epistles as written by John the apostle.

Lardner on the Canon, vol. iii. p. 562, hath shewed, That the first epistle of John is referred to by Polycarp, and by the martyr of Lyons,—That his first and second epistles are quoted by Irenæus, and were received by Clement of Alexandria,—That Origen saith, "John beside the Gospel and Revelation, hath left us an epistle of a few lines: Grant also a second and third: For all do not allow these to be genuine;"—That Didymus of Alexandria received John's first epistle, which he calls his Catholic Epistle, and likewise mentions the other two as ascribed to him,—That the first epistle was received by Cyprian,—And that the second is cited by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria.

Eusebius's testimony to the first epistle of John hath been already mentioned in his own words; Pref. to James, sect. 2. parag. 2. In bearing that testimony, Eusebius inausuitheth that some ascribed the second and third epistles to another person of the name of John, called the Elder, of whom he speaks, lib. iii. c. 39.—Jerome likewise hath ascribed this John in his catalogue, and of the three is in the Alexandrian MS. and in the catalogue of Gregory Nazianzen, and of Amphilebch, who observes that some received only one of them.—The Syrian churches received only the first. See Pref. to James, sect. 2. parag. 3.

Nor did Chrysostom receive any other.

Bede, in the beginning of the eighth century, wrote thus in his exposition of the second epistle: "Some have thought this and the following epistle not to have been written by John the apostle, but by another, a presbyter of the same name, whose sepulchre is still seen at Ephesus; whom also Papias mentions in his writings. But now it is the general consent of the church, that John the apostle wrote also these two epistles, forasmuch as there is a great agreement of the doctrine and style between these and his first epistle. And there is also a like zeal against heretics."
Sect. II.

PREFACE TO II. JOHN.

Sect. II.—Of the Person to whom John wrote his Second Epistle.

The inscription of this epistle is Ἐπιστ. κύρια.: which has been translated and interpreted differently, both by the ancients and the moderns. Some, fancying Eclecta to be a proper name, have translated the inscription thus; 'To the Lady Eclecta.' Accordingly, in the Adumbrations of Clemens Alexander, this epistle is said to have been written to a Babylonian woman, or virgin, named Eclecta. Among the moderns, Wolf and Wetstein are of the same opinion as to the name of this woman. But Heumann and Benson contend that her name was Κυρία, Κυρία, and translate the inscription thus: 'To the elect Κυρία.' Oecumenius in his prologue saith, 'He calls her Εκλεκτή, either from her name, or on account of the excellence of her virtue.' And in his commentary on the beginning of the epistle he saith, 'John did not scruple to write to a faithful woman, forasmuch as in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female.'—On the other hand, Cassiodorus, among the ancients, thought a particular church was meant by the apostle; and of the moderns, Whitby and Whiston were of the same opinion; for they say, this epistle was not written to a particular lady, but to a particular church; and Whitson mentions the church of Philadelphia; but Whitby that of Jerusalem, the mother of all the churches. Our English translation expresses the commonly received opinion concerning this matter; which Mill also, and Wall, and Wolf, with Le Clerc and Lardner, have adopted.—Besa too was of the same opinion, for in his note on the inscription he thus writes: 'Some think Eclecta a proper name, which I do not approve, because in that case the order of the words would have been Κυρία Ἐκλεκτή. 'To the Lady Eclecta.' Others think this name denotes the Christian church in general. But that is disproved, first, by its being a manner of speaking altogether unusual; secondly, by the apostle's expressly promising, in the last two verses, to come to her and her children; thirdly, by sending to her the salutation of her sister, whom also she calls Eclecta. I therefore think this epistle was inscribed to a woman of eminence, of whom there were some here and there who supported the church with their wealth; and that he called her Eclecta, that is excellent, and gave her the title of Κυρία, Κυρία, just as Luke gave to Theophania, and Paul gave to Festus, the title of ᾿ἀγαθὴ, ᾿ἀγαθή, most excellent. For the Christian religion doth not forbid such honourable titles to be given, when they are due.'

It is supposed, that the writer of this letter did not mention the name of the lady to whom it was sent, lest the enemies of the gospel into whose hands it came, finding her pointed out as a person of eminence among the Christians, might have given her trouble. But the same reason should have hindered the writer of the third epistle from mentioning the name of Καίσαρ in its inscription. Benson therefore thinks Κυρία the name of the woman to whom the second of these epistles was written, and in support of his opinion observes, that the authors of the second Syriac, and of the Arabic versions of this epistle, understood Κυρία to be her name; for they have inserted the word Κυρία in their versions, without translating it. It is not known where this lady lived; but from the apostle's proposing to visit her soon, it is conjectured that she lived not far from Ephesus, where the apostle abode when he wrote to her.

Sect. III.—Of John's Design in writing his Second Epistle.

The Continuator of Eustis's commentary saith, that any one who compares ver. 7, of this epistle with what is written in the first letter, and with what Tertullian hath said De Prescript. c. 48, and Philippius Hieros. 94, will be sensible that this short epistle was written to confute the errors of Basilides and his followers, who affirmed that Christ was not a real man, but only a man in appearance; consequently, that he neither did nor suffered what he appeared to do and suffer.

In the preface to the first epistle, sect. 3. it was observed, that in the latter end of the first age many false teachers, the disciples of Basilides, were going about disseminating his doctrine concerning the person of Christ. Wherefore, as that doctrine overturned the whole scheme of the gospel, and in particular annihilated the atonement which Christ is said in the gospel to have made for the sin of the world by his death, robbed Christians of their best hopes, and turned the whole of their faith into a dream or illusion, John did not content himself with condemning that pernicious doctrine in his first epistle, but judged it necessary, in a more particular manner, to put this lady and her children on their guard against the deceivers who taught it. He therefore said to them, ver. 7. If any teacher come to you, who doth not hold the true doctrine concerning the person of Christ, do not receive him into your house, neither wish him health and prosperity; lest, by seeming to encourage him in his errors, ye become partakers in his evil deeds.

Some readers, not attending to the circumstances in which this lady was, may, perhaps, from the apostle's advice to her, conclude that he was of an evil disposition himself, and encouraged in his disciples an intolerant spirit toward those who differed from them in opinion concerning matters of religion. But those who thus reason ought to consider, that the person to whom the apostle gave this advice was a woman, whose benevolent disposition laid her open to be imposed on by cunning deceivers. They ought also to call to mind the black picture which the apostle Paul, in his second to Timothy, chap. iii. 6, 7. and his epistle to Titus, chap. i. 10, 12, hath given of the ancient heretical teachers; together with what the Fathers have written concerning their base arts, their impiety, their monstrous tenets, their hypocrisy, their covetousness, and their debauchery. For, if they attend to these things, they will be sensible that the apostle's directions to this lady and her children were by no means too severe; especially as these heretical teachers pretended to be inspired; nay, to possess a degree of power by which they were enabled to do many wonderful things toward those who were, and in the spirit of meekness to claim them; for the persons they had in view in these precepts were not false teachers, who disseminated their corrupt doctrine and who erred through weakness of understanding and ignorance. This is plain from Paul's ordering Titus to rebuke the false teachers in Crete with a cutting sharpness; and from his commanding Timothy to shun the company of obstinate heretics. And as John's advice to this lady is not inconsistent with the precepts of his brethren, so neither do they contradict his own precepts, earnestly and repeatedly delivered in his first epistle, to love and to do good to the worst of men. They are only advice to this lady and her children, not to expose themselves to the danger of being seduced by false teachers, and not to aid them in spreading their errors. His advice, therefore, ought to be attended to by those who, either from piety or benevolence, are disposed to shew hospitality to teachers, of whose character and tenets they are ignorant; because such, notwithstanding their show of godliness, and their plausible discourse, may be deceivers: in which case, the persons who entertain them in their houses, or who give them money, certainly become partakers of their evil deeds, as the apostle in this epistle hath expressly declared.
II. JOHN.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in John's Second Epistle.

The apostle, after addressing this letter to a woman of distinction and her children, and expressing a great affection to them on account of their adhering to the truth of the gospel, ver. 1.—declared that he was moved thus to love them, by the gospel itself, ver. 2.—And as a testimony of his love, he gave them his apostolical benediction, ver. 3.—Then told this lady, that he felt the greatest joy when he found some of her children, with whom he had conversed, perhaps at Ephesus, walking in the truth; that is, holding the true doctrine of the gospel, and behaving suitably to that doctrine, ver. 4.—From this he took occasion to exhort them, to love all the sincere disciples of Christ, and to do them good offices, according to the commandment which Christ gave to his apostles at the beginning, ver. 5.—and to express their love to Christ by obeying all his commandments; particularly the commandment they had heard from the beginning, that they should love one another sincerely with a pure spiritual love, ver. 6.—Next he told this excellent lady, that his joy on account of her children's walking in the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the person of Christ, was the greater, that many false teachers were going about, who denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh. Each of these, he told her, was the deceiver and the anti-christ foretold by our Lord to come. This account of the false teachers the apostle gave, lest the lady and her children, deceived by their plausible speeches, and their show of extraordinary piety, might have been disposed to shew them kindness, supposing them to be the servants of Christ, ver. 7.—He, therefore, desired them to be on their guard against such teachers, for this among other reasons, that if they should be drawn away by them, he would lose the reward which he expected for his having, not only faithfully, but successfully, taught them the true doctrine of the gospel: For he wished that his reward might be complete, through their continuing in the belief and practice of the truth, ver. 8.—Moreover he told them, that the teacher who doth not abide in the true doctrine concerning Christ, doth not acknowledge the truth of God's testimony concerning his Son. But the teacher who continueth to hold that doctrine, acknowledges the Son's testimony concerning himself, as well as the Father's, ver. 9.—Wherefore, if any teacher came to them, and did not bring the true doctrine concerning Christ, he forbade them to receive him into their house, or so much as to give him the common salutation or wish of health, ver. 10.—Because the person who gives any encouragement to false teachers, though it be done inconsiderately, is in some sort accessory to the mischief which his pernicious doctrine may occasion, ver. 11.—He then told them, that he had many other things to say to them concerning these impostors, but he would not commit them to writing, because he hoped to come soon and converse with them personally, in a more free manner than he could do by letter, that their mutual joy might be complete, ver. 12.—And so concluded with giving this lady the salutation of the children of her sister, to whom likewise he gives the appellation of elect, on account of the excellence of her character, ver. 13.

New Translation.

VER. 1. The elder to the elect lady, and her children, whom I love sincerely. And not only, but all also who know the truth.

VER. 2. (See) We love you through the truth which abideth (v. 172.) among us, and shall be with us for ever.

VER. 3. Grace, mercy, and peace, be with you, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, (v. 162.) with truth and love.

VER. 4. I rejoiced greatly (v. 259.) when I found some of thy children walking in truth, as we received commandment from the Father.

Commentary.

VER. 1. The aged apostle of Christ to the excellent lady and her children, whom I love in truth; and not I only, but all also who know the true doctrine of the gospel, love her and her children sincerely.

VER. 2. This love I and all who know the truth bear to you, through the influence of the gospel which abideth among us, and shall be with us to the end of the world.

VER. 3. Grace, mercy, and peace, (v. 252.) be with you, from God the Father of all, and from Jesus Christ the Son of the Father, together with the possession of truth, and of love to God and to man.

VER. 4. I rejoiced greatly when I found some of thy children, with whom I conversed lately, holding the doctrines and observing the precepts of the gospel, as these were preached by us according to the commandment which we received from the Father.
II. JOHN.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as writing to thee a new commandment, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.

6 And this is the love, that we walk according to his commandments. This is the commandment, even as ye have heard from the beginning, that ye may walk in it.

7 (Cov., 255.) For many deceivers are entered into the world, who do not confess that Jesus Christ did come in the flesh. This is the deceiver and the antichrist.

8 Look to yourselves, lest we may not lose the things which we have wrought, but may receive a full reward.

9 Whosoever goeth beyond, and doth not abide in the doctrine of Christ, acknowledges not God. He who abideth in the doctrine of Christ abideth in God and God abideth in him. (See 1 John iv. 12, note.)

10 If any one come to you, and do not bring this doctrine, do not receive him into your assembly in any wise suitable to the gospel. In this joy the apostle manifested the disposition of a faithful minister of Christ: let such derive their greatest happiness from the faith and holiness of their disciples. John spoke in the same manner concerning Caius, 3 John, ver. 12: and Paul concerning his converts, Philipp. iv. 1: I Thess. ii. 9.

Ver. 5.—Now I beseech thee, lady,—This sort of address suited a particular person better than a whole church consisting of many individuals, to which, in the opinion of some, this letter was directed. See pref. sect. 2.

2. Not as writing to thee a new commandment,—The apostle doth not speak of a new commandment, in the sense in which our Lord uses that phrase, when he said to his disciples, John xiv. 2. 'A new commandment I give to you, that ye love one another: as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.' (See 1 John ii. 8, note 1.) But his meaning is, either that the commandment to love one another, which he gave to this lady, was not a commandment which had never been delivered to the church before; or that it was not a commandment peculiar to the gospel. The first of these I take to be the apostle's meaning; as he tells this lady, that the disciples of Christ had the commandment delivered to them from the beginning.

3. But that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another,—In insculping this commandment so frequently and so earnestly in all his writings, John showed himself not only a faithful apostle of Christ, but a person of an excellent heart. His own heart was full of love to mankind, and he wished to promote that amiable disposition in all the disciples of Jesus. See the conclusion at the end of this epistle.

Ver. 6. —This is the love, that we walk according to his commandments,—Most commentators think John, in so describing the love mentioned in the preceding verse, namely, the love which Christians owe to each other, but since he tells us, that the love of which he now speaketh consists in the keeping of God's commandments, he must mean the love of God; let he deliver the same sentiment, 1 John v. 3. This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments.

2. This is the commandment,—that is, the commandment by way of example. Wherefore, though the apostle doth not tell us what this commandment is, yet by calling it the commandment, he certainly directeth us to God's great commandment to obey his beloved Son Jesus Christ, whom he sent into the world made flesh, to save sinners. To this interpretation, the reason assigned by the apostle in the next verse, for putting the disciples in mind of God's commandment, agreeeth; for 'many deceivers are entered into the world' doth.
II. JOHN.

mankind, do not receive him into your house, nor express your approbation of him by giving him the common salutation.

11 For he who gave him the common salutation, thereby expresses his approbation of his conduct, and partaketh in the evil which his corrupt doctrine may occasion.

12 Having many things to write to you, I did not incline to communicate them by paper and ink; (

13 The children of thy elect sister salute thee. Amen.

2. Do not receive him into your house. ]—In the eastern countries, where there were no inns for the entertainment of travellers as with us, to receive and entertain strangers in one's house was considered, either as a duty which friends mutually owed to each other, or as the beginning of a lasting friendship. But after the inhabitants of these countries became Christians, they exercised hospitality to the stranger, even from a still higher principle, especially when these strangers were employed in spreading the gospel. For in that case, how to Christ and a regard to his religion strongly moved them to these kind offices; see Rom. 12. 8. note. 3.—From the example of Apollos, mentioned Acts viii. 26. and from what is insinuated 2 Cor. iii. L concerning the false teachers who had come from Judea to Corinth, it appears that, even when the heathen had occasion to go to any church where they were not known, they carried letters of recommendation from persons who were acquainted with some of the members of that church, who, on the credit of these letters, received and entertained them. Or, if these strangers had no recommendatory letters, they made themselves known as sincere disciples of Christ, by declaring their faith to the bishop and elders of the church to which they came, as is insinuated in the first clause of the verse under consideration. These customs were prudently established in the first age, to prevent the churches from being deceived by the heretical teachers, who very early went about disseminating their errors.—The help in whom the apostle wrote this letter being rich, and of a very benevolent disposition, perhaps being also in a place where the Christians were too few, or too far from one another, for the entertainment of strangers, she might think it to herself under the more obligation to pay attention to the wants of those strangers who went about preaching the gospel. Wherefore, to prevent her from being deceived by impostors, the apostle directed her to require these teachers to give an account of the doctrines which they taught; and if she found that they did not hold the true doctrine concerning the person of Christ, he advised her not to receive them into her house, nor even to give them the common salutation of wishing them health and happiness. For, among the Christians of that age, this was no more compulsory, as with us, but an expression of real good will. The apostle's advice, therefore, was perfectly proper, because they who entertained, or otherwise showed respect to false teachers, enabled them the more effectually to spread their erroneous doctrine, to the ruin of those whom they deceived; consequently, as the apostle observes, they became partners in their evil deeds. See Preface, sect. ii. last paragraph.

3. Not with his happiness. ]—Χαρακτηρίζω μεν αὐτόν καίρος. The Greeks usually began their letters to each other with a wish of health and happiness, which they considered, as a sufficient token of benevolence. Also, with it, they saluted one another at parting. Wherefore the apostle's meaning is, as in the commentary, Do not express either good-will to a false teacher, or approbation of his behaviour, by giving him the common salutation.

Ver. 12. Having many things to write to you. ]—The apostle, I suppose, means many things concerning the character and actions of the false teachers: perhaps also he wished to mention the names of the false teachers whom he had in view. But these things he did not think it proper to write in a letter; especially as he proposed to visit this lady and her children soon, and to converse with them personally.

2. I did not incline to communicate them by paper and ink. ]—Διὰ ἑαυτοῦ. From this Bradulius conjectures, that in writing this letter John made use of paper, not parchment. But the ver. 12. Having many things to write to you. ]—The words are εἰς τοὺς ἰδίους. From this Brudulius conjectures, that in writing this letter John made use of paper, not parchment.

Ver. 12. The children of thy elect sister. ]—The word elect, as in ver. 1, and some other passages of scripture, does not signify chosen from eternity to salvation. For the apostle could not know that the lady's sister was so elected, unless the matter had been made known to him by a particular revelation, which is not alleged to have been the case by any who so interpret election. But it signifies a person of an excellent character; such as the Hebrews being called elect persons, Ex. iv. 14.

2. Salute thee. ]—Ἀναστέψε. The salutations which the Christians in the first age gave to each other, were not of the same kind with the salutations of unbelievers, which were words of temporal health and felicity only, but they were wishes of health and happiness to their souls, and expressions of the most sincere love. See 3 John ver. 2. The apostle sent this lady the salutation of the children of his excellent sister, in imitation of what he sent to all Christians, and that they preserved in the true doctrine of the gospel. Probably they and their mother lived in the city, or place of the country, where the apostle had his residence.

CONCLUSION.

The frequency and earnestness with which St. John hath inculcated mutual love, his declaring that it is the only sure proof of our love to God, and his assuring us that it banishes from the mind of the person who possesses it all fear of the judgment, may justly make us solicitous to form a just idea of so excellent a quality, and raise us in a sincere endeavour to acquire it. I therefore observe, that since the love which the gospel enjoins is a duty which is due from all to all, it cannot be that which is called the love of esteem, because of that none but the virtuous can be the objects; neither can it be that which the love of gratitude, since gratitude is due only to benefactors: but it must be the love of benevolence; an affection which all may exercise toward all; only it is more especially due to the good. Yet every kind of benevolence will not mark a person as a real disciple of Christ, nor banish from one's mind all fear of the judgment, because some may be benevolent naturally, and others may do beneficent actions merely to gain applause, or to promote some worldly purpose. Whereas the benevolence peculiar to the real disciples of Christ, is that alone which proceeds from love to God, and from a regard to his will. So John hath told us, chap. v. 2. By this we know that we love the children of God in a right manner, when we love God, and from that principle keep his commandments, particularly his commandment to love one another: Næ, however, in word or in tongue only, but in truth and in deed, by doing them good according to our power. If so, our love to each other is to be judged of and measured, not so much by the warmth of our affection, for that depends on one's natural temper, as by our doing good to others from a regard to the commandment or will of God.—That true Christian love consists in benevolence, John hath taught us, by telling us, that as the love of God to us consists in his doing good to us, so our love to one another consists in doing good to one another, even to laying down our lives for them, 1 Epist. li. 16. According to this view of love, persons whose natural temper does not admit of great warmth of affection, but who, from an habitual regard to the will of God, do all the good they can to others, really possess a greater degree of the love which Christ hath enjoined, than those persons who, having warmer affections, are moved to do acts of benevolence merely from natural disposition, without any regard to the will of God.

If the love which Christ hath enjoined consists in benevolence, how fortunate are those to whom God hath given the means of doing good, not only to their own relations and friends, but to the poor and needy who apply to them; and how cogent are the obligations which God hath laid on the great, the powerful, and the rich, who have general benefactions to mankind, by doing good and communicating. Being thus imitators of God in his greatest attribute,
III. JOHN.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—Of the Authenticity of the Third Epistle of John.

For the proofs of the authenticity of this epistle, see Pref. 1 John, sect. 1. To which may be added, that, in the third epistle, we find some sentiments and expressions which are used in the second. Compare ver. 4. with 2d epistle, ver. 4., and ver. 18, 14. with 2d epistle, ver. 14.

Sect. II.—Of the Person to whom this Epistle was written.

This short letter is inscribed to a person named Caius, or, according to the Latin orthography, Caius; a common name, especially among the Romans. In the history of the Acts, and in the epistles, we meet with five persons of this name.—1. There is a Caius who was with St. Paul in Ephesus during the riot of Demetrius, and who is called 'a man of Macedonia,' and 'Paul’s companion in travel,' Acts xix. 29.—2. A Caius is mentioned Acts xx. 4. called Caius of Derbe, which was a city of Lycaonia or Isauria. Probably he was a person different from the Macedonian Caius, though like him he was Paul’s assistant in preaching the gospel. Caius of Derbe accompanied Paul to Jerusalem with the collection for the saints. Probably, therefore, he was chosen by the churches of Lycaonia their messenger for that effect.—3. Paul, writing from Corinth to the church of Rome, speaks of a Caius with whom he lodged, Rom. xvi. 23. who was a very benevolent person, and in opulent circumstances: for the apostle called him his host, and the host of the whole church of Corinth. Whereas, as the Caius to whom John wrote his 3d epistle, was in like manner a very benevolent person, and in good circumstances, Bede, and after him Lightfoot, conjectured that he was the Caius who, in Paul’s epistle to the Romans, sent his salutation to the church at Rome.—4. The same apostle mentions his having baptized one of the name of Caius at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14. Probably he was the person whom in his epistle to the Romans, which was written from Corinth, Paul calls his host and the host of the church.—5. There was a Caius to whom John wrote this third epistle. Him Eusebius and Hieronymus thought a different person from all those above mentioned, because the apostle, by numbering him among his children, ver. 4. hath intimated that he was his convert, which they suppose he could not say of any of the Caius’s mentioned above.

In the ancient history of the church, we meet with three persons of the name of Caius. One of them a bishop of Ephesus, another of Thessalonica, and a third of Pergamos; all about this time.—Whiston and Mill have said, that the bishop of Pergamos was the Caius to whom John wrote his third epistle. But, as Lardiner observes, they said this on the testimony of the pretended Apostolical Constitutions, which in the present affair are of no authority at all. Besides, from the epistle itself it is evident, that Caius, to whom it was written, was at that time a person in a private station.

Lardiner’s account of Caius is, that “he was an eminent Christian, who lived in some city of Asia not far from Ephesus, where St. John chiefly resided after his leaving Judea. For, ver. 14. the apostle speaks of shortly coming to him; which he could not well have done if Caius lived at Corinth, or any other remote place.” Canon, vol. iii. p. 283.

Caius being neither a bishop nor a descem, but a private member of some church of which the apostle took the inspection, his hospitality to the brethren, and to the strangers who came to him, is a proof that he possessed some substance, and that he was of a very benevolent disposition. Grotsius thought Caius a good Christian, who lived in one of the churches or cities mentioned in the Revelation. However, as John hath not suggested any circumstance by which we can distinguish his Caius from others of the same name, it is impossible to say with any certainty who he was, or where he lived.

Sect. III.—Of the Apostle’s Design in writing his Third Epistle, and of the Persons who are mentioned in it by name.

It doth not seem to have been John’s design in writing to Caius, either to guard him against the attempts of the heretical teachers who were gone abroad, or to condemn the errors which they were at great pains to propagate; but only, in the first place, to praise Caius for having showed kindness to some brethren and strangers, who, in journeying among the Gentiles, had come to the place were Caius resided; and to encourage him to shew them the like kindness, when they should come to him again in the course of their second journey.—In the next place, he wrote this letter for the purpose of rebuking and restraining one Diotrephes, who had arrogantly assumed to himself the chief direction of the affairs of the church of which Caius was a member; and who had refused to assist the brethren and strangers above mentioned; and even had hindered those from receiving and entertaining them who were desirous to do it.—In the third place, the apostle wrote this letter to command an excellent person named Demetrius, who, in disposition and behaviour, being the reverse of Diotrephes, the apostle proposed him as a pattern whom Caius and the rest were to imitate.

Commentators are not agreed in their accounts of the brethren and the strangers, to whom Caius showed kindness as they passed through his city. Grotius and Lampe thought these strangers were believing Jews, who had been driven out of Palestine by their unbelieving brethren, or who had been forced away by the calamities brought on that country during the Jewish war, and had come into Asia in hopes of obtaining assistance from the Christians in that province, or perhaps of obtaining a settlement among them. Grotius supposes Diotrephes would not receive these strangers, nor even the brethren, that is, the Christians who were of his acquaintance, because they joined the rites of the law with the gospel. This, likewise, was the opinion of Le Clerc and Beausobre. Whereas, according to these authors, Diotrephes was a Gentile convert, and zealous for the freedom of the Gentiles from the yoke of the law. But Mosheim rejects their opinion, as having no foundation in antiquity. Others think these strangers were Gentile converts, whom Diotrephes, a Jew zealous of the law, would not receive, because they did not observe the rites of Moses. That opinion Benson adopted, founding it on this circumstance, that Diotrephes 'did not receive John;' that is, did not acknowledge his authority as an apostle. For he thinks none but the Judaizing teachers denied the authority of the apostles.

The brethren who were hospitably entertained by Caius, were some believers who had gone from Ephesus to the church where Caius abode; for they are said to have praised his liberality, in the presence of the church over which John presided. Probably they belonged to that church as members.—Further, since the apostle desired Caius to help these brethren and strangers forward on their journey, it implieth that they had gone forth, or were going forth, on a second journey among the Gentiles, in which they proposed to visit Caius again. Ezechiæ conjectures, that John sent this letter to Caius by them.

The account given, ver. 7, of the purpose for which the brethren and strangers went forth to the Gentiles, inclines me to think they were preachers. 'For his name's sake they went forth.' Bede however informs us, that anciently two interpretations were given of these words. The first was, 'For his name's sake they went forth to preach the gospel.' The second, 'For the faith and profession of the holy name of Christ, they were expelled from their native country.' Heumann adopts the latter interpretation, and often calls these strangers exiles; and saith they were Gentiles. But, as the brethren are distinguished from the strangers, and as it is said that they bare witness to Caius's love before the church, it is reasonable to think these brethren were members of the church over which St. John presided. And with respect to the strangers, without determining in this place whether they were exiles from their own country or not, I suppose, that, having come to the place where the brethren of whom the apostle speaks dwelled, they joined them in their journey, which I think was undertaken for the sake of preaching Christ to the Gentiles. If I am right in this conjecture, the strangers as well as the brethren above observed. For, if they were only persons in want, it was no commendation of them, 'that they went forth taking nothing of the Gentiles'! because, standing in need of alms, it was their duty, not only to receive alms, for the support of their life, from the unbelieving Gentiles; especially as, in many places, there may have been no Christians to whom they could apply for relief. Whereas, if they were preachers, they were greatly to be praised, when, in imitation of the apostle Paul, they supported themselves by their own labour, and took nothing from the Gentiles except on the score of maintenance, lest it might have marred the success of their preaching. In short, if these brethren and strangers had not been preachers, the apostle could not with propriety have said, ver. 8. 'We therefore ought to receive such, that we may be joint labourers in the truth.' For the terms labourers and joint labourers are always, in the apostolical writings, applied to preachers of the gospel, or to those who in some way or other assisted the preaching of the gospel. These things Lardner did not attend to when he said, 'I see nothing that should lead us to think preachers are spoken of, but only persons in want.'

Commentators are no less divided concerning the character and office of Diotrephes.—Erasmus in his paraphrase saith, Diotrephes was the author of a new sect. This likewise was Bede's opinion. But, as other learned men have well argued, if Diotrephes had been a corruptor of the Christian doctrine, the apostle without doubt would have cautioned Caius, and all the members of his church, to have avoided him, as he did the elect lady to avoid the false teachers of whom he wrote in his letter to her. But this, as Lamy observeth, he did not do. He only reproved the pride of Diotrephes, his contempt of the apostle's authority, but especially his ordering the members of his church not to shew kindness to the brethren and the strangers who applied to them for relief.

It is the opinion of many, that Diotrephes was a bishop in the church where he resided, and of which Caius was a member. In support of their opinion they observe, first, That he is said to have hindered those from receiving the brethren and the strangers, who were willing to shew them kindness; and to have cast them out of the church; contrary to his orders, continued to entertain them. Next, they take notice that the apostle saith to Caius, ver. 9. 'I would have written to the church; but Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them, doth not receive us.' The apostle wrote most of their letters to the churches, that is, to the whole body of Christians living in a particular place, and sent them to the bishops and elders of those churches, to be by them read in the public assemblies for the instruction of their people. But, as Diotrephes did not acknowledge John's authority, he had reason to fear, that if he had written to the church, and had sent his letter to Diotrephes to be read by him publicly to the brethren, he would have suppressed it by virtue of his episcopal authority; or, if it had been read to the church without his consent, he would have rendered it ineffectual by means of his adherents.

Heumann thought that Diotrephes was a deacon; and that, having the charge of the church's stock, he had it in his power to refuse relief to the brethren and strangers who applied to him; and that by so doing he cast them out of the church, that is, obliged them to depart. But Lardner, who supposed Diotrephes to have been a bishop, argues, that as he loved to rule every thing in his church according to his own pleasure, his office as bishop enabled him to restrain the deacons from employing any part of the church's stock in relieving the brethren and the strangers.

Demetrius, who is so highly praised by the apostle in this letter, is thought to have held some sacred office in the church of which Caius was a member. But Benson rejects this opinion, because, on that supposition, Caius would have known him so well as to need no information concerning his character from the apostle. Benson therefore believed him to be the bearer of this letter, and one of the brethren who went out to preach to the Gentiles. But whatever Demetrius was, his character and behaviour were the reverse of the character and behaviour of Diotrephes. For the apostle speaks of him as one who was esteemed of all men, and whose behaviour in every respect was conformable to the gospel; in short, one to whom the apostle himself bore the most honourable testimony. This high character of Demetrius, John wrote to Caius, that he and all the members of the church might imitate him rather than Diotrephes, whose arrogance, uncharitableness, and contempt of the apostle’s authority, were so great, that he threatened to punish him for these enormities when he visited Caius; which he promised to do soon, that he might have an opportunity of speaking with Caius face to face concerning that impious man.

Sect. IV.—Of the Date of the Second and Third Epistles of John.

Or the time of writing the second and third epistles of John, nothing, as Lardner observes, can be said with certainty. But he tells us, “Mill places them about the same time with the first; that is, in the year 91 or 92.” Whiston supposed that they were all three written about the year 82 or 93. I imagine that St. John was somewhat advanced in age, and that he had resided a good while in Asia before he wrote any of these epistles; consequently I am disposed to think that these two were not written sooner than the first. And as it was before argued, that the first epistle was written about the year 88, these two may be reckoned to have been written between the years 90 and 92.” Thus far Lardner, Can. vol. iii. p. 313.

In the preface to the first epistle, I have attempted to shew from the epistle itself, that it was written about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem: But there is nothing in the second and third epistles leading us to think they were written so early. We may therefore fix their date as late as Lardner hath done; or even later, when John was so old as with much propriety to take the title of the elder, or aged apostle, by way of eminence.

To encourage Caius to persevere in that virtuous course by which he had obtained the love of all who knew him, John, in the inscription of this letter, declared his own love to him, on account of the uncommon goodness of his character and actions, ver. 1.—and prayed to God to prosper him in his spiritual concerns, ver. 2.—and told him what joy it gave him, when the brethren who had been assisted by him, had brought him the welcome news of his perseverance in the true doctrine of the gospel, ver. 3.—because the apostle’s greatest joy was to hear that his disciples walked in the truth, ver. 4.—Next, he praised Caius as acting agreeably to the gospel, when he showed kindness to the brethren and to the strangers who had applied to him for succour in their straits, ver. 5.—And to encourage him to persevere in those charitable Christian offices, he told Caius, that the brethren and strangers, when they returned, bare an honourable testimony to his love publicly before the church over which John presided. And as they were, at the time this letter was written, making a second journey among the Gentiles, he told them, if he helped them forward a second time, in a manner worthy of God whom they served, by succouring them he would still do a good work acceptable to God, ver. 6.—because these brethren and strangers, for the sake of publishing the name of Christ and the doctrine of the gospel among the Gentiles, were gone forth, as formerly, with a resolution of taking nothing on the score of maintenance from the Gentiles, notwithstanding they greatly benefited the Gentiles by preaching the gospel to them, ver. 7.—For which cause, all who had the furtherance of the gospel at heart, he told him, were bound to shew such persons kindness, that they might be joint labourers with them in spreading and establishing the truth, ver. 8.

Next, he told Caius, that he would have written the same exhortation to the church of which he was a member; but he had abstained from writing, because Diotrephes, who ruled every thing in that church according to his own humour, did not acknowledge his apostolical authority: thereby insinuating, that Diotrephes probably would have suppressed any letter which the apostle might write, ver. 9.—He added, that because Diotrephes did not acknowledge his authority, he would, when he came among them, put him in mind of his deeds; his prating against the apostle with malicious words, his not receiving the brethren and the strangers who had applied to him in their straits for relief, his hindering the members of his church from assisting them, who were disposed to do it, and his casting those out of the church who had persevered in assisting them, contrary to his arbitrary orders. By this, he thought, the apostle threatened to exercise his miraculous power in punishing Diotrephes for his evil deeds, ver. 10.—But, beloved, said he, do not imitate what is evil in Diotrephes, but what is good in Demetrius, one of your own church: For he who doth good actions is begotten of God; but he who doth evil actions hath not seen God—he hath no right knowledge of God, ver. 11.—He then told Caius, that Demetrius was every way worthy of being imitated, because he was praised not only by all good men, but by the gospel itself, his temper and actions being conformable to the precepts of the gospel in every respect. To these honourable testimonies John added his own approbation of Demetrius’s character, which Caius knew to be a true testimony, because he knew that the apostle never praised any person from flattery, ver. 12.—He told him farther, that he had many things to write to him concerning the unchristian temper and conduct of Diotrephes; but he would not commit them to paper, lest his letter, falling into other hands, might be shewed to that improper man, and enrage him against Caius, ver. 13.—But he hoped to visit Caius soon, and then would speak to him mouth to mouth freely concerning Diotrephes. In the mean time, to testify his esteem of Caius, he gave him his apostolical benediction, together with the salutation of all the faithful who were with him; and whom he named the friends, because they were the friends of Christ, and lived in strict friendship with each other. Lastly, he desired Caius in his name to wish health and happiness to all the faithful in his church, whom he termed the friends, because they also were the friends of Christ, and lived in the strictest friendship with each other, ver. 14.

New Translation.

Ver. 1. The elder to Caius the beloved, whom I love in truth.2
Ver. 1.—The elder to Caius the beloved of all who know him, whom I also love most sincerely.

Ver. 1.—1. The elder.—This appellation signifies the aged apostle. See Pref. to 2 John, sect. 1. point para.

Commentary.

2. To Caius (see Pref. sect. 2.) the beloved, whom I love in truth.) —See 2 John, ver. 1. note 9.
III. JOHN.

2 Beloved, I pray that (ver. 279.) with respect to all things, thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thou soul prospereth.

3 For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and bare witness to thy truth, even as thou walkedst in truth.

4 I have no greater joy than those which I have ( Isa. 199.) when I hear my children are walking in truth.

5 Beloved, thou dost faithfully what thou performest for the brethren, and for the strangers.

6 (Os. 87.) These have borne testimony to thy ( ver. 8.) love in the presence of the church; whom if thou help forward on their journey in a manner worthy of God, thou wilt do well;

7 Because for his name's sake they went forth, receiving nothing from the Gentiles.

Ver. 2.—2. Beloved, I pray that with respect to all things thou mayest prosper. —In the Greek it is, γενεαλογήσθαι ὑμῖν παντὶς τῶν μετὰ σου, which is our Bibles' rendering, 'with and all things through and through.'

3. For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and bare witness to thy truth, even as thou walkedst in truth. —In this translation 'when' is omitted; 'the brethren' are the Gentiles; and there is no mention of the Gentiles' having come to John; whereas here, in the Authorised Version, the Gentiles are expressly mentioned as having come to John, and bare witness to his truth, as tho' they had come from a distance to be present at this memorable occasion.

4. I have no greater joy than those which I have, when I hear my children are walking in truth. —In the Greek it is, ἐλαύνει μοι ἡ γῆμα ὑμῶν, εἰ δύνασθε, ἵνα προσφέρητε τῷ θεῷ ἄλλην ἡμῶν, which is our Bibles' rendering, 'even as thou soul prospereth.'

5. Beloved, thou dost faithfully what thou performest for the brethren, and for the strangers. —2 Tim. 4:21. There is no mention of the Gentiles being such; whereas, here, Gentiles are so expressly named. In this verse also the word 'beloved' is omitted.

6. (Os. 87.) These have borne testimony to thy ( ver. 8.) love in the presence of the church; whom if thou help forward on their journey in a manner worthy of God, thou wilt do well; —2 Tim. 4:20. Here, it is said, 'whom if thou help forward on their journey, in a manner worthy of God.'

7. Because for the name of Christ as the Son of God known among the Gentiles, they went forth, and received nothing on the score of dependence from the Gentiles to whom they preached, that their preaching might be the more acceptable.

Ver. 3.—3. For I rejoiced greatly. —1 Cor. 16:17. John says that he liked it about John the Baptist, 'He proved himself a man of God.'

4. I have no greater joy than those which I have. —2 Cor. 10:10. For the different interpretation of these words given in the ancient commentators, see Pref. sect. 3. par. 4. I think these brethren and strangers were preaching, for the sake of making known to the world the Son of God, and as far as possible, to embrace the faith of Christ; that is, his character as the Son of God, and his office as Saviour of the world; because, as was observed, Pref. sect. 3. par. 4. if the strangers had been merely persons in want, there was no reason for their not receiving assistance from the Gentiles, whether converted or unconverted.

5. Beloved, thou dost agreeably to the faith which thou professest what thou performest for the brethren, who are gone forth to preach the gospel, and for the strangers who assist them in that good work.

6. The an honourable testimony to thy benevolence in the presence of the church here, whom if thou help forward on their journey, will do well; —2 Tim. 1:15. Here, 'whom if thou help forward on their journey.'

7. Because, for the name of Christ as the Son of God known among the Gentiles, they went forth, and received nothing on the score of dependence from the Gentiles to whom they preached, that their preaching might be the more acceptable.
III. JOHN.

8 We, therefore, ought to entertain such, that we may be joint labourers in the truth.

9 (Exegete, supply εὐλαβεῖτε) I would have written to the church; but Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them, doth not receive us.²

10 For this cause, when I come, I will bring his deeds to remembrance which he doth, and how he setteth himself in opposition against all, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church.²

11 Beloved, do not imitate what is evil, but what is good.¹ He that doeth good is of God; but he that doeth evil hath not seen God.³

12 Testimony is borne to Demetrius by all men, and by the truth itself. And we also bear testimony; and ye know that our testimony is true.²

13 I have many things to write, but I do not incline to write to thee with pen and ink to receive neither entertainment nor money from the Gentiles, lest it might have marred the success of their preaching among them, when they found the reception of the gospel attended with expenses. This at least was the conclusion which determined the apostle Paul to preach the gospel gratis.—The commentators who think these brethren and strangers were simply poor Christians, who had been driven from their homes by their persecutors, suppose that they received nothing from the unconverted Gentiles, lest it might have given them occasion to say that there was no charity among the Christians.

Ver. 8. We, therefore, ought to entertain such. — See Luke xv. 27, Gal. iv. 6, where εὐλαβεῖτε signifies simply to receive, which, in the language of the New Testament, means to lodge and entertain a person in one's house; to keep him, as one whom we esteem. Wherefore, the apostle's sentiment in this precept is, that such of the brethren as had not devoted themselves to the preaching of the gospel, but followed their ordinary occupations at home, were bound to contribute according to their ability toward the maintenance of those who went about preaching the gospel, and to render their contributions the more acceptable to them, he included himself in the church, the support of those who preached the gospel to the Gentiles, would thereby shew their earnest desire the prosperity of the Gentiles.

Ver. 9. I would have written to the church. — See νεώτερον εἰρήνην εὑρεῖν, for εὐλαβεῖτε, as plain from what follows, where the apostle, in apology for not writing to the church, adds, But Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them, doth not receive us; doth not acknowledge us as an apostle. The letters which the apostles wrote to the churches were all sent to the bishops and elders in these churches, to be read to the people in their public assemblies. See note ii. If Diotrephes was a bishop, or elder, of the church to which John would have written, he might suspect that that importunate arrogant man would have suppressed his letter; consequently, to have written to a church of which he had usurped the sole government, would have answered no good purpose. The translation of the clause of our English Bible represents the apostle as saying, that he had written a letter, which is now lost. This, he says, appears a difficulty. But the translation I have given, which is supported by several MSS., and by the Vulgate version, obviates this difficulty.

2. But Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them,—namely, who are members of his church. From Diotrephes's loving to rule the church, it may be inferred that Caicus was a member, many suppose even a bishop, or at least a deacon, to have been the bishop of that church. Besides, they think if he had been a private person only, he would not have hindered any letter which the apostle might have written to that church from being read in it, and from saving its due effect. See the Preface to this epistle, sect. 3. par. 3. from the end.

3. Doth not receive us. — On this circumstance Benson finds his opinion, that Diotrephes was a bishop or deacon. But he thinks the persons who denied John's authority as an apostle were the Jews only, not the Gentiles. See note ii. He that doeth evil hath not seen God. — See what is said concerning Demetrius, Prov. xxv. 3, last paragraph.

Ver. 10. If I bring his deeds to remembrance which he practiseth; — Τὸ τυγχάνοντος properly signifies to bring another to the remembrance of a thing, and it is so translated Luke v. 5. In thus speaking, the writer of this epistle showed himself to be Diotrephes's superior. It is therefore highly probable, that the writer of the third epistle of John was not the person called by the ancients John the preacher, but John the apostle. Heuman and Lachter are of opinion, that the apostle only meant that he would put Diotrephes in mind of his evil deeds, and endeavour to persuade him to repent of them by mild admonitions. But there is no occasion to threaten Diotrephes for his insolence in prating against him with malicious words, and for his uncharitableness in refusing to entertain and assist the brethren and the strangers, his threatening did not proceed from resentment, but from zeal for the interest of his church; in which he had a right to be concerned; because, as Whitby remarks on this verse, Private offences against ourselves must be forgiven and forgotten; but when the offence is an impediment to the faith, and very prejudicial to the church, it is to be opposed and publicly reproved.

2. He doth not himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them who would, and casteth them out, etc. — Because Caicus, who shew great kindness to the brethren and the strangers, doth not seem to have been cast out of the church by Diotrephes, Heiman contends, that the persons who were cast out of the church were not those who showed kindness to the brethren and to the strangers, but the brethren and strangers themselves; but the apostle does not oblige the church to leave the church, by denying them relief, and by hindering others from receiving them. In some passages εὐλαβεῖτε is followed by εὑρεῖν, as in this verse, and it is followed by εὐλαβεῖσθαι. It is but fair to observe, that the relative pronouns often express not the near, but the remote antecedent. See John xi. 27. Yet I take the comma to imply, that Heiman's interpretation does not give the true meaning of the passage. Some commentators, by Diotrephes's casting the persons spoken of out of the church, understand his excommunicating them; a sense of the phrase which is suitable to Diotrephes's insolent and arrogant disposition, and agreeable to the supposition, that the persons whom he cast out of the church were those who rejoiced the brethren and the strangers.

Ver. 11. Beloved, do not imitate what is evil, but what is good. — See what is said concerning Demetrius, for of God. — See note i. 10. I begotten of God; for so this phrase signifies, 1 John iii. 10. See 1 John iii. 12, note 1.

Ver. 12. Testimony is borne to Demetrius by all men. — By bearing testimony to a person, the Jews meant the like profession of him for his good qualities and actions. Thus it is said of Jesus, Luke iv. 22. All bare him witness, etc. The same manner, Paul speaking of David, saith, Acts xx. 29. ‘To whom God bare witness, saying, I have found David.’ — See what is said concerning Demetrius, Pref. sect. 2, last paragraph. This expression is twice used by John in his gospel, chap. xiv. 17, and xiv. 26, with a clear internal evidence that this epistle was written, not by John the preacher, but by John the apostle. See ver. 15. I have many things to write, etc. — John said the same to the elect lady and her children, 2 Epist. ver. 12. See the note on this word. Ver. 14. 1. I hope straightway to see thee. I. Lardner conjectures that John did actually visit Cáius, and adds, "I please myself with the supposition that his journey was not vain. I imagine that Dioscorus submitted and acquiesced in the advice and admonitions of the apostle. Of this I have no assurance. However, I may add, neither doth any one else know the contrary."—Cáius, vol. iii. p. 312.

2. The friends here salute thee. Our translators have inserted the word one in this clause without any authority.—Cáius, the friends.

This appellation is singular, being nowhere else found in scripture. But it applies excellently to the primitive Christians, as it denotes in the strongest manner the love which, in the first age, subsisted among the true disciples of Christ. Let it not then be pretended, that the gospel does not recommend private friendship.

3. Salute the friends by name. The apostle, by sending a salutation to the faithful disciples of Crist, who were in the church of which John was a member, and who were living together in great love, shewed his affection for them, and encouraged them to persevere in the truth.

JUDE.

PREFACE.

CHAP. I.—The History of Jude the Apostle, and Brother of James.

In the catalogue which Luke gives of the apostles, chap. vi. 14, 15. James the son of Alpheus, Simon called Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James, are mentioned. In the catalogue, Acts i. 13, we have the same persons named, and in the same order. But in the catalogue, Matt. x. 3, in the place of Judas there is Lebbaeus, called Thaddeus; and in Mark iii. 18. Thaddeus simply. Whereas, as all the evangelists agree that there were only twelve apostles, we must suppose that Judas the brother of James was named Lebbaeus and Thaddeus. The appellation of the brother of James was given to Judas, probably because James was the elder brother, and because, after our Lord's ascension, James became a person of considerable note among the apostles, and was highly esteemed by the Jewish believers.

In the Preface to the epistle of James, sect. 1. we have shown, that James the son of Alpheus was our Lord's brother or cousin-german. From this it follows, that Judas the brother of James stood in the same relation to Christ. Accordingly we find James and Joses, and Simon and Judas, expressively called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3. We have no account of the time and manner in which Judas the brother of Jesus became Christ's disciple. But the history of his election to the apostleship is given Luke vi. 13. Perhaps, like some others of the apostles, he was originally a follower of the Baptist, on whose testimony to Jesus he believed him to be the Messiah.

None of the evangelists have said any thing of Judas after he became an apostle except John, who tells us, that when our Lord spoke what is recorded John xiv. 81. Judas saith to him,—23. Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world? 23. Jesus answered and said to him, If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our abode with him; meaning, that after his resurrection he should show himself alive to his apostles; and that he and his Father, by the spiritual gifts bestowed on them, would make their abode with them; that is, would shew that they were present with them in all their ministrations. Accordingly, Judas the apostle was one of those to whom Jesus appeared, at different times, after his resurrection. He was also one of the 120 upon whom the Holy Ghost descend ed in the visible shape of flames of fire, on the memorable day of Pentecost.—Being therefore an eye-witness, and endowed with the Holy Ghost, he no doubt, as Lardner remarks, joined his brethren apostles in witnessing their Master's resurrection from the dead, and shared with them in the reproaches and sufferings which befell them on that account.

Lardner conjectures, that Judas the apostle was an husbandman before he became Christ's disciple; founding his conjecture on a passage of the Apostolical Constitutions, where the apostles are made to say, "Some of us are fishermen, others tent-makers, others husbandmen." He adds, "undoubtedly several of the apostles were fishermen: But by the latter part of the sentence no more may be meant, than that there was among them one tent-maker, even Paul; and one husbandman, intending perhaps St. Jude. For Hegesippus, as quoted by Eusebius, writes, "That when Domitian made inquiries after the posterity of David, some grandsons of Jude, called the Lord's brother, were brought before him. Being asked concerning their possessions and substance, they assured him, that they had only so many acres of land, out of the improvement of which they both paid him tribute and maintained themselves with their own hard labour. The truth of what they said was confirmed by the calmness of their hands," &c. On this passage Lardner's remarks are, "Hence some may argue, that St. Jude himself had been an husbandman; and from this account, if it may be relied upon, we learn that this apostle was married and had children." Lardner on the Canon, vol. iii. chap. xxi. p. 325.

If Judas the apostle was the same person with Jude the author of the epistle, he lived to a great age. And his life being thus prolonged, we may suppose that, after preaching the gospel and confirming it by miracles, he went into other countries for the same purpose. Lard ner tells us, some have said that Jude preached in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Persia; and that he suffered martyrdom in the last mentioned country. But these things are not supported by any well-authenticated history. With respect to his being a martyr, it may be doubted; because none of the ancients have mentioned his having suffered martyrdom. It is therefore generally believed that he died a natural death.—Jerome, in his Commentary on Matt. x. 35, says, "That the apostle Thaddaeus, called by the evangelist Luke Judas the brother of James, was sent to Edessa, to Agbaruos king of Oromine."—Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. lib. i. c. 13, says, Thomas, one of the twelve, sent to Edessa Thaddaeus, one of Christ's seventy disciples, to preach the gospel in these countries.

Sect. II.—Showing that the Epistle of Jude was written by Judas the Apostle, consequently that it is an inspired Writing.

I. In the inscription of this epistle, the writer styles himself Ἰησοῦς Χριστοῦ δοῦλος καὶ ἀποστόλος, 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' By these two characters, the author of this epistle hath shewed himself to be an apostle. For, 1. His name Judas is precisely the same with that of the apostle Judas. 2. His designation is the same, and brother of James.—If it be objected, that Judas, the writer of the epistle, hath not called himself an apostle, but only a servant of Jesus Christ, the answer is, First, As there was another apostle named Judas, to have called himself an apostle was no distinction at all; whereas, by styling himself the brother of James, he hath made himself known to all who are acquainted with the catalogues of the apostles given by the evangelists, to be a different person from Judas the traitor, and hath as effectually declared himself to be an apostle, as if he had expressly assumed that title. Besides, by calling himself the brother of James, he hath asserted his relation to Christ as his cousin-german, (see Pref. to James, sect. i, paragr. 1.), and thereby hath secured to himself whatever respect was due to him on account of that honourable relation. Secondly, Some others, who were undoubtedly apostles, have in their epistles omitted to take that title, and have called themselves simply servants of Jesus Christ. Thus, in Paul's epistle to the Philippians, chap. i. 1. we have Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ; and in the Epistle to Philæmon, Paul a prisoner for Jesus Christ, without any addition; also, in the inscription of the epistles to the Thessalonians, we have Paul and Silvanus and Timothy to the church of the Thessalonians, without any designation whatever. In like manner, James, in his epistle, chap. i. 1. calls himself simply a servant of Jesus Christ. Yet no one, on account of the omission of the word apostle in these epistles, ever doubted of the apostleship either of Paul or of James. For, 2. In the first epistle of John, the writer, neither in the inscription nor in any other part of his letters, hath called himself an apostle, or so much as mentioned his own name; yet, by his manner of writing, he hath made himself known so fully, that his epistle, from the very first, hath been universally acknowledged as John's, and respected as a writing divinely inspired. Why then should Judas be thought no apostle, or his epistle be reckoned an uninspired writing, merely because he hath not called himself an apostle, but only a servant of Jesus Christ?

If, in this epistle, there had been anything inconsistent with the Christian doctrine, or anything tending to reconcile the person of sin with the hope of salvation, there would have been the justest reason for calling the apostleship of its author in question. But, instead of this, its profound design, as shall be shewed by and by, was to condemn the erroneous doctrines, which in the first age were propagated by corrupt teachers, for the purpose of encouraging their disciples in their licentious courses; and to make those to whom this letter was written, sensible of the obligation which their Christian profession laid on them resolutely to maintain the faith, and constantly to follow the holy practice enjoined by the gospel.

Grotius, however, fancying that the author of this epistle was not Judas the apostle, but another person of the same name, who lived in the time of the emperor Adrian, and who was the fifteenth bishop of Jerusalem, hath boldly affirmed, that the words and brother of James are an interpolation; and that the true reading is, 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, to them who are sanctified.' 2 Cor. But as he hath not produced so much as a shadow of authority from any ancient MS. or from the Fathers, in support of his emendation, it deserves not the least regard, and should not have been mentioned, had it not been to make the reader sensible, how little the opinion of the greatest critics is to be regarded when they have a favourite notion to maintain, or wish to make themselves conspicuous by the novelty or singularity of their pretended discoveries.

From the inscription, therefore, of this epistle, I think it certain that it was written by Judas the apostle; and that it is an inspired writing of equal authority with the epistles of the other apostles, which by all are acknowledged to be inspired and canonical.

II. The genuineness of this epistle is established likewise by the matters contained in it, which in every respect are suitable to the character of an inspired apostle of Christ. For, as was already observed, the writer's design in it was to characterize and condemn the heretical teachers, who, in that age, endeavoured by a variety of base arts to make disciples; and to shew the impious doctrines which they taught for the sake of advantage; and to enforce the practice of holiness on all who professed the gospel. In short, there is no error taught, nor evil practice enjoined, for the sake of which any inspector could be moved to impose a forger of this kind on the world.

To invalidate this branch of the proof of the authenticiy of the epistle of Jude, it hath been objected, both anciently and in modern times, that the writer of it hath quoted the apocryphal book entituled Enoch, and thereby hath put that book on an equality with the canonical books of the Old Testament. But to this objection learned men have replied, that it is by no means certain that Jude quoted any book whatever: He only says, ver. 14, 'Now Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied even concerning these men, saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads.' Besides, we have no good evidence, that in Jude's time there was any book extant entitled Enoch or Enoch's Prophecy. In the second and third centuries, indeed, a book with that title was handed among the Christians. But it seems to have been forged on occasion of the mention that is made of Enoch's prophecy in the epistle of Jude; and was universally rejected as a manifest forgery. In the apostolical writings there are a variety of acquaintances mentioned or alluded to, which are not recorded in the Jewish scriptures; such as, The sin and punishment of the evil angels, 2 Pet. ii. 4, and their confinement in everlasting chains under darkness to the judgment of the great day, Jude, ver. 6.—The prophecy of Enoch concerning the judgment and punishment of the wicked, Jude, ver. 14.—Noah's preaching righteousness to the antediluvians, 2 Pet. ii. 5.—Abraham's seeing Christ's day and being gled, mentioned by Christ himself, John vii. 55.—Lot's being vexed with the filthy discourse of the wicked Sodomites, 2 Pet. ii. 7.—The emblematical purposes for which Moses slew the Egyptian who strove with the Israelites, Acta ii. 25.—The names of Pharaoh's magicians who contended with Moses, 2 Tim. iii. 8.—Moses' exclamation on the mount, when terrified by what he saw, Heb. xii. 21.—The emblematical meaning of the tabernacles and of their services, Heb. ix. 8, 9. — All which ancient facts are mentioned by the inspired writers, as things universally known and acknowledged. — It is no objection to the truth of these things, that they are not recorded in the books of the Old Testament. For it is reasonable to believe, that the writers of these books have not recorded all the revelations which God made to mankind in ancient times; nor all the circumstances of the revelations which they have recorded. As little have they related all the interesting incidents of the lives of the persons whose history they have given. This is certain with respect to Moses. For he hath omitted the revelation by which sacrifice was appointed; and yet that it was appointed of God is evident from Moses himself, who tells us, that God had respect to Abel and to his offering. Likewise, he hath omitted the discovery which was made to Abraham, of the purpose for which God ordered him to sacrifice his son. Yet, that such a discovery was made to him we learn from Christ himself, who tells us, that from a man sawed, and he was glad. Wherefore, the revelations and facts mentioned in the New Testament may all have happened; and, though not recorded in the Old, may have been preserved by tradition. Nay, it is reason to think that most of the ancient revelations were made, somewhat of their meaning was also discovered, whereby posterity were led to agree in their interpretation of these very obscure oracles. On any other supposition, that uniformity of interpretation which took place from the beginning, can hardly be accounted for.

Allowing, then, that there were revelations anciently made to mankind which are not recorded, and that the revelations which are recorded were accompanied with some explanations not mentioned, it is natural to think, that those things would be verbally published to the ancients, who, considering them as matters of importance, would lay them up in their memory, and rehearse them to their children; and they in like manner relating them to their descendants, they were preserved by uninterrupted tradition. Further, these traditional revelations, and explanations of revelations, after the art of writing became common, may have been inserted in books as ancient traditions which were well authenticated. And the Spirit of God, who inspired the evangelists and apostles, may have directed them to mention these traditions in their writings, and to allude to them, to make us sensible that many important matters, anciently made known by revelation, have been preserved by tradition. And more especially, that the perversion, which history assures us hath prevailed in all ages and countries from the most early times, concerning the placability of the Deity, the acceptableness of sacrifice, the existence of the soul after death, the resurrection of the body, the rewards and punishments of the life to come, with other matters of a like kind, was founded on revelations concerning these things which were made to mankind in the first age, and handed down by tradition. The truth is, these things being matters which by the utmost effort of their natural faculties men could not discover, the knowledge and belief of them which prevailed among all nations, whether they did, or did not, enjoy the benefit of revelation in a greater or in a less degree. But to return to the objection formerly mentioned, by which some endeavour to disprove the authenticity of Jude's epistle, founded on the mention which is made in it of Enoch's prophecy. Allowing for a moment, that there was such a book extant in the apostle's days as that entitled Henc flourish, or the prophecy of Henc, and that Jude quoted it from the prophecy under consideration, such a quotation would not lessen the authority of his epistle as an inspired writing, any more than the quotations from the heathen poct Aratus, Acts xviii. 30, and from Xenander, 1 Cor. xv. 33, and from Epenisses, Tit. ii. 12, have lessened the authority of the history of the Acts, and of Paul's epistles, where these quotations are found. The reason is, if the things contained in these quotations were true in themselves, they might be mentioned by an inspired writer, without giving authority to the poems from which they were taken. In like manner, if the prophecy ascribed to Enoch, concerning the future judgment and punishment of the wicked, was agreeable to the other declarations of God concerning that event, Jude might cite it; because Enoch, who like Noah was a preacher of righteousness, may actually have delivered such a prophecy, though it be not recorded in the Old Testament; and because his quoting it did not establish the authority of the book from which he took it, if he took it from any book extant in his time.

Having thus cleared the internal evidence of the epistle of Jude from the objections which have been raised against it, I shall now set before the reader the external evidence by which the authenticity of that writing is proved. — For this purpose I observe, that although the epistle of Jude was doubted of by some in the early ages, yet, as soon as it was understood that its author was the brother of James, mentioned in the catalogue of the apostles, it was generally received as an apostolic inspired writing, and read publicly in the churches as such. The evidence of these important and decisive facts I shall set before the reader, as collected and arranged by the learned and impartial Lardner.

And first of all, Lardner acknowledgeth that the epistle of Jude is nowhere quoted by bishops, who wrote about the year 178; but that Eusebius, giving an account of the works of Clem, Alexandr. who flourished about the year 194, saith, Eccles. Hist. lib. vi. c. 14. inito. "In his institutions he hath given explications of all the Canonical Scriptures, not omitting those which are contradicted; I mean the epistle of Jude, and the other catholic epistles." Clement's Institutions are lost; but we have a small treatise in Latin, called Adversubles, supposed to be translated from the Institutions. In these Adversubles there are remarks upon almost every verse of the epistle of Jude except the last. There likewise is the following observation: "Jude, who wrote a catholic epistle, does not style himself at the beginning of it Brother of the Lord, though he was related to him, but Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." From this it appears, that Clement thought the epistle of Jude under consideration one of them who are called the Lord's brethren, Matt. xiii. 55. and an apostle. — Further, verses 5, 6, and 11. of the epistle of Jude, are quoted by Clement in his Pedagogy, or Instrutor. Moreover, in his Stromata or Miscellanea he quotes Jude from ver. 8. to ver. 16. These are sufficient proofs of the antiquity of this epistle, and that it was written by Judas, one of the twelve apostles of Christ.

Tertullian, who flourished about the year 200, hath one very express quotation from Jude's epistle, in his treatise De Cultu Femine, namely this: "Hence it is that Enoch is quoted by the apostle Jude."

Origen, about the year 330, mentions the epistle of Jude in various passages of his writings; particularly in his Commentaries on St. Matthew, having cited chap. xiii. 53. 56. he saith, "Jude wrote an epistle in few lines indeed, but full of the powerful words of the heavenly grace, who at the beginning says, Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." And in the same Commentaries on St. Matthew, having quoted 1 Pet. i. 13. he says, "If any one receives also the epistle of Jude, let him consider what will follow from what is there said, And the angels who kept not their first estate; &c. Wherefore, notwithstanding in Origen's time some doubted of, or denied the authority of this epistle, he himself without hesitation quoted it as written by Jude, one of the Lord's brethren, consequently by an apostle.

In the writings of Cyprian, who flourished about the year 254, no notice is taken of Jude's epistle. But it is quoted by the anonymous author against the Novatian heretic, who wrote about the year 355. However, he does not name Jude. His words are, "As it is written, Behold he cometh with ten thousands of his angels to execute judgment upon all; and what follows." He means the 14th and 15th verses of the epistle.

Eusebius, who flourished about the year 315, hath mentioned Jude's epistle. See the passage in the Pref. to James, sect. 2, parag. 2. From that passage it appears, that Eusebius Jude's epistle was generally received, though not by all. After the time of Eusebius, seven Catholic epistles were generally received by all Christians, Greek and Latin. Jude's epistle therefore, as well as the rest, was received by Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Didymus of Alexandria, Jerome, Ruffin, the third council of Carthage, Augustine, Isidore of Pelusium, Cyril of Alexandria, and others. But it was not received by the Syrians. Lardner adds, that he found this epistle often quoted by writers who lived about the time of Eusebius, than the epistle of James.

Lucifer of Cagliari in Siciliana, about the year 354, hath quoted almost the whole of Jude's epistle. He quotes it expressly as written by the excellent apostle Jude, brother of James the Lord's brethren. Epiphanius, about the year 368, in his Heresy of the Gnostics, "cites the catholic epistle of the apostle Jude, brother of James and of the Lord, written by inspiration." Jerome, in his Catalogue of ecclesiastical writers, Arv. Jude, says, "Jude the brother of James left a short epistle, which is one of the seven called Catholic. But, because of a quotation from a book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, it is rejected by many. However, at length it hath obtained authority, and is reckoned among the Sacred Scriptures."

Sect. III.—Of the Persons to whom the Epistle of Jude was directed, and of the Time when it was written.

1. Ervras and Witsius were of opinion that Jude wrote to the Jews everywhere, but especially to the converted Jews. Hammond thought this epistle was directed to Jewish Christians alone; and with a design to secure them against the errors of the Gnostics. Bingen also thought it was written to Jewish believers especially to those of the western dispersion. For, according to him, Jude wrote to the very persons to whom Peter wrote his epistles. But I agree with Lardner in thinking, that the inscription of this letter leads us to believe, that it was written to all, without distinction, who had embraced the gospel. For it runs in this manner, ver. 1. 'To the sanctified by God the Father, and to the preserved by Jesus Christ, to the called.' 2. Beloved, making all haste to write to you concerning the common salvation, I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the saints. For the reason why I write this letter, I entreat you to consider the common salvation. I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the saints.

The only reason which hath induced commentators to suppose that Jude wrote to the Jewish believers alone, is, that he makes use of arguments and examples taken from the sacred books of the Jews. But the apostle Paul followed the same course in writing to the Gentiles; and both apostles did so with propriety, not only because all who embraced the gospel acknowledged the authority of the Jewish scriptures, but because it was of the greatest importance to make the Gentiles sensible, that the gospel was concomitant to the ancient revelation.

II. Learned men, as Lardner observes, have differed in their opinion with respect to the time when Jude wrote his epistle. Mill hath fixed it to a. d. 80; for he saith, "It is certain this epistle was written after the death of Peter, but before the year 95, when the descendants of this Jude were suspected by Domitian, because they were of the family of David." See Pref. to Jude, sect. 1. parag. 4. "For otherwise the apostle would not have reached to Jude himself, if he had been alive, as much as to his descendants."—But Dodd, who is followed by Cave, is of opinion that Jude wrote his epistle soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 70, or in 71. L'Enfant and Beausobre thought it might be written between the years 70 and 75. Estius and Witsius supposed it was written in the latter part of the apostolic age, when Jude was very old, and when few or perhaps none of the apostles were alive but himself. Oecumenius, in his note on ver. 17. 'Beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ,' saith, "Jude means Peter in his second epistle, and Paul in almost all his epistles;" and adds, "Hence it is evident that Jude wrote late after the decease of the apostles."—I agree with Oecumenius in thinking, that by the words before spoken by the apostles, Jude meant the words committed to writing; because it is not to be supposed that all, or even many of those into whose hands Jude's epistle might come, had heard the apostles preach. This epistle therefore was written when the writings of the apostles and evangelists were generally dispersed; that is to say, towards the end of the apostolic age.

The same thing appears from ver. 3. "I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the saints." For these expressions, I think, imply, that some considerable time had elapsed since the whole scheme of the Christian doctrine had been published to the world, and after the persons to whom Jude wrote had been instructed in it.

Upon the whole, although the precise date of this epistle cannot be determined, it is highly probable that it was written in the latter part of the apostolic age; and not long before Jude's death. See however the following sect. parag. 3.

Sect. IV.—Of the Occasion on which the Epistle of Jude was written.

In the latter part of the apostolic age many false teachers had arisen, and were going about speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them, as St. Paul had foretold to the elders of Ephesus, Acts xx. 30. See Pref. to I John, sect. 3. In drawing disciples after them, these teachers had nothing in view but to increase their own gains, that they might have wherewithal to spend upon their lusts. For the first Christians having a great affection for their teachers, willingly and liberally contributed towards their maintenance. But Jude foresees, that the vicious part of mankind after them, perverting Paul's doctrine of justification by faith without the works of law, resolved the whole of Christianity into the speculative belief and outward profession of the gospel. See Pref. to James, sect. 4. And, having thus cancelled the obligations of morality, they taught their disciples to live in all manner of licentiousness; and at the same time flattered them with the hope of the favour of God, and of obtaining eternal life.

One of the perverse things which these corrupt teachers spake for the purpose of alluring the wicked was that God is so good that he will not punish men for indulging those natural appetites which he himself hath implanted in their nature, nor be displeased with them for committing a few sins which can do him no harm, but which are necessary to their present happiness. Wherefore, to shew the impiety and falsehood of that doctrine, and to secure the disciples from being seduced by it, the apostle Jude wrote this epistle, in which, by facts recorded in the Jewish scriptures, he proved, that as God had already punished the angels who sinned, notwithstanding their dignity and their angels, notwithstanding their number, so he will at length most assuredly punish all obstinate sinners in the severest manner.

Estius hath observed, that the subject of Jude's epistle is the same with that of Peter's second epistle; and hath accounted for the likeness of the two epistles by supposing, that Jude had read Peter's epistle before he wrote his own; and that he imitated it; in some places abridging Peter's sentiments, and in others enlarging upon them, and often using his very words. As an example, he mentions Jude, ver. 17, 18, where he thinks Jude copied 2 Pet. iii. 3. In this opinion Estius is followed by Benson, who, in his Pref. to Jude, sect. 3, thus writes: "Upon comparing the two epistles, it appears not only that St. Peter and St. Jude had translated some passages from the same ancient Hebrew author; (in this Benson follows Bishop Sherlock, Dissert. on 2 Pet.) but it seems highly probable that St. Jude had also seen and read the second epistle of St. Peter."—But Landenber, Canon, vol. iii. p. 353. It seems very unlikely that St. Jude should write so similar an epistle if he had seen Peter's. In that case, St. Jude would not have thought it needful for him to write at all. If he had formed a design of writing, and had met with an epistle of one of the apostles very suitable to his own thoughts and intentions, I think he would have forbore to write. Indeed, the great agreement in subject and design between these two epistles, affords a strong argument that they were writ about the same time. As therefore I have placed the second epistle of St. Peter in the year 64, I am induced to place this epistle of St. Jude in the same year, or soon after, in 65 or 66. For there was exactly the same state of things in the Christian church, or in some part of it, when both these epistles were writ." Thus far Landenber.

But I incline to be of their opinion, who, on account of the sameness both of sentiment and language found in the two epistles, think that Jude wrote his epistle after he had read Peter's, and that he copied it in several passages. For the Spirit may have directed him to write on the same subject with Peter, and even in the words which Peter used, to give the greater authority to both epistles; and that the condemnation of the false teachers, and the exhortations which the two apostles addressed to the faithful in their time, might have the more weight with them, and with Christians in succeeding ages, when they found these things delivered by both, precisely in the same terms.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in the Epistle of Jude.

After inscribing his letter to all who were sanctified, and preserved, and called, Jude, after the example of his brethren apostles, gave to the faithful his apocalyptic benediction, ver. 1, 2. Then told them that he judged it necessary, in the then state of the church, to exhort them strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the holy apostles and prophets, and by them to the disciples of Christ, ver. 3—because certain ungodly men, under the mask of being inspired, had come in among the faithful, and, from the goodness of God in pardoning men's sins, published in the gospel, had inferred that God would not punish sinners; and, by thus perverting the mercy of God, had encouraged their disciples in all manner of lecherous practices. Moreover, when in danger of suffering for their faith, they had not scrupled to deny both God and Christ; vainly fancying that God would not punish them for so doing, ver. 4. But, to shew how ill-founded the doctrine of these deceivers was, Jude put the faithful in mind, how God, having saved the people of Israel from Egypt, afterwards utterly destroyed the whole of them in the wilderness for their sin of unbelief, except Caleb and Joshua, ver. 5—and, how he bound the rebellious angels with everlasting chains, under darkness, in order to their being punished at the judgment of the great day, ver. 6. Moreover he told them, seeing the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah and of the neighbouring cities, who had given themselves up to unnatural lusts as the false teachers likewise did, are, in the punishment which was inflicted on them, set forth as an everlasting example of God's just indignation against such crimes, ver. 7—so, in like manner, said he, these wicked teachers and their disciples shall assuredly be punished, who having lost all sense of virtue, defiled their bodies with unnatural lusts, and despised the office of magistrates, and reviled those who exercised it, because they punished them for their misdeeds, ver. 8. With this insolence of the heretical teachers towards the heathen magistrates, the apostle contrasted the behaviour of the archangel Michael towards the devil. For, as the prophet Zechariah informs us, that great and holy angel, when, contending with the devil who opposed him in his benevolent designs towards the Jewish church and state, he did not attempt to revile even that apostate spirit, but said to him mildly, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan, ver. 9—whereas the wicked teachers who are now gone abroad, speak evil of magistrates, the origin and end of whose office they do not understand; and corrupt themselves by the only knowledge they possess, namely, that knowledge of the use of their body which is suggested to them by their natural appetites, and which they have in common with brute beasts, ver. 10. The apostle, therefore, declared the misery which was awaiting these impious teachers, whose wickedness in slaying the souls of men by their false doctrine he compared to that of Cain, who slew his brother; and whose excessive love of money he compared to that of Balaam, who, to obtain the hire which Balak promised him, attempted to curse the Israelites contrary to his conscience; and whose miserable end, for opposing Christ and his apostles, he compared to that of Korah and his companions for opposing Moses and Aaron, ver. 11. These wicked teachers, the apostle told the faithful, were spots in their love-feasts, being guilty of glutony and drunkenness; so that, even if they had taught true doctrine, they would have rendered it ineffectual by their bad example. For which reason he compared them to clouds without water, and to trees absolutely dead, ver. 12. And because by their wicked practices they disgraced themselves, he called them 'raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame;' and meteors which were to be extinguished for ever, ver. 13. Further, to terrify these wicked men, he declared, that Enoch prophesied, not to the antediluvians only, but to them also, when he said, Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his holy angels, ver. 14. To inflict condign punishment on all the ungodly, both for their impious speeches and for their wicked practices, ver. 15. And that the faithful might be at no loss to know them, he

Ver. 1. Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them who are sanctified by God the Father, and to the preserved by Jesus Christ, to the called; 2. May mercy, and peace, and love, be multiplied to you.

3. Beloved, making all haste to write to you concerning the common salvation, I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you stridency to contend for the faith; therefore I formerly delivered to the saints.

Commentary.

Ver. 1. Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them who are separated from the idolatrous world by their faith in God, the Father of all, and to all whom are preserved by Jesus Christ from the corrupt practices of idolaters, and from the errors disseminated by false teachers, even to all the called seed of Abraham; 2. May pardon of sin, and happiness, temporal and eternal (see Rom. 11:16, note 4), and love to God and man, abound to you.

3. Beloved, making all haste to write to you concerning the common salvation, instead of spending time in explaining the nature of that salvation, and shewing that it is common to Jews and Gentiles, or in proving any of the doctrines of the gospel, I thought it more necessary to write to you, exhorting you stridency to contend, the faith formerly delivered to the holy prophets and apostles of Christ, and by them published to the world.

New Translation.

3. Beloved, making all haste to write to you concerning the common salvation, I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you stridency to contend for the faith; therefore I formerly delivered to the saints.

* Ver. 1. Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James. 1 For the history of Jude, see Pref. sect. 1, and sect 2 where it is shewn, that by this designation Jude declared himself an apostle. Jude might have called himself the brother of Jesus Christ, rather than the brother of James. But he avoided that designation in the subscription of a letter which he wrote in the character of an apostle, to shew, that whatever respect as a man he might deserve on account of his relation to Christ, he derived no authority from it as an apostle, nor indeed claimed any.

2. The preserved by Jesus Christ.—The proposition εὐθείας, by which the Greek phrases are governed, is often wanting, especially when it is expressed in a preceding clause, as in the present verse, where we have εὐθείας τῆς αὐτοῦ τάξεως. But in translating these clauses, or in rendering the particular doctrines of the gospel,—by stridency contending for the faith, the apostle did not mean condemning it with fire and sword; but their endeavouring, in the spirit of meekness and love, to establish the true doctrine of the gospel by argument drawn, not only from the Jewish scriptures, but especially from the writings of the evangelists and apostles, which were all, or most of them, published when Jude wrote this letter. In the same manner they were strongly to oppose and confute the errors of the false-teachers. The word καταχράσεις properly signifies to strive as in the Olympic games; that is, with their whole might.

For the faith.—Here faith, by an usual antonymy, is put for the objects of faith; namely, the doctrines and precepts of the gospel; both being equally the objects of God's presence in their assemblies; and, being conscious of their loving God, they would on good ground expect the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ exercised towards them in the pardon of their sins, accompanied with eternal life, ver. 21. And as it would be God's will to have them to attempt the reformation of those who erred, whether they were teachers or private Christians, the apostle desired them to make a distinction in their manner of treating them. They were to exercise compassion towards those who erred through ignorance and weakness; that is, they were to instruct and reclaim such by the gentle method of persuasion, ver. 22. But the false teachers, who erred wilfully through corruption of heart, they were to save from destruction by the power of terror, reproving them sharply, and censoring them severely, that they might snatch them out of the fire of the wrath of God, which was ready to devour them. But in doing them this friendly office, they were to shun all familiarity with them, as carefully as they would shun touching a garment spotted by the leper, Gen. 37:3. Thus they who had a plague-sore, lest they should be infected by their vicious conversation, ver. 23.

Having thus finished what he judged necessary for their instruction and direction, the apostle, encouraged the faithful to persevere in the true doctrine and practice of the gospel, by a solemn aspiration of praise to him who was both able and willing to keep them from falling into error, and to present them faultless at the day of judgment, with exceeding joy to themselves, ver. 24. Even to the only wise God our Saviour, whose glory as God and Saviour will last through all ages. Then, to shew his firm persuasion of all the things which he had written, the apostle concluded his epistle, with an Amen, ver. 25.

hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day. 4

7 (Tit. Parkh.) As Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities around them, which in a manner like to these had habitually committed whoredom, and gone after other flesh, are set forth as an example, having undergone the punishment of an eternal fire, 5

8 (Oemec με τα 294.) In like manner, indeed, these also shall be punished. Being cast into a deep sleep, they defile the flesh, and despise (supper) government, and revile (λείπου) dignities. 6

9 (a) But Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, did not attempt to bring for punishment of this clause, viz. 'who kept not their estate,' expressive, it is the paraphrase, and not a translation. — Hunt, in his Dissertation on the fall of man, saith, the office of the angels who sinned was to attend the divine presence in paradise, and in minister to mankind. But this is to be wise above what is written. See note 4.

3. But left the proper habitation. — Which proper place denotes the place in which God appointed the angels who sinned to execute the offices and functions which he had assigned to them. According to Hunt, their habitation was earth. It is of more importance to observe, that they sinned. The angels kept not their own office, but left their proper habitation, the apostle intimates that they attempted to raise themselves to a higher station than that which God had allotted to them; consequently, that sin for which they are to be punished is pride and rebellion.

4. He hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness. — Everlasting chains is a metaphorical expression, which denotes a perpetual confinement, which it is no more in their power to escape from, than a man who is strongly bound with iron chains can break them. See the explication of this phrase under darkness, verse 5. 2 Pet. ii. 4. 4.

4. Unto the judgment of the great day. — This great day is elsewhere called the day of the Lord, and that day, emphatically. In our Lord's description of the general judgment, Matt. xxv. 41, he tells us, that the wicked are to 'depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' This implies that these spirits are to be punished with the wicked of mount. Hunt, in his Dissertation referred to note 1, on this verse, saith, Upon the supposition that the fallen angels belong to our species, their punishment with the wicked of our species will appear the more congruous. If the angels who sinned were originally appointed to minister to mankind, as Hunt imagines, and were disconected with this earth in its paradisical state as an habitation, the atmosphere surrounding which the earth in its present altered state, is very properly made the place here mentioned in which they are confined of the general judgment.

5. And the devil around them. — These cities were Admah and Zeboim. The four are mentioned Deut. xxxii. 28—30; Zoor, the fifth city in the plain of Sodom, was spared at the request of Lot, for the sake of refuge to himself and his two daughters.

6. Which in a manner like to these. — Tit. i. 2. 2. 7. 7. I have followed our translators in completing the construction of this clause, by supplying the preposition κατά, which the sense likewise requires—like to these. The relative τοις, being masculine, may refer to the ungodly teachers mentioned ver. 4; or, though κατά may be feminine word, yet, as it signifies the inhabitants of a city as well as the city itself, the relative τοις may very properly be in the masculine gender, to denote the inhabitants of the other cities of the plain. See Esai. iv. 14—16. I make these observations, because some commentators suppose τοις stands for the angels who left their proper habitation, as if their sin had been lawlessness: which is a very false idea.

8. Habitation committed unholy: — This is the literal signification of the compound word ἀθυετήσασθαι, which translates; because it increases the signification of the word with which it is compounded. In the language of scripture, ἀθυετήσασθαι signifies to commit any sort of whoredom or uncleanness, and among the rood sodom. See 1 Cor. vi. 1. note 1, and Parkhurst in voc. voc. 294. Esaius saith the preposition in this compound word denotes the Sodomites committing whoredom out of the order of nature. They committed the unnatural crime which hath taken its name from them. 4. Are set forth (εἰς τὸ παράθυεν) as an example. — See 2 Pet. iii. 6. The burning of the cities of the plain being represented here as an example, etc., is to be understood metaphorically, for God will inflict on the wicked, the consideration thereof shall be a warning to those who still lust after vain devices, and bring them to repentance. For when God is about to punish them in that dreadful way, will they not repent? 5. In like manner, indeed, these also shall be punished. — 1 Pet. iv. 1. 4. — I put a full point after the words εἰς τὸ παράθυεν; and to finish the sentence, I supply the words shall be punished, from the Greek, the foregoing verse, with which this clause is connected in the sense, being a resolution to the clause in the beginning of ver. 7. — For then, in the transgression of this apostle, since, or as Sodom and Gomorrha are set forth as an example, etc. ver. 5, it is like manner certainly these also shall be punished. — In the beginning of verse 8 a new sentiment is introduced, which therefore should have been made the beginning of the verse. 2. Being cast into a deep sleep. — This is the literal translation of the word ἀθυετήσασθαι, as being cast into a deep sleep. — The Hebrew word used in other passages of scripture, the wicked are represented as fast asleep. See Rom. xiii. 11. 1 Thes. v. 8.

5. And despise government. — See 2 Pet. ii. 10. note 2, and revile dignities. — 1 Pet. ii. 13—15. Hereby they revile giants, that is, those who possess the glory of the magistrate's office. This must be the meaning of λείπου, as distinguished from ἀθυετήσασθαι, government. The Jews, having it stuf to obey the heathen magistrates, despised both them and their office. The ungodly teachers of whom Jude speaks carried the matter still farther, they reviled all magistrates whatever, as enemies to the natural liberty of mankind.

9. But Michael the archangel, — Michael is mentioned Dan. xiii. 21. xlii. 1, as standing up in defence of the children of Daniel's people. Because it is said, Rev. xvi. 7, that 'Michael and his angels fought against the dragon and his angels.' Esaius conjectures that Michael is the chief or prince of all the angels. But this argument is not conclusive. Because the book of Daniel is the first sacred writing in which proper names are given to particular angels, some have fancied, that during the design of writing this book, the names of the angels which were invented these names, or learned them from the Chaldæans. But this seems an unfounded conjecture, for though Michael appeared to Zacharias, Luke x. 18, called himself Gabriel, which shows that that name was not of Chaldæan origin.

10. When contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses. — In the passage of Daniel's prophecy quoted in the preceding note, Michael is spoken of as one of the chief angels who took care of the Israelites as a nation. He was called the angel of the Lord, before whom Joshua the high-priest is said, Zech. iii. 1. to have stood, 'Zacham being at his right hand to resist him,' namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish church and state, called by Jude the body of Moses, just as the Christian church is called by Paul the body of Christ. Zachariah adds, 'And the Lord,' that is, the angel of the Lord, is as plain from ver. 1. said unto Zach. The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan, even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee.' — Le Clerc gives a different interpretation of this passage. By Satan in Zachariah's vision, and ἀθυετήσεσθαι in Jude's epistle, he understands Tannai and Sosethareb, the king of Persia's lieutenant, who opposed the restoration of Jerusalem, and who on that account might be called Satan, or the adversary of the Jews, in the same manner that Peter was called Satan by his Master for opposing his suffering at Jerusalem. According to this interpretation, Jude's meaning is, that the angel in Zachariah's vision brought no reviling accusation against the adversaries of the Jews, but reproved them with modesty on account of their being magistrates. This Jude mentioned to show the ungodly teachers who reviled the Roman magistrates, that they were culpable in doing what the angels, who, as Peter, observed, 1 Pet. ii. 14, are greater in power than they, did not attempt to do.

11. Samaea, Edinah, Tissinon, and others, by which the devil contended with Michael, understand his dead body, which they suppose the devil contended should be buried publicly, on pretence of doing honour to Moses; but by that intention it was to give the Israelites an opportunity of raising his body and worshipping it. That Michael, knowing this, refused the devil in the words mentioned by Jude; and to prevent the Israelites from committing idolatry, buried Moses's body so secretly that the Israelites ever knew where his sepulchre was. Virgil, instead of the body of Moses, proposes to lead the bodies of the gods to the infernal kingdom, to set them out any authority whatever. The first mentioned account of this
JUDE.

Though that malicious spirit was clothed with no authority of office, he did not attempt to bring against him a reviving accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee, Samtan.

10 (x. 100.) Yet these men revile those things which indeed they do not know. But what they know, they do so as animals void of reason, by these they destroy themselves.

11 Wo to them; for they have gone in the way of Cain, and have run far in the error of Balaam’s hire, and have perished in the rebellion of Korah.

19 These men are spots in your love-feasts; when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear; they are clouds without water, carried about of winds; and the ungodly teachers are there said to have followed in it. See notes 1, 2, on that passage of Peter.

3. And have perished. Here, as in many passages of scripture, a thing is said to have happened, which was only to happen. This manner of expression was used to show the absolute certainty of the thing spoken of. Have perished, therefore, means, shall certainly perish. See Eccl. x. 18.

and the blackness of darkness for ever is reserved.

13 Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shade; wandering stars, for whom the darkness of nature is ever reserved. 2

14 (New Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied) even (6, 168), concerning these men; 2 saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads of angels.

To pass sentence on all, to make the tribunal and the justice of mankind sensible of all the impious actions which they have impiously committed, and of all the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. 3

These are murmurers, and complainers, and who say that their lot is not what they deserve; and them speaks the great swell words; (σημαίνει τεκνῶν) They admire persons for 'clouds without water, carried about of winds,' because, notwithstanding they give an earnest expectation of good doctrine, they offend none; in which respect they are like clouds which promise rain, but bring not forth rain; they are sandals, in respect of which they are like sandals; (See Rev. ii. 17, note 3. 7. Withered autumnal trees: So I translate σφετάριοι, because it signifies σφετερίζω, to wither, to wither away, according to Tholuck, signifies σφετέρα, and σφιτός, and σφετερίδες, Behemoth is a mountain monster: 'A tree without a fruit.' This sense of the word was adopted in his translation of the Apocrypha. The word, upon the pagan, the thoroughly, suggests a beautiful idea. In the eastern countries the finest fruits are produced in autumn, by calling the corrupt teachers autumnal trees, Jethl intimated the just expectation which was entertained of their being fruitful in good doctrine; but by adding without fruit, he marked their uselessness, and the disappointment of their disciples.

15 Twice dead; rooted out. 1—Here the apostle intimates, that while those ungodly teachers, who were mostly of the Jewish nation, continued under the Mosaic dispensation, they were dead and unfruitful: And that under the gospel dispensation, though they seemed to flourish for a little while, and promised to bring forth fruit, they had proved as barren as before, having died a second time, and for that reason were justly rooted out. The commentators observe, that there is a striking climax in this description of the false teachers. They were trees stripped of their leaves, and withering. They had no fruit, being barren that season. They were once dead, having borne no fruit the former year: Lastly, they were rooted out as utterly barren. 2 Wandering stars. Παράδοσης, Doddridge, in his note on this verse, observes, That the Jews called their teachers paradosi, and that the teachers in the Christian church are represented under the emblem of stars, Rev. i. 20, 1. Wherefore, as the planets have irregular motions, being sometimes stationary and sometimes retrograde, he thinks they are proper emblems of those who are unsettled in their principles, and irregular in their behaviour.

16 For whom the blackness of darkness for ever is reserved. As the apostle intimates, the that the planets are naturally dark bodies, and derive all their light from the sun, it is supposed that Judas corrupted the false teachers, not to mention the fruit of the true doctrine, which have no existence after they are extinguished, but to plants property so careless.

Ver. 14—Now Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied—See Pref. sect. 2, No. 2, parag. 2. Though Moses had nothing concerning Enoch's prophecy, yet, by telling us that he was a preacher, and that he was a tree in the garden of Eden, he was a teacher in heaven, and in the body with the dead, dying, he hath warranted us to believe Judg. account of him; namely, that God employed him, as he did Noah, in reforming the wicked of the age in which he lived, and that he required from him the prophecy of which Judas speaks. That Enoch was endowed with the spirit of prophecy, that is, that God gave him the power of speaking in the name which he gave to his son, to wit, Methuselah; which signifies, that he, being instructed from the seventh from Adam, to distinguish him from the son of Cain, Gen. iv. 18, was a teacher of the Gentile world.

2 Prophesied even concerning these men: So I translate προφητεύειν, by prophesying, or by speaking of things to come, without the preposition, thus, 'prophesied also to these men,' as well as to the clouds without rain, which intercept the genial rays of the sun, and being carried about of winds, render men's habitations gloomy. (See 2 Pet. ii. 17.) They are withered autumnal trees without fruit, although they ought to produce the best: the trees that are dead twice over, once in the Jewish, and a second time in the Christian vineyard; and are rooted out on that account.

17 They are as unstable in their doctrine, and as turbulent in their sermons, as raging waves of the sea, so that they are without their shame apparent to all. Having renounced the true doctrines of the gospel, instead of being the lights of the world, they are wandering meteors, which are quickly to be extinguished in perpetual darkness.

18 Now Enoch, the seventh in descent from Adam, prophesied even concerning these ungodly teachers, when he foretold the destruction of the wicked at the general judgment, saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his myriads of angels, to pass sentence on all, and to make the tribunal and justice of mankind sensible of all the impious actions which they have impiously committed, and of all the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him, as if he were an impostor who was justly punished with an ignominious death.

19 These ungodly teachers are murmurers against God, and complainers, and who say that their lot is not what they deserve; and them speaks the great swell words, in praise of themselves, as the only teachers who free men from the antithedevians. Though Enoch prophesied immediately to the wicked men of his own age, what he said was transferred to the wicked in every age.

3 Raging, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads of angels. So I translate προφητεύειν, because it signifies προφητευσία, prophesying; and so in the plural, προφητεύουσιν, προφητεύουσιν, they speak prophetic words. But it is used for the future tense, as in the plural, προφητεύσωσιν, προφητεύσωσιν, infinitely, to signify an innumerable multitude. Μόνος, τό προφητεύειν, came. But in the prophetic style the present is often put for the future, to signify the uncertainty of the event foretold: The Lord cometh, or, as it is in our Bible, the Lord cometh, being the genuine prophetic style, it is no proof, as Benson fancies, that Jethl took this prophecy out of some book. If it was preserved by tradition, this is the language in which it must have been preserved.
JUDE.

The sake of gain. They admire and praise persons, not for their good qualities, but for their riches, that they may get money from them for their flattery.

But, beloved, remember ye the words which were before spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ;

That they said to you, that in the last times there should be scoffers, walking according to their own ungodly lusts.

These be they who separate themselves from others; not having the Spirit.

But ye, beloved, building (inworks), 65. 1.) one another on your most holy faith, and praying (ευπληρείσθαι) by the Holy Spirit;

4. They admire persons for the sake of gain.—The false teachers of that age greatly admired the rich on account of their riches, therefore drawing many away. They despised them likewise with the hope of salvation; and by so doing hardened them in their sins. In short, they were the bathing of the rich and the wil of their rich disciples in anything. And this servility they showed towards the rich, merely to draw them to them; and so they were permitted by the Lord to be led away by the error of Judas.

Ver. 17. Remember ye the words which were before spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ.—In ver. 18, Jude cites the words spoken by Peter in particular, concerning the coming of scoffers in the last time. Yet Jude’s exhortation being general, it comprehends the words spoken by the other apostles concerning the coming of false teachers: Such as Paul’s words, 1 Thes. i. 1—6. 2 Tim. ii. 3. And, As I understand it, it comprehends the words spoken by Jude himself in the preceding part of this epistle. For we have showed, First, that there would be scoffers, walking according to their own unbelieving lusts. Then he saith, The answer to that office. bycalling himself the brother of James. He mentions, in his observations upon the epistle of Peter concerning the present English version, 4c, thinks this clause should be translated, ‘Remember ye the words which were formerly spoken by the apostles.’

Ver. 18. That they said to you, that in the last time there would be scoffers, walking according to their own unbelieving lusts.—Though it be allowed that Jude in this verse translates 2 Pet. iii. 3, it will not follow, from his using Peter’s words, that the two apostles wrote of the same persons. Peter, in the passage quoted by Jude, evidently speaks of scoffers who were to arise in the age in which Christ was to come to judge mankind, and put an end to this mundane system. For he represents them as ridiculing the promise of Christ’s coming, as a thing not likely to happen after being so long delayed. Whereas Jude speaks of scoffers as already come, ver. 4, and the account which he gives of them, that they perverted the grace of God to lasciviousness; denied God and Christ; despised government; reviled dignities; led innocent persons astray; took for beastly sports those which are in the punishment of Gehenna; and said nothing of scoffing at the prophecies of Christ according to the order of God, nor of any doctrines or promises of the gospel. He calls them scoffers on account of their reviling dignities, and perhaps of their ridiculing those precepts of the gospel which prohibited lasciviousness. However, the order of opinion still is, that Jude, like Peter, speaks of the scoffers who are to arise about the end of the world, his exhortation to remember the words which Peter again speaking concerning them was highly proper, because the recollection of Peter’s prophecy would put the faithful in every age on their guard against such false teachers as might arise in any future period.

Ver. 19. These be they who separate themselves from others; namely, on account of their pretended great illumination. In the common text it is μαθητεύοντες, who separate from. But many MSS. add the word ευπληρείσθαι, a reading which our translators have followed, and which is warranted by the Vulgate, where we find, Qui segregant sibi metentes. Likewise have followed that reading, and have supplied the word others, because the preposition in the word ευπληρείσθαι requires it. From Rom. xvi. 17. It appears, that the heretical teachers very early began to set up separate assemblies for worship. See Rom. xvi. 17. Note 2. Perhaps they founded their practice on Gen. i. 17.

2. Animal men.—Some are of opinion that by νεκρον, animal men, the apostle means those who are governed by the lusts which properly belong to the animal part of the human nature, and who are, therefore, capable of being served by animals. Others, by natural men, understand those who in religion submit of nothing as true but what is consented to by them, and can be explained upon what they call the principles of reason. In this sense of the word, it is said in Col. ii. 8. See note 1. there. I think the apostle calls the false teachers animal men, because they were neither inspired by the Spirit of God, nor guided by right reason.

3. Not having the Spirit.—The ungodly teachers boasted of having no illumination from the Spirit superior to that of the disciples of the apostles. And on this pretence they separated themselves and their disciples from the others. But their boasting was without foundation: these men were truly what they called others, mere animal men, not having the Spirit, either of God or of another reason.

Ver. 20. Building one another on your most holy faith.—Here faith is put for the object of faith: the substance of the promise, and the prophecies, and the promises of the gospel. This faith the apostle terms holy, because it is the genuine and unerring guide of the true people of God of all kinds, and to make men holy both in mind and body. Whereas the faith of the ungodly teachers, especially those of the Nicene sect, was most uncleancly, faith, as it encouraged men in all manner of licentiousness.

2. And praying by the Holy Spirit.—From I Cor. xiv. 16. Paul, speaking to the Corinthians, I will pray with the Spirit; 1 Cor. xiv. 14. I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also. In the first age uttered prayers and psalms in their public assemblies by an immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as an apostle, and that he addressed his words to that office by calling himself the brother of James. He mentions, in his observations upon the epistle of Peter concerning the present English version, 4c, thinks this clause should be translated, ‘Remember ye the words which were formerly spoken by the apostles.’

Ver. 17. That they said to you, that in the last time there would be scoffers, walking according to their own unbelieving lusts.—Though it be allowed that Jude in this verse translates 2 Pet. iii. 3, it will not follow, from his using Peter’s words, that the two apostles wrote of the same persons. Peter, in the passage quoted by Jude, evidently speaks of scoffers who were to arise in the age in which Christ was to come to judge mankind, and put an end to this mundane system. For he represents them as ridiculing the promise of Christ’s coming, as a thing not likely to happen after being so long delayed. Whereas Jude speaks of scoffers as already come, ver. 4, and the account which he gives of them, that they perverted the grace of God to lasciviousness; denied God and Christ; despised government; reviled dignities; led innocent persons astray; took for beastly sports those which are in the punishment of Gehenna; and said nothing of scoffing at the prophecies of Christ according to the order of God, nor of any doctrines or promises of the gospel. He calls them scoffers on account of their reviling dignities, and perhaps of their ridiculing those precepts of the gospel which prohibited lasciviousness. However, the order of opinion still is, that Jude, like Peter, speaks of the scoffers who are to arise about the end of the world, his exhortation to remember the words which Peter again speaking concerning them was highly proper, because the recollection of Peter’s prophecy would put the faithful in every age on their guard against such false teachers as might arise in any future period.
JUDE.

21 Keep one another in the love of God, expecting the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, (2 Cor. 1:4) with eternal life.

22 And making a difference, 1 have compassion indeed on some.

23 But others save (σωθήναι) by fear, 2 snatching them out of the fire, 3 hating even the garment spotted by the flesh. 4

24 Now, to him who is able to guard you from stumbling, 5 and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory 6 with exceeding joy.

25 To the wise God alone, 7 (see Rom. xvi. 27. note 1.), our Saviour, 8 as glory and majesty, strength and right, both now and (σωρεύονται οἱ ἄνω) throughout all ages. Amen.

21 Keep one another in the constant exercise of love to God, and, in that method only, expect pardon from our Lord Jesus Christ, together with eternal life, as the consequence of pardon.

22 And, making a difference in your methods of reigning sinners, have compassion indeed on some who have erred through ignorance and weakness, and reclaim them by the gentle method of persuasion.

23 But the ungodly teachers, and such of their disciples as have erred through corruption of heart, save by the fear of reproofs and censures; snatching them out of the fire of the wrath of God: and, in doing this them good office, shun all familiar intercourse with them, as ye would shun touching a garment spotted by the flesh of one who hath a plague sore.

24 Now, to inspire you with courage to persevere in the doctrine and practice of the gospel, and to shew you with what assurance ye may rely on the protection of God, I conclude with this promise, which is a direction to those who snatch others out of the fire, implying, that in doing them that compassionate office, they are to avoid all familiarities with them, as even as they would avoid touching a garment spotted by the flesh of one who hath died the plague: lest they be infected by their venomous conversation.

Ver. 24.—1. Now, to him who is able to guard you from stumbling. 5—(Matt. xvi, 18. Luke x, 20. 25. Acts xiii, 2.) Literally signifies. The apostle's meaning is, guard you from falling into sin. For the course of one's life being in Scripture represented by the metaphor of walking, sinning is metaphorically represented by stumbling in walking. Some who translate this clause, 'keep you from falling,' 'by falling understand falling into calamity,' in which sense they interpret Prov. xiv. 16. 'A just man falleth seven times, and riseth again.' But in the apostolical writings the word θύμωσις commonly hath the meaning which I have annexed to it. See Rom. vii. 25. James ii. 10. 11. 2.

2. And to present you faultless before the presence of his glory. 7—This being one of the characters of the persons to whom this doxology is addressed, it is argued by some, that God the Father is means, who is said, Col. i. 15. 'By him (Christ) to reconcile all things to himself.'—Ver. 25.—1. To the wise God alone. 1 That this is the true translation of οἰκουμένη, see proved Rom. xvi. 27. note 1.

2. Our Saviour. 8 From this appellation it is argued, that the wise God, to whom this doxology is addressed, is Jesus Christ, whose propitious title is our Saviour, and who is called God in other passages of Scripture, particularly Rom. i. 5. where he is styled God εἰς all blessings for ever. Nevertheless, as in some passages of Scripture, particularly Luke i. 41. and xlii. i. Tit. i. 3, the Father is styled the Saviour, this argument likewise is doubtful. They who contend, that the doxology in this passage of Jude belongs to the Father, observe, that the same doxology is ambiguously addressed to God the Father. Rom. xvi. 27. where it runs thus, 'To the wise God alone, through Jesus Christ, be the glory for ever.' Amen. 1

After the words 'our Saviour,' in this verse, some MSS. add, 'through Jesus Christ our Lord.' and the best copies of the Vulgate have 'Soli Deo Saliuntur nostri, per Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum, gloria et magnificatia, in saecula saeculorum, in saecula saeculorum, et in omnis saeculis sempiternis.' Amen.'—See Mill on this verse.

SUPPLEMENT TO ESSAY IV.

On Translating the Greek Language used by the Writers of the New Testament.

The author hath judged it necessary to make the following additions to Essay IV. for establishing more fully the translations which he hath given of the Greek particles, &c. as used by the writers of the New Testament, because, as he hath more than once remarked already, by rightly translating the Greek particles, most important alterations have been made in the sense of many passages of the apostolical epistles, whereby the meaning of those passages hath been placed in a more clear, unambiguous, and beautiful light, than formerly. Wherefore, if the reader is of opinion, that the meaning of any Greek word mentioned in Essay IV. is not sufficiently established by the examples there produced, he is desired to consult this supplement.

N. B.—The Paragraphs of Essay IV. being all numbered, the figures prefixed to the following additions point out the paragraphs of that Essay to which they belong.

No. 1. Active Verbs express the agent's attempt or intention. &c. John i. 9. 'That was the true light which lighteth (which is designed to light) every man that cometh into the world.' Rom. ii. 4. 'Not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth (is designed to lead) thee to repentance.' 1 John i. 10. 'If we say we have not sinned, we make (we attempt to make) him a liar.' Rev. xii. 9. 'Called the Devil, and Satan, who deceiveth (who endeavours to deceive) the whole world.'

2. Active verbs express, not the doing, but the permission of a thing. 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. 'The anger of the Lord was moved against Israel, and he moved David (that is, permitted David to be moved by Satan) against Israel: as is plain from 1 Chron. xxvi. 1. 'And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel.'

3. The subjunctive mood put for the indicative. 2 Cor. xiii. 9. 'We are glad (τελθομενες, we are in number) when we are weak and ye are strong.'

4. The infinitive with the article prefixed, is put for the subjunctive. Philip. iii. 10. 'Το γένος, That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection.'

5. Δει for the corresponding substantive noun. Philip. iii. 21. 'Κατα τον πατρα ζητησεν τα δικαια αυτου.' According to the strong working whereby he is able even to subdue all things.'

6. The preterite used for the future. Col. ii. 13. 'You, being dead through the sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, (τα ἐν σαρκι, he hath) he will make alive together with him; with Christ.' Jude, ver. 1. (Κατα τον παταρα) 'And (have perished) shall perish in the rebellion of Korah.'

7. The present tense put for the preterite. 1 John iii. 8. 'The devil sinneth (hath sinned) from the beginning.'

8. Tis for the future. 1 Cor. xi. 24. 'This is my body (tis ἐστιν κατα τοῦ σώματος) which is broken (which shall be broken; or, which is about to be broken) for you.'

16.—1. The Greek participles have sometimes an adverbial sense. Heb. xi. 13. 'All these died in faith, (ἐν πίστεω) though they did not receive the things promised.' For, seeing them afar off, &c. Jude, ver. 5. 'I will therefore put you in remembrance, (ἐν σοφία) though ye once knew this,' &c. 2. The participle is put for the present of the indicative. Rom. ix. 5. 'ο ἀν, Who is God over all.' Rev. i. 8. 'I am Alpha and Omega, (ἐγώ εστιν) which is, and which was.'

3. Beza, in his note on 2 John, ver. 7, saith, the participle of the imperfect of the indicative is used in innumerable places for the sorit. See 2 John, ver. 7. note 1. 18.—1. When one substantive governs another, the latter must be translated as an explanation of the former. 2 Tim. iii. 3. 'What kind of speech hath escaped the guard of your teeth?' that is, your teeth which are a guard, namely, to your tongue.

19.—1. Two substantives joined by a copulative particle must be translated in regimen. Phil. i. 25. Εκ τοῦ ουαναζων καὶ προδος τε το τιμω. 'For your furtherance and joy of faith,' for the advancement of the joy of your faith.

21.—1. Genders of nouns. The neuter is sometimes put for the masculine. Gal. iii. 22. 'But the scripture hath shut up together (εν ταυτη) all things under sin.' Eph. i. 10. 'To gather together (εν ταυτη) all men (Jews and Gentiles) under Christ.' 2 Thess. ii. 6. 'And ye know (ειπον εστε) what now restrainedeth; ye know the person who now restrainedeth.'

22.—1. The sacred writers, to render their discourse of greater extent, sometimes put the relative in the plural number, notwithstanding its antecedent is in the singular number. 1 John v. 16. 'If any one see his brother sinning a sin not unto death, let him ask God, and he will grant to him life for those,' &c.

24.—1. Genitive case denoting possession. Rom. xv. 8. Εν αμερίκαις τοιούτου, Promises belonging to the fathers.' Eph. iii. 1. 'Paul (εν ουκατοικως εις Χριστον) a prisoner belonging to Christ Jesus.'

30.—1. Denoting the end for which a thing is done or suffered. Philonon, ver. 13. 'He might minister to me (εν ουκατοικως εις τον Χριστον) in these bonds for the gospel.'

31.—1. All signifies sometimes a considerable part only. John iv. 29. 'Come see a man who told me all things that ever I did.' Acts i. 1. 'All that Jesus began both to do and teach.' 1 Cor. ii. 15. 'The spiritual man examineth indeed all things.' 1 Cor. ix. 22. 'To all I have become all things.' Wherefore, 1 Pet. iv. 7. 'The end of all things hath approached,' signifies the end of the Jewish church and state only.

41.—1. Elector, elected, in the following passages may signify approved. Rom. xvi. 13. 'Rufus (ουκατακιλης εις Χριστον) the approved by the Lord.' Col. iii. 12. 'Put on therefore, (κατα προσωπος εις το θεον) as persons approved of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies.'

59.—1. Walk. In scripture one's moral conduct is denoted by the metaphor of walking, because, as walking.
in a road ends in one's arrival at a place, so his moral conduct will at least end, either in happiness or in misery to him. 60. — 1. Hazard, κακός sometimes denotes elegance. 2 Cor. viii. 7. "Therefore, as ye abound in faith (κατα λόγον) and in eloquence." Eph. vi. 19. "That (κακός) eloquence may be given me in the opening of my mouth." 2. λαβέντες, a promise. Tit. i. 3. "Hath manifested (το ζητήσετε) his promise, by preaching with which I am intrusted." See note 1. on this verse. 3. λαβέντες, A prayer. 1 Kings xviii. 1. "Elijah said to Ahab. As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these three years but according to your word, my lord." See James v. 17. note 2. 4. λαμπά, A doctrine. Tit. i. 9. "Holding fast (το ζητήσετε) the true doctrine." 5. λάος, An history, a narration, a discourse. Acts i. 1. "The former (λόγος) treatise* or narration. 2 Pet. ii. 3. "Will make merchandise of you (πταίνετε) by fictitious tales." 6. λάθος, An appearance or show of a thing. Col. ii. 23. "Which things have indeed (κακός) a show of wisdom." 63. — 1. The relative pronoun refers to the remote antecedent. Luke xxiii. 14. "I have found no fault in this man. 15. No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him, and lo nothing worthy of death is done by him." Not Herod, who is last mentioned, but Jesus, who is mentioned ver. 14. 1 Cor. xv. 25. "For he must reign till (πάντας) he (God, who is mentioned in the preceding verse) hath put all the enemies under his feet." 65. — 1. The pronoun ius is often used in the sense of allass, one another. 1 Cor. vii. 7. "Ye go to law (κακός) one with another." See also Eph. iv. 19. 32. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. 1 Thess. v. 13. Jude, ver. 20. John vii. 35. 66. — 1. The relative pronoun sometimes differs in gender from its antecedent, regarding its meaning rather than its form. Matt. xxviii. 19. "Teach (ποιήσετε τοις οίκοις της οικογενείας αυτού) all nations, baptizing them." John xv. 25. "Τα πνεύματα πάντα σημαίνεται, 'The Spirit-he shall testify.'" Rom. ix. 22, 23. "Σαλωμὼν εἶ άλλος απὸ των άλλων, ἵνα μοι ἐν ἡμῖν. "Gal. iv. 19. "Ταύτα μας εἰ χαίνων." Phil. iv. 10. "1 beseech thee (τοις ταύταις εἰσελθεῖν) for my son, whom I begat in my bonds." 2. The relative pronoun sometimes differs in number from its antecedent. Philip. iii. 20. "Our conversation is (θείας εἰσάγεται) for heaven, because from whence also we look for the Saviour." 67. — 1. The relative pronoun is sometimes put for the demonstrative οὗτος. 2 Cor. ii. 12. "ο ἕλπις μοι ἐν δόξῃ μοι. "Those things eye hath not seen," &c. : So a must be understood, which in the end of the sentence there is another om, signifying which. 2 Cor. ii. 16. "ον μοι. "To these, indeed, it is the savour of death ending in death, (ος οὗτος) but to those," &c. 81. — 1. λάδιον, He narrowed. 1 Tim. i. 6. λάδιον ἐγείρων. "Howbeit, for this cause I obtained mercy." 86. — 1. ἀποκρ. Luke xii. 57. "Τι έκ του και επίκειντα τον δόξην. "And why also in yourselves do ye not judge what is right?" xxi. 3. "Ye see and know (κακός) in yourselves, that the summer is now high." Luke xiv. 30. "And some of the Pharisees (κατα λόγον) in the crowd said." Wherefore Philip. iv. 15. may be thus translated: When I went forth (κατα λόγον) in Macedonia. See the note on that passage. 2. ἀλάτος, By means of. Matt. vii. 16. ἀλάτος τοις καιροῖς τοῖς καταλέγονται. "By their fruits ye shall know them." 3. έκος denotes sometimes the efficient cause. Mark vii. 31. "And be rejected (κατα λόγον) by the not recollecting that ω signifies although, have in their translation endeavoured to avoid the absurdity, not very properly, by supplying the word γε; thus, ‘If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful.’ The proper translation is, ‘Though we be unfaithful, he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself.’

133.—3. Et γάρ. Siquidem, since indeed. 2 Pet. ii. 4. Er ei τον Χριστόν ομοσπονιδάς και συνήθα, ‘Since indeed God did not spare the angels who sinned.’

134.—1. Et γάρ. Seeing at least. Chandler saith, ω γάρ is used in this sense by the best writers, and in support of his opinion cites 1Elias. Pierce is of the same opinion, in his note on Col. i. 23.

135.—1. Et κατά. Although. Scapula translates κατά, eti etiam.

136.—2. Et μοι in the LXX. often denotes a question, and signifies, ‘Nam.’ Gen. iii. 11. Er μοί γεγενέτο, ‘Hast thou eaten of the tree?’ 2 Cor. iii. 1. Er μοι χρείζεσθαι, ‘Or need we, as some, letters of recommendation to you?’

3. En, To. unto. Eph. iv. 13. En, ‘Unto the measure of the stature.’ 1 Pet. iv. 2. ‘Use hospitality (ως ἐλαττεῖτε) one to another.’

In this sense οὐ is used by Xenophon, Memorab. lib. i. Πρῶτοι οὐ καὶ οὐ, ζε μανήσαι, οὐκ εἰ ποιεῖται πράξαι μερισθήτο τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς; 'First, then, that he did not reckon them gods, whom the city reckoned gods—what kind of argument did they use?'
ESSAY VIII.

CONCERNING THE RIGHT INTERPRETATION OF THE WRITINGS IN WHICH THE REVELATIONS OF GOD ARE CONTAINED.

The revelations of God being designed to give mankind the knowledge of his counsels respecting their salvation, the right understanding of these revelations must appear to every religious person a matter of great importance. This Essay, therefore, having for its object to explain the phraseology of the writings in which the revelations of God are recorded, it will meet with attention from the reader, in proportion to the value which he puts on religious knowledge.

Sect. I.—Of the Original Language of Mankind, and of the Method in which Language was at first formed.

The books which contain the revelations of God, being more ancient than any books now extant, are written in the language which mankind used in the first ages, or in a language nearly allied to it. Wherefore, the style of these writings being very different from that of modern compositions, to interpret them, as modern compositions are interpreted is without doubt to misinterpret them. Accordingly, persons ignorant of the character of the primitive languages, have, by that method of interpretation, been led to fancy that the scriptures contain sentiments unworthy of God, whereby they have not only exposed these venerable writings to the scorn of infidels, but have formed to themselves false notions in religion, which have had a pernicious influence on their morals.

For avoiding these evils, the nature and character of the language first spoken by mankind must be well understood; and for that purpose the best method seems to be, to consider in what manner language was originally formed.

The first idea which come into the human mind being those which enter by the senses, it is reasonable to believe that names for expressing sensible objects would be invented before any others, and, after them, terms for expressing those operations of the senses, by which the ideas of sensible objects are acquired.—And because the operations of the senses have some resemblance to the operations of intellect, to express the operations of intellect mankind would naturally have recourse to the words by which they expressed the operation of the senses.—Thus, many words of the primitive language of mankind must have had a twofold signification. According to the one signification they denoted ideas of sense, and according to the other they denoted ideas of intellect; so that, although these words were the same in respect of their sound, they were really different words in respect of their signification: and to mark that difference, after the nature of language came to be accurately investigated, the words which denoted the ideas of sense, when used to express the ideas of intellect, were called by critics metaphors, from a Greek word which signifies to transfer; because these words, so used, were carried away from their original meaning to a different one, which, however, had some resemblance to it.

Metaphorical meanings being affixed to words in the ancient languages to remedy the poverty of these languages, it is plain, that the more ancient any language is, the fewer words, consequently the more numerous and bold its metaphors will be. Accordingly we find, that the primitive languages, and even the languages of savage tribes, which may be ranked with the primitive languages, are all of them highly figurative. On this subject it is proper to observe, that even after a language has become sufficiently copious, if the people who use it possess a vigorous and warm imagination, and are favourably situated for enjoying sensual gratifications, as is the case with most of the eastern nations, being by these circumstances peculiarly disposed to relish the sensible pictures exhibited in metaphorical and other figurative expressions, such a people, instead of retrenching, will rather multiply these expressions. Hence the language of that people will be more figurative than the languages of nations whose imagination is languid, and whose situation does not permit them to be occupied in sensual gratifications. This is the reason that the language of the Hebrews, and of the other eastern nations, by the multitude, the variety, the boldness, and even the extravagance of its metaphorical expressions, is distinguished from the more temperate speech of the nations in the western parts of the world, whose imagination is not so warm, and whose climate and soil are not so favourable to luxury as theirs.

Of the bold metaphors used by the ancient Hebrews, the following examples are all taken from their sacred books:—Gen. iv. 10. 'The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to me from the ground.' Gen. xii. 26. 'His wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.' Gen. xli. 11. 'He washed—his clothes in the blood of grapes,' to signify that Judah was to inhabit a country fruitful in vines. Psal. v. 9. 'Their throat is an open sepulchre.' Psal. ix. 3. 'Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment.' Psal. lxviii. 25. 'Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full.' Psal. cxix. 3. 'The flowers plowed upon my back; they made long their furies.' Isa. xxiv. 3. 'The mountains shall be melted with their blood.' ver. 4. 'And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; ver. 6. 'The sword of the Lord is filled with blood, it is made fat with fatness.' Isa. xiv. 23. 'I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the Lord of hosts.' Jer. xx. 7. 'O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived.' Isa. vi. 1. 'My well beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill.' In the original it is, eu a horns, the son of oil: The horn being the highest part of horned animals, it is used to denote the highest part of a country; am hill. This horn or hill is called the son of oil, because the olive which produces oil is one of the valuable fruits of the earth. See Louwh on the passage. Isa. xi. 15. 'The Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea.'

Having in the scriptures these, and many other examples of bold metaphors, the natural effect of the poverty of the ancient language of the Hebrews, why should we be either surprised or offended with the bold figurative language in which the Hebrews expressed their conceptions of the divine nature and government? There was not a philosophical language, but the primitive speech of an uncultivated race of men, who, by words and phrases taken from objects of sense, endeavoured to express their notions of matters which cannot be distinctly conceived by the human mind, and far less expressed in human language. Wherefore, they injure the Hebrews who affirm, that they believed the Deity to have a body, consisting of members of the like form and use with the members of the human body, because, in their sacred writings, the eyes, the ears, the hands, and the feet of God, are spoken of; and because he is represented as acting with these members after the manner of man. Gen. iii. 8. 'They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day.' Gen. iv. 16. 'And the bow shall be in the cloud, and I will look upon it.' Exod. xxv. 4. 'The Lord is a man of war.' Ver. 6. 'Thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy.' Ver. 8. 'With the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together.' Psal. viii. 8. 'There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured; coals were kindled by it.' Ver. 9. 'He bowed his heavens also and came down, and darkness was under his feet.' Ver. 10. 'And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly upon the wings of the wind.' Psal. ii. 7. 'Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee.'

In like manner they injure the Hebrews who affirm, that they thought God was moved by anger, jealousy, hatred, revenge, grief, and other human passions, because in their scriptures they are said, Gen. vii. 10. 'It repented the Lord, that he made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart.' Exod. xv. 7. 'Thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumeth them as stubble.' Exod. xxv. 14. 'If the Lord thy God be a jealous God,' Num. xix. 13. 'The wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people.' Prov. viii. 13. 'The evil way and froward mouth do I hate.' Isa. xxxiv. 2. 'The indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies.' Nah. i. 2. 'God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth and is furious. The Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies.'

They also injure the Hebrews who affirm, that they believed the Deity subject to human infirmity, because it is said, Gen. ii. 2. 'God rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made.' Gen. viii. 21. 'The Lord smelled a sweet savour.' Gen. xviii. 20. 'Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous, 20. I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it which is come up to me: And if not, I will know.' Psal. ii. 4. 'He that setteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision.' Psal. lxxviii. 64. 'Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouldest by reason of wine.'

These and the like expressions are highly metaphorical, and imply nothing more but that in the divine mind and conduct there is somewhat analogous to, and resembling the sensible objects and the human affections on which these metaphorical expressions are founded. For if any one contends, that the Hebrews themselves understood these expressions literally when applied to the Deity, and meant that they should be so understood by those who read their scriptures, he must likewise contend, that the following expressions were understood by them in their literal meaning:—Psal. xxvii. 8. 'Hide me under the shadow of thy wings.' Psal. lii. 1. 'In the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast.' Psal. lxi. 1. 'I will trust in the covert of thy wings.' Psal. xxvii. 5. 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.' Ver. 4. 'He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust.'—I say, if from the passages of scripture in which the members of the human body are ascribed to the Deity, it is inferred that the ancient Hebrews believed the Deity hath a body of the same form with the human body, we must, from the last mentioned passages of the same scriptures, conclude, that they believed the Deity to be a tree, with spreading branches and leaves which afforded an agreeable shade; and a great fowl, with feathers and wings; and even a rock, because he is so called Deut. xxxii. 15. Psal. viii. 2. 31. Such are the bold metaphor by which the ancient Hebrews expressed their conceptions of the attributes and operations of God. To prevent, however, those who are acquainted only with modern languages from being shocked with the boldness of these figures, modern critics have distinguished them by the appellation of Anthropomorphia, concerning which Lowth on Isa. i. 24. 'Aha, I will be eased of mine adversaries, I will be avenged of mine enemies,' thus writeth: 'This is a strong instance of the metaphor called Anthropomorphia; by which, throughout the scriptures, as well the historical as the poetical parts, the sentiments, sensations, and affections— the bodily faculties, qualities, and members of men, and even of brute animals, are attributed to God, and that with the utmost liberty and latitude of application. The foundation of this is obvious, it arises from necessity: We have no idea of the natural attributes of God, of his pure essence, of his manner of existing; when therefore we would treat on these subjects, we find ourselves forced to express them by sensible images. But necessity leads to beauty: This is true of metaphor in general, and in particular of this kind of metaphor; which is used with great elegance and sublimity in the sacred poetry; and, what is very remarkable, in the grossest instances of the application of it, it is generally the most striking and the most sublime. The reason seems to be this: When the images are taken from the superior faculties of the human nature, from the purer and more generous affections, and applied to God, we are apt to acquiesce in the notion; we overlook the metaphor, and take it as a proper attribute; but when the idea is gross and offensive, as in this passage of Isaiah, where the impatience of anger and the pleasure of revenge is attributed to God, we are immediately shocked at the application, the impropriety strikes us at once; and the mind, casting about for something in the divine nature analogous to the image, lays hold on some great, obscure, vague idea, which she endeavours to comprehend; and is lost in immensity and astonishment. See De 8. Poes. Helv. Prael. xvi. sub. fin. where this matter is treated and illustrated by examples.'

From the above ingenious remarks it appears, that notwithstanding metaphors and other figures derive their origin from the poverty of language, they infuse both strength and beauty into discourse where they are judiciously used. By exhibiting sensible pictures of our conceptions accompanied with pleasant images, they make a strong impression on the mind of the hearers: for which reason they have found a place, not in the ancient languages only, but in all the modern tongues also; not excepting those which are the most copious and the most refined: in so much that it hath become the business of the poets and orators to ransack the whole compass of nature in search of resemblances between sensible and intellectual objects, on which to graft metaphor; and, not satisfied with natural and apparent likeness, the most remote and dispart resemblances, nay resemblances founded merely on popular opinions, local prejudices, and national customs, have been made the foundation of metaphor. Hence that diversity of figurative expressions observable in the languages of nations living at a distance from each other: hence, also, the figures which to one nation appear natural and expressive, to others appear unnatural, tumid, and ridiculous.
Sect. II.—Of Picture-writing; and of its Influence in the Formation of the Primitive Languages.

In the early ages, after men had acquired any branch of useful knowledge, either by research or by observation, they naturally wished to communicate that knowledge to their contemporaries, and even to transmit it to posterity. But this they could not do effectually, till they contrived a method of making speech the object of sight. While this was accomplished, the knowledge which they conveyed to the ears of a few by pronounced speech, it was in their power to convey to multitudes, even in the most distant countries, by the eyes.

The first method of rendering speech visible, was that which history informs us was practised by all the ancient nations: we have any knowledge of, from the Chinese in the east to the Mexicans in the west, from the Egyptians in the south to the Scythians in the north. All these, taught by nature, formed images or pictures, on wood, or stone, or clay, of the sensible objects for which they had invented names, and of which they had occasion to discourse. By these pictures they represented not only the things themselves, but the articulate sounds or names also by which they were called. Thus, to express in that kind of writing a man, or a horse, that is, to express both the idea and the things, they drew its picture on some permanent substance, whereby, not only the thing itself, but its name, was immediately suggested to those who looked on its picture. But this method being tedious, the Egyptians, who it is supposed were the inventors of picture-writing, shortened it by converting the picture into a symbol, which as Warburton, to whom I am indebted for many particulars in this section, observes in his Divine Legislation, they did in three ways. 1. By making the principal part of the symbol stand for the whole of it, and by agreeing that that part should express the character of the thing represented by the symbol. Thus, they express a fuller by two feet standing in water; and a charioteer, by an arm holding a whip. This is what is called the Cuneiform Hieroglyphic. 2. From this the Egyptians proceeded to a more artful method of rendering speech visible and permanent; namely, by putting the instruments, whether real or metaphorical, by which a thing was done. Thus, they expressed a battle by two hands, the one holding a shield, the other a bow: a siege by a scaling-ladder: the divine eminence by an eagle pernently placed: a monarch by an eye and a sceptre. Sometimes they represented the agent without the instrument, to show the quality of the action. Thus a judge was expressed by a man without a sword, to show that a judge ought not to be moved either by interest or pity. This method was called the Typographic Hieroglyphic. 3. Their third, and most artificial method of abbreviating picture-writing, was to make one thing stand for another, where any resemblance or analogy, however far-fetched, could be observed between the thing represented and the thing by which it was represented, whether that resemblance was founded in nature or in popular opinion only. Thus a serpent, on account of its vigour and spirit, its longevity and reviviscence, was made the symbol of the divine nature: a mouse was used to represent destruction: a swift, impudence: an ant, knowledge: a serpent in a circle, the universe: and the variegated spots of the serpent’s skin, the stars. This method of writing was called the Hieroglyphical, Analogical, or Symbolical Hieroglyphic. And being formed on their knowledge of physics, the marks of which it was composed increased in number, as the Egyptians, the inventors of picture-writing, increased in science.

But, in regard there are many qualities and relations of things which are not objects of sense, and many complex moral modes, and other mental conceptions, which cannot be likened to any object of sense, consequently, which cannot be expressed by any picture, natural or symbolical, it became necessary, in all kinds of picture-writing, to introduce arbitrary marks for expressing these qualities, relations, and modes. Yet, even with this art, picture-writing was still very defective and obscure. The Chinese, therefore, to improve the method of rendering speech visible and permanent by writing, threw away the images or pictures altogether, and substituted in their place new marks, formed, it is said, from the images. However, as in this way of writing every word required a distinct character or mark, and as the best part of these characters were arbitrary, the difficulty of acquiring the knowledge of the meaning of such a multitude of characters was so great, that very few could attain to it. Meanwhile, the Chinese method, in denoting the separate words of which speech consisted, by separate marks, is supposed by some to have suggested to the ingenious in other nations the idea of expressing, by separate marks, the distinct articulate sounds of which words are composed. Hence the alphabetical or literal method of writing arose, which, on account of its great facility and utility, hath come into general use among all civilized nations, except the Chinese themselves.

The literal method of writing is generally said to have been first practised by the Phoenicians. But whether they, or whoever else first used that method of rendering speech visible, were the inventors of the art; or whether, as Plato and Tully thought, De Leg. lib. iv. sect. 4., they were supernaturally assisted in the invention, is hard to determine. This however is certain, that the books of Moses were written in the literal method. And some learned men have thought, the first specimen of literal writing was that which God himself engraved on the two tables of stone, and gave to Moses on the Mount; who, being taught the meaning of the characters by inspiration, communicated the knowledge of the same to the Israelites, from whom it passed to the Phoenicians. Perhaps it may be some confirmation of this conjecture to observe, that the Chinese, though they have long possessed the art of writing by characters, have never been able to attain the method of writing by letters.

I have given the above account of the art of rendering speech visible and permanent by picture-writing, not as a matter of curiosity, but to show the influence which the hieroglyphical manner of writing had on the ancient languages. For the symbols used in that kind of writing denoting the names of things as well as the things themselves, in speaking, men would naturally give to the things represented both the name and the qualities of the symbol by which it was represented. Hence arose a new species of metaphor, altogether unknown in the speech of modern nations, and forming a kind of language which, although it may appear to us fanciful and dark, was well understood, and made a strong impression on those who were accustomed to it.—This higher kind of metaphorical language claims particular attention, because it is that in which the divine revelations, especially those concerning future events, were communicated to mankind, and in which they still remain recorded in scripture. Wherefore, to show the influence which picture-writing, particularly of the symbolical kind, had to introduce into the ancient languages the boldest, and in the opinion of modern nations the most extravagant metaphors, the following examples are proposed to the reader’s consideration.

1. A supreme ruler being represented in symbolical writing by a man with four wings, and his lieutenants or princes by one with two wings; and the stretching out of his wings signifying action or design, (Divine Leg. b. iv. sect. 4.), the names of these symbols were naturally used in the ancient languages for the things signified by them. Hence Isaiah, predicting the invasion of Judah by the king of Assyria, hath termed it the stretching out of his wings so as to cover and desolate the whole land, Isa. xlix. 5. 'The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel.' By the like metaphor Jeremiah predicted the desolation of Moab, chap. xxviii. 40. 'He shall fly as an eagle, and shall spread his wings over Moab.' In the same highly figurative language, Isaiah denounced destruction to a kingdom which oppressed other countries by the greatness of its power, chap. xvii. 1. 'Woe to the land shadowing with wings.' This use of the symbol shows the propriety of giving the wings of a fowl to two of the four beasts, which in Daniel's vision represented the four great monarchies. By that symbol, the devastation which these monarchies were to bring on other nations, and the speed and force with which they would act, were strongly and beautifully represented to those who understood symbolical picture-writing. It shows us, likewise, how the power of God in protecting his people came to be termed his feathers and his wings; and the confidence of his people in his power to protect them, by their trusting in the covert of his wings.

2. A crocodile was one of the symbols by which, in the ancient picture-writing, the kingdom of Egypt was represented; Divine Leg. b. iv. sect. 4. Hence the Egyptians are called, Josh. ii. 11. 'Dragons in the waters; and, ver. 14, their king is called Leviathan; and the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, Ezek. xxix. 3. So also Isa. xxvii. 1. 'In that day the Lord, with his sore, and great, and strong sword, shall punish Leviathan, the piercing serpent, even Leviathan that crooked serpent, and he shall slay the dragon.'

The king of Ethiopia was termed a fly, and the king of Assyria a bee, probably because in picture-writing they were represented by these symbols: Isa. vii. 18. 'The Lord shall h小编 for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria, that is, the Lord shall call the Ethiopian and Assyrian kings to avenge his quarrel.

3. In the picture-writing, a sword and a bow being symbols of war, the prophets use the names of these warlike instruments to denote great warriors; and, in general, to denote a powerful warlike nation, such as the Romans, Dan. xi. 31; and gigantic stature, for a mighty leader of an army; and balances, weights, and measures, for a judge of a magistrat. In like manner, being in a picture-writing a sceptre denoted the administration of government, the word is used in that significance by Jacob, in his prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10. 'The sceptre shall not depart, &c.; and the anointing of the power of Moab, by the breaking of his sceptre, Jer. xlviii. 17. 'All ye that are about him, bemoan him; and all ye that know his name say, How is the strong staff broken, and the beautiful rod.'

4. The figure of a star being used in picture-writing as a symbol of the Deity, that word was used by Balaam to denote the Jewish Messiah, of whose divine nature and government he seems to have had some obscure conception, Num. xiv. 17. 'There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel.' Also, a star in picture-writing denoted the image of a god. Thus, Amos v. 8. 'The star of your god, which ye made to yourselves,' means the material image of your God. Lastly, the sun, moon, and stars, were used in picture-writing as symbols of the founders of nations, and of the fathers of tribes, and as the symbols also of mighty kings. Thus the king of Babylon is called, Isa. iv. 12. 'Lucifer, son of the morning.' Thus also, in ordinary discourse, the sun, moon, and stars, were used to denote patriarchs and princes. Accordingly, when Joseph, Gen. xxxvii. 9. 'said, I have dreamed a dream, and behold the sun, and the moon, and the eleven stars made obeissance to me,' his father, understanding his words in their symbolical and true meaning, 'rebuked him, and said to him, Shall I and thy mother and sisters and brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee, to the earth?' But as the heavenly bodies mentioned by Joseph could not appear, even in a dream, as making obeissance to him, we may believe that he saw in his dream, not the heavenly bodies, but a visionary representation of his parents and brethren making obeissance to him; and that, in relating this to his father, he chose from modesty to express it in symbolical rather than in plain language. Besides, as there never was any collection of stars called the eleven stars, the application which Jacob made of that appellation to Joseph's eleven brethren shows clearly, that the word star, in common speech, was used to signify the father of a tribe.

5. That the use of ensigns, for distinguishing tribes and nations, was very ancient, we learn from Moses's command, Num. ii. 3. 'Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house.' What the ensigns of the Israelitish tribes were, Moses hath not told us. But because our Lord, who sprang from Judah, is called, Rev. v. 5. 'The lion of the tribe of Judah,' it is conjectured, that the tribe of Judah had for its ensign a lion; that Judah assumed that device because Jacob, in blessing his children before his death, had termed Judah a lion's whelp; and that the other tribes assumed for their ensigns the pictures of the animals and trees to which Jacob had likened them. But be this as it may, it is probable, that in the ensigns by which tribes and nations anciently distinguished themselves, they painted the figures of such animals, trees, &c. as were emblematical of the qualities, circumstances, and events, by which they thought themselves most honoured. Hence it was natural in picture-writing, to represent a nation or tribe by the thing which it carried as its ensign; and in speaking of a nation or tribe, to call it by the name of its ensign. Accordingly, Jeremiah likens Egypt to a very fair heifer, chap. xlvii. 20. either because the Egyptians carried in their ensigns the image of a heifer, which was the symbol of Isis, their tutelary divinity; or because they were represented in sculpture by that device. And some perhaps is the reason that in Pharaoh's dream Egypt was symbolically represented by kine. In like manner, because the Roman armies had for their ensign the image of an eagle, they are called, in our Lord's parable of the destruction of Jerusalem, eagles, Matt. xxiv. 28. Wheresoever the carcasse is, there will the eagles be gathered together. Since, then, it was customary to call a nation by the name of its ensign, 'the burden of the beasts of the south,' Isa. xxx. 6. means, the prophecy concerning the destruction of the nations of the south, who had beasts for their ensigns. And since the Assyrians are called by the prophet Isaiah, chap. viii. 7. 'The waters of the river, it is not improbable that their armes carried in their ensigns a picture of the Euphrates, not only on account of the advantages which their country derived from that river, but because it was a fit emblem of the irresistible force of their armes. Wherefore the Assyrians being represented in picture-writing by the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris, the great where, who is said, Rev. xvii. 2. 'to sit upon many waters,' signifies an idolastrous power which ruled over many populous nations.

6. The symbols by which nations and cities were anciently represented in picture-writing, were commonly formed on some remarkable quality belonging to them. Thus, because the laws, institutions, and discipline peculiar to a city or nation, were intended to form the manners of their people, it was natural to consider a nation or city as a mother. This I suppose was the aetiology of the epithet 'mother,' which was frequently given to cities and countries.
son that, on coins and in sculpture, nations and cities were symbolically represented by a young woman sitting on a throne, magnificently attired, and surrounded with emblems expressive of the qualities by which that nation was distinguished. Hence the Jewish prophet, in his discourses which they addressed to nations and cities, termed them daughters, and virgin daughters, in allusion to the above described symbol. Is. xxii. 4. 'I will weep bitterly—because of the spoiling of the daughter of my people.' Zech. ii. 7. 'Deliver thyself, O Zion, that dwellest with the daughter of Babylon.' Jer. xiv. 17. 'Let mine eyes run down with tears night and day, for the virgin daughter of my people is broken with a great breach.' Jer. xvi. 11. 'Go up into Gilead and take balm, O virgin, the daughter of Egypt. In vain shalt thou use many medicines, for thou shalt not be cured.

7. In the ancient picture-writing, it would seem that persons and things were represented by the figures of the things to which they were metaphorically likened. Hence, in speaking of them, they were called by the names of those things. For example, because ancient men were metaphorically likened to trees, (Cant. ii. 3. v. 15.), princes and great men, in the animated language of the eastern nations, were called by the name of such trees as were remarkable for their magnificence and beauty; and had the properties of these trees ascribed to them. Thus the great men of Judah were called by Sennacherib the tall cedars of Babylon, and the common people the choice fir trees thereof. Is. xxxvii. 24. 'By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the sides of Lebanon, and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir trees thereof.' Zech. xi. 1. 'Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars. Howl, fir trees, for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty are spoiled!' Howl, O ye oaks of Bashan.' See also Is. vii. 18–16. In like manner, Jeremiah calls the whole people of a country a forest, chap. xxi. 14. 'I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things round about it.' The same prophet, speaking to Judah, saith, chap. xi. 16. 'The Lord called thy name a green olive tree, fair and of goodly fruit.' Hence Messiah is foretold under the idea of a branch of a tree. Jer. xxiii. 5. 'Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch.' Zech. vii. 12. 'Behold the man whose name is the branch,' and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord.' Suitably to the same idea, the place out of which this branch was to grow is thus described, Is. xi. 1. 'There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his root, and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him.

8. Anciently places were metaphorically called shepherds, and their subjects sheep, because the care which they took of their people resembled the care which shepherds take of their flocks. 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. 'I have sinned, I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done?' Homer likewise often calls his princes shepherds of the people.—Among the Jews the priests also were called shepherds, because it was a part of their office to teach the people the law. Exek. xxxiv. 2. 'Where to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves; should not the shepherds feed the flock?'—This phraseology passed from the Jewish into the Christian church. For Christ is called the chief shepherd, and the ministers of the gospel are considered as subordinate shepherds employed by him to take care of the people. 1 Pet. v. 2. 'Feed the flock of God, ye elders, verse 4. 'And when the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive the crown of glory which faileth not away.'

9. Because it is usual, in all languages, metaphorically to ascribe to men the qualities of beasts, and to call them by the name of such beasts as they resemble in their dispositions, the Psalmist, in predicting Christ's suffering, termed his enemies strong bulls of Bashan, the country most famous for its breed of kine. Psal. xxii. 12. 'Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round about. Around me they gaped as a ravening lion.'

10. In like manner the prophet Amos, to mark the stupidity and brutality of the great men of Samaria who oppressed the people, reproved them under the name of Xime of Bashan, chap. iv. 1. 'Hear this word, ye King of Bashan, that are in the mountain of Samaria, which oppress the poor,' &c. Upon the same foundation the Israelitish nation is spoken of as a beast of prey in Balaam's prophecy; and hath the actions of a beast of prey sacrificed to it. Numb. xxiv. 8. 'God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn. He shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows. 9. He couched, he lay down as a lion; and who shall stir him up?'

SECT. III.—Of the allegorical Manner of Writing.

When the custom, described in the preceding section, of substituting the symbol, the slave, and the metaphor, for the thing signified thereby, took place, and the thing signified obtained the name of the thing by which it was signified, it was natural to describe the condition, the qualities, and the actions of the thing signified, by the condition, the qualities, and the actions of its symbol. Hence arose that species of composition which is called allegory, because therein one thing was expressed, and another entirely different from it was meant; and which, for reasons to be mentioned immediately, was of great fame and use among the eastern nations. In mentioning metaphors as the foundation of allegories, I am authorized by Quintilian, who thus writes, lib. viii. c. 6. 'Ut medicus stique opportunos translationis usus illustrat orationem, suos frequenter et obscurat et tudio compleat: Continuus vero in allegoriam et imitatur veritatem.'

The Egyptians, who are supposed to have invented picture-writing, are thought also to have invented the allegorical method of communicating their sentiments. But by whomsoever invented, it came early into general use, and was greatly delighted in by the orientals, for the following reasons:—1. A well-formed allegory, by its striking images and vivid colouring, never failed, when understood, to make a strong impression on those to whom it was addressed. 2. Being a narration of things which are objects of sense, and between which there is a natural or supposed connexion, it was easily remembered, and could be translated from one language into another with the greatest precision. 3. Professing to contain an important hidden meaning, those to whom it was proposed were led by curiosity to search out that meaning. 4. The discovery of the meaning of an allegory, as an exercise of one's mental powers, afforded great pleasure to the discoverer, especially if it contained a moral lesson useful for regulating life and manners: For a person, by the discovery, being led to instruct himself, he was spared the pain of having instruction forced upon him. 5. Allegory being a kind of speech which none but the learned understood, it was an excellent vehicle for conveying to them the knowledge of such matters as were thought improper for the common people to know.

These reasons led the priests, with whom the whole learning of Egypt was lodged, to teach their religion, their laws, and their politics, under the veil of allegory, both to their own countrymen and to those strangers who came to be instructed in the wisdom of Egypt. And such well-informed strangers, on their return to their own country, in imitation of their teachers, communicated the knowledge which they had acquired in Egypt to their disciples in allegories: by which means allegory came in a little time to be the most approved method of instruction all over the East.

Allegories being in great repute when the Jewish prophets were commissioned to instruct the people, and to foretell future events, it need not surprise us to find them delivering most of their prophecies in allegories; especially when we consider, that at the time these were delivered, it was proper to conceal the events foretold under the veil of allegory, that they might not be understood till they were explained by their accomplishment.—But, notwithstanding the ancient Egyptian allegory was attended with the advantages above-mentioned, its extreme darkness occasioned it to be laid aside after the gift of prophecy ceased. A new species, however, hath been substituted in its room, better fitted to convey instruction, because it is formed on symbols more obvious than those used in the ancient allegory. Of this new species the writings of the moderns furnish many beautiful examples, none of which need be mentioned here, in regard they are generally known.

Of the ancient allegory there were four kinds:—1. The proper allegory; 2. The apologue, or fable; 3. The parable; 4. The enigma.

The proper Allegory was a discourse, in which the conditions, the qualities, and the actions of a person, or thing, were represented by the condition, the qualities, and the actions of the symbol, device, or metaphor, by which it was represented in picture-writing. It was therefore a representation of real matters of fact under feigned names and feigned characters.

The Apologue or Fable was a narration of speeches and actions attributed sometimes to men, sometimes to brute animals, and sometimes to things inanimate, according to their natural or supposed qualities. But these speeches and actions had no existence, except in the imagination of the author of the fable, who contrived them in the manner he judged fittest for conveying the moral he had in view to incutinate. Of this kind was Jotham's fable of the trees going forth to anoint a king, Judges ix. 8; and Josiah's fable of the thistle, which desired the cedar to give his daughter as a wife to his son, 2 Chron. xxv. 18.

The Parable or Similitude was a discourse in which one thing was compared with another which had a resemblance to it; so that the thing compared was more clearly understood by means of the qualities of the thing to which it was compared, and made a strong impression on the minds of the hearers. Of this kind were many of our Lord's parables. But although the apologue and parable were thus distinguished, we find them sometimes confounded with each other.

Lastly, the Enigma or Riddle was a mysterious assemblage of different symbols, set forth either in a verbal discourse, or by presenting the symbols themselves to the eye. Either way exhibited, the meaning of the assemblage was so dark, that it required the greatest ingenuity to discover it. Of the verbal enigmas, Samson's riddle is an example. Of the symbolical enigmas, Herodotus hath recorded a remarkable instance, Hist. lib. iv. 128. 139, where he tells us, that when Darius Hystaspes invaded Scythia, the Scythian king sent him a present of a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows. This Gobyra, one of Darius's generals, considering as an enigma, interpreted in the following manner:—That unless the Persians could fly through the air like birds, or hide themselves in the earth like mice, or swim through the lakes like frogs, they should not return to their own country, but be slain by the arrows of the Scythians.

All allegories have two senses; First, The literal sense exhibited in the verbal description, or in the visible symbol; secondly, The remote sense, concealed under the literal sense, or under the visible symbol. Wherefore, in every allegory, the first or literal sense is itself the sign of the second or hidden meaning, called the figurative sense of the allegory. And this figurative sense should be as distinctly represented by the literal sense of the allegory, as the literal sense is exhibited, whether by the verbal description, or by the visible symbol. Properly speaking, therefore, the first or literal sense constitutes the body of the allegory, and the second or figurative sense, its soul. In compositions of this kind, if rightly formed, the literal sense ought to be perfectly plain, and the only exercise of one's ingenuity ought to lie, not in understanding the literal sense, but in finding out its concealed meaning.

Some of the ancient fables and parables exhibited such striking representations and reproofs of the common follies of mankind, that by their frequent application they became proverbial. In allusion to this use of the parable, Habakkuk vii. chap. ii. 6. 'Shall not all these take up a parable against him, and a proverb against him? And, Micah ii. 4. 'In that day shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation.'

In the beginning of this section, the proper allegory was said to be that in which persons and things, together with the accidents befalling them, are set forth by the name of the symbol used in picture-writing to represent them: and by such accidents as may naturally be supposed to befall that symbol. According to this account of the proper allegory, the symbols of which it was composed, together with the accidents befalling these symbols, might be set forth in a verbal description addressed to the ear, or by presenting the symbol either to the eye of a person awake or to his imagination while asleep. Hence of the proper allegory there were three kinds, of which it is proposed to treat separately.

A.—Of the Proper Allegory, as set forth in a Verbal Description.

We now the allegory set forth in a verbal description was intended to convey immediate information to the persons to whom it was addressed, it was commonly formed on a symbol which was well known to belong to the persons or things which were the subjects of the allegory; and the circumstances and qualities of the symbol, together with the accidents befalling it, were such as naturally suggested the designed information. Of this species of allegory we have an example, Exod. xxi. where, because the dragon or crocodile was one of the well-known symbols by which Egypt was represented in the ancient picture-writings, (Sect. 2. No. 2.), the pride of the kings of Egypt, and the mischief their insolence brought on the neighbouring nations, are allegorically represented by the actions of a dragon or crocodile; and the destruction of the kingdom of Egypt is represented by the taking and killing of a dragon, and by the bringing it to land, and filling all the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the whole earth with its flesh. Ver. 2. 'Son of man, take up a lamentation for Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and say to him, Thou art as a dragon in the seas, and thou canst forth with thy rivers, and troublest the waters with thy feet, and foulest the sea with thy back. Thus saith the Lord God, I will therefore spread out my net over thee with a company of many people, and they shall bring thee up in my net. Then will I leave thee upon the land.—And will cause all the fowls of the heaven to remain upon thee,' &c.
OF THE RIGHT INTERPRETATION

Essay VIII.

Because nations and cities anciently were represented on coins, and on sculptured stone, by the image of a young woman splendidly attired and seated on a throne, (Sect. 2. No. 6.), the prophet Isaiah hath formed an allegorical prediction on that emblem, in which he hath described the judgment and punishment of the Chaldeans for oppressing the Jews by the pulling down of a tender and delicate virgin from her throne, and stripping her of her ornaments, and making her a slave, and forcing her to perform the offices of a slave, and treating her with the utmost indignity. Isa. xlvii. 10. "Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon. There is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. 2. Take the millstones and grind meal; uncover the locks; make bare the leg; uncover the thigh; pass over the rivers. 3. Thy nakedness shall be uncovered, yea thy shame shall be seen. I will avenge, and I will not meet thee as a man. As for our Redeemer, the Lord of Hosts is his name. 5. Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the lady of kingdoms. 8. Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else besides me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children," &c.

Upon the same symbol Ezekiel, to make the Israelites sensible of their sins in forsaking the true God and worshipping idols, hath formed an allegory, in which he represents God's choosing the Israelites to be his people, and his giving them his statutes, under the idea of his taking up a female infant, which, when born, had been exposed naked and helpless; his nourishing it till it grew up; his making her his own by marriage, after her breasts were fashioned, and her hair was grown, Ezek. xvi. 6-8; and then clothing her with fine raiment, and adorning her with costly jewels, so that the fame of her beauty went forth among the heathen, ver. 9-14. But this beloved married wife, forgetting her obligations and vows, played the harlot, by making images of men, which she worshipped with the flour, and the oil, and the honey wherewith her husband fed her, ver. 17. 19, and by sacrificing the sons and the daughters which she had brought forth to him, ver. 20.—This adultery she committed with the Egyptians, the Assyrians, and the Chaldeans, ver. 26-28.—Wherefore, in the same figurative language, God thus addressed the Israelites:—Ver. 33. "O harlot, hear the word of the Lord. 38. I will judge thee as women that break wedlock and shed blood are judged; and I will give thee blood and fury in jealousy. 39. They shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take thy fair jewels, and leave thee naked and bare. 40. They shall also bring up a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their sword.

On the other hand, in allusion to the same symbol, the prosperity of a city or nation, after great affliction, is represented by a woman's cleansing herself from filth, and adorning herself with beautiful garments. Isa. iii. 1. "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments. O Jerusalem, the holy city. 2. Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem, loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion."—In like manner, a nation expressing its joy for being delivered from oppression, is represented by a woman's singing and shouting. Zeph. iii. 14. "Sing, O daughter of Zion, shout, O Israel; be glad and rejoice with all thy heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. 15. The Lord hath taken away thy judgments, he hath cast out thine enemy; the king of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee; thou shalt not see evil any more.'

In allusion to the same symbol, Isaiah foretold the restoration of Tyre to her former wealth, and pride, and wickedness under the image of an harlot resuming her former manners. Isa. xlvii. 15. "Thus saith the Lord God, At the end of seven years shall Tyre sing as an harlot. 16. Take an harp, go about the city, thou harlot that hast been forgotten; make sweet melody, sing many songs, that thou mayest be remembered. 17. The Lord will visit Tyre, and she shall turn to her hire, and shall commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth.'

In the ancient picture-writing, (Sect. 2. No. 4.), the sun, moon, and stars, being used as symbols to denote cities and kingdoms as well as princes and great men, the temporary disasters of cities and kingdoms, in allusion to these symbols, are in the prophetic writings represented by the extinction of the sun and moon; and the destruction of the cities and states, by the falling of the stars from heaven. Thus Isaiah, foretelling the destruction of Babylon by the Medes, saith, chap. xiii. 10. "The stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine.' Chap. xxxiv. 4. "All the host of heaven shall be dissolve, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their hosts shall fall down as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig figg the fig tree.'—In like manner, the destruction of Egypt is thus allegorically described, Ezek. xxxii. 7. "When I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. 8. All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord.'—Joel also, upon the same symbols, hath formed an allegorical prophecy concerning the overturning of the Jewish state, and the destruction of the heathen idolatry. Chap. ii. 30. "I will shew wonders in the heavens, and in the earth blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. 31. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come. 31. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered.'—These grand events our Lord hath foretold in the same allegorical language, Matt. xxiv. 29. On the other hand, national prosperity is allegorically represented by an increase of the light of the heavenly bodies: Isa. xxx. 26. "Moreover, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound.'

In picture-writing, tribes and nations being represented by the figures of the things which they carried in their ensigns, (Sect. 2. No. 5.), various allegorical prophecies were formed on these symbols. Thus, because the Assyrians, it is supposed, had the river Euphrates painted on their standards, Isaiah foretells their invasion of Judah by an allegory formed on that symbol. Isa. viii. 7. "Behold the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the river strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory; and he shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks. 8. And he shall pass through Judah, he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even to the neck.'

Sect. 2. No. 2. In picture-writing, a crocodile being one of the symbols by which Egypt was denoted, Ezekiel, upon that symbol hath formed the following beautiful allegorical prophecy, chap. xxix. 2. "Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and against all Egypt. 2. Speak and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. 4. But I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick upon thy scales. 5. And I will cause thee to fall upon the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers: thou shalt fall upon the open fields, thou shalt not be brought together nor gathered: I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field, and to the fowls of heaven; vide. to ver. 17.

Sect. 2. No. 7. In the ancient picture writing, men being represented by the figures of the things to which they were metaphorically likened, the Jewish prophets have raised many allegories on that foundation. Thus, because princes and great men were likened to trees, the power of the Assyrian kings, and the greatness of their empire, are represented by Ezekiel in an allegory formed on the qualities and circumstances of a tall cedar tree with fair branches, among which all the fowls of heaven made their nests; and under which all the beasts of the field brought forth their young; and under its shadow dwelt all great nations, Ezek. xxx. 3-9. Moreover, the destruction of the Assyrian empire is in the same allegory represented by the breaking of the boughs and the falling of the branches of this cedar, and by the depasting of the people of the earth from its shadow, ver. 10-14.

In like manner, nations being metaphorically compared to a forest, their desolation and destruction are represented by the burning of a forest; as in the following allegory, Ezek. xx. 46. ‘Son of man, set thy face towards the south, and prophesy against the forest of the south field: 47. And say to the forest of the south, Hear the word of the Lord, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will kindle a fire in thee, and it shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree: the flaming flame shall not be quenched, and all faces from the south to the north shall be burnt therein. 46. And all flesh shall see that I the Lord have kindled it: It shall not be quenched. 49. Then said I, Ah, Lord God! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?—On this allegory our Lord's expression, Luke xxi. 31. ‘If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry!’ seems to have been founded.

In allusion to the symbolical meaning of trees in picture-writing, the introduction of the Israelites into Canaan, and their becoming a great nation in that land, are represented under the allegory of a vine brought from Egypt and planted in Canaan, which took deep root and filled the land: Psal. lxxx. 10. ‘The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. 11. She sent out her boughs from the sea, (the Mediterranean Seas), and her branches to the river, (Eufrates). Why hast thou then broken her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? The boar out of the wood doth waste it,’ vide. to ver. 2. No. 7. b. Because in ancient times kings, and magistrates, and priests, were metaphorically called shepherds, on account of their care in governing, defending, and instructing their people, the prophet Ezekiel hath, upon this metaphor, formed a beautiful allegorical discourse, in which he severely reproved the Jewish princes, magistrates, and priests, for their negligence in the execution of their offices: for their enriching themselves and living luxuriously at the expense of their people; and for their being at no pains to promote their happiness. Ezek. xxxiv. 2. ‘Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds. We be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! Should not the shepherds feed the flock? 2. Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed; but ye feed not the flock! For this unfaithfulness God threatened to punish the Israelitish princes and priests severely; vide. to ver. 10. ‘Thus saith the Lord, Behold I am against the shepherds, and I will requite my flock at their hand, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock. For I will deliver my flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them.’ The people, thus neglected and spoiled by their rulers, God comforted in the same allegorical language, ver. 12. ‘I will seek out my sheep, and I will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day: Ver. 14. I will feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be; there shall they lie in a good field.’ In the mean time, to prevent the wicked among the Israelites from fancying themselves the objects of his love, God reproved them in the same pastoral dialect; vide. to ver. 17. ‘As for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord God, Behold I judge between cattle and cattle, between the rains and the hegoats. 16. Seemeth it a small thing to you to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? And to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet? 19. But as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet, and they drink that which ye have fouled. 21. Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad; 22. Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey, and I will judge between cattle and cattle. 23. And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David, a prince among them.’ vide. to ver. 17.

On this allegory our Lord seems to have formed his parable of the sheep and the goats, in which he hath described the general judgment, Matt. xxv.

B. Of the proper Allegory, as set forth in a Dream or in a Vision.

Having treated of verbal allegories, it remains to treat of those allegories which were set forth in symbols actually presented to the imagination of the prophet in a dream while asleep, or in a vision while awake. These allegorical dreams and visions, the persons who were favoured with them communicated to their contemporaries by word of mouth, and sometimes committed them to writing, for the instruction of posterity. In these, as in other allegories, the persons or nations who were the subjects of them were designed, sometimes by their known symbols, whose figure was presented to the imagination of the person who dreamed or beheld the vision, and sometimes by arbitrary symbols, whose character, however, and attending circumstances, were so formed as to lead to their meaning.

Of allegorical dreams formed on symbols which were generally known, that of Pharaoh, Gen. xli. 17. is a signal example. For, one of the symbols by which Egypt was designed being an heifer, the seven years of great plenty which were to be in Egypt, were represented in Pharaoh's dream by seven very fat and well-favoured kine, which came up out of the Nile, and fed in an adjoining meadow; and the seven years of famine which were to succeed the years of plenty, by seven other kine, lean and ill-favoured, which also came up out of the river after the former; and the greatness of the famine, by the lean kine eating up the fat kine, and remaining as lean and ill-favoured as at the beginning.—Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Dan. iv. is another example of an allegorical representation formed on a well-known symbol. For, princes and great men being represented in picture-writing by trees, the greatness of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom, and the benefits which the nations over which he reigned derived from the power of his kingdom, were represented by a tree which in his dream he saw growing in the midst of the earth, whose height reached to the heaven; and those were fair, and its fruit was much, affording...
OF THE RIGHT-INTERPRETATION

Essay VIII.

The beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the air dwelt in the boughs thereof. — In the same dream, the punishment which God was to inflict on that proud prince for his impiety and other sins, was allegorically represented by the hewing down of that great tree, the cutting off of its branches, the driving away of the beasts from under it, and of the fowls from its branches. On this symbol our Lord formed his parable of the grain of mustard seed which a man took and sowed in his field, whereby he allegorically represented the wide spreading of the kingdom of heaven, or gospel dispensation, and its beneficial influence on the happiness of mankind: Matt. xiii. 32. 'Which indeed is the least of all seeds, but when it is grown it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree; so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof.'

Of the allegorical dream formed on an arbitrary symbol, we have an example in the great and terrible image which stood before Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, recorded Dan. ii. 31, and which, by the different materials of which it was composed, represented the four great empires which were to rule the nations of the earth in succession.

The head of this image, which was of fine gold, signified the Babylonian empire; its breast and its arms of silver, signified the Medo-Persian empire; its belly and its thighs of brass, the Grecian empire; and its legs of iron, and its feet part of clay and part of iron, the Roman empire in its different states. And whereas this great image was broken in pieces by a stone, which was cut out of a mountain without hands, and which afterwards became itself a great mountain and filled the whole earth, that accident signified the utter destruction of these idolatrous kingdoms, to make way for a kingdom which the God of heaven was to set up, and which was never to be destroyed. The order in which these four empires were to arise, and the peculiarities by which they were to be distinguished, were showed to Daniel himself, chap. vii. 2. In an allegorical vision, formed on the arbitrary symbols of four beasts which arose out of the great sea, after it was violently agitated by storms, and whose forms and qualities were different from any beasts known to exist. See an interpretation of that vision in my Truth of the Gospel History, p. 819.

The living creatures which Ezekiel saw in his vision, chap. i. were still more monstrous, and unlike any thing in nature, than the beasts in Daniel's vision. Each of them had four faces, namely, the face of a man, of a lion, of an ox, and of an eagle. Their feet were straight with soles, like those of calves' feet. They had the hands of a man under their wings, and their appearance was that of burning coals of fire, from which went flashes of lightning. They were accompanied with wheels of the colour of beryl. Each wheel had a wheel within it, and their rings were so high that they were dreadful, and had eyes round about; and when the living creatures went, the wheels went; for the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels. The likeness of the firmament, which was stretched over the heads of the living creatures, was as the colour of chrysolite. And above the firmament was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone; and upon the throne, the likeness of the appearance of a man above upon it. His loins downward had the appearance of fire, like the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain.

This allegorical vision not being accompanied with an interpretation, it meaning cannot be determined with any certainty. Only, as the prophet in the conclusion of his account of it says, ver. 18. 'This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord.' And intimates, that the things spoken to him, which are mentioned in the following chapters, proceeded from this appearance, it may perhaps be conjectured, that the vision was an enigmatical representation of the attributes of the Deity exerted in the government of the world; and that that representation was formed by the union of a number of symbols, whose meaning those who understood the ancient picture-writing knew, but which we, whose knowledge of that sort of writing is extremely imperfect, cannot pretend to explain.

It remains to observe, that in foretelling future events, especially those which were of an extensive nature, and at a great distance in point of time, the Spirit of God thought proper to make use of allegorical dreams and visions, rather than of plain verbal descriptions, for the following reasons:—1. These dreams and visions, whether formed on known or on arbitrary symbols, were naturally so dark, even when accompanied with an interpretation, as not to be distinctly understood till they were explained by their fulfilment. This darkness I think was necessary to prevent unbelievers from pretending that the prophecy, by exciting persons to do the things foretold, occasioned its own accomplishment.—2. The images of which these allegorical dreams and visions were composed, being all objects of sight, they made a much more lively and forcible impression on the minds of the prophets, than it was possible to do by words; consequently, they could be more distinctly remembered, and more accurately related to others, than if the qualities and actions of the persons represented by the symbols in the dream or vision, had been expressed in a verbal description.—3. The facility with which the representations in an allegorical dream or vision could be remembered, and the precision with which they could be related in all their circumstances, rendered the transmission of them to posterity as matters of fact easy. And although the meaning of these dreams and visions was not understood by those to whom they were related, yet being of such a nature as to make a strong impression on all to whom they were related, when they came to be explained by their accomplishment, the inspiration of the prophet who had the dream or vision was rendered undeniable, and the sovereignty of God in the government of the world was raised beyond all possibility of doubt.

Sect. IV.—Of the Method of conveying Instruction by significant Actions.

To render speech forcible and affecting, mankind, in all ages and countries, have been in use to accompany their words with such gestures and actions as indicated the sentiments and feelings of their mind. This was the custom more especially in the first ages of the world, when the primitive languages were not sufficiently copious, and men's passions were under little restraint. Hence the eastern nations, whose imaginations were warm, and whose tempers were lively, early delighted in this method of communicating their sentiments and feelings; and even after their language became so copious as not to need that extrinsic aid, they still continued to express their sentiments in the same way. Nay, all savage nations at this day express their strongest feelings by accompanying their words with significant actions, which shews that the custom is founded in nature.—The scriptures furnish many instances of this custom. For example, to render promissory oaths more solemn and binding, the person who swears the oath put his hand under the thigh of him to whom he swore: Gen. xxiv. 2. 'Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house, Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: 3. And I will make thee swear by the Lord the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou wilt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites.'
In like manner, Jacob before his death required his son Joseph to put his hand under his thigh, and swear, that he would not bury him in Egypt, but in Canaan with his fathers, Gen. xlvii. 29.

To express extreme affliction and grief, they rent their clothes, and covered themselves with sackcloth. Thus it is said of Jacob when he saw Joseph's coat, 'He rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days.'—1 Kings xxi. 27. When Ahab heard Elijah's words, 'he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth on his flesh, and fasted, and lay on sackcloth and went softly.'

Moses having constrained his wife Zipporah to circumcise her son, she, to express her detestation of the action, and her displeasure with her husband for having commanded it, cast the foreskin of the child at his feet, and said, 'Surely a bloody husband art thou to me.' Exod. iv. 25.

Indulge the significant actions with which any kind of information was accompanied, were commonly of the typical kind; that is, they were so contrived as to express the information conveyed by the words. Thus, when Moses saw an Egyptian smiting an Israelite, he slew the Egyptian, to show, by action, that God would by him deliver the Israelites from the bondage of the Egyptians. So Stephen assures us, Acta vii. 39. Thus also, 1 Kings xi. 36. 'The prophet Ahijah caught the new garment that was on Jeroboam, and rent it in twelve pieces. 31. And he said to Jeroboam, take thee ten pieces; for thus saith the Lord the God of Israel, Behold I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee.'—1 Kings xxi. 11. 'Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah made him horns of iron; and he said, Thus saith the Lord, With these shalt thou push the Syrians until thou have consumed them.'—2 Kings xiii. 18.

'Elisha said unto the king of Israel, Smite upon the ground; and he smote thrice, and said, 19. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, 'Thou shalt not have smitten five or six times, when thou shalt smite Syria till thou hast consumed it; whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice.'—2 Kings v. 13. 'Thus said the Lord, Forasmuch as this people refused the water of Gihon, and had no water, I give you the tears as rain.'—Jer. x. 15. 'Sigh, therefore, thou son of man, with the breaking (beating) of thy loins; and with bitterness a sigh before their eyes. 7. And it shall be when they say unto thee, Whereforeighest thou that thou shall answer? For the tidings, because it cometh; and every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble.'—Ezek. iii. 14.

'Thou, therefore, son of man, prophesy, and smite thine hand togethers.' 3 Matt. xvi. 21.

In later times, likewise, the Jews accompanied their discourses with significant actions, to give their instructions the greater force. Matt. xviii. 2. 'Jesus called a little child, and set him in the midst of them. 3. And said, Verily, I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. 4. Wherefore, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child,'&c.—Mark xi. 12. 'On the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, Jesus was hungry. 13. And seeing a fig tree afar off having leaves, he came, if haply he might find anything thereon; and when he came to it he found nothing but leaves. Now the time of (growing) figs was not yet. 14. And Jesus answered and said to it, No man eat fruit of thee henceforth for ever. 15. And his disciples heard it.—20. And on the (next) morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots. 21. And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto him, Master, behold the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away.' Peter called his Master's declaration, in consequence of which the fig tree was destroyed, a curse, agreeably to the phraseology of the Hebrews, who considered land absolutely sterile as cursed; Heb. vi. 8.—By the typical action of destroying the barren fig tree, our Lord intimated to his disciples the destruction which was coming on the Jewish nation on account of their wickedness.—John xiii. 4. 'Jesus riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments, and took a towel and girded himself. 5. After that he poureth water in a basin, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherein he was girded. 12. So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments and was set down again, he said to them, Know ye what I have done to you? 14. If ye love me, let me wash your feet.'—John xiii. 14. 'Ye ought to do the meanest offices to each other, when they are necessary for promoting each other's happiness.—Luke ix. 5. 'Whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust from your feet for a testimony against them.'—Matt. xix. 13. 'Then there were brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands on them and pray. 16. And he laid his hands on them.—1 Tim. iv. 14. "Neglect not the spiritual gift which is in thee, which was given thee according to prophecy, together with the imposition of the hands of the eldership."—Matt. xxvii. 44. 'Jesus had compassion on them, and touched their eyes; and immediately their eyes received sight.'—John ix. 6. 'He spat on the ground and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay; 7. And said to him, go wash in the pool of Siloam.'

These examples shew, that our Lord's taking Peter's wife's mother, who was sick of a fever, and Jairus's daughter, who was dead, by the hand; and his touching the eyes of the two blind men mentioned Matt. ix. 2, with other things of the like nature, were merely significant actions, by which he intimated to the persons themselves, and to those who were present, that he was going to work a miracle in their behalf. So also, before he said to his apostles, John xx. 22. 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost, he breathed on them,' to intimate, that by the invisible operation of his power he would confer on them the gifts of inspiration and miracles.

Another remarkable instance of enforcing information by a significant action, we have Acts xx. 11. When Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, 'Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that oweth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.'

Lastly, it is well known that baptism and the Lord's supper were instituted by Christ, and appointed to be continued in the church, for the purpose of setting before the people by significant actions some of the greatest articles of their faith.

Since then it was common in the eastern countries to give instruction by symbolical actions, as well as by words, the many extraordinary things done by the Jewish prophets, for discovering to the Israelites God's purposes concerning themselves, and concerning the neighbouring nations, cannot be matter either of astonishment or of offence to us. They were all of them done at the commandment of God, and agreeably to the manners of the times; and were admirably adapted to convey, in the strongest and most forcible manner, the information intended.

Thus, Isaiah was commanded by God to walk three years, not only barefoot but naked, that is, without his upper garment; namely, the hairy mantle commonly worn by the prophets, Zech. xiii. 4. And this he was to do as a sign and a wonder upon Egypt and Ethiopia.
Isa. xx. 3, 3. that is, as it is explained ver. 4. to shew by action, that the king of Assyria would lead away the Egyptians prisoners, and the Ethiopians captive, young and old, naked and barefoot, even with their buttocks uncovered, to the shores of Egypt. B. Lowth, in his notes on Isa. xx. 3, thinks it probable that Isaiah was ordered to walk naked and barefoot three days, to shew that within three years after the defeat of the Cushites and Egyptians by the king of Assyria, the town should be taken. For he thinks the time was foretold, as well as the event; and that the words three days may have been lost out of the text at the end of ver. 2, after the word barefoot, a day being put for a year, according to the prophetic rule.

In like manner Jeremiah was ordered, chap. xix. 1, to get a potter’s earthen bottle, and with the ancients of the people and of the priests, ver. 2, to go to the valley of Hinom, and prophesy in their hearing that Jerusalem was to be destroyed. And that his prophecy might have a strong impression on the imagination of the men who were with him, he was ordered, ver. 10, ‘to break the bottle in the sight of these men; 11. And to say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Even so will I break this people and this city, as one breaketh a potter’s vessel that cannot be made whole again.’

The same prophet was ordered, Jer. xxvii. 2. to make bonds and yokes, and put them on his own neck, and to send them to all the neighbouring kings, by the messengers whom they had sent to Jerusalem to persuade Zedekiah to enter into the confederacy which they had formed against the king of Babylon; and by that symbolic action the prophet was to signify to them, that the issue of the confederacy would be certain captivity to them all. But we are told, chap. xxviii. 10, that the false prophet Hananiah took the yoke from off the prophet Jeremiah’s neck, and broke it, and spoke in the presence of all the people, saying, ‘Thus saith the Lord, Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnessar king of Babylon, from the neck of all nations, within the space of two full years.’

Once more, Jeremiah having written in a book his prophecy concerning the destruction of Babylon, recorded Jer. li. he gave it to Seraiah, ver. 60, and ordered him when he came to Babylon with Zedekiah to read it, and having read it, to bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates. Ver. 64, ‘And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her.’

With the same design of speaking by significant actions, Ezekiel was ordered to delineate Jerusalem upon a tile, and to besiege it by building a fort against it, raising a mount, and setting a camp with battering rams against it round about. This siege the prophet was to continue four hundred and thirty days, and during the continuance thereof he was to eat and drink by measure: and his bread was to be baked, that is, prepared, ver. 15, with dung — the fuel with which he was to prepare his bread was to be dung. By these symbolical actions the prophet showed that Jerusalem was to be besieged, and that during the siege the inhabitants were to be punished with a grievous famine, Ezek. iv.—In the following chapter the prophet was ordered, ver. 1, to shew his head and beard, and with a balance to divide the hairs thereof into three parts, and, ver. 2, when the days of the siege were fulfilled, he was to burn with fire a third part of the hairs in the midst of the city: next, he was to take a third part and smile about it with a knife; and the remaining third part he was to scatter in the wind except a few hairs which he was to bind in the skirts of his garment. The meaning of these symbolical actions God explained to the Israelites as follows:—Ver. 11, ‘Because thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things, and with all thine abominations; therefore will I also diminish thee; neither shall mine eyes spare, neither will I have any pity. 12. A third part of thee shall be die with pestilence, and with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee: and a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee; and I will scatter a third part into all the winds: and I will draw out a sword after them. 13. Thus shall mine anger be accomplished, and I will cause my fury to rest upon them, and I will be comforted. 15. So it shall be a reproach and a taunt, an instruction and an astonishment, unto the nations that are round about thee, when I shall execute judgments in them, in anger, and in fury, and in furors of rebukes. If the Lord have spoken it.’

For the illustration of the foregoing allegorical action, I will here transcribe B. Lowth’s note on Isa. vii. 20, ‘In the same day shall the Lord shew with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head and the hair of the feet: and it shall also consume the beard.’—‘To shave with the hired razor the head, the feet, and the beard, is an expression highly parabolical; to denote the utter devastation of the country from one end to the other, and the plundering of the people from the highest to the lowest, by the Assyrians, whom God employed as his instrument to punish the Jews. Ahaz himself, in the first place, hired the king of Assyria to come to help him against the Syrians, by a present made to him of all the treasures of the temple as well as his own: and God himself considered the great nations whom he thus employed as his mercenaries, and paid them their wages. Thus he paid Nebuchadnessar, for his services against Tyre, by the conquest of Egypt, Ezek. xxix. 18–20. The hairs of the head are those of highest order in the state; those of the feet or the lower parts are the common people; the beard is the king, the high priest, the very supreme in dignity and majesty. The eastern people have always held the beard in the highest veneration, and have been extremely jealous of its honour. To pluck a man’s beard is an instance of the greatest indignity that can be offered, Isa. l. 6. The king of the Ammonites, to shew the utmost contempt of David, cut off half of the beards of his servants; and the men were greatly ashamed; and David bade them tarry at Jericho till their beards were grown,’ 2 Sam. x. 4, 5, &c.”

Once more, God ordered Ezekiel, chap. xii. 3, to prepare stuff for removing, and to go forth with it at even in the sight of the people, as they who go forth into captivity, and, having digged through the wall in their sight, to carry his stuff out thereby upon his shoulders in the twilight, with his face covered that he might not see the ground. The prophet having performed these actions in the sight of the people, when they said to him, What doest thou? God ordered him to reply, ver. 11, ‘I am your sign: like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall remove and go into captivity. 12. And the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulders in the twilight, and shall go forth: they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby: he shall cover his face that he see not the ground with his eyes. 13. My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in the snare: and I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there. 14. And I will scatter towards every wind, all that are about him to help him,’ &c.”

From these examples of significant actions, concerning which God declared that they were commanded to be done for the purpose of prefiguring future events, we may conclude, that those uncommon actions which he commanded without declaring the purpose for which they were commanded, had, like the others, a typical meaning. This conclusion is warranted by the inspired writers, who in after times have pointed out the things signified by these actions. For example, when God ordered Abraham to sacrifice his only son, although he did not tell him the purpose for which that difficult command was given to him, yet, from the apostle's terming the suspension of that command a receiving of Isaac from the dead for a parable, Heb. xi. 19, we learn, that by the command to sacrifice Isaac, and by the suspension of that command, the death and resurrection of God's only Son was prefigured. In like manner, when the sacrifice of the passover was instituted, although no intimation was given of its having a typical meaning, we know that it prefigured the sacrifice of Christ, together with the influence of that sacrifice in procuring the salvation of believers. For we are told expressly, John xix. 36, that when our Lord hung on the cross his legs were not broken, that the command concerning the paschal lamb, Exod. xii. 46. 'Neither shall ye break a bone thereof,' might be fulfilled. Besides, in allusion to the typical meaning of the passover, Christ is called, 1 Cor. v. 7. our Passover; and is said to be sacrificed for us. Further, when God ordered Moses to lift up the image of a serpent on a pole, that the Israelites in the wilderness who were stung with serpents, might be healed by looking at it, although nothing was said concerning its having a typical meaning, yet that it had such a meaning we learn from our Lord himself, who thus explained it, John iii. 14. 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whatsoever believeth on him, should not perish, but have eternal life.' Wherefore, the lifting up of the brazen serpent was a type of Christ's being lifted up on the cross; and the health which the Israelites obtained by looking at it, represented the salvation of those who believe on Christ as the Saviour of the world. Hence, in allusion to the typical meaning of the brazen serpent, Isaiah introduces Messiah saying, chap. iv. 21. 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.'

Upon the whole it appears, that the uncommon actions performed by the Jewish prophets, were all of them significant; both those whose meaning was declared, and those whose meaning was not declared; and that they were commanded by God, for the purpose of prefiguring, in a symbolic manner, future persons and events. It is true, the long duration of some of these symbolic actions, the labour with which they were performed, and the pain which they occasioned to the persons who performed them, have afforded infidels a presence for speaking of the prophets as fanatics and madmen, who by such doings debased the prophetic office. For which reason the prophets, by the divine direction, assumed characters not naturally belonging to them, and performed actions altogether out of the common course, for the purpose of prefiguring future persons and events, the characters and actions and fortunes of some eminent persons, whose distinguished stations placed them in the view of the world, were so ordered by God as to be exact representations of future persons, who, when they arose, by the likeness of their characters and actions and fortunes to those of the persons by whom they were represented, would make mankind sensible that the inspired teachers spake truly, when they declared that the one had been prefigured by the other. In some instances, the persons whose characters and actions prefigured future events, were declared by God himself to be typical, long before the events, which they prefigured came to pass; but in other instances, many persons really typical were not known to be such till after the things which they typified happened.

1. Of the first-mentioned sort we have a remarkable example in Abraham, whom God declared to be a typical person, by constituting him the father or type of believers of all nations; and by making with him, as their father, a covenant, in which he promised to be a God to him and to his seed in their generations, and to give to him and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; which promises had not only a literal but a typical or second meaning; as was shewed at large in Ex. v., sect. 1, 2, &c. consequently the covenant with Abraham was an allegory.

2. A second example of a typical person we have in Melchizedek, who, in his character of a king and priest united, was declared by God himself to be a type of his Son's being a king and a priest in the human nature; and who, by blessing Abraham, in a figure of the priesthood and government of the Son of God, was curving for believers the pardon of their sins.
4. ‘The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the similitude of Melchizedec.’

3. Jacob likewise, and Esau, were typical persons; for their struggling together in their mother’s womb, prefurged the wars which the nations who were to descend from them were to wage with each other: and Jacob’s taking hold of Esau’s heel in their birth, prefurged that the descendants of Jacob would subdue the descendants of Esau. So God told Rebecca, Gen. xxi. 23. ‘Two nations are in thy womb; and two kinds of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger.’

4. Joshua, who was the high-priest of the Jews during the rebuilding of the temple, was an eminently typical person: for he prefurged our great high-priest Christ, as we learn from the vision in which the prophet Zechariah, chap. iii. 3. saw him standing before the angel of the Lord, in filthy garments, to represent the iniquity of the many which was to be laid on Christ. These filthy garments the angel commanded to be taken away from him; and said, ver. 4. ‘Behold I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment.’

5. And I said, let them set a fair mitre upon his head: So they set a fair mitre upon his head; such as the high-priests wore when they officiated, and clothed him with garments.’ Then, to show the emblems of the sacrifice, the angel of the Lord said, ver. 8. ‘Hear now, O Joshua, the high-priest, thou and thy fellows that sit before thee, for they are men of wonder; typical men. So the phrase signifies, Isa. viii. 18. ‘For behold, I will bring forth my servant the Branch.’ Wherefore, Joshua, in his character as high-priest, and his fellows the high-priests who preceded him, were all of them types, or prefigurations, of God’s servant the Branch, in his character as high-priest; which also the author of the epistle to the Hebrews hath proved at great length.—Farther, to shew still more clearly that Joshua was a type of Christ, the prophet was ordered by God to take silver and gold and make crowns, and to set them on the head of Joshua in the house of Joash, and to say to him, chap. vi. 12. ‘Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch: He shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and the nations shall be blessed in him, and in his reign shall be between them both.’ But the man whose name is the Branch, and who is here foretold to grow up out of his place, was, according to Isaiah, to be a descendant of Jesse. Chap xi. 1. ‘And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots.’ Wherefore, Joshua being a descendant of Aaron, was not the person whom Isaiah foretold under the idea of a Branch growing out of the roots of Jesse; consequently, when God ordered the prophet to say to Joshua and the witnesses, after putting the crowns on Joshua’s head, Behold the man whose name is the Branch, his meaning certainly was, that Joshua was a type of the man whose name is the Branch, in his two offices of a king and a priest, and as the builder of the true temple of the Lord. Accordingly, that this symbolical transaction might be remembered, and that Joshua in after ages might be known to have been a type and a pledge of the coming of the Man whose name is the Branch, the two crowns which the prophet had put on Joshua’s head, as symbols of the two offices in which he was a type of Christ, were, by the command of God, delivered to the witnesses, to be laid up in the temple as a memorial, ver. 14.

If, because Zechariah at this time was the prince of the Jews, any one expects that he, and not Joshua, was called the man whose name is the Branch, he ought to consider, that of the man whose name is the Branch it is said, ver. 13. not only that he shall build the temple of the Lord,—and shall sit and rule upon his throne,—but that ‘he shall be a priest upon his throne,’ for this could not be said of Zechariah, who was not a descendant of Aaron. We may therefore conclude, that the things said and done to Joshua by the prophet Zechariah, were said and done to him as a type of Christ.

5. Of typical persons who were not declared to be such, till the persons of whom they were types appeared, Adam deserves to be first mentioned. For, in respect of his being the author of sin and death to all his posterity, he is said by the apostle, Rom. v. 14. to be by contrast πατέρ, ‘the type or figure of him (Christ) whom was to come,’ for the purpose of being the author of righteousness and life to mankind. See Rom. v. 14. notes. Hence Christ is called, 1 Cor. xv. 45. the last Adam.—Adam was likewise a type of Christ in this respect, that Eve, who was an image of the church, was formed of a rib taken from Adam’s side while he was in a deep sleep; for this transaction prefurged the formation of the church, the Lamb’s wife, by the breaking of Christ’s side on the cross, while he slept the sleep of death, as the prophet Isaiah saith, Eph. v. 32. See the note on that verse.

6. Of persons who in their natural characters and fortunes were types of future persons and events, Abraham’s wives and sons are remarkable examples. His wife, Hagar and Sarah, were types of the two covenants, by which men become the people of God; and his sons Isaac and Ishmael, were, in their characters and state, types of the people of God under these covenants. So the apostle Paul assures us, Gal. iv. 22. ‘It is written that Abraham had two sons; one by the bond-maid, and one by the free woman. But he, verily, who was born of the bond-maid, was begotten according to the flesh; but he who was born of the free woman was through the promise. 24. Which things are an allegory; for these women are the two covenants: The one, vanity, from Mount Sinai, bringing forth children unto bondage, which is Hagar. 25. For the name Agar denotes Mount Sinai in Arabia; and she answereth to the present Jerusalem, and is in bondage with her children. 26. But the Jerusalem above is the free woman, who is the mother of us all.’ See Gal. iv. 24. notes 1, 2, and ver. 25. notes, where, and in the commentary, this allegory is explained.

7. The third typical person I shall mention is David, who was raised by God to the government of the natural seed of Abraham, that in his office as their king, and in his wars against their enemies, he might be a type of Christ the Ruler and Saviour of Abraham’s spiritual seed. This appears from what the angel who announced our Lord’s birth said to his mother, Luke i. 32. ‘The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall rule over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.’ For in what sense could our Lord’s spiritual dominion be called the kingdom of his father David, unless David’s kingdom was a type thereof? In fact, the power and success with which David governed the natural seed, and subdued the neighbouring heathen nations, their enemies, was a fit prefiguration of the power and success with which Christ rules the spiritual seed, and subdues their enemies.—That David was a type of Christ appears from this also, that the prophets who foretold to the Israelites the coming of Christ, named him David, and David their king: by a common metonymy giving the name of the type to the person typified. See Jer. xxx. 9. Ezek. xxiv. 23. xxvii. 24. Hosea iii. 4. 5. and Isa. iv. 3. Acts xiii. 34. particularly the last mentioned passage, where the benefits which the spiritual seed derive from the government of Christ, and in particular their safety from their enemies, are termed, The sure mercies of David. — In short, unless David in his government of the natural seed was a type of Christ in his government of the spiritual seed, no just interpretation can be given of the divine revelations and promises which were made to him, and which are recorded by Ethan, Psal. lxxxix. 19—37. Whereas, if these things are spoken to David as an image or type of Christ, the whole is plain, and hath received a complete accomplishment.

8. The fourth typical person whose history is given in scripture is Solomon, who, in his ruling the natural seed, and in his building the temple, prefigured Christ the ruler of the spiritual Israel, and the builder of the Christian church, the great temple of God which in its perfect form will subsist in the heavenly country. For as David's government was so ordered by God as to be a striking representation of the powerful government which Christ now exercises, for protecting his people and subduing their enemies, so God raised up Solomon a peaceful king, and made Israel enjoy peace and prosperity under his government, and appointed him to build the temple of God at Jerusalem, 1 Chron. xxii. 10. to prefigure the peace and happiness which the spiritual Israel shall enjoy after all their enemies are completely destroyed, and they themselves are introduced into the heavenly country, and formed into one great church or temple for the worship of God. This appears from Psal. lxxii, where Solomon's character and actions as a king are delineated, and the happy effects of his government are described. For in that Psalm things are spoken of him which do not belong to him, unless as a type of Christ; particularly ver. 6. They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations.— Ver. 11. All kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him. 12. For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth, the poor also, and him who hath no helper. 14. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence; and precious shall their blood be in his sight.— Ver. 17. His name shall endure for ever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed. —This last circumstance indispensably proves Solomon to have been a type of Christ, for it was one of these distinguishing characters of Christ, Abrahamic seed, that 'in him all the nations of the earth were to be blessed.' Moreover, Psal. xlv. cannot be interpreted of Solomon, unless on the supposition that he was a type of Christ; for in his natural character it could not be said to Solomon, ver. 6. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of rectitude. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated wickedness; therefore, O God, thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy associates.' See Heb. i. 8, note 1.

9. The fifth allegorical or typical person spoken of in scripture, is the son of the prophetess, whose birth was foretold Is. vii. 14. 'The Lord himself shall give you a sign, Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Emmanuel.' Butter and honey shall be in his mouth, and he shall make to understand the difference between the fear of the Lord and the fear of the false gods. 15. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings.'— B. Lowth says this passage should be translated in the following manner: Behold this virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and thou shalt call his name Emmanuel: Butter and honey shall he eat whom he shall know to refuse evil and choose good. For before this child shall know to refuse evil and choose good, the land shall be desolate, by whose two kings thou art distressed.' On Isaiah, p. 83. Lowth adds, 'Harmer has clearly shewn, that these articles of food (butter and honey) are delicacies in the east, and as such denote a state of plenty. See also Job. v. 6. They therefore naturally express the plenty of the country, as a mark of peace restored to it.' And in confirmation of his opinion he cites Jer. xi. 5. Buitym et mel comendavit, quoniam terrae nostra plena erit omnis boni.' He then proceeds thus, p. 64.: Agreeably to the observations communicated by the learned person above mentioned, (Harmer), which perfectly well explain the historical sense of this much disputed passage, not excluding a higher secondary sense, the obvious and literal meaning of the prophecy is this, That within the time that a young woman, now a virgin, should conceive and bring forth a child, and that child should arrive at such an age as to distinguish between good and evil, that is, within a few years, (compare viii. 4.), the enemies of Judah should be destroyed.' And to show that this prophecy actually hath a higher secondary meaning, that learned expositor reasons as follows: 'But the prophecy is introduced in so solemn a manner, the sign is so marked, as a sign selected and given by God himself, after Abaz had rejected the offer of any sign of his own choosing out of the whole compass of nature; the terms of the prophecy are so peculiar, and the name of the child so expressive, containing in them much more than the circumstances of the birth of a common child required or even admitted; that we may easily suppose, that, in minds prepared by the general expectation of a great deliverer to spring from the house of David, they raised hopes far beyond what the present occasion suggested, especially when it was found, that in the subsequent prophecy, delivered immediately afterward, this child, called Immanuel, is treated as the Lord and Prince of the land of Judah. (Chap. viii. 8.) To the things mentioned by Lowth, I add, that the account of the character and actions of this child, given Is. ix. 6, is by no means applicable to the son of the prophetess, unless as a type of the divine person who was to be the deliverer of the people of God. 'Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.' Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end; upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth, even for ever: The seal of the Lord of hosts will perform this.' That the prediction of a virgin's conceiving and bearing a son, who was to be called Emmanuel, was at that time understood to be a promise of the birth of a great and even a divine person, B. Lowth says, 'may be collected with great probability from a passage of Micah, a prophet contemporary with Isaiah, but who began to prophesy after him, and who, as I have already observed, imitated him, and sometimes used his expressions. Micah having delivered that remarkable prophecy which determines the place of the birth of Messiah, 'the ruler of God's people, whose goings forth have been of old from everlasting,' that it should be Bethlehem Ephrata, adds immediately, that nevertheless in the mean time God would deliver his people into the hands of their enemies: 'He will give them up, till she who is to bear a child shall bring forth.' Micah v. 8. This obviously and plainly refers to some known prophecy concerning a woman to bring forth a child, and seems much more properly applicable to this passage of Isaiah, than to any other of the same prophet to which some interpreters have applied it. St. Matthew, therefore, in applying this prophecy to the birth of Christ, chap. i. 22, 23, does it merely in accordance with the words of the prophet to a suitable case, not...
OF THE RIGHT INTERPRETATION

CHAPTER VIII

The sixth allegorical or typical person mentioned in Scripture is the prophet Jonah, whose preservation in the belly of the whale during three days and three nights, and his being after that vomited up alive, Christ himself declared was a type of his own continuance in the grave, and of his subsequent resurrection from the dead: Matt. xii. 39. "An evil and adulterous generation seeketh a sign after a sign, and there shall no sign be given to it but the sign of the prophet Jonah. 40. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." Farther, by saying, Luke xi. 30. "As Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation," our Lord insinuated, that as the miraculous preservation of Jonah in the whale's belly, when related to the Ninevites, induced them to give credit to the message which he brought to them from God, so Christ's resurrection from the dead, preached to mankind by his apostles, would induce many to believe on him as the Son of God: wherefore, in both these particulars, Jonah was a type of Christ. 11. Having said thus much concerning persons, who in their natural characters, and actions, and fortunes, are declared to have been types of futurc persons and events, it remains to speak of events happening to the ancient church and people of God, which by the circumstances wherewith they were accompanied, are shewed to have been typical of greater events than were to happen to the people of God under the gospel dispensation. Now concerning these I have two observations to make. The first is, that the things respecting the ancient people of God, which prefigured the greater things to happen to the people of God under the gospel dispensation, were in some instances foretold before they happened to the ancient people. My second observation is, that the prediction of these figurative events were also predictions of the events which they prefigured. Of this double sense of prophecy various instances might be given: Suffice it, however, to mention one instance only: namely, the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, and their restoration to the land of Canaan. These, though natural events, prefigured the much greater and more important deliverance of mankind from the captivity of sin, and the introduction into the heavenly Canaan. For, in the writings of the evangelists, passages of the prophecies which foretold the deliverance from Babylon are applied to that greater deliverance. For example, Isa. xi. 2, 3. He is said by Matthew, chap. iii. 3, and by our Lord himself, Matt. x. 10. to have been fulfilled by John Baptist's preaching in the wilderness of Judea. Yet these verses, in their literal and literal meaning, evidently relate to the return of the Jews from Babylon: for Isaiah, in the end of chap. xxxix. having foretold that all the riches of his palace, which Hezekiah had from pride shown to the messengers of the king of Babylon, should be carried away to Babylon, and that his sons should be carried thither captive, and made eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon, the prophet in his 11th chapter mitigated the severity of that prediction, by foretelling, that while the Jews were oppressed with the miseries of their captivity, God would order his prophets who were among them to comfort his people, by assuring them that their captivity would at length come to an end; because, considering their sufferings as a sufficient punishment for their sins as a nation, he would pardon and restore them to their own land, ver. 2. "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hands double for all her sins." The people in Babylon being thus assured that they were to be brought back to Judea, "the first thought," as B. Lowth observes, "which would occur to the captives, would be the difficult and danger of their passing through the deserts of Arabia, the nearest way from Babylon to Jerusalem lay." Wherefore the prophets in Babylon, to remove the fears of the people, were ordered to assure them, that by whatever road they should return, it would be made commodious for their safe passage. And this assurance the prophets would give them in language taken from the custom of the eastern princes, when, when they were about to march with their armies through difficult roads, sent pioneers before them to widen the narrow passages, to fill up the hollows, to level the heights, and to smooth the rough ways through which they were to march — Ver. 8. "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord: make straight in the desert an highway for our God. 4. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain." By these images the prophets intimated, that God was to march from Babylon at the head of his people, to protect them during their journey and to bring them safely into Judea. These things are more plainly expressed, Isa. lxi. 12. "Ye shall not go out with haste, nor go by flight; for the Lord will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rear-ward." But although this whole prophecy, in its first and literal meaning, evidently related to the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon, the application of the above cited passage to the preaching of John Baptist by the evangelist Matthew, and by our Lord himself, sheweth plainly, that the prophecies concerning the deliverance of the people of God from the Babylonian captivity, had a second and higher meaning, of which the literal sense was the sign. By foretelling the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon, these prophecies foretold the deliverance of mankind from the infinitely worse bondage of sin. Moreover, the command to the prophets in Babylon to comfort God's people, by announcing that their sins were pardoned, and that they were soon to be brought back to their own land, was a command to the ministers of the gospel in every age to comfort penitent believers, by assuring them that their sins shall be pardoned, and that Christ will bring them safely into the heavenly country, (of which the restoration of the Jews to Canaan was the emblem and pledge), because he hath successfully removed all obstacles out of their way. The preparation of the way of the Lord among the Jews by the preaching of John Baptist, was fifty expressed by the voice of one crying in the wilderness. For, as Lowth observes on Isaiah, p. 188. "The Jewish church, to which John was sent to announce the coming of Messiah, was at that time in a barren and desert condition; unfruitful, without reformation, for the reception of her king. It was in this desert country, destitute at that time of all religious cultivation, in true piety and good works unfruitful, that John was sent to prepare the way of the Lord by preaching repentance." Many other examples of prophecies might be mentioned in which the return of the Jews from Babylon was foretold, and of which passages are applied, by the writers of the New Testament, to the redemption of mankind from the bondage of sin. But the one explained above may suffice as a proof of what is called the double sense of prophecy, in which the obvious literal sense exhibits a second and higher meaning; so that these prophecies, properly speaking, are true allegories. Thus it appears, that the high figurative expressions in the Jewish scriptures, which are so offensive to modern ears and to minute philosophers, were occasioned by the poverty of the first language of mankind: that the boldest of these figures were derived from the ancient picture-writing: that the symbols used in that kind of writing gave rise to the dark Egyptian allegory, which was held in great estimation at the time the scriptures were written; and that, in the early ages, mankind, whether barbarous or civilized, were accustomed to express their sentiments and feelings by significant actions as well as by significant sounds. These things considered, it cannot be matter either of surprise or of blame, that the Jewish prophets exhorted the people and foretold future events in such figurative language as to us moderns appears extravagant; or that they delivered their exhortations and predictions in dark allegories, formed on the qualities and circumstances of the symbols by which the persons and nations, concerning whom they prophesied, were denoted in picture-writing; or even that, on extraordinary occasions, they foretold things future by what may be called a drama continued through a great length of time, in which they spake and acted things which excited the wonder of the spectators, and led them to inquire what the prophets meant by them, and, when explained, could not but make a strong impression upon their imagination. These things were all done suitably to the genius and manners of the times, and were easily understood by the people for whose instruction they were intended.—And with respect to the persons who, in the scriptures, are said in their natural characters and actions to have been types of future persons and events, that method of foretelling things future was of the same kind with allegorical prophecy; for surely it made no difference whether the allegory was formed on the qualities and actions of a symbol, or on the qualities and actions of a real person. In the symbolical or instituted allegory, it was shewed to be an allegory by the particulars of which it was composed; but in the natural allegory, the characters and events of which it was composed do not shew it to be an allegory: wherefore, before these are considered by us as allegories, or prefigurations of future persons and events, we ought to be assured by some one or other of the prophets or inspired persons who afterwards arose, that they are allegories, otherwise they ought not to be considered as such.—By this rule, the falsity of those allegorical meanings which some of the ancient fathers put on many passages of scripture will clearly appear; and the humour of finding mystical senses in the sacred oracles, which some of the modern commentators have too much indulged, will be effectually repressed.

Upon the whole, the observation suggested in the beginning of this Essay may now be repeated with some confidence: namely, That the high figurative language by which the Jewish scriptures are so strongly marked, together with the allegorical and typical senses with which they abound, and the extraordinary things done by the Jewish prophets, instead of being instances of absurdity, and signs of imposture, are proofs of their antiquity and authenticity; and even strong presumptions of the divine original of the revelation contained in those venerable writings.
THE LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL,
BY WHOM THE GENTILES WERE CONVERTED.
ACCOMPANIED WITH PROOFS AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

I offer to the Public the history of the Apostle Paul, composed from materials furnished, partly by himself in his epistles, and partly by the evangelist Luke in his book of the Acts. And I do this in the persuasion, that the better we are acquainted with Paul’s character and actions, the more we will be disposed to acknowledge his authority as an apostle, and to respect his writings as the oracles of God. This, however, is not the only advantage to be derived from the knowledge of Paul’s history: it will establish us in the faith, by showing us in what manner the gospel was preached at the first, both to the Jews and to the Gentiles; what success it met with in different countries where it was preached; what sufferings the first preachers and the first believers endured for the sake of the gospel; and how truly it was confirmed by the Lord, who gave testimony to the word of his grace, by the signs and wonders which he granted to be wrought by the hands of the apostles, in all the countries where they preached. To these advantages we may add, the use which the knowledge of Paul’s history will be of in helping us to understand his writings, which make so considerable a part of the canon of scripture.

CHAP. I.—Paul’s Birth and Education; his Persecution of the Disciples of Christ; and his Conversion.

Paul was a Jew, of the tribe of Benjamin, rightly descended from Abraham, the founder of the Jewish nation; in which respect he was superior to those Jews whose parents had been converted from heathenism. According to the manner of his people, he was circumcisioned on the eighth day after his birth, and had an Hebrew name given him, being called Saul; but afterward he took the name of Paulus or Paul, in compliment to Sergius Paulus the proconsul of Cyprus, whom he converted in his first journey among the Gentiles, Acts xvi. 7. R. Tarsus, the place of Saul’s nativity, though not a city of Judea, did honor to such Jews as were born there; for it was the metropolis of Cilicia, and, as a place of education, it excelled Athens and Alexandria, and all the other Greek cities where there were schools of philosophy and of the polite arts. So Strabo tells us, lib. xiv. Saul therefore had reason to boast even of the place of his birth, Acts xx. 39. ‘I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city.’

Saul’s father was a Roman,” (Acts xxii. 28.), which in the provinces was a distinction highly honorable, as it entitled those who possessed it to many valuable privileges and immunities. For which reason it was either purchased with money, or it was bestowed as the reward of extraordinary services, Acts xx. 28. His being a Roman in the right of his father, is not the only circumstance which shows that Saul was well born: the care and expense bestowed on his education, is a proof that his family was in opulent circumstances.

As Saul hath termed himself an Hebrew of the Hebrews, we may presume that the language of his family was what they then called the Hebrew. Yet having passed the first years of his life in Tarsus, a Greek city, it is reasonable to believe that he spake the Greek language also, and was even taught to read it. But as to his education in the Greek literature I am not so certain. In his sermons and writings there are traces from which it may be gathered, that he had a general knowledge of the learning, the religion, the manners, and the customs of the Greeks, and that he had read some of their best authors. But whether he got that knowledge at Tarsus, in his younger years, may be doubted. He did not remain there the time that was requisite for acquiring it, and at Jerusalem, where he received the greatest part of his education, he had no opportunity of studying the Greek learning. I am therefore of opinion, that Saul’s knowledge of the Greek rhetoric and philosophy was not acquired in Tarsus. Neither was it such as could entitle him to the appellation of learned in these matters. But it was a general knowledge only, acquired by conversing with the Greeks in the different countries where he preached the gospel. In any other manner he cannot be supposed to have got that knowledge; because, however capable he might be of such studies, he had no leisure, after he became an apostle, to prosecute them. Besides the greatest proficiency in the rhetoric and philosophy of the Greeks would have been of no use to him in the discharge of the apostolic office. For Christ sent him and the other apostles to preach the gospel, not with the wisdom of words, lest the conversion of the world might have been attributed to the eloquence, knowledge, and superior abilities of the preachers, and not to the power of God which accompanied their preaching.

But though Saul was no proficient in the rhetoric and philosophy of the Greeks, he was thoroughly instructed in the learning of the Jews. For as soon as the years of his childhood were over, his parents sent him to Jerusalem, to study under Gamaliel, the most celebrated doctor of his time, and who, for his great knowledge and virtue, was in reputation among all the people, Acts v. 34. —According to Josephus, Ant. xx. the learning of the Jews consisted in the knowledge of their own laws and religion, as contained in their sacred writings. The doctors, therefore, employed themselves in explaining these writings to the studious youth, founding their interpretations upon traditions pretended to be handed down from Moses and the prophets. It is true, the doctors in some instances perverted the meaning of the scriptures; and by their traditions made void the commandments of God. But in general the true sense of the scriptures seems to have been preserved among the Jews by those traditionary explications, as may be understood from the following well known facts—1. The apostle, especially Paul, in reasoning with the Jews, always proved the doctrines of the gospel by quotations out of the writings of Moses and the prophets. But these quotations would have been no proofs at all of the gospel doctrines, at least to the Jews, unless the sense put upon them by the apostles, which was their real meaning, had been the sense generally put upon them by the Jews.—2. It was owing to the knowledge which they had of the true meaning of the writings of Moses and the prophets, that some of the more learned Jews believed on Jesus: Such as Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathæa, and that great company of the priests who were obedient to the faith, Acts vi. 7—9. Gamaliel, Paul’s master, from his great knowledge of the scriptures, seems to have thought well of the apostles, and of their doctrines, as is plain from the council which he gave to his brethren of the Sanhedrim, Acts v. 38. ‘And now, I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel, or this work, be of men, it will come to nought. 39. But if it be of God, you cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God!’—How perfectly Saul was educated in the knowledge of the law of the Fathers, we learn from himself, Acts xxii. 3. ‘Born in Tarsus in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers; and was zealous towards God, as ye all are this day.’ And of his proficiency in that kind of learning he says, Gal. i. 14. ‘And profited in Judaism above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the fathers.’

Saul’s parents completed his education, by having him taught the art of tent-making, Acts xviii. 3. In this they followed the manners of the Jews, with whom it was customary to teach the youth of the highest birth some mechanical employment, whereby, in cases of necessity, they might maintain themselves without being burdensome to others. The benefit which Saul derived from this branch of his education while he preached the gospel, will be seen afterwards.

In what year of his age Saul came to Jerusalem, and how long he continued under the tuition of Gamaliel, is not known: But from his saying, that ‘he spent his youth among his own nation at Jerusalem,’ Acts xxvi. 4, it may be conjectured that he came thither early in life. And seeing, in his epistle to Philemon, which is thought to have been written A. D. 62, he calls himself Paul the aged, we cannot be much mistaken in supposing that he was then about 60 years old; and that when our Lord began his public ministry he was in the 26th year of his age. Wherefore, having finished his studies, we may suppose that he then professed himself a Pharisee; of which sect also his father was, Acts xxii. 6—Farther, seeing our Lord, in the course of his ministry, attracted the attention of the whole Jewish nation, it is probable Saul’s zeal for the institutions of his fathers prompted him to join such of his sect as followed Jesus with an intention to find matter of accusation against him. And when he was tried, condemned, and put to death, for calling himself Christ the Son of the Blessed, this zealous young man may have been present. So that, having often seen Jesus, he could know whether he who appeared to him on the road to Damascus, was really the person whom the rulers at Jerusalem had put to death, or only an impostor who personated him. However, if any one calls this conjecture in question, I will not dispute it with him.

What we certainly know from the sacred history is, that when Christ’s resurrection from the dead was published in Jerusalem, the rulers were greatly offended with the preachers of that miracle; and the rather, because they urged it as a proof that Jesus, whom God had raised from the dead, was the Christ, and that he had been put to death unjustly. Wherefore the rulers stirred up some of the most zealous members of the foreign synagogues in Jerusalem (Proofs and Illustrations, No. 1.) to oppose them. And these zealots happening to hear Stephen, one of the seven deacons, preach, disputed with him. But, Acts vi. 10, ‘They were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake. 11. Then they suborned men, which said, in the hearing of the multitude before whom they disputed, and in private to the elders and scribes, ‘We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and God. 12. And they stirred up the people, and the elders, and the scribes, and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council. 13. And set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law. 14. For we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth, whom ye put to death as a deceiver, shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us.’ While the witnesses thus bare testimony against Stephen, 15. ‘All that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.’ It seems his face alone with a glory like that which beams from Moses’ face when he came down from the mount. This miraculous testimony from God the council beheld all the while Stephen spake in his own defence; and from it they might have concluded, that the things which he spake were agreeable to God. Nevertheless, when they heard them, being cut to the heart, they ‘gnashed on him with their teeth’ through rage. But Stephen was miraculously supported by a sight of ‘the glory of God, and of Jesus standing on the right hand of God;’ and being exceedingly affected with the sight, he told it to the council. But they stopped their ears, as afraid to hear things blasphemous, ‘and ran upon him with one accord, and cast him out of the city, and stoned him to death, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, (for he now saw him), receive my spirit.’

In executions of this kind, it was usual for those who had borne witness against the criminal to cast the first stone. And for that purpose they put off their upper garments, and gave them to be kept by persons equally hearty in the prosecution with themselves. At the stoning of Stephen, the witnesses laid their clothes at the feet of our Saul; by which he is pointed out as consenting to the condemnation and punishment of that blessed martyr, Acts xxii. 20. Stephen, in his defence, having boldly asserted before the council that Jesus was the Just One, or Christ; and that they were his betrayers and murderers, also, having called them a stiffnecked and uncircumcised, whose fathers persecuted the prophets, and slew them which shadowed before of the coming of the Just One, and who by no means observed the law of which they pretended to be so zealous; all the council were enraged, and carried on the persecution against the church, after Stephen’s death, with the utmost severity, intending utterly to extirpate the whole sect. Acts viii. 1—3. "bhlb.
that time there was a great persecution against the church that was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad, the preachers and the chief brethren were scattered abroad, throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles. — One of the main instruments in this persecution was our Saul; 3. 'Who made havoc of the church, entering into every house where the disciples assembled for the worship of God,' and halting men and women, committed them to prison.' It seems the chief priests had given him a commission to search them out, and imprison them, that they might be punished. So he tells us himself, Acts xxvi. 10. 'Which thing I also did at Jerusalem; and many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests.' — The same thing he affirmed in the hearing of the multitude, Acts xxii. 4. 'I persecuted this way unto death, binding and delivering into prison both men and women.' The Jews were now at liberty to put the disciples to death, because, between the removal of Pontius Pilate and the accession of Herod Agrippa, in the second year of the Emperor Claudius, who gave him all the dominions of his grandfather Herod the Great, there was no procurator in Judea to restrain their inimicable zeal.

In employing Saul as the instrument of their malice against the saints, the rulers did not make a wrong choice. For though he had received abundance of Jewish literature from his master Gamaliel, he had acquired nothing of his moderation; but executed his commission with such severity, that the disciples were forced to take shelter in foreign cities. But even there they did not long remain in safety; for, Acts ix. 1. 'Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went up unto the high-priest; 2. And desired of him letters to Damascus, to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men, or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.' It seems the synagogues in foreign parts had a jurisdiction over their own members, (No. II.,) in the exercise of which they were sometimes directed, as on this occasion, by the high-priest and council at Jerusalem. At this time there were several synagogues in Damascus; so that it was full of Jews; and many of them had embraced the gospel. Wherefore, although Damascus was at a great distance from Jerusalem, Saul resolved to go thither with his new commission from the high-priest; and, being joined by assistants equally bigoted and furious with himself, the news of their coming reached Damascus before they arrived, and greatly terrified the saints, Acts ix. 14. 21.

But when this company of persecutors, full of wrath against the disciples, drew nigh to the city, the Lord Jesus appeared to Saul from heaven, surrounded with a light inexpressibly resplendent, which was seen also by Saul's companions: Acts ix. 3. 'And as he journeyed he came near Damascus, and suddenly there shined round him a light from heaven.' Saul himself, giving an account of this circumstance to Agrippa, says, Acts xxvi. 13. 'At mid-day, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me and them which journeyed with me.' Luke proceeds thus: 4. 'And he fell to the earth.' But Saul himself, in relating this circumstance, says, Acts xxvi. 14. 'And when we were all fallen to the earth—' they all fell prostrate, from fear or reverence, supposing the supernatural light which they saw to be an indication of the appearance of some divine person — 'I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' By speaking thus, Jesus declared that he considered whatever was done to his people as done to himself. Acts ix. 8. 'And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest: It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.' Thon will find it hard for thee to accomplish thy malicious designs against me. In the account which Saul gave of this conversation to Agrippa, he says, that after speaking the words last mentioned, Jesus ordered him to rise and to put off his shoes. Acts xxvi. 15. 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. But rise and stand upon thy feet.' Jesus intended that Saul should see him, and be convinced that the person who now spake to him was Jesus of Nazareth, whom the priests had crucified at Jerusalem; and that he was really risen from the dead, as his disciples affirmed. We must therefore believe, that in obedience to this order, Saul arose from the earth, and with his bodily eyes beheld Jesus standing in the way before him, (No. III.) But being unable to bear the dazzling splendour of his appearance, he fell to the earth a second time; or, he may have put himself into that posture, as worshipping Jesus, whom he now knew to be Christ the Son of God, Acts ix. 20. While in this humble posture, Acts ix. 6. 'he trembled and was astonished, said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' By professing a willingness to do whatever Jesus should command him, Saul declared that he had now altered his opinion of Jesus of Nazareth, and had laid aside his enmity against his disciples. — Luke has related none of the things which on this occasion Jesus said to Saul, except that he was to go into the city, and there it should be told him what he was to do; so that, from his account of the matter, we could not have understood that Jesus at this time was made an apostle by Christ, and commissioned to preach to the Gentiles. But Saul himself hath supplied that defect; for he told Agrippa, that when Jesus ordered him to rise and stand upon his feet, he added, Acts xxvi. 16. 'I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17. Delivering thee from the people of the Jews, and from the Gentiles, unto whom I now send thee, 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith which is in me.' Having thus spoken, he added, as Luke informs us, Acts ix. 6. 'Arise and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.' 7. And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, (κατεκοίμητος ἀπὸ τῆς γλώσσας) hearing indeed his voice, but seeing no man.' They heard Saul's voice, but did not see the person to whom he spoke. 8. And Saul arose from the earth; and when his eyes were opened, he saw no man.' Saul having looked steadfastly on Jesus, before he fell to the ground the second time, was struck blind by the brightness of his appearance: so he says, Acts xxii. 11. 'When I could not see for the glory of that light.' But his companions, lying all the while with their faces towards the earth, did not see Jesus; so that their eye-sight remaining, Acts ix. 8. 'they led Saul by the hand, and brought him to Damascus,' to the house of one Judas, ver. 11. with whom it seems they were acquainted. Here Saul abode three days absolutely blind, without either eating or drinking, ver. 9.—If Saul's companions, by what had happened and by what he told them, were induced to alter their faith concerning Jesus of Nazareth, they would remain with Saul, to assist and comfort him in his disconsolate state: But if they continued in their former persuasion—"Hearing indeed his voice, but seeing no man." — This translation removes the difficulty arising from Saul's account of the matter to the council, Acts xxiii. 9. 'And they that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid, but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.' Or this supposition may be removed by translating οὐσίας, "they understood not the voice of him that spake to me." — Acts xxvi. 14. 'And when a voice came to our Lord from the Father, John xii. 8. to the people that stood by heard the voice, but not understanding what was spoken, said it thundered." they would return to Jerusalem, and inform the high-priest and council of what had happened.

Saul’s long-continued fast was a natural expression of his bitter grief for having persecuted the disciples of Jesus. With fasting he joined fervent and often-repeated prayer, perhaps to Jesus; in which he made an humble confession of his sin in persecuting him, and earnest supplication for pardon: all which being certain signs of his repentance, they were mentioned by Christ himself as such, Acts ix. 11.—During his three days’ blindness and fasting, Saul was instructed by visions and revelations from the Lord, agreeably to what was promised him, ‘That in Damascus it should be told him what he was to do.’ One vision of this kind is expressly mentioned, in which the restoration of his sight by Ananias was foretold to him, while perhaps he was praying for that very blessing—Acts ix. 12. ‘And hast seen a man named Ananias coming in and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.’

This Ananias, before his conversion to Christianity, had lived so conformably to the law, that he was much esteemed by all the Jews who dwelt in Damascus, Acts xiii. 12. And after his conversion, his piety being equally conspicuous, he was a person of great note among the brethren also. To him Jesus appeared in a vision on the third day of Saul’s fast, and ordered him to go into the house of Judas, and inquire for Saul of Tarsus; of whom he needed no longer to fear, because he was spending his time in prayer for the pardon of his sin in persecuting the saints; and because Ananias himself had been shown to him in a vision as sent to cure his sight. Wherefore Ananias, being so deceived, went forth with into the house of Judas, Acts xxi. 7. ‘And putting his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.’ (No. IV.) 16. And immediately there fell from his eyes, as if it had been scales. And he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized, in token of his faith, and repentance, and pardon. And since Ananias told him he was sent that he might both receive his sight and be filled with the Holy Ghost, we may believe that after his baptism the Holy Ghost fell upon him in some visible manner, as upon the other apostles at the first; so that Saul was ‘in nothing inferior to the very greatest apostles,’ 2 Cor. xi. 5. For, as we shall see afterwards, he enjoyed the inspiration of the Spirit, the power of working miracles, the discerning of spirits, and the gift of tongues, in as ample a manner as any of the apostles; by all which he was not only fitted for being an apostle of Christ, but plainly declared to be so.

The miraculous restoration of Saul’s sight, his baptism, and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, being undoubted pledges of his pardon and reconciliation with Christ, he put an end to his long fast, and was comforted. Acts xix. 14. ‘And when he had received meat, he was strengthened.’ He received his bodily strength, which had been impaired by his long fast, as well as by what had happened to him in the way. In this miraculous manner was Saul, in the very height of his rage against the saints, converted, and made an apostle of Jesus Christ, and called to preach that very faith which he had been so zealous to destroy.

The choice of Saul to be an apostle, was proper on many accounts. For, in the first place, his conversion added great lustre to the evidences of Christ’s resurrection from the dead. Saul had persecuted all who preached that miracle. Wherefore, when he himself went over to the persecuted party, and published Christ’s resurrection with greater earnestness and diligence than any of them, every impartial person must have been sensible, that such an alteration of sentiment and conduct in a person of Saul’s good sense, and learning, and zeal, and that at the very time he was breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, could not possibly have happened, unless he had actually received that unquestionable evidence of Christ’s resurrection from the dead, which he affirmed had been given him by Christ’s appearing to him personally in the body as he went to Damascus, and by conferring upon him the gift of the Holy Ghost. It is true, the appearing of Jesus in the body might seem to many an improbable story. Yet as, by the miracles which Saul performed, he gave convincing proofs that Christ had bestowed on him the gift of the Holy Ghost, no reasonable person, after that, could doubt of his having appeared to him, as Saul constantly affirmed.

Secondly, Saul possessed every natural qualification necessary to the successful discharge of the difficult work of an apostle of Jesus Christ. He was a person of an excellent understanding, whereby he was able to judge rightly of matters. He was remarkable for his address in managing the humours of those with whom he had to do. His courage was such as enabled him to face the greatest dangers; his industry in procuring the most laborious and difficult enterprises, was unsparing; and his patience was equal to his industry, fitting him to bear the heaviest sufferings, however long continued. On all which accounts, there was perhaps no Jew of his age better qualified by nature for undertaking those long journeys, and for enduring those hardships and persecutions, which the Christian preachers were obliged to undergo in propagating the gospel.

Thirdly, Saul’s moral character was such as brought no discredit upon the office to which he was now chosen. From his youth up, he had been remarkable for purity of manners, and zeal for the interest of truth and virtue. It is true, when he came of an age fit to engage in affairs, his zeal hurried him too far, when it led him to persecute the Christians; but the prejudices of his education, and the example of his brethren of the sect of the Pharisees, had so blinded him, that he believed Jesus to be an impostor, and thought himself bound to put his disciples to death: Acts xxvii. 9. ‘I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth.’ Wherefore, having acted in this manner from principle, he could safely tell the Jewish council, many of whom knew his doings against the name of Jesus, that he had lived in all good conscience before God unto this day.’ Nay, he could say to Timothy, i. 13. ‘I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.’ Saul’s general conduct having thus been all along improved, he was able to execute his new office with all that dignity and weight which results from excellence of character.

Fourthly, Since the gospel was to be offered, both to the Jews and to the Gentiles, as a revelation from the same God who had spoken to the Jews by the prophets, it was necessary that it should be preached to both by such a person as Saul, who, being of the Jewish nation, and thoroughly educated in the knowledge of their sacred writings under Gamaliel, the most noted doctor of his time, was, by his great talents and education, as well as by his inspiration, qualified to convince both Jews and Gentiles, that the things done, and taught, and suffered by Jesus, were all foretold in these writings, and had happened exactly as they were foretold. So that, in this method of offering the gospel to the world, all were made sensible that it did not destroy the law and the prophets, but fulfill them.

* Upon this part of his character, Lord Shaftesbury has paid Saul an handsome compliment, Charact., i. p. 20. ‘While the apostle appeared as appearing either before the witty Athenians, or before a Roman Court of J u d i t h, in the presence of their great men and ladies, I see how handsomely he accommodated himself to the situation and temper of these polite persons.’

Thus it appears that Saul was truly, what Jesus termed him, Acts i. 15. 'A chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel.'

Luke has not mentioned any date by which we can with certainty fix either Saul's age at his conversion, or the particular year in which that remarkable event happened; nevertheless, from such circumstances taken notice of in the history, learned men have gathered that it happened in the end of A. D. 36, or in the beginning of A. D. 37, when Saul was about 34 years of age. See No. V. and No. VII.

CHAP. II.—The History of Saul, from his Conversion to his Departure from Antioch to preach the Gospel to the idolatrous Gentiles.

The supernatural brightness of the light which issued from the body of Jesus, and which struck Saul blind; the visions and revelations made to him during his blindness; the miraculous restoration of his sight by Ananias, whom Jesus sent to him for that purpose; and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, in the plenitude of his gifts—produced in Saul's mind such a full conviction as left him no room of doubt; but Jesus of Nazareth had really appeared to him, and that he was the Christ; and, at the same time, banished all hesitation with respect to the cause he was now called to maintain. He therefore resolved to spend his life in the service of Christ. In the prosecution of this resolution he had no occasion to converse with any person, because, according to Christ's promise, it was told him in Damascus what he was to do. Accordingly, Gal. i. 16. 'He did not converse with flesh and blood, neither did he go up to Jerusalem to them who were apostles before him,' to be instructed in the Christian doctrine, or to be confirmed in his new office; but, Acts ix. 20. 'Straightway he preached Christ in their synagogues,' (No. VI.) that he is the Son of God,' foretold Psalm ii. 7.—Acts ix. 21. 'But all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound to the chief priests?'

Saul, in after years, went into Arabia, (Gal. i. 17,) where there were few Christians, and none of them of any note.—This course, we may believe, he took by the direction of Christ, who sent him into that country, to instruct him in the duties of his office, and in the doctrines of the gospel, by immediate revelation. The truth is, now that the Lord Jesus was gone to heaven, this was the only proper method of training an apostle. For if the ministry of men had been used in instructing Saul, he would have been considered as an apostle of men, and on that account might have been reckoned inferior to the other apostles, who were all instructed by Christ himself. In Arabia, therefore, Saul continued more than two years; and during all that time employed himself in studying the Jewish scriptures more carefully than ever, by the help of the new lights which had been bestowed on him, and in searching into the true nature of the law of Moses, and in attending to such revelations as Christ was pleased to make to him. And having, by these revelations, acquired a complete knowledge of all Christ's doctrines, sayings, miracles, sufferings, resurrection, and ascension, and of the design both of the law and of the gospel, and of the confirmation which the gospel derives from the writings of Moses and the prophets, he returned to Damascus a well-instructed apostle of Christ, and there entered on the stated execution of his apostolic office, (No. XI.)—Acts ix. 32. 'But Saul increased the more in strength.' His natural abilities and his gifts as an apostle increased after his return from Arabia, not only by the revelations which had been there made to him, but now by continual exercise; so that through his knowledge of the scriptures, and by the assistance of the Spirit, and by the power of his eloquence, 22. he confounded the Jews which dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the very Christ,' or the great personage foretold in the second Psalm. 23. 'And after that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him: and, in prosecution of their malicious design, they applied to the governor of Damascus, under Aretas the king, and he, in compliance with their request, guarded the city so strictly that the disciples were obliged to let their new preacher down by the wall, through a window, in a basket: 2 Cor. xi. 32. See also Acts ix. 25.

Saul having thus escaped with his life, set out for Jerusalem to see the apostle Peter, (Gal. i. 18,) of whom, no doubt, he had heard a great deal since his conversion. And in the different towns through which he passed, he preached Jesus that he is the Christ, as he had done at Damascus. And being come to Jerusalem, Acts ix. 26. 'He assayed to join himself to the disciples; but they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple.' But Barnabas, who may be supposed to have learned Paul's conversion from Ananias and the brethren of Damascus, 'brought him to the apostles,' Acts ix. 27; that is, to Peter and James, for of the other apostles saw he none, (Gal. i. 18;), and declared to them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus. After this, the disciples 'willingly received him.' But he abode in Jerusalem only fifteen days, during which he lodged with Peter: and then went forth to Tarsus, as we shall see immediately. So that he was personally unknown to the churches of Judea, (Gal. i. 22,) for some time.

On one or other of the fifteen days which Saul now spent in Jerusalem, happening to pray in the temple, he fell into a trance, or ecstasy, in which the whole senses of his body being suspended, the impressions which his soul then received were made by the immediate operation of God. In this trance, Saul had a visible vision of his Lord, who ordered him to leave Jerusalem quickly, Acts xxii. 18. 'For they will not receive thy testimony concerning me.' But Saul, unwilling to depart, replied, 19. 'Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on thee.' 20. And when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by and consenting to his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him.' It seems Saul thought his change of sentiment and conduct, not well known to the Jews at Jerusalem, would certainly induce them to receive his testimony concerning Christ's having appeared to him by the way, because no other rational account could be given of his espousing that cause which formerly he had persecuted with such fury. But Jesus having called him to a different work, answered, 21. 'Depart, for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles.'—Besides, there was a particular reason for Saul's leaving Jerusalem quickly:

In affirming that Saul had the whole history of our Lord, and of his ministry, communicated to him by revelation, I am supported by Saul himself, who tells us, 1 Cor. xii. 23. that he received the institution of the Lord's supper, and the words of institution, from Christ; and, 1 Cor. xv. 8. that he 'received from the Lord, that Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures; and that he was raised from the dead on the third day, according to the scriptures.' How fully Saul was instructed in the things which concern the Lord Jesus, may be known from this, that he has mentioned a saying of Christ (Acts xx. 35.) which none of the evangelists have recorded, and an appearance of Christ after his resurrection to James alone, not mentioned by them. Besides, in Paul's epistles, there are many allusions to things done and said by Christ which he could know only by particular revelation.
THE LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

at this time, Acts ix. 29. Having spoken boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against (Θαυμάστε) the Ἰουδαίων, the very persons with whom formerly he had joined in persecuting Stephen, they went about to slay him. 30. Which when the brethren knew, they brought him down to Caesarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus, thinking that in his native city he might preach the gospel to the Jews, with more success and less hazard than in Judea. After Saul’s departure for Tarsus, 31. ‘the churches throughout all Judea, and Samaria, and Galilee, had rest and were edified; and, walking in the fear of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied.’

Thus was Saul in his turn driven out of Judea by the rage of the Hellenists or unbelieving Jews, who had come from Jerusalem to the provinces, and who were called Hellenists, probably because they used the Greek translation of the scriptures in their synagogues. These men, whose zeal for the institutions of Moses had brought them up to Jerusalem, were so offended at Paul for preaching Jesus, that they resolved to kill him; being set on by the rulers also, who could not bear that one whom they themselves had employed to persecute the saints, should go over to the persecuted party, and become a serious bane against the doctrine concerning the Lord Jesus; ‘And a great many believed, and turned to the Lord;’ the church of Christ at Antioch, which was originally gathered from among the natives of Judea, being by the conversion of the Hellenist Jews, 32. ‘When the tidings thereof came to the ears of the church which was at Jerusalem, they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch.’ This was John the Levite of Cyprus, to whom the name of Barnabas, the son of consolation, was given, on account of the relief which he afforded to the brethren, by selling his land, and dividing the price of it among them; and who, by the gifts of the Spirit which he possessed, was one of the superior prophets. 23. ‘Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord.’

For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith; and much people was added unto the Lord. 24. The increase of the church at Antioch, last mentioned, was owing, I suppose, to the conversion of the devout proselytes. For, as Barnabas came to Antioch after Peter had preached to Cornelius, it is reasonable to think, that if the gospel was not formerly preached to the proselytes of Antioch, Barnabas would without scruple preach to them now. Wherefore, finding the work too heavy for him singly, and wishing to have the assistance of an able fellow-labourer, he went into Cilicia in quest of Saul, and having found him, brought him to Antioch, a. d. 44, after he had been about five years in Cilicia, (No. IX.)

Barnabas and Saul being together at Antioch, Acts xi. 26. ‘assembled themselves with the church a whole year, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians, (No. XI) first in Antioch, perhaps about the time Barnabas and Saul came thither from Cilicia.—Ver. 27. ‘And in those days came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch. 28. And there stood up one of them, named Agabus,’ and signed by the Spirit that there should be a great dearth throughout all the world, that is, throughout all the land of Judea, for the original word often denotes a particular land or country; ‘which came to pass in the days of Martin the emperor. The famine began in the fourth year of Claudius’s reign, answering to a. d. 44; but it raged chiefly in the 5th and 6th year of that emperor.—Acts xi. 29. ‘Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea.’

This determination was extremely proper: for the churches

* The Caesarea to which the brethren now conducted Saul, was not the seaport of that name, (described chap. vi. 19) but Caesarea Philippi. For he himself tells us, that after his leaving Jerusalem on this occasion, ‘he came unto the region of Syria and Cilicia’ Gal. i. 23, which implies, that he did not go to Cilicia by sea, but travelled thither through the region of Syria.
of Judea, being more exposed than other churches to persecution, and to the rapacity of the Roman officers, and to those outrages which the populace, under weak and corrupt governments, commit upon the objects of their hatred, the brethren in Judea could not have supported this death, if they had not been assisted from abroad. The church of Antioch, therefore, made collections for them, which they sent by the hands of Barnabas and Saul; not to the apostles, (for they had now given up the custody and management of the funds of the church in Jerusalem, Acts vi. 2,) but to the elders or rulers of that church, chosen perhaps out of the 120 on whom the Holy Ghost fell at the first. And these were to make distribution thereof to the brethren, according to their need. By sending this seasonable gift to the disciples in Judea, the church of Antioch, in which were many Gentile presbyters, did what they could to conciliate the good-will of the Jewish believers. And this mark of their regard seems to have been well received by the brethren in Judea.

After a short abode at Jerusalem, Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch in the end of the year 44, or in the beginning of 45, and took with them John, whose surname was Mark, to assist them in the ministry there. This is he who is called Barnabas' sister's son,' Col. iv. 10.—Some time after this, as Barnabas and Saul, with the other prophets and teachers of the church at Antioch, Acts xiii. 2, 'ministered to the Lord and fasted, the Holy Ghost said,' with an articulate audible voice, 'Separate me both Barnabas and Saul for the work wherunto I have called them.'—Saul at his conversion was expressly called to preach to the Gentiles; and that call was renewed at the time Jesus appeared to him during his trance in the temple. But at what time Barnabas was called by the Holy Ghost to preach to the Gentiles, is not told. However, the work here meant, being that of converting the idolatrous nations, and the present being their first separation thereto, it is more than probable that no idolaters were at that time converted. Wherefore, though the brethren of Antioch did not understand the nature of the work which Barnabas and Saul were now called to fulfil, yet, as they knew they were going into distant countries, they willingly agreed to be deprived of their useful labours. Accordingly, Acts xiii. 2, 'when they had fasted and prayed,' for a blessing on their undertaking, 'and laid their hands upon them,' after the manner of the Jews in their solemn prayers, (see Acts vi. 5,) 'they sent them away,' that is, gave them leave to depart: for they were sent forth, not by the church of Antioch, but by the Holy Ghost, as the historian observes, ver. 4.

However, lest the nature of this transaction should be mistaken, it is proper to observe, that by their separation of Barnabas and Saul, the church of Antioch did not confer upon them the apostolic office, (No. XI,) nor even authority to preach the gospel; far less did they communicate to them any spiritual gift, or miraculous power, to fit them for being apostles. All they did was simply this,—they agreed to send them away, and by prayer recommended them to the grace of God, Acts xiv. 46, xv. 40.

As the separation of Barnabas and Saul by the prophets of Antioch is recorded in the history after the death of Herod Agrippa, which happened a. d. 44, the order of the narration seems to imply, that Barnabas and Saul went among the Gentiles after that event. But how long after it, I cannot pretend to determine; perhaps they left Antioch in that year 45.

The hand of providence appeared visible, at this time, in the removal of Herod Agrippa by death. The emperor Claudius, in the second year of his reign, had given him the kingdom of his grandfathers Herod the Great:

After which Agrippa lived mostly at Jerusalem, observed the Jewish institutions, and practised the purity which they required. Josephus tells us, Antiq. xix. 7. "He did not let a day pass, without worshipping God according to the law." Wherefore, being a zealous Jew, his principles led him to persecute the Christians. And as he possessed the supreme power in Judea, he was not under those restraints which tied up the hands of the chief priests while the Romans governed the country. Herod's seal, therefore, or his policy, having free scope to operate, when he saw the Jews pleased with his putting the apostle James to death, he meant to proceed to further cruelties, when God cut him off by a mortal disease after he had reigned three years, and thereby gave great relief to the Christian churches.

Upon Herod's death, the Romans reduced Judea a second time into the form of a province. But as they were not animated with any zeal for the institutions of Moses, they did not think themselves obliged to take part with the Jews against the Christians, but restrained their fury; so that, as the historian observes, Acts xii. 24, 'the word of the Lord grew and multiplied.' Cuspius Fadus was the first procurator in Judea after Agrippa's death. He came into the province in the end of a. d. 44, and governed it for the space of two years. Under his government, and that of his successor Tiberius Alexander, the famine happened which Agabus foretold. Tiberius Alexander was succeeded by Venticundus Cumanus; and after him came Antoninus Claudius Felix, under whose procuratorship the tumult was raised against Paul in the temple, which ended in his imprisonment, first at Jerusalem, and after that at Caesarea, where he was shut up two years complete.

CHAP. III.—Of the journey which Barnabas and Saul, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, made into the Lesser Asia, for the purpose of preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles.

Acts xiii. 4. 'So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed (with John Mark as their minister) unto Seleucia, a seaport town on the Orenites, twelve miles below Antioch, and about five from the sea, and thence sailed into Cyprus, the native country of Barnabas, (Acts iv. 36,) where the Jews and proselytes were very numerous—where also the gospel had been formerly preached to the Jews, by the brethren who had fled from the persecution which arose after Stephen's death, Acts xi. 19.

They land at Salamis in the island of Cyprus.

Having landed at Salamis, a considerable town in the eastern end of the island, Barnabas and Saul preached in the Jewish synagogues there.

But, before we proceed, it will be necessary to make a pause here, for the sake of explaining the order observed by Saul from this time forth in preaching the gospel. Our Lord, at the time he first sent forth his apostles to preach, having said to them, Matt. x. 5. 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; 6. But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel;' it was long before they themselves at liberty to preach to the Gentiles. And even after they knew the truth concerning this matter, they considered the above direction as an order to offer the gospel in every country and city to the Jews, if there were any in those parts, before they offered it to the Gentiles; Acts xiii. 46. Nor were they mistaken in putting this interpretation upon their Master's precept, who had fixed this order of preaching the gospel, for the following reasons:
THE LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

First, The Jews being the keepers of all the former revelations made to mankind by the true God, and these revelations being preparations for the introduction of the gospel, and containing clear predictions thereof, and of Jesus its author, it was necessary that it should be offered first to the Jews; because, if they received it as the completion of the former revelations, it would be no small argument to persuade the Gentiles of the divine original of the gospel. The truth is, the converted Jews, by their knowledge and belief of the former revelations, were well fitted to be zealous and effectual preachers of the gospel, not only among their own countrymen, but among the Gentiles also. Wherefore, it was fit that most of the first preachers of the gospel should be of that nation.

Secondly, The wide dispersion of the Jews among the Gentiles, by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, and their extreme passion for commerce, which led them to plant themselves in all the chief cities of the Gentiles, not only in accidental events, but were brought about by the providence of God, to prepare the world for the reception of the gospel. Nor could any method more effectual have been devised for that purpose. Because the Jews having from the beginning possessed the knowledge of the only true God, the Maker and Governor of the world, they carried that knowledge with them into the Gentile countries where they resided, and imparted it to all around them who were willing to receive it. And having multiplied exceedingly in their dispersion at the time Saul went among the Gentiles to preach the gospel, he found in every country and city great numbers, not only of his own nation, (No. XII.), but of the Gentiles whom the Jews had turned from idols to worship the only true God. These enlightened Gentiles were called by the Jews Religious or worshipping proselytes, because they assembled themselves with the Jews in their synagogues, and joined them in worshipping God, by such prayers and hymns as they addressed to him in the character of Maker and Governor of the world: also, because they joined them in hearing the writings of Moses and the prophets read in the Greek translation. These pious Gentiles, by their knowledge of the true God, and of the Jewish scriptures, were much better disposed to listen to the gospel, and better qualified to judge of the arguments by which the apostles proved Jesus to be the Christ, than their idolatrous brethren, who had no knowledge of God, nor of the revelations which God had formerly made to mankind. Nay, they heard the word of the Lord oftentimes with more attention than even the Jews themselves. Wherefore, as this class of men were so well disposed to receive the gospel, and as, after receiving it, they could communicate it to their idolatrous relations and friends, it was extremely proper that it should be preached to them, before it was offered to the others. And as they were nowhere to be found assembled in a body, except in the Jewish synagogues, that circumstance was an additional reason for preaching the gospel to the Jews in the synagogues, before it was offered to the idolatrous Gentiles.

Moved by these considerations, the apostle Paul set don attempted to preach in any city of the Gentiles unless he found in it a synagogue of the Jews, where he might make the gospel known, not only to the Jews, but to the proselytes, before he offered it to the idolatrous Gentiles. Thus when Paul and Silas came to Amphipolis and Apollonia, they made no stay in either of these places, probably because there was no synagogue of the Jews there in which they could preach. But at Salamis in Cyprus, where Barnabas and Saul now were, the Jews being so numerous as to have several synagogues, they preached in them all, often I suppose than once; and as the whole island abounded with Jews, they did not go by sea to Paphos, the chief city of the island, but by land, for the sake of preaching to the Jews and proselytes in the towns through which they were to pass.

In their journey to Paphos, they no doubt met with many disciples. For we are told, Acts xi. 19, that some of the brethren, who fled from the persecution which arose after the death of Stephen, 'came into Cyprus, preaching the word to none but to the Jews only.'

From Salamis they go to Paphos, the residence of the Roman Governor of the Province.

Barnabas and Saul having gone through Cyprus, came at length to Paphos, where was a famous temple of Venus, and a great confusion of priests and worshipers, who, by their extreme attachment to this false deity, occasioned her to be celebrated under the names of the Paphian and Cyprian Queen.

In Paphos (as before) the Roman proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, (No. XIII.), resided with other principal persons, who had come from Rome to assist in the government of the province. This Roman magistrate, who was a person of good sense as well as of good dispositions, having heard of the arrival of the servants of Christ at Paphos, called for Barnabas and Saul, whose name it seems had reached Paphos before they came, and desired to hear the word of God, that is, the new doctrine which these strangers were said to preach in the name of God.

But a Jew named Bar-Jesus, a false prophet and a sorcerer, Acts xiii. 8. 'withstood them, seeking to turn away the proconsul from the faith.' Probably this impostor contradicted the account which Barnabas and Saul gave of Christ's miracles and resurrection, and by soiled miracles endeavored to dissuade the proconsul from embracing the gospel. 9. 'Then Saul, who also is called Paul,' moved by an immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, looked steadfastly on that impostor; 10. 'And said, O full of all subtility and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? 11. And now behold the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season.' By saying that he should be blind for a season, Paul insinuated, that on the sorcerer's repentance his sight should be restored. 'And immediately there fell on him a mist, and a darkness, and he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand. 12. Then the proconsul, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord.' When he saw Elymas thus punished, he knew him to be an impostor, and believed the things spoken by Barnabas and Saul, being astonished at the power with which the doctrine of the Lord was accompanied.—The conversion of such a person, in so high a situation, and by such means, brought great credit to the gospel, and to its ministers, in that island.

The reader no doubt has observed, that at this period of the history Luke hath changed Saul's name, calling him Paul, without assigning any reason.
Learned men have conjectured, that this change was made by Paul himself, in honour of the proconsul, who perhaps was Saul's first convert from among the idolatrous Gentiles, or the first person of high rank of that character who was converted. For it was customary among the Romans to assume the name of a benefactor whom they highly esteemed. Thus the Jewish historian Josephus took the name of Flavius, in compliment to Vespasian, with whom he was in high favour. But in whatever manner it happened, certain it is, that even after this the great apostle of the Gentiles was known only by the name of Paul. From this time forth likewise Paul is generally mentioned by the historian before Barnabas; because, by his success in preaching at Paphos, and by the greatness of his miracles, he was now shewn to be the principal person, although formerly he was mentioned after Barnabas, because he was a younger disciple, and because his apostolical authority was not fully understood.

They sail from Cyprus to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark deserts them.

After these things, Acts xiii. 13. 'Paul and his company loosed from Paphos,' and sailing to the continent of the Lesser Asia, they came to Perga, a city in Pamphylia, situated on the west side of the river Cestrus, about seven miles from the sea. Here there was a celebrated temple of Diana; consequently many priests and others, whose interest the temple maintained, were engaged in maintaining the worship of that idol, and who no doubt were not a little displeased with these foreign teachers, for presuming to find fault with the gods of the country, and with the worship that was paid to them. On that occasion, John Mark, who had hitherto accompanied them as their minister, terrified perhaps by the threatening speeches of the priests and bigots, or discouraged by the difficulty and danger of the undertaking, 'departed from them, and returned to Jerusalem.' This desertion, however, did not discourage Paul and Barnabas; neither were they moved from their purpose, by the little success which they had at Perga; for, going away, they travelled through various countries of the Lesser Asia: and, as we shall see immediately, made many disciples to Christ, both among the Jews and the Gentiles.

Paul and Barnabas go to Antioch in Pisidia, where they convert great numbers, both of the proselyted and of the idolatrous Gentiles.

The first city Paul and Barnabas came to, after they left Perga, was Antioch the metropolis of Pisidia, a country to the north of Pamphylia. Here they went into the synagogue of the Jews; and, after reading of the law and the prophets, being desirous of the rulers of the synagogue to give the people an exhortation, Paul preached to the Jews and proselytes a sermon, which is fully related by Luke, Acts xiii. 16-47, and which is highly worthy of the attention of Christians, being an example of Paul's manner of preaching in all the synagogues, and of the arguments which he used for convincing the Jews and proselytes, that Jesus was the Christ or Messiah foretold by David in the second Psalm. It is therefore an excellent illustration of the short account which Luke hath given of Paul's preaching in the synagogue of Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 2. 'Thrice Sabbath days he reasoned with them out of the scriptures, explaining and proving that the Christ must needs have suffered, and have risen from the dead, and that this Jesus whom I preach unto you is the Christ.' These were the topics on which Paul insisted in all his sermons to the Jews and proselytes. And the arguments taken from the scriptures by which he proved these topics to the Thessalonians, were no doubt such as he offered to the Jews and proselytes of Antioch, and which are related by Luke in this chapter.

Paul's discourse on this occasion was well received by those who heard it; for, Acts xiii. 42. 'When the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles (or religious proselytes) besought, that these things might be preached to them the next Sabbath. 43. And when the congregation was broken up, many of the Jews and religious proselytes believing, followed Paul and Barnabas; who, speaking to them, persuaded them to continue in the grace of God; that is, in the faith into which they were brought by the grace of God. 44. 'And next Sabbath day came almost the whole city together; the idolaters as well as the proselytes came together to the synagogue to hear the word of God. 45. But when the Jews (of the more bigoted sort) saw the multitude, they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming: They contradicted Paul's doctrine concerning the sufferings and death of the Christ, and reviled the apostle, or rather Jesus, calling him an impostor, because he had not been able to deliver himself from death, though he pretended to be the Christ. Upon this Paul boldly told them, it was necessary to have spoken the word of God first to them; 'but seeing ye put it from you, and judge (apostre, declare) yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. 47. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying by the prophet, Isa. xlii. 19. 'I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth. 48. And when the Gentiles heard this;' when they heard that such things had been prophesied concerning them many ages ago, and that the Lord Jesus had commanded his apostles to receive them into his church, without submitting them to the law of Moses, 'they were glad.' And well might they be so: For they now had the door of faith set wide open to them; and Antioch, where Paul first preached the gospel publicly to the idolatrous Gentiles, hath obtained a name which will not soon perish. —And glorified the word of the Lord.' The idolatrous Gentiles praised the gospel for its extensive charity, and yielded a full and ready assent to its doctrines. 49. 'And the word of the Lord was published throughout all that region.' It seems Paul and Barnabas, during their stay at Antioch, made excursions into the neighbouring country, for the sake of preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles. Or the people who came from the country to Antioch, hearing Paul and Barnabas preach, believed; and carried the glad tidings of salvation home with them.

From this time forth, in all the Gentile countries, Paul, after preaching to the Jews, constantly carried the tidings of salvation to the idolatrous Gentiles: and, by so doing, fulfilled the commission which he had received from Christ, when he made him his apostle to the Gentiles.

But the unbelieving Jews in Antioch, greatly enraged at the success with which Paul and Barnabas preached to the Gentiles, stirred up some ladies of the first distinction, who were religious proselytes, over whom they had great influence, Acts xiii. 50. 'and the chief men of the city also,' who probably were the husbands of these proselyte ladies, 'and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts,' and out of the territory belonging to Antioch; because they had made frequent excursions into the country, and had persuaded many. But although the Christian preachers were thus persecuted, 'the disciples in Antioch were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost,' having received the Spirit in the plenteous of his gifts, either by an immediate illspe from heaven, or by the imposition of the apostle's hands. This, with other instances mentioned in the history, Acts ii. 38. viii. 14—17, and 1 Cor. chap. xii. and xiv. and Gal. iii. 5. gives reason to believe, that in all places where churches were planted, the disciples received the gifts of the Spirit in great abundance, to qualify them, not only for edifying each other, but for converting unbelievers also.

Being driven out of Pisidia by the machinations of the unbelieving Jews, they go to Iconium in Lycaonia, where they convert many; but are in danger of being stoned.

Paul and Barnabas, thus banished from Antioch, came to Iconium, at that time the chief city of Lycaonia, and at present a considerable town still subsisting under the name of Uzunc. Here, Acts xiv. 1. 'They went both together into the synagogue of the Jews, and so spake, that a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed.' The great multitude of the Greeks who are said to have believed the gospel on this occasion, being found in the synagogue with the Jews, were without doubt religious proselytes; for few or none of the idolaters frequented the Jewish synagogues. From the Jews and proselytes being so numerous in Iconium, we may infer that it was a very great and populous city, and that the servants of Christ, with great propriety, made a long abode there, to aid the disciples under the persecution which the unbelieving Jews raised against them. 2. Now the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected against the brethren. 3. Long time therefore abode they, speaking boldly in the Lord, who gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands. Because the idolatrous Gentiles in Iconium showed a disposition to listen to truth, the servants of Christ were directed to work many great miracles among them, for the confirmation of the gospel. The truth had it not been for their miracles, Paul and Barnabas might have preached long enough without making many converts, either among the Jews or the Gentiles, in any country. 4. 'And the multitude of the city was divided. And part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles. 5. And when there was an assault made, both of the Gentiles and also of the Jews with their rulers, to use them despitefully, and to stone them' as atheists; 6. 'They were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia, and unto the region that lieth round about.' They fled to Lystra first, and then to Derbe, and after that into the region that lieth around Lycaonia, viz. the region of Phrygia and Galatia; for these countries bordered on Lycaonia. In thus flying from their persecutors, Paul and Barnabas followed their Master's advice, who directed them, when persecuted in one city, to flee into another: For though he enabled them to work miracles for the confirmation of the gospel, he gave them no power of working miracles to save themselves from persecution. 7. 'Και εστω οι ἑορται ἡμῶν. 'And there they were preaching the gospel.' They spent a considerable time in the cities of Lycaonia, and in the region that lieth round about, preaching the gospel.—To this general account of the apostle's labours, the historian subjoins a particular relation of some memorable events which happened in Lystra.

From Iconium Paul and Barnabas go to Lystra, where Paul works a miracle on a cripple, and is considered as a god; but is afterwards stoned, and drawn out of the city as dead.

The first city Paul and Barnabas came to, after flying from Iconium, was Lystra. Here they converted a Jewish woman, named Lois, and her daughter named Eunice, (2 Tim. i. 5), and Eunice's son Timothy. For when Paul came to Lystra, in his second journey, the brethren there recommended Timothy to him, as a disciple who, though very young, had made himself remarkable by his knowledge and piety.

Paul at Lystra, Acts xiv. 8. happening to preach in some place of public resort, a man who had been born lame, and never had walked, sat there, and heard him with great attention. On this man, ver. 9. 'Paul looked steadfastly, and, by the gift of discerning spirits which he possessed, perceiving that he had faith to be healed, 10. Said with a loud voice, Stand upright upon thy feet; and he leaped and walked. 11. And when the people saw what Paul had done, they lift up their voice, saying, in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. 12. And called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker.' Therefore, in the persuasion that they were gods, the priests of Jupiter, the tutelary deity of the city, whose statue stood without the gate, 'brought oxen and garlands to the gate' of the house where the servants of Christ lodged, and would have done sacrifice to them with the people. 14. Which when Barnabas and Paul heard, they rent their clothes' in token of their deep grief for what the Lystrians were about to do, 'and ran in among the people, crying out,' with the greatest vehemence, 15. And saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We are men like yourselves, who have come to persuade you to forsake these false deities and to worship the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein. 16. Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways, without instructing them by divinely inspired teachers. 17. Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness of his being, perfections, and providence, in any country; in that he did good to all men, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. 18. And with these sayings scarce restrained they the people.' This remarkable humility, amidst so high a gust of popular applause, plainly showed these men to be the servants of God.—But mark the fickleness of the multitude: 19. 'There came thither certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium, who, by representing Paul and Barnabas as two wicked magicians, who were come to overturn every thing sacred both among the Jews and the Gentiles, persuaded the people, and having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead. 20. Howbeit, as the disciples stood round him, he rose up, (perfectly whole), and came into the city.' Probably Timothy was one of the disciples who stood round Paul on this occasion; for he says to him, 2 Epist. iii. 10. 'But thou hast fully known.—11. The persecutions, sufferings, such as befell me in Antioch, in Iconium, and Lystra: such persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me.' Thus, in his turn, did Paul suffer the very punishment which he had been so active in bringing upon the blessed martyr Stephen. And doubtless the recollection of that affair helped very much to reconcile him to what had now befallen him.

They go to Derbe, and into the region round about Lycaonia; then return to Lystra, Iconium, Antioch, and Perga: after which they sail from Attalia to Antioch in Syria.

Acts xiv. 20. 'And the next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe,' which city, therefore, was not far off. 21. And when they had preached the gospel to that city, and had taught many, namely, in the region of Galatia and Phrygia lying round about Lycaonia, (ver. 6), and founded the churches of Colossae, and Hierapolis, mentioned Col. iv. 12.'

returned again to Lystra, and to Iconium, and Antioch, being directed so to do by the Spirit. In these cities they spent some considerable time; 22. Confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. 23. And when they had ordained them elders, that is, bishops, and presidents, and deacons, in every church, and (at their ordination) had solemnly prayed with fasting, they commended them to the protection and direction of the Lord, on whom they had believed. This custom of ordaining elders in the churches which he planted, Paul invariably observed, in order that the brethren being united together, under the direction of stated teachers and leaders, might the better make increase of themselves in love, and sustain persecution for the gospel.

Paul and Barnabas having thus, on their return from Phrygia and Galatia, visited all the cities of Lycaonia and Pisidia where they had formerly planted churches, came at length to Perga in Pamphylia, where they spent some time in preaching the word; ver. 20.; probably because they had remained there but a short space formerly. And having thus revisited all those cities, and given to the churches there their due form, they came down to Attalia, a seaport town below Perga; 26. And thence sailed to Antioch in Syria, from whence they had been recommended to the grace of God, for the work which they had fulfilled. 27. And when they were come, and had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done by them. This expression is used likewise Acts xv. 4.; but it is explained, ver. 19. of the miracles and wonders which God had wrought among the Gentiles by them; of which wonders the chief no doubt was, that God by the apostles had communicated the Holy Ghost to the Gentiles converts, and thereby declared his acceptance of them without circumcision: And how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles: by which, I suppose, is to be understood the proselyted Gentiles. See Preface to Galatians, sect. 4.—Acts xiv. 26. And they abode long time with the disciples in Antioch.

Paul and Barnabas go up to the Council of Jerusalem: by whose decree the proselyted Gentiles were freed from observing the Law of Moses as a term of salvation.

Acts xv. 4. And when they were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders, who all showed them every mark of respect. And they declared all things which God had done by them. They declared how that God, by their ministry, had converted the Gentiles in many countries, and had bestowed upon them the Holy Ghost in the plenteous of his gifts. But that at Antioch there rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees who believed, affirming that it was necessary to circumcise them, and command them to keep the law of Moses; and that the brethren of Antioch had sent them to lay the matter before the apostles. 6. And the apostles and elders came together to consider of this matter. As the apostles commonly resided at Jerusalem, the greatest part of them may have come together on this occasion; as did the elders likewise, men most respectable for their talents and gifts, having been chosen to the office of elders out of those on whom the Holy Ghost descended on the day of Pentecost. The brethren, too, of the church of Jerusalem, were present in this assembly. For the decree which was passed on the question runs in the name of the whole church. (No. XV.)—Acts xv. 7. And where there had been much disputing, occasioned by those of the sect of the Pharisees who maintained the necessity of circumcision, Peter rose up, and put the assembly in mind, how he had been ordered of God to preach the gospel to Cornelius, and the other Gentiles who were with him; and how God, who kneweth the hearts of men, bare them witness that he accepted them without circumcision, having given them the Holy Ghost, even as to the Jews. 9. And put no difference between them and the Jews, purifying their hearts, not by the rites and ceremonies of the law, but by faith. 10. Now therefore, said he, why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? Why provoke ye God, by making circumcision necessary to the salvation of the Gentiles, contrary to his declared will in this matter, and contrary to your own conviction. 11. For we (who were apostles) believe, that through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and not through obedience to the law of Moses, we (Jews) eaten, should, in order to their enjoying full communion with the faithful, be subjected to the law of Moses; or at least to the four precepts bound by the council upon the converted proselytes. Wherefore these Gentiles must have been a class of believers different from the converted proselytes, about whom there could be no dispute now, as their case had been clearly determined by the council. If therefore think these Gentiles were converted from idolatry, who had come from distant parts; or, if they were natives of Antioch, Paul had preached to them, and converted them, since his return from the council: For, from the secrecy with which he communicated the conversion of the idolatrous Gentiles to them of reputation in Jerusalem, it may be concluded that he had not then preached to any of the idolatrous Gentiles in Antioch.

But, whatever may be in this conjecture, certain it is, that the disputes about eating with the Gentiles were carried so high in Antioch at this time, that a number of the brethren who knew the truth, and who were of note in the church, assembled in the matter, as well as Peter; and the torrent became at length so strong, that even Barnabas himself was carried away with their dissimulation, Gal. ii. 13. Wherefore, when teachers of the greatest authority and reputation in the church, seemed thus to agree in making obedience to the law of Moses necessary to the salvation of the idolatrous Gentiles, Paul found himself under the necessity of standing forth in defence of the truth. And though he was single and unsupported, he opposed the dissensers in the boldest and most direct manner, and rebuked even Peter himself, in the presence of all who had been misled by his example, for compelling in that manner the Gentiles to be brought back, contrary to the truth of the gospel, with which he was well acquainted. And Peter, being conscious of his fault, meekly bare Paul’s reproof, without making any reply. Thus a stop was put for the present to the attempts of the Judeizers; and Paul, who on that occasion acted as an apostle, equal in authority with Peter, but who shewed more sincerity and courage in maintaining the truth, certainly merited the grateful acknowledgments of all the Gentile converts, who, by his faithfulness, were secured in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

Such a glaring example of bigotry in many of the Jewish believers, and of timid compliance with their prejudices in some of the chief brethren, having made Paul sensible that the Gentiles in distant countries were in the greatest danger of being perverted by the Jews, his zeal for the purity of the gospel led him to consider by what means the Gentiles might be confirmed in the truth. And as no expedient offered itself more proper for the purpose, than to make the Gentiles universally acquainted with the decrees which were ordained by the apostles, elders, and brethren in Jerusalem, he proposed the matter to Barnabas, saying, Acts xv. 30. ‘Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.’ On that occasion, Barnabas proposed to take his nephew Mark with them as their minister. But Paul thought him an improper assistant, who in their former journey had shown such cowardice, or fickleness, as to desert them in Paphlagonia. And the contention between them was so sharp that they separated. But though the strife between these good men proceeded from passion, in one of them at least it was made the occasion of the more extensive spreading of the gospel. For Barnabas sailed with Mark into Cyprus, to visit the churches which he and Paul had planted there in their former journey: But Paul, choosing Silas, who was himself a prophet and a chief man among the brethren, departed; after being recommended by the church of Antioch, as before, to the grace of God, Acts xv. 40.

Paul and Silas go into Syria and Cilicia to confirm the Churches, by publishing the Decrees of the Council.

HAVING left Antioch, Paul and Silas, Acts xv. 41. went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches, by delivering the decrees of the council, which were read to them in particular, (ver. 21.) so that churches had been planted, not only in Syria but in Cilicia, before the council.—Of the planting of the churches in Syria, Luke has given some account; but of the planting of the churches in Cilicia nothing is said, except that the brethren were sent forth from Saul to Tarsus. From which it may be gathered, that he was the spiritual father of the believers in Cilicia, and therefore that his visit to the churches in that country, with the decrees, must have been peculiarly acceptable to them.

Paul and Silas go to Derbe and Lystra in Lycænia, to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles a second time, and to publish the Decrees. At Lystra Paul takes Timothy as his Assistant.

From Cilicia, Paul and Silas went into Lycænia: and being come to Lystra, Acts xvi. 1. the brethren there, and at Iconium, recommended Timothy to Paul as a young disciple of singular piety and zeal. Him the apostle took as an assistant in the ministry, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, (1 Tim. i. 18,) and conferred on him the gifts of the Spirit, (2 Tim. i. 6,) and had him solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry, by the presbytery or eldership of Lystra, (1 Tim. iv. 14;) for, in his former journey, he and Barnabas had ordained elders in every city. Withal, designing to employ Timothy in preaching to the Jews, he circumcised him; because he knew the Jews would not have respected him as a teacher, if they had taken him for an uncircumcised Gentile. This is that Timothy, whose teachableness and tears made such an impression on the apostle’s mind that he never forgot them, (2 Tim. i. 4,) and who attended Paul in many of his journeys, and who, in respect of his love to Christ and zeal for the advancement of the gospel, was like minded with Paul, (Phil. ii. 20,) so that he was his genuine son; and as a son served with his father, so he served with the apostle in the gospel. On all which accounts, he was of such consideraion among the disciples, and also so exceedingly esteemed by Paul for his knowledge and piety, that he allowed him to join in some of those epistles which he wrote to the churches. Withal, he honoured Timothy greatly, by writing to him the two excellent letters found in the canon of scripture, which bear his name.

In Lycænia they visited most of the cities where they had formerly preached, Acts xvi. 4. And as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem. For although these decrees were written in the form of a letter to the brethren of the Gentiles, in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia, they belonged equally to all the brethren of the Gentiles everywhere. 6. ‘And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily.’ For the burdensome yoke of the law of Moses being now broken, a great obstacle to the conversion of the Gentiles was removed.
THE LIFE OF THE

Paul, and Silas, and Timothy, go through Phrygia and Galatia, publishing the decree of the council. They are hindered by the Holy Ghost from going into Bithynia, and come down to Troas.

Acts xvi. 6. 'And passing through Phrygia, and the Galatian country,' (No. XVII.), they established the churches there in the true faith of the gospel, by delivering to them, in like manner, the decrees for to keep. But they made no stay in any place. So the original word, παρελθοντες, passing through, imports. Nor was it necessary for them to do otherwise. Their business was not to plant churches in these countries, but to confirm those which were already planted, by delivering to them copies of the apostolical decrees.

Paul and his company having gone through Phrygia and (Ταλαιπωρημένοι) the Galatian country, were forbidden by the Holy Ghost to preach in the province of Asia; and therefore, when they were come to Myria, Acts xvi. 7. 'and assayed to go into Bithynia,' a country bounded on the west by a part of the Propontis and the Thracean Bosphorus, and on the north by the Euxine Sea,' the Spirit suffered them not; and so, passing by the Lesser Asia, which separated Bithynia from the country of Troas, they came to the city of Troas, a noted seaport, where travellers from the upper coasts of Asia commonly took ship to pass into Europe. Here Paul and his associates were joined by Luke, (ver. 10.), the writer of the history of the Acts of the Apostles, and a native of Antioch, as is generally believed, who to the profession of a physician had joined that of a Christian minister, or evangelist.

At Troas Paul and his assistants are called to preach the Gospel in Macedonia, by a vision which appeared to Paul in the night-time.

Acts xvi. 9. 'Paul had a vision in the night. There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us.' Of this vision Paul gave an account to his companions, who from it gathering assuredly that the Lord had called them to preach in Macedonia, they willingly obeyed the heavenly admonition, loosed from Troas and went straight to Samothrace, an island in those seas, famous for being the seat of certain religious mysteries, in equal estimation with those called Eucebene. But it does not appear that they went thither there; for they landed the next day at Neapolis, a seaport town of Macedonia.

Thus Paul, having preached first at Damascus, next at Jerusalem, after that throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles in Syria and Cilicia, and most of the countries of the Lesser Asia, went at length, by the particular commandment of Christ, among the Greek nations, to whom it was proper that the glad tidings of salvation should now be given. For seeing the gospel was a revelation from the true God, and was supported by great and undeniable miracles, it was fit that it should in due course be proposed to those nations who were best qualified to judge of its nature and evidences: because if, upon an accurate examination, great numbers of men embraced the gospel, whose minds were improved by science, and every kind of culture, their conversion would render it indubitable, in after-times, that the gospel was supported by those great and undeniable miracles, which the Christian records affirm were performed in every corner by the proconsuls of the gospel.—Besides, God, in his infinite wisdom, was determined that the reigning idolatry should be utterly overthrown, in those countries of Europe where it had the greatest support from the ability and learning of its abettors; that no person might suspect or affirm, in after-times, that idolatry was destroyed, and Christianity established, merely through the ignorance and simplicity of the people among whom it was first preached.

The ancient boundary of Macedonia was the river Strymon. But Philip, the father of Alexander, having conquered Thrace, added that part of it which lay between the rivers Nestus and Strymon to Macedonia. And observing that one of the cities of the affected country named Dyrrachium, might be made a good defence against the Thracians, he fortified it, and named it Philippi, in honour of himself. Lucian, in his dialogue called The Pygmy, introduces Hercules describing Philip's in the following manner: "The plain, which is very fertile, raises itself into little hills, which serve for a defence to the city Philippi, whose walls are washed by the river Hebrus."—From coins still remaining, mentioned by Pausanias prefixed to his Paraphrase and Notes on the Philippians, it appears, that a colony of Romans was planted by Julius Caesar at Philippi; and that it was afterwards augmented by Augustus, who sent Anthony's adherents to this and other cities of Macedonia: so that, having received inhabitants from Italy twice, Philippi of a small town became a great city, and enjoyed all the privileges of a Roman colony. Wherefore, Luke speaks with great propriety when he thus describes Paul's journey to Philippi, Acts xvi. 12. 'And from thence to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, (No. XVIII.), a colony.'

Ver. 13. 'And on the Sabbath-day we went out of the city by a river's side, (No. XIX.), where a place for prayer was by law allowed.' In this place for prayer the Jews and their proselytes were wont to assemble. 'And we sat down, and spake to the women which resorted thither; among whom there was one, 14. Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, who worshipped God.' This woman was a devout Gentile, a native of Thyatira, who had fixed her residence in Philippi for the sake of commerce; whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul. She was so strongly affected with the things which Paul spoke, that she embraced them with an entire faith. 15. 'And when she was baptized, and her house, she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide; and she constrained us.' Lydia being a rich merchant, who had a large house and servants, she was able to lodge them all. And being penetrated with a just sense of her obligation to those messengers of God, for the knowledge of salvation which they had imparted to her, she would take no refusal. So they abode in her house all the time they were in Philippi. Encouraged by this favourable beginning, Paul and his company continued on.
THE LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

many days, (ver. 12, 18,) during which they laid the foundations of a numerous church, gathered both from among the Jews and the Gentiles; and which, after the apostle's departure, increased so exceedingly, that, at the time he wrote his epistle to the Philippians, they had more bishops than one, and many deacons, Philip. ii. 1.

While Paul and his assistants abode at Philippi, they were often attacked by a dame who was possessed with an evil spirit, by which she divined, and brought her masters much gain through soothsaying; that is, by pretending, with the assistance of a familiar spirit, to discover stolen goods, and to point out the concealed authors of mischiefs, and to disclose the general good or ill fortune of the persons who applied to her, and their success in particular affairs, with other secrets, for which the rabble in all countries are willing to give money. This dame, Acts xvi. 17. 'following Paul and us,' (Luke, Silas, and Timothy,) cried, saying, (ironically,) 'these men are the servants of the most high God, who declare unto us the way of salvation.' And this she did many days. But Paul being vexed, turned and said to the Spirit, 'I command thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of her.' And he came out that same hour. 19. And when her masters saw that the hope of their gain was gone, they caught Paul and Silas; Timothy and Luke, it seems, were not so obnoxious to them; and drew them into the market-place, unto the rulers. 20. (And the inferior magistrates,) and brought them to the pristors, (περὶ τὸν αὐτόν,) who were the chief magistrates of the Roman colony, saying, 'These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city.' 21. And teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.' Knowing them to be Jews, they calumniated them as attempting to introduce the ritual of Judaism at Philippi, particularly baptism. Perhaps also they alluded to something said by the apostle relating to the kingship of Christ, concerning which we know he preached afterwards at Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 7. These accusations so wrought on the multitude, and upon the pristors, that the multitude rose up against Paul and Silas; and the pristors tore their clothes from around them, and commanded them to be beaten with rods; and having laid on them many stripes, thrust them into the inner prison, and put them in the stocks, that they might be kept the more securely.

These multiplied injuries the servants of God bore with great joy; for in the middle of the night, they prayed and sang praises to God with such elevation of spirit and voice, as raised the admiration of their fellow-prisoners, who heard them distinctly. 26. 'And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken, and immediately all the doors of the prison were opened, and every man's bonds were loosed.' On this the jailer, who dwelt in a part of the prison not far from the ward where Paul and Silas lay, awakening out of sleep, and seeing the prison-doors open, drew his sword, and would have killed himself, to avoid a more severe punishment, supposing that all the prisoners had escaped. 28. But Paul cried out with a loud voice, 'Do thyself no harm, for we are all here.' The jailer, greatly terrified by the earthquake, and astonished at Paul's discovering his purpose to kill himself, called for a light, sprang into the inner prison, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas, begging them to forgive the injuries he had been obliged to do them: For he was now convinced they were what the possessed dame had called them in derision, even the servants of the most high God, who shewed to men the way of salvation. He therefore, Acts xvi. 30. 'brought them out of the inner prison, and said, Sire, what must I do to be saved? 31. And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house.' For Paul having preached a considerable time at Philippi, the jailer, before this, must have heard of Jesus Christ, perhaps oftener than once. The jailer's family being also come into the outer prison, 32. 'They spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house;' that is, Paul shortly explained to them the character of Jesus as Lord, and gave them a brief account of his life, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension; all which Silas confirmed by his testimony; and his discourse on these subjects was so powerfully convincing, that the jailer was baptized, 'he, and all his straightway. 34. And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced in the knowledge which he had obtained of the way of salvation; 'having believed in God with all his house,' who, it seems, were equally impressed with Paul's sermon as the jailer himself was.

Such were the transactions of this memorable night. But the earthquake having been felt all over the city, and the miraculous opening of the prison-doors having been told to the pristors, they changed their opinion of Paul and Silas, and began to think more favourably of their cause. Therefore, 36. 'when it was day, the pristors sent the sergeants, (περὶ τὸν αὐτόν,) the rod-bearers, or lictors,) saying to the jailer, 'Let these men go.' But Paul replied, 'The pristors 'have beaten us openly, and uncondemned, who are Romans, and have cast us into prison: and now they thrust us out privily, without making us any preparation for the injury they have done us: 'Nay, verily, but let them come themselves, and fetch us out;' and by their dismissing us openly, let them shew the people that they imprisoned us unjustly— When the pristors heard that they were Romans, they were afraid of being called to account for having beaten them uncondemned. 39. 'And they came and besought them, 'not to resent the injury that had been done; and, bringing them out, desired them to depart out of the city.' The servants of Christ, by this public release, being honourably cleared from every crime, left the prison quietly, and went to the house of Lydia, where they met with the disciples, and comforted them by re-hearing what had happened, and by giving them suitable exhortations; then departed, leaving Luke at Philippi.

(No. XX.)

Of all the churches planted by Paul, this at Philippi seems to have loved and respected him the most. They suffered he had undergone in their city, for the sake of giving them the knowledge of the gospel, more precious than gold, greatly endeared him to them; and the rather, that they seem to have put a just value on moral and religious truth, and to have had a great share of good dispositions, which were much strengthened and improved by the gospel; so that they discovered more of the true spirit of Christianity than any other church. For while the apostle was at Thessalonica, the Philippians sent him money twice, that, by making the gospel without expense to the Thessalonians, they might give the more heed to the things which Paul spake, when they found him a teacher of a different character from the Greek philosophers, who taught only for hire. They likewise sent him money during his first imprisonment at Rome, that he might want nothing necessary for him. In short, the injurious treatment which Paul and Silas met with in this first city of Europe where they preached, was abundantly compensated by the readiness of mind with which many of its inhabitants received the gospel; and by the excellent disposition which they showed after their conversion; and by the great love which they all along expressed towards their spiritual father.
Paul with his Assistants go to Thessalonica. In the Synagogue. Paul proves from the Jewish Scriptures, That it behoved the Christ to be put to death, and to rise from the dead. Many idolaters are converted. The Jews assault the house of Jason, whom they carry, with other Brethren, before the Rulers. Paul goes by night to Berera.

The apostle having thus successfully planted the gospel in Philippi, departed with his assistants, Silas and Timothy, and passing first through Amphipolis, a city built in an island formed by two branches of the river Strymon, and a colony of the Athenians, and then through Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews. This seems to imply, that the Jews had no synagogue in Amphipolis and Apollonia; for which reason the apostle made no stay in either of these places, but went straight to Thessalonica, now the metropolis of all the countries comprehended in the Roman province of Macedonia. For it was the residence both of the proconsul and quater; so that, being the seat of government, it was constantly filled with strangers, who attended the courts of judicature, or who solicited offices. And as most of the Greeks, about this time, were extremely addicted to philosophy and the polite arts, so great a city as Thessalonica could not but destitute of men of learning, who were well qualified to judge of the gospel and its evidences. Moreover, the situation of Thessalonica, at the bottom of the Thermaic Gulf, rendering it fit for commerce, many of its inhabitants were merchants, who carried on an extensive trade with foreign countries; and who, as the apostle observes, published in these distant countries the conversion of the Thessalonians, and the miracles by which they had been converted: 1 Thess. i. 9. The Jews likewise resorted to this city in such numbers as to form a numerous synagogue: so that in every respect Thessalonica was a proper theatre whereon to display the light of the gospel.—By the advantage of its situation, this city still subsists a place of great resort and trade, under the name of Salonica. But it is in the possession of the Turks.

Acts xviii. 1. Now, when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews. 2. And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures: 'The subject of Paul’s sermons in the synagogue of Thessalonica, as in all the synagogues of the Jews, was this, 3. דנהרנו וגו It was clearly and fully explained and proved that it behoved the Christ to suffer death, and to be raised from the dead; and that this Jesus whom I preach unto you is the Christ.—If any reader wishes to know more particularly the manner of the apostle’s reasoning with the Jews, and the proofs which he brought from their own scriptures in support of the facts which he affirmed, he will find an excellent example thereof in the sermons which Paul preached in the synagogue of Antioch in Pisidia, which is related at large Acts xiii. 16—41.

But notwithstanding Paul’s arguments were all taken out of the scriptures, his discourses in the synagogue of Thessalonica did not make such an impression on the Jews as might have been expected; for only a few of them believed. However, of the religious profanities a great multitude were converted; among whom were many women of the first distraction in that city: Acts xviii. 4. And some of them believed, and consort with Paul and Silas, and of the devout Greeks, (that is of the proselytes,) a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few. This is Luke’s account of the success of the gospel at Thessalonica. But from Paul himself we learn, that multitudes of the idolaters also believed; being greatly struck with the miracles which he wrought, and with the miraculous gifts which he conferred on the believers. For in his first epistle to the Thessalonians, as if their church had been chiefly composed of converts from idolatry, he says, chap. i. 9. They themselves, the unbelieving Thessalonians, publish in foreign countries concerning us, that sort of entrance we had to you, and how ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God. We may therefore suppose, that when Paul found the Jews adverse to his doctrine, he left the synagogue, and preached to the idolatrous Gentiles; with whom he had great success, not only on account of his miracles, but on account of his disinterestedness: For neither he nor any of his assistants, all the time they were in Thessalonica, took the least reward, either in money or goods, from their disciples, but wrought with their hands; and by the profits of their labour maintained themselves, without being burdensome to any person, 1 Thess. ii. 9. None of the Thessalonians, therefore, could suspect, that Paul and his assistants had come to make gain of them, by converting them to the Christian faith.

The great success which Paul had at Thessalonica, in converting the idolatrous Gentiles, raised the indignation and envy of the unbelieving Jews to such a pitch, that they hired (יוֹמִיָאשׁ כֹּכֶבֶב ויִשְׂכָּה) certain disolute fellows who frequented the market-place. These, Acts xviii. 5. gathered a company, and set all the people an uproar, and broke into the house of Jason, (with whom the apostle and his assistants lodged,) and sought to bring them out to the people; probably with an intention to put them to death in the tumult. 6. And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying. These have turned the world upside down (with their new doctrine) are come hither also:—7. Whom Jason hath received; and these all do contrary to the decrees of Caesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus:—alleging, I suppose, to Paul’s doctrine concerning the lordship or universal dominion of Jesus, which they pretended was inconsistent with the universal lordship of Caesar; and the rather, that some time before this it had been decreed at Rome, that no person within the bounds of the empire should assume the title of king without the emperor’s permission. In uttering this calumny against the Christian preachers, they that they were setting up Jesus as a king in opposition to the emperor, the Jews imitated their brethren in Judea, who, to enrage Pilate against Jesus, accused him of calling himself the King of the Jews. In both instances these malicious men, out of spite to Jesus, denounced the most sacred article of their national faith; for in Judea the chief priests publicly disclaimed all expectation of the coming of their king Messiah, by crying, We have no king but Caesar. In like manner at Thessalonica, the Jews, enraged against Paul for affirming that Jesus was the Christ, accused him of setting up another king different from Caesar, and urged their accusation with such clamour and bitterness, Acts xviii. 8. that they troubled the people, and (טַשְׂמֵשׁ יִשְׂכֻּה) the rulers of the city, when they heard these things. But when the rulers understood that the King of whom Paul spake was no king on earth, neither claimed any temporal dominion, 9. they took security of Jason and of the others; that they would behave as good subjects, and let them go.—This liberal conduct of the rulers of Thessalonica restrained the malice of the Jews for that time; but the brethren, fearing some new tumult might arise, thought it prudent, 10. to send Paul and Silas, and I suppose Timothy also, (ver. 15.)* away by night to Berea, a populous city in the neighbourhood.

Luke has not told us what time Paul ....... spent at Thessalonica. But there are circumstances mentioned in the apostle's epistles, from which we may infer that the money was collected by planting the church there, such as, that during his abode at Thessalonica he received money twice from the Philippians, (Phil. iv. 16.), and communed the spiritual gifts to the brethren in plenty, (1 Thess. v. 12.), and appointed proesidyeis, presidents, or rulers, stately to exercise the ministry among them, (1 Thess. v. 12.) having formed them into a regular church: all which implies, that he abode a considerable time in this city.

In Beroea, Paul and his Assistants preach the Gospel to the Jews with great success; but the unbelieving Jews come from Thessalonica, and stir up the people against them. Paul goes to Athens.

On their arrival in Beroea, Paul and Silas, notwithstanding the evil treatment they had experienced in Thessalonica, went into the synagogue and preached Christ: Acts xvii. 11. 'These Jews were more noble (they were of a more excellent disposition) than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether these things were so,' namely, the things which Paul preached concerning the sufferings and resurrection of the Christ, using great candour and impartiality in the search. 13. 'Therefore many of them believed; also of the honourable women which were Greeks, (that is, proselytes, for so the word is commonly used by Luke), and of the men not a few.' Thus a numerous church was gathered in Beroea likewise, consisting both of the Jews and of the Gentiles; but especially of the Gentiles. For many of the Grecian ladies had Jewish slaves, by whom they were taught to worship the true God, and to frequent the synagogue, where they heard Paul preach, and were converted; and after their conversion were instrumental in persuading their husbands to hear the gospel; so that many of them likewise believed.

While the apostle was thus successfully preaching the gospel at Beroea, he often recoiled with grief, that he had been obliged to leave Thessalonica before the brethren there were fully instructed; that, being new converts, they were ill fitted to sustain persecution and affliction for the word; and that his enemies might impede his flight either to want of affection for his disciples or to cowardice. For they might allege, that he was afraid to appear before the rulers and men of learning in Thessalonica, being conscious that he was not able in their presence to defend the doctrines which he had preached. These considerations made such an impression on Paul's mind, that, once and again, while in Beroea, he had resolved to return to Thessalonica, to strengthen the disciples, and to defend the gospel; but Satan hindered him, by filling the hearts of the unbelieving Jews of Thessalonica (1 Thess. ii. 16.) with such malice against the gospel, that when they heard of its great success in Beroea, they came thither, Acts vii. 12. 'and stirred up the people,' the idolatrous multitude, against Paul, whom no doubt they represented as an enemy of their gods; wherefore the brethren, 'anxious for his safety, had him privately conducted to Athens. But Silas and Timothy, being less obnoxious to the Jews, remained at Beroea still. Nevertheless, when the brethren who accompanied Paul to Athens departed, he sent an order by them, 18. 'to Timothy and Silas, to come to him with all speed,' because he did not choose, I suppose, to preach at Athens without the aid of his fellow labourers in the ministry, who were now in Thessalonica, 1 Thess. iii. 1, 2.

At Athens Paul disputes daily in the Synagogue with the Jews, and in the Market-place with the Epicurean and Stoic Philosophers. They carry him to the Areopagus, where, in a most elegant oration, he shews the Areopagites the absurdity of the common idolatry; but with little success. He goes to Corinth.

Athens, having now passed the zenith of her political splendour, was declining ever since the Romans, after conquering Greece, fixed the seat of their government at Corinth. Nevertheless its fame for learning was still as great as ever; for at the time Paul visited Athens, that city was full of philosophers, rhetoricians, orators, painters, statesmen, and of young persons who came to learn philosophy and the arts. But this sort of people, being generally very idle, were great talkers, and had an insatiable curiosity; so that the character which Luke has given of the Athenians and strangers there is perfectly just: Acts xvii. 21. 'All the Athenians, and strangers who were there, spent their time in nothing else, but to either to tell or hear some new thing.'—Further, Pausanias says, There were more images in Athens than in all Greece besides; and that they worshipped the gods more than all Greece. Well, therefore, might Paul tell the Areopagites, that 'be perceived they were in all things (παντα ρηματα) very religious.'

The apostle, it would seem, had resolved not to preach in Athens till Timothy and Silas arrived. Yet when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry, he could no longer forbear. Acts xviii. 5. 'Now when Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him, (he felt great grief and indignation), when he saw a city, (in which learning and arts were carried to greater perfection than anywhere else) worshipping full of idols.' Wherefore, as there was a synagogue of Jews in Athens, he went into it first, as his manner was, 17. 'and disputed with the Jews and with the devout persons, or religious proselytes; for to them the gospel was to be offered before it was preached to the Gentiles.

While Paul was thus employed, Timothy came from Beroea to Athens, and informed him that the idolatrous Thessalonians, dispossessed to see so many of their countrymen deserting the temples and altars of their gods, had joined the Jews in persecuting the disciples, 1 Thess. ii. 14. On hearing this, Paul thought it good to be left at Athens alone, (1 Thess. iii. 1.), and sent for Timothy to Thessalonica, to establish and comfort the brethren concerning their faith.

After Timothy's departure, Paul, Acts xviii. 17. 'disputed in the market daily, with them that met with him. 18. Then certain of the Epicureans and Stoics encountered him; and some said, What will this babbler say I other some, He seemseth to be a setter forth of strange gods; because he preached to them Jesus, and the resurrection (of all mankind by Jesus). 19. And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, the court at Athens which judged of all matters pertaining to religion, and particularly the introduction of new gods; saying, May we know what this new doctrine whereof thou speakest is 1 20. For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know, therefore, what these things mean.' This course the Athenians took with Paul, not from the love of truth, but as the historian observes, ver. 31. from mere curiosity; as the event afterwards proved.—The apostle being thus called to declare the new doctrine whereof he spake, to an assembly consisting of senators, philosophers, rhetoricians, and statesmen, willingly embraced the opportunity; and in a most eloquent discourse, prepared his illustrious auditors for receiving that doctrine which seemed to them so strange, by shewing them the absurdity of the commonly received idolatry, and by speaking on that delicate subject, with an address and temper, and strength of reason, which would have done honour to the greatest orator of Greece or Rome.

His discourse to the Areopagite Paul introduced with a handsome compliment to the Athenians in general. He told them, that he perceived they were extremely religious; for, lest any God should be neglected by them, he found they had erected an altar to the unknown God; and from this he inferred, that it would not be unacceptable, if he should declare to them, that God whom they ignorantly worshipped. Acts xvii. 23. 'Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are (παντὸς αὐτοῦ) very religious. 23. For as I passed by and beheld (ἐπηρέαζα) the objects of your worship, I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.'

(No. XXI.)—The true God, whom the apostle affirms the Athenians ignorantly worshipped, and the worship that is acceptable to him, he declared in the following manner:—24. 'God, who made the world, and all things therein, seeing he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands.' God hath no need of temples to dwell in, seeing he hath made the world, and is the Lord or possessor of the universe. Ye therefore greatly err in thinking, that by erecting magnificent temples and images, and by consecrating them, ye draw God down into them, and prevail with him to reside among you in such a manner as to be present nowhere else. That vulgar notion is unworthy of men whose minds are improved by science, and who, from God's having made the world, ought to know that his presence is not confined to temples made by men. 25. 'Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing.' Neither is the true God worshipped with sacrifices and meats prepared by men's hands, if those things are offered to him, as though he needed to be fed with the fruits of the earth, and with the flesh of beasts, and refreshed with the steams of sacrifices and incense. The truth is, 'seeing he giveth to all,' whether men or beasts, 'life, and breath, and all things,' it is evident that men can contribute nothing to his life or happiness. 26. 'And hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the whole earth.' By the liberal provision which he hath made, everywhere, of the necessities of life, he hath from one man and woman multiplied the human race, so as to form those different nations which cover the face of the whole earth. How then can ye fancy that he himself needs to be lodged, and clothed, and fed by men? 'And hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; also he hath assigned to each of these nations their times of existence, and the particular countries they were to inhabit, according as he had before appointed these things. By all which he shows, that he governs the world by a most wise providence, contrary to what you Epicureans teach; and also that his government is most free, contrary to the doctrine of the Stoics. This most wise and free government of the nations of men, God carries on through all ages, for this purpose. 27. 'that they should be led to seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after and find him;' (εἰς τὸν ἄν) and truly indeed he is not far from any one of us.' Though he be not the object of men's senses, it is no difficult matter to find God; because he is not far from any one of us. 28. For the structure of our body, and the union of our soul to that piece of material mechanism, together with the noble faculties of our soul wherein we resemble God, and the admirable end for which this wonderful composition of soul and body is formed, affords to every man, not only an idea, but a proof, of the divinity residing within him, supporting and animating him: so that it may truly be said, 'In him we live, and move, and have our being, as one of your own poets (Aristus) hath said.'—Who also hath added another sentiment, equally just and striking: That we are his offspring, in respect of the reason, and intelligence, and other mental powers similar to his, which we possess. 29. 'Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto (that is, can be represented by) an image of gold, or silver, or stone, however curiously graven by art and man's device;' because such things conveying no idea of mind, if they are likenesses of God, they represent him to be more, rather, void of intelligence, than which nothing can be more impious.

The apostle having, in this manner, shewn the philosophers of Athens the gross absurdity of their idolatrous worship, concluded his oration with telling them, Acts xvii. 30. that 'the times of this ignorance God winked at.' He allowed mankind to go on in their ignorance, without instruction from them by messengers divinely commissioned; because he meant to show them experimentally the insufficiency of their own reason in matters of religion. But now, by messengers divinely authorized, he commandeth all men everywhere to repent of their ignorance, idolatry, and wickedness. And to persuade them effectually to do so, he hath set before them the greatest of all motives, that of a future judgment. 31. 'Because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by the man whom he hath ordained; whereas he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.' The resurrection of Jesus from the dead hath put the resurrection and judgment of all men, repeatedly declared by Jesus, beyond a doubt. 32. 'But when they heard of the resurrection, some, namely the Epicureans, mocked, and others (more candid) said, We will hear thee again of this matter.' And having said this, they put an end to the apostle's discourse and to the assembly, without allowing him an opportunity of shewing how the resurrection of Jesus renders the resurrection and judgment of mankind probable, or of explaining the other fundamental doctrines of the gospel. 33. And so Paul departed from among them,' astonished, no doubt, that men who professed wisdom were so little able to discern truth. 34. 'Howbeit some clave unto him and believed, among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite,' one of his judges, and a woman (of some note) named Damaris, and others with them; who it seems were the only ones who met with in this famous mart of learning, capable of seeing and acknowledging the absurdity of the prevailing idolatry.

It is not said that Paul wrought any miracles at Athens; and the little success with which he preached, gives reason to suspect that he wrought no miracles there. Perhaps in this he acted by divine direction, to try what reception the gospel would meet with from learned and inquisitive men, when offered to them merely upon the footing of its own reasonableness. The truth is, if such an experiment was anywhere to be made, in order to confute those, in after-times, who should affirm that the general reception of the gospel in the first age was owing not to miracles, but to the absurdities of heathenism, and to the reasonableness of the gospel doctrine, Athens surely was the place where the trial could be made with most advantage, and Paul's oration in the Areopagus was the discourse which should have convinced reasonable men. Nevertheless, at Athens, where the human faculties were carried to the greatest perfection, the apostle was not able to convince his hearers of the folly of idolatry, nor of the reasonableness of worshipping the only living and true God, by purity of mind and goodness of life. And therefore the truth which taught those sublime truths, was rejected by the ἄκεφλοι.

unfit for the common people, and they remained as much attached to their errors as before.

After being so unsuccessfully preached to the philosophers and others in Athens, the apostle judged it needful any longer to attempt, by natural means, the conversion of such a vain, unprincipled, frivolous people. And being allowed to use no other means, he left them as incurable, and went forward to Corinth, now become more considerable for the number, the learning, and the wealth of its inhabitants, than even Athens itself.

At Corinth Paul preaches in the synagogue. Timothy and Silas come to him from Thessalonica. He testifies to the Jews that Jesus is the Christ. He teaches in the house of Justus. Christ appears to him in a vision. He writes First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Then goes into Peloponnesus. At his return to Corinth, he writes his Second to the Thessalonians. The Jews bring him before Gallio, who drives them from the judgment-seat with disgrace. He goes, with Aquila and Priscilla, by sea to Ephesus. Then sails to Syria.

Corinth was situated on an isthmus, or narrow neck of land, which joined Peloponnesus to Greece. On the east side of the isthmus were the ports of Cenchrea and Schonous, which received the merchandise of Asia by the Saronic Gulp; and on the west side, the port of Lechaion received the merchandise of Italy, Gaul, and Spain, by the Cissanian Gulp. Corinth, being thus conveniently situated for commerce, soon became extremely rich and populous; and being situated on the isthmus which joined Peloponnesus to Greece, it commanded both countries. In the course of the Achaean war, the Roman consul Mummius burnt it to the ground; but Julius Caesar rebuilt it after it had long lain in ashes. See Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 2.—When Achaia was made a Roman province, Corinth, becoming the seat of government, soon regained its ancient celebrity in respect of commerce and riches, but especially in respect of the number and quality of its inhabitants. For, at the time the apostle arrived, Corinth was full of learned men, some of whom taught philosophy, rhetoric, poetry, and painting; others studied these sciences and arts; and so much that there was no city in Greece, where philosophy, and the fine arts, and learning, were carried to greater perfection than at Corinth; were men of a cultivated understanding. These circumstances rendered Corinth a fit scene on which to display the light of the gospel; because if it proved successful among a people so enlightened as the Corinthians, it would be a proof to after-ages of the reality of the miracles by which, as the Christian records affirm, the gospel was established in every country. It is true, but a few of the philosophers and men of learning at Corinth embraced the gospel. Nevertheless, if the apostle's miracles had been impostures, the philosophers and other learned men, being well qualified to judge of such matters, would have detected them; and by so doing, have stopped the progress of the gospel in their city. These were the reasons which induced Paul to spend more than eighteen months in preaching at Corinth, from the time of his first arrival to his departure.

The character of the Corinthians being such as I have described, it is natural to suppose, that they would expect both learning and eloquence in any person who pretended to instruct them. The apostle, well apprized of this, addressed them at the first with great fear and trembling, as he tells us himself, 1 Cor. ii. 3, in so much that Christ found it necessary to encourage him by a vision, in which he commanded him not to be afraid, but to speak boldly, promising that many of the Corinthians should believe the gospel.

Paul, at his first coming to Corinth, Acta viii. 2, 'found a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy with his wife Priscilla, because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome. (No. XXII.)—3. And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them and wrought; for by their occupation they were tent-makers.' In his youth, Paul, as was observed above, had been bred to that business. And it was of great use to him on many occasions, particularly at this time; for by the profit of his labour he maintained himself all the while he abode in Corinth, without burdening the Corinthians in the least. The same course he had followed some time before this, while he preached in Thessalonica. 1 Thess. ii. 9. 'Ye remember, brethren, our labour and toil. For night and day we wrought (for our own maintenance), in order not to overload any of you, when we preached to you the gospel of God.' And afterwards at Ephesus and I suppose in many other places, he supported not only himself, but his assistants also, by the profits of his labour, as appears from what he said to the elders of Ephesus, Acts xx. 34. 'Y' e yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessity, and to them that were with me. 35. I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.' Wherefore, not to speak of the apostle's miracles, his distinguishedness in coming all the way from Judea to communicate to the Greeks the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation by Christ, must have made a strong impression on those who were candid; especially when they considered, that their own philosophers communicated none of their knowledge without receiving a hire for so doing.

The Jews being very numerous in Corinth, Paul, according to his custom, began his ministry in the synagogue. Acts viii. 4. 'And he reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath-day, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks, (Exarn.)', the devout Gentiles; for such only frequented the Jewish synagogue. His first converts at Corinth were Epenetus, and the household of Stephanas, whom he calls 'the first-fruits of Achaia.' But whether they were Jews or Gentiles is hard to say; only this we know, that his sermons had little influence in converting many of the Jews.

About this time Timothy, after establishing the brethren of Thessalonica in their faith, to whom he had been sent from Athens, left that city to join Paul at Corinth. In his way, calling upon Silas, who was at Berea, they travelled together to Corinth, where they found the apostle, and gave him the agreeable news, that the Thessalonian brethren stood firm in the faith, bare the persecution of the unbelievers with exemplary fortitude, and entertained a grateful remembrance of their spiritual father, 1 Thess. iii. 6. These tidings filled the apostle with joy, and encouraged him to deal more plainly with the Jews at Corinth than he had hitherto done. Acts viii. 6. 'And when Silas and Timothy were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed in spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus was the Christ,' founding his testimony upon arguments brought from the scriptures, and upon the miracles which he wrought in confirmation of his doctrine, and upon the spiritual gifts which he conferred upon those who believed. 6. 'And when they opposed themselves (to this doctrine), and blasphemed Jesus, by affirming that he was not the Christ, but an impostor, he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean.' (see also God's declaration, Ezek. xxxiii. 8, 9.) 'from henceforth I will go to the Gentiles.' I will no longer attempt to convert persons who contemptuously put away the word of God from them, but I will preach the gospel to the idolatrous Gentiles in this city. 7. 'And he departed thence, and entered into a certain man's house named Justus, one that worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue.' Paul chose to preach in the house of this religious proselyte, because, being near to the synagogue, such of the Jews as were of a teachable disposition had thereby an opportunity of hearing him preach. Accordingly, while he preached in the house of Justus, St. Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, believed in the Lord, with all his house; and many of the Corinthians, (the idolatrous inhabitants of the city), hearing him, believed and were baptized,' by Silas and Timothy, I suppose; for the apostle affirms, that he baptized none of the Corinthians but Crispus and Gaius, and the household of Stephanas.

—Acts xviii. 9. 'Then spake the Lord to Paul by night in a vision. Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace. 10. For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee.' speak frequently and boldly; for I have much people in this city: I have in this city many who are disposed to hear the gospel, and who on hearing it will believe.—The apostle, thus encouraged by his Master, 11. 'continued a year and six months teaching the word of God among them.'

Timothy, in the account which he gave of the Thessalonian brethren, had told the apostle, That the persecution against them raged more than ever; being carried on by the idolatrous Gentiles, as well as by the Jews: That while the rulers and the multitude used force in destroying the church, the philosophers and the men of learning endeavoured to overthrow the gospel itself by arguments: That the Thessalonian brethren nevertheless had stood firm against every shock; and that they had a great desire to see the apostle, their spiritual father, to be comforted by him in their distress. These tidings made St. Paul wish exceedingly to return to Thessalonica; but the importance of the work in which he was engaged at Corinth, and the success with which he was carrying it on, rendered it improper for him to depart. However, he supplied the want of his presence, in some measure, by writing to the Thessalonians his first epistle, wherein he furnished them with a demonstration of the divine original of the gospel, to enable them to answer such of the Oecumenical sophists as attacked their faith with arguments. In that first epistle also he comforted those who mourned the loss of their dear relations, by foretelling Christ's return from heaven to raise the dead, and carry his faithful servants to the abodes of the blessed.—This by many is reckoned a most important thing. 12. or who have heard the word of God, and have believed: and we may hold it to be so, unless we think his epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch, a few months after the Council of Jerusalem. 13. At the same time, it is plain that he was then coming to them the third time; although, in the history of the Acts, there is no mention of his being at Corinth more than once before he wrote his second epistle to the church in that city.

It seems, when the letter to the Thessalonians was publicly read, some who were not acquainted with the apostle's manner of writing inferred, from certain expressions in that letter, that the day of judgment was at hand. Impostors also came to Thessalonica, pretending to bring from Paul himself the same doctrine. This error occasioning great confusion among the Thessalonian brethren, with a total neglect of their worldly affairs, tidings thereof were brought to the apostle at Corinth after his return from the region of Achaea. Wherefore he wrote his second epistle to the Thessalonians, to assure them that the day of judgment was not at hand; for that day was not come till there was a falling away first, and the man of sin was revealed, whose coming he there describes.

Paul's great success at Corinth and in Peloponnesus provoked the Jews to the highest pitch of rage, when they found he led his converts to despise the institutions of Moses, by assuring them that they might be justified and saved through faith in Christ, without the use of these institutions. Wherefore, in the year that Gallio, the elder brother of Seneca the philosopher, Acts xxi. 12. was proconsul of Achaea, that is, about the end of A. D. 59, (being the 12th of Claudius, see No. VII.), the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him before the judge: but, upon the second appeal, Gallio adjourned Paul to Corinth. Where Paul, joined in this assault; 13. Saying, This fellow persuaded men to worship God contrary to the law. It seems Paul had taught that the law of Moses being now abrogated, men were no longer to worship God with sacrifices and washings, and other bodily services, but in spirit and truth. And this manner of worship being deemed contrary to the law of Moses, the unbelieving Jews, in a tumultuous manner, brought Paul, the promoter of it, before the proconsul, in order to have him punished as one who, in professing a worship contrary to the law of Moses, had acted contrary to the laws of the empire, which tolerated the Jews in the exercises of their religion. 14. 'But when Paul was now about to open his mouth,' Gallio, sensible of the futility of the charge, would not allow him to make any reply; but himself said to the Jews, 'If it were possible that Paul was a question (ἐνεργος) of a doctrine, and of names, and of your law; if your affection respect opinions taught by Paul which ye think heretical; and whether the names of the Christ and the Son of God which he hath given to any one ought to be given to that person; and whether all who worship the God of the Jews are bound to worship him according to the rites of your law, look ye to it.' These are matters which belong to yourselves, and with which as a magistrate I have no concern; therefore I will be no judge of such matters. It seems Gallio knew that Paul had persuaded some of the idolatrous Corinthians to receive his opinions; but he wisely declined determining, by any judicial sentence, what were their obligations in consequence of that alteration of their faith. At the same time, it is plain he was not offended with Paul for having turned many of the Corinthians from idols to serve the true God. He knew the Jews had attempted to do the same thing in various parts of the empire, though not with equal success. 15. 'And he drew them from the judgment-seat.' 17. Then, after the court was ended, the Greeks, displeased with the Jews for their turbulent persecuting spirit, took Sotheneus the ruler of the synagogue, who I suppose had succeeded who was the ringleader in this insurrection, although afterward, following the example of Cipsrus, he also believed, 1 and best him (with their hands) before the judgment-seat,' while Gallio looked on, without hindering them: 'Gallio cared for none of those things;' being pleased with the indignity done by the Greeks to the chief magistrates of the Jews, whose malicious disposition he detected.

In this manner Christ, according to his promise, ver. 10. protected Paul against the rage of the Jews. The rulers likewise showed no unfriendly disposition towards the disciples. And therefore Paul abode yet a good while at Corinth after the insurrection."—Acts xviii. 18.

And then took his leave of the brethren and sailed into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquila, having shorn his head in Cenchrea, for he had a vow. (No. xiii.) They took ship at Cenchrea, the eastern port of Corinth, where Paul shaved his head, and thereby put a period to the duration of a vow which he had made, perhaps on occasion of the great deliverance he had obtained when the Jews made insurrection against him. But the ship in which they sailed having occasion to touch at Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla remained there. 19. 'But he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews, upon whom his discourse made such an impression, that, ver. 20. 'they desired him to tarry longer with them.' However, as his vow made it necessary that he should offer the appointed sacrifices in Jerusalem at the ensuing feast, which according to the general opinion was the passover, he consented not; 21. But bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh, in Jerusalem.' In the mean time, perceiving there was a probability of preaching the gospel with success, both to the Jews and Gentiles in Ephesus, he promised to return: 'I will return again to you, if God will; and be sailed from Ephesus.'

In this voyage the apostle met with no obstruction. We may therefore believe, that he landed at Cæsarea in such good time as to keep the feast in Jerusalem according to his resolution, and complete his vow. Acts xvi. 23. 'And when he had landed at Cæsarea.' &c.

CXX. VI.—Paul's History, from his landing at Cæsarea to his going to Jerusalem with the Collections for the Saints.

As we shall have occasion, in the course of the narration, to mention Cæsarea more than once, where Paul now landed after finishing his voyage from Ephesus, it will be proper to give some account of a city, which in those days was so celebrated.—Anciently people who came to Jerusalem by sea landed at Joppa. But the harbour being inconvenient, Herod the Great built one more commodious at Straton's-tower, a town situated not far from Joppa, on an open bay. This harbour he made by running a strong mole in the sea. He likewise enlarged and beautified the city with many edifices, both public and private; particularly with a praetorium, a theatre, and an amphitheatre; in which latter his grandson Herod Agrippa was struck with a mortal disease, for reviving the glory which belonged to God, Acts xii. 23. Withal, to make this as like a Greek city as possible, he set up a colossal statue of Augustus, not inferior to that of Jupiter at Olympia, and named the city Cæsarea.—The beauty of Cæsarea, and the advantages which it derived from its fine harbour, induced the Roman governors of Judea to reside there, rather than at Jerusalem. Accordingly, in the course of Paul's history, we shall find him imprisoned in that city; and during his imprisonment, brought before Felix and Festus, the governors of the province.

Paul, having visited the Churches of Jerusalem and Antioch, goes through Galatia and Phrygia. While he is thus employed, Apollos comes to Ephesus.

After landing at Cæsarea, Paul went up to Jerusalem, and saluted the church. But as there was no need of his labours in a city where there were so many apostles and chief brethren, he did not stay long after keeping the feast, but went down to Antioch, where formerly he and Barnabas had laboured so successfully in the work of the ministry. Acts xvi. 32. 'And when he had landed at Cæsarea, and gone up and saluted the church, he went down to Antioch.' 23. And when he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.—The apostle went at this time into the countries of Galatia and Phrygia by land, taking Syria and Cilicia of course in his way. And seeing we are told he went over all these countries in order, we may believe he did so for the purpose of visiting every church, and receiving those contributions which, in his former journey, he had requested them to make for the saints in Judea, 1 Cor. xvi. 1.

While Paul was thus visiting the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, there came to Ephesus a certain Jew named Apollos, a native of Alexandria in Egypt. This person having heard John Baptist preach, had become his disciple, and was but imperfectly instructed by him in the way of the Lord. Apollos, however, being mighty in the sacred writings of the Jews, went into the synagogue of Ephesus, and taught with great accuracy what he knew concerning the Lord Messiah, whether from John's preaching, or from the scriptures. But Aquila and Priscilla, who during Paul's abode with them had improved themselves in the knowledge of the gospel, and who had been left by him at Ephesus, happening to hear Apollos, and observing that he possessed great goodness of disposition, Acts xvi. 26. 'took him and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly,' by informing him that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ whose coming John had announced; and by assuring him that John had even pointed him out as the Christ to his disciples. Besides, these well-instructed Christians gave Apollos a particular account of the birth, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus; and informed him, that Jesus had proved himself to be the Christ, not only by his miracles and resurrection, but by his baptizing his disciples with the Holy Ghost and with fire, as John had foretold.—Apollos, having received this more perfect instruction in the Christian faith, went with letters from the brethren to Corinth, where he helped them much who had believed through grace. 28. For he mighty convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the scriptures that Jesus was the Christ.' And, having occasion to tarry some time at Corinth, he became so zealous and useful a preacher there, that the fame of his labours reached the apostle during his abode in Ephesus; and occasioned him, in the letter which he wrote from that city to the Corinthians, to say, 1 Cor. iii. 6. 'I have planted, Apollos watered.'
the School of Tyrannus; and works great miracles. The Magicians burn their Books. He receives a Letter from the Corinthians, in answer to which he writes his First Epistle to them. He is assaulted by the Craftsmen, and leaves Ephesus, after having gathered a numerous Church there.

While Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the country of Galatia and Phrygia, called, Acts xix. 1. ‘the upper coast, came to Ephesus.’ Who were his companions in his journey, Luke has not told us. But it appears that he had several: For Timothy and Erastus are called, ver. 22. ‘two of them who ministered to him.’ Timothy was Paul’s constant attendant; and Erastus was the chamberlain or treasurer of Corinth, (Rom. xvi. 23.); who, having early embraced the gospel, formed such an attachment to the apostle, that when he sailed from Corinth to Judea he accompanied him; and from Judea he now returned with him to Ephesus. Or he may have met the apostle at Ephesus. Thus also was it in Paul’s train at this time: for he was the bearer of the first epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Ephesus. So the same, formerly a ruler of the synagogue in Corinth, but now a convert to the gospel, was with him likewise; for he joined him in writing that epistle. Caius, too, and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, were also with Paul; for, in the account given of the riot of Demetrius, they are mentioned as Paul’s companions in trouble, Acts xix. 28.

At this time, Ephesus was the metropolis of the province of Asia, and an exceedingly populous city. For, not to speak of its native inhabitants, which were very numerous, a great concourse of strangers always resorted to Ephesus—some to worship the goddess Diana, whose rites were celebrated with great magnificence in a temple erected to her there at the expense of all Asia; others to learn the arts of sorcery and magic, which were taught and practised at Ephesus with such reputation, that the magical words or sentences used in the practice of sorcery had their name from Ephesus; being called ephebian. Ephemian letters: others came to prosecute law-suits, or to solicit offices from the Roman governor of the province, who had his residence there; others took Ephesus in their way to and from Europe; and others, after the manner of the Easterns, abode there occasionally for the sake of commerce. See Pref. to Eph. sect. 1.—Ephesus, therefore, being a place of such general resort, and the very throne of idolatry, superstition, and magic, the apostle, when he foresaw that city, resolved to return and attack these impurities in this their strongest hold. Wherefore, having discharged his vow in Jerusalem, he made no stay there, nor even at Amiintha; but, as was observed above, he travelled through Syria and Cilicia, and the upper coast, as expeditiously as was consistent with his purpose in visiting those countries; then came to Ephesus, where he abode three years, and gathered a very numerous church, the members of which were so dear to him, that ‘he ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears,’ Acts xix. 31.

On his arrival, the apostle found certain disciples residing at Ephesus, to whom he said, Acts xix. 2. ‘Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost:’ any effusion of the Holy Ghost on the disciples, whereby they are enabled to prophesy and work miracles. 3. ‘And he said unto them, (v. 6.) With what then, were ye baptized? ’ It seems, those who were baptized by the apostles commonly received the Holy Ghost after their baptism. ‘They said to him with John’s baptism.’ Upon this he took occasion to show them, that by John’s baptism, they had bound themselves, 4. ‘to believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. 5. When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.’ And, after their baptism, Paul laying his hands on them, 6. ‘the Holy Ghost came upon them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. 7. And all the men were about twelve.’ These brethren, being not only the first disciples of Christ in Ephesus, but the first in that city who received the Holy Ghost, we may believe the apostle afterwards ordained them elders of that church. If so, they may have been among the elders of Ephesus who came to Miletus, and received from Paul the pathetic exhortation recorded Acts xx. 18-35.

Paul, after giving this signal proof of his apostleship, 8. ‘went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, (June, &c.) reasoning and persuading the things which concern the kingdom of God’ that is, reasoning in proof of the things which concern the gospel dispensation, and persuading the Jews to believe these things. But the Jews, during this second series of preaching, perceiving the drift of his discourses to be, to prove that men are justified by the gospel without obeying the law of Moses, Acts xix. 8. ‘Diverse sects were hardened, and believed not, before the multitude in the synagogue, representing it as utterly subversive of the revelations made by Moses and the prophets. Wherefore, finding the Jews incorrigible, the apostle carried the disciples away from the synagogue, and preached daily in the school of one Tyrannus, a philosopher, who either was himself converted, or hired his school to the apostle to preach in it. 10. ‘And this continued by the space of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia, (that is, in the province so called,) heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.’ It seems the fame of the apostle’s doctrine and miracles brought multitudes to Ephesus from distant parts; and these, by what they heard and saw, being converted, proouched the gospel when they returned to their own cities, and founded those churches which the apostle tells the Colossians, chap. ii. 1. ‘had not seen his face in the flesh.’

As Paul abode longer at Ephesus than in any other city we read of, he wrought more miracles and miracles than in any other city; Acts xix. 11. ‘And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul. 12. So that from his body were brought unto the sick, who could not conveniently be carried to him, handkerchiefs (v. and aprons) belonging to the gods, had touched his body; and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.’ In this respect Paul was equal to Peter, whose shadow, as he passed by, overshadowing the sick who were laid on couches in the streets of Jerusalem, cured them of their distempers, Acts v. 15.—Wherefore it was owing to the multitude and greatness of Paul’s miracles that so many of the inhabitants of Ephesus, and of the province of Asia, embraced the gospel.

Paul’s reputation was greatly increased at Ephesus by what happened to the seven sons of Sceva, one of the Jewish chief priests. These men are called venerated Jews and exorcists, because they strode through the countries of the Lesser Asia, practising that magic which was in such vogue among the heathens. But when they came to Ephesus, hearing of the wonderful things which Paul performed in the name of Jesus, and perhaps seeing some of them, they took upon them, in the name of Jesus, to expel an evil spirit out of a possessed person. But, Acts xix. 16. ‘the evil spirit answered, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; I know the authority and power of Jesus and Paul, and I am ready to be obedient; but who are ye? ’ Acts xix. 16. ‘And the man in whom was.
spirit was leapt on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded. 18. And many believed, strong ly impressed with what had happened, came to Paul, and confessed that they had attempted to cure diseases by charms, and other magical operations, and shewed their deeds; the arts by which they had deceived the multitude. 19. Many also of them who used these curious arts, of exorcism, conjuration, and magic, now firmly believing the gospel, brought their books, in which the different forms of incantation for different diseases were prescribed, the method of making these incantations was shewn, the herbs and other medicines to be used with these incantations were pointed out, and the seasons for using them were fixed; and burned these books before all men; and they counted the price of them, and they found it fifty thousand pieces of silver, (£7500 sterling) For these, being books of medicine as well as of sorcery and magic, were of great value; especially if, according to the fashion of the times, they were written on parchment. Nevertheless the owners of them made a willing sacrifice of them to truth and piety; because the arts themselves being unlawful, it was not fit that the books which taught them should be in the possession of any person whatever. Acts xix. 20. So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed.

But notwithstanding this great success, Paul had many enemies in Ephesus, who on some occasion or other hurried him into the theatre, and forced him to fight with wild beasts: 1 Cor. xvi. 22. If after the manner of men (σπουδών ἡμῶν) I have fought with wild beasts, some, indeed, understand this metaphorically of certain dangerous contests which the apostle had with the unbelieving Jews, whom on account of their malice and rage he called wild beasts, as he called the Cretians (ἀσακρογεία) evil wild beasts, Tit. i. 12, on account of their idleness and gluttony. Yet I rather think this was a real combat; because the apostle seems to allude to such a combat, 2 Cor. i. 8—15. For he tells the Corinthians he was in such danger that he passed the sentence of death upon himself; but God delivered him from so great a death. Besides, the expectation, the manner of men, or the custom which they have, prevail a great deal among the Greeks, seems to imply that this was a real combat. For though, being a Roman citizen, he could not be adjudged to such a punishment, he may have been forced to fight by an assembly of the multitude. Further, as the apostle, in every city where he preached any length of time, had the same dangerous contests with the unbelieving Jews as in Ephesus, there was no reason for mentioning his contests with the Jews in that city more than anywhere else.

About this time some of the family of Chloe, a Corinthian disciple, happening to come to Ephesus, informed the apostle that great divisions had taken place in their church, 1 Cor. i. 11. through the bad practices of a teacher who had come recommended from Judea, and who affirmed that Paul was no apostle, and who at the same time contradicted many of his doctrines. On such an occasion Paul's presence at Corinth, without doubt, was extremely necessary. But the business in which he was engaged at Ephesus not permitting him to depart immediately, he sent Erastus and Timothy into Macedonia, Acts xix. 22. and from thence to Corinth, to inquire into the state of the church: And if they understood the matter, the Corinthians were not wholly alienated from the apostle, they were to tell him he would come among them soon, to increase the spiritual gifts of those who acknowledged his authority, and to punish with the rod all who persisted in their disobedience, 1 Cor. iv. 17.

While the things above related were doing at Ephesus, the sincere part of the Corinthian church, having heard of Paul's residence there, sent three of their number to him with a letter, in which they asked his opinion concerning the subjects of their dissensions. These messengers arrived at Ephesus not long after the departure of Timothy and Erastus; and from the account which they brought, the apostle entertained great hopes that the Corinthians might yet be reclaimed. Wherefore, to promote their reformation, he, in answer to their letter, wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians; in which he endeavoured to heal their divisions, reproved the faulty, explained and asserted the doctrines which the false teacher had impugned, and prescribed rules for the orderliness and edifying exercise of their spiritual gifts. This epistle the apostle sent, not by the Corinthian messengers, Stephe,os, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, but by Titus, who accompanied them on their return: For we wished to inform the Corinthians of his great success at Ephesus by one who was an eyewitness of it. It is likewise proper, that the person who carried his letter should bring him back word how it was received, and what effect it produced. And as Apollo was at Ephesus when this epistle was written, he is supposed to have been likewise sent to Corinth, in the persuasion that he might be of great use there. But Apollo declined it, (1 Cor. xvi. 12,) for reason of which, at this distance of time, nothing but uncertain conjectures can be formed.

The success with which Paul turned the inhabitants of Ephesus from the worship of idols being very great, the bigots, and all who made gain of the established idolatry, were alarmed; especially one Demetrius, who made silver shrines* for Diana. Of these shrines, many were sold to the inhabitants of Ephesus, and many of those who came from distant parts to worship the goddess, so that great profits were made by those who dealt in this commodity. But Demetrius, perceiving that there would be an end of the trade if Paul's doctrine was spread, called together the men of like occupation, and said to them, Acts xix. 20. Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth. 26. Moreover, ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying, that they be no gods which are made with hands! Paul, it seems, had denied that the gods resided in their images. 27. So that not only this craft is in danger to be set at nought: but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana is despised, and her magnificence will be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshipped. An inflammatory speech of this kind, addressed to the superstition and avarice of the multitude, immediately produced the desired effect. The craftsmen, and all who were employed about the temple of Diana, 28. when they heard these things, were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. 29. And the whole city was filled with confusion; for the craftsmen ran about the streets, and gave the alarm to the multitude; and having caught Calus and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they ran with one accord into the theatre, intending no doubt to throw them to the wild beasts.

* In the original it is σιδηραγωτοσ καιρωσ, silver temple of Diana, i.e. representations in miniature of the temple of Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter, as if the person being set on an altar, or some other holy place, the door of it was opened, and the image stood or set in state, in the view of the spectators who worshipped it. The tabernacles of Moloch, mentioned Acts vii. 43. which the levities carried about in the wilderness, seem to have been things of the same kind with Diana's shrines.
THE LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

On this occasion it appears, that some of the principal men of the city had embraced the Christian doctrine, or were disposed to do so. For no less persons than the Asiarchs are said to have been Paul's friends, ver. 31. These were the priests of Diana, who had the care of the games celebrated in honour of that goddess. (See Whitby's note on ver. 31.) For although they derived both dignity and profit from the established idolatry, yet their sound sense, their love of truth, and their attachment to good morals, led them to befriend Paul in his arduous undertaking of spreading the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation by Christ. The proconsul's secretary, or, as others think, the town-clerk of Ephesus, declared likewise that he had a good opinion of the Christian preachers. They were neither robbers of temples nor blasphemers of Diana; nay, he told them plainly, that there was no cause for that day's uproar. We may therefore believe, that in preaching against the set of worship, Paul and his assistants had spoken nothing against Diana in particular, though their general doctrine struck against all the heathen deities in the lump; and even that, in speaking against the established idolatry, they had used a becoming decency of language. Wherefore, the secretary, observing their prudence, entertained a good opinion of the cause they were engaged in. To these illustrious converts may be added such as had studied magic, and who, on their becoming Christians, burnt the books in which the secrets of their art were contained. For many of them, no doubt, were men of learning, and philosophers. Wherefore, the church gathered at Ephesus was not more considerable for the number than for the quality of many of its members.

We are not told how long Paul remained at Ephesus after the riot. It is said, indeed, Acts xx. 1. After the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia. This, however, does not necessarily imply his immediate departure, as hath been shown in the preface to the Ephesians, sect. 1. par. 4. The apostle therefore may have remained in Ephesus and its neighbourhood some months after the riot, to comfort the disciples and establish the churches of Asia, whose salutation he sent in the conclusion of his first letter to the Corinthians. Besides, from Paul's own account it appears, that he remained in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, waiting for the coming of Titus from Corinth. But Titus not arriving within the time appointed him, the apostle became impatient, and went forward to Troas in the hope of meeting with him there. But being disappointed in that expectation also, he passed over into Macedonia, where at length Titus came to him, and gave him great joy, by the account which he brought him of the good disposition of the Corinthians, as we shall see immediately.

Leaving Ephesus, Paul goes into Macedonia, where he writes his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, then proceeds to Greece to receive the Collections. In Corinth he writes his epistle to the Romans, and returns to Macedonia in his way to Jerusalem. He is resisted by the Messengers of the Churches. At Philippi Luke joins him as one of his attendants.

When Paul left Ephesus he went to Troas, in expectation of meeting Titus as he returned from Corinth, 3 Cor. ii. 12, 13. At Troas the apostle had great success in preaching. Nevertheless he did not remain any time there, but passed over into Macedonia, being anxious to see Titus. While in Macedonia, he doubtless visited the churches which he had planted at Philippi, and Thessalonica, and Berea, and all the other churches in that large and populous province. So the historian says, Acts xx. 1. And when the uproar was called to him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia. Here, that he might wholly wear the Corinthian cloths, from the false teachers that wrote to them his second epistle, in the summer of the year 57, about five months after the date of his first letter. See No. VII.

In that second letter Paul hath given us a short account of his past sufferings, which deserves to be mentioned here, because his sufferings are the strongest proofs of his firm belief of the doctrines and facts which he preached, and of the righteousness of the cause in which he was engaged. From that account it appears that he had been five times scourged by the Jews in their synagogues, and thrice beaten with rods by the Greeks and Romans; he had been once stoned, and left as dead, namely at Lystra, and three times shipwrecked. In one of those shipwreck he had been a whole night and a day in the sea. He had made many journeys by land, in which he had encountered perils without number, in passing rivers, and from robbers, and from the unbelieving Jews, and from the Gentiles, and even from false brethren. Also, he had undergone much bodily fatigue, in working for his own maintenance, and for the maintenance of his companions, while they assisted him in preaching. Lastly, in the course of his many and long journeys, he had endured much watchful, and hunger, and thirst, and cold, and nakedness, 2 Cor. xi. 23-28. But his trials did not end at this period. He lived nine or ten years after this, in which he suffered yet greater hardships, till at length he was put to death by Nero, for the testimony of Jesus. Would any impostor have suffered such a long course of evils for the sake of propagating a tale, the falsehood of which he was conscious of?

Acts xx. 2. And when he had gone over those parts, (Macedonia), and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece. 3. And there abode three months.
—In going through Macedonia, the apostle certainly received the collections which the churches made for the poor of the saints in Judea; and had those fightings and inward fears of which he speaks, 2 Cor. vii. 5. Perhaps also it was on this occasion that he preached the gospel on the confines of Illyricum, as mentioned Rom. xv. 19.

—During the three months the apostle spent in Greece, he received from the churches of Achaia the money which they had collected for the saints, agreeably to his direction to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. At that time also he wrote from Corinth his epistle to the Romans, (Rom. xv. 25.), of whose affairs he had heard from Aquila and Priscilla. And having finished all these matters, he proposed to sail directly into Syria. But the Jews, who had heard of the money he was carrying to Jerusalem, and who besides hated him as an enemy to their religion, lying in wait for him in Cenchrea, the eastern port of Corinth, where he was to embark, he changed his resolution. So that, avoiding Cenchrea, which was about nine miles from Corinth, he returned by land through Macedonia, in such time that he left Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and so began his voyage into Syria; Acts xx. 6.

From 2 Cor. viii. 23. ix. 4. it appears, that before the apostle went into Greece, the Macedonian churches had appointed some of their most esteemed members to accompany him to Jerusalem, to assist in making their present acceptable to the Jewish believers, and to witness the delivery of it. This they did at the particular request of Paul himself, (1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4), who in this affair wished to place his own conduct above all suspicion of fraud; and the rather, because the money intrusted to him amounted to a great sum. At that time, likewise, the messengers whom the churches of Galatia, Lycaonia, and Asia, had commissioned for the same purpose, were with him in Macedonia. Wherefore, seeing his first intention was to sail into Syria from Corinth, Acts xx. 3, after receiving the collections from the churches of Greece. In all these messengers must have accompanied him from Macedonia into Greece, 2 Cor. ix. 1. And when he altered his purpose on account of the lying in wait of the Jews, they no doubt came back with him into Macedonia.

—Their names, and the names of the churches whose messengers they were, we have Acts xx. 4. And there accompanied him in his return through Macedonia into Asia, Sopater of Berea, and of the Thessalonians Aristarchus and Secundus, (these are the Macedonians of whom he speaks 2 Cor. ix. 4.), and Caius of Derbe, (the person who with Aristarchus was hurried into the theatre at Ephesus during the riot), and Timotheus; and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus. This latter being an Ephesian, I suppose the former was of the same city also, Acts xxiii. 29.—Titus is not mentioned in this catalogue, nor Jason, nor Lucius; yet from the epistle to the Romans, which, as above mentioned, was written at Corinth, we know they also were with Paul there, Rom. xvi. 23. But whether they accompanied him into Syria is uncertain. It was not necessary that every church which made the collection should dote one of their number to attend the apostle to Jerusalem. The churches of Galatia, who certainly made the collections, (1 Cor. xvi. 1.) and of Phrygia, and of Lycaonia, who were many in number, seem to have intrusted that business to Caius of Derbe, and to Timothy of Lystra. The churches of the province of Asia may have done the same to Tychicus and Trophimus, the Ephesian messengers. The church at Philippi seems to have committed its interest in the collections to Aristarchus and Secundus, the messengers of the Thessalonians. And as for the churches of Achaia, they seem to have sent no messengers at all, though expressly invited to do it, 1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4, but to have intrusted their present to the apostle's care.

Paul, accompanied by the Messengers of the Churches, sails from Philippi to Troas, where he raises Eutychus from the dead: after which he sails to Miletus, and sends for the Elders of Ephesus, whom he addresses in the most affectionate manner.

Our Paul's coming to Philippi from Corinth, he was accompanied by Luke in his way to Syria. (No. XX.) But his other assistants, Titus and Trophimus, with the messengers of the churches, went before him to Troas. This happened in the spring, A. d. 58. For we are told, Acts xx. 6. that Paul, attended by Luke, 'sailed away from Philippi, after the days of unleavened bread;' that is, after the passover week was ended; and came to Troas in five days, where we abide seven days.' They stayed these days in Troas, because there was a numerous church in that city and neighbourhood, gathered by Paul, who had preached there on different occasions, Acts xvi. 8. 2 Cor. ii. 12.—7. 'And on the first day of the week, when the disciples came together (from different parts) to break bread, (No. XXIV.), Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight.' On that occasion the room where they met was so full of people, that they opened the windows to let in the air. But a young man, named Eutychus, who sat in a window, 'falling into a deep sleep while Paul was long preaching, he sank down with sleep, and fell from the third loft, and was taken up dead.' Him Paul restored to life by a miracle, Acts xx. 11. 'When he therefore was come up again, and had broken bread, and eaten the Lord's supper, ver. 7. ' and had talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed. In this instance we have an example of the disciples meeting in the night-time to celebrate the Lord's supper, to avoid

Paul and his Company, leaving from Miletus, sail to Syria, and land at Tyre, where they abide seven days: From Tyre they sail to Ptolemais, then go on foot to Cesarea, where Paul lodges with Philip the Evangelist, They all go up to Jerusalem to deliver the Collections.

Having parted with the elders of Ephesus, they loosed from Miletus and came to Coos. The day following they came to Rhodes, and thence to Patara, a noted seaport town of Lycia. Here they went aboard a ship bound for Phoenicia, and having a prosperous voyage, they landed at Tyre, where, meeting with disciples, they abode seven days. These disciples, Acts xx. 4, said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem; that is, by the Spirit of prophecy foreseeing the troubles Paul was to meet with in Jerusalem, they advised him not to go thither. For if this had been a

The feast of Pentecost was instituted in commemoration of the giving of the law, on the 50th day after the first passover. It seems to have been the greatest of all the Jewish festivals, and to have been more frequented than any of them, especially by the Jews in the provinces. "Tyre, after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, recovered, as foretold Isa. xxxv. 17, its ancient trade, wealth, and grandeur; as did likewise after a second destruction by Alexander. It became a link, as it were, between the rest of the neighboring countries. St. Paul himself found many Christians there, Acts xxii. 4. It suffered much in the Diocletian persecution. It was an archbishopric under the patriarchate of Jerusalem, with fourteen bishoprics under its jurisdiction. It continued Christian till it was taken by the Saracens in 929, was recovered by the Christians in 1124, but in 1290 it was conquered by the Mamelukes and afterwards taken from them by the Turks in 1585. Since that time it has sunk into utter decay; is now a mere ruin; a bare rock; a place to spread nets upon, with the prophet Ezekiel, chap. xxvi. 14."

Crab. VII.—Paul’s History, from his arrival at Jerusalem with the Collections for the Saints in Judea, to his Imprisonment in Cesarea.

It seems that the apostle performed his voyage expeditiously, that, after finishing it, he could speak... seven days in Tyre, and many days at Cesarea, and yet go to Jerusalem in time to celebrate the feast of Pentecost: for he had left Macedonia with a fixed purpose so to do, Acts xxi. 16.; and there is no reason to think he did not accomplish his design.

Paul, with the Messengers of the Churches, go in to James and the Elders, to whom Paul gives an Account of the Success of his Preaching to the Gentiles. The Collections made for the Saints in Judea are delivered to the Elders by the Messengers of the Churches.

The day after their arrival at Jerusalem, Paul, with the messengers of the churches, Acts xxi. 18. went in to James; and all the elders of the church of Jerusalem were present. 19. And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry.—In the account which Paul gave of his ministry to James and to the elders, he declared, that many of the idolatrous Gentiles in all the great cities of the Lesser Asia, Macedonia, and Greece, had embraced the gospel; and spoke of the churches which he had planted in these cities, and of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which, by his ministry God had bestowed on them, brought the believers in every church. Moreover, in that account we may be sure he did not forget to mention the liberal collections which the churches of the Gentiles through Asia and Europe had made for the poor of the saints in Judea, and which they had sent by his hands, as a testimony of their gratitude for the knowledge of the true God communicated to them by men of their nation. These collections Paul, no doubt, now delivered, in presence of the messengers of the churches, to James and to the elders, to be by them distributed to the poor of the Jewish Christians, who by that expression of the good-will of the Gentile believers, ought to have been disposed to think favourably of them as their brethren.

Paul goes into the Temple, to assist some of the Brethren to discharge a vow they were under. The Jews from the Perea as well as the multitude to kill Paul. He is rescued by Lycaon the Chief Captain. From the stairs of the Council he gives the People an Account of the manner in which he was converted to Christianity.

The Jews at Jerusalem, before Paul’s arrival, having heard a false report of his teaching the Jews which were among the Gentiles, Acts xxi. 23.; to forsake Moses and the custom of the Jews, saying, that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the custom; James and the elders showed him the propriety of his giving satisfaction on that head to the many thousands of the Jewish believers in Jerusalem, who were all zealous of the law, and who on the news of his arrival would come together to inquire into the matter. For this purpose, they advised him to assist four of the brethren who were under a vow to discharge the same. And to shew his attachment to the law, they proposed that he should be himself at the charges necessary therefor; (No. XXII.) Acts xxi. 34.; That all may know that those things whereby they were informed concerning thee, are nothing, but that thou thyself also walked orderly, and keepest the law.

To this measure Paul very willingly agreed. For he never taught the Jews in foreign countries to forsake circumcising their children, or to forsake the law of Moses. On the contrary, knowing that law to be the civil or political law of Judea, he always enjoined them to comply with its institutions, as the means of preserving their political rights and privileges; even as he enjoined the converted Gentiles to obey the good laws of the countries where they resided, 1 Cor. vii. 17. x. 30.—What he really taught concerning the law of Moses was, That neither Jew nor Gentile could be saved by its institutions; which was the doctrine likewise of James, and of the elders, and of all the more intelligent members of the church of Jerusalem. For, to shew that they did not think obedience to the law of Moses necessary to men’s salvation, James added on this very occasion, Acts xxi. 25. ‘As touching the Gentiles who believe, we have written and concluded, that they observe no such thing,’—But if the Gentiles were not to observe the law of Moses, obedience thereto could not be necessary to the salvation of any person; and therefore, in recommending this measure to Paul, James and the elders had nothing in view, but to establish the duty which the Jews, as citizens, owed to the municipal law of their country. For it is well known, that in whatever laws were settled, they still considered themselves as citizens of Judea, and observed the law of Moses, as far as it was possible for them to observe it out of Judea, and thereby kept themselves a distinct people from the idolatrous Gentiles among whom they resided. Wherefore, if Paul had really taught the Jews in foreign parts not to circumcise their children, and not to walk after the customs, he would have taught them to preserve their political constitution, and to renounce their civil rights as Jews; than which nothing was farther from his intention.

Agreedly to the advice which Paul had received from James and the elders, Acts xxi. 26. ‘he took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them, he entered into the temple, to signify to the priest the accomplishment of the days of purification;’ that is, their resolution to accomplish the seven days of purification, (Lev. v.) ‘even to the time that an offering should be offered for every one of them. 27. And when the seven days of purification were almost ended, the Jews which were of Armenia, where Paul had preached so long, and who were especially enraged against him, utterly disregarding this proof of his respect for the law, when they saw him in the women’s court of the temple, stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him, 28. cried out, Men of Israel, help; this is the man who teacheth every-where all men against the people;’ (No. XXV.) by telling the Jews, that they ought not to circumcise their children, and by assuring them that they may be saved without becoming proselytes to Judaism; ‘and against the law, and this holy place,’ by predicting that both are to be destroyed; and farther, brought Greeks also into the temple, and that they had seen before with him in the city, Throphonius an Ephesian Gentile, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.’

There was in this city a prodigious confluence of Jews from foreign countries, who like Paul had come to the feast of Pentecost, Acts xxi. 30. ‘And all the city was moved, and the people ran together, and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple;’ that is, out of the women’s court into the court of the Gentiles, as one who had polluted the temple; and forthwith the doors were shut. 31. And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the chief captain of the legion, (No. XXVI.), that all Jerusalem was in an uproar. ’This was the tribune Claudius Lysias, who commanded the Roman garrison stationed in the castle Antonia, hard by the temple. 32. Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them. And when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they let beating of Paul.’ Then Lysias coming to him laid hold on him, and after the Roman manner ordered him to be bound with two chains to two soldiers, that he might not escape; and demanded who he was, and what he had done 1. And some cried one thing, and some another, among the multitude: and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle. (No. XXVIII.) 35. And when he came upon the stairs' leading to the castle, 'so it was that he was borne of the soldiers for the violence of the people. 36. For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, Away with him.' But the soldiers halting on the top of the stairs, Paul begged of the chief captain permission to speak to him, 'who said, Canst thou speak Greek? 38. Art thou not that Egyptian which before these days madness an insurrection, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were Sicarii?' (No. XXXVII.)

To this question Paul replied, that he was a Jew born in Tarsus in Cilicia, and begged that he would suffer him to speak to the people. 40. And when he had given him license, Paul stood on the stairs, and beckoned with the hand unto the people, 'to shew that he was going to speak to them. 'And when there was made a great silence, he spake in the Hebrew tongue,' a discourse which Luke has recorded Acts xxii. 1-22.

In that discourse Paul told the multitude, that he was verily a Jew, who, though born in Tarsus, had received his education in Jerusalem, according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers: that having been instructed by Gamaliel a Pharisee, and a celebrated doctor well known to the people, he was so zealous of the law, that he persecuted the way he was now engaged in to death. And for the truth of what he said, he appealed, ver. 5, to the high-priest, and to the whole estate of the elders, who had given him letters to the synagogues of Damascus for that very purpose. But that, when he came nigh to the city, Jesus himself appeared to him at mid-day, rebuked him for his folly, and brought him over to his cause. And being struck blind by the brightness of Christ's appearance, a disciple named Ananias came to him, restored his sight, and baptized him. And afterward returning from Arabia to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to him while he was in a trance in the temple, and ordered him to leave Jerusalem, because he would send him far hence unto the Gentiles. So that his preaching to the Gentiles was no scheme of his, but was done by revelation from Jesus, who expressly commanded him to do so.—But no sooner did Paul mention his preaching to the Gentiles, than the multitude, especially such of them as had come from Asia, perfectly enraged, cried out, Acts xxii. 22. Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live. 23. And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, 24. The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle; and, thinking him some notorious malefactor, 'laid that he should be examined by scourging, that he might know wherefore they cried so against him.' But, to prevent this impunity, Paul pleaded his privilege as a Roman, whom it was unlawful to beat with rods, or even to bind with thongs, in order to his being so beset. 27. Then the chief captain came, and said to him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? And he said, Yea. 28. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. But Paul said, I was free born. 29. Then straightway they departed from him, which should have examined him by scourging.'

Paul is brought before the Jewish Council. He declares himself a Pharisee. The Pharisees and Sadducees in the Council strive with each other. The Soldiers go into the Council, and take Paul from among them by force. The Chief Captain commands the Council to accuse him before Felix the Governor, in Cesarea.

Luke, now that he understood Paul was a Roman, became the more anxious to know certainly what his crime was. And therefore on the morrow, Acts xxii. 30. he loosed him from his bonds, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear,—it seems the chief priests had joined the multitude against Paul, and had accused him of sedition, with an intention to have him put to death; being exceedingly enraged against him for what he had said concerning them on the stairs, as well as for having deserted their service, and gone over to the Christians:—And brought Paul down, (from the castle), and set him before them, in their council.

The apostle, being thus placed at the bar of the council, looked steadfastly around on all the members present. And though many of them knew him well, having formerly employed him to persecute the disciples of Jesus, yet, conscious of integrity even in that unrighteous course, as in the whole of his other conduct, he boldly said to them, Acts xxxiii. 1. 'Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God unto this day.' But that saying displeasing the high-priest Ananias, as savouring, in his opinion, of falsehood and vanity, he commanded those who stood by, Acts xxiii. 2. 'to smite him on the mouth,' in the manner Pashur formerly smote the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. xx. 2. But Paul, offended at the injury, replied, 3. 'God shall smite thee, thou whited wall,' thou hypocrite; 'for sittest thou to judge me according to the law, which saith, thou shalt do no unrighteousness in judgment?' Lev. xix. 15.—And surely it was unrighteousness in a judge to order one not yet convicted of any crime to be treated as if he had been already condemned; and that for no reason, but because, in beginning to make his defence, he had ascertained the uprightness of his general conduct. Therefore, Ananias having been guilty of injustice under the mask of piety, certainly deserved the rebuke which Paul now gave him.—But some present, 4. 'said, Revilest thou God's high-priest? 5. Then said Paul, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high-priest: For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.' In affirming that he did not know Ananias to be the high-priest, Paul assuredly spake the truth. For both the Roman governor and the Jewish princes had for some time past been in use to sell the high-priesthood to the best bidders; and sometimes to deprive the persons in office, that they might have it to sell anew. Wherefore, as Paul was but lately in their favour, after five years' absence, he may very well have been ignorant of Ananias's dignity, notwithstanding he knew him personally. It is alleged, indeed, that by his dress and seat in the council, Paul might have known Ananias to be the high-priest. But that does not seem probable; because, having looked steadfastly on the council at his first coming in, he would by such an excuse have exposed himself to ridicule, if Ananias could have been known to be the high-priest, either by his dress or by his seat in the council.

Paul, seeing many sitting round with whom he was personally acquainted, and knowing that some of them were Sadducees and some of them Pharisees, Acts xxiii. 6. 'cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question;' meaning, that he was brought before them, as a criminal, for preaching the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, as a proof of the resurrection of all the dead at the last day. The council hearing this account of the crime laid to his charge, 7. 'There arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees; and the multitude was divided. And there arose a great cry; and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' party arose and stood up against his defence, saying, We find no evil in this man; but... spirit or an angel hath spoken to him,' (so they interpreted what Paul had spoken to the multitude from the stairs concerning the appearing of Jesus to him by the way; for they did not allow that the person whom they had crucified, and who had risen from the dead), 'let us not fight against God.' The dissension now became so great, that, 10. 'The chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers,' who had set Paul before the council, 'to go down and take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.' At the same time he ordered his accusers to declare, before the governor himself, what they had to say against the prisoner, (ver. 30.), because he intended to remit the affair to his cognizance.

Jesus appears to Paul in the night. The Jews conspire to kill Paul. The Chief Captain sends him to Cesarea, escorted by a strong guard.

Acts xxiii. 11. 'And the night following the Lord Jesus stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome. 12. And when it was day, certain zealots of the Jews banded together, and bound themselves under a curse, saying, That they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. 13. And there were more than forty who had made this conspiracy. 14. And they came to the chief priests and elders, who were of the sect of the Sadducees, and of the chief men, who were the adversaries of the things which Paul preached, telling them what they had done; and desiring them to send the chief captain to bring Paul down to the council on the morrow, as if to inquire something more perfectly concerning him, that they might have an opportunity of killing him by the way. But the conspiracy being made known to Paul by his brother's son, he sent him to the chief captain, who, on hearing thereof, prudently sent Paul away to Cesarea by night under a strong guard to Felix the governor, (No. XXIX.), with a letter, giving him an account of the whole affair from the beginning, and informing him that he had ordered the prisoner's accusers to say before the governor what they had to lay to his charge. Lyias's letter being delivered to the governor, Acts xxiv. 33. 'They presented Paul also before him. 34. And when the governor had read the letter, he asked of what province he was! And when he understood that he was of Cilicia; 35. I will hear thee, said he, when thine accusers are also come: And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's prætorium.' This was a ball which Herod built in Cesarea for holding courts of judicature in, with apartments adjoining, in which the prisoners who were to be tried were confined.

Chap. VIII.—Paul's History, from his Imprisonment at Cesarea, to his appealing to the Emperor.

'\textit{The High-priest and Elders with Tertullus accuse Paul before Felix. Paul denies the Crimes laid to his charge, and gives an Account of his Faith.}'

It seems the commander of the horsemen who brought Paul to Cesarea, was ordered on his return to inform the high-priest and the elders at Jerusalem of the day which the governor should fix for hearing their accusation, and for trying the prisoner. Wherefore, Acts xxiv. 1. 'After five days Ananias the high-priest descended with the elders, and with a certain orator named Tertullus, who informed the governor against Paul.' This Roman orator, or barrister, to persuade the governor to punish Paul as a disturber of the public peace, complimented him on the wisdom and vigour of his administration: Acts xxiv. 2. 'Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation,' &c. But in this the orator flattered the governor too much. For, although he had repressed the Baccells and other robbers, he was himself a great oppressor of the nation, by the cruelty and injustice of his administration. (No. XXX.) Having made his farming produce, Tertullus roundly affirmed, that Paul was, 5. 'A pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes.' But in this there was not a word of truth, except that Paul was a ringleader of the Nazarenes; a term of reproach which was given to the disciples of Christ even in that early period. 6. 'Who also hath gone about to profane the temple,' by bringing heathens into it, 'whom we took, and would have judged according to our law.' By this the orator insinuated, that as the Romans permitted the Jews to govern themselves by their own laws, it was the governor's duty to maintain them in the possession of that privilege, which he meant to tell him had been violated by the chief captain; for he added, 'The chief captain Lyias came upon us, and with great violence took him out of our hands.' Lyias took Paul twice out of the hands of the Jews by force; once, when he delivered him from the enraged multitude who went about to kill him in the temple, Acts xxi. 32, and a second time, when, after he was sent out of the hands of the council, that he might not be pulled in pieces of them, Acts xxiii. 10. Now, as the Jews thought their law authorized them to punish notorious offenders in a summary manner, as after the example of Phinehas, who without any trial or judicial sentence killed Zimri and Coheb in the act of transgression, Tertullus, I suppose, called the killing of Paul by the enraged multitude, in the supposed act of profaning the temple, a judging or punishing him according to their law. Or, he might give that appellation to the attempt of the council to pull Paul in pieces. Yet the manner in which he expressed himself leads us to think, that he rather meant the attempt of the multitude, 'whom we took, and would have judged.' For the council did not take Paul; but the chief captain pleased him before them, merely to obtain certain information of the crimes which they laid to his charge, and by no means to judge and punish him, Acts xxiii. 30. whereas the multitude laid hold on Paul in the temple, and would have immediately punished him with death. Tertullus's accusation of Paul, together with the circumstances by which he aggravated his accusation, were all mere fictions, of which he offered no proof whatever; only, Acts xxiv. 9. 'The Jews, (namely, Ananias and the elders), asserted, saying, That these things were so.'

His answer to this accusation Paul introduced, not by paying any fulsome compliment to the governor, after the barrister's example; but by saying, Acts xxiv. 10. 'For as much as I know thou hast been a judge many years a judge unto this nation, so canst not be ignorant of the affairs of the Christians, and of the temper of the Jews my accusers, 'I do the more cheerfully answer for myself.' Next, because the charge brought against him was, that 'he was a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world,' he told the governor, that he had been only twelve days in Jerusalem, during which they had not found him stirring up the people anywhere; and boldly averred, that his accusers could prove none of the things which they laid to his charge. Only as to his 'being a ringleader of the Nazarenes, 14. This I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers!' I worship the God of my fathers through the mediation of Christ, which they call heresy, because it renders the mediation of the Levitical priests unnecessary in the worship of God. But this is no heresy; the Levitical services being prefigurations of the mediation of Christ; and the prophets having ex-presently foretold the same. And therefore, in thus worshipping God, I believe 'all things written in the law and in the prophets; 15. And have hope towards God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust.' All the Pharisees allowed the resurrection, hoping for it, as Paul did, upon the foundation of the promises of God delivered by Moses and the prophets. This was a very proper defence before a Roman magistrate, who by the law of the empire was bound to allow every man to worship God according to the religion of his country. Acts xxiv. 16. (Er sive) 'And on this account, (that I believe the resurrection,) I exercise myself to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men.' So that my principles do not lead to sedition.—And as to his professing the temple, he said, That, 17. 'after many years' absence, he had come with alms to his nation and offerings to God, which he proposed to make by assisting some Nazarites to discharge their vow: that with this intention he had gone into the temple; but it was not with any multitude attending him, not tumult made by him. And yet the Jews from Asia laid violent hands on him, as if he had really profaned the temple; 19. 'Who ought to have been here before thee to object, if they had sought against me.' But as they did not appear to make good their charge, it was plain they were conscious of having injured him by their accusation. And doubtless Felix so understood it.—Paul therefore called upon the chief priests and elders, now his only prosecutors, to shew any evil deed that was proved against him while he stood before the council; 21. 'Except it be for this one saying, which I cried standing among them, 'Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day.' But as that was one of the great articles of the national faith, he could not be blamed, either for maintaining it, or for asserting that God had given a proof of it in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead.

Acts xxiv. 22. 'And when Felix heard these things,' the orator's accusation and the prisoner's defence, having by his long residence in Judea more perfect knowledge of that way of worship mentioned by Paul, ver. 14. or a more perfect knowledge of Jesus and his disciples than had been given him by the high-priest and elders and their orator, he did not find any crime proved against Paul: yet he did not acquit him, for fear of displeasing the Jews, but he deferred them till Lystra should come down, as if he could have given better information concerning the pretended sedition.—In the mean time, being fully convinced of Paul's innocenc, he ordered that he should not be confined so closely, but that his acquaintance should be allowed to visit him:—a liberty which we may believe the brethren of Cæsarea made good use of, during his long imprisonment in that city.

Felix, at the request of his Wife Drusilla, sends for Paul, who gives them an account of the Faith in Christ. He reasons concerning Righteousness, Charity, and a Judgment to come. Felix's Conscience is so-raised that he trembles. When recalled from his Government he leaves Paul in bonds.

Paul's trial having occasioned much discourse in Cæsarea, Felix's wife Drusilla, (No. XXX.) who was herself a Jewess, and of the Jewish religion, desired to hear him. Felix therefore sent for him, Acts xxiv. 24. 'and heard him concerning the faith in Christ;' heard him declare what the Christians believed concerning Jesus; namely, that he is the Christ or Messiah long expected by the Jews; and that he was promised to be the Christ by God's raising him from the dead. Moreover, being well acquainted with the character and actions of his illustrious bearers, the apostle introduced some other articles of the Christian religion, suited to their particular case: For, ver. 25. 'he reasoneth of righteousness, or justice, a virtue highly necessary in a ruler, and of constancy, or charity, against which Felix and his lady had greatly treasupled in their marriage, and of a judgment to come,' at which great and small shall answer to God for their actions. His discourse was uttered with such energy, that Felix, who was a very corrupt governor, was exceedingly terrified, and trembled; then dismissed Paul, saying, Acts xxiv. 25. 'Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee.' The apostle's discourse however, produced no alteration of conduct either in Felix or his lady. He continued his bad practice, all the time his government lasted; and she, trusting to her privileges as a daughter of Abraham, paid no regard to what he had heard.—Felix indeed sent for Paul, as he promised, and communed with him, not about the amendment of his life, but in hopes to receive money from him for releasing him; 26. and the rather, that Paul, in his defence, had mentioned his bringing alms and offerings to his nation. However, his deliverance by money not being attempted, for a reason too obvious to be mentioned, Felix kept him in prison the two remaining years of his government; and when leaving the province did not release him, wishing to please the great men among the Jews, who earnestly desired to have Paul put to death.

Festus succeeds Felix in the Government of Judea. He sits in judgment on Paul; hears the accusation of the Jews, and Paul's defence; and pronounces he will go up to Jerusalem, and be judged by him there. Paul appeals from Festus to the Emperor.

FELIX was succeeded in the government of Judea by Porcius Festus, who went up to Jerusalem three days after he landed at Cæsarea.—While Festus was in Jerusalem, Acts xxv. 3. 'the high-priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against Paul, and besought him, 4. And desired favour against him, (see ver. 15,) that he would send him for Jerusalem, laying wait in the way to kill him, (Acts xxv. 5.) But Festus,' knowing their design, answered, that Paul should be kept at Cæsarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither; and ordered them to go down with him, and accuse him there. Accordingly, the day after his arrival in Cæsarea, he set in judgment on Paul; and the Jews who had come from Jerusalem, standing round, 7. 'said many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove; (see ver. 18, 19.) 8. While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended any thing at all.' But Festus, to gratify the Jews, asked Paul if he would go to Jerusalem and be judged by him, concerning these things, in the presence of the chief priests and elders, who understood them much better than he did ! To this Paul replied, That he was standing at Cæsar's judgment-seat, where, as being a Roman, he ought to be tried; that Festus knew he had done no wrong to the Jews; that if he was an evil-doer he did not refuse to die; but that, if he was innocent, it would be wrong even in the governor to make a gift of his life to the Jews, by sending him to Jerusalem to be judged in the presence of his inveterate enemies, who by their clamour and threatenings might oblige Festus to condemn him. Wherefore, to prevent that injury, Paul, as being a Roman citizen, appealed from Festus to Cæsar, (No. XXXI.), and by so doing put a stop to any further proceedure concerning his life in Judea; for, after conferring with his council, (No. XIII.), Festus declared in the Court, that Paul should be sent to Caesar in consequence of his appeal.

Chap. IX.—Paul's History, from the time of his Appeal to his embarking for Italy to prosecute his Appeal before the Emperor.

Caesar gives an Account of Paul's Cause to King Agrippa, who desires to hear Paul's Defence from his own mouth.

Now long after this, King Agrippa (No. XXXII.) and his sister Bernice came to Cesarea to pay their respects to Festus, who had succeeded their brother-in-law Felix in the province. Acts xxv. 14. 'And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king.' For as the crime of which he was accused wholly to the Jewish religion, in which the king was very knowing, Festus wished to have his opinion upon it; and for that purpose began by telling him, that Felix had left Paul in bonds, and that the chief priests and elders at Jerusalem had desired him to condemn him: Acts xxv. 16. 'To whom I answered, It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die till he is condemned after a fair trial. And therefore, having sat in judgment upon him in Cesarea, when his accusers stood up, they did not lay any of those crimes to his charge which I opposed.' 19. But had certain questions against him of his own religion, and of one Jesus which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. 20. And because I was in doubt about such questions, whether they were dangerous to the state and punishable, and whether I was a competent judge of them, 'I asked him if he was willing to go to Jerusalem, where I could have the advice of persons skilled in the Jewish religion, and there be judged of these matters' But he refused to be judged there, and appealed to Caesar.

Agrippa hearing these things, Acts xxv. 23. 'said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself.' This demand the king made, because he was well acquainted with the religious tenets, disputes, and expectations of the Jews, and because many wonderful things had been reported to him concerning Jesus and his disciples. Perihos also he may have remembered, how his father, who was a zealous Jew, had been so displeased with this sect as to put the apostle James to death. But whatever was his reason, he obtained his desire: 'To-morrow, said Festus, thou shalt hear him.'

Paul is brought into the place of hearing at Cesarea, and makes his defence before King Agrippa, Queen Bernice, the Ladies who attended her, the Tribunals, and the principal Inhabitants of Cesarea.

Festus accordingly performed his promise to the king. Acts xxv. 23. 'For on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp' of apparel, attendants, guards, &c. 'and was entered into the place of hearing, with the Tribunals and principal men of the city, at Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth.' Then Festus, rising up, made an elegant speech to the assembly, in which he declared, that at the former trial no crime had been proved against the prisoner; but that having appealed to Caesar, he had brought him forth, that after a second examination he might have something more certain to write to the emperor, concerning the crimes laid to the prisoner's charge. Acts xxvi. 1. 'Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself.' Upon this, 'Paul stretched forth his hand,' to draw the attention of the assembly, and declared. He thought himself happy in being allowed to the accusers of the Jews, to be before one so expert in the Jewish laws and religion as the king. This he said, because if Agrippa expressed a favourable opinion of his doctrine before Festus and the Tribunes, it would be of great service to the Christian cause. Then, in the hearing of this illustrious king, he called on all the Jews present to bear witness, (No. XXXIII.) that he had received his education at Jerusalem, and had early professed himself a Pharisee: That he now stood as a criminal, for testifying the resurrection of Jesus, and for believing that God would raise the dead, as he promised to the fathers: ver. 7. 'Unto which happiness,' said he, 'our twelve tribes, by serving God day and night, hope to come.' That formerly, from a principle of conscience, he was a great enemy to Jesus of Nazareth and to his disciples, Acts xxvi. 11. 'and being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them even unto strange cities;' and, in particular, he went to Damascus for that purpose, 'with authority and commission from the chief priests.' But that Jesus himself appeared to him at mid-day, as he drew nigh to the city, and spake to him, and convinced him that he was risen from the dead, as his disciples affirmed. Moreover, Jesus told him that he had appeared to him to make him a witness and a preacher of his resurrection; and that he now sent him to the Gentiles, 'to open their eyes,' Acts xix. Whereupon, O king, having bad this convincing evidence of the resurrection of Jesus, 'I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but preached first to the Jews of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judæa, and then to the Gentiles.' But the Jews being enraged at me, for promising salvation to the Gentiles through Jesus, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses, they, Acts xxvi. 1. 'caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.' But God having preserved me, Acts xxvi. 1. 'I continue to this day witnessing, both to small and great,' that Jesus of Nazareth is risen from the dead, and that he is the Christ. And in affirming these facts, I say 'no other things than those which Moses and the prophets did say should come;' Acts xxvi. 17. 'That the Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead' to die no more,' and should shew light to the people and to the Gentiles; Acts xxvi. 17. 'so that, instead of being a conqueror, the Christ, according to Moses and the prophets, was to be a teacher of true religion both to Jews and Gentiles.—

When Festus the governor heard Paul speak of Christ's shewing light to the Gentiles, he considered it as a mere chimera, produced in Paul's brain by his too great application to the study of the Jewish learning; and therefore he interrupted him, saying, Acts xxvi. 24. 'with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.' Paul replied, 'I am not mad, most noble Festus;' and appealed to the king, as fully acquainted, not only with the doctrine of Moses and the prophets concerning the Christ, but with the miracles, death, and resurrection of Jesus. Acts xxvi. 24. 'For this thing was not done in a corner.' Then turning to Agrippa, he said, Acts xxvi. 27. 'King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.' Paul knew Agrippa to be of the sect of the Pharisees; for his father, being a zealous Jew, had educated him in the Jewish religion, according to its strictest form. Acts xxvi. 23. 'Then Agrippa said to Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.' Paul's doctrine concerning Jesus of Nazareth appeared so conformable to the things written concerning the Christ by Moses and the prophets, and his testimony concerning the appearing of Jesus to him by the way was rendered so probable by the total alteration of his sentiments and conduct, that Agrippa declared he was almost persuaded of the truth of the things which he affirmed concerning Jesus. On this new subject of vindicating himself, and the cause which he was engaged, the apostle spake with such effect, that the king the governor, and the governor's council, ver. 31. 'going aside, talked between themselves, saying, This man doth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.' After which Agrippa, not in the least offended with Paul for having spoken to him so freely, came forward, and, 32. 'said to Festus,' in the hearing of the whole assembly, 'This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Caesar.'—Paul's appeal, however, was perfectly proper at the time he made it, seeing Festus had shown an inclination to gratify the Jews by proposing to judge him in Jerusalem. And now, although Agrippa, with the consent of Festus, had declared that Paul might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Caesar, Paul very prudently did not withdraw his appeal, because he foresaw, that by the solicitations and threatenings of the chief priests and elders, Festus might be constrained, contrary to his inclination, to put him to death, even as Pilate formerly had been constrained, contrary to his conscience, to put Jesus to death.

Remarks on Paul's Defences before the Multitude, the Jewish Council, the Governors Felix and Festus, and King Agrippa.

Thus it appears, that besides the defence which Paul made from the top of the stairs to the multitude in Jerusalem, he at four different times, before the highest courts of judicature in Judea, defended the gospel, and his own conduct in preaching it, in the most public manner;—namely, 1. Before the Jewish council, consisting of the high-priest, the chief priests, the whole estate of the elders, and the scribes, who all sat as his accusers.—2. Before Felix the Roman governor, at whose tribunal the high-priest Ananias, and the elders from Jerusalem, were likewise his accusers; and employed a Roman barrister to plead against him.—3. Before Festus the governor; on which occasion the Jews from Jerusalem stood forth, a third time, as his accusers.—4. Before King Agrippa, Bernice, the Tribunes, and the principal persons of Caesarea, with many others, in whose presence Paul boldly asserted his own innocence, with such a strength of evidence, that both Agrippa and Festus declared he might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to the emperor.

Now, it is to be observed, 1. That at these different trials, although Paul was accused of sedition and heresy, and the profanation of the temple, it clearly appeared that the only offences which with truth could be laid to his charge were—his being a ring-leader of the sect of the Nazarenes; his joining them in affirming that Jesus, whom the rulers at Jerusalem had crucified, was risen from the dead, and was thereby demonstrated to be both Lord and Christ; also his worshipping God through the mediation of Jesus, who was now risen from the dead.—These things the chief priests and elders construed into the crimes of sedition, heresy, and profanation, most unjustly; for though Paul affirmed that Jesus is Lord, this doctrine had no tendency to sedition, since at the same time he taught that Christ's kingdom is not of this world. Next, as to his worshipping God through the mediation of Jesus, it was no heresy, being agreeable to the doctrine of Moses and the prophets. And with respect to his having profaned the temple, it was a mere calumny, which had not the least foundation in truth. 2. At these different trials, the high-priest and elders, who were all present, did not, either in their own council or before the Roman governors, so much as once attempt to contradict what Paul publicly and directly affirmed concerning the resurrection of Jesus. And yet, if his affirmation had been a falsehood, it might easily have been disproved, as the resurrection of Jesus was said to have happened in Jerusalem, where his accusers commonly resided.

3. At all these trials, Paul offered a proof of the resurrection of Jesus which could not be gainsaid. He knew, that, both by education and principle, he himself was at the first a furious enemy of the Christians, and had persecuted them to death. Nay, he told them he did so by authority and commission from themselves: But that in going to Damascus, to bring the Christians bound in fetters to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to him on the way, and thereby convinced him that he was risen from the dead; and ordered him to preach his resurrection both to the Jews and to the Gentiles. And having so done ever after that, notwithstanding he thereby exposed himself to innumerable evils, all impartial persons who heard him must have been convinced, that so total a change of sentiment and conduct, in a person of his acknowledged sense and education, could not have happened, unless Jesus had really appeared to him, as he constantly affirmed.

4. And lastly, it deserves particular notice, that these public defences, whereby the Christian cause was so well established, Paul would have had no opportunity of making, if the Romans had not governed in Judea at that time. For the injurious and violent disposition which the Jews on every occasion displayed against the disciples of Jesus, would have led them to put Paul to death at the first hearing, if the supreme power had been in their hands. We may therefore believe it was owing to the particular providence of God, that Paul was apprehended and tried while the Romans exercised the supreme power in Judea; for they all along behaved towards him in a fair and impartial manner, as magistrates who had to answer for their conduct at the imperial tribunal. So that at all his trials he had an opportunity of speaking freely in defence of the gospel, and of his own conduct, in the hearing of his enemies, who were the chief of the Jews, and who had it in their power to contradict him, and no doubt would have contradicted him, if the things he affirmed had been falsehoods. And though it may seem strange, that when Paul's innocence was so clearly proved, and even acknowledged by his judges, he was not released, it should be remembered, that this failure of justice in the Roman magistrates was owing to the powerful influence of the people of the country, to whose inclinations governors, who are strangers, are obliged to shew too much regard, from political considerations.

Chap. X.—Festus having determined to send Paul to Italy by sea, with the other prisoners who were to be judged by the Emperor, they all embark at Caesarea with the Centurion and Soldiers appointed to guard them. Luke and Aristarchus go aboard with them, resolved to accompany Paul to Rome. They are all shipwrecked on the Island of Mâëth, where Paul works many miracles.

The apostle having, by appeal, transferred his cause to the emperor, Festus determined to send him to Italy by sea; and for that purpose delivered him, with certain other persons who were also to be judged at Rome, to one Julius, a centurion of the Italian legion. All these prisoners, with the soldiers who guarded them, went aboard a ship of Adramyttium, and sailed from Caesarea in the autumn of A. D. 59.

From the history it appears, that the messengers of the churches, who accompanied Paul into Judea with the collections, Acts xxi. 4, were not intimidated by the evils which the Jewish rage brought upon him in Jerusalem.
For, while he continued there, they remained with him; and when he was sent a prisoner to Cæsarea, they followed him thither; and in both places ministered to him, and perhaps attended him at his trials. And when it was determined to send him to Italy, two at least of these affectionate friends went in the same ship with him, namely, Luke the writer of the Acts, as appears from the style of his history, and Aristarchus the Thessalonian, Acts xvii. 2. Aristarchus had accompanied the apostle in some of his former journeys, Acts xix. 29, and being one of the messengers of the churches who were appointed to attend Paul with the collections to Jerusalem, he went with him into Greece, and abode with him there, while he received the collections from the churches of Achaia; then returned with him into Macedonia, where Luke joined them at Philippi; after which they all sailed with the apostle into Judæa.

The day after Paul and his company loosed from Cæsarea, the ship in which they sailed happening to touch at Sidon, Julius, who was a person of singular humanity, allowed Paul to go ashore, and refresh himself with the brethren in that city; a favour which must have been peculiarly acceptable to one who had been so long in prison. After that, loosing from Sidon, they sailed to Myra, a city of Lycia; and there finding a ship of Alexandria, bound for Italy with a lading of wheat, they went aboard, and arriving at Cæsarea, they put in at a port called The Fair Havens; where staying some days, the centurion no doubt, as at Sidon, allowed Paul to go ashore: in which case, we may suppose he preached Christ to all who came to him.

In this port the apostle advised them to winter, because sailing was now become dangerous, on account of the long dark nights, and the tempestuous weather usual at that season: for the fast of the seventh month or anniversary expiation was now past. But the master and the owner of the vessel not thinking the Fair Havens a safe harbour, they set out for one judged more commodious; and had proceeded a little way, when there arose a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon, which soon increased into a hurricane; so that not being able to bear up against the storm, they let the ship drive, and were exceedingly tossed for many days, without seeing either the sun or stars.—Acts xxvii. 20. And now, when all hope was gone, an angel of God appeared to Paul by night, and assured him that there should be no loss of any man's life, but of the ship: 'Howbeit they were to be cast on a certain island.' This revelation Paul communicated to all in the ship, and thereby encouraged them. At length, when the fourteenth night from their leaving the Fair Havens was come, they drew near to land; and by break of day were driven on an island in the Adriatic Sea, named Meliti. On that occasion the soldiers proposed to kill the prisoners, fearing they might swim out and escape. But Julius, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose, Acts xxvii. 43. 'And commanded that they which could swim, should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land, and the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship; and so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land;' not one life being lost, although there were in the ship no fewer than two hundred and seventy-six persons, ver. 37.

When they came ashore, Acts xxviii. 1. 'they knew that the island was called Meliti.' No. XXXIV.—The people of Meliti, though reckoned by the Greeks and Romans barbarians, on account of their ignorance of the Greek and Latin languages, shewed them no small kindness; for they received them in a very friendly manner, by giving them all the assistance in their power, and kindling a fire for them, because of the rain and cold. But a viper happening to fasten on Paul's hand, as he laid a bundle of sticks on the fire, the islanders, who saw him with his chain on, supposed him some murderer who had escaped the sea, but whom (Nepos, the divine justice did not allow to live. However, when they saw him shake off the beast without receiving any harm, they altered their opinion, and said he was a god.—On this occasion, the promise which Jesus made to his disciples was fulfilled: Mark xvi. 18. 'They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them.' It happened that the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius, had his estate in the quarter where the ship was stranded. This excellent person invited them to his house, and lodged them three days, till they could all be disposed of properly through the island. To such goodness Paul was happy to be able to make some return. For the father of Publius, Acts xxvii. 8. 'lying sick of a fever and bloody flux, he went in to him, and laying his hands upon him, healed him. 9. So when this was done, others also who had diseases in the island came, and were healed.' The sick people were who were thus miraculously cured, together with their friends and relations, grateful to Paul, performed to him, and to all them who were with him, during their abode in the island, every office of kindness in their power; and at their departure laded them with such things as were necessary for their voyage.

Paul's Voyage from Meliti to Puteoli. His Journey from Puteoli by land to Rome. His reception and confinement in Rome. The Centurion's behaviour to Paul described and praised.

And now, having abode in Meliti three months, they went aboard a ship of Alexandria which had wintered in the island, and sailed to Syracuse, the chief city of Sicily, where they remained three days; then came to Rhegium, a town on the Italian shore opposite to Messana in Sicily; and from thence to Puteoli, a great seaport town of Campania, not far from Naples. Here finding brethren to whom Paul was known, at least by his face, they entreated him to tarry with them; and Justinus and Julius was so good as to grant their request. After which Julius set out with the prisoners and soldiers for Rome, by land. And now the brethren in that city, to whom Paul was well known by his latter letters written to the Romans, hearing that he was on the road, came out to meet him; being not ashamed of his bonds. Some of them therefore came as far as to the town of Appi Forus, which was fifty-one miles from that city; and others, to Tres Tabernae, a town at the distance of thirty miles, which afterwards became a bishop's see. This unlooked-for testimony of respect from the brethren of Rome, making a strong impression upon the apostle's mind, he thanked God for it, and took courage, being greatly refreshed by the company and conversation of such affectionate friends; after which they all went forward to the city, where it is supposed they arrived in the February of A. d. 60, in the seventh year of the reign of the emperor Nero.

The humanity with which Julius all along treated the apostle from the time he was delivered to him, merits particular attention. At Sidon he allowed him to go ashore to visit his Christian friends: And when they were shipwrecked on the island of Meliti, he kept the soldiers from killing the prisoners, that he might save Paul: And because some brethren at Puteoli wished Paul to remain with them a week, he was so good as to grant their desire: And, as this worthy person is said by Luke to have courteously entreated Paul through the whole of the voyage, he may have bestowed on him favours which are not particularly mentioned. Those, however, which are mentioned deserve notice, as proofs of esteem, the love from a brethren, very honourable to the apostle.—Julius's esteem of Paul was founded at first on the favourable opinion which Festus, Agrippa, and the Tribes, had formed of his cause, and which no doubt they made known to Julius before he left Cæsarea. But his esteem of the apostle must have increased by what he himself observed in the course of their acquaintance. For in his conversation Paul expressed such just views of God and religion, and of all the duties of morality, and in his actions showed such benevolence to mankind, and such a concern for their real interest, as could not fail to endear him to so great a friend to virtue as this centurion seems to have been. Besides, if Paul was represented to Julius as one who could work miracles, that circumstance alone would induce him to treat him with great respect; and more especially, when he became himself a witness to the accomplishment of Paul's prediction concerning their shipwreck, and to the miraculous cure which he performed on the sick in the island of Miletus. Julius therefore having so great a friendship for Paul, and it may be a favourable opinion of the Christian doctrine, we may suppose, that when he delivered the prisoner, Marcus Burrhus, who was then Praetorian prefect, he did justice to Paul, by representing him, not only as entirely innocent of any real crime, but as a man of singular probity, who was highly favoured of God, and endowed with extraordinary powers. To this representation, as well as to Festus's letter, I think the apostle was indebted for the indulgence which was shown him immediately on his arrival at Rome. For he was not shut up in a common jail with the other prisoners, but from the very first was allowed to dwell in his own hired house, with a soldier who kept him by means of a chain fastened to his right wrist and to the soldier's left arm. This is the chain of which Paul so often speaks in his epistles, calling it his bonds; and which he shewed to the Jews, when they came to him on the third day after his arrival.

Paul sends for the chief of the unbelieving Jews in Rome to his Lodging, and explains to them the Cause of his Imprisonment; but with little Success.

The apostle's confinement at Rome being thus easy from the beginning, and every one that pleased having access to him, it came into his mind, that as the unbelieving Jews might be offended, when they heard he had appealed from the courts in Judea to Cæsar, it would be very proper to make an apology to them. Wherefore, on the third day after his arrival at Rome, he called the chief of the unbelieving Jews together; and when they were come, he said to them, Acts xxviii. 17. 'Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans: 18. Who, when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me. 19. But when the Jews spake against me, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar;' adding, that he had done so, not because he had any thing to accuse his nation of to the emperor, but merely to assert his own innocence. And therefore he had called them together, to tell them that he was bound with the chain they saw on his wrist, because he affirmed that God had accomplished the hope of Israel, by sending the Christ. 21. 'And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came shewed or spake any evil of thee.' It seems the apostle's accusers had not yet arrived. However, desiring his opinion concerning the sect of the Christians, which they told him 'was everywhere spoken of, and that they appointed him a day, and many came into his lodging. Acts xxviii. 22. 'To whom he expounded* and testified the kingdom of God: he expounded the nature of the Messiah's kingdom, and testified that it was come in the gospel dispensation: 'Persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening.' I think, in a long discourse, he shewed that the birth, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, had all happened exactly according to the predictions concerning the Christ contained in the law and the prophets; and from that agreement inferred, that Jesus was their long expected Messiah. 24. 'And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not. 25. And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed; after Paul had spoken one word, or quotation from Isaiah, in which the Jews' unbelief was foretold. And having thus reproved the unbelieving and disobedient among his hearers, he added, 28. 'Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it. 28. And when he had said these words the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.' For notwithstanding all Paul had said, many of them still retained their sinful and inveterate prejudices against the gospel.

Luke having thus brought Paul's history down to his arrival at Rome, and having related what happened to him at his first coming, adds a short description of his two years' confinement in that city: Acts xxviii. 30. 'And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came unto him. 31. Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.' This singular indulgence, of preaching the gospel without being hindered by any person, Paul enjoyed during the whole of his two years' imprisonment at Rome, because he preached only in his own hired house, and to those who came to him of their own accord. Whereas, if in Rome, as at Ephesus and the other great cities where he suffered persecution, he had gone about publicly preaching against the established idolatry, in all probability both the priests and the people would have been enraged; and of course the magistrate might have been obliged to interpose. These evils however the apostle avoided. For though he was brought to Rome, by the direction of God, for the purpose of bearing witness there concerning the Lord Jesus, it was not his business to speak to the Roman citizens. Wherefore, when he was publicly preaching against the established idolatry, he left them alone, to go about gathering the people to hear the gospel, as in places where he was utterly unknown. His fame as a preacher of the new doctrine, and as a worker of miracles, had reached Rome long before he arrived there, having been published by those who came from the provinces of Greece and Asia. Besides, his imprisonment itself, for preaching doctrines and attesting facts so contrary to the common experience of mankind, made a great noise, as the apostle himself intimates, Phil. i. 29. 13. Wherefore, seeing Paul's house was open to every comer, it is not to be doubted that many resorted to him daily, some out of curiosity to hear and see the chief of one sect which was now become so numerous, and who was said to be endowed with extraordinary powers; others, from an honest inclination seriously to inquire into the strange things which he spake concerning Jesus of Nazareth, and to examine the evidence which he offered in support of them. Now to all these the apostle willingly preached, bearing witness to Christ at Rome, even as formerly in Jerusalem. And though Luke has not mentioned it, Paul himself hath told us, that his testimony concerning Jesus was well received, and that he made many converts in Rome, among whom were some even of the emperor's domestics, whose salutation he sent to the Philippians, chap. iv. 22.—Further, he says that the brethren in Rome, encouraged by his example, perhaps also strengthened by the gifts of the Spirit, which he imparted to them according to his promise, Rom. i. 11., preached the gospel more openly and boldly than they would otherwise have done; while at the same time some of the Judaizing teachers preached with the malicious intention of adding affliction to the apostle’s bonds; namely, by provoking the magistrates against him, as the ringleader of the obnoxious sect, Philip. i. 14, 15.

An Account of the Letters which Paul wrote during his first imprisonment at Rome. He is at length set at liberty.

During his first confinement at Rome, the apostle wrote four epistles, which are still remaining,—namely, one to the Ephesians; another to the Philippians; a third to the Colossians; and the fourth to Philemon; and after his release he wrote his epistle to the Hebrews. In the epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, Timothy joined Paul: But he is not mentioned in the inscription of the epistle to the Ephesians, though it was written about the same time with the others, and sent along with the epistle to the Colossians. From this circumstance we may infer, that the letters to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon, were written a little before the letter to the Ephesians, and while Timothy was at Rome; but that after they were finished, and before the letter to the Ephesians was begun, he left the city to go to Philippi, agreeably to the apostle’s promise to the Philippians ‘to send Timothy to them soon,’ chap. ii. 19. and to what he tells the Hebrews, that Timothy was actually sent away, chap. xiii. 23. The letter to the Ephesians being written soon after that to the Colossians, and while the matter, and form, and very expressions of that letter were fresh in the apostle’s mind, the two resemble each other so much, that they have been termed twin epistles, and throw light on each other. For which reason the apostle, very properly, ordered the Colossians to cause their epistle to be read in the church of the Laodiceans, to which it is supposed the Ephesians, agreeably to the direction given them by Typhicus, sent a copy of their epistle. If I am right in this conjecture, the epistle to the Ephesians is the letter from Laodicea, which the Colossians were ordered to read in their church, Col. iv. 16.

The apostle’s letters just now mentioned show, that during his confinement in Rome he was attended by many of his faithful disciples and friends, who had either accompanied him from Judea, or who had followed him to Rome. Of this number was Typhicus, by whom the apostle sent his epistle to the Colossians, chap. iv. 17. and Onesimus, ver. 9. and Mark, Barnabas’ sister’s son, ver. 10. to whom the apostle was now fully reconciled, and Jesus called Justus; all Jews by descent, ver. 11. exerts Onesimus. About this time his faithful friend Aristarchus was imprisoned for his zeal in preaching the gospel; but his other friend, Luke, had free access to him all the time of his imprisonment. Demas, too, was with him, Col. iv. 14. and Timothy, Philip. i. 1. Besides, the churches of Greece and Asia, hearing of his imprisonment, sent some of their most esteemed members to inquire concerning his welfare, and to minister unto him. Of this number was Epaphras, who came from Colosee, and Epaphroditus from Philippi. These had a considerable time with the apostle, and gave him all the assistance in their power, especially in the work of the ministry; not to mention the good offices which he received from the Roman brethren, whose esteem and affection he had formerly experienced in their coming all the way to Appii Forum and Treês Tabernæs, to conduct him into the city.

It is now time to relate, that Paul, during his two years’ confinement at Rome, having preached the gospel with great success, and edified the churches of Greece and Asia by the divinely inspired letters which he wrote them during that period, was at length released in the spring of A. D. 62, answering to the 9th year of Nero. Luke indeed has not directly mentioned Paul’s release: But by limiting his confinement to two years, he has insinuated that he was then set at liberty. His confinement at Rome issued thus favourably through the goodness of his cause, and through the intercession of some powerful friends in Caesar’s family, who had embraced the Christian faith, and who were greatly interested in the fortune of one who was so strong a pillar of the new religion which they had espoused.

It is conjectured, that Paul was released when he wrote his epistle to the Hebrews; because he says to them, chap. xiii. 23. ‘Know ye that our brother Timothy is sent away, with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.’ Timothy, it seems, had been sent to Philippi, according to the apostle’s promise, Philip. ii. 19. and had been ordered to return as soon as possible; and the apostle was waiting his return at Rome, or rather in some of the towns of Italy, Heb. xiii. 24. when he wrote his letter to the Hebrews.

Chap. XI.—Paul’s History, from the time he was released from his first confinement at Rome, to his death.

Or Paul’s travels and preaching, between his release and martyrdom, we have no authentic record remaining. Nevertheless, from the intimations which he has given of his purposes, in the epistles which he wrote from Rome during his first confinement, we may suppose the following sketch of the transactions of the latter part of his life to bear some resemblance to the truth.

Paul sails from Italy to Judea. In his way he touches at Crete, accompanied by Titus and Timothy. Leaving Titus in Crete, he sails with Timothy to Judea.

The apostle being released in the spring of A. D. 63, (as was shown in the preface to the epistle to the Philippians,) embarked with Titus, perhaps also with Timothy, in some of the ports of Italy, designing to visit the churches of Judea according to his promise, Heb. xiii. 23. But in the course of his voyage happening to touch at Crete, he preached in many cities there; and either gathered new churches, or increased the churches already gathered.

About this time Judea was full of robbers and Sicarii, who went about in armed bands, and plundered the villages, after killing the inhabitants who made any resistance. Impostors also arose, who drew many after them, by promising to work for them miraculous deliverances. These disturbances were increased by the extreme severity of the Roman government, which exasperated the people to such a degree, that, in asserting their liberty, they raised those seditions which ended in the war.

whereby Jerusalem and the Jewish state were overthrown. The mischiefs occasioned by these disorders falling with equal weight upon the disciples of Christ as upon others, the apostle, when he received information thereof, judged his presence and advice might be necessary for supporting the brethren in Judea. Wherefore, leaving Titus in Crete, to set in order the things which were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city; Tit. i. 5, he set sail for Judea with Timothy, who, if he did not accompany him from Italy, had come to him in Crete.

Being arrived in Judea, Paul visited the church of Jerusalem, and the other churches in that country, to which he had lately sent an epistle from Rome, inscribed to the Hebrews.

Paul and Timothy travel through Syria and Cilicia, and the countries of the Lesser Asia, visiting the Churches. They abide some time at Colosse, where Paul writes his Epistle to Titus. He leaves Timothy in Ephesus, and goes into Macedonia.

After spending some time in comforting and instructing the brethren in Judea, Paul, accompanied by Timothy, left Judea, to visit the churches of the Lesser Asia, and, taking, as usual, Antioch in his way, where he had so often and so successfully ministered in the gospel. From Antioch, Paul and his assistants travelled through Cilicia into Galatia, and there, that went to Colosse, where he had desired Philemon to provide him a lodging, ver. 32, because he intended to spend some time in that city.

While the apostle abode at Colosse, he wrote his epistle to Titus in Crete. Here also he met with Tychicus, who before Paul’s release had been sent from Rome with the epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, Col. iv. 8.; for in his epistle to Titus he told him, he would send Tychicus or Artemas into Crete, that Titus might come to him at Nicopolis, where he proposed to winter. And having finished his business at Colosse, he went forward to Ephesus, in his way to Macedonia. At his departure from Ephesus, the apostle left Timothy there, to direct the affairs of the numerous church in that city, 1 Tim. i. 3.

In travelling to Macedonia the apostle came to Troas, where, lodging with keeping (g2vovx2vuo|v) the ephud, which, according to some, his father had received as the badge of his being a Roman citizen. But others think this was a bag, or bookcase, with certain books, supposed to be books of the Jewish scriptures. He left likewise some parchments with Carpus, containing, perhaps, the autographs, or original copies of his own epistles to the churches he had visited; or the epistles which he had received from the churches. These parchments he afterwards ordered Timothy to bring to him during his second imprisonment, 2 Tim. iv. 15. describing, I suppose, to acknowledge them as his writings, and to deliver them to Timothy with his own hand, to be kept for the use of the churches, after he was gone.

Paul visits the Churches in Macedonia, writes his First Epistle to Timothy, and winters at Nicopolis. From that city he goes into Crete. Leaving Crete, he goes with Titus to Rome, where he is imprisoned a second time.

In Macedonia Paul visited the several churches; and among the rest that at Philippi, which had shewn him such kindness in his former confinement. From Macedonia he went to Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12. a city of Epirus, where he spent the winter. Here Titus came to him from Crete, according to his order, Tit. iii. 12. Here also, or at Philippi, he wrote his first epistle to Timothy in Ephesus, to direct him how he ought to behave himself in the church of the living God; fearing it would not be in his power to return to Ephesus at the time he proposed when he parted with Timothy, 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15. Accordingly, the account given by Titus of the churches in Crete determining him to visit them, he changed his resolution; and instead of returning to Ephesus, he set out early in the spring from Nicopolis for Crete, accompanied by Titus, Trophimus, and Erastus; and taking Cerinthus in his way, Erastus, who was a native of that city, chose to abide there. When they arrived at Crete Trophimus fell sick, and was left in Miletus, a city of that island, 2 Tim. iv. 20.

About this time the emperor Nero began that persecution of the Christians, which is reckoned the first of the ten general persecutions. The occasion of it was this. Nero himself having set fire to the city, on the tenth of July A. D. 64, a great part of it was laid in ashes. And being generally believed the author of that calamity, he became the object of the popular hatred. Wherefore, to clear himself from the imputation of so odious a crime, Nero, in the month of November following, began to punish the Christians as the incendiaries, and treated them with such cruelty, that at length the people’s compassion towards them was raised. The torments which the Christians now endured, on account of their supposed guilt, are described by Tacitus, (Ann. lib. x. c. 44.), who informs us, that many of them being apprehended, some were covered with the skins of wild beasts, and thrown to dogs to be devoured; others were crucified; others were fastened to stakes, and daubed over with pitch, and had fire set to them, that they might burn instead of torches in the night-time. By these, and such like cruelties, the historian says (ingens multitudo) a prodigious number of Christians were destroyed.

The news of these cruelties being brought to Crete, the apostle thinking his presence might be useful in comforting the brethren, went with Titus to Italy, where they arrived about the time Nero set out for Achaia, and where the priestly prefect, who was left to govern the city in the emperor’s absence, continued the persecution with a cruelty equal to that of Nero himself. Wherefore, though the danger was great, the apostle went to Rome in the beginning of A. D. 66, where he exerted the same zeal and activity in promoting the Christian cause as formerly. But the priests and bigots pointing him out to the magistrates as a chief man among the obnoxious sect, he was apprehended and imprisoned, in order to be punished.

How long Paul continued in prison at this time, we know not. But from his being twice brought before the emperor, or his prefect, it may be presumed, that he was imprisoned a year or more before he was condemned.

Paul appears before Nero the first time. Writes his Second Epistle to Timothy, and at last suffers Martyrdom.

This danger to which Paul was exposed by this second imprisonment, appeared so great to his assistants, that most of them fled from the city. Luke alone remained with him: and even he was so intimidated, that he durst not stand by him when he made his first answer, 2 Tim. iv. 11. 16. While the apostle’s friends thus deserted him, his enemies waxed more bold; especially Alexander the Ephesian coppermith, whom formerly the apostle had delivered to Satan, for his errors and vices. This person, moved with resentment, came to Rome, and did Paul much harm, ‘by withstanding his words,’ 2 Tim. iv. 14. It seems he joined his prosecutors, and in the presence of his judges loudly contradicted the facts which Paul alleged in his own vindication. Wherefore it was with the utmost difficulty he escaped condemnation after mak ing his first defence; so that he looked for nothing but a sentence of death, when next brought before his judge.

Impressed, therefore, with a view of his approaching condemnation, Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy; in which he desired him to come to him before winter, ver. 21. and to bring Mark with him, ver. 11. that they might receive his last instructions, and assist him in the ministry during the few months he had to live. Withal, to induce Timothy the more cheerfully to come, he told him he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus, 2 Tim. iv. 12. to supply his place there.—From this epistle we learn also, that although the apostle’s assistants, terrified with the danger that threatened him, forsook him and fled, he was not altogether without consolation. For the brethren of Rome came to him privately, and ministered to him; as we learn from his sending their salutation to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 21.

Most of the particulars above mentioned the apostle hath suggested in his own letters, especially in his second to Timothy. What followed we learn from ancient Christian writers, who inform us, that Paul was condemned and put to death in the 12th year of the reign of Nero, answering to A.D. 66. And two years after that, namely A.D. 68, Nero put an end to his own life, and to this terrible persecution, after it had continued four years, and swept off a prodigious number of the disciples of Christ.

CHAP. XII.—Character and Eulogy of the Apostle Paul.

Such was the life, and such the death of Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ. In his younger years, being exceedingly zealous of the law of Moses, he persecuted the Christians as enemies of God and religion. But after Jesus appeared to him, and showed him his error in denying his resurrection, he forthwith became a zealous and indefatigable preacher of that faith which formerly he was so active in destroying. In the rolls of fame, Paul stands deservedly next to his divine Master as a teacher of religion and morality; being without comparison a greater hero by that undertaking, and much more worthy of admiration, than the greatest of those who have been called great. The bodily labour which he endured, the dangers which he encountered, the sufferings which befell him, and the courage which amidst all these evils he exerted in his apostolic office, shew that his virtues, both active and passive, were far superior to those which the most renowned conquerors have exhibited in the pursuits of ambition or fame. The end, likewise, for which he exerted such an high degree of all the virtues, was more noble; being not to amass riches, or to acquire power, or to obtain fame, or to conquer kingdoms, or to enslave mankind; but to deliver the nations of the world from the thraldom of ignorance, idolatry, and wickedness, by imparting to them the knowledge of God and of a future state, and by teaching them those duties of religion and morality, on which their happiness both in time and eternity wholly depends.

This noble, this beneficent employment, Paul prosecuted with unremitting diligence for the space of thirty years; all the while foreseeing and experiencing innumerable evils as the consequence of his generous undertaking, without reap ing from it any worldly advantage whatever. Such heroic benevolence is the more to be esteemed, that as the time Paul carried the light of the gospel through the world, mankind were involved in one thick cloud of darkness, which hindered them from discerning those spiritual matters, which, as reasonable beings designed to exist through eternity, it was of the greatest importance for them to know. Wherefore, if any person ever merits well of mankind, it is Paul, who with such unwearied activity, and with such labour and loss to himself, imparted to the nations of the world the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation.

But this most excellent man is entitled to admiration and gratitude, not from those alone who put a just value on religious knowledge, but from those also who esteem nothing but what promotes the interest of the present life. For the gospel which Paul spread through the world, hath been the source of many of those good qualities whereby such as have embraced the Christian religion have been rendered superior to all who have gone before them. More particularly, the gospel hath introduced good faith, which is the foundation of mutual confidence between nations, in their leagues and compacts; it hath banished that fierce ness with which the most civilized nations anciently carried on war; it hath diffused that humanity and complaisance, by which modern manners are so happily distinguished from the ancient. Nay, if I am not mistaken, the gospel hath, by accident, contributed to the improvement even of the sciences and the arts; for, by the great objects which it presents to the minds of men, their intellectual faculties have been enlarged and strengthened; and by the rewards of immortality which it promises, its votaries have been inspired with a sense of their own dignity, and such hopes have been infused into their breasts, as have rendered them not only just, but active, even in the affairs of this life. Let the gospel, therefore, have its due praise, which holds out distinguished rewards in the future life even to those who mingle in the affairs of the present, and who, from just principles, promote the temporal interest of their fellow creatures. Also let the blessed Paul have his praise, to whom chiefly we in this part of the world are indebted for our knowledge of the gospel, and for all the advantages, temporal and eternal, of which the gospel hath been the happy occasion to mankind.

No. I. Stirred up the most zealous members of the foreign synagogues in Jerusalem.—Virtua, de Syn. Vet. lib. i. p. 1. c. 14. tells us from Jewish authors, that there were 480 synagogues in Jerusalem. And learned men suppose, that of these a number were composed of Jews from the provinces, who chose to worship God in their native language. Lightfoot (Exercit. Acta vii. 9.) observes, that Jewish authors expressly mention a synagogue which the Alexandrian Jews had at Jerusalem. With respect to the synagogue of the Libertines, there are facts in history which show who they were. Liberitius ur Libertine is a Latin word, which signifies a slave who hath obtained his freedom; also, the son of such a person. From Philo we learn, that the 8000 Jews, who, as Josephus (Ant. xvii. 13. initio) tells us joined at Rome the embassy which came from Judea, to petition Augustus against Archelaus, were mostly of this denomination. For he expressly affirms, that the Jews at Rome were generally such as had been taken captives, but were made free by their Roman masters. Tacitus likewise speaks of the Jews, when he tells us, Ann. ii. 85. that 4000 of the Libertine race were transported into Sardinia. Besides, Iustius (Thib. c. 36.) and Josephus (Antiq. xviii. 4. fine) expressly call them Jews who were thus transported.

The Jewish Libertines being so numerous at Rome, and in Italy, it is probable that, like other foreign Jews, they had a synagogue in Jerusalem.—The members of all these foreign synagogues, being generally very zealous, were most fit instruments to be employed in opposing the disciples of Christ. Accordingly they disputed with great vehemence against Stephen. Acts vi. 9. Then there arose certain of the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexanderians, who of the city of Azes, disputing with Stephen. 10. And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake. 11. Then they suborned men, which said, we have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God. 12. And they stirred up the people,' &c.

No. II. It seems the synagogues in foreign parts had a jurisdiction over their own members.—In all the provinces of the Roman empire, the Jews were governed by a senate of their own; and where they were numerous, they had a chief magistrate, elected by themselves, who was sometimes called Anarch and, sometimes Ethnarch.

Of the nature and extent of that separate government which the Jews exercised over those of their own race, we have the most authentic account in a decree concerning the Jews of Sardin, of which Josephus has preserved a copy. Antiq. xiv. c. 10. § 17. Gen. edit. page 437. and which deserves a place here. It is as follows:—

"Lucius Antonius, son of Mark, proconsul and pretor, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Sardis, greeting. The Jews which are our citizens have shown me that they have always had an assembly of their own according to the laws of their country, and a place of their own, in which they decide the affairs and differences which concern themselves. Having desired of me that it may be lawful for them so to do, I have decreed that this (right) be preserved and permitted to them." Wherefore, Paul had reason to blame the Christians at Corinth for going to law with one another before the unbelievers, (1 Cor. vi. 5, 6,) since they might have decided these differences by their own judges. Josephus has also preserved an edict of Claudius, published in favour of the Jews in the beginning of his reign. In that edict Claudius observes, as a precedent, "That when a Jewish Ethnarch died, Augustus did not forbid the creation of a new Ethnarch; willing that all men should remain subject to him, but in the observation of their own customs." And Strabo, in a passage not now in his works, but cited by Josephus, Antiq. xiv. c. 7. § 2. says, "A good part of Alexandria is inhabited by this people, (the Jews). They have likewise an Ethnarch, who administers their affairs, decides causes, presides over contracts and mandates, as if he were the governor of a perfect republic."

The Jews, in all the provinces of the Roman empire, being thus allowed to live according to their own customs, they regulated their conduct in every thing by the law of Moses; at least as far as it was possible for them to do it out of Judea. And as the high-priest and elders at Jerusalem were regarded by all the Jews as the interpreters and administrators of the law, the foreign Jews considered themselves as actually under their jurisdiction. And therefore, in all countries, they implicitly obeyed the mandates sent them from the council at Jerusalem; just as, in after-times, the clergy of the Romish communion in every country of Europe obeyed implicitly the mandates of the Pope and conclaves of Rome.

No. III. Saul arose from the earth, and with his bodily eyes beheld Jesus standing in the way.—We are absolutely certain, that on this, or on some other occasion, Saul saw Jesus with the eyes of his body. For he hath twice affirmed that he saw Jesus in that manner. 1 Cor. xi. 1. "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" Chap. xv. 8. "Last of all, (οποιον εκεινω) he was seen of me also, as of an, abotive apostle." Now it is to be observed, that this appearance of Jesus, Paul places among his other appearances to the rest of the apostles, which, without all doubt, were personal appearances. Besides, if Saul had not seen Jesus in the body after his resurrection, he could not have been made an apostle; whose chief business it was, as an eye-witness, to bear testimony to the resurrection of Jesus from the dead.—I acknowledge, that if we were to form our opinion of this matter solely upon the account which Luke hath given of it, Acts ix. 3-6. we could not but see that Saul now saw Jesus. Yet if we attend to the words of Ananias, both as recorded in this chap. ver. 17.

"The Lord Jesus who appeared to thee (Jesus, who was seen of thee) in the way;" and as recorded Acts xii. 14. "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest—see that just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth." Also, if we consider the words of Christ,
' I have appeared to thee for this very purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness of those things which thou hast seen; and that Barnabas declared to the apostles, how he had seen the Lord in the way,' Acts ix. 27.—I say, when all these expressions are duly attended to, we shall have little doubt that Saul saw Jesus standing before him in the way, (ver. 17.), when in obedience to his command he arose from the ground; but, not being able to endure the splendour of his appearance, or perhaps the better to express his reverence, he fell to the earth anew, and remained before him in that posture, till Christ ordered him to arise a second time, and go into the city: where it should be told him what he was to do Acts ix. 6. Then it was, that, opening his eyes, he found himself absolutely blind.—This, I suppose, is a better account of Saul's seeing Jesus after his resurrection, than with some to affirm, that he saw him in his trance in the temple, or in his rapture into the third heaven. For on neither of those occasions did Saul see Jesus with his bodily eyes; the impression, at those times, having been made upon his mind by the power of Christ, and not by means of his external senses; so that he would not have been qualified by such a vision to attest Christ's resurrection from the dead. I know that Paul had another corporeal sight of Jesus, namely, after he had made his defence before the council, Acts xxiii. 11. But as the first epistle to the Corinthians, in which Paul affirm'd that he had seen the Lord, was written before he was favoured with that second corporeal sight of Jesus, he cannot be thought in that epistle to have spoken of an event which had not then happened.

No. IV. That thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.—From Ananias administering baptism to Saul, Acts ix. 18, it would seem that he was one of the prophets or teachers of the church of Damascus. He may likewise have possessed the gift of healing diseases; and in that character may have been sent to restore Paul's sight. But he told him likewise, he was sent that he might be filled with the Holy Ghost. Nevertheless, from the other examples recorded in the Acts, and from the passages in the epistles where the communication of the spiritual gifts is mentioned, and from Acts viii. 14, 15, 17, it appears, that more but apostles had the power of conferring the Holy Ghost on believers. For, when Philip had converted the Samaritans, the apostles at Jerusalem sent unto them Peter and John, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Wherefore, if Ananias, who was not an apostle, really conferred the Holy Ghost on Saul, he did it by virtue of a special commissioner; and having accomplished what was appointed him, his power ended with the fulness of his commission. From the history, however, we cannot gather that any such commission was given to Ananias. And therefore we may interpret his words to Saul in this manner: The Lord Jesus hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and when thou hast received thy sight, that thou mightest, by an immediate impulse, be filled with the Holy Ghost. According to this way of understanding the matter, Saul received his sight when Ananias spake to him and put his hands on him, Acts ix. 12.; but he did not receive the Holy Ghost till he was baptized; and then, by some visible symbol which Saul saw, the Holy Ghost fell upon him, as upon the apostles at the beginning. So that he was not a whit behind the very greatest apostles, as he himself affirms: being baptized, not with water only, but with the Holy Ghost and with fire, according to John Baptist's prediction. Besides, if an inferior prophet, or even an apostle, had been employed to communicate the Holy Ghost to Saul, that circumstance would have been urged as an argument to prove Saul an apostle of an inferior order: whereas, in the manner we have supposed him to have received the Holy Ghost, no argument could be drawn in prejudice of his authority. An ordinary prophet was sent to give Saul premonition of his being to receive the Holy Ghost. This, with the recovery of his sight, gave him the fullest assurance that what had befallen him by the way was no illusion, but a real appearance. To conclude, the supposition that the Holy Ghost was communicated to Paul by an immediate impulsion, will appear still more probable, if the observation of many commentators is just, that the phrase filled with the Holy Ghost is never applied in scripture to those who received the Holy Ghost by the imposition of the hands of men, but to those on whom the Holy Ghost descended in some visible symbol.

No. V. When Saul was about thirty-four years of age.—The time of Saul's conversion may be determined, with a good degree of probability, in the following manner:—When the brethren at Jerusalem sent him forth to Tarsus, it is said, Acts xi. 31. 'Then had the churches rested throughout all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria, and were edified.' If this rest of the churches throughout all the land, which the historian hath connected with Saul's going to Tarsus, was occasioned, learned men and chronologists have thought, by the publication of the Emperor Caius's order to set up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem, we can nearly determine the time of Saul's conversion. For Josephus tells us, (Ant. xviii. 9, al. 11.) That 'Caius, greatly incensed against the Jews for not paying him that respect which others did, sent Petronius governor into Syria, commanding him to set up his statue in the temple, and if the Jews opposed it, to march into the country with an army, and effect it by force.' The same historian adds, (Bell. xi. 10. § 1.), "That he enjoined him, if the Jews opposed it, to put to death all who made any resistance, and to make all the rest of the nation slaves; Petronius, therefore, marched from Antioch into Judea with three legions, and a large body of auxiliaries raised in Syria." Now it is allowed, that Caius sent Petronius into Syria in the third year of his reign, answering to a. n. 39. And it is supposed he came into the province in the autumn of 39, or in the beginning of a. n. 40.

Wherefore, as the publication of Caius's order affected the whole people of Judea, we may suppose with Lardner, that it threw the unbelieving Jews into such a consternation, that they had no leisure to think of persecuting the Christians any longer. A disaster befalling themselves, which threatened destruction to their religion, perhaps to their nation; so that they were wholly possessed by their own fears. Our Saul seems to have been the last who was hurt by the persecution which had wasted the church after the death of Stephen. For the historian having narrated the attempt of the Grecians to kill him, and the care of the brethren to save his life by sending him away, adds, 'Then had the churches rest.' Saul therefore set out for Tarsus in the year 39, a little before Petronius published the emperor's order.

Further, according to Saul's own account, his arrival at Jerusalem, before he went to Tarsus, happened full three years after his conversion, Gal. i. 18. Wherefore, if the rest of the churches was occasioned by the publication of Caius's order in the end of a. n. 39, or in the beginning of a. n. 40, Saul's conversion, three years before, must have happened in the end of the year 36, or in the beginning of 37, when he was 34 years of age; a time of life at which men are as qualified to judge of religious matters as at any time whatever.—That Saul was not more than 34 years of age when he was converted, may be gathered likewise from his being called a young man at the time of Stephen's death, which happened, as is generally believed, A.D. 35, about a year before Saul's conversion. To 34, Saul's age A.D. 35, add the 35 years which elapse from that time to A.D. 52, when he wrote his epistle to Philemon, and he will then have been 59 or 60 years old, and so might very properly then call himself Paul the aged. But if he was more than 60 when he wrote that letter, he must have been more than 54 at his conversion.

No. VI. Straitway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.—Learned men are not agreed, whether this preaching in the synagogues of Damascus happened before Saul went into Arabia, or after he returned there. They who think it happened after his return, found their opinion on the following argument:—If Saul had begun to preach in Damascus before he went into Arabia, he probably would have preached in that country also. And yet, in the account which he gave of his preaching to Agrippa, he does not say that he preached in Arabia at all, Acts xxvi. 30. Besides, if Paul had preached in Damascus before he went into Arabia, the news thereof must have reached Jerusalem before he went thither himself, and, by consequence, the brethren there could not have been ignorant of his being a disciple.—They who think Saul preached in Damascus before he went into Arabia, found their opinion on the account which Luke has given of the matter Acts ix. 19. 'And when he had received meat, he was strengthened. Then was Saul with the disciples certain days at Damascus; and straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues.' Now, though it does not necessarily follow from the expression 'straightway he preached,' that this happened a few days after his conversion, yet they think the remark which the Jews at Damascus made on Saul's preaching shows that it so happened: ver. 21. 'But all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound to the chief priests?'—To the argument taken from Luke's expression, 'straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues,' it is replied, That the sacred historians often relate things as connected, which happened at a considerable distance of time from each other, and between which things intervened which they did not think proper to relate. See examples of this manner of recording events, 2 Chron. xxxii. 37, Observe, iii. prefixed to my Harmony of the Gospels. Next, with respect to the remark which the Jews at Damascus made on Saul's preaching Christ, every reader must be sensible that it might as properly be said of him as of his family settled there, after being driven from Rome by Claudius's edict, which was published in the eleventh year of his reign. But according to the best chronologers, the eleventh year of Claudius began January A.D. 41. Wherefore, although his decree was published in the beginning of that year, Aquila could not be settled in Corinth sooner than the end of the spring 51. See Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 1. Consequently, Paul did not arrive till autumn. And having abode at Corinth a year and six months, he sailed to Caesarea in spring 53; then went up and saluted the church of Jerusalem, after which he went down to Antioch; and having spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order; and so came to Ephesus.

His voyage from Corinth to Caesarea, and his journey by land from Jules to Ephesus, may have been performed in a year and ten months, so that if the apostle left Co-inith in the beginning of spring, he may have come to Ephesus in the end of the year 54. At Ephesus he abode two years and three months, then went over to Macedonia, where he arrived early in the year 57. In Macedonia he wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians, (2 Cor. vii. 6, vii. 18.), after which, travelling through Macedonia, he preached on the borders of Illyricum, Rom. xv. 19. These transactions would take up all the spring and summer, and part of the autumn of the year 57. The apostle after that went into Greece to receive the collections which the churches of Achaia had made for the brethren in Jules. For it is said, Acts xx. 2, 3. 'Having gone over those parts, and given them much exhortation, he came into Greece, and there abode three months. During his abode in Greece he wrote his epistle to the Romans at Corinth, not long before he set out for Jerusalem with the collection. But in this voyage he proposed to sail from Cenchrea. But the Jews lying in wait for him there, he changed his purpose, returned to Macedonia, and arrived at Philippi about the time of the passover in the year 58. For after the days of unleavened bread he left Philippi, and took ship to sail into Syria, Acts xx. 6.'

I now put the reader in mind of what Paul himself tells us, 2 Cor. xii. 2. 4. namely, that he was carried up into the third heaven, more than 14 years before he wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians. Wherefore that epistle being written in the beginning of the year 57, (See Pref. to 2 Cor. sect. 3.), his rapture, 14 years before, must have happened in the end of A.D. 42, or in the beginning of 43, full seven years before the council of Jerusalem, which was held in the end of A.D. 50, (No. XXII.) But the council of Jerusalem happened about 14 years after Saul's conversion, Gal. i. 1. perhaps 14 years wanting some months; so that by this compatation likewise, Saul was converted in the end of A.D. 36. Three years after his conversion he went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, viz. in the end of A.D. 39; and having abode with him 15 days, he was sent forth to Tarsus in Cilicia, in which country Barnabas found him towards the end of A.D. 45, (No. IX.), about three years after his rapture; which, as is said above, happened in the end of 45, or in the beginning of 44, consequently six years after his conversion.

No. VIII. And Antioch. Anciently there were many cities of the name of Antioch. But this was the metropolis of Syria, and indeed of all the East, being little inferior in magnitude and populoseness to Alexandria in Egypt, or even to Rome itself. It was built by Seleucu-cus, one of Alexander's successors, who named it after his son Antiochus, and peopled it with Greeks. But many Jews also settled there. For Josephus tells us, Bell. vii. c. 3, § 3. 'That the kings of Syria allowed the Jews the freedom of Antioch equally with the Greeks, so that their numbers increased exceedingly; and that they were always bringing over a great many of the Greeks to their religious worship, whom they made in some sort a part of themselves.'—Antioch was celebrated for the beauty of its situation, the magnificence of its buildings, the extensiveness of its commerce, and the learning and ingenuity of its inhabitants. Hence Cicero, in an oration for the poet Archias, a native of Antioch, says, c. 3, "Primum Antiochius (nam ibi natus, loco nobili, celebri quondam urbe et copioso, atque eruditissimis hominibus liberalissimisque studiosis adstante) celebriter antecellere omnibus gloriam, qui in multa res pervenit."—But what Antioch was thus famous for learning and the arts, the manners of its inhabitants were exceedingly corrupted by its vicinity to Daphne, a village in the neighbourhood, where, under the pretext of religion, all manner of sensuality was practised, in so much that the manners of those who frequented Daphne became proverbial. But however famous Antioch was for the circumstances mentioned by the orator, it became more famous for its having the light of the gospel so early bestowed on it, and for that numerous Christian church which was early planted there, and for its giving the name of Christians to the disciples. On the other hand, it brought no small honour to the gospel, that such a numerous church was so early gathered in Antioch from among a people so intelligent, and who at the same time were so dissolute, but who changed their manners after they embraced the gospel. — The Christian religion flourished to such a degree in Antioch for many ages, that it obtained the name of ἀσκρίνια, the city of God. And the church there was considered as the first, and chief of all the Gentile churches.

No. IX. After he had been about five years in Cilicia, — That Saul abode five years in Cilicia and the neighbouring countries, may be proved in the following manner. He was sent forth from Jerusalem to Tarsus, full three years after his conversion: Then, 14 years wanting some months after his conversion, he went to Jerusalem to the council, in the end of A. D. 49, or in the beginning of A. D. 50. Wherefore, between these two events, there elapsed somewhat more than 10 years. Of these 10 years, Saul spent five years with Barnabas, after they left Tarsus; as any one may know who considers the account which Luke has given of their joint labours. For on leaving Tarsus they came to Antioch, where they assembled with the church a whole year; Acts xi. 36. After this, they went up to Jerusalem with the alms of the brethren of Antioch; and having finished that ministry, they returned to Antioch, where they abide till the Holy Ghost commanded the prophets of Antioch to separate them for the work to which he had called them, Acts xiii. 2. Upon this, going down to Seleucia, a seaport town on the Orontes, they sailed to Cyprus; and having travelled that island, they came to Paphos, and from thence sailed to Pamphylia; and having preached in that country, they went into Pisidia, and from thence into Lycaonia, preaching the gospel, and planting churches in all the great cities. In Iconium particularly they are said to have ‘abode long time,’ Acts xiv. 3. But being driven out of that city, they went to Derbe, and Lystra, and the region that lieth round about; (I suppose the region of Galatia and Phrygia) and there having taught many, they returned, and visited the church, which they had planted, and ordained elders in every city, till they came to Attalia; where taking ship, they sailed to Antioch in Syria. These different journeys and transactions could not be accomplished in less than three years. After their return to Antioch, ‘they abide long time with the disciples’ before they went up to Jerusalem to the council. Now this, with the three years which they spent in the Lesser Asia, added to the year spent at Antioch before they went to Jerusalem with the alms, and the time they abide in Antioch after their return, cannot make less than five years complete. And these being deducted from the 10 years which elapsed between Saul’s retreat into Cilicia and his going to the council of Jerusalem, there will remain full five years as the duration of his abode in Cilicia, previous to the five years of his labours with Barnabas.

No. X. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch. — As the name Ἰησοῦς has a Latin, and not a Greek termination, learned men are of opinion, that it was given to the disciples, neither by themselves nor by the Greeks, but by the Romans, who imposed that name upon them, to signify that they were a new sect, of which Christ was the author. Accordingly, both Luke in his history, and Paul in his epistles, seem industriously to have avoided the use of that name, lest it should have been thought that they meant to represent their Master as an ordinary leader of a sect, like the noted philosophers among the Greeks and Romans. But though the name was thus offensive at first, it became afterwards very acceptable to the disciples of Jesus: for it is used by Peter, 1 Epist. iv. 16; and some have thought it that worthy name of which James speaks, chap. ii. 17. Besides, we know that in process of time it was much and justly valued by those who bare it. Hence, in the epistles of the churches of Vienne and Lyons, it is styled an honourable, and glorious, and reviving appellation. Lardner, Can. vol. ii. p. 72.

Before the disciples of Jesus were named Christians, they were called by their enemies, men of that way, (Acts ii. 2, xix. 9, 23.) Gallileans, and Nazarens; but among themselves, they went by the name of disciples, saints, brethren, the church, them that call upon the Lord Jesus Christ, or upon his name, or upon the Lord, simply, 2 Tim. ii. 2. And the gospel itself was called the way of the Lord, the way of God, the way of salvation, and sometimes simply the way, Acts xix. 23.

No. XI. Did not confer on them the apostolic office. — Barnabas and Saul were not on this occasion separated by the church of Antioch to the ministry in general: They had discharged that office long before. Neither were they made apostles by the church of Antioch. An apostle of men was no apostle; and therefore Paul disclaimed that character, in the lowest manner, by affirming, Gal. i. 1. ‘That he was an apostle, not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father.’ In which he spake the truth; for at the time of his conversion Jesus expressly made him an apostle, saying to him, Acts xxii. 16. ‘I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister, and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17. Delivering thee from the people (the Jewish people) and from the Gentiles, (οὐ κακοῖς ἔργοσις) unto whom I now send thee: 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.’

To Saul’s being made an apostle at his conversion it cannot be objected, that he did not then begin to discharge the apostolical office, but retired into Arabia: For the other apostles, after their election, did not go forth immediately to preach, but they remained mostly with their Master during his ministry, that they might be eye and ear-witnesses of the things which they were afterwards to testify to the world; and in the course of their attendance, they received from their Master various instructions and directions relative to their office. And when he was about to leave them, though he ordered them to go and teach all nations, they neither understood the full extent of their commission, nor did they immediately execute it. Yet they acted and taught as apostles, according to the knowledge they then had of their duty; and by degrees proceeded to fulfill their commission, according as it was opened up to them. This was the case likewise with Saul, who though he was an apostle from the beginning, was fitted for the special duties of his office gradually, as circumstances required, until at length the whole extent of his commission was revealed to him.

Saul therefore was an apostle from the time of his conversion, and always acted and taught as such: preaching ‘first to them at Damascus, (after his return from Africa), next at Jerusalem, and throughout all Judea, and then to the Gentiles.'

No. XII. He found in every country great numbers, not only of his own nation, but of the Gentiles, whom the Jews had turned from idols.—Lardner has well illustrated this fact, Credib. vol. i. c. 3. by passages from Philo, Josephus, and other authors, of which the following are the principal.

Philo, in the book which he wrote against Flaccus, president of Egypt, in the beginning of Caligula's reign, says, "There is no less than a million of Jews in Alexandria and other parts of Egypt;" and adds, "For one country does not contain the Jewish people, they being extremely numerous; for which reason, there are of them in all the best and most flourishing countries in Europe and Asia, in the islands, as well as on the continent; all esteeming for their metropolis the holy city, in which is the sacred temple of the most high God." The same Philo, De Legatione ad Caesum, mentions a letter of Herod Agrippa the elder, to the emperor Caligula, to dissuade him from setting up his statue at Jerusalem, in which he says, "Nor can I forbear to allege in behalf of the holy city, the place of my nativity, that it is the metropolis, not of the country of Judea only, but of many others, on account of the many colonies that have been sent out of it at different times, not only into neighbouring countries, Egypt, Phoenicia, both the Syrians; but also into places more distant, to Pamphylia, Cilicia, and many parts of Asia, as well as Bithynia, and the recesses of Pontus. They are in the same manner in Europe—in Thessaly, Boeotia, Macedonia, Etolia, Argos, Corinth, in the most and best parts of Peloponnesus. Nor are the colonies only full of Jewish colonies, but also the most celebrated islands—Euboea, Cyprus, Crete; not to mention those which are beyond the Euphrates. For excepting only a small part of Babylon, and some other lesser districts, scarce any country of note can be mentioned in which there are not Jewish inhabitants," &c. Lardner, vol. i. p. 232.

The zeal of the Jews in making proselytes is well known. Horace has taken notice of it, lib. i. sat. 4. ver. 117.

Judaei cognosce in hanc consederit turbam.

Josephus likewise, in his second book against Apion, says, "We chose not to imitate the institutions of other people, but we willingly embrace all that will follow ours." And from various passages in the Acts it is evident, that many Gentiles, especially of the female sex, were brought to worship the one true God after the manner of the Jews.—To conclude, when the men of Damascus (Acts xxii. 66.) had formed a design to make away with all the Jews of that place, Josephus tells us, Bell. lib. ii. c. 20. § 2. "They concealed their design very carefully from their wives, because all of them, except a very few, were devoted to the Jewish religion."

No. XIII. The proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, resided.—When Augustus obtained the supreme power, he gave the inland provinces to the people, and reserved those on the frontiers of the empire to himself, designating by that distribution to keep in his hand the whole power of the armies. Dio (quoted by Lardner, vol. i. p. 52.) tells us, that the governors sent by the emperor into the provinces were called legates, or propréteurs, though they were consular persons, that is, had served the office of consul in the city. But the governors sent by the senate into the provinces which belonged to them were called consulars, not only those who had held the consulship, but those also who had been priests only.

The division of the provinces made at first by Augustus, underwent many changes. For a province originally assigned to the senate, was afterwards given to the emperor; and on the contrary. Such a change happened with respect to the province of Cyprus, which, in the first partition, was one of the emperor's provinces, but was afterwards, together with Gallia Narbonensis, given to the senate; instead of which he took Dalmatia, which formerly was theirs, as Dio informs us, lib. liv. p. 553. Therefore, when Paul visited Cyprus, that island was one of the provinces which belonged to the senate; consequently, the proper title of his governor was that of proconsul. Accordingly, Sergius Paulus is so named by Luke; which shews his perfect knowledge of the state of the countries of which he writes.

This honourable and worthy person, like other proconsuls, had persons learned in the Roman law to assist him in judging causes. Also he had a council (ενεργεῖαι), as Festus likewise had, Acts xxv. 12. to advise with in difficult matters of state, and an officer to collect the taxes paid by the province. Besides, the province appointed to govern the provinces, commonly brought with them from Rome the most intelligent and faithful of their friends. These composed their council, and to them were joined some of the most considerable of the Roman citizens who resided in the province: also some of the most respectable natives of the country, who could give instruction concerning the state of the province, the customs of its inhabitants, and the genius of their political constitution. All, or most of these respectable persons, we may suppose, were witnesses to the apostle's transactions in Paphos.

No. XIV. Should go up to Jerusalem, to the apostles.—From this passage of the history, and from Acts viii. 1. Gal. i. 17. it appears, that while the inferior teachers went to distant parts, whether to avoid persecution or to make disciples, the apostles of the circumcision usually resided at Jerusalem. This I suppose they did by the divine direction, that the brethren in distant parts, who had need of their advice and assistance in any difficult matter, might know where to apply to them: and also that they might establish a church under their own immediate inspection, as a pattern, according to which, those who were converted in distant countries might be formed into assemblies for the public worship of God, and for edifying themselves with the gospel doctrine, stedfastly dispensed to them by the ministers of the word in these assemblies.

No. XV. The decree which they passed on the question, runs in the name of the whole church—for it begins in this manner, Acts xxv. 22. "Then it seemed good to the apostles and elders, with the whole church." The historian, however, does not mean, that all the brethren in Jerusalem were gathered together on this occasion. For what house could have held so great a multitude?—Peter by one sermon converted three thousand, and by another no less than five thousand. And without doubt, many more on other occasions were added to the church of Jerusalem by the joint labours of the whole apostles, who commonly resided there. The Christians being so numerous in Jerusalem, Menander (De Prov. p. 117.) conjectures, that the faithful in that city met in separate assemblies for worshipping God; and that all who ordinarily came together in one and the same house, considered themselves as more particularly united. And therefore, when the question concerning the Gentiles was to be determined, seeing they could not all be present, they naturally deputed some of their most esteemed members to meet with the apostles and elders, to deliberate on that important subject. And these delegates having signified their consent to James's proposal, no. xviii. philippi, which is the chief city of that part of macedonia, and a colony.—livy, b. xiv. c. 9, tells us, that when paulus emilius conquered macedonia, he divided it into four parts; of which the first was that which lay between the rivers strymon and nesseus; and that the chief city of that first part was amphipolis. to avoid contradicting the roman historian, the following translation of luke's words is proposed by some: 'and thence to philippi, which is (περί τῶν μουσίων τῆς μακεδόνες πρώτης ἀληθοῦς) the first city of that part of macedonia which is a colony.' but b. pearce, in his commentary on the acts, thinks the common translation ought to be retained, because luke, who was with the apostle at this time, could not be mistaken in a fact so obvious. and therefore, although formerly amphipolis was the chief city of that division of macedonia, we may on luke's authority believe, that at the time paul passed into macedonia, philippi enjoyed that honour. i suppose, that when augustus, after the defeat of anthony, augmented the colony at philippi by sending anthony's adherents thither, he, in honour of the colony, transferred the court of justice from amphipolis to philippi, whereby it became the chief city of that division of macedonia. but in whatever manner it happened, the fact may be relied on, since luke, who resided long at philippi, has expressly asserted it.

philippi being a colony, the greatest part of its inhabitants were romans, and were governed by the laws of rome. they also enjoyed the rights of latium, and worshipped the gods thereof, and probably spoke the latin language, so that in many respects philippi was a latin city.—this is the account which a. gellius gives of the colonies, lib. xiii. c. 13. 'et juris institutoque omnis, populi romani, non sui imperii saltem.' quoted by lardner, cred. vol. i. p. 128.

no. xix. went out of the city by a river-side (ἐκ τῆς παραπόταμου αὐτῆς) where a place for prayer was by law allowed.—from this it is evident, that philippi was built beside a river, or near to one. yet no such river is marked in the maps of this country, which is the more extraordinary, that luke, who was long at philippi, hath represented the river beside which it stood as navigable: acts xx. 6. 'and we sailed from philippi after the days of unleavened bread.' but luke's geography is amply confirmed by the passage from lucian, quoted page 164, who says, 'the walls of philippi were washed by the river hebrus.'

learned men are not agreed whether παραπόταμος, the word in the original, denotes the act, or the place of prayer. dr. lardner, vol. i. p. 336, has produced the following passages, which may be of use in settling this point. the first is from josephus, ant. xiv. 10. § 24, where a decree of the city of halicarnassus permitting the jews to build (παραπόταμος ἀντίστροφος) oratories is cited; part of which decree runs thus: "we decree that the jews who are willing, men and women, do observe the sabbaths, and perform sacred rites according to the jewish laws, and build oratories by the sea-side, according to the custom of their country," &c. the next passage is from tertullian, adv. nat. lib. i. c. 15, where, among other jews' rites, he mentions orationes literales, orate-prayers, that is, prayers by the sea-side, or a river-side: for the jews esteemed these the most pure places for performing the worship of god in, as is plain from philo's oration against placus, p. 983, where speaking of the jews, he says, "and early in the morning, flocking out of the gates of the city, they go to the neighbouring shores, for the (prosecutus) oratories were destroyed, and standing in a most pure place, they lift up their voices with one accord." of this jewish custom we have an instance acts xxii. 5. 'they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city, and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed."

It is commonly said, that the difference between a prosenuchē or oratory, and a synagogue, was this — The synagogue was a covered house, where the law was read, and prayers offered up to God, according to a set form, in name of the whole congregation: But the prosenuchē, or oratory, was a piece of ground enclosed with a wall, where individuals prayed each by himself apart, as in the courts of the temple. The Jews built their synagogues and prosenuches on the banks of rivers, or on the sea-shore, because, according to the tradition of the fathers, they were obliged to wash their hands before they prayed; for which use they esteemed the rivers and sea-water by far the fittest. See Joseph. Ant. xii. c. 2. Elmer.

No. XX. Then departed, leaving Luke at Pella.—That Paul left Luke at Pella, we know from the phraseology of his history. For before that event Luke carries on the narration in the following manner — Acts xvi. 11. ’Loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothrace. 13. And, on the Sabbath-day, we went out of the city by a river-side. 16. And it came to pass as we went to prayer. ’But after Paul and the rest departed from Pella, Luke changes his style in this manner — Acts xvi. 1. ’Now when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica. ’Nor does he resume his former manner of writing, until, chap. x. 25., describing Paul’s voyage to Syria, he thus writes: 6. ’These going before, tarried for us at Troas. 6. And we sailed from Pella after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas, where we abide seven days.’ It is therefore more probable, that when Paul, Silas, and Timothy departed from Pella, after having gathered a church there, Luke remained with the new converts, until the apostle, in his way from Corinth to Syria the second time, came to Pella and took him with them.

If the foregoing supposition is well founded, Luke must have remained several years at Pella; and if he was ‘the brother whose praise was in the gospel,’ mentioned 2 Cor. viii. 18. he joined Paul on his journey into Macedonia, after the riot of Demetrius, and was sent by him to Corinth with Titus, who carried the apostle’s second letter to the Corinthians. And having executed that commission, he returned to Pella, and gave him an account of the success of that letter. And after the apostle set out for Corinth, Luke remained at Pella till Paul returned, for the he joined him on his second voyage to Syria, as has been already observed.

No. XXI. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I to you.—Because Paul, on this occasion, told the Athenians, that the true God was he whom they ignorantly worshipped under the title of the unknown God, some learned men have supposed, that the altar he speaks of was raised to the God of the Jews, concerning whose power, in the destruction of the Egyptians and Canaanites, the ancient Athenians had received some obscure reports: But because the Jews carefully concealed his name, and had no image of him, the Athenians erected no statue to the God of the Jews, but worshipped him under the appellation of The unknown God. Others think this one of the altars which Diogenes Laërtius speaks of in Epimenides. For he relates, that by the advice of Epimenides, the Athenians, when afflicted with a pestilence, brought a number of white and black sheep to Areopagus, and there let them go; appointing a man to follow each, that when any of them lay down it might be sacrificed (σκύρυς) to the God to whom sacrifices were due: after which the plague was stayed. Hence, says he, there are among the Athenians various altars without the name of any God. But this delivery being wrought by the true God, the apostle justly affirms, that they worshipped him by these altars, though they knew him not. Dr. Wellwood, however, in the introduction to his translation of the Banquet of Xenophon, says these altars were erected by Socrates, to express his devotion to the one true God, of whom the Athenians had no idea, and whose nature, he insinuated by this inscription, was far above the reach of human comprehension. According to this account also of the Athenian altars, the apostle’s interpretation of the inscription is still perfectly just.

No. XXII. Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome.—That the emperor Claudius banished all the Jews from Rome, is testified by Suetonius in his life of Claudius, c. 25. “Judeos, impudentes Chresto, asiduo tumultuantes, Roma expulit.” The origin of the tumults which occasioned the banishment of the Jews from Rome, Suetonius, in the above passage, hath related in such a manner, as to make his readers imagine Christ or Chrestus was then in Rome, and that the tumults were owing to his instigation. But the true state of the fact seems to have been this: —The Jews, whose darling object was to make proselytes to their religion, had so nourished the malice of the Romans, that they were瞅ed in the other great cities where the gospel was preached with success. Being extremely displeased with the heathens for embracing the gospel, they published a number of calumnies against the gospel itself, and against its abettors, by which they enraged the idolatrous multitude at Rome to such a degree, that they assisted the unbelieving Jews in their tumultuous attacks upon the Christians. Wherefore the Jews being the ringleaders in these tumults, the emperor, to preserve the peace of the city, found it necessary to banish all the Jews from Rome; and among the rest such of them as had embraced the Christian faith.

Claudius’s edict against the Jews, according to the best chronologers, was published in the eleventh year of his reign; which year began January 24. A. D. 51. Now, supposing Claudius to have published his edict in the beginning of that year, he certainly would allow the proscribed some months at least to settle their affairs, and take themselves away. Whereas Aquila and Priscilla could not well leave Italy before the end of the spring A. D. 51. Besides, their voyage to Corinth would take up some time; and, when they arrived, a month or two must have passed before they could settle themselves in such a manner as to be carrying on their business of making when Paul came to Corinth. His arrival, therefore, cannot be fixed sooner than the autumn of A. D. 51.

Having in this manner fixed one date in Paul’s history, let us next consider, how it may be applied for determining the time of some important events connected with his arrival at Corinth. — After the council of Jerusalem, Paul came down to Antioch, where he abode several months; then departed with Titus to confirm the churches of Cilicia, Galatia, and Phrygia. This office he performed by delivering them the decrees of the council to keep. And as he remained no longer in any place than was necessary for that purpose, we may suppose he finished his progress through the churches in four or five months from his leaving Antioch: Then he went over to Macedonia, where, and in Greece, he preached indeed a considerable time, probably ten or twelve months, before he came to Corinth, when add to the months he spent in Antioch after the council, and in confirming the churches in Cilicia, Galatia, and Phrygia, may have made in all a year and a half. Therefore, if these are counted backward, in the time it might be three years and a half. 5 D autumn of A.D. 51, when Paul arrived at Corinth, they will bring us to the end of Luke 49, or the beginning of Acts 50, as the date of the council of Jerusalem. And seeing that council was held about 14 years after Paul's conversion, (Gal. ii. 1), perhaps 14 years wanting some months, his conversion will thus be fixed to the end of Acts 36, or to the beginning of Acts 37, a date which is likewise confirmed by the rest which the churches of Judea, Samaria, and Galilee enjoyed, through the publication of Caius's order to set up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem in the end of Acts 39, or of the beginning of Acts 40, three years after Paul's conversion, as hath been shown No. V.

No. XXIII. Having shorn his head in Cenchrea, he had a vow.—This thought to have been the vow of the Nazarite, whereby Paul, from the time he made it, until he offered the sacrifices prescribed by the law, bound himself to abstain from wine and all fermented liquors. See Num. vi. 1-21. That this vow was in use in Paul's days, is evident from what Josephus has related of Bernice, Bell. ii. c. 15. init. "She was then (Acts 21, 66) at Jerusalem, performing a vow to God. For it is customary for those who have been afflicted with some distemper, or have laboured under any other difficulty, to make a vow, thirty days before they offer sacrifices, to abstain from wine and share the hair of their head." By the law, the Nazarite was to shave his head at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. But as there were a vast number of Jews in the Gentile countries, who lived at a great distance from Jerusalem, they were obliged to dispense with the exactness of many things required in the law. Lardner, vol. i. p. 461, has mentioned a passage of a Jewish book, quoted by Rashi, which says, "They who make the vow of the Nazarite out of the land of Israel, shall go into it to complete the vow." This accounts for Paul's concern to keep the next feast at Jerusalem, Acts xix. 21.

The vow of the four brethren, mentioned Acts 21. 23, is likewise thought to have been the vow of the Nazarite. There is a passage in Josephus, concerning Herod Agrippa, which shews that it was no unusual thing now for zealous men, who had it in their power, to bear the whole, or a part of the charges of the sacrifices which the Nazarites were obliged to offer at the expiration of their vow. The passage I refer to is Ant. xii. 8. initio, where, having told that Claudius made Herod king of all Judea, he adds, "And he, as it was very likely for one to do who had had so considerable an advancement, made all the expedition he could into his kingdom. And coming to Jerusalem, he offered up sacrifices of thanksgiving, and omitted nothing that was prescribed by the law; for which reason he also ordered a good number of Nazarites to be shaved." That was the common phrase for completing the vow of the Nazarite, by offering the prescribed sacrifices; and therefore the brethren at Jerusalem, when they advised Paul to assist the four men in discharging their vow, did not say, Be at charges with them that they make their offerings, but that they may shave their heads. An action of this kind being extremely popular, and shewing great zeal for the law, the brethren at Jerusalem very prudently advised Paul to it, to shew that he did not contemn the institutions of Moses. Besides, it was one of those popular actions by which Agrippa recommended himself to the Jews when he took possession of the kingdom, as appears from the foregoing quotation.

No. XXIV. On the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread.—From this passage, and from Col. ii. 16, it appears to have been the custom of the disciples, after our Lord's resurrection, to observe the first day of the week in honour of that event, by assembling thereon for the worship of God, and for celebrating the Lord's Supper. Accordingly, Justin Martyr, who wrote forty-four years after the death of the apostle John, tells us, Apol. ii. p. 98. "On Sunday, all Christians in the city and country meet together, because it is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we bear read to us the writings of the prophets and apostles. This done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate and do the things they hear: and then we all join in prayer; and after that we celebrate the sacrament, and they that are willing and able give alms," &c. Whitby's note on Acts xx. 7.

No. XXV. Teaching all men everywhere against the people.—Lardner, Credib. vol. i. p. 565, observes, that the Jews in Judea considered it as their due to have particular regard paid to them by their countrymen in the provinces, and by all the Gentiles who worshipped the true God, and who for that purpose assembled themselves with the Jews in their synagogues. And, in fact, the Jews out of Judea, and all the proselytes, shewed great regard to the people of Jerusalem and of Judea, and were very ready to assist them in every difficulty. Thus, the disciples at Antioch, when they heard that there was to be a death in the land of Judea, Acts xii. 29, 'every man, according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea.' And in this resolution, not the Jews by birth alone, but the just proselytes also, and even the religious proselytes, joined: And having made a liberal collection, they sent it to the elders at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Saul. In like manner, when that famine actually happened, Helene, queen of Adiabene, and ladies her son, both of them proselytes to Judaism, contributed largely for the relief of the inhabitants of Jerusalem and of Judea, Joseph. Ant. xx. c. 2. 6. Also, when the apostles at Jerusalem agreed that Paul should go among the Gentiles, they recommended it to him to remember the poor; which very thing he also made haste to do, Gal. ii. 10. Wherefore, the collections which Paul afterwards made, among all the churches of the Gentiles, for the saints in Judea, was no novelty. It had been often practised, and was founded in the best reason. For, as Paul writing to the Romans on this subject observed, they were bound to do this both in justice and in gratitude—Rom. xv. 27. 'They have been pleased, verily, and their debtors they are. For, if the Gentiles have partaken of their spiritual things, they ought certainly to minister to them in carnal things.' And considering, that in the persecution the brethren of Judea were often spoilt of their goods, (Heb. x. 34.), these collections were the more necessary.

Such being the principles and the expectations of the Jews in Judea, no wonder that the bigots among them were enraged, when they heard that Paul, instead of enjoining the converted Gentiles to observe the law of Moses, taught that they were entirely free from that law; for this was to break the tie by which the Jews held those brethren in subjection who had turned from idols to worship the true God. And therefore the outcry of the Jews against Paul, though wholly unjust, was every word of it expressive and popular, especially at Jerusalem: 'This is the man who teacheth all men everywhere against the people,' Acts xxi. 26.

No. XXVI. Tidings came to the chief captain of the legion.—Δημοτικος πολέμων. The word στράτας is used with considerable latitude. It signifies any garrison of soldiers, without determining their number:
hence it is applied to a legion. At other times, it signifies a much smaller number of soldiers. The other word, χαρτηχαρτης, properly signifies the commander of a thousand men; but it is likewise used for a Roman military Tribune. Wherefore as there was always a legion stationed in Jerusalem, we may suppose that Lysias was the eldest or first Tribune, and, by consequence, that he was the commander of the garrison, and was intrusted by the governor, Felix, with the power which the chief officer under him at Jerusalem usually possessed. But the word χαρτηχαρτης is likewise used to signify the captain of the temple, John xviii. 12. who is thought to have been a Jewish officer. And Luke speaks of ἵππος τῆς τεχνῆς, the captains of the temple, Luke xvi. 52. These, I suppose, were the persons who presided over the divisions of the priests and Levites employed in different ministrations in the temple; but the χαρτηχαρτης, or captain of the temple, was he who had the command of the whole.

No. XXVII. Commanded him to be carried into the castle.—This was the castle Antonia, which was built by John Hyrcanus, high-priest and prince of the Jews, on a rock which stood at the angle of the northern and western porticoes of the outer court of the temple. It was at first named Batis. But Herod the great rebuilt it, and raised it so high as to command the temple, and afford a sight of what passed in the two outer courts. On the side where it joined the portico of the temple, there were stairs which reached to each portico, by which the soldiers descended to keep guard in several places of the porticoes, especially during the great festivals, to suppress any disorders which might happen. Further, to render this fortress inaccessible, Herod faced the rock on which it stood with white polished marble; and having completed the fortress, he named it Antonia, in honour of his friend Mark Antony. Afterward, when Judea was made a Roman province, the Romans always kept a strong garrison in that castle. And at the festivals, when the people flocked to Jerusalem in great multitudes, bodies of armed soldiers went down from this castle, and watched in several places of the porticoes of the temple, to prevent tumults: for on such occasions, more especially, the multitude was disposed to make disturbances.

No. XXVIII. Leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men (τω ερμοποιεσι) of the Sicarii.—The men of whom the Tribune spake were named Sicarii, from the small crooked swords or daggers (called by the Romans Sica) which they carried under their garments. With these they committed horrible murders in Jerusalem about this time: For their custom was to mix in the crowd at the great festivals, and to stab their enemies, even in the day-time; and to conceal their wickedness, they affected great indignation against the authors of the slaughter. Nay, to such a pitch did they carry their cruelty, that they would kill any person whatever for hire. Thus Josephus, Ant. xx. 7. 5. tells us, that one Dora, at the instigation of Felix the governor, hired some of these miscreants, who murdered the high-priest Jonathan.—The same historian informs us, (ibid. c. 6.), that when Felix was procurator, a certain Egyptian came to Jerusalem, and pretending to be a prophet, persuaded the people to follow him to Mount Olivet, promising that they should see the walls of Jerusalem fall down at his command, and have a free entrance into the city over the ruins: but that Felix attacked them with an army, killed four hundred of them, and took two hundred captives; and that the Egyptian himself, having fled, disappeared. This, it is thought, was the impostor of whom the Tribune spake, when he asked Paul if he was 'that Egyptian who before these days made an inscription,' &c. The Tribune added that the followers of the Egyptian were Sicarii. Perhaps, besides the Sicarii, many of this impostor's followers were Zealots, who were very forward in all the tumults against the Romans. Josephus, indeed, has not told us what sort of people the followers of the Egyptian were; only, by relating the affair after giving an account of the Sicarii, he seems to insinuate that they were mostly of that description.

In the other account which Josephus has given of this affair, Bell. ii. c. 13. he says, the Egyptian gathered thirty thousand; that, after bringing them round out of the wilderness up to the Mount of Olives, he intended from thence to attack Jerusalem, and, beating the Roman guards, to bring the people in subjectation to him. But Felix, coming suddenly upon him with the Roman soldiers, prevented the attack; and that all the people joined with Felix in their own defence; so that, when they came to engage, the Egyptian fled, followed only by a few; that the greatest part of those who were with him were either slain or taken prisoners; the rest of the multitude being scattered. This account of the numbers which followed the Egyptian being very different from the former, no objection can be drawn from either against the number mentioned by the Tribune. The truth is, Josephus needs more to be reconciled with himself, than Luke to be reconciled with him; for it should be remembered, that Luke is not answerable for the Tribune's numbers; all that was incumbent on him was, to relate faithfully what he said.

No. XXIX. Felix the Governor.—Judea, though sometimes called a province, was properly a branch of the province of Syria, as Lardner observes, Credib. vol. i. p. 161. Nevertheless it had a Roman governor residing in it with supreme authority, which was a very uncommon thing. The proper title of this governor was Procurator; a name that was given to the officer who took care of the Emperor's revenue in the provinces belonging to him; whereas, in the provinces belonging to the senate, that officer was named Questor. But though the governors of Judea were properly procurators, they had, as was just now observed, the power of presidents. Hence the sacred writers give to Pilate, Felix, and Festus, the title of Governors; which is a general word, and very proper according to the usage of the best writers.

No. XXX. Felix was himself a great oppressor of the nation.—Antonius Claudius Felix, with his brother Pallas, were freed-men of the Emperor Claudius, with whom Pallas being in high favour, he procured for his brother Felix the procuratorship of Judea. But in his government Felix showed the meanness of his disposition and former condition, by exercising his power in the most wanton acts of cruelty and oppression. So Tacitus tells us, Hist. lib. v. c. 9. " Claudius, defunctis Regibus, aut ad modicum redactus, Judeam provinciam Equitibus Romanis, aut liberta permisit. E quisibus Antonius Felix per omnem servitium ac libidinem, jus regium servitii ingenio exercuit, Drusilla, Cleopatra et Antonii nepos (grand-daughter) in matrimonium accepta; ut ejusdem Antonii, Felix progenit, Claudius nepos esset."—Felix married two ladies of the name of Drusilla. The one was the grand-daughter of Cleopatra and Antony. She is the lady of whom Tacitus speaks. The other was Drusilla, mentioned Acts xxiv. 24, where she is called a Jewess, to distinguish her from the Roman lady of that name. This Drusilla was the daughter of Herod Agrippa, (whose death is related Acts xii. 33), and the sister of Herod Agrippa the younger, before whom Paul pleaded his cause. He gave her to Azizus, king of the Emessense, on his consenting to embrace the Jewish religion. But she did not remain long with him: For Felix having seen this most beautiful of women, as Josephus calls her, (Ant. x. 5.), became violently in love with her, and sent his friend Simon, a Jew of Cyprus, who possessed the magic art, to persuade her to leave Azarias and marry him. This commission Simon executed so well, that Drusilla, to avoid the affronts put upon her by her sister Bernice, who envied her beauty, consented to marry Felix, though it was contrary to her religion.

This Drusilla having expressed a desire to hear Paul preach, her husband Felix sent for him, and they heard him concerning the faith in Christ. On that occasion Felix’s conscience was awakened to such a degree by Paul’s sermon, that he trembled. Nevertheless, he continued his cruel and unjust practices all the time his government lasted, which was about the space of two years: for Nero, in the sixth year of his reign, recalled him. After Felix was recalled, some of the principal Jews followed him to Rome, and accused him to the Emperor, who would have punished him, if it had not been for the prayers and entreaties of his brother Falass, who then possessed the favour of Nero, as he had formerly done that of Claudius.

No. XXXI. He appealed from Festus to Caesar.—That cause was by appeal removed from the courts in the provinces to Rome, is evident from Suetonius, who, in his life of Augustus, c. 33, says, “Appellations quondam urbaniarum quiadem litteratorum Praetori delegatis urbano, at provinciis, consularebus viris, quos singulos cujusque provinciae negotii praeposisset.” And, that Roman citizens, tried for their life in the provinces, had a right to transfer their cause by appeal to Rome, is evident from Pliny, epist. x. epist. 97. Ad Trajanum: “Et aliis similis amentie, quae quis cives Romani sunt, anotatii in urbem remittendi.”

No. XXXII. King Agrippa and his sister Bernice. —This is he who by Josephus is called King Agrippa the younger. He was the son of that Herod Agrippa whose death is related Acts xii. 23. and the grandson of Aristobulus, (whom his father put to death), consequently the great-grandson of the first Herod, called Herod the Great, in whose reign our Lord was born.

Herod Agrippa the younger was in great favour with the Emperor Claudius, who gave him the kingdom of his uncle Herod, king of Chalcis. But he afterwards took it from him, and gave him the tetrarchy of Philip, with Batanea, Trachonitis and Ablina, which formerly Aristobulus possessed, Luke iii. 1. After this Nero gave him a part of Galilee, with the cities Tiberias, Tarricha, and Julius, beyond Jordan, with fourteen villages.

Herod the younger was the last king of the Herod family: For he lived to see Jerusalem destroyed, and the Jewish nation sold as slaves to any who would purchase them. After that he went to Rome, where, as Dio informs us, he obtained priestly honours, and lived in the palace with his sister Bernice. This is the lady mentioned in the Acts. She was first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis: but after his death, being talked of as criminally familiar with her brother Agrippa, she married Polemon king of Cilicia, to quash that rumour. But soon after, influenced more by legal inclination than by a regard to her reputation, she divorced Polemon, and returned to her brother; by which the rumour of their unlawful commerce was again revived.

Agrippa and Bernice were living together when Festus arrived in the province. They came therefore to Felix to congratulate Festus upon his advancement to the procuratorship. On that occasion, Agrippa having expressed a desire to hear Paul, Festus gratified him by procuring the apostle, in the place of hearing, before him and Bernice, and the Tribunes, and all the principal men of Cæsarea: so that the apostle had a new opportunity of speaking in his own defence; which he did to such good effect, that Agrippa declared, in the presence of the whole assembly, that he had done nothing worthy of death; and that he might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Cæsar.

Tacitus has spoken of Bernice’s beauty, and of the court which she paid to Vespasian by her magnificent presents, and of the love which his son Titus bare to her, Hist. lib. ii. c. 81. “Nec minore animo Regina Bere- nices partes iuvabat, flores esse formosae, et sem quasi Vespasiano, magnificentia munera, grata.” And, speaking of Vespasian’s son Titus, the same historian says, Hist. lib. ii. c. 2. “Neque abhorret a Bernice juvenilus animus.” Suetonius adds, that Titus promised to marry her: For, after mentioning Titus’s cruelty, he speaks of his lust, c. 7. “Nec minus limbido, proper exor- letorum et epodorum greges, propterque insignem regine Berenosis amorem, cui etiam nuplias pollicitus fereba- tur.” Nevertheless, after he became Emperor, he, for reasons of state, dismissed Bernice, though with great regret: “Berenice ex urbe dimissit, invitam invitam.” Titus Vesp. c. 7.

No. XXXIII. He called on all the Jews present to bear witness.—Bishop Lowth, in his note on Isa. liii. 8, tells us, “It is said in the Mishna, that before any one was punished for a capital crime, proclamation was made before the prisoner by the public crier, in these words: Quicumque noventir aliquid de ejus sinceritat, veniat et deceat de eo. On which passage the Gemara of Babylon adds, ‘That before the death of Jesus this proclamation was made for forty days, but no defence could be found.’ On which words Lardner observes, ‘It is truly surprising to see such falsehoods contrary to well-known facts, Testimonies, vol. l. p. 196. The report is certainly false; but this false report is found on the supposition that there was such a custom, and so far confirms the account above given from the Mishna. The Mishna was composed in the middle of the second century: Lardner ascribes it to the year of Christ 180.

“Now it is plain, from the history of the Four Evangelists, that in the trial and condemnation of Jesus no such rule was observed; (though, according to the accoun- t of the Mishna, it must have been in practice at that time); no proclamation was made for any person to bear witness to the innocence and character of Jesus; nor did any one voluntarily step forth to give his attestation to it. And our Saviour seems to refer to such a custom, and to claim the benefit of it, by his answer to the high-priest, when he asked him of his disciples and of his doctrine: ‘I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: Behold they know what I said.’ John xviii. 20, 21. This therefore was one remarkable instance of hardship and injustice, among others predict- ed by the prophet, which our Saviour underwent in his trial and sufferings.

“St. Paul likewise, in similar circumstances, standing before the judgment-seat of Festus, seems to complain of the same unjust treatment—that no one was called, or would appear, to vindicate his character: ‘My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among my own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews, which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the strictest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee;’ Acts xxvi. 4, 5.”—Thus far Lowlath.
To comprehend the force and propriety of the above appeal to the Jews who were present at the apostle's defence before Agrippa, the full extent of his expression, My manner of life, must be attended to and understood. For the apostle did not mean only, that all the Jews knew his education was at the first among his own nation at Jerusalem, but likewise that they knew the other particulars which he mentioned in the subsequent parts of his defence; namely, that after the strictest sect of their religion he lived a Pharisee, ver. 5.—That he thought with himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, ver. 9. That he did these things in Jerusalem: That many of the saints he shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests so to do. And that when they were put to death, he gave his voice against them, ver. 10. Alluding to his behaviour at the stoning of Stephen. That he punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme Jesus; and that being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them even to foreign cities, ver. 11. In particular, that he went to Damascus with authority and commission from the chief priests, ver. 12. That if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound to Jerusalem, Acts ix. 2. Namely, to be punished. All these things the Jews, who were present at his defence before Agrippa in Caesarea, well knew. He therefore called on them in this public manner to attest the truth of them, because they were clear proofs of his bitter enmity to the Christians; and demonstrated, that for sake of the chief priest, and going over to the Christians, whereby he subjected himself to the hatred of the Jews, could be owing to nothing but to the appearing of Jesus to him on the road to Damascus; of which he gave Agrippa an account in the remaining part of his speech, ver. 13-15. At the same time he told him, that Jesus said to him, I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in which I will appear unto thee afterwards. 19. Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision: 20. But shewed first to them of Damascus, &c. that they should repent, and do works meet for repentance. He added, ver. 22. That in his discourses to the Jews and Gentiles, he said no other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come; 23. That the Christ should suffer, and should be the first who should rise from the dead, and should shew light to the people, and to the Gentiles.—The apostle having given this account of his conversion to Christianity, and of the doctrine which he taught after he became a Christian, the one appeared so rational, and the other so consonant to the writings of Moses and the prophets, that Agrippa entertained a favourable opinion of Paul, and declared that he had done nothing worthy of death, or of bonds.

No. XXXIV. The island was called Melitæ. Bryant, Observ. on Ancient History, contends, that this island was not Malta, because Malta is not in the Adriatic Sea, notwithstanding Bochart endeavours to prove it to be so; but it was an island belonging to Dalmatia, called anciently Melitæ, but is now called Mileet by the Slavonians, and is subject to Ragusa. In support of his opinion Bryant cites ancient authors, who, in enumerating the Adriatic islands, mention Melitæ very particularly, and say that it was twenty stadia distant from Corcyra Melane; and among the rest Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. iii. c. 26, who reckons it among the Adriatic islands, and adds, unde Catulos Melitaeum appellari Callimachus auctor est.
