1 THESSALONIANS, p. 397.

PREFACE.—Sect. 1. Of the introduction of the Gospel into Thessalonica.—2. Of the occasion of writing this Epistle.—3. Of the matters treated of in it.
2 Thessalonians, p. 431.

Preface. — Sect. 1. Of the occasion of writing this Epistle. — 2. Of the time and place of writing it. — 3. Showing that none of the apostles thought the day of judgment would happen in their lifetime. — 4. Of the different comings of Christ spoken of in Scripture.

1 Timothy, p. 438.

Preface. — Sect. 1. Timothy's history. — 2. Of the time when this Epistle was written. — 3. Of the occasion of writing it. — 4. Of the use which the church in every age is to make of the epistles to Timothy and Titus. — 5. Showing that the church of the living God is the pillar and support of the truth; that the church of Rome is not the church of the living God, exclusively of all other churches; and that its claim to infallibility is altogether without foundation.

2 Timothy, p. 466.

Preface. — Sect. 1. Of the time of writing this Epistle. — 2. Of the place where Timothy resided when it was written to him. — 3. Of the occasion of writing it. — 4. That the truth of the gospel is strongly confirmed by the things written in this Epistle.

Titus, p. 484.

Preface. — Sect. 1. The history of Titus. — 2. Of the introduction of the gospel into Crete. — 3. Of Crete, and of the manners of its inhabitants. — 4. Of the time and place of writing this Epistle. — 5. Of the purpose for which it was written.

Philemon, p. 486.

Preface. — Sect. 1. The history of Philemon. — 2. Of Paul's design in writing this Epistle. — 3. Of the use which is to be made of it. — 4. Of the time and place of writing it.

Hebrews, p. 500.

Preface. — Sect. 1. That Paul is the author of this Epistle. — 2. Of the people to whom this Epistle was written; of the occasion of writing it; and of the language in which it was written. — 3. Of the matters contained in it; of Paul's method of reasoning in it; and of the proofs by which he establishes the doctrines advanced in it. — 4. Of the time of writing it.

James, p. 581.

Preface. — Catholic Epistles, why so named. — Sect. 1. The history of James the writer of this Epistle. — 2. Its authenticity established. — 3. Of the persons to whom it was directed; of the time when, and the place where it was written; and of the death of James. — 4. Of the purpose for which this Epistle was written.

JAMES MACKNIGHT, D.D.

Dr. James Macknight was born on the 17th of September, 1721. His father Mr. William Macknight, minister at Irvine, was a native of Ireland, where his ancestors, descended from the family of McNaughtane in the Highlands of Scotland, had resided for more than a century, and where some of his relations still remain. Mr. William Macknight early displayed very popular talents as a preacher; and having, it is said, accidentally officiated in the church of Irvine, some time after the death of the former incumbent, he gave so much satisfaction to the hearers that he was soon appointed to supply the vacant charge. In this situation he continued during life, universally esteemed for genuine piety, purity of morals, and integrity of character. He married Elizabeth Gemmil, daughter of Mr. Gemmil of Dalraith—a small property in the neighbourhood of Kilmarnock, which had been in possession of the same family for several centuries, and which Dr. Macknight afterwards inherited in right of his mother.

By this marriage Mr. William Macknight had two daughters and four sons; of whom the youngest, and only one now alive, is Thomas Macknight, Esq. of Ritho, a gentleman who in early life signalized himself during the American war, by the most eminent services as a loyalist, and who, since his return to his native country, has long been distinguished by his unusual activity in the prosecution of agricultural improvements on the most liberal and extensive scale.

Dr. James Macknight, the subject of this narrative, received the rudiments of education at the school of Irvine, and about the age of fourteen was sent to the University of Glasgow, where he studied with great approval from his teachers, on account of his diligence and proficiency. Throughout the Lectures on Logic and Moral Philosophy, before he was sixteen, still remain among his papers, and afford remarkable indications of the same acuteness and soundness of judgment which afterwards characterized his theological writings.

Having completed the usual course of academical discipline at Glasgow, Mr. Macknight went to Leyden, in order to prosecute the study of theology, to which he had shown an early attachment. While he studied in Holland, he had an opportunity of procuring many valuable books written by foreign divines, which afterwards assisted his own labours in explaining Scripture. After his return to Scotland, having received from the Presbytery of Irvine a license to preach the gospel, he was chosen to officiate at the Gorbals, near Glasgow; a situation which at that time could be held by a licentiate of the Church, before being ordained to the pastoral function. On this occasion, one of the candidates was Mr. Robert Henry, afterwards the well known historian of Great Britain. It is somewhat remarkable, that the same gentlemen who thus happened to be placed in competition with each other at the commencement of life, were at last, after an interval of many years, associated as colleagues in the charge of the Old Parish Church of Edinburgh, a connexion which subsisted till the death of Dr. Henry, in the most cordial habits of friendship and intimacy.

From the Gorbals Mr. Macknight went to Kilwinning, in consequence of an invitation from Mr. Ferguson, then minister of that place, and acted for some time as his assistant in the charge of the parish. Here he conducted himself with such propriety, that his character began to be established; and, on the death of Mr. Fisher at Maybole, he obtained the vacant living there, with the concurring wish of the heritors and people. Of this charge, accordingly, he was ordained as minister on the 10th of May, 1755. At Maybole Mr. Macknight continued sixteen years, and discharged the duties of the pastoral office with such assiduity and kindness, that when he left it, he carried with him the affections and regret of all his flock.

It was at Maybole that, amidst his professional occupations in a populous charge, Dr. Macknight composed the first and second of his Works. Of the former, indeed, on the Harmony of the Gospels, it appears from his papers, that the plan had been conceived by him so early as the third or fourth year of his attendance at the university, and from that time he began to collect materials for the publication. The first edition of this book was published in 1756. Although the plan of it differed considerably from that of former Harmonies, in supposing that the Evangelists have not neglected the order of time in the narration of events, the reception it met with from the most competent judges was so favourable, that the author was encouraged to undertake a second edition, with considerable improvements and additions. This edition appeared in 1765. In the same year was also published by Dr. Macknight another performance of great merit, entitled, The Truth of the Gospel History, which had been the fruit of the author's studies during the interval between the first and second editions of his Harmony. Its object is, to illustrate and confirm, both by argument and by appeal to the testimony of ancient authors, what are commonly arranged under the three great titles of the Internal, the Collateral, and the Direct Evidences of the Gospel History.

By these publications Dr. Macknight soon obtained a high reputation for theological learning. The University of Edinburgh conferred on him (among the first who obtained that distinction in Scotland) the degree of Doctor of Divinity; and he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1769. During the course of the same year he was translated to the parochial charge of Jedburgh, in which he remained about three years, and where he received from his people the most flattering tokens of respect and kindness. In 1772 he was elected one of the ministers of Edinburgh. His first charge was the Parish of Lady Yesteres, from which he was translated in 1778 to the Old Church, where he continued during the remainder of his life.

The lives of the learned commonly offer little else to our curiosity, than the simple record of their studies and writings. This observation, often made, is peculiarly applicable in the present instance. After he took up his residence in Edinburgh, there were few occurrences in the life of Dr. Macknight which can be made the subject of narration. Besides performing the ordinary duties of the pastoral function, a minister of Edinburgh, in virtue of his office, is much occupied with public meetings on business of various kinds, especially the management of the different charitable foundations which have long been the boast of the capital of Scotland. Among other objects of such official care is the Fund established by Act of Parliament for a Provision to the Widows and Children of Ministers in the Church of Scotland. As one of the Trustees appointed by the Act, he had long taken a leading part in conducting the business of this charity; and when the growing prosperity of the Fund had paved the way for an increase of its capital, MACKINTOSH was nominated by the Trustees, along with the celebrated Dr. Webster, (to whose benevolent exertions this valuable institution was much indebted for its establishment), as a Commissioner, to solicit a renewal of the Act of Parliament. This urgently was obtained in 1779; raising the capital at £100,000, and making other alterations for the benefit of the Fund. After the death of Dr. Webster, MACKINTOSH was appointed joint Collector with Sir H. MONTGOMERY WILLOUGHBY, Bart.; a colleague whose great ability and talents for business peculiarly qualified him, as experience has since shown, for the important office which he still holds, with the highest credit to himself and advantage to the Fund.

The line of conduct which MACKINTOSH pursued with regard to the points of ecclesiastical policy that have long divided the members of the Church of Scotland, was different from what might have been presumed, in consequence of the first impressions on these topics which, it is probable, he had received from his father. But after mature deliberation, with that manliness and self-judgment which marked his character, he adopted the principles that were to regulate his future conduct in the Church Courts; and, throughout life, he acted steadily on that system of ecclesiastical policy which, for many years past, has guided the decisions of the General Assembly. At the same time, he firmly resisted whatever appeared to him as any infringement on the constitutional law or practice of the Church; and accordingly, when some of his friends seemed to wish for the abolition of calls, as an unnecessary form in the settlement of ministers, he moved and carried a resolution of the Assembly, 1783 (relative to certain omissions on the subject, then under the consideration of the house), "Declaring, That the moderation of a call in settling ministers, is agreeable to the immemorial and constitutional practice of this Church; and that it ought to be continued;" a resolution which was afterwards converted into a Declaration Act, and printed as such in the proceedings of the Assembly for that year.

Of MACKINTOSH it may with general on this head be recorded, that no member of the Church to which he belonged ever, perhaps, entertained more just or profound views respecting the great fundamental principles of her constitution and laws, or concerning the nature and distinctive powers of her several judicatories; and that in relation to the business which usually occupies the General Assembly, either in its judicature or in its legislative capacity, he always formed a clear, sound, and decisive judgment. On this account he was often consulted by the leading members of that Court; and, on several important occasions, his professional advice and assistance were of essential service to the magistrates of Edinburgh, with regard to the governmental arrangements of the city.

But what chiefly engaged his mind, and occupied his time, after he became a minister of Edinburgh, was the execution of his last and greatest work, on the Apostolical Epistles; which was published in 1795, in four volumes quarto. Respecting this work it is perhaps not unworthy of being told, that it was the result of the unremitting labour of almost thirty years; that notwithstanding his numerous professional avocations, the author, while composing it, was seldom less than eleven hours every day employed in study; and that before it came to the press, the whole manuscript had been written no less than five times with his own hand. At the time of publishing 'The New Translation of the Apostolical Epistles, with a Commentary and Notes,' MACKINTOSH was highly indebted to the patronage of the Duke of Grafton; and after the work made its appearance, he received the most honourable testimonies of approbation from many of the Bishops and respectable dignitaries of the Church of England, as well as from the ablest divines of all descriptions.

After the publication of this work, MACKINTOSH considered himself as having accomplished the greatest object of his life; and wishing to enjoy, at the end of his days, some relief from the labour of study, he resisted the repeated solicitations of his friends, who earnestly urged him to undertake the illustration of the book of the Acts, on the same plan which he had so successfully followed in the explaining the other parts of the New Testament. But soon after this period, from the want of their usual exercise, a sensible decline of his faculties, particularly a failure of his memory, was observed by his friends. This fact is a striking instance of the analogy between the powers of the body and those of the mind, both of which suffer by inaction; and it furnishes a useful caution to those who have been long habituated to any regular exertion of mind, against the once desiring entirely from its usual efforts; since the effect, in the course of nature, is not only to create languor, but to hasten the progress of debility and failure.

As yet, however, MACKINTOSH's bodily vigour seemed to be but little impaired. In early life he was afflicted with frequent headaches; but after he had reached the age of thirty, they seldom returned; and he afforded a singular instance of a sedentary life long continued, with hardly any of those complaints which it usually induces. This uninterrupted enjoyment of health he owed, under Providence, to a naturally robust make, and a constitution of body uncommonly sound and vigorous; along with regular habits of temperance, and of taking exercise, which he did by walking nearly three hours every day.

Having finished the task he had prescribed to himself as an author, he mingled frequently in the society of his friends, from which, at intervals, he always received much enjoyment; and long retained the same cheerfulness of temper for which, during hours of relaxation from severe study, he had been remarkable, and in the company of those whom he esteemed. Even after the symptoms of his decline were become visible, his natural sagacity and strength of judgment, as well as his extensive and familiar knowledge of the Scriptures, were still to be discerned in his conversation and public appearances; and so habitual was his anxiety to discharge his duty, that he insisted on officiating for a considerable time after his friends had wished him to withdraw from public labour. It was not, indeed, without much entreaty, that he at last consented to accept the services of an assistant.

At this period of his life it was peculiarly fortunate for him, that in Dr. Grieve, who became his colleague after the death of Dr. HANAY, he found a companion of the most amiable manners, and a friend of distinguished worth and respectability, from whom he experienced every office of attention and kindness. When he was at length no longer able to prosecute his favourite studies, the judicious opinions, and extensive information of his very accomplished and learned colleague, frequently afforded he in conversation a source of interesting entertainment. These proofs of respect and attachment have laid his family under perpetual obligation; and gratitude forbids, that any account of him should be given to the world without an acknowledgment of the friendly assiduities which cheered and supported his declining years.

The disease which terminated his life was the Peri-pneumonia Notho, occasioned by an incalculable exposure to the severity of the weather, about the end of December, 1799. This distemper, in its progress and issue, resisted the ablest and most assiduous efforts of medical skill. During his illness, his mind was composed, tranquil, and resigned; he never complained; and on the morning of the 13th of January, 1800, he expired without a struggle. As in the course of the preceding night he slept but little, the time was employed in hearing passages from the Psalms and Evangelists, which by his own desire were read to him by one of his family. Thus, having spent his life in illustrating Scripture, and exerted the last efforts of his attention in listening with delight to its precious words of peace to the righteous, he may be truly said to have slept in Jesus.

The character of a man whose life was devoted to a single object of incessant study, can hardly be expected to afford scope for much variety of delineation. Perhaps the circumstances which have been related, sufficiently indicate its prominent features; and we might leave the consideration of it with observing, that it was strongly marked by vigour, firmness, good sense, and unbending integrity. Yet we shall find, on a near inspection, that it is not unworthy of being contemplated more minutely; because it exhibits some traits of professional virtues, on which the mind may, for a little, dwell with pleasure and advantage. Such examples in real life illustrate the excellence of pure religion; and it is with peculiar interest that we read descriptions which make us familiarly acquainted with those who have contributed, by their labours, to the instruction or the consolation of mankind.

As a clergyman, the sentiments and conduct of Dr. Macknight were equally characterized by consistency and propriety. In the discharge of every public and private duty of religion, with a constant reliance on divine aid, he was regular and steady. He knew and felt what became the sacred office which he held; and never departed on any occasion from the dignity or decorum of his professional character. Having given himself wholly to the meditation of divine things, he continued in them: In the work of his Master he was steadfast and faithful to the end. His piety was at once sincere, rational, and without ostentation. To be useful in the cause of truth and virtue, was his highest ambition: and with all the means of attaining this end, which the resources of a well-informed and liberal mind could supply, he united a zeal for the interests of Christianity, that terminated only with his life.

In that branch of the pastoral office which is called lecturing, his learning and ability were much admired, and never failed to please, as well as to instruct and edify, in a degree which has seldom been equalled. As a preacher, also, without pretensions to the graces of elocution, he had a certain earnestness of manner, evidently proceeding from the heart, and from a sincere anxiety to be useful, which always commanded the attention, and excited the interest of the hearers. In doctrine he showed uncorrupted, gravity, sincerity; his sentiments were just, energetic, and impressive; and his constant object was to press on the minds of his people the truths necessary for the correction of vice, and the advancement of pious knowledge and goodness. With this view he may be said to have affected a greater than usual plainness of diction.

It is true, that to be perspicuous and intelligible to the most illustrious of his audience, ought to be always the chief object of a preacher. But this may be accomplished with a strict adherence to purity of language; and it must be confessed, that the difficulty is great of frequently employing familiar expressions, without descending from that propriety which is indispensable to the dignity of the pulpit. It may be added, that his inexhaustible variety of thought and expression in prayer, bespoke a mind richly stored with religious ideas, and at once surprised and delighted those who regularly attended his ministry.

When engaged, either in private controversy or in the public debates of the church courts, he was always remarkable for speaking strictly to the point at issue. He was likewise distinguished by coolness, discretion, and command of temper: he listened with patience to the arguments of his opponents, and in delivering his opinions, he showed himself uniformly open, candid, and explicit. At the same time, his talent was rather that of business than of address; he appeared to be better fitted for deciding on the merits of a question in debate, than for soothing the passions or managing the humours of mankind—a qualification rarely possessed but by minds of a superior order. On every occasion he thought and acted with the energy of a self-deciding upright mind. And hence it is that all his writings evince the sentiments of a masculine independent spirit, uninfluenced by authority, and unfettered by prejudice.

Nor was his praise merely that of professional excellence. On various subjects his range of knowledge was ample and profound. Thus his taste for classical literature was early formed. He perused the writers of antiquity with critical skill; and of his acquaintance with the Greek language, especially the original of the New Testament, his observations on the force of the particles, in his commentary, are a sufficient proof. In the speculations, also of metaphysical, moral, and mathematical science, he was a considerable proficient. The fact is, his powers were such as might have been turned with advantage to any department of knowledge or learning.

It may further be noticed, that in conducting the ordinary affairs of life he displayed uncommon prudence and sagacity. He was one of those who are generally attentive to small concerns, but on proper occasions show themselves liberal to a high degree. Of this different instances occurred in the course of his transactions with his friends; and he was enabled to act on such a principle of generosity by his usual habits of economy and prudence. Dr. Macknight's external appearance was sufficiently expressive of his character. His countenance was manly and commanding, and his gait remarkably erect and firm.

According to the plan of this sketch, any critical account of Dr. Macknight's works cannot with propriety be given here. It may only be observed, in general, that his reputation for sound criticism, extensive knowledge, and clear elucidation of the sacred writings, is rapidly increasing amongst Christians of every denomination; and he must be acknowledged to have been one of the most intelligent, judicious, and candid expositors of the Scriptures that ever appeared. Even during his own lifetime his diligence was rewarded by an ample portion of respectable fame. The "Harmony of the Gospels" has long been esteemed a work of standard excellence for the students of evangelical knowledge. His "Truth of the Gospel History" has hitherto attracted the notice of the public less than any of his other productions: but it well deserves to be more generally read, since, of what it proposes to establish, it contains the most satisfying views that can be suggested by learned and good sense, and is admitted by the best of judges to be a performance as useful and instructive as any we have on that important subject.

The Commentary on the Apostolical Epistles is now held in peculiar estimation; and it may be doubted whether the scope of the sacred authors of these writings was ever, in any former age of Christianity, so fully, clearly, and happily stated, as has been done by Dr. Macknight in the General Views and Illustrations which he has prefixed to the several Chapters of the Epistles.—In this able, judicious, and learned Work, the Author's method of explaining the Scriptures is everywhere employed with the greatest success. His object was to discover the meaning of the inspired writers in difficult passages, from a comprehensive view of all the circumstances to which they allude, without regard to interpretations of mere human authority. Hence, although on principle attached to the established standards of the Church of Scotland, he did not conceive it as any advantage to the system which he maintained, to urge in support of its peculiar doctrines every passage which zeal without knowledge may have employed for that purpose. Nothing, in fact, tends more to injure the cause of truth and religion than an injudicious appeal to Scripture; or the attempt to establish opinions by the sanction of scriptural words or passages, quoted singly, without regard to what precedes or follows them, and thus invested with a meaning, more than probably, entirely different from what was intended by the sacred writers. Of this mistaken application Dr. Macknight has shown various instances; remarking, that when a doctrine is sufficiently established by any passages in which it is expressly or undoubtedly declared, we only weaken it by any appeal to other passages, of which the application to that doctrine may be dubious, or at best equivocal.—Accordingly it must be allowed, that in this method of eliciting the true meaning of Scripture, by a due respect to parallel passages, and the design of the whole context, the exposition and views which, with much sagacity of critical investigation, our Author has given of Paul's Epistles, are extremely natural, acute, and sensible.

The Life of the Apostle Paul, which concludes this Work, is an excellent compendium of the apostolical History; and may be considered as the Author's view and illustration of the Acts of the Apostles—the only part of the New Testament writings (except the Revelation of St. John) to which the labours of Dr. Macknight, as a Commentator, were not directed.—In all his writings, his style, though unassuming, is elegant and ornamental, and is, from the nature of the subject, peculiar, and appropriate to the object.

Dr. Macknight enjoyed the friendship and esteem of many eminent characters among his contemporaries of the same profession. In the number of these were Dr. Blair and Dr. Robertson, to whose attachment he owed much on different occasions. If the portrait which has been given in this account is a faithful resemblance, the name of him whom it represents may now be considered as not unworthy to be associated, in future times, with those of the men in whose society, during his lifetime, he had often the happiness of passing his hours, and whose works will live as the glory of Scottish literature, while civilization and refinement exist.

Dr. Keppie and Dr. Findlay had been the companions of his early youth; and although in his opinions on some points of Church policy he differed from these venerable persons, so universally esteemed for piety and profound theological learning, their mutual regard continued unaltered through life.

From Lord Hailsham he received many valuable hints relative to the early state of Christianity, of which he walked himself in the footsteps. The proofs of respect which he experienced from many of his younger brethren in the Church, were highly gratifying to Dr. Macknight. Among his friends of this description, there were two for whom he entertained a peculiar esteem; and each of them had an opportunity of paying a public tribute of regard to his memory, in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which ought not to pass unrecorded. Principal Hill, with that impressive and dignified eloquence which has long been celebrated as having a powerful influence on the decisions of the Assembly, characterized him as "a venerable Father, who ranked among the most eminent Divines that the Church of Scotland has produced; who often spoke in this House with great ability, and profound knowledge of the subject on which he delivered his opinion; who was a master in our Israel, concerning all points of ecclesiastical law; and by whose theological labours, conducted during a long life with unremitting assiduity, and directed to the most valuable objects, all of us now daily profit."—To Dr. Finlayson, of whose firmness, sagacity, and accurate knowledge, he early appreciated the future value to the Church, Dr. Macknight was strongly attached by a certain congeniality of mind; and he often had great pleasure in discussing various subjects of his attention, with a friend so remarkable for acuteness, judgment, and strength of intellect. It accorded with the sentiments of all his brethren, when Dr. Finlayson, officially reporting to the Assembly the death of Dr. Macknight, as joint Collector of the Fund already mentioned, said, that "his deep learning, sound judgment, and great respectability of character, had rendered him one of the brightest ornaments of our Church.”

Soon after the time of his being ordained, Dr. Macknight married Elizabeth McCormick, eldest daughter of the worthy and respectable Samuel McCormick, Esq., General Examiner of the Excise in Scotland—a lady whose humane and charitable character endeared her to the people in every parish where her husband has officiated as pastor; and whose tender feelings of sympathy for distress, unwearied activity of benevolence, and constant anxiety to promote the happiness of all whom her kind offices can reach, are still known, and will long be remembered with approbation in the circle where Providence has blessed her with opportunities of doing good.

By her Dr. Macknight had four sons: The eldest, a very promising child, died at the age of seven. Another reached the age of thirteen, after much from a lingering distemper, which at last proved fatal to him. The loss of this very amiable young man was the chief distress which Dr. Macknight experienced in the course of his long and useful life.—Of his family now remaining, one is engaged in a department of the Profession of the Law, and the other is a Clergyman of the Church of Scotland.

This plain and cursory narrative, which must now be brought to a close, is another proof of what has frequently been remarked, that the history of men whose lives have been spent in the acquisitions of learning, are generally barren of those incidents which excite an interest in the details of biography.—Continually occupied with the duties of his office, with his studies, and his writings, Dr. Macknight seldom mingled in what may be called the bustle of the world, and had no share in the political transactions of the day. For engaging in these, indeed, as already hinted, he was little qualified, either by the natural bent of his mind, or by his usual habits of life. But he has left behind him a reputation superior to that which is conferred by the pursuits of ambition, or the lustre of events creating only a temporary interest in the mass of men; and his name will probably be remembered with veneration, as long as the study of divine truth continues to be cultivated in the Christian world.
GENERAL PREFACE.

The New Translation of the Apostolical Epistles being the principal part of the Work now offered to the Public, it will no doubt be expected, that the Author should give the reasons which induced him to undertake a performance of this sort, after the many versions of the Scriptures already published. The principles also on which this translation is formed must be explained, that the reader may understand in what respect it will differ from other versions. And as the commentary and notes, with the prefaces and essays, have greatly increased the size of the Work, some account must be given of what is done in them towards explaining the meaning of the sacred oracles.

SECT. I.—Of the Ancient Translations of the Scriptures; and of their influence on the Modern Versions.

With respect to the reasons which induced the author to attempt a new translation of the apostolical epistles, he acknowledges that the versions of the Scriptures used at present by the different nations of Europe have been faithfully made, according to the skill of the persons who made them; and that the common people who read any of these versions can be at no loss to know the fundamental articles of the Christian faith. Nevertheless, a new translation of these divinely inspired writings cannot be thought superfluous, unless it could be said with truth of some one of the versions extant, that it is everywhere accurate, intelligible, and unambiguous. But this, it is supposed, no good judge will take upon him to affirm.

The learned, in reading the ancient and modern versions of the Scriptures, must be sensible that there is a remarkable agreement among them, especially in their translations of the difficult passages. Now, though at first sight this may be thought a proof of their accuracy, the inference is by no means safe. That agreement may have proceeded, not from the justness of the translation, but from the subsequent translators treading in the steps of those who went before them. And that they actually did so, will appear from what follows.

During the first and following ages, the disciples of Christ being numerous in the countries where the Syriac was the vulgar language, a translation of the writings of the apostles and evangelists into that language became absolutely necessary, and after the gift of tongues, and of the interpretation of tongues, had ceased in the church.

Wherefore, a Syriac translation of the books of the New Testament was very early made, for the use of the Christians in the east who did not understand the Greek.

This, with the Syriac translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, is what the Maronites, who use that translation, call The pure and ancient Syriac Version, (simplicem et antiquam. Mill's Preface, No. 1327. Kuster's edition.) But the Maronites speak without proof, when they say a part of that version was made in the time of Solomon, and the rest by Thaddeus, or some other of the apostles, in the time of Agbarus. It is certain, however, that the Syriac version of the New Testament is very ancient.

For, from its wanting the second epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, and from some other marks of antiquity, Walton and Mill with great probability infer, that it was made before the whole of the sacred writings were generally known; consequently, that it was made in the beginning of the second century. (See 2 Pet. Pref. Sect. 1.)

This Syriac version, on account of its antiquity, and because it is in a language not materially different from that which our Lord and his apostles used, was held in great esteem, in the early ages, by all the eastern churches. But it was not known among us till the sixteenth century, at which time it was brought into Europe from Ignatius, the patriarch of Antioch, by an eastern priest; and falling into the hands of Albert Wimsantrud, he printed it at Vienna in the year 1555; since which it hath been well known to the learned in Europe, and well received by them all.*

The reasons which occasioned a Syriac Translation of the Scriptures to be made in the east, operated likewise in producing a Latin translation of the same writings, for the use of the Christians in the west. This is what has been called The old Italic Version, which as Mill conjectures, (No. 586.), was made in the time of Pope Pius I., that is, in the middle of the second century, not long after the first Syriac version was made.

In the Italic version the New Testament was translated from the Greek, and the Old, not from the Hebrew, but from the Septuagint, which at that time was generally believed to have been made by inspiration, and was esteemed of equal authority with the Hebrew itself. But the edition of the Septuagint from which it was made being very incorrect, Jerome, about the desire of Pope Damascus, translated the Old Testament into Latin from the LXX. as set forth in Origen's Hexapla; and, at the same time, corrected the Italic translation of the New Testament by the Greek. (See Mill, No. 852, 853.)

In his preface, however, Jerome informs us, (No. 1356.) that he corrected it only in those passages where he thought the meaning of the Greek text was misrepresented. The other passages, in which the deviations from the original were of less importance, he suffered to remain as he found them, that his might not appear to be very different from the former edition of the Italic version, which at that time was universally used. Afterwards, between the years 392 and 405, Jerome translated all the books of the Old Testament from the Hebrew.—

This second version, as well as his corrections of the Italic translation of the New Testament, being disapproved by many of the bishops and learned men of that age, lessening the credit of the old translation, a new edition of the Italic version was compiled, in which its translations of the Psalms, and of some other books of the Old Testament, were retained, (Simon, Hist. Crit. 1. ii. c. 7.), and Jerome's second version of the rest was adopted, together with his corrected translation of the New Testament. The Italic version of the Bible, thus modelled and amended, is what hath long been known in the church by the name of The Vulgate. And though at the first that edition was rejected by many who adhered to the Italic translation in its primitive form, yet the prejudices of the public subsiding by degrees, it came at length into such general esteem, that it was substituted in place of the Italic, which had been long publicly read in the western churches, and in all the churches of Afin the original languages. Nay, in times more enlightened, I mean about the beginning of the Reformation, when Luther translated the New Testament into the German language, and Tyndal into the English, and Olive-tan into the French, though these excellent men are said to have made their translations from the Hebrew and Greek, it is more probable that they made them from the Vulgate, and corrected them by the Greek. This was the case with Tyndal, as shall be shown afterwards. These fathers of the Reformation, before their eyes were a little opened, having known no other word of God but the Latin Bible, it was natural for them to follow it in their translations, where the doctrine in dispute between them and the Papists did not interfere. The high esteem in which the Vulgate version was held at that time, was strongly displayed by the fathers of the council, many of them eminent for their learning, when, in the fourth session, after enumerating the books of Scripture, they decreed as follows: "If any person does not esteem these books, with all their parts, as contained in the Vulgate edition, to be Scriptures and canonical, let him be anathema." Then, to strengthen their decree, they added, "That in all public readings, disputations, preaching, and expounding of the Scriptures it is to be held as authentic."

(Fra. Paolo's History of the Council of Trent.) It is true, the first reformers neither acknowledged the authority of the council, nor carried their respect for the Vulgate translation so far as to place it on an equality with the originals; yet it was natural for them to follow that highly esteemed ancient version, especially when they were at any loss for the meaning of the Greek text.

Beza, perhaps, may be thought an exception from this charge. He translated the New Testament into Latin, professedly to amend the Vulgate version. Yet any one who compares his translation with the Vulgate, will find that, notwithstanding he hath corrected a number of its faults, he hath often followed it in passages where it is erroneous. Many of the Greek particles he hath translated with more latitude than is done in the Vulgate. Yet, having followed its uniform translations of those particles in other passages, he hath perpetuated, in his version, a number of its errors. Besides, being deeply tinctured with the scholastic theology, by adopting the readings of the Vulgate which favored that theology. (No. 1258.), and by strained criticisms, he hath made texts express doctrines, which, though they may be true, were not intended by the inspired writers to be set forth in them: And thus, by presenting his favorite doctrines to the view of the reader, more frequently than is done in the Scriptures, he hath led the unlearned to lay a greater stress on these doctrines than is done by the Spirit of God. Nor is this all; he hath mistranslated a number of texts, for the purpose, as it would seem, of establishing his peculiar doctrines, and of confusing his opponents.—of all which examples shall be given afterwards. Farther, by omitting some of the original words, and by adding others without any necessity, he hath in his translation perverted, or at least darkened some passages; so that, to speak impartially, his translation is neither literal, nor faithful, nor perspicuous. Nevertheless, Baza having acquired great fame, both as a linguist and a divine, the learned men who afterwards translated the New Testament, for the use of the reformed churches, were too much awed by his opinions.

Since then, the first translators of the Scriptures were considered as patterns, and copied by those who succeeded them, to judge whether the versions of the New Testament, hitherto published, stand in need of amendment, it will be proper to inquire a little into the character and qualifications of the first translators of these inspired writings. It is true, neither their names, nor any particulars by which we might have judged of their learning and ability, are preserved in the history of the church. Yet both may be estimated by the well-known characters of their contemporaries, whose writings still remain; particularly Tatian, Irenaeus, and Tertullian; and by the characters and talents of the Christian writers of the ages immediately following; such as Origen, Chrysostom, Jerome, and others. These ancient writers, however learned in other respects, were not well acquainted with the meaning of the Scriptures, nor free from the prejudices of the age in which they lived. This appears from the writings of the three first mentioned fathers, in which we find them misinterpreting particular passages, for the purpose of establishing their own erroneous tenets. In like manner the three last mentioned ancients, in their writings, have permitted a number of texts, to support the doctrines of purgatory and celibacy, and to bring monstrosy, and rigid fasting, and other bodily mortifications into vogue; and to confirm the people in their superstitions of worshipping angels and departed saints, all which corruptions had then taken place in the church. We find these fathers, likewise, misinterpreting passages without any particular design. Of this number was Origen, as may be seen in his exposition of the epistle to the Romans. Even Jerome himself was not faultless in the respects above mentioned, as shall be shown in the author's notes on Gal. ii. 11. iii. 16., not to mention, that in his criticisms on St. Paul's style he hath discovered that he was not well acquainted with the use and propriety of the Greek language. Wherefore, though we do not know who were the first translators of the New Testament, we may believe that they were not more intelligent, nor more skilful in the Scriptures, than their contemporaries, whose writings still remain; consequently that they were not perfectly qualified for making an accurate translation of writings divinely inspired, wherein many ideas respecting religion are introduced which they did not fully comprehend.

More particularly, the ancient translators, that their versions might be strictly literal, not only rendered the Greek text verbatim, but introduced the Greek idioms and syntax into their versions, by which they rendered them not a little obscure. Nevertheless, by closely following the original, they were restrained from indulging their own fancy in the translation, and have shown us what were the readings of the Greek copies which they made use of—which certainly are no small advantages. Farther, so great was their anxiety to give an exact representation of the original, that when they did not know the meaning of any Greek word in the text, they inserted it in their version in Latin characters, without attempt.

1 Greek words in Latin characters are found in the following passages of the Vulgate:—Matt. xx. 36. Siquidem tuus deses te (ex multis) scelus ab inuentis. —Jn. vii. 49. Cuius non vidisti me? Ex Nt. xii. 49. Aq. —Col. i. 19. Quem non amat amator? Ex Nt. xvi. 7. Quo non amat obierant. —Heb. v. 12. Sicut neque illos sibi donati. —1 Cor. iv. 13. Idoneum (ut semper) sibi pertinent. Non quidem. —1 Cor. v. 7. Sicut enim (ut semper) sibi pertinet. Non quidem. —Heb. xii. 27. Cessante (ut semper) in melius. —1 Pet. ii. 38. Exstante (ut semper) in melius. —1 Pet. ii. 38. Exstante interpretis Dacice, which is a Greek word of difficulty difficult interpretation. —4 Of erroneous translations in the Vulgate, numerous examples might be given; but the following may suffice.—Matt. xi. 21. Panem mysticum (ut semper) superadditionem, superadditionem. —Jn. vi. 36. Scopus, superaddition. —In nine passages the Vulgate hath translated the word werkten by superadditionem. See also the following notes.

1 The words wanting in the sense in the following passages are not supplied in the Vulgate:—Rom. iv. 4. Ex resurrectione nescit Iesum Christum.—Heb. xi. 20. Et adducta facies virgine non. —The following are examples of words added in the Vulgate without necessity.—Rom. iii. 31. In commune.—Rom. v. 3. Secundum, seu est dominus.—Rom. vi. 2. In eum quod est gratia.—Rom. vii. 17. Non sunt eritorum Dce. —The following are examples of absurd unintelligible translations in the Vulgate:—Rom. iv. 4. Qui conturbatur.—Rom. vi. 2. scelus ab inuentis. —Jn. vii. 49. Et jam certius illa (ut semper) quod non habere verum.—Matt. xxiv. 2. Et intersequentia (ut semper) in melius. —Rom. xiv. 15. Veste ego dictus Dominus (ut semper) quasi mel hic factus. been guided by it, we may now with some degree of confidence affirm, that the agreement observable in the ancient and modern versions of the New Testament, especially in the more difficult passages, is owing, not to the justness of the translation, but to the translators having, one after another, followed the old itallic version, as it was corrected by Jerome in the Vulgate edition. This being the case, it cannot be thought strange, that the errors and obscurities of the Vulgate have entered more or less into all the ancient versions of the New Testament, and that from them they have crept into many of the modern versions likewise.*

Sect. II.—Of the modern Versions of the New Testament; and particularly of the English Translations of the greatest note.

As the author does not pretend to be acquainted with all the vernacular translations of the Scriptures, used at present by the different nations of Europe, he will not take upon him to say how far they have copied the Vulgate. But this he may affirm, that most of the vernacular versions of the Scriptures made by the Roman Catholics since the reformation are translations of the Vulgate.

And with respect to the Protestants, though Luther and Olivetan gave out that they made their versions from the Hebrew, they must be understood with some limitation, if F. Simon’s opinion be true, namely, that neither the one nor the other understood Hebrew so well as to be able to translate the Scriptures from that language. Be that, however, as it will, this is known, that all the vernacular versions now used by the Lutherans are translations of Luther’s German Bible, and that most of those used by the Calvinists are translations either from Olivetan’s version, as corrected by Calvin, or from Beza’s Latin New Testament; consequently, neither the Lutherans nor the Calvinists can call their versions exact as they should be. But without insisting on this, the author supposes the utility of a new English translation of the apostolic epistles will be sufficiently evinced, if it can be shown that the first English translators made their versions from the Vulgate, and that the subsequent translators, by copying them, have retained a number of the errors of that ancient version.

WICKLIFF’S NEW TESTAMENT.—If we except the Saxton translation of the four gospels, mentioned p. 2, the most ancient English version of the New Testament now remaining is that which was made by John Wickliff, a fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Such a change had taken place in the language since the Norman conquest, that the Anglo-Saxon, the only English version of the Scriptures then extant, was in Wickliff’s time become unintelligible to the common people, who either understood a number of the words, or not the spelling, or even the letters in which it was written. This excellent person, therefore, with a view to expose the errors of popery, and to spread the knowledge of religion among his countrymen, employed himself in making a translation of the New Testament into the English language, as it was then spoken, and finished it about the year 1387. But because, by translating the Scriptures, Wickliff put it in the power of every one who could read to compare the doctrines of Rome with the doctrines of Christ, his translation was universally condemned as heretical by the Romish clergy; and a bill was brought into the House of Lords, anno 1390, for suppressing it. But the Duke of Lancaster, a favourer of Wickliff, and uncle to King Richard II., opposing the bill, it was thrown out. After Wickliff’s death, by a constitution of the convocation at Oxford, the reading of his translation was prohibited, and some, for using it, suffered death.

Wickliff did not make his translation of the New Testament from the Greek, which it is thought he did not understand, but from the Latin Bible then read in the churches, which he rendered verbally, without regarding the idiom of the languages. A translation of the New Testament made in that manner, from such an incorrect copy as the Latin Bible then was, could not miss to be both erroneous and obscure. Nevertheless, being anxiously sought after, and much read by persons of all ranks, it was of great use in opening the eyes of the nation to the errors of popery; and the rather, that to the books of the New Testament Wickliff had prefixed a translation of Jerome’s prologues, with some additions of his own, tending to expose the Romish superstitions. Afterwards, the faults of Wickliff’s translation being discovered, some of his followers, as Lewis informs us, (p. 25.) revised it; or rather, made “another translation, not so strictly literal as his, and more according to the sense.” Of this revised translation, the MS. copies are more rare, though some of them are still preserved in the public libraries. In the advocates’ library at Edinburg, there is a beautiful MS. of Wickliff’s translation, on velum. But whether it is of the first, or of the revised translation, the author does not know.

TYNDAL’S TRANSLATION.—The next English translation of the New Testament which merits attention, was made in the reign of Henry VIII. by William Tyndal, a Welchman, educated in Magdalen-Hall, Oxford, where he read lectures in divinity. But after a while, becoming sensible of the errors of popery, to show their opposition to the word of God, he formed the design of translating the New Testament into English, and of publishing it from the press—a measure so necessary, as both the language and orthography of Wickliff’s translation were become in a great measure obsolete.

While Tyndal was executing his pious intention, he fell under the suspicion of heresy, and was ordered to Antwerp, where, with the assistance of one John Frith, he finished his translation of the New Testament, and published it either at Antwerp or Hamburg in the year 1526.—When the copies of Tyndal’s translation were imported into England, and dispersed, the Romish clergy were exceedingly provoked. Some of them said it was impossible to translate the Scriptures into English; others, that it was not lawful for the clergy to transact their affairs in their mother tongue; others, that it would make them all heretics. They were displeased, likewise, because Tyndal, like Wickliff, had interpreted the sacred words (sec. p. 8), whose meaning they wished to hide from the people; because, having appropriated these words to themselves, as long as they were not understood, the clergy were at liberty to affix to them any sense they pleased, for aggravating their own cause. Wherefore when they found that Tyndal, in his translation, had put the word senator for priest, congregation for church, love for charity, repentance for penance, &c. they were so enraged, that, by various constitutions, they condemned... the whole of his translation as heretical, forbade the people to read it, made strict search after the copies of it, and all that they found they burnt publicly. But the more Tyndale’s translation was condemned, the more it was sought after and read; insomuch that the Dutch booksellers printed four editions of it before Tyndale thought fit to reprint it. Concerning these Dutch editions, it is to be observed, that as the editors did not understand the English language themselves, and had no person skilled in it to correct their presses, three of their editions are extremely erroneous.

While the foreign booksellers were making gain of Tyndale’s labours, he was employed in translating the five books of Moses into English, with an intention to publish them likewise. In this part of his work he was assisted by Myles Coverdale, a native of Yorkshire, and one of the Austin friars in Cambridge, who, being suspected of heresy, had fled to the continent. Having finished his translation, Tyndale printed it at Malbourough (Marburg), in the land of Hesse, in the year 1530. To each of the books of Moses he prefixed a prologue, and on the margin placed notes, and added ten wooden cuts, representing the ark, the candlestick, &c. About this time, likewise, he translated the prophecy of Jonah, and some other books of Scripture.

In the year 1534, the Dutch booksellers having resolved to print a fourth edition of Tyndale’s New Testament, they hired one George Joyce (a Bedfordshire man, bred in Peterhouse, Cambridge), to correct the press. But, as Joyce tells us in his preface, “he not only corrected the errors of the press; but when he came to some dark sentences, having the Latin text by him, he made them plainer, and gave many words their native signification, which they had not before.” This edition was printed at Antwerp in August 1534.

In November 1534 the papal dominion was abolished in England, and the king’s supremacy established by act of parliament; so that a way was opened for the reformation of religion, to the unspokable advantage of the English nation.

This year, Tyndale published his New Testament a second time, because, in his former edition, as he acknowledges in the preface, “there were many faults, which the lack of help, and oversight, had occasioned.” The title of this edition is, “The New Testament, diligently corrected, and printed in the year of our Lord 1534, in November.” And at the end, “Printed at Antwerp by Martin Empour.” But the Dutch booksellers had made such haste, that, as was just now mentioned, their edition was published in August, three months before Tyndale’s.

It hath been commonly said, that Tyndale made his translation of the New Testament from the Greek; but no such thing is said in the titles of any of the editions published by himself, or by Joyce. In the library of St. Paul’s church, London, there is an edition with this

“If as Lewis informs us, Tyndale translated an entire of the books he must have had some knowledge of the Greek; but as that language was very little studied in those days, it may be doubted whether he understood it so well as to be able to translate the New Testament from the Greek. The Hebrew being still less studied in England, it is generally believed that neither he nor Coverdale understood that language. Besides, the short time they spent in finishing their translations of the books of the Old Testament, renders it more than probable that they did not make their translations from the Hebrew, but from the Latin Bible. Perhaps they compared their translations with the originals. For, with a very slender knowledge of the languages, they may have done what Olearian says he did, when he made his French translation from the Hebrew.

at Cambridge, where, in 1535, he took the degree of bachelor of arts; then, removing to Oxford, he was made a junior canon of Cardinal's college; after that, taking orders, he was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, where, meeting with Tyndal, he was by him made sensible of the errors of popery. From Antwerp he went to Marbeck, and became pastor of a congregation there.

Before this edition of Coverdale's Bible was finished, Tyndal was burnt as an heretic. Wherefore Rogers, fearing that the prefixing of Tyndal's name to it might occasion its being ill received by the common people, published it under the feigned name of Thomas Matthew, and dedicated it to Henry VIII. Bishop Bale says, Rogers translated the Bible from the beginning to the end, having recourse to the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, English, and German copies. But Lewis says this is evidently a mistake. For the Bible called Matthew's is not a new translation, but, as Wanley observes, to the end of Charles II. In Tyndal's, and from that to the end of the Apocalypse, it is Coverdale's. He ought to have excepted Jonah, which is of Tyndal's translation, having his prologue prefixed to it. The translation of the New Testament is likewise in Tyndal's, and in the prefaces and notes. Further, that the translation which goes under the name of Matthew's was not made from the originals, is evident from the title, which runs thus: "The Bible, which is all the Holy Scripture, in which are contained the Old and Newe Testament, truely and purely translated into Englysh: By Thomas Mathew." This, which is commonly called Matthew's Bible, was begun and finished under the patronage of archbishop Cranmer; for it was presented by Grafton to him, and to the lord Cromwell; and Cromwell, at the archbishop's request, presented it to the king, who permitted it to be bought and used by all persons without distinction.—Rogers returned to England in Edward VI.'s time, and was made a prebendary of St. Paul's. But when Mary came to the throne, he was apprehended and condemned under the name of Rogers, alias Matthew, for having published this translation of the Bible under the name of Matthew. He was the first martyr in that reign.

HOLYHOUSE'S NEW TESTAMENT.—It seems the Papists, about this time, to discredit the English translations of the Scriptures before mentioned, affirmed that they were contrary to the Latin Bible, which was then used in the churches, and which, as the Rhemish translators afterwards expressed it, was considered as truer than the original. By this means they made the copies of the Greek New Testament then used.

For in the year 1538, Coverdale, to show that his translation of the New Testament was not derived from the common Latin Bible, allowed one Johan Hollyhouse to print, in a column opposite to the Vulgate Latin, the English translation of the New Testament, which Coverdale had formerly set forth in his Bible. This Hollyhouse published while Coverdale was abroad, with the following title: "The New Testament, both in Latin and English, cote correspondent to the other, after the Vulgate, commonly called St. Jerome's, faithfully translated by Johan Hollyhouse, anno 1538." After that year, 1539, Grafton, and Holychurch published a new edition of the English Bible, with the following title: "The Byble in Englishe, that is to say, the content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Olde and Newe Testaments, truely translated after the vertye of the Hebreuse and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of diverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tongue." This is the first time any English translation of the Bible was set forth as made after the veryty of the originals. (See page 5, note.) Who the divers excellent learned men were, by whose diligent study this translation was made, is not known. Johnson says it was corrected by Coverdale. And from the splendid manner in which it was printed, Lewis conjectures that it was intended to be used in the churches, and was patronized by Cranmer, who might appoint some learned men to assist Coverdale in correcting it. But whoever these excellent learned men were, it is certain that this is no new translation from the originals, but, as Lewis observes, a revision only of Matthew's, that is, Rogers' edition, with some small alterations. However, a different name was given to them, as were Tyndal's prefaces and notes, because they had been blamed as heretical and defamatory. In this edition, the additions to the Hebrew and Greek originals, the Vulgate Latin are translated, and inserted in a smaller letter than the text, particularly the three verses in Psalm xiv., which were omitted by Coverdale and Matthew; likewise the famous text, 1 John, ch. v. 7, which Tyndal, in his New Testament, (published in 1525), had printed in small letters, to show that it was not then in the common Greek copies. Next, where the editors found various readings in the text, they prefixed a cross to the word. In the third place, to supply, in some measure, the want of the notes, they placed on the margin, hands pointing to the texts which were supposed to condemn the errors of popery, that the reader might attend to them. This Bible being printed with types of a greater size than common, and in a large folio, with a fine emblematical frontispiece, said to be designed by Hans Holben, and beautifully cut in wood, it was called The Great Bible.

When the liturgy was first compiled, in the reign of Edward VI., the epistles, gospels, and psalms put into it, were all according to this translation; and so they continued till the restoration of Charles II., when the epistles, though in some places he used the honest and just liberty of a grammarians, as was serviceable for the reader's better understand- yere, yet, because he was loth to swerve from the text (the Vulgate Latin), he so regulated his pen, that, as he had translated, he might make plain construction of it by the English that standeth on the other side. In 1539 Coverdale set forth a second edition of the New Testament, with a dedication to the lord Cromwell, in which, speaking of his indulgence to publish the former edition, he says, "Iassuar as the New Testament which he had set forth in Eng- lid before anonymously, in his Bible, did so agree with the Latin, he was hardly well content that the Latin and the English text should be so near one another (namely, by Holyhouse), promised always, that the corrector should follow the true copy of the Latin in every way, and to keep the true and right English of the same; and so doing, he was content to set his name to it; and so he did, trusting, that though he was out of the land, all should be well. But when he had pressed this copy, he found, that, as it was disgraceable to his former translation in English (Tyndal's translation, which he had copied in his Bible), so was not the true copy of the Latin text observed, neither the English so correspondent to the same as it ought to be. Therefore he endeavored himself to wade out the faults that were in the Latin and English, and correct them. According to these quotations it is evident, that the translation of the New Testament which Coverdale allowed Holyhouse to print with the Latin text, was the one which he had published in his Bible; consequently it was Tyndal's translation. It is evident, likewise, that that translation was made from the Vulgate, and in so literal a manner, that the reader might make plain construction of the text in the Latin. It is certain, that the English was true, Coverdale in some places corrected the Latin text; but it was only as a grammarians; and in the corrections he was careful to swerve as little as possible from his text. Wherefore, Coverdale having assisted Tyndal in making his translation, they followed one and the same method; that is, both of them translated the Scriptures from the Vulgate; both of them translated the Vulgate literally; and both of them corrected the Vulgate as grammarians, making use of other translations for that purpose; such as, for the Old Testament, the Septuagint; Luther's German version, and Mynster's Latin translation; and for the New, Wickhille's and Rimsens' versions, and what others they could find.
and gospels were inserted from King James’s Bible; but the psalms of the Great Bible were allowed to remain.

Crane’s Bible. In 1540 another edition of the English Bible was printed in folio, with this title: “The Bible in English; that is to say, the content of al the Holy Scripture, both of the Old and Newe Testament, with a prologue thereunto made by the Reverend Father in God, Thomas Archbishopp of Canterbury.” On account of this prologue, and because Cranmer amended the translation in this edition, in some places, with his own pen, it hath been called Crane’s Bible, though it is little different from the Great Bible. In this, as in the Great Bible, the verses of the psalms, proverbs, &c. which are not in the Hebrew, but which are translated from the Vulgate, are printed in smaller letters, and the order of the psalms is different from that of the Vulgate, being according to the Hebrew.

By Cranmer’s influence with the king, a proclamation was issued in May 1540, ordering this Bible to be bought, and placed in the churches. But the popish party making great complaints of the English translations in general as heretical, an act of parliament passed in January 1542, prohibiting the reading of Tyndal and Coverdale’s translation in any church or open assembly within the kingdom. However, the king being resolved to have an English translation of the New Testament, which should be authorized by the clergy, Cranmer, in a convocation which met in February 1542, required the bishops and clergy, in the king’s name, to revise the translation of the New Testament. Accordingly, each bishop had his part assigned to him. But Stokesly, bishop of London, refusing to execute his part, the design miscarried.

Of Tyndal and Coverdale’s translation of the Bible, and of its revisions by Cranmer and others, many complaints were made, even by the Protestants. B. Sandys wrote to Abp. Parker, that “the setters forth of this our common translation followed Munster too much.” And of the New Testament in the Great Bible, Laurence, a noted Greek scholar in that age, observed, that there are words which it hath not aptly translated; words and pieces of sentences in the original which it hath omitted; words not in the original which it hath superfluously added; nay, he charged this translation even with errors in doctrine. The encouragers also of the Geneva edition represented this Bible as ill translated, and falsely printed, and gave it the invidious name of a corrupted Bible.

Henry VIII., dying in January 1546, was succeeded by his son, Edward VI., in whose first parliament the above mentioned statute was reversed. The gospels and epistles were now, for the first time, appointed to be read in English in the public service.

In 1550 an edition of the New Testament was published with this title, “The New Testament diligently translated by Myles Coverdale, and conferred with the translacyon of William Tyndal.” Coverdale’s translation here mentioned seems to have been that which he published in the second edition of Holybusho’s New Testament.

Geneva Bible. Edward VI. dying in July 1553, was succeeded by Mary, who immediately restored the popish regime; and accordingly accelerated the favourers of the reformation with such cruelty, that many of them fled into foreign countries; among whom was Coverdale, who, in Edward’s reign, had returned to England, and had been made bishop of Exeter. He, with some others, fixed their residence at Geneva, where they employed themselves in making a translation of the Bible. They began with the New Testament, which they published in 1540, printed with a small but beautiful letter, in 1557. This is the first printed edition of the New Testament, in which the verses of the chapters are distinguished by numeral figures and breaks.

Styrpe, in his Annales of the Reformation, tells us, that the Geneva brethren, after publishing their New Testament, proceeded to revise the Old. But not having finished it when Elizabeth came to the throne, some of them stayed behind the rest to complete their design. And having finished the Old Testament, they published the whole Bible at Geneva in 1540, in the year 1560, printed by Rowland Hall. This is what is commonly called The Geneva Bible; concerning which F. Simon affirms, that it is only a translation of a French version made at Geneva some time before. But he said this perhaps to disparage the work. In this translation cuts are inserted, representing the garden of Eden, Noah’s ark, &c. They likewise added a variety of notes, with two tables; one containing an interpretation of the names, and the other an account of the principal matters in the Scriptures. There is also an epistle to Queen Elizabeth, in which they charge the English reformation with retaining the remains of popery, and exhort her to strike off certain ceremonies. But this epistle giving offence, it was omitted in the subsequent editions. The Geneva Bible was so universally used in private families, that there were above thirty editions of it in folio, 4to., and 8vo., printed from the year 1560 to the year 1616. The authors of this edition being all zealous Calvinists, their translation and notes are calculated to support the doctrine and discipline of that party. For which reason it was better esteemed at its first appearance than it hath been in later times.

The Bishops’ Bible. Queen Mary dying in November 1558, was succeeded by Elizabeth, who, treading in the steps of her brother Edward VI., suppressed the Roman superstition in all her dominions, and filled the sees with Protestants. After this, Abp. Matthew Parker having represented to the queen that many churches were without Bibles, or had incorrect copies, she resolved that a revision and correction of the former translation should be made, in order to publication. The archbishop therefore appointed some of the most learned of the bishops and others to revise the Bible commonly used, and to compare it with the originals; and to each of them he assigned a particular book of Scripture, with directions not to vary from the former translation, except where it was not agreeable to the original, and to add marginal notes for explaining the difficult text; reserving to himself the oversight of the whole. A revision of the English Bible, on the same plan, had been proposed by Cranmer (see above); but the design did not take effect. Parker was more successful in his attempt. The persons employed by him performed their tasks with such cheerfulness, that the whole was ready for the press in the year 1568; and in that year the Bible of the bishops’ revision was printed in a very elegant manner, with a beautiful English letter, on a royal paper, in a large folio, by Richard Jugge, the queen’s printer. In this edition, which contains the Apocrypha, the chapters are divided into verses, as in our Bibles; and the several additional words of the Latin, which in the Great Bible were printed in small characters, are omitted, except the 1 John 5 v. 7, which is printed in the same character with the rest of the text. To this edition Parker added some good notes, different from those of Tyndal and Coverdale, and two prefaces. In the one to the Old Testament he exhorted the people to study the Scriptures, which, after St. Jerome, he termed The Scriptures of the People. In the preface to the New Testament, he advised the reader not to be offended with the diversity of translation. After the preface to the Old Testament Cranmer’s prologue is inserted, and before the psalms there is a prologue of St. Basil. On the margin, besides the notes, there are references, and the whole is embellished with cuts and maps. This Bible, on account of the pains which the bishops took in perfecting it, was called The Bishops’ Bible, and was authorized to be read in the churches. Yet it was found fault with by some, on prejudice. He did not as much as say it should be the cause in the Old Testament it does not always follow the Hebrew, but in some places is on purpose accommodated to the LXX., and is disgraced with divers errors. But Levinares, the Bishops’ Bible, first faced all the worse through the interpenetration of the sticklers for the Geneva translation.” In 1572 the Bishops’ Bible was reprinted in folio, in the same splendid manner as in 1568, with a few additions and alterations.

L. THOMSON’S NEW TESTAMENT.—In the year 1583, one Laurence Thomson, an under-secretary to Sir F. Walsingham, published an English version of Beza’s Latin translation of the New Testament, which he added notes from Beza, Cameronius, and others. This translation differs so very little from the Geneva Bible, that it was sometimes printed with the Geneva translation of the Old Testament.

RHEIMS NEW TESTAMENT.—The English Papists, who after Queen Mary’s death fled to Rhemse, finding it impracticable to hinder their countrymen from having the Scriptures in their mother-tongue, published an English translation of the New Testament from the authenticity Latine; that is, from the Vulgate, printed at Rheims by John Pogany, in the year 1582. At the same time they promised a translation of the Old Testament in the same language. Their translation of the New Testament, the Rhemists rendered unintelligible to common readers, by introducing into it a number of hard words, neither Greek, nor Latin, nor English, but a barbarous mixture of the three languages, such as Asyrm, Turch, Holis casat, Prepos, Pasche, Paracaseus, Nephite, Evangelize, Penance, Chalice, Host, &c. These are what the Romish clergy call ecclesiastical and sacred words; and by affirming that they contain certain deep and inexplicable meanings, they have raised in the minds of the vulgar a superstitious veneration of the clerical orders, to the enslaving of their consciences; (see p. 4.) To their translation the Rhemists added notes, from what they called the catholic tradition, from the expositions of the fathers, and from the decrees of popes and councils, for the support of the Romish errors. This is what goes by the name of the Rhemish New Testament.—In the year 1589, Dr. Fulke, master of Pembroke-hall, Cambridge, reprinted this translation, together with that of the Bishops’ Bible, in two columns; and in his notes confuted all its arguments, glosses, annotations, manifest impieties, and slanders against the translations used in the church of England; and dedicated the whole to Queen Elizabeth.

DOWAY BIBLE.—About twenty-seven years after the publication of the Rheims New Testament, an English translation of the Old Testament, from the authenticity Latine, came forth from the English college of Doway, in two vol. 4to; the first in the year 1609, the second in 1616, both printed at Doway by Laurence Kellam. But this translation is of the same complexion with the Rheims New Testament, having been made many years before in the college of Rheims, by the very same persons who translated the New Testament; for it was only revised and published by their brethren of the college of Doway.

KING JAMES’S BIBLE.—Queen Elizabeth dying in March 1603, was succeeded by James VI. King of Scotland, who, soon after his arrival at London, received a petition from the puritan ministers, desiring a reforming of certain ceremonies and abuses in the church. In consequence of this petition, the king appointed several bishops and deanies, together with the principal petitioners, to meet him at Hampton-court, January 12, 1603, to confer with him on these abuses. On the second day of the conference, the puritans proposed that a new translation of the Bible should be made; and no one opposing the proposition, the king, in the following year, appointed 54, or according to others, 47 persons, learned in the languages, for revising the common translation. These he divided into six companies, and to the several companies he allotted certain books of Scripture, to be translated or amended by each individual of the company separately. And that they might execute their work in the best manner, he prescribed to them certain rules which they were to observe.—The first was, that the work should be made ready for the public reading in the churches, commonly called the Bishops’ Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the original would permit.—The third was, that the old ecclesiastical words be kept; as the word church not to be translated congregation, &c.—The fifth; the division of the chapters to be altered, either not at all or as little as might be.—The sixth; no marginal notes to be affixed, but only for explaining the Hebrew and Greek words which could not be expressed in the text without some circumlocution.—The eighth; every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters; and having amended or translated them severally by himself, where he thought good, all were to meet together to compare what they had done, and to agree on what they thought should stand.—The ninth; when any one company had finished any book in the manner prescribed, to send it to the other companies to be considered by them.—The fourteenth; the translations of Tyndale, Coverdale, Matthew, Whitechurch, (the Great Bible), and Geneva, to be used where they agree better with the original than the Bishops’ Bible. This, therefore, was not to be a new translation, but a correction only or amendment of the Bishops’ Bible.—The translators entered on their work in spring 1607.

Selden, in his table-talk, says, “The king’s translators took an excellent way. That part of the Bible was given to the person who was most excellent in such a tongue. And then they met together, and one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands any Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, Italian, &c. If they found any fault they spoke; if not, he read on.” After long and earnest expectation, the Bible, thus revised, came out in the year 1611, dedicated to the king; and is that which at present is used in all the British dominions.

To this edition of the Bible it hath been objected, 1. That it often differs from the Hebrew, to follow the LXX. if not the German translation; particularly in the proper names.—2. That the translators, following the Vulgate Latin, have adopted many of the original words, without translating them; such as habitation, heritage, mammon, anathema, &c. by which they have rendered their version unintelligible to a mere English reader. But they may have done this in compliance with the king’s injunction concerning the old ecclesiastical words, and because, by long use, many of them were as well understood by the people as if they had been English.—2. That by keeping too close to the Hebrew and Greek idiom, they have rendered their version obscure.—3. That they were a little too compliant to the king, in favouring his notions of predestimation, election, witchcraft, familiar spirits, &c. But these, it is probable, were their own opinions, as well as the king's. That their translation is partial, speaking the language of, and giving authority to one sect. But this, perhaps, was owing to the restraint they were laid under by those who employed them. 4. That where the original words and phrases admitted of different translations, the worse translations, by plurality of voices, was put into the text, and the better was often thrown into the margin. 5. That notwithstanding all the pains taken in correcting this and the former editions of the English Bible, there still remain many passages mistranslated, either through negligence or want of knowledge; and that to other passages improper additions are made, which pervert the sense; as Matt. xx. 25, where, by adding the words it shall be given, it is insinuated, that some other person than the Son will distribute rewards at the day of judgment.

Such are the objections which have been made to the king's translation by the protestants. They are mentioned here as historical facts. How far they are just lies in the reader to consider. The objections made by the papists were the same with those which were made to the former translations; and particularly, that several texts are mistranslated, from the translators' aversion to the doctrines and usages of the church of Rome.

If the reader desires more full information concerning the English translations of the Bible, he may consult Anthony Johnson's historical account, published at London in 1730; also John Lewis's complete history of the several translations of the Bible in English, 3d edit. published at London in 1739. From which treatises, most of the facts relating to the English translations of the Bible mentioned in this section are taken.

Since the commencement of the present century, several English translations of the gospels and epistles have been published by private hands. But they are little different in the sense from the king's translation; or, if they differ, it is occasioned by their giving the sense of a few passages, not in a different translation, but in paraphrases which do not truly express the meaning of the original.

And even where the meaning is truly expressed, it cannot be said that the translation is improved by these paraphrases, at least in those instances, where the sense could have been represented with equal strength and perspicuity in a literal version.

From the foregoing account of the English translations of the Bible, it appears, that they are not different translations, but different editions of Tyndal and Coverdale's translation. It appears likewise, that Tyndal and Coverdale's translation, of which the rest are copies, was not made from the originals, but from the Vulgate Latin. For as they did not say in the title pages that their translation was made from the originals, and as Coverdale, in particular, declared in his prefaces to Holywood's New Testament, that he swerved as little as possible from his Latin text, it is reasonable to think that Tyndal and he made their translation from that text. Besides, it did not suit their purpose to translate from the originals. The Vulgate Latin text being the only word of God that was then known to the people, and even to many of the clergy, these translators knew, that the nearer their version approached to the Latin Bible, they would be the less offensive; a consideration which Coverdale acknowledges, in his prefaces, had great weight with him.

As Tyndal and Coverdale made their translation from the Vulgate, they could hardly avoid adopting a number of its errors. Some that were palpable they corrected, especially when the sense of the passage suggested the correction. But in translating the more difficult texts which they did not understand, they implicitly followed the Vulgate, as Luther, Erasmus, and others had done before them. It is true, their translation was often corrected in the editions of the English Bible, which were published from time to time. But the corrections were made chiefly in the phraseology. The alteration of the English language made it necessary, in every revival of the translation, to substitute modern words and phrases in place of those which were becoming obsolete. But few alterations were made in the sense, except in the passages which had a relation to the popish controversy, which, on that account, were considered with more care. Wherefore, each new edition being little different from the preceding one, none of them were esteemed new translations, as is plain from the public acts prohibiting the use of the English Bibles. For, in these acts, they are all called Tyndal and Coverdale's Translation.

To conclude:—If Tyndal and Coverdale's translation was made from the Vulgate Latin, and if the subsequent English translations, as they have been called, were only corrected editions of their version, and if the corrections made from time to time in the different editions, respected the language more than the sense, it is to be thought strange, that many of the errors of that translation, especially those copied from the Vulgate, have been continued ever since, in all the editions of the English Bible! Even that which is called the king's translation, though, in general, much better than the rest, being radically the same, is not a little faulty, as it was not thoroughly and impartially corrected by the revisers. It is, therefore, by no means such a just representation of the inspired originals as merit to be implicitly relied upon for determining the controverted articles of the Christian faith, and for quieting the disensions which have rent the church.

Sect. III.—Of the Principles on which the Translation now offered to the Public is formed.

The history of the ancient and modern versions of the Scriptures, given in the preceding sections, must have convinced every unprejudiced reader, that a translation of the sacred writings, more agreeable to the original, and more intelligible and unambiguous than any hitherto existing, is much wanted. In this persuasion, the author formed the design of translating the apostolic epistles, although he was sensible the attempt would be attended with great difficulties, and be liable to many objections. But objections were made to Jerome's corrections of the Italic version of the New Testament. And in an age much more enlightened, when the correction of the Bishops' Bible was proposed, there were some who did not approve of the design, fearing bad consequences would follow the alteration of a book rendered sacred in the eyes of the people by long use. On both occasions, however, these objections were justly disregarded, for the sake of the advantages expected from a translation of the inspired writings more consonant to the original. Wherefore, that the reader may be enabled to conjecture, whether, in the following version of the apostolical epistles, the alterations that are made in the translation be of sufficient importance to justify the author in publishing it, he will now explain the principles on which it is formed, in such a manner as to give a general idea of the number and nature of these alterations. At the same time, to remove such prejudices as may remain in the minds of the serious against altering the common translation, he will mention a few of the many advantages which will be derived from a new translation of the Scriptures, skillfully and faithfully executed.

Sensible that the former translators have been misled by copying those who went before them, the author, to avoid the errors which that method leads to, hath made his translation from the original itself. And that it might be a true image of the original, he hath at all times observed the following rules:—1. He hath translated the Greek text as literally as the genius of the two languages would permit. And because the sense of particular passages sometimes depends on the order of the words in the original, the author, in his translation, hath placed the English words and clauses, where it could be done to advantage, in the order in which the corresponding words and clauses hold in the original. By thus strictly adhering to the Greek text, where it could be done consistently with perspicuity, the emphasis of the sacred phraseology is preserved, and the meaning of the inspired penman is better represented, than it can be in a free translation. (See p. 11 note.) To these advantages add, that, in this literal method, the difficult passages being exhibited in their genuine form, the unlearned have thereby an opportunity of exercising their own ingenuity in finding out their meaning; whereas, in a free translation, the words of the inspired writer being concealed, no subject of examination is presented to the unlearned but the translator's sense of the passage, which may be very different from its true meaning.

2. As the Greek language admits an artificial order of the words of a sentence, or period, which the English language does not allow, in translating many passages of the apostolical epistles it is necessary to place the words in their proper connexion, without regarding the order in which they stand in the original. This method the author hath followed in his translations where it was necessary, and thereby hath obtained a better sense of many passages than that given in our English version, where the translators have followed the order of the Greek words, or have constructed them improperly.

3. With respect to the Hebraisma found in the Scriptures, it is to be observed, first, That as the Greek language, in its classical purity, did not furnish phrases fit to convey just ideas of spiritual matters, these could only be expressed intelligibly in the language of the ancient reveling them in their ordinary Bible. Farther, though he hath often deviated from the beaten road, the diversity of his translation will not be offensive, because, throughout the whole, he hath endeavoured to preserve that beautiful simplicity of style for which the Scriptures are so justly admired, together with those allusions to ancient manners and historical facts, implied in the phraseology by which the age and nation of the authors of these writings are known. In short, by observing the rules mentioned, the author hath endeavoured to make his translation as exact an image of the original as he could; not only because, in that method, it acquires the authority which a translation of writings divinely inspired ought to have, but because, by a faithful exhibition of the Scriptures in their original dress, there arises such a strong internal proof of their antiquity and authenticity, as far overbalances any inconveniences resulting from a few pleonastes, uncouth expressions, and grammatical anomalies, all common in ancient writings, and retained in this translation of the apostolical epistles, for the purpose of shewing the Scriptures in their unalloyed simplicity.

Yet many modern translators, disregarding that advantage, and aiming at an imaginary elegance of style, have departed from the words and phraseology of the original, in such a manner as to convert their translations of particular passages into paraphrases, which exhibit a meaning often different from that of the inspired writers; a fault from which our translators of the Bible are not altogether free.—It must be acknowledged, however, that there are some sentences in these invaluable writings which cannot be literally translated; and therefore, to represent their true meaning, recourse must be had to the paraphrastic method. But these are the only passages, in books divinely inspired, which should be paraphrased in the translation.

Among the free translators of the Scripture, Sebastian Castalio, some time professor of the Greek language at Basel, is the most eminent. But whatever praise he may deserve for the general propriety and conciseness of his translation of the New Testament, and for the purity of his Latin, it is certain that, by aiming at a classical and polished style, he hath often lost sight of the original, and hath given what he imagined to be its meaning, in words not at all corresponding to the Greek text; so that his translation of a number, or passages hath little relation to the original, consequently is erroneous. Wherefore, neither his nor Erasmus's, nor any other free translation of the Scriptures, can be relied on; because if a material word in the original is omitted in the translation, or if a word not in the original is added, without marking it as added, or if words not corresponding to the original are used, much more if a whole sentence, or even a part of a sentence is paraphrased, the meaning of the text very probably will be altered, if not entirely lost; consequently the version, in these passages, can have no authority.

It is time now to inform the reader, that this translation of the apostolical epistles differs not a little from the former versions, because therein meanings are affixed to a number of Greek words and phrases diverse from those given to them in the same passages by other translators. Yet the translation of these passages is not the less literal on that account. Persons conversant in the language, know that many Greek words have more meanings than one, all of them equally literal, though not equally common; and that the skill of a translator is shown in his choosing from among these different literal significations, the one that best suits the scope of the passage where it is found. And if he chooses judiciously, his translation will be more truly literal than those in which the more ordinary significations of the Greek words have been adopted, if these significations do not accord with the writer's design. The truth of this remark will appear, especially in those passages of the new translation, where the Greek particles have meanings affixed to them different from those given them in other versions, but not acknowledged elsewhere in Scripture. For, however much it hath been overlooked hitherto, it is certain that, in a version of St. Paul's epistles, the connexion and propriety of his reasoning will either appear, or be lost, according to the manner in which the particles, which connect the different parts of his discourse, are translated.

The author, therefore, to lay a firm foundation for the just translation of the Scriptures, hath been at great pains, in Prelim. Ego. IV. to establish the uncommon significations which, in some passages, he hath affixed to the Greek words and phrases, by examples brought from the Scriptures themselves, or from approved Greek writers. In the same essay he hath offered some grammatical remarks, by which the peculiarities of style observable in the writings of the Jews are illustrated. But what hath been one of the chief objects of his attention in that essay was, by examples taken from the Scriptures themselves, to explain the meaning and powers of the Greek particles, as used by the sacred writers. Some of these examples, at first sight, may perhaps appear inconclusive; because of the word, for the sake of which the example is produced, may, in that passage, be taken in its ordinary acceptation. Yet the other examples, in which it can have no meaning but that which the author hath given it, and which is acknowledged by

Rom. ii. 19.

A teacher of the uncivilized.

This translation of the clause Erasmus gave, on the pretence that no one teaches babes. But he had forgotten that the Jews gave to the Gentiles a teacher, as is elsewhere mentioned by the apostle, to show their contempt of them; and did not know, I suppose, that the apostle, by translating these contemptuous names in this passage, intended to point out the intolerable arrogance of the Jews in a lively manner. This example shows, that every translation of the Scriptures ought to be as literal as possible: because those who afterwards study them with care, may find proprieties in the original expressions, altogether overlooked by the free translator.

Of the influence which the right translation of the Greek particles hath to render the apostle's reasonings clear and conclusive, take for an example. This particle sometimes signifies that, sometimes therefore. Now, if it is translated in the former sense, where it hath the latter, the scheme of the discourse will be reversed; because that will be a reason, which was never an inference. (Compare the common English version of Rom. iv. 2, 3, Heb. vi. 11, 18, with the new translation of these passages.) In like manner, the other Greek particles having different significations, if, in a translation of the Greek, a particle is uniformly given to the same word, or if one of its senses is substituted for another, it will render the translation erroneous. Of this, Rom. viii. 4. That the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled, or, is a remarkable example. For this particle, as it presents men as absolutely passive in fulfilling the righteousness of the law. Whereas the true literal translation, which, therefore, is fulfilled, by us, who walk not according to the flesh. Many other examples might be given, but these may suffice.
our translators to be its meaning in these passages, make it probable that, in the first mentioned examples likewise, it hath the uncommon signification contended for, especially if, so understood, it agrees better with the context.—There are, however, two or three instances of uncommon significations given to words, for which the author can produce no authority. But he contends that the context leads to these significations of the words; and that, in giving them such signification, he is supported by critics and dictionary writers, who prove the uncommon significations which they affix to some words, only by producing a single passage from an approved author, in which it cannot be otherwise understood. See examples, 2 Pet. i. 20. note.

Many of the alterations introduced into this new translation, are in the common use; which, because it was settled according to the opinion of learned men in different countries, who compared a great number of MSS., and fixed on the readings which appeared to them best supported, the author hath not attempted to alter. Only because the oldest MSS. are written without any distinction of the words by intervening spaces, and of the sentences by commas and colons, and without the spiritus and accents; the author hath attended to the correcting and pointing of the common edition in a few instances, in order to obtain a better and more perspicuous sense of the passages, than that which arises from the common pointing. Further, although by the care with which other MSS. and versions have been collated, since the text of the New Testament was settled, more various readings have been procured, none of these readings are followed in this translation, except the few which our English Bible hath adopted, and which shall be mentioned in the notes. The author's attachment to the common text hath not proceeded from an implicit acquiescence in the opinion of the learned men who settled it, but from a persuasion that the readings which they adopted are, for the most part, better supported by MSS., and agree better with the context, than either the readings which they rejected, or than those which have been obtained since their time. Some of the rejected readings, indeed, will be of great use in guarding the unlearned against errors, which have a tendency to perplex their minds, and make them careless of the duties of morality. (See Rom. vii. 12. to the end; and 2 Cor. iii. 5. new translation.)—4. A just translation of the Scriptures, by exhibiting the doctrines of the gospel in their genuine simplicity, will sufficiently show the falsity of the cavils of infidels, which, for the most part, are founded on wrong views of the doctrines of revelation.—These certainly are objects, which all who have the interests of Christianity at heart must wish to see attained; objects of far greater importance to the welfare of the world than those which engross the attention of a frivolous age.

The text of the Greek New Testament followed in this translation, is the one in common use; which, because it was settled according to the opinion of learned men in different countries, who compared a great number of MSS., and fixed on the readings which appeared to them best supported, the author hath not attempted to alter. Only because the oldest MSS. are written without any distinction of the words by intervening spaces, and of the sentences by commas and colons, and without the spiritus and accents; the author hath attended to the correcting and pointing of the common edition in a few instances, in order to obtain a better and more perspicuous sense of the passages, than that which arises from the common pointing. Further, although by the care with which other MSS. and versions have been collated, since the text of the New Testament was settled, more various readings have been procured, none of these readings are followed in this translation, except the few which our English Bible hath adopted, and which shall be mentioned in the notes. The author's attachment to the common text hath not proceeded from an implicit acquiescence in the opinion of the learned men who settled it, but from a persuasion that the readings which they adopted are, for the most part, better supported by MSS., and agree better with the context, than either the readings which they rejected, or than those which have been obtained since their time. Some of the rejected readings, indeed, stand on an equal, or perhaps on a better authority than those in the received text. But as they make no material alteration in the sense of the passages where they assert which was not completed till the year 1557, and he dying, his Bible was not given to the public till about the year 1564.

The next person of some note who attempted to restore the true readings of the Greek Testament, was Erasmus, of Rotterdam. He, by collating five Greek MSS. and some Latin copies, amended both the Greek text and the Vulgate version, and published both, with large notes, at Basel, in the year 1516. This was the first copy of a Greek Testament that was published from the genuine Greek. Mill tells us, that, exclusive of typographical errors, it contains above 500 springing errors, and about 100 corrections. Both editions have the same apparatus, and, with a few exceptions, the same notes; and the text in the second edition differs from the Erasmian in not a few places.

In the year 1518, a Greek Testament was published at Venice by Andrea Ambrosii, Aldus's son-in-law; Aldus himself having died about two years before. Certain learned men corrected this edition, by collating it with some very ancient MSS. But its text is different from the Erasmian, which was published a little before.

Both editions have the same apparatus, and, with a few exceptions, the same notes; and the text in the second edition differs from the Erasmian in not a few places.

In the year 1522, Erasmus's third edition came out, printed at Basel by Froben, in which he followed the text of his second Greek Testament, except the 15 readings, which he took from the Aldine edition and some new MSS. which he had collated or examined; and, for the remainder, he marked the readings taken from Aldus.

The text in this is somewhat more correct than that in his second edition. And the famous text, 1 John v. 7, concerning the testimony of the Father, and the Word, and the Holy Ghost, is inserted in it in Greek. Erasmus says, he took it from a copy which he calls the Greek text. He says he inserted it that there might be no handle for calumniating him.

At the length, in the year 1526, the Complutensium, or Ximenes's Bible, was published in six vols. folio: a noble work, every way worthy of a nation at whose expense it was executed, and the Pope Leo X. did patronize it. The Old Testament consists of two columns in each page, and the New Testament is in one volume: the Greek text, according to the Vatican copy, with an interlinear Latin version. In the second column is the Vulgate, or Jerome's translation, correctly by the best MSS. The third column is the Hebrew text; and last are placed, in two columns, a Chaldean translation, and a Latin version of that translation.

In the second column is the Vulgate, or Jerome's translation, exactly by the best MSS. In the third column is the Hebrew text, and last are placed, in two columns, a Chaldean translation, and a Latin version of that translation.

In the year 1523, Simon Colomars, a Parisian printer, published his Greek Testament, without any preface informing the reader in what manner he had formed his text. So that it is uncertain whether he followed the text of any of the former printed editions, or any particular MS.; or whether he chose what he judged the best readings of all the manuscripts and printed copies he had examined.

Mill tells us, that, in his third edition, he made use of the Complutensian Bible. It has three columns in each page. In the first is the Greek text; in the second is Erasmus's own translation; and in the third is the Vulgate version. With respect to the Greek text of this edition, Erasmus professes to have followed that of the Complutensian Bible: for, though the text is, in general, agreeable to that of his third edition, Erasmus thought proper to deviate from it in 186 instances, and instead of its readings, to substitute those of the Complutensian Bible.

In the year 1526, Robert, son of Robert Stephen, published a Greek Testament, in the same volume, and with the same kind of type, wherein his father's first and second editions were printed, and added such of the readings of his father's third edition as he thought necessary to correct the text. The same was printed in the year 1527, and reprinted in 1529, and again in 1535.

The year 1527, saw the publication of a Greek Testament, in which he altered one or two of the erroneous readings which he had formerly adopted, and added some readings from two MSS. of great antiquity, namely, a MS. of the Fourth Gospel and of the Acts, with the Balaamic Scripture, before it was corrected by the Virginia copies of the Complutensian Bible.

In the year 1530, Robert, the son of Robert Stephen, published a Greek Testament, in the same volume, and with the same kind of type, wherein his father's first and second editions were printed, and added such of the readings of his father's third edition as he thought necessary to correct the text. The same was printed in the year 1527, and reprinted in 1529, and again in 1535.

which relate to controverted doctrines, the author hath mentioned in his notes; but without examining their authenticity, because of the many who are the unlearned are no judges; and, with respect to the learned, they may consult Mill, Wetstein, and others, who have made large collections of the various readings, and may judge for themselves.

In the larger edition of this work, the author, following Origen's plan, hath set the common English version opposite to his new translation, that the reader may see in what particulars they differ. And having placed the Greek text in a column between the two translations, the learned, by comparing them with the original, can easily judge to which version the preference is due.

SECT. IV.—Of the Prefaces, the Illustrations prefixed to the Chapters, and the Notes.

It is well known that the epistles to particular churches were written, either to correct certain irregularities into which they have fallen, or to confute the errors of false teachers, who endeavoured to seduce them. It is equally well known, that the epistles to particular persons were written to direct them in the discharge of the offices assigned to them, and to support them under the evils to which they were exposed, while faithfully executing these offices. Wherefore the knowledge of the state of the churches, and of the characters of the persons to whom the epistles were addressed, and of the erroneous doctrines which prevailed in the first age, must be of great use in studying the epistles. To give the reader some idea of these matters, the author has prefixed a preface to each epistle, in which, from the hints given in the epistle itself, and from particulars mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the writings of the fathers, he hath endeavoured to settle the date of the epistle, and to explain the state of the churches, and the character of the person to whom it was sent, together with the errors which it was written to correct.

In the new translation, the common division of the text into chapters and verses is retained, because the Scriptures have long been quoted according to that division. But, to remedy the inconveniences which that division had occasioned, by breaking the text, sometimes even in the middle of a sentence, the author hath prefixed to each chapter what he hath termed a View and Illustration. In those, the principal matters contained in the chapters are set at greater length than could be done in the commentary; the arguments used by the inspired writers for proving their positions are distinguished, their relation to these positions is pointed out, and the conclusion drawn from them is shown to be just. Also because St. Paul, in particular, hath omitted sometimes the major proposition of his argument, sometimes the minor, and often the conclusion itself, (see Gal. i, 20.), the author, in his Illustrations, hath endeavoured to complete those unfinished reasonings.

He hath also marked the apostle's digressions, mentioned the purposes for which they are introduced, and apprized the reader when he returns to his main subject. Lastly, in these views, care hath been taken to show how the apostle's words may be applied, for defending the Jewish and Christian revelations against the cavils of infidels.

Opposite to the new translation, the author hath placed an interpretation, in which the traditional words of the text are inserted, for the most part, without any alteration; because, in general, they express the inspired writer's meaning with more energy than it is possible to do by any words of human invention. This interpretation the author has called a commentary, rather than a paraphrase, because it is commonly made, not by expressing the meaning of the text in other words, but by supplying the things that are necessary for showing the scope and connection of the reasoning, or by mentioning particulars which the apostles have omitted, because they were well known to the persons to whom they wrote, but which, at this distance of time, being unknown to ordinary readers, must be suggested to them. These additions, being properly short notes intermixed with the text, for the purpose of explanation, are all printed in Roman characters, that the reader may distinguish them from the text, which is printed in Italics.

As a translator of the Scriptures, the author thought himself bound to give the true literal version of every passage, according to the best of his judgment, without regarding whether it favoured or opposed his own particular opinions, or any of the schemes of doctrine which have divided the Christian world. Yet, as an interpreter, he hath taken the liberty, in his commentary, to submit to his readers, though not always with the same assurance, what in his opinion is the meaning of the passage. There are, indeed, some texts which he hath not ventured to explain, because, though all agree in the translation of them, their meaning hath been much disputed. But in the notes he hath shown how the contending parties explain them for supporting their particular tenets; and hath fairly represented the arguments by which they justify their own interpretations, without concealing any thing that seemed to be of importance on either side. And if, on some occasions, he hath leaned towards the interpretation of a disputed text, given by one of the parties, the reader must not conclude that he holds the opinion which that interpretation is advanced to support; for he will find that, in explaining other texts, he hath given interpretations which favour the contrary doctrine. In both cases, his only motive for approving these interpretations was, that he judged them the true meaning of the text.
Sect. IV.  GENERAL

Preface.

The passages. The balancing of these seemingly opposite passages against each other, and the application of them for the purpose of supporting a particular doctrine, or scheme of doctrine, not falling within the author’s plan, he hath left it, for the most part, to theologians, with that opinion, that the only foundation on which the doctrines of revelation can be securely built is the Scriptures, understood in their plain grammatical meaning. And therefore, in all cases where opposite doctrines have been founded, not on one or two, but on a number of texts, according to their unconstrained meaning, the one class of texts ought not, by forced criticism, to be turned from their plain grammatical meaning, to make them accord with the scheme of doctrine built on the other class. For it will be found, that these seemingly inconsistent texts speak of persons and things of whose existence we are not able to judge. So that the things said concerning them in the Scriptures, which appear inconsistent, may all be true, though we are not able to reconcile them with each other. And as, in natural religion, there are facts discovered to us, by reason and experience, from which seemingly contradictory conclusions may be drawn, both of which we must believe though we are not able to reconcile them, why may not the seemingly inconsistent facts made known in the Scriptures be received as true, upon the testimony of God, though we cannot reconcile them with each other? Wherefore it is no objection to the plain wise and grammatical interpretation of the Scriptures, that it gives them the appearance of inconsistency. If that appearance is in the Scriptures themselves, why should it be concealed, either in the translation or in the interpretation? A translator or an interpreter of the sacred oracles will certainly show, not only greater honesty and candour, but will even come nearer to the truth, when he suffers their real aspect to remain, than if, for the purpose of establishing particular doctrines, or for reducing everything in revelation to the measure of human conceptions, he attends only to one class of texts, and, by forced criticism, turns all the opposite texts from their plain grammatical meaning to artificial senses which they do not admit without much straining; a practice which hath been too much followed in interpreting the Scriptures, not by one sect only, but by all the different sects of Christians in their turn.

It remains, that some account be now given of the matters contained in the notes. In the first place, then, when the author introduces the interpretations of former commentators, he commonly mentions in the notes the proofs by which they support their interpretations; hoping they may be of use, even to the learned, by bringing things to their remembrance which otherwise, perhaps, they might not have recollected. In the second place, as the Christian revelation is founded on the Jewish, and is the completion of it, the apostles, in explaining the doctrines of the gospel, have not only used the language of the Jewish Scriptures, but have frequently quoted or alluded to particular passages in them. Wherefore, that ordinary readers may understand the Scripture phraseology, which, in many particulars, is very different from the language of the European nations, and discern the propriety of the apostle's reasoning, the author, in his notes, hath explained the peculiarities of that phraseology, and hath transcribed the passages of the Old Testament at full length, of which a few words only are quoted, or which are alluded to, indirectly, that the reader, who is supposed to be acquainted with the Scriptures, having the whole passage under his eyes, may be sensible of the justness of the reasoning. In the third place, as the manners, opinions, proverbs, and remarkable sayings, not only of the Jewish people, but of the sages of other ancient nations, are mentioned or alluded to by the sacred writers, these also are explained in the notes; that what is only a proverb, or an allusion to some known fact or saying, may be interpreted as a doctrine or prediction, contrary to the intention of the sacred writers. Examples of this kind of allusion are, Matt. ii. 45; x. 39; Luke xxiii. 31. In the fourth place, as often as an uncommon interpretation is given of any passage, the author, in the notes, hath endeavoured to support it, by its agreement with the context, and with the apostle's design in writing; by parallel passages; by criticisms on the language, especially those contained in Essay IV; by the established rules of interpretation; by arguments drawn from common sense; and sometimes by the opinion of former commentators, both ancient and modern, whose judgment is approved by the learned. In many instances, however, for the sake of brevity, neither the translation, nor the interpretation, though uncommon, is supported by any particular of the law, namely, to perfect obedience, 'might be fulfilled in us.' By this translation Beza has endeavoured to establish, that the righteousness of Christ is imputed to believers in such a manner, that all which the law required from them is fulfilled in them, so that they become thereby perfectly righteous.—Rom. iii. 22. Tob. xxi. 13; omnes dixit: and in his note he says, electum vide- licet, de quibus discursum.—Titus ii. 11. Illustri est gratia Dei atri- butur suo (κύριος) quibusque masculinos. Here all men are converted into some men, lest, from the just grammatical translation, any argument should be drawn in favour of universal redemption. See also his translation of 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2; 2 Pet. iii. 3; Heb. x. 36. Justus autem ex fide vestra. Sed si qua se subdicerit, non est gratia animae sua. In this passage, by adding the word quis, any one, which is not in the text, and by mistranslating the clause, "qua subdicionem, Beza hath hidden from his readers that God supplies a just man may draw back, and thereby lose his favour, lest, from that supposition, an argument might be drawn against the perseverance of the saints. Examples of strained criticism might be produced from Calvin, Gutenberg, Hammond, Luboch, Locke, and other noted commentators. But the above are all quoted from Beza, because most of the Calvinists divide since his time, who have translated and interpreted the apostolical epistles, and among the rest our English translators, have followed him too implicitly. For example, by copying Beza, as he copied the Vulgate, our translators have translated their version in the following passages, unintelligible—2 Cor. iv. 3. 'It is hid to them that are lost.' 4. In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not.' But what idea can any reader form of Satan's blinding the minds? 'For our gospel indeed is of unoffence, to condemnation.' By this translation, Beza makes the apostle affirm, that all Adam's posterity are actually guilty of his first transgression; such, on that account, are liable, on eternal death. But that doctrine is not taught in this passage; for I know no text in which it is actually taught (Psalm 15).—Rom. vii. 4. [The halter sign in the margin.] That right lar proof; because it was supposed, that, to the learned, both would clearly appear from the original itself; and to the unlearned from their giving a better sense of the passages than that found in the common versions and paraphrases. In the 4th place, instead of entering into theological controversies, the author, judging it more for the reader's profit, hath in the notes shown how the important sentiments contained in the word of God may be improved for forming men's tempers and manners. Lastly, In the notes, the author hath displayed the beauties of some of the finest passages, by remarks on the sentiments and language.

All the different parts of the author's plan, above described, being necessary to the right explanation of the apostolical epistles, the due execution of them hath swelling this work to a great bulk. Yet no one who knows how many volumes have been written by critics and commentators, for elucidating a single Greek and Latin classic, can be offended with the size of this performance. For, however profitable the right interpretation of the writings of the celebrated authors of Greece and Rome may be, to those who take a delight in polite literature, it is a matter of small importance, in comparison with the right interpretation of the oracles of God, by which the faith and morals of mankind are to be regulated. However, that this publication might not be needlessly swollen, the author hath, to the best of his judgment, shunned everything trivium. And that the same remarks might not be repeated, he hath, as often as it was necessary, referred the reader to the places of the work where they are to be found. When two interpretations and remarks of other commentators are introduced, such only are mentioned as are accompanied with some degree of probability. And both in giving his own interpretations and the interpretations of others, the author hath studied brevity. With the same view, he hath endeavoured, in general, to exclude from his style, tautology, synonymous epithets, and circumlocution. And, that what he hath written may be understood at the first reading, he hath all along aimed at simplicity, perspicuity, and precision in his style.

Many Greek words, it is true, and phrases, are introduced, especially in the notes. But those being placed as parentheses, to show that the sense of the sentences where they occur is complete without them, they can occasion no difficulty to any reader. They are inserted for the sake of persons skilled in the Greek, to whom the author appeals for the justness of his critical remarks. And although the unlearned cannot judge of such matters, he hopes it will be some proof, even to them, that his remarks are well founded, if the alterations in the translation, and in the interpretation which they are designed to support, make the Scriptures more plain to them than they were before, and if they afford a clearer view of the sentiments and reasonings of the inspired writers.

To conclude; As it is ultimately from the Scriptures, and not from creeds and systems, by whomsoever composed, nor even from the decrees of councils, whether general or particular, that the genuine doctrines of the gospel are to be learned, the study of these writings is the most profitable work in which any man can be employed, especially if he be a teacher of religion; and the right understanding of them is the best of all acquisitions. The person, therefore, who puts it in the power of others to attain their true meaning, whether it be by faithfully translating them into a known language, or by rightly interpreting them, where they have been misunderstood, performs a work most acceptable to God, and does the greatest possible service to the world. In this persuasion, the author having spent the greatest part of his life in the study of the Scriptures, now offers to the public his translation and interpretation of the apostolical epistles; because, notwithstanding all the light which hath been thrown on that part of the word of God by modern critics and commentators, many obscurities and errors, both in the translation and interpretation of these invaluable compositions, still remain, which the friends of revelation, who are qualified for the undertaking, should endeavour to correct. The author flatters himself, that, by rectifying the translation in many places, and by offering interpretations different from those commonly given, he hath successfully removed some of the former difficulties; and makes no doubt, but, by the diligence and skill of those who shall succeed him, the difficulties which remain will, in time, receive a satisfactory solution. (See Essay I. at the end.) The prejudice, therefore, which is taken up by many in the present age, that each writings on the Scriptures may yet be published can contain nothing of moment but what hath been advanced before, is groundless, and of most pernicious consequence, as it puts a stop to all farther inquiry. The Scriptures being not yet fully understood, they ought to be diligently searched, that the treasures of divine knowledge, which lie hid in them, may be brought to light. What the author hath said or insinuated in this preface, concerning the things he hath done for the explanation of the apostolical epistles, hath been said, perhaps, with too much confidence. But as he is perfectly sensible that his opinion of his own work will have no influence on the judgment of the public, the things which he hath said can only be meant to draw the attention of the learned, to whom it belongs to determine, whether he hath executed the several parts of his plan in the manner proposed by him; and whether his discoveries, if he hath made any, ought to be approved and received, or disapproved and rejected. To their examination, therefore, he submits the whole, and waits for their decision with respect. In the mean time, he commits his performance to God, in whose hand all things are; with fervent prayers that he would be pleased to make it subservient to his own glory, and to the good of his church. And if, in any degree, it contributes to promote these great ends, he will rest contented, as having received an ample reward.

PRELIMINARY ESSAYS.

ESSAY I.

Of the commission given by Christ to his Apostles; and of the power by which he fitted them for executing that commission; and of the nature and authority of their writings.

The Lord Jesus, before his death spake in this manner to his apostles—Luke xxii. 32, 'I have yet many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now. 13. Howbeit, when the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth.' From this it is evident, that while on earth Jesus did not declare the whole doctrines of the gospel, but left them to be revealed by the Holy Ghost, to the persons who, after his departure, were to make them known to the world. In this method of revealing the gospel, there was both dignity and propriety. For the Son of God came from heaven, to make the gospel revelation, but to be the subject of it by doing and suffering all that was necessary to procure the salvation of mankind.

But, although it was not our Lord's intention to make a complete revelation of the gospel in person, he occasionally delivered many of its doctrines and precepts in the hearing of his followers, that, when the persons commissioned by him to preach the gospel in its full extent executed their commission, the world, by observing the perfect conformity of their doctrine with his, might entertain no doubt of their authority and inspiration, in those farther discoveries which they made concerning the matters of which Christ himself had spoken nothing.

The Son of God, in prosecution of the purpose for which he took on him the human nature, came to John at Jordan, and was baptized. To this rite he submitted, not as it was the baptism of repentance, for he was perfectly free from sin, but as it prefigured his dying and rising again from the dead, and because he was, on that occasion, to be declared God's beloved son by a voice from Heaven, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, in the view of the multitudes who were assembled at John's baptism.

Having received these miraculous attestations, Jesus began his ministry; and from that time forth showed himself to Israel as their long-expected deliverer, and, in the hearing of the people, spake many discourses, in which he corrected the errors of the Jewish teachers, and explained many of their mysteries and precepts. Of true religion. And while he thus employed himself, he confirmed his doctrine, and proved himself to be the Son of God, by working great miracles in all parts of Judea, and even in Jerusalem itself. But the chiefs of the Jews, envying his reputation with the people, laid hold on him, and condemning him for calling himself the Son of God, constrained Pontius Pilate, the governor of Judea, to put him to death. But whilst the Jews, with wicked hands, crucified Jesus, his death, by the sovereign appointment of God, became an atonement for the sin of the world. And, to wipe away the stain which the Jews endeavoured to fix on Jesus as a deceiver, by putting him to death, God raised him from the dead on the third day, according to Christ's own prediction, and thereby declared him, in the most illustrious manner, his son. After his resurrection, Jesus showed himself alive to many witnesses; and, having remained on earth forty days, a sufficient time to prove the truth of his resurrection, he ascended into heaven, in the presence of his disciples, who were assured, by the attending angels, that he would return from heaven in like manner as they had seen him go away; namely, at the end of the world.

I. The illustrious display just now described, which Jesus made on earth of his glory as the Son of God, by his virtues, his miracles, his sufferings, his resurrection, and his ascension, was intended, not solely for the people before whom it was exhibited, but for all mankind. And, therefore, that the knowledge of it might not be confined to the Jews, but spread through the whole world, and continued in it to the end, Jesus, in the beginning of his ministry, chose twelve of his disciples, and ordained them to be with him, that they might hear all that he should speak, and that as eyewitnesses of these things, they might report them to the world, with every circumstance of credibility. These witnesses Jesus named apostles, or persons sent forth by him, and appointed them to bear that name always, that when they published his history, bare witness to his resurrection, and preached salvation to them who believed, all might be sensible that they acted by commission and authority from him. And, to prevent any error that might arise in the execution of this office, from the failure of their memory, he made them the following promises:—John xiv. 18. 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever. 17. Even the Spirit of truth; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. 26. The comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.' And, John xvi. 13. 'I will guide you into all truth.' Besides bringing to your remembrance the things I have said to you, he will give you the knowledge of the whole gospel scheme. And, because many of the doctrines of the gospel were darkly revealed, and many of the particulars of Christ's life were in diverse manners foretold in the writings of Moses and the prophets, Jesus 'opened the understanding of his apostles, that they might understand the Scriptures,' Luke xxiv. 15.

Having in this manner educated and prepared the twelve, Jesus, before his ascension, declared to them the purpose for which he had called them, and appointed them during his ministry, and explained to them their duty as apostles. Acts i. 8. 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me in Jerusalem, and in Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth.' Then, after giving them their commission in the following words: Mark xvi. 15. 'Go ye therefore, and teach all nations. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: But he that believeth not shall be damned.' And that the things which they should teach might gain entire credit, in addition to what he had promised formerly. (Luke xxi. 15. 'Behold I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist'); he now told them, Luke xxiv. 29. 'Behold I send the promise of My Father upon you. But tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endowed with power from on high.' And added, Mark xvi. 17. 'These signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues. They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. 19. So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God.' Such was the commission which Christ gave to his apostles, and such the supernatural powers which he promised to bestow on them, to fit them for executing it with success.

But one of the apostles, Judas by name, having fallen from his office by transgression, the twelve judged it necessary to supply his place; and for that purpose chose Matthias by lot. In this, however, they acted not by the direction of the Holy Ghost, for he was not yet given to them, but merely by the dictates of human prudence, which on that occasion seems to have carried them too far. No man, nor body of men whatever, could, by their designation, confer an office, whose authority bound the consciences of all men, and whose duties could not be performed without the gifts of inspiration and miracles. To ordain an apostle belonged to Christ alone, who, with the appointment, could also give the supernatural powers necessary to the function. Some time, therefore, after the election of Matthias, Jesus himself seems to have superseded it, by appointing another to be an apostle and witness in the place of Judas. In the choice of this new apostle, Jesus had a view to the conversion of the Gentiles; which, of all the services allotted to the apostles, was the most dangerous and difficult. For no person engaged in that work had to contend with the heathen priests, whose office and gains being annihilated by the spreading of the gospel, it was to be expected that they would oppose its preachers with an extreme rage. He had to contend, likewise, with the unbelieving Jews living in the heathen countries, who would not fail to of the idolatrous multitude against any one who should preach salvation to the Gentiles, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses. The University too were to be encountered, who, no doubt, after their manner, would endeavour to overthrow the gospel by argument; whilst the magistrates and priests laboured to destroy it, by persecuting its preachers and adherents. The difficulty and danger of preaching to the Gentiles being so great, the person who engaged in it certainly needed an uncommon strength of mind, a great degree of religious zeal, a courage superior to every danger, and a patience of labour and suffering not to be exhausted, together with much prudence, to enable him to avoid giving just offence to unbelievers. Besides these natural talents, education and literature were necessary in the person who attempted to convert the Gentiles, that he might acquit himself with propriety, when called before kings and magistrates and men of learning. All these talents and advantages Saul of Tarsus possessed in an eminent degree; and being a violent persecutor of the Christians, his testimony to the resurrection of Jesus would have the greater weight when he became a preacher of the gospel. Him, therefore, the Lord Jesus determined to make his apostle in the room of Judas; and for that purpose he appeared to him from heaven, as he journeyed to Damascus to persecute his disciples. And having convinced him of the truth of his resurrection, by thus appearing to him in person, he commissioned him to preach his resurrection to the Gentiles, together with the doctrines of the gospel, which were to be made known to him afterwards by revelation; saying to him, Acts xxvi. 16. 'I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17. Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee; 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness, &c.' Such was the commission which Jesus in person gave to Saul of Tarsus, who afterwards was called Paul; so that, although he had not attended Jesus during his ministry, he was, in respect both of his election to the office, and of his fitness for it, rightly numbered with the apostles.

II. The apostles being ordered to tarry in Jerusalem, till they were endowed with power from on high, they obeyed their master's command; and on the tenth day after his ascension, which was the day of Pentecost, happening to be assembled in one place, with other disciples, to the number of about a hundred and twenty; Acts ii. 2. 'Suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. 3. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them; 4. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.' The Spirit manifested his presence with the disciples, by enabling them to speak fluently a variety of foreign languages, of which, till then, they were utterly ignorant. By this, his first gift, the Holy Ghost prepared our Lord's witnesses to preach his sufferings and resurrection to all nations, agreeably to their commission, without being obliged to wait till they learnt to speak the languages of the nations to whom they were sent. By this gift, likewise, the disciples were enabled immediately to publish those farther revelations of the gospel doctrine which the Spirit was afterwards to make to them, according to Christ's promise.

Although, on the memorable occasion above mentioned, all the hundred and twenty disciples were filled with the Holy Ghost, his gifts were bestowed more abundantly on the apostles, who had accompanied Jesus during his ministry on earth, and who were made his witnesses, for the purpose of testifying his sufferings and resurrection, and of preaching the gospel to all nations. These, by their commission and illumination, being authorized to dissent the religious faith and practice of mankind, it was of great importance to the world to know, with certainty, who they were to whom that high honour belonged. To give us, therefore, full assurance in this matter, three of the writers of our Lord's history, by the direction of the Spirit, have not only recorded his election of the twelve to the apostolic office, but each hath given a separate catalogue of their names and designations.

It is to be remarked, however, that notwithstanding the highest measures of inspiration and miraculous powers were bestowed on the apostles, they did not all possess these gifts in an equal degree. This we learn from Peter, one of the number, who tells us, 2 Peter iii. 15. that Paul 'wrote his epistles according to the wisdom given to him.' This Paul likewise has insinuated by calling Peter, James, and John, pillars, Gal. ii. 9. and chief apostles, 2 Cor. xi. 5.; xii. 11. Add. that if all the apostles possessed the gifts of inspiration and miracles in an equal degree, it will be difficult to understand how it has happened that only six of the twelve have written the revelations which were made to them, and that, while the preaching and miracles of those who are called chief apostles are recorded by Luke in his history of the Acts, nothing is said of the preaching and miracles of the rest; which is the more remarkable, as the miracles and preaching of some of the inferior ministers of the word, such as Stephen and Philip, are there particularly related. The apostles, it would seem, had different parts assigned to them by Christ, and were qualified, each for his own work, by such a measure of illumination and miraculous power as was requisite to it. May we not therefore suppose, that the work allotted to the apostles who have left nothing in writing concerning our religion, was to bear witness to that display which their master made of his own character as the Son of God, by his miracles and resurrection; and to publish to the world those revelations of the gospel doctrine which were made to them in common with the other apostles? So that, being favoured with no peculiar revelation which merited to be committed to writing, they discharged the apostolical office both honourably and usefully, when they employed themselves in testifying to the world Christ's resurrection, together with the things they had heard him speak, and seen him do, while they attended on him; especially if, as tradition informs us, they sealed their testimony concerning these matters with their blood.

The apostles having received their commission to preach the gospel to all nations, and being furnished with inspiration and miraculous powers for that purpose, went forth and published the things which concern the Lord Jesus, first in Judea, and afterwards among the Gentiles; and, by the miracles which they wrought, persuaded great multitudes, both of the Jews and of the Gentiles, to believe the gospel, and openly to profess themselves Christ's disciples, notwithstanding by so doing they exposed themselves to sufferings and to death. It is evident, therefore, that the world is indebted to the apostles for the complete knowledge of the gospel scheme. Yet that praise is due only to them in a subordinate degree; for the Spirit, who revealed the gospel to the apostles, and enabled them to confirm it by miracles, received the whole from Christ. He therefore is the light of the world, and the Spirit who inspired the apostles shone on them with a light borrowed from him. So Christ himself hath told us, John xvi. 13. 'When the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he shall shew you things to come. 14. He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you. 15. All things that the Father hath are mine; therefore said I, that he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you."

But here it must be remembered, to the honour of the apostle Paul, that being made an apostle for the purpose of converting the idolatrous Gentiles, he laboured in that department more abundantly than all the other apostles. After having the gospel revealed to him by Christ (Gal. i. 12.), and after receiving the power of working miracles, and of conferring miraculous gifts on them who should believe (2 Cor. xii. 12, 13.) he first preached in Damascus, then went to Jerusalem, where he was introduced to Peter and James. But the Jews in that city, who were enraged against him for deserting their party, endeavouring to kill him, the brethren sent him away to Cilicia, his native country. From that time forth, St. Paul spent the greatest part of his life among the Gentiles, visiting one country after another with such unremitting diligence, that, at the time he wrote his epistle to the Romans (ch. xv. 19.), "from Jerusalem, and round about as far as Illyricum, he had fully preached the gospel of Christ." But in the course of his labours, having met with great opposition, the Lord Jesus appeared to him on different occasions to encourage him in his work; and in particular caught him up into the third heaven.

So that, not only in respect of his election to the apostolic office, but in respect of the gifts and endowments bestowed on him for that office, and of the success of his labours in it, St. Paul was not inferior to the very chiepest apostles, as he himself affirms. I may add, that, by the abundance of the revelations that were given him, he excelled the other apostles as much as he exceeded them in genius and learning. He did not, it is true, attend our Lord during his ministry; yet he had so complete a knowledge of all his transactions given him by revelation, that in his epistles, most of which were written before the evangelists published their histories, he has alluded to many of the particulars which they have mentioned. Nay, in his discourse to the elders of Ephesus, he has preserved a remarkable saying of our Lord's, which none of the evangelists have recorded. Upon the whole, no reasonable person can entertain the least doubt of St. Paul's title to the apostleship. As little can there be any doubt concerning that high degree of illumination and miraculous power which was bestowed on him to render his ministry successful.

III. Because the author of the Christian religion left nothing in writing for the instruction of the world, the apostles and others, who were eyewitnesses of his virtues, his miracles, his sufferings, his resurrection and ascension, and who heard his divine discourses, besides preaching these things to all nations, have taken care that the knowledge of them should not be left to the uncertainty of a vague tradition, handed down from age to age. Four of these witnesses (who, I doubt not, were of the number of the hundred and twenty on whom the Holy Ghost fell at the first) wrote, under the direction of the Spirit, histories of Christ's ministry, to which the name of Gospels hath been given, being the same which are in our possession at this day. In these excellent writings, every thing relating to the Lord Jesus is set forth in a plain undecorated narration, which bears the clearest mark of authenticity. And because their master's character as the Son of God was most ilustriously displayed in the conclusion of his ministry, when he was arrayed before the highest court of judicature in Judea for calling himself the Son of God, and was put to death as a blasphemer for so doing, these historians are far more full in their accounts of that period than of any other part of his history. In like manner, that the revelations of the gospel doctrines which was made to the apostles by the Spirit, and which they delivered to the world in their discourses and conversations, might not be left to the uncertainty of tradition, but be preserved uncorrupted to the end of time, the Holy Ghost moved certain of these divinely inspired teachers to commit their doctrines to writing in epistles, some of which they addressed to particular churches, others to particular persons, and others to believers in general; all which are still in our possession. And that nothing might be wanting to the edification of the faithful, and to the conversion of unbelievers, Luke, the writer of one of the gospels, hath also written an history of the apostles, which he hath entitled its Acts, in which the discourses they delivered, and the great miracles they wrought for the confirmation of the gospel, not only in Judea, but in the different provinces of the Roman empire where they travelled, are faithfully narrated. In the same history we have an account of the opposition which the apostles met with, especially from the Jews, and of the evils which the preaching of the gospel brought on them, and of their founding numerous churches in the chief cities of the most civilized provinces of the Roman kingdom; and, as, in the course of his narration, Luke hath mentioned many particulars relating to the natural and political state of the countries which are the scene of his history, and to the persons who governed them at that time, the accuracy of his narration, even in the minutest circumstances, is a striking proof of the truth of his history, and of the author's being, what he calls himself, an eyewitness of many of the transactions which he hath recorded. So that, in my opinion, all antiquity cannot furnish a narrative of the same length, in which there are as many internal marks of authenticity, as in Luke's history of the Acts of the Apostles.

Seeing then, in the four gospels, and in the Acts, we have the history of our Lord's ministry, and of the spreading of the gospel in the first age, written by inspiration; and seeing, in the Apostolical Epistles, the doctrines and precepts of our religion are set forth by the like inspiration, these writings ought to be highly esteemed by all Christians, as the rule of their faith and manners; and no doctrine ought to be received as an article of faith, nor any precept acknowledged as obligatory, but what is contained in these writings. With respect, however, to the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, let it be remarked, that while the greatest regard is due to them, especially to the Gospels, because they contain the words of Christ himself, we are not in them to lock for a full account of the gospel scheme. Their professed design is to give, not a complete delineation of our religion, but the history of its Founder, and of that illustrious display which he made of his glory as the Son of God and Saviour of the world, together with an account of the spreading of the gospel after our Lord's ascension. The gospel doctrine is to be found complete only in the Epistles, where it is exhibited with great accuracy by the apostles, to whom the Holy Ghost revealed it, as Christ had promised.

I have said that Paul excelled his brethren apostles, by reason of the abundance of the revelations that were given to him. By this, however, I do not mean that his discourses and writings are superior to theirs in point of authority. The other apostles, indeed, have not entered so deep into the Christian scheme as has been done, yet, in what they have written, being guided by the same Spirit which inspired him, their declarations and decisions, so far as they go, are of equal authority with his. Nevertheless, it must be remembered, that it is St. Paul chiefly, who in his epistles, shall be shown immediately, hath explained the gospel economy in its full extent, hath shown its connexion with the former dispensations, and hath defended it against the objections of the enemies of Christianity, both in ancient and modern times, have endeavoured to overthrow it.
Preliminary Essays.

In confirmation of this account of the superior illumination of the apostle Paul, I now observe, that the great news of the mercy of God, as extending to all mankind, was made known to him before it was discovered to the other apostles; namely, in the commission which he received at his conversion, to preach to the Gentiles the good news of salvation through faith, "that they might receive forgiveness of sin, and inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith," Acts xxvi. 18. So that he was the first of the apostles, who, by Christ's command, declared that faith, and not circumcision, was necessary to the salvation of the idolatrous Gentiles. And as St. Paul early communicated to his brethren apostles the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 2), it seems to have been by him that Christ first made known to the other apostles the extent of the divine mercy to mankind. For that the apostles, besides discovering to each other the revelations which they received, read each other's writings, is plain, from the character which Peter hath given of Paul's epistles, 2 Peter iii. 15, 16.

It is St. Paul who hath informed us that sin and death were permitted to enter into the world, and pass through to all men, by the disobedience of one man, because God determined, by the obedience of a greater man, to bestow resurrection from the dead on all men, and to give all an opportunity of obtaining righteousness and life under a more gracious covenant than the former, procured for them by the merit of that obedience.

It is St. Paul who, in his learned epistle to the Hebrews, hath largely explained and proved the priesthood and intercession of Christ, and hath shown that his death is considered by God as a sacrifice for sin; not in a metaphorical sense, and in accommodation to the prejudices of mankind, but on account of its real efficacy in procuring pardon for penitents: that Christ was constituted a priest by the oath of God; that all the priests and sacrifices that have been in the world, but especially the levitical priests and sacrifices, were emblems of the priesthood, sacrifice, and intercession of Christ; and that sacrifice was instituted originally to preserve the memory of the revelation which God made at the fall, concerning the salvation of mankind through the death of his Son, after he should become the seed of the woman.

It is this great apostle who hath fully explained the doctrine of justification, and shown, that it consists in our being delivered from death, and in our obtaining eternal life, through the obedience of Christ: that no sinner can obtain this justification meritoriously through works of law: that through faith which was required as the condition thereof, justification is still the free gift of God through Jesus Christ; because no works which men can perform, not even the work of faith itself, hath any merit with God to procure pardon for those who have sinned: that this method of justification having been established at the fall, is the way in which mankind, from the beginning to the end of time, are justified: and that, as such, it is attested both by the law and by the prophets.

It is St. Paul who, by often discoursing of the justification of Abraham, hath shown the true nature of the faith which justifies sinners; that it consists in a strong desire to know, and in a sincere disposition to do, the will of God; that it leads the believer implicitly to obey the will of God when made known; and that even the heathens are capable of attaining this kind of faith, and of being saved through Christ. Also, it is this apostle who, by penetrating into the depth of the meaning of the covenant with Abraham, hath discovered the nature and greatness of those rewards of the covenant with mankind, even in the first ages, to expect from his goodness; and who hath shown that the gospel, in its chief articles, was preached to Abraham and to the Jews; nay, preached to the antediluvians, in the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent. So that the gospel is not a revelation of a new method of justification, but a more full publication of the method of justification mercifully established by God for all mankind from the very beginning.

It is the apostle Paul chiefly who, by proving the principal doctrines of the gospel from the writings of Moses and the prophets, hath shown, that the same God who spake to the fathers by the prophets, did, in the last days of the Mosaic dispensation, speak to all mankind by his Son: that the various dispensations of religion, under which mankind have been placed, are all parts of one great scheme formed by God for saving penitent sinners; and, in particular, that there is an intimate connexion between the Jewish and the Christian revelations; that the former was a preparation for the latter: consequently, those writers show great ignorance of the divine dispensations, who, on account of the objections to which the law of Moses, as a rule of justification, is liable, and on account of the obscurity of the ancient prophecies, wish to disjoin the Jewish and Christian revelations. But all who make this attempt, do it in opposition to the testimony of Jesus himself, who commanded the Jews to search their own Scriptures, because "they are they which testify of him" (John v. 39), who, in his conversation on the road to Emmaus, "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, expounded unto them from all the Scriptures, the things concerning himself" (Luke xxiv. 27); and who told them, ver. 44. "That all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning him." The attempt is made in opposition also to the testimony of the apostle Peter, who, speaking to Cornelius of Christ, said, "To him give all the prophets witness, that, through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins," Acts ii. 43. The Jewish and Christian revelations, therefore, are so closely connected, that if the former is removed as false, the latter must, of necessity, fail to the ground.

It is the apostle of the Gentiles who hath set the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, in a proper light, by showing that it was no method of justification, even to the Jews, but merely their national law, delivered to them by God, not as governor of the universe, but as king in Israel, who had separated them from the rest of mankind, and placed them in Canaan under his own immediate government, as a nation, for the purpose of preserving his oracles and worship amidst that universal destruction which was to overspread the earth. Accordingly, this apostle hath proved, that seeing the law of Moses contained a more perfect account of the duties of morality, and of the demerit of sin, than is to be found in any other national law, instead of justifying, it condemned the Jews by its curse; especially as it prescribed no sacrifice of any real efficacy to cleanse the consciences of sinners, nor promised them pardon in any method whatsoever; and that, by the rigour of its curse, the law of Moses laid the Jews under the necessity of seeking justification from the mercy of God through faith, according to the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, which was the gospel and religion of the Jews. Thus, by the lights which St. Paul hath held up to us, the impious murings of the Manicheans against the law of Moses, and against the God of the Jews, the author of that law, on the supposition that it was a rule of justification, are seen to be without foundation; as are the objections likewise which modern deists have urged against the Mosaic revelation, on account of God's dealings with the heathens.

It is St. Paul who hath most largely discoursed concerning the transcendent greatness of the Son of God, above angels and all created beings whatever; and who hath shown, that, as the reward of his humiliation and death in the human nature, he hath, in that nature, obtained the government of the world, for the good of his church, and will hold that government till he hath put down the usurped dominion which the apostate angels have so long endeavoured to maintain, in opposition to the righteous government of God; that, as the last exercise of his kingly power, Christ will raise the dead, and judge the world, and render to every one according to his deeds; and that, when all the enemies of God and goodness are thus utterly subdued, the Son will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be over all in all places.

It is this great apostle who hath made known to us many of the circumstances and consequences of the general judgment, not mentioned by the other apostles. For, besides repeating what Christ himself declared, that he will return a second time to this earth surrounded with the glory of his Father, and attended by a great host of angels; that he will call all the dead forth from their graves; and that, by his sentence as Judge, he will fix the doom of all mankind irrevocably, this apostle hath taught us the following interesting particulars—That the last generation of men shall not die, but that, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, Christ will change such of the righteous as are alive upon the earth at his coming. And having said nothing of Christ's changing the wicked, the apostle hath led us to believe that no change shall pass on them; consequently, that the discrimination of the righteous from the wicked will be made by the difference of the body in which the one and the other shall appear before the tribunal; and that no particular inquiry into the actions of individuals will be needed to determine their different characters. The character of each will be shown to all, by the nature of the body in which he appears to receive his sentence. The same apostle hath taught us, that, after sentence is pronounced upon all men, according to their true characters, thus visibly manifested, the righteous shall be caught up in clouds to join the Lord in the air; so that the wicked being left behind on the earth, it follows, that they are to perish in the flames of the general conflagration. He further informs us, that the righteous, having joined the Lord in the air, shall accompany him in his return to heaven, and there live in an embodied state, with God and Christ and the angels, to all eternity.

It is St. Paul who hath given us the completest account of the spiritual gifts which were bestowed in so plenty and variety on the first Christians, for the confirmation of the gospel. Nay, the form which the Christian visible church has taken under the government of Christ, is owing, in a great measure, to the directions contained in his writings. Not to mention, that the different offices of the gospel ministry, together with the duties and privileges belonging to these offices, have all been established in consequence of his appointment.

Finally, it is St. Paul who, in his first epistle to the Thessalonians, hath given us a formal proof of the divine original of the gospel; which, though it was originally designed for the learned Greeks of that age, hath been of the greatest use ever since, in confirming believers in their most holy faith, and stopping the mouths of adversaries.

The foregoing account of the matters contained in the writings of the apostle Paul, shows, that whilst the inspired epistles of the other apostles deserve to be read with the utmost attention, on account of the explications of particular doctrines and facts which they contain, and of the exact precedents of piety and morality with which they abound, the epistles of Paul must be regarded as the grand repository, in which the whole of the gospel doctrine is lodged, and from which the knowledge of it can be drawn with the greatest advantage. And, therefore, all who wish to understand true Christianity ought to study the epistles of this great apostle with the utmost care. In them, indeed, they will meet with things hard to be understood. But that circumstance, instead of discouraging, ought rather to make them more diligent in their endeavours to understand his writings; as they contain information from God himself concerning matters which are of the utmost importance to their temporal and eternal welfare. It is true, the ministers of religion, whose office it is to instruct others, are under more peculiar obligations to study the Scriptures with unremitting assiduity; nevertheless, others, whose leisure, learning, and genius, qualify them for the work, are not exempted from that obligation. In former times, by the cruel persecution and obloquy which followed those who, in matters of religion, happened to go out of the beaten track, men of liberal minds were hindered from searching the Scriptures, or, at least, from publishing what they found in them contrary to the received opinions. But the darkness of bigotry is passing away, and the light of truth is beginning to shine. Men have acquired more just notions of the rights of conscience; and the fetters in which the understandings of Christians, for so many ages, have been held bound by the decrees of councils and the establishment of creeds, are begun to be broken; so that the candid may now modestly propose the result of their inquiries into the word of God, without incurring either danger or blame. If, therefore, proper attention is paid to such publications as are designed for the illustration of the Scriptures, it is to be hoped that, in the progress of ages, the united efforts of many will dispel the obscurity which hath so long rendered some passages of Scripture hard to be understood; and the matters of fact above human comprehension really made known in the word of God, being separated from those which have been obtruded on it by ignorant or by worldly men, genuine Christianity will, at last, shine forth in its native splendour. And thus the objections raised against the gospel vanishing, it will at length be generally received, and acquire its proper influence on the minds and manners of mankind.

By attending to the various undoubted facts set forth in the foregoing essay, every Christian must be sensible of the divine authority of all the books of the New Testament; and, by forming a proper judgment of the purpose for which each of these books was written, he may easily learn the use he is to make of these divinely inspired writings.

Essay II.

Of the Use which the Churches were to make of the Apostle's Epistles; and of the Method in which these Writings were published and preserved.

Formerly, books being of such value that none but the rich were able to purchase them, the common people were seldom taught to read in any country; and having no teachers given them by the public, they were generally grossly ignorant of moral and religious truths. The vulgar, however, of the Jewish nation, were better instructed. For Moses having ordered his law to be read to the people at the end of every seven years, during the feast of tabernacles, in the year of release (Deut. xxxi. 10, 11), the knowledge of the doctrines contained in his writings was, by that institution, universally diffused among the Jews. Besides, it gave rise to the reading of the law and the prophets in their synagogues. For, in whatever part of the world the Jews resided, they assembled themselves every Sabbath for the worshipping of God, and for the reading of their sacred writings. Now, the Christian churches being destined for the same purposes of worshipping God, and diffusing the knowledge of religion among the people, it was natural, in forming them, to imitate the model, and follow the rules of the synagogue. And therefore, seeing the reading of the Jewish Scriptures always made a part of the synagogue service, it cannot be doubted that the same was practised in the church from the very beginning, especially as the disciples of Christ, equally with the disciples of Moses, acknowledged the divine inspiration of these Scriptures, and had been ordered, by their master, to search them as testifying of him. Besides, till the apostles and evangelists published their writings, the Jewish Scriptures were the only guide to which the disciples of Christ could have recourse for their instruction. But, after the Spirit of God had inspired the evangelists to write their histories of Christ’s ministry, and the apostles to commit their doctrines and precepts to writing, their gospels and epistles became a more direct rule of faith and practice to the brethren, than even the Jewish Scriptures themselves; for which reason it was fit that they should be stately read in the public assemblies, to teach the brethren more perfectly the things wherein they had been instructed. And, to introduce that practice, St. Paul, in the conclusion of his first epistle to the Thessalonians (which is generally supposed to have been the first of his inspired writings), laid the foundation, and passed of that church under “an oath to cause it to be read to all the holy brethren,” ch. v. 27.; that is to say, being conscious of his own inspiration, he required the Thessalonians to put his writings on a level with the writings of the Jewish prophets, by reading them in their public assemblies for worship, and by regarding them as the infallible rule of their faith and practice. For the same purpose, John (Rev. 1: 1.) declared him blessed who readeth, and them who hear the words of his prophecy.

The Thessalonian presidents and pastors being adjured by the apostle Paul to cause his epistle to be read “to all the brethren,” it was to be read, not only to them in Thessalonica, but to the brethren of all the towns and cities of the province of Macedonia; and particularly to the brethren of Berea and Philippi, and of every place in their neighbourhood where churches were planted. For that St. Paul did not intend his epistle merely for the churches to which they were first sent, but for general use, appears from the inscriptions of several of them. Thus the epistle to the Galatians is directed “To the churches of Galatia;” and the second epistle to the Corinthians, “To the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia.” Nay, the first epistle to the same church has even a more general inscription, being directed, not only “To the church at Corinth,” but “To all them who in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ.”

But while the churches, to which the apostle sent his letters, were directed by the inscriptions to circulate them as widely as possible, he did not mean, by these inscriptions, nor by his adjuration of the Thessalonian pastors, that the autographs of his letters were to be sent to all who had an interest in them. These divinely inspired compositions, authenticated by the salutation in the apostle’s own handwriting, were too valuable to be used in that manner. But his meaning was that correct copies of his letters should be sent to the neighbouring churches, to remain with them for their own use, and to be transcribed by them, and circulated as widely as possible. The direction to the Colossians, iv. 16. “When this epistle hath been read by you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans,” is certainly to be understood in the manner which I have explained. The apostle adds, “and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea.” The Laodiceans, it seems, had been directed to send to the Colossians a copy of some letter written by the apostle, which they had received; probably the letter which he had lately sent to the Ephesians; for that epistle is inscribed, not only “To the saints which are at Ephesus,” but also “To the faithful in Christ Jesus.”

This inscription, therefore, like that of the epistle to the Corinthians, implied that the Ephesian brethren were to send copies of their letter to the neighbouring churches, and, among the rest, to the church of the Laodiceans, with a particular order to them to send a copy of it to the Colossians.

In the same manner, also, we may suppose the epistle to the Galatians was circulated. For the inscription, “To the churches of Galatia” implies, that the church in Galatia which received this letter from the apostle’s messenger, was to send a copy of it to the church that was nearest to them; which church was to circulate it in like manner; so that, being sent from one church to another it was no doubt communicate, in a short time, to all the churches of Galatia. In like manner, the apostle Peter’s first epistle being inscribed “To the strangers of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia,” the person or church to which that letter was delivered by Silvanus (1 Pet. v. 12.), was to communicate it to the brethren nearest at hand, to be copied and dispersed till it was fully circulated among the faithful in the several countries mentioned in the inscription, unless that service was performed by Silvanus himself. For it cannot be supposed that Peter would write and send copies of such a long letter to all the churches in the widely extended countries of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. The like method, no doubt, was used for circulating all the other catholic epistles.

The apostles, by the inscription of their letters, having signified their desire that they should be read publicly, not only in the churches to which they were first sent, but in all the neighbouring churches; and St. Paul, in particular, having given express orders to that purpose in his epistles to the Thessalonians and Colossians, we have good reason to believe that their epistles were read publicly and frequently in the churches to which they were inscribed, along with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, that copies of them were sent to every church which had an immediate interest in them; and that, when the gospels were published, they, in like manner, were read daily in the churches of all those copies of which were quickly multiplied. To this respect the gospels were certainly entitled, not only on account of their authors being apostles or evangelists, but because the matters contained in them were of the greatest utility, both for the instruction and for the consolation of the brethren.

The epistles and gospels, being the authentic record in which the whole doctrines, precepts, and promises of the gospel are contained, we may believe that, although no injunction had been given by the apostles respecting the communication of their writings, the members of the churches to which their epistles and gospels were sent, moved by their own piety and good sense, would be anxious to communicate them; and would not grudge either the expense of transcribing them, or the trouble of sending them to all the churches with which they had any connexion. The persons likewise who were employed, whether in transcribing, or in carrying these excellent writings to the neighbouring churches, would take great delight in the work; thinking themselves both usefully and honourably employed. Nay, I am persuaded that such of the brethren as could afford the expense, and were capable of reading these divinely inspired writings, would get them transcribed for their own use; so that copies of these books would be multiplied and dispersed in a very short time. This accounts for St. Paul’s epistles, in particular, being so generally known, read, and acknowledged by all Christians, in the very first age; as we learn from Peter, who speaks of the epistles which his beloved brother Paul had written to the persons to whom he himself wrote his second epistle, chap. iii. 16. It seems, before Peter wrote that letter, that he had seen and read Paul’s epistles to the Galatians, the Ephesians, and the Colossians. He speaks also of all Paul’s other epistles; from which some learned men have inferred, that Paul by that time was dead, and that all his writings had come to Peter’s hands. Nay, Peter intimates that they were then universally read and acknowledged as inspired writings; for he tells us, ‘the ignorant and unstable wrested them, as they did the other Scriptures also, to their own destruction.’

The writings of the apostles and evangelists being thus easily and widely dispersed among the disciples of Christ, I think it cannot be doubted that the persons who obtained copies of them, regarding them as precious treasures of divine truth, preserved them with the utmost care. We are morally certain, therefore, that none of the inspired writings, either of the evangelists or of the apostles, have been lost; and, in particular, that the suspicion which some have entertained of the loss of certain epistles of Paul, is destitute of probability. His inspired writings were all sent to persons greatly interested in them, who, while they preserved their own copies with the utmost care, were, no doubt, very diligent in circulating transcripts from them among the other churches; so that, being widely dispersed, highly respected, and much read, none of them, I think, could perish. What puts this matter beyond doubt is, that while all the sacred books which now remain are often quoted by the most ancient Christian writers, whose works have done down to us, in none of them, nor in any other author whatever, is there so much as a single quotation from any apostolical writing that is not at present in our canon; nor the least hint from which it can be gathered, that any apostolical writing ever existed, which we do not at precent possess.

Further, as none of the apostolical writings have been lost, so no material alteration hath taken place in any of those which remain. For the autographs having, in all probability, been long preserved with care, by the rulers of the churches to which these writings were sent, if any material alteration, in particular copies, had ever been attempted, for the purpose of supporting heresy, the fraud must instantly have been detected by comparing, the vitiated copies with the autographs. And even after the autographs, by length of time, or by accident, were lost, the consent of such a number of copies as might easily be procured and compared in every country, was at all times sufficient to preserve the genuine text, and for correcting whatever alteration might be made, whether through accident or design. Nor is it this all:
the disputes about articles of faith which took place in the Christian church, almost from the beginning, though productive of much mischief in other respects, secured the Scriptures from all vitiation. For the different sects of Christians, constantly appealing to the sacred oracles in support of their particular opinions, each would take care that their opponents quoted the Scriptures fairly, and transcribed them faithfully. And thus the different parties of Christians being checks on each other, every possibility of vitiating the Scriptures was absolutely precluded.

With respect to the various readings of the books of the New Testament, about which disputes have made such a noise, and well disposed persons have expressed such fears as if the sacred text were thereby rendered uncertain, I may take upon me to affirm, that the clamour of the former, and the fears of the latter, are without foundation. Before the invention of printing there was no method of multiplying the copies of books, but by transscibing them; and the persons who followed that business being liable, through carelessness, to transpose, omit, and alter, not only letters, but words, and even whole sentences, it is plain that the more frequently any book was transcribed, the more numerous would the variations from the original text be in the one that was last transcribed; because, in the new copy, besides the errors pecculiar to the one from which it was taken, there would be all those also which the transcriber himself might fall into through carelessness. If, therefore, the MSS. which remain of any ancient book are of a late date, and few in number, the defects and errors of such a book will be many, and the various readings few; and as it is by the various readings alone that the defects and errors of particular copies can be redressed, the imperfections of that book will be without remedy. Of this, Hesychius among the Greeks, and Velleius Paterculus among the Latins, are striking examples; for as there is but one MS. copy of each of these authors remaining, the numerous errors and defects found in them are past all redress. Happily, this is not the case with the books of the New Testament, of which there are more MSS. of different ages than of any other ancient writing. Wherefore, although by collecting these MSS. different readings, to the amount of many thousands, have appeared, the text, instead of being rendered uncertain thereby, hath been fixed with greater precision: Because, with the help of sound criticism, learned men, from the vast variety of readings, obtained by comparing different copies, have been able to select, almost with certainty, those readings which originally composed the sacred text. See Gen. Pref. p. 18. note.

This, however, though great, is not the only advantage the Scriptures have derived from the various readings found in the different MSS. of the New Testament which have been collated. For as these MSS. were found, some of them in Egypt, others of them in Europe, the distance of the places from whence they have been brought give us, as Bentley hath well remarked, the ful-est assurance that there never could be any collusion in altering or interpolating one copy by another, nor all by any one of them; and that, however numerous these readings may be, they have proceeded merely from the carelessness of transcribers, and by no means from bad design in any persons whatever. This important fact is set in the clearest light by the pains which learned men have taken in collating all the ancient translations of the Scriptures now remaining, and all the quotations from the Scriptures found in the writings of the fathers, even those which they made by memory, in order to mark the minute variations from the originals. For although, by this means, the various readings have been increased to a prodigious number, we find but a very few of them that make any material alteration in the sense of the passages where they are found; and of those which give a different sense, it is easy for persons skilled in criticism to determine which is the genuine reading. Those facts, which are all well known, prove, in the strongest manner, that the books of the New Testament have, from the beginning, remained unaltered, and that in the various readings we have the genuine text of these books entire, or almost entire; which is more than can be said o any other writing of equal antiquity, of which the MSS.
are not so numerous, nor the various readings in such abundance. See the note, Pref. p. 14, last paragraph.

ESSAY III.

Of the Apostle Paul’s Style and Manner of Writing

Although the sermons and epistles of the apostle Paul be much superior in sentiment to the rest of the writings of the Greeks, many who are judges of elegant writing, I doubt not, will pronounce them inferior both in composition and style. The truth is, in forming his discourses, the apostle, for the most part, neglected the rules of the Grecian eloquence. He seldom begins with proposing his subject, or with declaring the method of which he is to handle it. And when he treats of more subjects than one in the same epistle, he does not inform us when he passes from one subject to another, nor always point out the purpose for which his arguments are introduced. Besides, he makes little use of those rhetorical transitions, connections, and recapitulations, whereby the learned Greeks beautifully displayed the method and coherence of their discourses.

As the apostle did not follow the rules prescribed by the Greek rhetoricians, in disposing the matter of his discourses, so he hath not observed their precepts in the choice of his words, the arrangement of his sentences, and the measure of his periods. That kind of speaking and writing which is more remarkable for an artificial structure of words, and a laboured smoothness of periods, than for the perfection of sentiment and justness of reasoning, was called by the apostle 'the wisdom of speech,' 1 Cor. i. 17; and 'the persuasive words of human wisdom,' 1 Cor. ii. 4; and was utterly disapproved by him, 1 Cor. ii. 1. 'And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, nor of wisdom, declaring the testimony of God.'

But while the apostle, in the composition and style of his discourses, hath commonly avoided the showy embellishments, and even some of the solid ornaments of the Grecian eloquence, for reasons I shall afterwards mention, he hath made sufficient amendments for these defects, by the excellence of his sentiments, the propriety of his method, the real connexion which subsists in his discourses, and the accuracy with which he has expressed himself on every subject.

The transcendent excellence of the apostle Paul's sentiments, it is presumed, no reader of true judgment will dispute. But the method and connexion of his writings, some, perhaps, may call in question; because, as I just now observed, he hath not adopted the method of composition used by the elegant Greeks. But, to remove this objection, and to illustrate, in the first place, the apostle's method, I observe, that, in his doctrinal epistles especially, he always treats of some important article of faith, which, though not formally proposed, is constantly in his view, and is handled accordingly to a preconceived plan, in which his arguments, illustrations, and conclusions, are all properly arranged. This the intelligent reader will easily perceive, if, in studying any particular epistle, he keeps the subject of it in his eye throughout. For thus he will be sensible how the things written are all connected with the subject in hand, either as proofs of what immediately goes before, or as illustrations of some proposition more remote; or as inferences from premises, sometimes expressed and sometimes implied; or as answers to objections which, in certain cases, are not stated, perhaps because the persons addressed had often heard them proposed. Nay, he will find that, on some occasions, the apostle adapts his reasoning to the thoughts which he knew would, at that instant, arise in the mind of his readers, and to the answers which he foresees they would make to his questions, though these answers are not expressed. In short, on a just view of Paul's epistles, it will be found that all his arguments are in point; that whatever incidental matter is introduced, contributes to the illustration of the principal subject; that his conclusions are well founded; and that the whole is properly arranged.

Next with respect to the connexion of the reasoning in the apostle's epistles. I acknowledge, that the want of those forms of expression by which the learned Greeks displayed the coherence and dependence of their discourses, has given to his compositions a disjointed appearance. Nevertheless, there is a close connexion of the several parts of his epistles established by the sense of what he hath written. Now, when there is a real connexion in the sense, the words and phrases invented by rhetoricians for showing it, become, in some measure, unnecessary. There is also in the apostle's epistles an apparent connexion suggested by the introduction of a word or thought (see Rom. iv. 24, 25; Eph. i. 19, 20; 1 Thess. ii. 14), which seemingly leads to what follows; yet the real connexion lies more deep, in the relation of the things to each other, and to the principal subject. These relations, however, would be more obvious, if the Greek particles used by the apostle for coupling his sentences and periods, instead of having always, or for the most part, the same meanings uniformly given them as in our English Bible, were diversified in the translation, according to the true force which each particle derives from the place which it holds in the discourse. Further, through the frequent use of that part of speech called the participle, there is a seeming connexion in the apostle's discourses, which is apt to mislead one who is not acquainted with the idiom of the Greek language. For, as the participle hath often a casual signification, by translating it literally, the subsequent clause appears to contain a reason for what immediately goes before,—contrary, in many instances, to the apostle's intention, who uses the participles, after the example of other Greek writers, for any part of the verb. Besides, by translating the apostle's participles literally, his sentences and periods are tacked to one another in such a manner, that they have neither beginning nor ending. (Col. i. 10, 11, 12.) Wherefore, that the unlearned reader may not apprehend a connexion in the apostle's discourses different from what really subsists in them, and that the true coherence and dependence of the several parts may appear, his participles should be translated so as to represent the parts of the verb for which they are put. If this were done, the apostle's sentences and periods would stand forth in their just dimensions, and their relation to the different parts of his discourse, as reasons for what immediately precedes, or as illustrations of something more remote, or as new arguments in support of the principal proposition, would clearly appear; and by this means, the general plan of his discourse would emerge from that obscurity in which it lies hid in the present translation.

But, in praising St. Paul for handling his subjects methodically, and for connecting his discourses on these subjects by the sense of what he hath written rather than by the words, lest I should be thought to ascribe to his compositions qualities which they do not possess, I mention his first epistle to the Thessalonians as an example and proof of all that I have said. For, although the subject of that letter is not formally proposed, nor the method declared in which it is handled, nor the scope of the particular arguments pointed out, nor the objections mentioned to which answers are given, all these particulars are so plainly implied in the meaning of the things written, that an attentive reader can be at no loss to discern them. In the same epistle, though no formal display of the coherence of the sentiments be made by introducing them with the artificial couplings used by the elegant Greek writers, it does not occasion any confusion, because the dependence of the several parts implied in the sense sufficiently supplies that want.

Yet, after all I have said in vindication of the apostle for having neglected in his epistles the so much admired formality of the Grecian eloquence, I should not think I had done him justice on this head, if I did not call the reader's particular attention to the nature of his writings. None of them are treatises; they are all letters to particu-
Paragraphs from a text about essays:

Preliminary Essays.

...condemned by the lesser critics, are real beauties, as they render discourse more lively; on which account these irregularities have been admitted, even by the best authors. And, with respect to the few uncommon words and phrases, to which the appellations of barbarisms and solecisms have been given, the reader ought to know, that the best Greek authors have used the very same words and phrases, which, if they are not condemned as diversifications of the style, must, at least, be excused as inaccuracies, flowing from the vivacity of these justly admired writers, or from their attention to matters of greater moment. However, as Longinus hath long ago acknowledged, (c. 30.) one of the beautiful passages and sublime thoughts found in the works of these great masters, is sufficient to stoke all their faults.

But if the ablest critics judge in this favourable manner of the celebrated writers of antiquity, on account of their many excellencies, surely the same indulgence cannot be denied to the apostle Paul, whose spirit as a writer, in many respects, is not inferior to theirs. For I will venture to affirm, that in elegance, variety, and strength of expression, and even in sublimity of thought, many of his passages will bear to meet in comparison with the most admired of theirs, and will suffer nothing by the comparison. The truth is, where the apostle's subject leads him to it, he not only expresses himself with delivery and energy, but often rises to the sublime, through the grandeur of his sentiments, the strength of his language, and the harmoniousness of his periods, not indusiously sought after, but naturally flowing from the fervour and wisdom of that divine spirit by which he was inspired.

In support of what I have advanced in praise of St. Paul as an author, I mention the following passages, as unquestionable examples of beautiful and sublime writing.

The greatest part of his epistle to the Ephesians, concerning which Grodius has said, that "it expresses the grand matters of which it treats in words more sublime than are to be found in any human tongue:"—His speech to the inhabitants of Lystra, Acts xiv., in which the justest sentiments concerning the Deity are expressed in such a beautiful simplicity of language, as must strike every reader of taste.—His oration to the Athenian magistrates and philosophers assembled in the Areopagus, wherein he describes the character and state of the true God, and the worship that is due to him, in the most elegant language, and with the most exquisite address, Acts xvii.:—His charge to the elders of Ephesus, (Acts xx.), which is tender and pathetic in the highest degree.—His different defences before the Roman governors, Felix and Festus, king Agrippa and Bernice, the tribunes and great ladies of Cesarea, who were all struck with admiration at the apostle's eloquence.—His description of the engagement between the flesh and the spirit, with the issue of that conflict, Rom. vii.:—The whole of the eighth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, in which both the sentiments and the language, especially towards the close, are transcendently sublime.—The fiftieth chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, where he treats of the resurrection of the dead, in a discourse of considerable length, adorned with the greatest of rhetorical figures, expressed in words aptly chosen, and beautifully placed; so that in no language there is to be found a passage of equal length, more lively, more harmonious, or more sublime.—The last four or five verses of the eleventh chapter of his epistle to the Corinthians, which are full of the most delicate ironies on the false teacher who had set himself up at Corinth as the apostle's rival, and on the faction who stood on that impostor.—1 Tim. vi. 6—12.: a passage admirable, both for the grandeur of the sentiment and for the elegance of the language.—The whole eleventh chapter of his epistle to the Hebrews, and the first six verses... of the twelfth chapter of the same epistle; with many other passages which might be mentioned, in which we find an eloquence superior to any thing exhibited in profane authors.

There are other passages, likewise, in Paul's epistles, of a narrower compass, concerning which I hazard it as my opinion, that in none of the celebrated writers of Greece or of Rome, are there periods in which we find greater subtlety of thought, or more propriety, beauty, and even melody of language. This every reader of taste will acknowledge, who takes the pains to consult the following passages in the original.—Romans xi. 33. 'Oh the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!' &c. which dictionology to the true God is superior, both in sentiment and language, to the most celebrated hymns of the greatest of the heathen poets in praise of their deities. —2 Cor. iv. 17, 18. 'For the present light thing of our affliction, which is but for a moment, &c.—Ch. v. 14.'

'For the love of Christ constraineth us,' &c.—vi. 4—11. 'In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God,' &c.—Philipp. iii. 18. 'For many walk,' &c.—Ephes. i. 19. 'What is the exceeding greatness of his power,' &c. In which last period there is such an accumulation of strong expression as is scarcely to be found in any profane author.—1 Tim. vi. 15, where there is a description of God, which, in fulness of sentiment and beauty of language, exceeds all the descriptions given of the Supreme Being by the most famed of the heathen philosophers or poets. Other periods also might be produced, in which, as in those just now mentioned, there are no unnatural rants, nor great swelling words of vanity; but a real grandeur of sentiment, and an energy of diction, which directly strike the heart.

Upon the whole, I heartily agree with Beza in the account which he hath given of the apostle Paul as a writer, 2 Cor. x. 6, note, where he says, "When I more narrowly consider the whole genius and character of Paul's style, I must confess that I have found no such sublimity of speaking in Plato himself, as often as the apostle is pleased to thunder out the mysteries of God; no exquisiteness of vehemence in Demosthenes equal to his, as often as he had a mind either to terrify men with a dread of the divine judgments, or to admonish them concerning their conduct, or to allure them to the contemplation of the divinest benignity, or to excite them to the duties of piety and morality. In a word, not even in Aristotle himself, nor in Galen, though most excellent artists, do I find a more exact method of teaching."

But though with Beza I acknowledge that Paul was capable of all the different kinds of fine writing: of the simple, the pathetic, the ironical, the vehement, and the sublime; and that he hath given admirable specimens of these several kinds of eloquence in his sermons and epistles, I would not be understood to mean that he ought, upon the whole, to be considered either as an elegant or as an eloquent writer. The method and connexion of his writings are too much concealed to entitle him to these appellations; and his style in general is neither copious nor smooth. It is rather harsh and difficult, through the vehemence of his genius, which led him frequently to use that dark form of expression called, by rhetoricians, elliptical; to leave some of his sentences, and even of his arguments, incomplete; and to mention the first words only of the passages which he hath quoted from the Old Testament, though his argument requires that the whole be taken into view. These peculiarities, it is true, are found in the most finished compositions of the Greeks; and though they appear harsh, are real excellencies; as they diversify the style, render it vigorous, and direct the reader's attention. But they occur much more seldom in their writings than in Paul's. And although the words that are wanting to complete the apostle's sentences are commonly expressed, either in the clause which goes before, or in that which follows, and the scope of his reasonings leads to the propositions omitted; yet these, for the most part, escape ordinary readers, so that his style, upon the whole, is difficult and obscure.

There are other peculiarities also, which render the apostle's style dark; such as, that on some occasions he hath inverted the order of his sentences, and used the same words in the same sentence, in different senses. Nay, he has affixed to many of his terms, significations quite different from what they have in profane authors; because, as Locke justly observes, the subjects of which he treats were perfectly remote from all the notions which mankind then entertained. In short, these peculiarities of style have thrown such an obscurity upon many passages of Paul's writings, that persons tolerably skilled in the Greek language will understand the compositions of Demosthenes, Isocrates, or any other standard prose writer among the Greeks, more readily than the epistles of the apostle Paul.

Let it be acknowledged then, that, in general, Paul's ordinary style is not polished and perspicuous, but rather harsh and obscure; nevertheless, in avoiding the studied perspicuity and prolixity of the Grecian eloquence, and in adopting a concise and unadorned style in his epistles, he is, I think, fully justified by the following considerations.

In the first place, a concise unadorned style in preaching and writing, though accompanied with some obscurity, was, in the apostle's situation, preferable to the clear and elegant manner of writing practised by the Grecian orators. For, as he himself tells us, it was intended by Christ to make the world sensible that the conversion of mankind was accomplished, neither by the charms of speech, nor by the power of sounds, nor by such arguments as a vain philosophy was able to furnish, but by those great and evident miracles which accompanied the first preaching of the gospel, and by the suitableness of its doctrines to the necessities of mankind:—facts, which it is of the greatest importance for us, in these latter ages, to be well assured of. 1 Cor. i. 17. 'Christ sent me to preach the gospel, not with wisdom of speech, that the cross of Christ might not be made ineffective.'—1 Cor. ii. 4. My discourse and my preaching was not with the persuasive words of human wisdom, but with the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power. 5. That your faith might not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.'

In the second place, the obscure manner of writing used by the apostle Paul, though the natural effect of his own comprehensive genius, may have been designed for the very purpose of rendering some of his passages difficult, that, by the pains necessary to the right understanding of them, their meaning, when found, might enter the deeper into his reader's mind. This use of obscurity was thought of such importance anciently, that the most celebrated teachers of religion concealed their doctrines under fables, and allegories, and enigmas, in order to render them the more venerable, and to excite more strongly the curiosity of their disciples. Of this the Egyptian priests were famous examples. So also was Plato, for his theological, and even some of his moral writings, are often more obscure than Paul's, or than the writings of any of the sacred authors whatever. The obscurity of the Scriptures may likewise have been intended to make the exercise of honesty, impartiality, and care, necessary in studying the revelations of God. For though it hath been alleged, that the profoundness of a revelation from God being to instruct all mankind in matters of religion, the terms in which it is conveyed ought to be perspicuous and level to the capacity of all;
 yet if the improvement of their understanding be as esso ntial to the happiness of rational creatures, destined to live eternally, as the improvement of their affections, the obscurity of revelation may be necessary to a certain degree.
In the present life, indeed, men's happiness arises more from the exercise of their affections than from the operations of their understanding. But it may not be so in the life to come. There the never-ending employment of the blessed may be to search after truth, and to unfolding the ways and works of God, not in this system alone, but in other systems which shall be laid open to their view. If so, it must be an important part of our education for eternity to gain a permanent and strong relies of truth, and to acquire the talents necessary for investigating it; particularly the habit of attending to and comparing things; of observing accurately their mintest agreements and differences; and of drawing the proper conclusions from such matters as fall under our observation. Hence, to afford scope for acquiring these talents, so necessary to the dignity and happiness of reasonable beings, the nice mechanism and admirable con-tinence of the material fabric of the universe is veiled from the eyes of men; and they are not allowed to behold but in consequence of accurate and laborious researches.
For the same reason, the system of grace is set before us in the books of revelation, covered with a veil; that, in the removing of that veil, and in penetrating into the meaning of the Scriptures, we may have an opportunity of exercising and strengthening the faculties of our minds, and of acquiring those habits of attention, recollection, and reasoning, which are absolutely necessary to the employments and enjoyments of the other world. Thus the obscenity of the Scriptures, instead of counteracting, evdently co-operates with the general design of revelation, and demonstrates, that the books of nature and of grace have come from one and the same author, the Eternal God, the Father of the universe.
In the third place, the concise manner in which the apostle hath written his epistles may have been designed to render them short, that they might be transcribed and purchased at a small expense, and by that means become of more general use. What advantage this must have been to the disciples in the early ages may easily be conceived, when it is recollected, that anciently there were no books but such as were written with the pen. For, if books so written were of any bulk, being necessarily of great price, they could not be procured by the lower classes of mankind, for whose use St. Paul's epistles were principally designed.
In the fourth place, although the want of those nicely formed transitions, circumlocutions, and recapitulations, by which the different parts of the elegant writings of the Greeks are united and formed into one whole or perfect body of discourse, hath given to the apostle's epistles such a miscellaneous appearance, that the reader is apt to consider them as desultory compositions, like those of Epictetus and Marcus Antoninus; and although, by this means, the most important passages of his writings have the form of aphorisms, it is, perhaps, no real disadvantage, because, on that very account, these passages may be the more easily committed to memory, even by persons who have not learned to read.
This leads me to remark, that the case with which the most striking passages of the apostolical epistles may be committed to memory, through their apparent want of con-exion, hath rendered them in all ages highly profitable to the common people, whose use principally they were intended, and more especially to the primitive Christians. For in that age, when men were so captivated with the gospel, that, on account of it, they parted with everything else, and even to themselves, we may believe they would spend much of their time in committing to memory the chief passages of the evangelical histories and apostolical epistles, in which the doctrines, precepts, and promises of the gospel are recorded. These were the charter on which all their hopes were founded, and the lights by which they guided themselves in every situation, and the only source of their consolation under the sufferings brought on them by the profession of the gospel. We cannot be much mistaken, therefore, in supposing, that persons were chosen to be the penmen of the Scriptures, who, following the bent of their own genius, should write, in the conceit and apparently unconnected manner above described, on purpose that the most useful passages of these divinely inspired compositions might be committed to memory with the greater ease. For thus the more intelligent brethren could not only make these passages the subjects of their own daily meditation, but also repeat them to others, whose memories were not so retentive, or who were not able to purchase copies of the Scriptures, or who perhaps could not have read them although posessed of them; but who, by hearing them often repeated, could commit them to memory, and derive great profit from them.
Even at this day the common people reap the same advantage from the concise and seemingly unconnected form in which the sacred oracles are written. For whether they read them, or hear them read, the nervous sentences and striking passages with which these divinely inspired writings abound, engrave themselves so deeply in the people's minds, that they often occur to their thoughts, both as matter of consolation under the troubles of life, and as motives and rules of conduct in the various situations wherein they are placed.

The foregoing remarks on the apostle Paul's manner of writing, and the reasonings by which I have endeavoured to vindicate him for using the concise obscure style in his epistles, I have ventured to lay before the reader; because, if they are well founded, every person of taste and judgment will acknowledge that these epistles in their present form, are much better calculated for the instruction of the world, than if they had been attired in all the splendour of the Grecian eloquence, whose brightness might have dazzled the imagination of the vulgar for a little, but could neither have enlightened their understanding, nor have made any lasting impression on their heart. This I say, because it is well known to the critica, that the style in writing which is esteemed most elegant derives its chief excellence from the free license of such taphors and allusions, which, though they may charm the learned, are of no value in the eye of the illiterate, who cannot apply them to their proper counterparts.
Whatever delight, therefore, such learned beauties may give to those who can unfold them, to the vulgar they are little better than a picture to a blind man; for which reason the apostle, with great propriety, hath, for the most part, neglected them.

I shall now conclude the present essay with the following observation concerning the Scriptures in general; namely, that as these writings were designed for all mankind, and were to be translated into every language, it may justly be doubted, whether, in such compositions, any great benefit could have been derived to the world from beauties which depend on a nice arrangement of words, on the rhythm and cadences of periods, and on the just application of the various figures of speech frequently introduced. Elegancies of that kind are generally lost in translations, being like those subtle essences which fly off when poured out of one vessel into another. And even though some of these delicate beauties might have been retained in what is called a free translation, yet, as that advantage must have been purchased often at the expense of the inspired writer's meaning, and a translation of the word of God never could have been appealed to as an infallible standard for determining controversies in religion, or for regulating men's practice; because it would have exhibited the translator's private opinion, rather than the mind of the Spirit of God. (See Gen. Pref. page 11.) Whereas, to have the very words, as nearly as possible, in which the revelations of God were originally delivered, set forth in literal translations, was the only method of extending the benefit of revelation, as an infallible rule of faith and practice, to men of all nations. The Spirit of God, therefore, wisely ordered, that the excellence of the Scriptures should consist, neither in their being written in the Attic purity of the Greek tongue, nor in their being highly ornamented with those flowers and graces of speech, whose principal virtue consists in pleasing the imagination and in tickling the ear, but in the truth and importance of the things written, and in a simplicity of style suited to the gravity of the subjects; or in such an energy of language as the grandeur of the thoughts naturally suggested. Excellencies of this sort easily pass from one language into another, while the meretricious ornaments of studied elegance, if in the least displaced, as they must when translated, wholly disappear.

This being the case, I appeal to every reader of sound judgment, whether Lord Shaftesbury and the deists speak sensibly, when they insinuate, that, because the Scriptures were dictated by the Spirit of God, they ought throughout to surpass all human writings in beauty of composition, elegance of style, and harmoniousness of periods. The sacred oracles were not designed, as works of genius, to attract the admiration of the learned, nor to set before them a finished model of fine writing for their imitation; but to turn mankind from sin to God. For which purpose, the graces of a florid, or even of a melodious style, were certainly of little value, in comparison of those more solid excellencies of sentiment and language, whereby the Scriptures have become the power of God unto salvation to all who believe them, and will continue to be so till the end of time. We may therefore in this, as in every other instance, affirm with our apostle, that "the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men," 1 Cor. i. 25.; and may with understanding ascribe to God, only wise, the glory that is due to him, on account of the admirable contrivance of his Word.

ESSAY IV.

On Translating the Greek Language used by the Writers of the New Testament.

In the translation of the apostolical epistles now offered to the public, important alterations are made in the meaning of many passages of Scripture, which are not supported in the notes. The author, therefore, has judged it necessary to submit to his readers a number of observations on the Greek language, and on some of its particles, as used in the inspired writings, whereby the alterations which he hath made in the translation of these writings, he hopes, will appear to be well-founded.

His remarks the author hath made in the following order.—I. On the Verbs. II. On the Voices, Modes, and Tenses of the Verb. III. On the Participle, Nouns, Pronouns, and Articles. IV. On the Particles, ranged in the order of the alphabet. The senses which he hath affixed to each particle he hath supported by passages both from the Scriptures and from the Greek classics, where they are used in these senses. And as often as in the new translation any uncommon sense is given to a Greek word, that word is inserted in the translation, that, by turning to the part of this essay where it is handled, the reader may judge whether the sense affixed to it is sufficiently warranted by its use in other passages. This method the author has adopted, to prevent the necessity of repeating the same proof on every new occasion where it might be wanted.

In examining the following remarks, the reader is desired to recollect, that the native language of the writers of the New Testament was the Hebrew, or Syr.-Chaldaic. For these authors, following the idiom of their mother tongue, naturally affixed to some of the Greek words and phrases which they had used, the senses of the corresponding Hebrew words and phrases. Hence the Hebraisms found in the New Testament, which the lesser critics have so loudly condemned, as was observed in the essay on St. Paul's style. Allowing, therefore, that the evangelists and apostles have introduced Hebrew forms of expression into their Greek writings, the following remarks ought not to be considered as ill-founded, on prentence that they are not applicable to the Greek language in its classical purity. Some critics, indeed, anxious to defend the reputation of the apostles as writers, have endeavoured to produce, from the best Greek authors, phrases similar to those in the inspired writings which have been most blamed. But the attempt, I think, might have been spared. For although the Hebraisms in the New Testament are fewer than some fastidious critics have supposed, the best judges have allowed that there are, in these books, words and phrases which can be called by no other name than Hebraisms, as the following remarks will clearly evince.

VERBS.

1. Active Verbs.—The Hebrews used active verbs to express the agent's design and attempt to do a thing, though the thing designed or attempted did not take place. Exod. viii. 18. "And the magicians did so (attempted to do so) with their enchantments, to bring forth lice, but they could not." Deut. xxviii. 60. "Ye shall be sold (set to sale) and no man shall buy you." Ezek. xxiv. 15. "Because I have purged (attempted to purge) thee," namely, by instructions, reproofs, &c. "and thou wast not purified." Matt. xii. 11. "Elias truly cometh first, and restoreth all things:" that is, attempteth to restore all things. Gal. v. 4. "Whoever of you are justified (that is, seek to be justified) by the law, ye are fallen from grace." Phil. iii. 15. (Oreb wawal). "As many as are (that is, as would be) perfect." 1 John i. 10. "We make him (we endeavour to make him) a liar." 1 John ii. 26. "These things I have written concerning them that deceive you:" that is, who endeavour to deceive you. See also chap. v. 10.

2. The Hebrews used active verbs to denote simply the effect of the action expressed. Isa. i. 1. Quacquenius sum ab is qui me non petebant. In this passage quarre and petere, according to the ordinary signification of these words, are evidently the same. And yet St. Paul, quoting the passage, rightly expresses it, Rom. x. 20. "I was found of them that sought me not." John xvi. 5. "None of you asketh me, whither I am going; for Peter had expressly asked that question, chap. xiii. 36. 1 Cor. viii. 12. "But thus sinning against the brethren (su mortem, and beating, that is), and hurting their weak consciences (for hurting is the effect of beating), ye sin against Christ."

3. Active Verbs, in some cases, were used by the Hebrews to express, not the doing of the thing said to be done, but simply the declaring that it is done, or that it shall be done. Thus, both in the Hebrew and in the Septuagint translation of Levit. xiii. 6. 8. 11. 13. 17. 20. &c., the priest is said to cleanse and to purify; but the meaning evidently is, that, after due examination, he is to declare the person clean or polluted. Acts x. 15. 'What God hath cleansed, let not man say, he is polluted.' Eph. v. 26. 'Do not thou pollute; that is, as our translators have rightly rendered it, do not thou call unclean.' Isaiah vi. 10. 'Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, declare, or foretell, that the heart of this people is fat, &c.' Accordingly, Matt. xiii. 15, where this passage is quoted, it is thus expressed: 'The heart of this people is waxed fat,' &c. Jeremiah i. 9. 'I have put my word into thy mouth, 10. So that I have this day set thee over the nations, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, and to build, and to plant.' I have appointed thee to destroy, or to build, concerning the nations, that they shall be rooted out, &c. Ezek. xliii. 3. 'According to the vision which I saw when I came to destroy the city; that is, to prophesy that it should be destroyed. Ezek. xiii. 2. 'Son of Man, wilt thou judge, wilt thou judge the bloody city?' Will thou declare that the bloody city shall be judged? This the prophet accordingly did in the subsequent part of the chapter, particularly ver. 14, 15, 16. Matt. xix. 28. 'Ye who have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory (when, after his resurrection, he shall sit on the right hand of God), ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel,' that is, by inspiration, ye shall publish laws for the government of all the members of the visible church on earth, and, by authority derived from me, ye shall declare, that all shall be judged by these laws to the last day. 1 Corinthians vi. 3. 'Do ye not know that the saints judge the world?' Do ye not know that the inspired preachers of the gospel declare that the world is to be judged; and also declare the laws by which it is to be judged? Ver. 3. 'Do ye not know that we judge angels?' That in the gospel which we preach, we declare the judgment and punishment of the evil angels?

4. Active Verbs were used by the Hebrews to express, not the doing, but the permission of the thing which the agent is said to do. Thus, Gen. xxvi. 7, Jacob says of Laban, 'God did not give him (did not permit him) to hurt me.' Ezek. v. 25. 'Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil entreated these people?' Wherefore hast thou suffered these people to be so evil entreated? Psalm xvi. 10. 'Thou wilt not (give, that is) suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.' Psalm lxix. 18. 'So I gave them up unto their own hearts' lusts.' I permitted them to be led by their own strong lusts; as is plain from God's adding, ver. 13. 'O that my people had hearkened to me, &c.; for then would not God have heard their enemies, and they that sought after his soul, but sent hosts against them.' Jer. iv. 10. 'Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people' (thou hast suffered this people to be greatly deceived by the false prophets), 'saying, ye shall have peace.' Ezek. xiv. 9. 'If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet.' I have permitted him to deceive himself. Ezek. xx. 25. 'I gave them also statutes that were not good.' I permitted them to follow the wicked statutes of the neighbouring nations, mentioned Levit. viii. 3. Matt. vi. 13. 'Lead us not (suffer us not to be led) into temptation.' Le Clerc, Ars Crit., vol. i. p. 237, has shown, that Homer, in the same sense, ascribes the evil actions of men to God. Matt. xvi. 25. 'I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast hid (has not revealed) these things,' &c. Matt. xiii. 11. 'To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom, but to them it is not given.' Ye are permitted to know the mysteries, &c., but they are not permitted to know them. Mark v. 12. 'Send us into the next town.' They suffer us to go, &c. Mark xii. 29. 'What they (the Jewish rulers who crucified Jesus) had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the cross, and laid him in a sepulchre; they permitted him to be taken down, and laid in a sepulchre; for it was Joseph and Nicodemus, two of Christ's disciples, who took him down and buried him. Rom. i. 34. 'God gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts.' God permitted them to fall into uncleanness, through their own strong lusts. Rom. ix. 18. 'Whom he will he hardeneth.' He permitted them to harden. Rom. vii. 7. 'The rest were blinded.' Were permitted to become blind. 8. 'According to what is written, God hath given them a spirit of slumber;' hath permitted them to fall asleep. 2 Thess. ii. 11. 'For this cause God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie.' God shall permit strong delusion to beset them, so that they shall believe a lie. Rev. ix. 3. 'And to them was given power.' xiii. 5. 'And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies.' 6. Active Verbs are used to express, not the doing, but the giving an occasion of doing a thing—Gen. xlii. 28. 'If mischief befall him by the way, then shall ye bring down (ye shall be the occasion of bringing down) my gray hairs, &c.' Kings xiv. 16. 'Jeroboam made Israel to sin; occasioned the people to sin, by setting up the calves. Acts i. 28. 'This man (Judas) purchased a field with the reward of iniquity;' that is, occasioned it to be purchased; &c. is plain from Matt. xxviii. 7. 6. Active Verbs sometimes denote the continuation of the action which they express.—John vi. 13. 'These things I have written to you who believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.' That is, continue to believe on the name of the Son of God. 7. Nouns and Intransitive Verbs.—The writers of the New Testament use nether and intransitive verbs to denote actions whose objects are things without the agent. Thus, the intransitive verb ἡμεῖς, which signifies to rise or spring up, is used transitively, Matt. iv. 45. (ἐκείνη) 'He maketh his sun to rise.' So ἐκεῖνος, I rise. John vi. 54. ἐκείνοις αὐτοῖς, I will cause him to rise. I will raise him. 1 Cor. iii. 6. 'But God hath made to grow.' 1 Cor. iv. 7. 'Who (ἐκ διαθήκης) maketh thee to differ?' Matt. xxv. 39. 'If thy right eye (ἐκ διαθήκης) causeth thee to offend, cast it out.' Matt. xviii. 6. 'Whoso (ἐκ διαθήκης) causeth one of these little ones to offend.' 1 Cor. viii. 13. 'If (ἐκ διαθήκης) maketh my brother to offend.' In like manner, ἔχωσιν, which signifies to know, is likewise used transitively. 1 Cor. ii. 2. (ἐγὼ γὰρ εἶδον τὰ ἀποκάλυψιν) 'For I determined to make known (to preach) nothing among you but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.' Mark xii. 32. 'Not even the angels who are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father;' neither man, nor angel, nor the Son, is allowed to make known that day will happen, the Father having reserved that discovery to himself. Acts i. 7. In the same manner, ἔκκοιτο also is used transitively in the following passage: 2 Cor. xii. 14. 'I give thanks to God, who at all times (ἐκκοίτε) maketh us to triumph.' 2 Cor. xix. 8. 'God is able (ἐκκοίτε) to make every gun. abound in you." Eph. i. 8. 'According to the riches of his grace (πληρωμα), which (πληρωμα) he hath made to overflow in us.' 1 Thess. iii. 12. 'And the Lord (ολακτονωμα, ολακτονωμα) cause you to abound and overflow in love.

Voices, Modes, Tenses, and Numbers of the Verb.

8. Voices.—Besa tells us, that the active is put for the passive, 1 Pet. ii. 6. 'Wherefore also (παρερχεσθαι for παρερχεσθαι) it is contained in the Scripture.' Accordingly, the first Syriac translation has Dictur in Scripture. But this change of the voice is singular. Estius observes, that some verbs in the middle voice have only a passive signification, and others an active, and others both. When verbs in the middle voice are used actively, they commonly express the agent's performing the action on himself. Heb. x. 38. 'The just by faith shall live (ουτοι ευνοονται) but, if he with draw himself.' Examples of verbs in the middle voice, which have a passive signification, are—Luke ii. 5. θετετελωσαν, 'to be taxed with Mary.' 1 Cor. i. 2. And all (ολακτονωμα) were baptized into Moses.'

9. Moses.—As the Hebrew language has no subjunctive mode, the indicative is often put for the subjunctive. 1 Cor. iv. 6. 'That none of you (ουτοι επιθυμουσιν) may be offended.' 1 Cor. xiv. 12. 'If it be preached that Christ was raised, &c. (εκ του θανατου) how can some among you say?' Ver. 35. 'Some will say, (ου νοειται γιας του επηρεμουσιν) how can the dead be raised! and with what body do they come?' Ver. 50. 'Neither (οπως επηρεμουσιν γιας του θανατου) can corruption inherit incorruption.' Gal. iv. 17. (ευνοεσθαι ενας συναδεως γιας συναδεως) 'That ye may freely love them.' On the other hand, the subjunctive mode hath often the sense of the indicative. Matt. xi. 6. 'Blessed is he (εις το συναδεως ου λεγεταις) who is not made to stumble.' John xv. 8. 'By this is my Father glorified (ευνοεσθαι ενας ου λεγεταις) when ye bear much fruit.' 1 Cor. xv. 5. (εις το συναδεως ου λεγεταις) when ye have secular seats of judgment.' 1 Cor. xv. 25. 'Until (παρει) he hath put all enemies under his feet.' James iv. 13. 'Today or to-morrow (οπως επηρεμουσιν γιας του θανατου) we will go.' Ver. 15. 'If the Lord will (ου νοειται γιας του θανατου) we shall live.'

The imperative is sometimes used for the indicative.—Thus, Psalm xxii. 8. what is in the Hebrew Roll, or trust thou, &c. is translated by the LXX. He trusted in the Lord; and it is so quoted Matt. xxvii. 43. The imperative is used for the future, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. 'Let him be;' for 'He shall be Anathema.'

The indicative mood is used by the Hebrews for the verb, in any of its modes and tenses. —Luke ix. 3. 'Neither (ουτος) have two coats.' Rom. xii. 15. (ουλομεν) 'Rejoice with them that rejoice.' Phil. iii. 16. (οντος και θεου) 'Let us walk by the same rule.' 2 Cor. x. 9. 'Seem (οντος και θεου) as if I would terrify you.' The imperative, with the article prefixed, is used for the substantive noun. Heb. ii. 15. 'And who (οι παντες οι και θεους) through all their life.' Heb. iii. 15. (οι παντες και θεους) for οι και θεους. 'By the saying, To-day, &c. In this form the article is sometimes omitted. Heb. iv. 1. 'A promise being left (οντος γιας του ενας συναδεως) of entering.' The Lainse likewise said σειρα ταυ, for σειρα του ενας συναδεως.

10. Tenses.—As the Hebrew verb hath only two tenses, the present and future, these two, with the participles, supply the place of all the rest. Hence the Jews, in writing Greek, give to the present and future tenses of Greek verbs all the variety of signification which these tenses have in the Hebrew.

To begin with the present tense, they denote in the Greek the continuation of the action or state expressed by the verb. —Rom. v. 2. 'This grace wherein (ουτοι οι και θεους) ye have stood' ye continue to stand.' 1 Cor. i. 10. 'In whom (ομοφων) we have trusted, and continue to trust.' Heb. ii. 11. 'And every high priest (οντος και θεους) standeth daily' that is, continueth daily to stand. James i. 20. 'He becometh himself, and (ουτος και θεους) goeth his way.' The present tense, therefore, must, in some instances, be translated in the signification of the present. In this observation I am supported by Besa, who thus writes on Rom. ix. 19. 'Multa enim verba sunt apud Graecos que improvisedis habent presentis significacionem. We may therefore translate John xx. 17. thus: 'Hold me not,(ουτος και θεους, &c.) for I am not yet ascended.' I am to remain a while on earth. The present tense, especially in the prophetic writings, are used for the future, to show the absolute certainty of the things spoken of. Thus, Rom. viii. 30. 'The called are represented as already justified, and even glorified.' Eph. ii. 6. Believers are said to be already raised from the dead. Heb. ii. 7. ('οντος και θεους, thou hast made') 'Thou wilt make him for a little while less than angels.' For this was spoken long before the Son of God was made man. Heb. iii. 14. (ουτοι και θεους, we have made) 'We shall be made partakers of Christ, if we hold.' &c. Wherefore, Heb. xii. 22. (ουτος και θεους) may be translated, 'But ye shall come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.'

11. The aorist tense sometimes denote the past action or state continued to the present time; and therefore they are rightly translated in the present tense.—Mark i. 11. 'Thou art my beloved Son, (οντος και θεους) in whom I am well pleased;' that is, have always been well pleased, am at present well pleased, and will continue to be well pleased. Mark xvi. 13. 'Was taken up into heaven, (ουτοι ευνοονται γιας του θανατου) and sat down (and continues to sit) at the right hand of God.' Matt. xxiii. 2. 'The Scribes and Pharisees (οι συναδεως) continue to sit in Moses's chair.'

The aorist is used sometimes for the aorist perfect tense; that is, it denotes an action completed some time ago.—Matt. iv. 3. 'Now Herod (οντος και θεους) having laid hold on John ('οντος και θεους) had bound him.' John xviii. 24. 'Now Anna (οντος και θεους) had sent him bound to Caesar.' John xi. 2. ('οντος και θεους) who was anointed,' i. e. who had formerly anointed. Blackwall, Sac. Cl. vol. ii. page 228, observes that the first and second aorists in the potential and subjunctive modes (which are futures too) are often, in sacred and common writers, equivalent to the future of the indicative. Thus 'αργεται is in the sense of 'ιμαται.' Mark ii. 20. 'The days will come (οντος και θεους) when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them.' See also Luke v. 35. John xvi. 8. (οντος και θεους)

12. The present tense is sometimes put for the preterite.—Acts ix. 36. 'They were all afraid of him, not believing (οντος και θεους, that he was) that he was a disciple.' Philip. i. 30. 'Having the same conflict (οντος και θεους, which ye see) which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.' Heb. viii. 3. (οντος και θεους) 'He remained a priest in all his life.' Ver. 8. 'One testified of (οντος και θεους, that he lived) name, a priest all his life. The present tense is often put for the future, to show that the thing spoken of shall as certainly happen, as it were already present. Matt. iii. 10. 'Every tree which bringeth forth good fruit (οντος και θεους, is cut down) shall be cut down.' Mark ix. 31. 'The Son of Man (οντος και θεους, is delivered) shall be delivered into the hands of men.' 1 Cor. xv. 2. 'By which also (οντος και θεον, ye are saved) ye shall be saved.' Ver. 12. 'How say some among you (οντος και θεους) that there is that shall be no resurrection of the dead!' James v. 3. 'And (οντος και θεους, eateth) shall eat your flesh.' 2 Pet. iii. 11. 'Seeing all these things (οντος και θεους, shall be dissolved) shall be dissolved.' Ver. 12. 'And the elements (οντος και θεους, are melted) shall be melted.'
ENAT IV. PRELIMINARY ESSAYS.

The present tense is sometimes put for the imperfect.—Gal. ii. 14. ‘Seeing that (εἰς ἀπαρακτός) they do not walk’—Gal. i. 15. (εἰς ἀπαρακτός) this was ‘This is he of whom I speak.”

13. The future of the indicative is often, in the writings of the Hebrews, used for the most forcible imperative. See the declension—1 Cor. v. 13. ‘Therefore (εἰς ἀπαρακτός) ye shall put away’ put away from among yourselves that wicked person.” 1 Tim. vi. 8. (ἀπαρακτώμενος, we will be content.) ‘Let us be content.’

‘The future of the indicative is sometimes used for the present and imperfect of the subjunctive.—Matt. xii. 31. ‘All manner of sin and blasphemy (ἀπαρακτώμενος, shall be forgiven) may be forgiven.’ Luke vi. 7. (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, whether he will heal) ‘Whether he would heal on the Sabbath.’ The participles of the present, and of the imperfect tenses, are sometimes used for the perfect.—John iii. 13. ‘No man had ascended into heaven, but the Son of Man, who is in heaven, who was in heaven.’

14. NUMBER AND PERSON OF THE VERB. The sacred writers, to render their discourse more emphatic, or more general, sometimes change the number and person of the verb. Gal. vi. 1. ‘Ye that are spiritual, (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) becoming God, considering thyself.’ 1 Tim. ii. 15. ‘She shall be saved through child-bearing (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος), if they live in faith, &c.’ By this change of the number and person, we are directed to consider Eve as the representative of the whole sex.—She and all her daughters shall be saved, if they live in faith, &c.

Participles, Nouns, Pronouns, Articles.

15. PARTICIPLES.—The English participles generally have a causal signification—that is, they express a reason for something which goes before, or which follows in the discourse.—Thus, Rom. vi. 8. ‘We believe that we shall also live with him.’ 6. ‘Knowing that Christ being raised (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) dieth no more.’ But as the Greek participles are often used, when no reason is expressed, in such cases, if they are translated by the corresponding English participles, the sense of a connexion, which does not exist in the text, will be conveyed. Of this, see examples in the common version, Rom. vi. 5, 6; 2 Cor. x. 5, 6; Eph. v. 10; Col. i. 10. In such cases, it is better to translate the participles by the parts of the verb for which they are used. For example, Rom. vi. 5, 6. ‘is thus rendered by our translators: ‘For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection.’ 5. Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin.’ But these verses ought to be translated unconnectedly in the following manner: 5. ‘For seeing we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) certainly we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection. 6. Ye know this also, that our old man is crucified together with him, &c.’ In like manner, 2 Cor. x. 4. is thus rendered: ‘For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strong holds.’ Col. i. 16. ‘Whose imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. 6. And having in readiness to revenge, &c.’ But the following is a more just translation: 5. ‘We overthrow reasonings, and every high thing raised up against the knowledge of Christ, and lead captive every thought to the obedience of Christ. 6. And have in readiness to punish, &c.’ See also Eph. v. 18, 30, 51.

16. The Greek participles have an adversative sense, and therefore, to translate them properly, the word though, or although, must be joined to them. Thus, 1 Cor. ix. 19. ‘For (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) though I be free from all men.’ 2 Cor. viii. 8. ‘εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘Though he was rich.’ 2 Cor. x. 3. ‘For (ἐν ἀπαρακτώμενος) though we walk in the flesh.’ Gal. iv. 1. ‘The heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a bond-man, (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) though he be Lord of all.’ 1 Pet. i. 6. ‘On which account ye rejoice (αἰτία ἐν ἀπαρακτώμενος), although for a little while still ye are made sorrow.’ Ver. 8. ‘Εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘On whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing.’ 1 Thess. ii. 6. ‘ἀπαρακτώμενος εἰς ἑαυτόν, ‘Though we might have been burdensome.’ In all these passages our translators have rightly supplied the word though, as included in the participle.

Supply the same word in the translation of the following passages, and it will throw great light on them.—Luke x. 32. ‘Likewise a Levite (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος καὶ ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, καὶ ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ ἐπισκόπητος) being near the place, though he came and saw, passed by on the other side.’ Rom. i. 21. ‘Because (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, not that they knew God, they did not glorify him.’ 1 Tim. iii. 14. ‘These things I write to thee, (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) though I hope to come to thee soon.’

The Greek participles, by means of the verb εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, are used for any part of the verb of which they are the participles.—Thus, Rom. v. 11. ‘εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘But we boast in God.’ Rom. xii. 2. ‘εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος ἐκατερομένος, Be of the same mind one towards another.’

Philip. iii. 4. ‘κατά παθήματα εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘Though I might also have confidence.’ 1 Tim. v. 13. ‘αἰτία εἰς ἄκατον ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ διακονεῖται, ‘At the same time being also idle, they learn to wander about.’ This is the Vulgate translation. Col. ii. 12. ‘εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘Ye are buried with him.’ 1 Pet. ii. 18. ‘Servants (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) be subject to your masters.’ 1 Pet. iii. 7. ‘In like manner, ye husbands (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) dwell with them.’ In other instances, the substantive verb is expressed: Eph. v. 5. ‘τατοῦ γὰρ ἐν ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘For this ye know.’ See also Heb. ii. 12. Our translators, however, forgetting this use of the Greek participles, have, in many other instances, translated them literally, and established a connexion in the discourse, which mars the sense, and renders the apostle’s language perfectly ungrammatical.

Participles are sometimes put for the correspondent substantive nouns.—Herod. l. i. i. Λόγος ἐν ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘To the emperor Marcus were born several daughters.’ Matt. iv. 3. ‘And when (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) the tempter came.’ Luke ii. 2. ‘This was the first enrolment (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος τὸ Σημεῖον Κορματος) of Cyrenius, governor of Syria; ’ that is, who was afterwards dictator of Syria. 1 Tim. vi. 15. ‘The King (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) of kings, and the Lord (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) of lords.’ Heb. xiii. 7. ‘Remember (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος for ἐπιμελήσασθε) your rulers, who have spoken to you the word.’ But, to two of these translations, it is objected, that the article is wanting. Nevertheless, in the following passage, the participle without the article is put for the substantive noun. Gal. iv. 24. ‘Αὐτὸς ἐν ἀπαρακτώμενος, ‘which things are an allegory,’

17. SUBSTANTIVE NOMS.—The sacred writers sometimes use substantive nouns for adjectives. Circumcision and uncircumcision signify circumcised and uncircumcised persons; anathema, excommunication, is an excommunicated person. 1 Cor. xiv. 12. ‘So also ye, seeing ye are earnestly deleos (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, for ἐκκλησία) of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may abound for the edification of the church.’ Ver. 32. ‘Παρεμωρίας, ‘The spirits (for the spiritual gifts) of the prophets are subject.’

Gal. i. 14. ‘More exceedingly (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος) zeal.’ 1 John v. 6. ‘Because the spirit is (εἰς ἀπαρακτώμενος, the truth, that is true.’
18. Sometimes in Scripture, when one substantive governs another in the genitive, one of them must be translated as an adjective.—Luke xvii. 6. 'Hear what (διότι ἂν) the unjust judge saith,' Rom. vi. 5. 'Walk in (ἐν) γνῶσιν, a new life.' Rom. vii. 5. Πᾶν ἡμέρα τοῦ σπυραίου, 'The sinful passions.' Rom. viii. 9. 'In the likeness (εἰς τὸν ομοίωμα) of the flesh of sin of sinful flesh.' Phil. iii. 21. Χρίστος τινὰ παρασκευάζομεν, (the body of our humiliation), our humbled body; body humbled by sin. Col. i. 22. 'The body of his flesh,' his fleshly body. Col. ii. 18. 'Puffed up by (εἰς τὸν ομοίωμα) his fleshly mind.' Col. iii. 14. Bond of perfectness;' a perfect bond. Eph. vi. 12. 'Against (τὰ πονηρὰ τῶν πνευμάτων, spiritual things of wickedness) wicked spirits. Heb. ix. 15. 'Receive the promise of the eternal inheritance,' the promised eternal inheritance. 1 John i. 1. 'Have handled (ἐν) τῷ λόγῳ Ἰησοῦ, concerning the word of life) concerning the living word.' Accordingly it is added, ver. 2. 'And the life (namely, of the word) was manifested.'

Sometimes when one substantive governs another, the latter must be translated in apposition, as it is called, that is, as explanatory of the former.—Gen. ii. 17. 'The tree of the knowledge of good and evil;' the tree of the knowledge of good, which is evil, that is, the tree of the knowledge of a pleasure which is evil. 2 Cor. v. 1. 'When our earthly house (ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ) of the tent, which is a tent,' 2 Pet. ii. 1. 'Who shall bring in (ἐν εἰρήνη) εἰρήνην, peace, heretikes of destruction) heretikes which occasion destruction.'

19. When one substantive is joined to another by a copulative, the one must be translated as governing the other.—Dan. iii. 7. All the people, the nations, and the languages; that is, 'people of all nations and languages.' Matt. iv. 16. 'The region and shadow of death;' the land of the shadow of death. Acts xviii. 6. 'The hope and resurrection of the dead.'* The hope of the resurrection of the dead. In other instances, the substantives so joined must be translated as adjectives. John xiv. 16. 'I am the way, the truth, and the life;' I am the true and living way. Col. ii. 8. 'Spoil you (ἐν τῷ θεόν) the fulness of God and Immortality, through philosophy and false deceit) through a false and deceitful philosophy.' 2 Tim. i. 10. 'Hath brought (ἐν ζωῇ) life and immortality immortal life to light.' This idiom is found in the Latin language likewise: Pateris libamus et aurum, i.e. auris patetis, golden cups.

20. Adjective Nouns.—The neuter adjective is sometimes put its corresponding substantive.—Rom. ii. 4. 'Not knowing (ἐν θέσεως, the good thing) the goodness of God.' See also 2 Cor. viii. 8. Philippians. iv. 4. 11. Heb. vi. 17. Sometimes the neuter adjective is put for the masculine and feminine jointly. John v. 37. πιστ., 'All that the Father giveth me.' 1 Cor. vi. 12. 'And such were some of you.' 1 Cor. xi. 13. 'As the woman is from the man, so also the man is by the woman; but (ὅτῳ) all, that is, both man and woman, of God.'

21. Generis of nouns.—The masculine is sometimes put for the feminine, even by classical authors. Of this Blackwall has produced examples, Sac. Cl. vol. i. p. 85. Wherefore, Acts ix. 35. μαθηταί, though masculine, denotes the woman who washed the dead body of Dorcas. Participles and adjectives sometimes take the genitives, not of the substantive noun that is expressed, but of one that is tantamount, and which is understood. Mark. ii. 20. Καὶ οὗτος ἤγαγεν τῆς παρασκευής. 'And the spirit seeing him, straightway took him.' Here the word agreeing with οὗτος is not παρασκευή, but θεών understood. See pronouns, No. 64.

22. Numbers of nouns.—A noun in the singular number is sometimes used for its plural.—1. Cor. vi. 11. 'One who shall be able to judge (ἐστώ μεν τοῦ αὐτοῦ) between his brethren.' 2 Cor. xi. 26. 'Dangers in (the city) cities, dangers in (the wilderness) wildernesses.'

On the other hand, the sacred writers, to aggravate the subjects of which they treat, use plural nouns, though the things which they denote are naturally singular.—Mark xvi. 19. 'Sat down (κατασκηνών, at the right hands) at the right hand of God.' 1 Thess. v. 1. 'However, concerning (τοὺς ἐγκρίνοντας καὶ κατασκηνών, the times and seasons) the time and seasons,' namely, of Christ's appearing. See also 1 Tim. vi. 15. Tit. i. 3. Heb. ix. 23. 'But the heavenly holy places (ἀπάντες οὐρανοί, with better sacrifices) with a better sacrifice.' For Christ offered only one sacrifice for sin. Heb. x. 28. 'He who despised Moses' law died without (κατασκηνών, mercies) mercy.' Matt. xxi. 7. 'And brought the ass and the colt, and set him (κατασκηνών) upon it,' the colt. Le Clerc, Ars Crit. vol. i. p. 353. hath given examples from Homer of the same anomaly. If this change of the number is admitted in that famous text, 1 Cor. xv. 28, as some commentators propose, it will afford an easy interpretation of a passage otherwise very difficult: 'Else what shall they do who are baptized (κατασκηνών) for the dead man, for Christ who was put to death by the Jewish rulers?

23. Cases of nouns.—Blackwall (Sac. Cl. vol. i. b. 1. c. 2.) remarks, that grammarians think the genitive the only case that can be put absolutely; but the accusative often, and the dative sometimes, are absolute in the Greek. For example, Mark ix. 28. Matt. vii. 1. Thence, Blackwall says, will clear many passages from the charge of solecism, and account for several various readings occasioned by the ignorance of copyists.

The genitive absolute in the Greek, answering to the ablative absolute in the Latin, hath often a causal significance, and ought to be so understood.—Gal. iii. 25. Εἰς τὸν αὐτόν. 'But faith (the gospel) being come,' that is, because faith is come, 'we are no longer under the pedagogue.'

24. It is of importance to observe, that, in the Greek language, nouns in the genitive case sometimes express the object, and sometimes the agent; and therefore, in the translation of the Scriptures, these uses of the genitive ought to be carefully distinguished. Of the genitive of the object, the following are examples.—Matt. ix. 25. 'The gospel (or good news, τὰ βούλημα) concerning the kingdom.' Matt. x. 1. Power (τὰ πεπραγμένα κατασκηνών) over unclean spirits, namely, to cast them out. Acts iv. 9. 'If we this day be examined (τὰς συμβάσεις) concerning the good deed of the impartial man;' that is, concerning the good deed done to the impartial man. Rom. xvi. 15. Τοὺς μὲν ἁγιασμένους, 'The preaching concerning Jesus.' 2 Cor. i. 8. 'For us (τὰς συμβάσεις τῶν ἀσών) the sufferings for Christ.' Eph. iii. 1. 'I Paul (ἐν συμβάσει τῶν ἀσών) the prisoner for Christ.' 1 Tim. iv. 1. Oδηγοῦμεν ἑαυτούς, 'Doctrines concerning demons.' Rev. ii. 13. 'And have not retained (τοὺς ἁγιασμένους) the faith concerning me;' or it may be translated as the genitive of the agent, 'the faith which I entwine.'

25. Of the genitive of the agent, the following are examples:—Luke i. 69. Καὶ ἐξ ὑμῶν, 'A horn which worketh salvation.' John vi. 28. 'This is the work of God;' the work which God enjoined. Rom. iii. 22. 'Faith of Jesus;' the faith which Jesus requires. 2 Cor. iv. 10. 'Always carrying about in the body (μικρὰς μυχὴς) the mortification of the Lord Jesus;' the mortification which the Lord Jesus requires or practised. Eph. iv. 18. Πονηροτάτους τοῦ γένους τῶν ὄντων, 'Being alienated from the life which God commandeth.' Col. i. 24. 'And fill up the remainder of the afflictions of Christ, the remainder of the afflictions which Christ hath enjoined me.
to suffer. Col. ii. 11. 'The circumcision of Christ;' the circumcision enjoined by Christ. See Rom. iii. 32. note. The genitive is commonly marked by the article το. But sometimes the article is omitted; as, Heb. v. 6. κατά τήν ταξις τῷ Μάρκου, 'According to the order of Melchizedek.' Tit. ii. 13. 'The appearing of the glory of the great God (οὖς τοῦ τούτοις θεοῦ γιατί θεόν) for τούτοις, and of our saviour Jesus Christ.'

The dative of the cause, manner, and instrument is often expressed by a preposition; but sometimes the preposition is understood.—Luke xxi. 15. 'Shall we smite (τί) with the sword?' Luke xxii. 15. 'Nothing worthy of death is done (τὸ δέκα) by him.' Supply τοίς. This is an easy solution of a difficulty which hath hitherto perplexed all the critics and commentators. Ephes. ii. 15. 'And hath abolished (οὖς τας τέκνα) by his flesh.' Heb. xii. 10. 'We have an altar of which they have no right to eat (οἱ τοῖς ἐκκλησίαις) who worship (supply τῶν) in the tabernacle.'

25. COMPARISON OF NOUNS.—While treating of nouns it may be proper to observe, that the writers of the New Testament have adopted the Hebrew manner of comparison. The following are examples of the Hebrew comparison in the second degree.—Matt. x. 7. 'I will have mercy, and not sacrifice.' Mark iii. 4. 'Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath days, or to do evil?' Is it not more lawful to do good on the Sabbath days than to do evil?' viz., in watching Jesus on the Sabbath, that they might find matter of accusation against him. John vii. 27. 'Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat endurable to eternal life.' Labour more for the meat endurable to eternal life, than for the meat that perisheth. John xiv. 23. 'If I had not come and spoken to them, they had not had sin;' so much sin. 1 Cor. iii. 7. 'So the planters are any thing, nor the waterer, but God who maketh to grow.' Their influence is nothing in comparison of God's. 1 Cor. i. 17. 'For Christ sent me not to baptise,' but to preach the gospel.' Christ sent me to preach the gospel rather than to baptise. Col. iii. 2. 'Set your affections on things above, and not on things on the earth.' Set your affections rather on things above, than on things on the earth.

27. The following are examples of the Hebrew manner of comparing things in the third degree, by representing them as belonging to God.—Gen. xxx. 6. 'Wrestlings of God;' that is, very great wrestlings. 1 Sam. xiv. 15. 'The anointings of God.' Psal. xxxvi. 6. 'The mountains of God,' and Psal. lxxii. 2. 'Cedars of God;' are very great mountains and cedars. Job viii. 5. 'Ποῖς ἡμέρας θαυμάζετε θεοῦ; 'A great city to God;' or a very great city. Matt. xii. 18. 'Jesus answered, saying unto them (στιχάριν) ὅτι ἔχεις τῆς ἡμέρας καὶ τῆς νύχτος; 'Have a faith of God;' have a very great faith. These. 11. 'With the voice of an archangel, and with a trumpet of God;' a great trumpet. The comparison in the third degree is sometimes made by doubling the word. Luke xiv. 16. 'With desire I have desired.' I have greatly desired. Acts iv. 17. ἃ�τοιχίζεσθαι γιατί. 'Let us threaten them as a threatening;' let us threaten them severely. Acts v. 28. Οὐ παρεγείροντο παραγείρομαντο. 'Did we not strictly command you?' Matt. vii. 21. 'Not every one who saith to me, Lord, Lord;' that is, most excellent Lord. Matt. xii. 27. 'I made myself to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi;' that is, most excellent Rabbi. Mark xiv. 45. He goeth straightway to him, and saith, Master, Master;' that is, most excellent master.

28. The positive is sometimes put for the superlative. Luke ix. 48. 'He who is least among you shall be (μετὰ πάντων) greatest.' For the disciples disputed who should be the greatest.

29. The comparative is sometimes put for the positive. E 1 Tim. iii. 14. 'Hoping to come to thee (τάχα) shortly,' or so soon. 2 Tim. i. 18. 'And in how many things he ministered to me in Ephesus, thou knowest (γνώσθην) better.' Sometimes the comparative is put for the superlative. 1 Cor. xii. 13. Μεγάλη (ἐν τίνι) 'But the (greater) greatest of these is charity.' 2 Cor. xiv. 19. 'We are of all men (συμμόρυ, more) most miserable.'

30. Idiomatical nouns are words used by the Hebrews in a sense peculiar to themselves. Of these the following are examples.

 שבת, when applied to God, or to Christ, signifies able and willing. Rom. iv. 21. 'Fuly persuaded, that what was promised, he was able and willing even to perform.' Rom. xi. 23. 'For God is (δύνατος) able and willing to graft them in.' See also Rom. xiv. 4; xvi. 25. Heb. ii. 18.

31. All is often used in a restricted sense for the greatest part. 1 Cor. vii. I. 'All we all have knowledge;' that is, the greatest part of us: for it is said, ver. 17. 'There is not in every man that knowledge.' 1 Cor. i. 2. 'That ye remember me in all things;' that is, most things. For they had not obeyed the apostle's precepts concerning the Lord's supper. 1 Cor. xv. 51. 'We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed;' that is, many of us shall be changed.

All sometimes means the greatest degree of the quality to which it is applied. 1 Cor. xii. 2. 'All knowledge, all faith,' signify the greatest knowledge and faith. Col. ii. 9. 'All wisdom and spiritual understanding.' 1 Tim. i. 16. 'Shew all long-suffering.' James i. 2. 'Count it all joy.'

32. Answer was applied by the Hebrews to any kind of speech. It may therefore be translated according to the nature of the speech to which it is applied. Matt. xi. 25. 'At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father,' &c. : At that time Jesus prayed and said, &c. Mark xii. 26. 'At that time Jesus answered and said, while he taught in the temple, How say the scribes that Elias,' &c.: Jesus asked and said. 2 Cor. i. 9. 'We had (πρακτήματα, the answer) the sentence of death in ourselves.'

33. A blessing signifies a gift. 1 Sam. xxi. 27. 'This blessing (gift) which thin hand-maid hath brought.' Rom. xv. 29. 'Come with the fulness of the blessing of the gospel;' come with the fulness of the gift of the gospel. 2 Cor. i. 8. 'That they would go before unto you, and complete beforehand your before-mentioned blessing;' that is, gift to the saints.

34. Brevets. By this word the Hebrews expressed the tenderest affection, and the greatest vehemence of desire; because tender affection, especially love mixed with pity, occasions a commotion and noise in the bowels. Hence the expression, Isa. xi. 15. 'Soundings of the bowels.' 2 Cor. vii. 13. 'Τὰ στομάχια, (his bowels), 'His inward affection.' Philip. ii. 1. 'If any bowels and mercies.' Philen. ver. 20. Αἴσθησίς γάρ εἰς τὰ καρδίας, 'Quiet my bowels.'

35. Bread signifies the whole provision of the table. 2 Sam. ix. 7. 'Thou shalt eat bread continually at my table.' Matt. iv. 3. 'Command that this stone be made bread, or meat.' 4. 'It is written, man shall not live by bread (meat) alone.' Matt. vi. 7. 'Our daily bread.' Mark iii. 20. 'They could not so much as eat bread,' take food. Mark vii. 5. 'Eat bread (meat) with unwashed hands.' See Eat, Drink.

36. Called. To be called often signifies to be simply. 1 John iii. 1. 'That we should be called the sons of God;' that we should be the sons of God. Sometimes called means held, acknowledged, accounted.
high degree of that quality. Thus, children of light, of disobedience, of wrath, sons of darkness, &c.—Children sometimes signify disciples: Thus, children of the prophets. Isaiah viii. 18. ‘Behold I and the children,’ &c.

38. Common. Because many of the things in common use among the heathens were, by the law of Moses, unclean to the Jews, they used the word common to denote a thing unclean. Matt. xv. 11. ἔθελεν αὐτῷ ὀνόματι (rendereth a man common,) ‘Polusteth a man.’ Mark vii. 2. ‘When they saw some of his disciples eat bread (κοινωνίαν, common) an unclean thing;’ the blood of an unclean or sinful person.

39. Doctrine, λόγος, signifies not only the thing taught, but the action of teaching; a discourse in which things are taught. Mark iv. 2. ‘Taught them many things by parables, and said unto them (τὸν λόγον) in his teaching or discourse.’ The same expression is used, Mark xi. 18. xii. 38. Acts ii. 42. ‘They constantly attended on (παρεῖτον) the teaching of the apostles.’ Titus i. 9. οὐ κατὰ λόγον, ‘According as he hath been taught.’ 1 Cor. xiv. 26. ‘Each of you hath a psalm, (παραθέτως) hath a doctrine.’

40. Eat, Drink. As the Hebrews represented knowledge and wisdom by meat and drink, they made use of the phrases eating and drinking, to denote the operation of the mind in receiving, understanding, and applying doctrine or instruction of any kind, so as to be strongly moved thereby. Jer. xv. 16. ‘Thy words were found, and I did eat them.’ Ezek. iii. 1. ‘Son of man, &c. eat this roll, and go speak unto the house of Israel.’ Consider, understand, and get this roll by heart, and then go and speak it to the house of Israel; as is evident from ver. 4. ‘Speak with my words to them.’ Prov. ix. 5. ‘Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.’ 6. Forsake the foolish and live, and go in the way of understanding.’ John vi. 51. ‘I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever.’ Hence, bread signifies doctrine, also moral qualities, which are nourished by sound doctrine. 1 Cor. v. 8. ‘The unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.’ Further, to eat and drink any quality, signifies intimately to partake thereof. 1 Cor. v. 1. ‘Osw swv πάντας, ποιεῖται διὰ ὑμῶν;’ why do ye not (蠡) hear understand the law! Acts ix. 7. ‘The men which journeyed with him stood speechless, (ὁ στόχος) hearing a voice, but seeing no man.’ Acts xxii. 9. ‘And they that were with me, saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but (οἱ μεθ' αὐτῶν) they heard not; so our translators have it; but it should be rendered they understood not the voice (the speech, of him who spake to me.’ This is an easy and proper reconciliation of these passages, which in the common method of translating the Greek word εἰσορέω, are directly contradictory to each other. 1 Cor. v. 3. ‘Eating’ is commonly reported that there is fornication among you.’

46. Hearing, εἰσορέω, signifies not only the act of hearing, but the thing heard; a relation, a report, fame. Matt. xiii. 1. ‘Herod the tetrarch heard (εἰσορέω) of the fame of Jesus.’ John xiii. 38. ‘Who hath believed (τὸ εἰσορέω) our report!’

47. Heaven was used by the Hebrews to denote God, the possessor of heaven. Matt. xxii. 23. ‘The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or from men? Was it from God, or from men?’ Luke xv. 18. ‘Have I sinned against heaven, and before thee;’ I have sinned against God.

48. Holy, ὅσιος, primarily signifies that which is clean, or free from defilement. Deut. xxiii. 14. ‘Therefore shall thy camp be holy, that he see no unclean thing.’

Holy likewise signifies separated from a common to a sacred use. In this sense Aaron and his sons, the priests, are called holy; being separated from the rest of the Israelites, to minister in holy things. Also, because the Israelites were separated from the rest of mankind, and set apart for the worship of the true God, they were called, Deut. xxiii. 3. God’s holy ones, or sainthes. Whatsoever, when in the epistles the name of saints is given to a whole church, it is in the same sense in which it was given to the ancient Hebrews as a nation. It does not denote holiness of life, but merely their separation from the heathens, to worship the true God, and to be his church and people, in place of the Jews; 1 Pet. ii. 9.
ESSAY IV.
PRELIMINARY ESSAYS.

See Sanctify. In like manner, places and things are called holy, on account of the use to which they are destined. Holy and holiness often denote moral purity. 1 Sam. vi. 19. 'Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? ' 1 Pet. i. 15. 'As he hath called you is holy, be ye also holy in all your conversation.'

Because the Hebrew word answering to holy, signifies sometimes merciful, beautiful, beneficent, and is so translated in our Bibles, it may have the same meaning in some passages of the New Testament. See Titus i. 8. Heb. vii. 26.

49. Honour, in the speech of the Jews, signified maintenance. Matt. xv. 5. 'But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father, or his mother, whatsoever thou wastakest to be profited by me, is a gift to the temple;' 6. 'And shall not honour (shall not maintain) his father or his mother, shall be free.' 1 Cor. xii. 26. 'Or one member be honoured, (nourished), all the members rejoice with it.' 1 Tim. v. 8. 'Honour widows who are really widows,' that is, maintain them from the funds of the church; as is evident from the following ver. 4. Ver. 17. 'Let the elders who rule well be counted worthy of double honour;' that is, of a liberal maintenance. 1 Pet. iii. 7. 'Giving honour to the wife as the weaker vessel;' that is, nourishing the weak with tenderness, on account of the weakness of her body.

50. Living. The Hebrews used the word living, as an epithet to denote the excellency of the thing to which it is applied. Thus, John iv. 10, 11. 'Living water;' Acts vii. 38. 'Living oracles;' Heb. x. 20. 'Living way;' 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5. 'Living stone;' Rev. vii. 17. 'Living fountain;' signify excellent waters, excellent oracles.

51. Name is often put for a person, especially when the person spoken of is great, honourable, and illustrious. Psal. xxx. 1. 'The name of the God of Jacob defend thee.' Acts i. 15. 'The number of the names (persons) was about an hundred and twenty.' Acts iv. 10. 'Be it known unto you all—that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth—by him, doth this man stand here before you whole.' Rev. iii. 4. 'Thou hast a few names (persons) in Sardis, who have not defiled their garments.' John xvi. 6. 'I have manifested thy name (thy character and will) to the men which thou gavest me.' This idiom seems to have taken its rise from the circumstance of persons being known by their names.

52. Riches denotes the greatest abundance of anything. Rom. ii. 4. 'Despise them that enjoy a rich provision of all things;' and his goodness!' Ephes. i. 7. 'According to the riches (greatness) of his grace.' Ephes. iii. 8. 'Preach to the Gentiles the insearchable riches (greatness) of Christ.' Col. i. 27. 'What is the riches of the glory (what the greatness of the glory) of this mystery?' Col. ii. 2. 'All the riches of the full assurance of understanding; the fullest assurance of knowledge.

53. To Sanctify, to make holy, to hallow, in the writings of the Hebrews, signify to cleanse a thing from those defilements which render it unfit for sacred uses. Thus, Moses is said, Exod. xix. 10. to sanctify the people, by making them 'wash their clothes,' &c. Hence, to sanctify, signifies to set a thing apart for a particular purpose; also, to fit a thing for a particular use. Jer. xii. 3. 'Prepare them for the day of slaughter;' that is, in the Hebrew text, 'Sanctify them for the day of slaughter.' Cor. vii. 14. 'For the unbelieving husband is sanctified to the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified to the husband.' The husband and wife, though unbelievers, are fitted to perform their relative duties to each other, by their mutual affection. In the apostolical epistles, Christians are said to have been sanctified, because they were separated from idolaters, and fitted to worship and obey the only true God; on which account the whole body of Christians are called saints. In like manner, those who are fitted for heaven, are said, Heb. x. 14. to 'be sanctified by the one offering of Christ; they are fitted to be admitted into heaven, having received the pardon of their sins through that one offering. See Holy.

To sanctify or hallow God, is to reverence and pay respect to God, on account of the excellence of his character, and the greatness of his power and goodness. Isa. viii. 19. 'Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be your dread, and let him be your bread.' Matt. vi. 9. 'Hallowed be thy name.'

54. Some, 777, in Scripture, often denotes a great number, many. Rom. iii. 3. 'What if some have not believed?' What if the greatest part of the Jewish nation have not believed? Rom. xi. 17. 'But if some (the greatest part) of the branches were broken off.' 1 Tim. iv. 1. 'That, in after times, some (a great number) shall apostatize from the faith.' Heb. iii. 16. 'For some, when they heard, provoked; ' The whole congregation did so, except Caleb and Joshua.

55. To speak, in the Hebrew phraseology, denotes any kind of speaking, whether in the way of affirmation, or command, or question, or promise. Rom. iv. 5. 'Even as David also (7774774) deserveth the blessing, &c.' Jer. xvii. 7. 'At what instant I shall speak (command) concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down.' In the New Testament the words 7777 and 771177 have the same significations. Matt. iv. 3. 'If thou be the Son of God, 7777 speak command that these stones be made bread.' Mark iv. 43. 'Knew to whom I am to give her 7777 meat.' Mark ii. 11. 'He saith to the sick of the palsy, (7711777) command thee to arise.' Luke vi. 14. 'Why calle ye me Lord, Lord, and do not (7711777) the things I command?' Acts xv. 24. 'Certain who went out from us have troubled you (7777777) with precepts, subverting your souls, (77777777) commanding you to be circumcised, to whom we gave no such commandment.' Rom. xi. 1. '17777777, I ask, then, Hath God cast away his people?' See also John xii. 49. Rom. xii. 3. 177 7777. 'Now, by the grace which is given me, I command every one among you.' 1 Cor. vii. 12. 'But to the rest (17777777) I command, not the Lord.' 2 Cor. iv. 6. 'For God (7777) who commanded the light to shine out of darkness.' Rev. xiii. 14. 77777777. 'Commanding those who dwell on the earth, to make an image to the beast; that the riches and glories have shown that the Greek writers use the word 7777777 in the same sense. To speak, 777777, hath the same general significations with 7777777. Luke i. 56. 77777777, (as he spake), As he promised to our fathers.' Heb. i. 1.

56. Spirit. Besides the significations mentioned in explaining the word flesh, No. 43. spirit denotes the greatest degree of any mental quality, either good or bad. Luke x. 22. 'Jesus rejoiced in spirit,' rejoiced greatly. Acts xviii. 25. 'Being fervent in spirit,' being exceedingly zealous. Acts xix. 21. 'Paul purposed in spirit, firmly purposed. Acts xx. 22. 'Behold I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem;' I go with a firm resolution. Rom. i. 9. 'Whom I serve with my spirit,' serve with the greatest zeal. Rom. viii. 15. 'Spirit of bondage, spirit of adoption;' Rom. xi. 8. 'Spirit of deep sleep,' signify the greatest degree of bondage; of final disposition of stupidity.

57. Stand. Dr. Symonds of Cambridge, in his treatise on revising the English translation of the Bible, p. 138. tells us, from Mr. Markland, that all sorts of posture or gesture, as to stand, to sit, to go, to walk, &c. in good Greek writers, have the signification of existere, to be. Acts ix. 7. 'And the men who journeyed with him (77777777) stood were speechless.' For it appears from Acts xxvi. 14. that they all fell to the ground.

58. True, as an epithet, denotes excellency. Luke xvi. 11. 'The true riches,' the most excellent riches. John i. 9. 'The true light,' the most excellent light. John vi. 32. 'True bread,' the most excellent bread. Heb. viii. 2. 'The true tabernacle,' the most excellent tabernacle. 'Truth signifies justice, righteousness.' John iii. 21. 'He who doeth (τὸν ἡμῶν, truth, that is) righteousness, cometh to the light,' &c. 1 Cor. xiii. 7. 'Rejoicing not in unrighteousness, but rejoicing jointly (τὴν ἡμῶν, in truth, that is) in righteousness.' 59. 'Walk.' One's walk denotes a continued course of action and enjoyment, either good or bad; the habitual manner in which one lives. Gen. v. 22. 'Enoch walked with God.' Rom. viii. 1. 'Who walk not after the flesh.' 2 Cor. v. 7. 'We walk by faith and not by sight.' 60. 'Word, λόγος, is a term of very extensive signification. It signifies not only reason, but speech, which is the effect of reason; reason brought forth. Hence the word often denotes the preaching of the gospel. Luke i. 2. 'Were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.' Acts vii. 2. 'It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables,' leave the preaching of the gospel of God. Acts x. 44. 'The Holy Ghost fell on all them who heard the word,' the gospel preached at that time. 'Word, λόγος, like the corresponding Hebrew noun, signifies a matter, or thing, or affair of any kind. Matt. v. 18. 'Whosoever of you shall put away his wife, (lit. κατά τὴν λογίαν) except for the affair of fornication.' Matt. xxii. 24. 'I also will ask you (τον λόγον) one thing.' Acts x. 29. 'I ask therefore, (τον λόγον) for what intent ye sent for me.' Acts xi. 36. 'Αναφέρεται εἰς ἑαυτόν,' 'Have an accusation.' 1 Cor. xv. 2. 'If ye remember (τον λόγον) in what manner,' &c. 'Word, λόγος, signifies likewise a command. Exod. xxi. 28. 'He wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, (I.X.X. τῶν λόγων τινὼν) the ten commandments.' John x. 35. 'If he called them gods to whom (λόγοι) the command of God came.' 1 Tim. vi. 2. 'Conscient not to wholesome (λόγοι) words, commands, even (λόγοις, to the words) to the commands of our Lord Jesus Christ.' 'Word, λόγος, sometimes signifies a sentence of a discourse. Rom. xiii. 9. 'And if there be any other commandment, it is briefly summed up (ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῆς λογίας) in this sentence; namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' 1 Cor. xiv. 19. 'In the church I had rather speak five sentences with my understanding, than ten thousand (λόγους) sentences,' &c. 'Word, εὐκρίνεια, likewise signifies a matter, or thing, of any kind. Luke ii. 19. 'Mary kept (ἐνευκρίνεσθαι) all these things.' 61. PROOEMIUM.—The primitive substantive pronoun is; κε, must be distinguished from the adjective pronoun εἰς, εἰ, who, which. Matt. xiv. 17. 'Οὗτος λέγει ἐμοί, 'They say unto him.' Acts viii. 27. 'Who had come to Jerusalem to worship: (κε) He had the charge of all her treasures.' Acts xiii. 30. 'But God raised him from the dead, (οὗτος) and he was seen many days.' Col. i. 16. 'Οὗτος (He God's beloved Son, mentioned ver. 13,) is the image of the invisible God.' Ver. 18. 'Οὗτος, 'He is the beginning.' Heb. v. 6. 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek.' Ver. 7. 'Οὗτος, 'He (Christ, mentioned ver. 5,) in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers,' &c. 62. The sacred writers, to give the greater emphasis to their discourse, sometimes join two relatives with one antecedent. 1 Pet. ii. 24. 'Οὗτος ἡμας ἐκ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀκούει.' 'Who his ownself bare our sins.' 1 Cor. ii. 9. 'Ας, 'for this sake, 'These things eye hath not seen, κε, (κε) which God hath prepared,' &c. Rom. xiv. 14. 'To him who reckons any thing to be unclean, (κε) to that man it is unclean.' 63. The relative pronouns, in many cases, refer not to the near, but to the remote, antecedent. Luke v. 17. 'The power of the Lord was present to heal (οὗτος) them.' 2 Pet. iv. 9. 'Not the pharisees, immediately before, but such sick people as were in the crowd.' 2 Thess. ii. 8. 'Shall render ineffectual, by the brightness of his coming, (οὗτος) of whom the coming is after the strong working of Satan.' Here οὗτος, of whom, refers not to the Lord, the immediate antecedent, but to the lawless one, mentioned in the first part of ver. 8. 64. The relative pronoun is sometimes used to denote an antecedent, not mentioned before, but which the writer is thinking of in his own mind. Thus, 2 Pet. ii. 11. 'Οὗτοι, 'them, is not put for οὗτος, dative of person, mentioned ver. 16, but for the evil angels, of whom nothing is said. 1 John iii. 2. 'We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like (οὗτος) him; we shall be like Christ, of whom nothing is spoken before. Ver. 16. Εἰςοδεῖ, 'He stands for Christ, of whom there is no mention made in what goes before. Heb. ii. 7. 'Thou hast made him for a little while less than angels;' namely The Son; as is plain from ver. 8, 9. 1 Pet. iii. 14. 'Be not afraid of their terror.' Here the relative their hath no antecedent expressed. 65. The relative pronoun οὗτος is sometimes used for τοιοῦτος, on σαυτόν, for εαυτόν, thyself, than thyself; and οὐκ 'εαυτόν, &c. Acts xiv. 8. 'By examining of whom (οὗτος) thou thyself mayst take knowledge of all these things.' Matt. xxiii. 37. 'Jerusalem, thou that storest them which are sent to thee; 'ποιεῖς σέ, for ποιεῖς σεωμ, sent to thyself. 66. When words of different genders are the antecedents, though the relative takes the gender of the masculine word, it comprehends the whole. Heb. i. 11. 'Οὗτοι, 'They (οὗτοι καὶ γυν.) shall perish.' Sometimes the relative takes the gender of its consequent. See Col. i. 27. Sometimes the relative differs in gender from its antecedent, regarding the meaning of the antecedent rather than its form; as in the following examples, Gal. iv. 19. Col. ii. 15. 19. Of this solerity Beza has given an example from Euripides, in his note on Col. ii. 19. 67. The relative pronoun is, διέκειται, is called by Cleland the subjunctive article, is sometimes used for the demonstrative ποιος, οὗτος, οὗτος, Cleland, Gram. p. 166. Of this use of the relative pronoun we have examples in the New Testament. 1 Pet. iv. 5. 'Οὗτος, 'They shall give an account to him,' &c. 1 Pet. ii. 8. 'Οὗτοι, 'These humble at the word.' Scapula also observes, that the Greek writers use the relative in the same manner. 'Είπε καὶ ἔφη ἀνδρεύεται ἐν τινί ἑαυτὸν, liid. last ver. I am therefore of opinion, that, in the following passages, the relative, though compounded with κε, is used for the demonstrative ποιος, οὗτος. Acts xxiii. 33. 'Οὗτος, 'These (the horsemen) going into Cesarea, and delivering the letter to the governor, presented Paul.' Acts xxiv. 1. 'Οὗτος, 'These,' namely, Ananias, the elders, and Tertullus, 'informed,' &c. Rom. i. 32. 'Οὗτος, 'These men knowing the law of God, that they who do such things,' &c. Rom. xvi. 4. 'Οὗτοι, 'These persons for my life laid down their own necks.' 2 Thess. i. 9. 'Οὗτοι, 'These shall suffer.' See, however, No. 71. 68. The demonstrative pronoun οὗτος, this, often denotes something that follows in the discourse. John vii. 22. 'Οὗτος, 'For this reason Moses gave you circumcision, not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers.' Rom. iv. 16. 'Οὗτος, 'For this reason it is by faith, that it might be by grace.' 1 Cor. vii. 6. 'Τοιοῦτος, 'But this (what follows) I speak by way of advice.' 1 Cor. xi. 17. 'Τοιοῦτος, 'This, now declaring this, (that follows) I praise you not, that ye come together,' &c. 1 Tim. i. 16. 'But (οὗτος) for this reason I received you, and was earnest with that in me,' &c. 2 Tim. ii. 10. 'Τοιοῦτος, 'For this cause, I patiently bear evil for the evil's sake, that they also may,' &c. 2 Tim. iii. 1. 'Τοιοῦτος, 'This know also, that in the last days," &c. Philem. ver. 15. Δω Δόξα. "For this reason, perhaps, he was separated for a little while, that thou mightest have him for ever." Heb. ix. 15. Δώ δόξα. "For this cause he is the Mediator of the new covenant, that by means of death," &c."—Wherefore Rom. v. 11, 12. may be thus translated: 'By whom we have received the reconciliation, (Δμ δόξα) for this reason, as by one man sin entered,' &c.

69. ARTICLES.—The article ο, ο, shows that the word to which it is prefixed signifies a particular person or thing; consequently it renders that word emphatical. Thus, ο άγιος is not a man, or any man, but the man of whom the discourse is. Now, though in general the article renders a word emphatical, it is sometimes used where no emphasis is intended; so that the word to which it is prefixed must be translated as if the article were wanting. Of both these uses of the article the following is an example. 2 Thes. ii. 3. "Unless there come (ο ἀρπάζων) the apostacy, and (ο ἀρπάζων τινὰ ἀλεξίας) the man of sin be revealed." For the article is emphatical, except before ἀλεξίας, which must be translated as if the article were wanting. On the other hand, some words which want the article are emphatical, and must be translated as if the article were prefixed. Matt. i. 18. "Was found with child (ο περιστρέφων τοῦ Θεοῦ) of the holy Ghost." Mark i. 1. "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, (ο καιμὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ) the Son of God." John iii. 6. "That which is begotten (ο γεννημένοις) of the Spirit," namely, of God. Gal. iii. 5. ο άνθρωπός, signifies 'by works of the law.' Heb. ii. 4. ο Ιεροσολύμου προφητεύων, signifies 'Distributions of the Holy Ghost.' Wherefore Phil. ii. 13, may, as was observed on the sign of the genitive case, No. 25, be translated, 'appearing of the glory of the great God (ο θεοῦ) and of our Saviour Jesus Christ.' 1 Pet. iv. 6. "Condemned by men (ο σάρξ) in the flesh, but live by God (πνεύμα) in the spirit." 70. When the article does not render the word definite, or emphatical, in its signification, it is put for ο, and may be translated some, an: as Matt. ix. 11. ο ἄρσεν. "Some Pharisees." Matt. ix. 29. "He went (ο τὸν κατακαίνεσαν) into an house." Matt. xxv. 1. "Went out to meet (ο τῷ γεροντί) a bridegroom." 1 Cor. i. 11. ο τῷ Χριστον. "By some belonging to Chloe." 71. Dionysius, (Gram. p. 166,) in speaking of the prefixed articles ο, ο, ο, says, "Capitur et pro demonstrativos pronominibus; το πρὸ τοῦ, hunc est το πρὸ τοῦ; λοικ: id quod crebrem est adjectives conjunctionibus ι καὶ ι καί ι; το πρὸ, τοτα; pro σήμερον, munit. Et idem in reliquis casibus, το το, τοτα, το πρὸ τοῦ, τοτα, τοτα, τοτα. "Of this use of the article we have many examples in Scripture. Matt. xxiv. 32. "Learn (ο τὸ περιστρέφων) this parable from the fig-tree." &c. Acts ix. 7. "If that be found any (ο τοῦ) of this way,"* Acts xxiv. 22. "When Felix heard these things, having perfect knowledge (ο τοῦ) concerning this way," Rom. xvi. 23. "I Tarusius who wrote (ο τοῦ) this epistle,"* 1 Cor. v. 9. "I have written (ο γεννημένοις) in this letter," &c. 2 Cor. vii. 11. "Ye have approved yourselves to be clear (ο τὸ περιστρέφων) in this matter." Col. iv. 16. "When (ο) this epistle is read,"* 1 Thess. iv. 6. "Go beyond, or deprad his brother (ο τοῦ) in this matter." 2 Thes. iii. 14. "If any one obey not (ο τὸ λέγων ἢ τοῦ) our command by this letter." 72. The article is sometimes used for the personal pronoun ο, he, he. Matt. xiii. 40. "Ο ἄγιος," "But he that received the seed."* Matt. xiv. 18. "Ο ἄγιος," "But he said,"* Gal. iii. 5. "Ο ἅγιος," "He therefore that ministereth the Spirit,"* Col. iii. 25. "Ο ἅγιος," "But he that doth wrong."* Heb. vii. 6. "Ο ἅγιος," "He whose descent is not counted,"* This use of the article affords an easy translation of that difficult passage, Rom. vi. 10. "Ο δὲ ἅγιος, who doth live, died, died by sin: (ο ἡμῶν) But he who liveth," &c.

73. The article in all its genders and cases, is often put for the relative pronoun ο, ο, and must be translated, which, which. Mark xviii. 10. "Beware of the scribes, (οι μάχαροι) which love to go in dignified clothing." Rom. i. 5. "Οτι, for οτι, "Who is over all, God blessed," &c." Sometimes the article in this sense is understood and must be supplied. 1 Tim. iv. 2. "Through the hypocrisy of liars (οι ψευδάρασι), for οι ψευδάρασι, "Who forbid to marry." 74. In many instances where the article is put for the relative pronoun, the substantive verb is understood, and must be supplied in the translation. 2 Cor. vii. 22. "Much more diligent upon the great trust (ο τὸ εὐφροσύνη) which he hath in you." 2 Cor. ix. 3. "That our boasting (ο τὸ εὐφροσύνη) which is concerning you." 75. Lowth, in his English grammar, page 32, observes, "That the connective parts of sentences, by which he means relatives, prepositions, and conjunctions, are the most important of all, and require the greatest care and attention: for it is by them chiefly that the train of thought, the course of reasoning, and the whole propriety of the mind, in continued discourse of all kinds, is laid open; and on the right use of these, perspicuity, which is the first and greatest beauty of style, depends." This observation, which is perfectly just, shows, that in a translation of any discourse from one language into another, it is of the utmost importance that the meanings and powers of the connective parts thereof be properly expressed. In the Hebrew language, the connectives being few, are used with more latitude of signification than belongs to the connectives which properly correspond to them in other languages. Wherefore, in translating the books of the New Testament, it ought to be remembered, that the authors of these books being Jews, naturally used the Greek particles and prepositions, not only in all the variety of their own significations, but in the variety also of the significations of the corresponding Hebrew particles and prepositions. And of these various significations, the one which best suits the passage where the particle is found, ought to be expressed in the translation; otherwise, the inspired writer's train of thought will disappear, and the course of his reasoning be interrupted, perhaps inverted. Wherefore, to lay a proper foundation for a right translation of the Scriptures, the following examples are produced, chiefly from the Scriptures themselves, to prove the variety of meanings affixed by the sacred writers to the Greek particles, by which they have connected the different parts of their discourse.

76. ΑΛΛΑ is sometimes used affirmatively, and must be translated yea, also, certainly. This sense of ΑΛΛΑ is acknowledged by Hoogeveen, who renders it by the Latin words sima, eiusm. Acts xix. 2. ΑΛΛΑ, "Indeed we have not so much as heard that the Holy Ghost is given." Rom. vii. 37. ΑΛΛΑ, "Nay, in all these things." 2 Cor. v. 11. ΑΛΛΑ, "Yea, what clearing of yourselves; (ΑΛΛΑ) yea, what indignation; (ΑΛΛΑ) yea, what zeal; (ΑΛΛΑ) yea, what revenge."* In this passage, however, ΑΛΛΑ might better be translated also. Rom. vi. 5. "For seeing we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (ΑΛЛΑ) certainly we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." 77. ΑΛΛΑ is sometimes used by the Greeks as the first word of a discourse, and signifies, now, now indeed. Of this use of ΑΛΛΑ, Hoogeveen has produced examples from the best Greek writers. 78. ΑΛΛΑ is likewise used causally, and must be translated for, because. John vii. 12. "Others said no, (ΑΛΛΑ) for he deceiveth the people." 1 Cor. iv. 3. ΑΛΛΑ, "Because I do not condemn myself." 1 Cor. xv.
Preliminary Essays.

10. And his grace which was bestowed on me, was not in vain; (\aleph, \epsilon) for I laboured more abundantly than all of them. 2 Cor. xiv. 14. 'I am not ashamed, (\aleph, \epsilon) for as I spake all things,' &c. 1 Thess. ii. 2. \aleph, \epsilon. 'For although we had before sufficed;' Titus i. 15. 'But to the polluted and unfruitful nothing is pure, (\aleph, \epsilon) because both their understanding,' &c. 2 Pet. i. 16. 'We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known to you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. (\aleph, \epsilon) For we were eyewitnesses of his majesty.' 79. \aleph, \epsilon. Used illatively, and must be translated, therefore, therefore. Acts x. 19. 'Three men seek thee, (\aleph, \epsilon) therefore arise, and get thee down.' Acts xxvi. 15. 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest, (\aleph, \epsilon) therefore arise.' 2 Cor. vii. 2. \aleph, \epsilon. 'Therefore as ye abound in every thing,' Eph. v. 24. \aleph, \epsilon. 'Therefore as the church is subject,' &c. 80. \aleph, \epsilon. Unusual, except. Matt. xx. 23. 'Is it not mine to give, (\aleph, \epsilon) except to them,' &c. Mark ix. 8. 'They saw no one. (\aleph, \epsilon) save Jesus only.' &c. 2 Cor. iii. 5. 'If a certain person hath grieved me, he hath not grieved me, (\aleph, \epsilon) except by a part of you.' 2 Cor. v. 13. 'We do not recommend ourselves to you, (\aleph, \epsilon) except to the same assuring thee concerning all things.' 1 John ii. 27. 'Ye have no need that any one should teach you, (\aleph, \epsilon) except you be already instructed.' 1 Cor. xii. 24. \aleph, \epsilon. 'However, God hath tempered the body.' 1 Cor. xiv. 20. \aleph, \epsilon. 'Howbeit in malice be ye children.' AN.

82. As joined with a verb, must sometimes be translated (cei) certainly, without doubt. Matt. xi. 23. 'If the mighty works which have been done in thee, have been done in Sodom, (\aleph, \epsilon) it would certainly have remained,' &c. John iv. 10. 'If thou knowest—who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, (\aleph, \epsilon) who saith thou certainly wouldst have asked him,' &c. APO.

83. \omega\nu\varsigma means of, or belonging to. Acts xvii. 13. 'But when the Jews (\omega\nu\varsigma) of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul in Berea, they came thither also.' 84. \omega\mu\nu\nu\nu, For, by reason of, because. Matt. xviii. 7. 'Wo to the world, (\omega\mu\nu\nu) because of offence.' Luke xix. 3. 'Could not (\omega\mu\nu\nu) for the press, because he was little of stature.' Luke xxii. 25. 'Men's hearts failing them (\omega\mu\nu\nu) for fear;' &c. by reason of fear.

85. \omega\nu\varsigma, After, in the sense of following on an example. 2 Tim. i. 3. 'When, (\omega\nu\varsigma) after my forefathers, I serve.' 86. \omega\nu\varsigma, In. 2 Cor. i. 14. 'Also ye have (\omega\nu\varsigma) in part acknowledged us.' APA.

87. \omega\nu\nu, properly is a particle of affirmation, and must be translated truly, certainly, indeed. Matt. xxi. 28. \omega\nu\nu, Certainly the kingdom of God is come unto you.' Matt. xxiv. 45. '\omega\nu\nu (\omega\nu\nu) I who truly is a wise and faithful servant.' Luke xxi. 48. \omega\nu\nu, 'Truly ye bear witness.' Acts xxi. 22. Et \omega\nu\nu, 'If, indeed, the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee.' Rom. x. 17. Ave \omega\nu\nu, 'So then,' or certainly, 'faith cometh by hearing.' 88. \omega\nu\nu is often used interrogatively. Matt. xviii. 1. 'Saying, (\omega\nu\nu) Who now is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' Mark iv. 41. \omega\nu\nu, 'What man of men saith this?' Rom. v. 35. \omega\nu\nu (\omega\nu\nu) Do I myself then as a slave serve sin?' 89. \omega\nu\nu is also used illatively, and must be translated therefore, then. Matt. xix. 25. 'Saying, (\omega\nu\nu) Who then can be saved?' Ver. 27. Te \omega\nu\nu, 'What therefore shall we have?' Heb. iv. 9. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'These remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.' Heb. xii. 8. \omega\nu\nu, 'Then ye are bas-taured.' Rom. vii. 1. O\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'There is therefore now no condemnation.' 90. \omega\nu\nu is used by the writers of the New Testament in a great variety of senses. Most frequently it hath a causal signification, and must be translated for. Yet it does not in all cases introduce a reason for what immediately goes before, but for something more remote in the discourse. 91. \omega\nu\nu is used to introduce an additional reason; that is, a reason in proof of some proposition, for which a reason has already been given. In such cases the proper translation of \omega\nu\nu is besides, farther, moreover. This use of \omega\nu\nu occurs so frequently in Scripture that to produce examples would be superfluous. The reader, however, if he please, may examine Rom. i. 18. iv. 5. 6. 7.

92. \omega\nu\nu is sometimes used to introduce a reason for something not expressed by the writer, but which being strongly impressed on his own mind, he supposes the reason offered will make it sufficiently known. Thus Pilate, speaking to the Jews, Mark xv. 14. 'Why should I crucify him?' Ti \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'For what evil hath he done?' In like manner the town-councillor says to the Ephesians, Acts iii. 35. 'Ye men of Ephesus, I am astonished at your behaviour, (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) For what man is there,' &c. 93. \omega\nu\nu is also used illatively, and must be translated therefore, therefore. Rom. vi. 19. \omega\nu\nu, 'Wherefore, as ye have presented your members servile instruments to uncleanness, and to iniquity, to work uncleanness, so now present your members,' &c. Rom. xvii. 2. \omega\nu\nu, 'Wherefore, let every one of you please his neighbour.' 1 Cor. xvi. 26. \omega\nu\nu, 'Wherefore, as often as ye eat this bread.' 1 Cor. xiv. 8. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'And therefore if the trumpet give an uncertain sound,' Phil. ii. 5. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'Wherefore let this disposition be in you, which was also in Christ.' James ii. 26. \omega\nu\nu, 'Therefore, as the body without the spirit is dead,' &c. This use of \omega\nu\nu Bezack acknowledges in his notes on 1 Cor. xi. 2. &c. 94. \omega\nu\nu is often a particle of affirmation, and must be translated indeed, certainly, truly. Luke xx. 36. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'Neither indeed can they die any more.' John ix. 35. 'The man answered and said to them, (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) Herein truly is a wonderful thing, that ye know not whence he is, (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) although he hath opened mine eyes.' Acts xvi. 37. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'No truly.' (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) &c. but coming themselves, let them bring us out;' 1 Cor. i. 10. 'Does he command this wholly for our sakes!' (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) For our sakes, no doubt, it was written.' 2 Cor. x. 8. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'And although indeed I should boast somewhat more,' &c. Gal. i. 13. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'Ye have heard certainly of my behaviour,' &c. 1 Thess. iv. 10. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, 'And indeed ye do it,' &c. Is. xiv. 15. the LXX. have inserted the particle \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, as the translation of a Hebrew word which signifies truly, indeed. See Thomm. Concord. 95. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu is put sometimes for \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, and must be translated by the English particle that. 1 Cor. vii. 6. 'I speak this as an advice, not as an injunction, 7. (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) that I wish all men were as I am.' 1 Cor. xv. 51. 'Behold, I shew you a mystery, (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) that we shall not all sleep.' 2 Tim. ii. 11. 'True is the saying, (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) that if we die with him,' &c.

96. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu, as Phavorinus tells us, (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) is put for and, consequently it has all the different meanings of for. Accordingly.

97. \omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu is used as a copulative; so must be translated and, now. Acts xiii. 39. 'And the eunuch saw him no more,' (\omega\nu\nu\nu\nu\nu) and he went on his way rejoicing,' &c.
Preliminary Essays.

Rom. v. 19. τινὸς ἡμῶν. "And as through the disobedience of one man,"
Rom. xii. 3. ἁμαρτάνω. "Now by the grace that is given to me, I command." Rom. xvi. 4. ἐὰν γάρ. "Now, whatever things were before written, were written for our instruction," &c. 2 Tim. ii. 7. "Consider what I say, (τις) and the Lord give thee understanding."

94. ὧς has the adverbial sense of ὧς, and must be translated but, yet, although. Mark vii. 28. "True, Lord, (αὐτὸς τὸς) but even the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs." Luke xxi. 2. "The chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill him, (τις) but they feared the people." Rom. x. 3. "Have not submitted to the righteousness of God." 4. Τοῖς γὰρ ἡμῖν ἔχων εἰρήνην, "Although Christ is the end of the law for righteousness," &c. Rom. xv. 2. "Εἰσεύκοτο γὰρ ἡμῖν, "But lest any of us please his neighbour." Rom. xv. 18. ὅτι γὰρ ὑπὲρ ἑαυτῶν, "Yet I will not dare to speak any thing of that which Christ hath not wrought," &c. 1 Cor. x. 29. "Περὶ γὰρ τῆς ἡμέρας, "But why is my liberty judged," &c. 2 Cor. v. 2. "Καὶ γὰρ, "But yet in this tent we groan." 2 Cor. xii. 1. "θλίψεως γὰρ, "Yet I am afraid." Heb. xii. 20. "Γὰρ, "Although they could not bear that which was strictly commanded." 1 Pet. iv. 15. "καὶ γὰρ τὰς ἡμέρας, "But let none of you suffer as a murderer." 99. ἡμῶν is used like ὧς, as a particle of transition, and must be translated now. Luke xii. 48. "τις γὰρ, "Now when thou goest with thine adversary, &c." γὰρ is seldom, if ever, used as an explicative. ὧς

100. ὧς is properly an adverbial particle, signifying but, however, nevertheless, notwithstanding, although. 1 Cor. xiv. 2. "Πονηροὶ ἂν, "Howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries." 2 Cor. xiii. 7. "τί οὖν, "Though we be as reproachers." Gal. ii. 20. "Nevertheless I live," 2 Tim. iv. 17. "ἀλλὰ, "Notwithstanding the Lord stood by me." 1 Pet. i. 7. "More precious than of gold which perisheth, (ἄμωμα) though it be tried with fire." 2 Pet. iii. 13. "Yet it is not so, according to his promise, look for new heavens." 101. ὧς is used as a sepulchre, and must be translated and. Of this use of ὧς, the examples are so numerous, that it is needless to mention any. 102. ὧς signifies even. Rom. iii. 22. οὐκ ἦλθεν ὧς, "Even the righteousness of God." Philip. ii. 6. θησαυρὸς ὧς, "Even the death of the cross." 103. ὧς now. Rom. xvi. 17. "Now I beseech you, brethren." Ver. 23. "Now to him that is able to establish you." Luke xx. 37. "ὁ δὲ ὧς, "Now that the dead are raised." 104. ὧς is likewise used to introduce an additional argument or sentence on the same subject, and must be translated besides, further, &c. Matt. xvi. 31. έρχεται ὧς, "Father, it hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife," Rom. viii. 30. ἄν. "Moreover, whom he did predestinate," 2 Cor. ii. 14. "ἀλλὰ, "Furthermore, when I came to Troas," 2 Tim. iii. 1. "This know (ἀλλὰ) also," 2 Pet. i. 15. "σαπεῖν ὧς, "Moreover, I will endeavour that ye may be able, after my decease." 105. ὧς is used causally, and must be translated for. Mark xvi. 8. "And flesh from the sepulchre; (ἐκ τοῦ σαπεῖν ὧς) for they trembled." Luke xii. 2. "Οὐδὲν ὧς, "For there is nothing concealed that shall not be revealed." 106. ὧς is used illogically, signifying so then, therefore, wherefore. Rom. viii. 6. "Ὅτι γὰρ οὐκ ἦσαν ὑποκείμενοι, "So then they that are in the flesh;" or, rather, "wherefore they are in the flesh." Rom. xii. 8. ἐξεχρίσθη ὧς, "Having then gifts differing." 1 Cor. viii. 9. ἡμῶν ὧς τοῦ σαπεῖν, "I say, therefore, to the unmarried," or, "I command, therefore, the unmarried." 1 Cor. xii. 21. "Αλλὰ, "Therefore the eye cannot say to the hand." 1 Cor. xvi. 15. "Αλλὰ, "I entreat you, therefore, brethren." Phil. ver. 12. "Αλλὰ, "Thou therefore receive him." 107. ὧς is used affirmatively, and may be translated indeed. Gal. iv. 20. "ἲδε ὥσπερ ἡμένα, "I could wish indeed to be present with you." 1 John ii. 1. "ὁ δὲ οὖν, "And truly our fellowship." 2 Pet. i. 13. "Αλλὰ, "Yes, I think it fit as long as I am," &c. &c. Beza, in his notes on Col. i. 21. tells us, that Plato often uses ὧς for ὡς, namely, truly.

108. ὧς, or; disjunctively. Rom. viii. 34. "It is Christ who died, (μάλλον ὧς) or rather who is risen." 1 Cor. xv. 3. "Them will I send to Jerusalem." 4. "οὐκ ὧς "Or if it be proper that even I should go.

109. ὧς, in the latter clause of a sentence, sometimes implies that τὸν οὖν, or τὸν οὖν, is omitted, and must be supplied. Rom. vi. 17. "Thanks to God (τὸν δὲ, for τὸν οὖν εὐφραίνεται) that although ye were the slaves of sin, (πάθος θεοῦ ὧς) yet ye have obeyed from the heart," &c. For can any one imagine the apostle would thank God that the Romans were the slaves of sin!—So also, 1 Pet. iv. 6. "Τίμαιοι ἡμῖν ὧς, "Yet I am afraid," &c. Heb. xii. 20. "Γὰρ, "Although they could not bear that which was strictly commanded." 1 Pet. iv. 15. "καὶ γὰρ τὰς ἡμέρας, "But let none of you suffer as a murderer." 99. ὧς is used like ὧς, as a particle of transition, and must be translated now. Luke xii. 48. "τις γὰρ, "Now when thou goest with thine adversary, &c." γὰρ is seldom, if ever, used as an explicative. ΔΙΑ

111. ΔΙΑ properly is a particle of affirmation, but it is used likewise illogically. 1 Cor. vi. 20. "Ye are bought with a price; (ἐλέγχεται ὧς) therefore God will be glorified in your body," &c. ΔΙΑ

112. ΔΙΑ with an accusative, commonly, though not always, denotes the end for which a thing was done, and must be translated for an account of. Rom. iv. 25. "And was raised again (ἑαυτῶς) for our justification." 2 Cor. iv. 5. "And ourselves your servants (ἑσσοῦν ὧς on account of Jesus." 3 Cor. viii. 8. "I speak not this as an injunction, but (ἑαυτῶς) on account of the forwardness of others." Heb. i. 14. "Sent forth to minister (ἑαυτῶς) for them that shall be heirs of salvation." Heb. ii. 9. "ἡμῶς, "On account of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour." 1 Pet. i. 20. "But manifested in these last times (ἡμῶς ἐναντίον) for you." 113. ΔΙΑ, with an accusative genitive, signifies an efficient cause of any kind, and must be translated by, through. John vi. 57. "And I live (ἑαυτῶς) by the Father." 2 Cor. iii. 11. "For if that which was abolished, was abolished (ἑαυτῶς) through glory," 2 Tim. ii. 2. "The things which thou hast heard from me (ὑπὸ σαπεῖν ὧς) by many witnesses," that is, confirmed by many witnesses.

114. ΔΙΑ ΤΟ, unto. 2 Pet. i. 3. "Who hath called us (ἐκ ὧς) to glory and virtue." 115. ΔΙΑ, According to. 1 Tim. iv. 14. "The spiritual gift which is in thee, which was given thee (ἑαυτῶς) according to prophecy." 116. ΔΙΑ, With respect to. Rom. viii. 10. See the note on the passage.

117. ΔΙΑ, both with a genitive and an accusative, signifies in. Mark xiv. 58. "And (ἑαυτῶς) within (ἐν) three days I will build another." Acts xvi. 15. "But the angel of the Lord (ἑαυτῶς ἐκ) in the night opened the prison doors. Rom. iii. 25. "For the declaration of his righteousness, (ἑαυτῶς ἐκ) in passing by the sins." Rom. xiv. 14. "There is nothing unclean (ἑαυτῶς ἐκ) in itself." 1 Cor. xii. 13. "We see (ἑαυτῶς ἐκ) in a mirror..."

120. *et, From, in relation to place. 2 Cor. ix. 33. 'And through a window in a basket, I was let down (α in α ex) along the wall.' See also Acts ix. 25.

121. *et, From, from the principle from which any thing is done. Philo. i. 15. 'Some indeed preach Christ, even (α in) of every and strife.'

122. *et sometimes denotes continuation of time, and must be translated during, under, throughout. α et α et α throughout the day. α et α During life. Luke v. 5. 'Master, we have toiled (α et α ex α ex) throughout the whole of the night.' Rom. iv. 11. 'The father of them who believe (α ex α ex α ex) in uncircumcision;' that is, during their uncircumcision. Rom. vii. 5. 'The sinful passions (α ex α ex α ex α) which we had under the law that is, during the time we were under the law.' Ver. 8. 'under the commandment;' that is under the law. See also ver. 11. Homer uses the preposition α et in the same sense: Α να η η η η η η η η η η η η η η η η η. See Baze's note on 1 Tim. ii. 15.

123. et properly is an illative particle; yet it is sometimes used causally, and must be translated for, because. Acts x. 20. 'Go with them, doubting nothing, (α et) for I have sent them.' Acts xviii. 10. 'ον, For I am with thee.' Rom. i. 21. α et, 'Because that when they knew God, &c.' Gal. ii. 16. α et, 'For by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.' Heb. x. 5. 'α et, Because God hath translated him.' Vigerus, page 325, tells us, that α et is used in this sense by the best Greek writers.

124. *ex, both in the LXX., and in the New Testament, is an adverb of time, signifying when. John xii. 22. 'And (α ex) when I shall be lifted up.' 1 Cor. vi. 4. 'Therefore, (α ex α) when ye have secular seats of judgment.' 1 Cor. ix. 16. 'α ex α, For when I preach the gospel.' 2 Cor. v. 1. 'We know that (α ex) when the temple of the tent is destroyed.' 2 Cor. xii. 2. 'That (α ex) when I come again I will not spare.' 1 Thess. iii. 8. 'We live (α ex) when ye stand firm.' Heb. iii. 7. 'Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost commandeth, To-day, (α ex) when ye shall hear his voice.' 1 John iii. 2. 'α ex α, When ye shall appear.' See Whitby on this passage.

125. *ex signifies though, although. John xi. 25. 'He that believeth on me, (α ex α) even though he die, yet shall live.' 2 Cor. x. 8. 'Τα αλληλο παρεσκευαστα, And although indeed I should boast somewhat more concerning our authority—I should not be ashamed.' 2 Cor. xii. 2. 'α ex α, For though I would desire to glory.'

126. *ex, But, but only. Gal. iii. 16. 'Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, (α ex α) but only by the faith of Jesus Christ.'

127. *ex is used by the writers of the New Testament in all the variety of the senses of its corresponding Hebrew particle, though its primary and proper signification be generally limited.

128. *ex is used for (ον εν) that. Acts xix. 2. 'Have not so much as heard (α) that the Holy Ghost is given.'

Acts xxvi. 8. 'Why should it be thought by you a thing incredible (α) that God should raise the dead.'* Ver. 23. 'Τα κατα ον εν αξιωματικ, That the Christ should suffer, and (α) that he should be the first.'* Acts. vii. 15. 'α, That after the similitude of Melchisedec.' Therefore Mark xv. 44. should be translated, 'Pilate wondered (α) that he was already dead.'

129. ex, signum, (quoniam) Because. John xiii. 32. Ex: oquam, 'Because God is glorified by him, God will also glorify him.' Acts xi. 17. 'Ex α, 'Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift.' Rom. vi. 5. Ex: oquam, 'Because we have been planted.' 1 Tim. v. 16. 'Well reported of for good works, (α) because she hath lodged strangers, (α) because.' See also Gal. v. 35. 'This sense of α, Baze acknowledges in his note on 1 John iii. 2. where he tells us that α α, is often put for quia.

129. Ex, Ord. 2 Cor. iii. 1. Ex: ord, 'Or need we, as some others, epistles of recommendation.' &c.

130. *ex, Though. 2 Tim. ii. 13. 'Ex: α, 'Though we be unfaithful, he abideth faithful.'

131. *ex, Perhaps. Numb. xxiii. 3. Ex α και α, 'Peraadventure the Lord will come to meet me.'

132. *ex, Whether. John ix. 25. Ex: oquum, 'Whether he be a sinner, I know not.' Acts xix. 2, Ex: oquum, 'Whether have ye received the Holy Ghost?'

133. Ex, is sometimes used to express an earnest wish. Luke xxii. 42. 'α και α ζε μη αν ρωπησαι, Father, O that thou wouldest remove this cup.'

134. Ex, Seeing, emphatical. Eph. iii. 2. Ex: α, 'Seeing at least ye have heard of the dispensation.' See also Eph. iv. 21.

136. *ex, But only. Matt. xii. 4. 'Which was not lawful for him to eat, (α μα) but only for the priests.' Gal. i. 7. 'α, Which is not another gospel, (α μα) but only there be some who trouble you.' See also 1 Cor. vii. 17; John v. 5; Rev. iv. x. xvi. 27.

137. Ex: α, Notwithstanding. 1 Cor. viii. 5. 'α και α αριστη, For certainly, notwithstanding there be.' &c. 2 Thess. i. 6. Ex: α, 'Notwithstanding it is righteous in God to recompense,' &c.

138. Ex, (αριστη, quoniam) Because. Rom. viii. 9. 'Ye live not to the flesh, but to the Spirit, (αριστη) because the Spirit of God dwelleth in you.' 1 Pet. ii. 2. 'Unadulterated milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby.' 1 Cor. iii. 1. 'α και α αριστη, Even though we desired to glory.' 2 Cor. xii. 2. 'And (α α) when I come again I will not spare.' 1 Thess. iii. 8. 'We live (α α) when ye stand firm.'

139. Ex, Sister. Heb. xi. 9. Ex: α, 'Furthmore, we have had fathers.'

140. Ex, And if. 1 Cor. xiv. 27. 'Ex: α, And if one speak in an unknown tongue.'

141. *ex, the proposition signifies m. Luke i. 20. 'Which shall be fulfilled (α) in their season.' John i. 18. 'Who is (α) in the bosom of the Father.' 2 Thess. ii. 4. 'Who sitteth (α) in the temple of God.'

142. Ex, Concerning. Acts. ii. 25. 'For David saith (α α) concerning him, I foresaw the Lord.' Gal. iii. 17. 'The covenant which was before confirmed by God (α αριστη) concerning Christ.' The Greek writers likewise use α in this sense. See Blackwell, vol. i. p. 108. 12mo edit.

143. *ex, With. Acts xix. 3. Ex: α, 'With what then were ye baptized? And they said, (α) with John's baptism.' Rom. vii. 6. 'Sulute Mary who laboured much (α μα) with us.' Eph. iii. 13. 'That ye may be filled (α) with all the fulness of God.' 2 Pet. i. 17. Ex: α, 'With whom I am well pleased.'

144. Ex, Against. Matt. xviii. 21. 'How often shall my brother sin (εἰς) against me?" Luke xii. 10. 'Whoever shall speak a word (εἰς) against the Son of Man,' Rom. iv. 20. 'Except ye should be blasphemed (εἰς) before them.' 2 Cor. viii. 24. 'Shew ye (εἰς) before them, and (εἰς) before the churches.' 146. En., Rv. Col. iii. 10. 'Which is renewed (εἰς) by knowledge.' Heb. vi. 6. 'Impossible to renew again (εἰς) by repentance.'

147. En., In order to. Rom. i. 17. 'It is revealed (εἰς) in order to faith.' Rom. xvi. 26. 'Made known to all the Gentiles (καί εἰς) in order to the obedience of faith.'

148. En., Concerning. 1 Cor. xiii. 13. 'All have not been made to drink (εἰς) of one Spirit.' 2 Cor. x. 13. 'I will not boast (εἰς τὰς) of things.'

ESSAY IV.
PRELIMINARY ESSAYS.

Luke xxiv. 49. 'But tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, (ος) until ye be endued with power from on high.'
Our Lord did not mean, that after the apostles were endued with miraculous power, they were to leave Jerusalem; neither did they leave it immediately after that event. See Trenomond Concord. in Voc.

195. 'it is commonly a disjunctive particle. But it is sometimes used as a copulative and signifies and, as Phavorinus observes. Rom. iii. 1. 'What then is the pre-eminence of the Jew! (και) and what the advantage of circumcision!' for these are different questions. Rom. iv. 13. 'The promise that he should be heir of the world, was not to Abraham, (και) and to his seed through law.'
2 Cor. i. 13. 'Than what ye read (και) and acknowledge.'
Eph. v. 3. 'But fornication and all uncleanness, (και) and covetousness.' What is it, Luke xx. 2. is και, Matt. xxi. 23. Wherefore 1 Cor. xi. 27. is rightly translated, 'Whosoever shall eat this bread (και) and drink this cup.'
1 Pet. i. 11. 'Concerning what people, (και) and what kind of time,' &c.

196. 'It is sometimes used interrogatively. Matt. vii. 9. 'If ye ask (και ἐν προσευχῇ) Is there any man among you? See Black. vol. ii. p. 139.

'IN.

197. Though και commonly denotes the end for which a thing is done, it often signifies the effect or consequence of an action simply, without expressing the intention of the agent; and therefore in such cases it ought to be translated so, or so. Of this use of και, many examples might be produced, but the following may suffice. Luke ix. 45. 'And it was hid from them, (καὶ) so that they perceived it not.' John x. 17. 'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, (καὶ) so as I can take it again.' John xix. 24. 'They said therefore among themselves, (καὶ) that the Scripture might be fulfilled,' &c. As the Roman soldiers who spake this had no knowledge of the Scripture, nor intention to fulfill it, καὶ here must express the effect simply. Rom. v. 20. 'The law privily entered, (καὶ) so that the offence hath abounded.' 1 Cor. xiv. 13. 'Wherefore let him that speaketh (προφητήσει) in an unknown tongue, pray (καὶ) so as he (the interpreter) may interpret.' 2 Cor. i. 17. 'Or the things I purpose, do I purpose them according to the flesh, (καὶ) so as with me there should be yes, yes, and nay, nay.' Gal. v. 17. 'For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, (καὶ) so as ye do not do those things which ye incline.' Rom. xi. 11. 'I ask then, have they stumbled (καὶ ἐσωθήσασθα) so as to fall!' This sense of καὶ is acknowledged by Noldius and Pasner, who say it must often be translated so, or so.

198. 'Καί sometimes denotes the efficient cause, and must be rendered so that. John ix. 3. 'Who hath sinned, this man or his parents, (καί) so that he was born blind!' Rev. viii. 12. 'And the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars, (καί ἐσωθήσασθα) so that the third part of them was darkened.' Rev. xii. 13. 'And he doth great wonders, (καί ἐσωθήσασθα) so that he maketh even fire come down from heaven.'

199. 'Καί When. John xvi. 2. 'Yea the time cometh, (καί) when every one who killeth you, will think he doth God service.' See also ver. 32. 3 John, ver. 4. 'Greater joy have I not than these, (καί ἐσωθήσασθα) when I hear my children are walking,' &c. Beza and Whitby observe on this verse, that it is a peculiarity in John's style, to use καί in the sense of ἐσωθήσασθα and καί. But Plato uses it in the same sense, Socrat. Apologia, sub init.: "Defend myself with the same language I used to speak in the market place, and at tables, (καί ἐσωθήσασθα) when, or rather, where many of you heard,' &c.

200. 'Καί τί Why. 1 Cor. x. 29. 'Καί τί γεγ. 'But why is my liberty judged by another's conscience!' Acts iv. 25. 'Who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, (καί τί γεγ) why,' &c.

201. 'Καί, 1 John i. 9. 'He is faithful and just (καί ἡσυχ λόγῳ) to forgive.'

KAOS.

202. Καίς, When. Acts vii. 17. Καίς ἐσωθήσασθα. 'But when the time of the promise drew near.' 1 Cor. i. 5. 'That ye were enriched with every gift by him, even with all speech, and with all knowledge, (καίς) when the testimony of Jesus was confirmed among you.' 1 Cor. v. 7. 'Cleanse out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump (καίς) when ye are without leaven.'

203. Καίς, Seeing. 2 Cor. i. 14. Καίς ἐσωθήσασθα. 'Seeing indeed ye have acknowledged us in part that we are your boasting.' Eph. i. 3. 'Who hath blessed us with, every spiritual,' &c. 4. (καίς) 'Seeing he hath chosen us.' Heb. iv. 3. 'For we who believe do enter into rest, (καίς) seeing he hath said,' &c. Heb. viii. 5. 'Who worship with the example and shadow of heavenly things, (καίς) seeing Moses, when about to make the tabernacle, was, admonished of God, see thou make all things according to the pattern.' See Scapul. Dict. where we are told that καίς is the same with Κά.

KAΣ.

204. Κας is used by the writers of the New Testament in all the senses of the corresponding Hebrew conjunction; and, as Parkhurst observes, is used for most of the different kinds of conjunctions.

205. Κας, But. Matt. xix. 17. 'We have piped unto you, (κας) but ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, (κας) but ye have not lamented.' Rom. i. 13. Κας, 'But have been hindered hitherto.' 1 Cor. xii. 5. 'Differences of administrations, (κας) but the same Lord.' 1 Thess. ii. 18. 'Therefore we have made unto you, even I Paul, (κας) but Satan hindered us.' Heb. x. 38. Κας, 'But if any man draw back.'

206. Κας, Or. Matt. xii. 37. 'By thy words thou shalt be justified, (κας) or by thy words thou shalt be condemned.' Luke xii. 38. 'And if he come in the second watch, (κας) or come in the third watch.' 2 Cor. xii. 1. 'Two (κας) or three witnesses.'

207. Κας is used causally and must be translated of. Psalm cviii. 12. 'Give us help from trouble, (κας) for vain is the help of man.' Micah vii. 8. 'Rejoice not against me, (κας) so as when I fall I shall rise again.' John x. 28. 'They shall never perish, (κας) for none shall pluck them out of my hand.' 1 Cor. xv. 45. 'Οὗτος Κας ἐσωθήσασθα. For thus it is written in Cor. v. 6. 'We are bold therefore all times, (κας) because we know.' See also ver. 8. 1 John i. 2. Κας, 'For the life was manifested.' 1 John iii. 4. Κας, 'For sin is the transgression of the law.' On this Beza remarks that Κας is put for Κά.

208. Κας hath an illative sense, and must be translated therefore. Joshua xxi. 11. Κας φωναζοῦσαι. 'Take heed therefore.'

209. Κας λέγοντας, &c. 'Be wise now therefore.' Mark x. 36. Κας τοῦτο, 'Who then can be saved?' Luke x. 33. 'Master, it is good for us to be here; (κας) therefore let us make three tabernacles.' Luke xii. 56. 'How much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith!' 9. Κας, 'Therefore seek not what ye shall eat.' Acts xxvi. 26. 'The king knoweth these things, (κας) before whom therefore I speak freely, being persuaded,' &c. 1 Cor. x. 13. Κας ἐσωθήσασθα. 'Therefore put away that wicked person from among yourselves.'

201. 2 Pet. i. 19. Κας ἐσωθήσασθα, 'Therefore we have the prophetic word more sure.'
PRELIMINARY ESSAYS.

Essay IV

the Lord gave to every man."* 1 Thes. iii. 4. 'As also happened, (καὶ ὁ στόχος τὼν) ye know.'

210. καὶ, When. Mark xv. 25. 'Now it was the third hour, (καὶ τὸ τρίτον ἠλικιάς) when they crucified him.' Acts v. 7. 'And it was about the space of three hours after, (καὶ τὰς ἱλικιὰς τρεῖς) when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.'* Rom. iii. 26. 'That he may be just, (καὶ) when justifying him who is of the faith of Jesus.'

211. καὶ, Although, yet, and yet. Luke xvii. 7. 'And shall not God avenge his own elect, (καὶ ὁ θεὸς τῶν ἑαυτοῦ) though he bear long with them.'* John ix. 30. 'Herein truly is a marvellous thing, that ye know not whence he is, (καὶ) although he hath opened mine eyes.' John xvi. 22. 'Shall leave me alone; (καὶ) and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me.'* 1 Cor. xii. 13. 'For as the body is one, (καὶ) although it hath many members, (καὶ) Philip, i. 22. 'Yet what I shall choose I wot not.'* Heb. iii. 9. 'When your fathers tempted me, proved me, (καὶ) although they saw my works forty years.' Heb. iv. 6. 'Seeing therefore it remained that some enter in, (καὶ) although they to whom it was first preached entered not in.' Rev. iii. 1. 'I know thy works, that thou hast a name, that thou livest, (καὶ) although thou art dead.'

212. καὶ, So, and so. Matt. vi. 10. 'They will be done as in heaven, (καὶ ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ) so upon earth.' Mark iii. 26. 'Καὶ ὃ καὶ Ἀβίας. 'And so if Satan rise up against himself.' John xvii. 18. 'As thou hast sent me into the world, (καὶ ἐμάς θέτεσθας στὸν κόσμον) so have I sent them.' Heb. iii. 19. 'Καὶ ἐὰς σοι οὐκ εἰπώμεν ἃ σοι οὐκ εἰπώμεν ἃ, (καὶ) for we see they could not enter in, because of unbelief.'* James v. 18. 'And the heavens gave rain, (καὶ) and so the earth brought forth her fruit.'

213. καὶ, And then. 2 Cor. viii. 5. 'First gave themselves to the Lord, (καὶ) and then to us.' 2 Tim. i. 5. 'That dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, (καὶ ἡ μητέρα) and then in thy mother.'

214. καὶ, when it follows a negative, signifies neither, nor. Rom. iv. 19. καὶ, 'Neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb.'* 1 John iii. 10. 'Is not of God, (καὶ) neither he that loveth not his brother.'

215. καὶ, Notwithstanding. 2 Cor. viii. 2. 'The overflowing of their joy, (καὶ) notwithstanding their deep poverty.' See Rev. iii. 1. No. 211.

216. When καὶ is repeated in one sentence, the first καὶ may be translated both. Rom. xi. 33. 'O the depth of the riches (καὶ) both of the wisdom (καὶ) and knowledge of God.'* See also Acts xxvi. 29.

217. καὶ is sometimes used for ὅταν, that. Susans, ver. 19. 'And it came to pass, when the maid were gone out, (καὶ ἠλώσατο) that the two elders rose up and ran to her.'

218. καὶ is used as a particle of conjunction, and must be translated certainly, surely. Gen. xlv. 29. 'And if ye take this also from me, and mischief befal him, (καὶ ὅτι θέλει) certainly ye shall bring down my gray hairs,' &c. Rom. vii. 8. Καὶ γὰρ, 'For indeed she hath been a helper of many.' 1 Cor. viii. 5. Καὶ γὰρ εἰρήθη, 'For certainly, notwithstanding there be that are called gods.'* 1 Thess. iv. 8. Καὶ οὐκ ἐγηρα, 'Who certainly hath given us his Holy Spirit.'

219. καὶ often supplies the place of the relative pronoun it, who, which. Is. v. 4. 'What shall I do to my vineyard, (καὶ ὁ στόχος) which I have not done!' Dan. vi. 6. 'I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, (καὶ) with which it was lifted up from the earth,' &c. This translation is in the margin of our Bibles; and Godius in loc. says, 'Verte, per quas efferentur supra terram. Sequentes Othello ut. Herod. caput vipir habet relativa.' Mark xvi. 1. 'They shall put hands on the sick, (καὶ) who shall recover.' Luke xv. 15. 'And joined himself to a citizen of that country, (καὶ) who sent him into his field.' John vii. 45. 'Then came the officers to the chief priests and pharisees, (καὶ) who said to them why he have ye not brought him!' John xii. 26. Καὶ ἦλθεν ὁ Πέτρος καὶ ἀπόταξεν τὸ ἔργον, 'And every living person who believeth in me, shall never die.' Acts vi. 6. 'Whom they set before the apostles, (καὶ προσφέρεται τῷ Φωτίῳ) who, praying, laid their hands on them.' Acts vii. 10. 'And God gave him favour in the eyes of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, (καὶ ἔφθασεν) who made him governor over Egypt.' Rom. viii. 34. 'Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, (καὶ ἐμμόνω) that is risen.'* 2 Cor. xi. 12. 'And what I do, (καὶ) that I will do.'* See Heb. vi. 5. 1 Pet. i. 23. 'By the word of God (καὶ) which liveth.'* See Else-where on Acts vii. 16. who hath shown that καὶ is used in this sense by the Greek classics.

220. καὶ, Especially. Mark vii. 1. 'But go and tell his disciples, (καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ ἔργα) especially Peter.' Luke xxiv. 44. 'Written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, (καὶ) especially in the Psalms, concerning me.' Acts i. 14. 'These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, (καὶ γυναῖκες) especially Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' Ephes. vi. 18. 'For all the saints, (καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν) Especially for me.'* 1 Tim. v. 24. (Τὰ ἐκ τῶν καὶ) 'But in some especially they follow after.'

221. καὶ, Namely. Matt. xxi. 5. 'Thy king comes unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, (καὶ ὁ βασιλεὺς ἡμῶν ἐπὶ ἰγκράνη) namely, a colt, the foal of an ass.' John x. 33. 'For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy, (καὶ ἐγένετο ἡ ἀνθρωποκομία) namely, because thou being a man, makest thyself God.' Noldius tells us, that the Hebrew particle answering to καὶ often signifies namely, to wit. De Part. Heb. p. 307.

222. καὶ is used as an explicative. Accordingly, Vigerus, p. 303. treating of καὶ, says, εἰδέναι τὸν θυγατέρα. Matt. ix. 10. 'A sinner sat at meat in the house, (καὶ ἠστήθη) behold, many publicans and sinners came.' Matt. xxviii. 9. 'And as they went to tell his disciples, (καὶ ἠστήθη) lo, Jesus met them.' Acts x. 17. 'Now, while Peter doubted in his own mind what that vision which he had seen, might mean, (καὶ ἠστήθη) behold, the men who were sent,' &c.

223. καὶ is sometimes omitted, where the sense requires it to be supplied. See Eph. i. 18. ii. 1. 1 Tim. iv. 2. By supplying καὶ, Mark v. 15. all appearance of tautology is removed, and the passage is rendered beautifully emphatical: 'And they come to Jesus, and see him who was possessed with demons, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind, (ἐπείρα τὸν ὄντας ἀστέρα) even him who had the legion, and they were afraid.' See Vigerus on this particle.

224. καὶ, Attic, for καὶ καὶ καὶ, at least. Mark v. 66. 'That they might touch, (καὶ) at least the border of his garment.' Acts x. 15. 'That (καὶ) at least the shadow of Peter passing by.'* 2 Cor. xi. 16. 'Otherwise (καὶ) at least as a fool bear with me.'

225. καὶ, Moreover. Mark iv. 24. καὶ, 'Moreover, he said unto them.'

Stephen, in the supplement to his Concordance, acknowledges most of the foregoing senses of καὶ.
new man, which (στενά) after God is created in righteousness."
238. ἐναρκτ. On account of, in order to. John ii. 6. "These were set there six water-pots of stone, (στενά) in order to the purifying of the Jews." 2 Cor. v. 16. "We respect no man (στενά ἐγκαθέστως) on account of the flesh; and if we have esteemed Christ (στενά) on account of the flesh, that is, on account of his descent as a Jew. Eph. i. 6. "Having predestinated us to the adoption of sons, (στενά) on account of the good pleasure of his will." 2 Tim. i. 1. "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, (στενά) on account of the promise of eternal life, which is by Jesus Christ." 2 Tim. i. 9. "Called us with an holy calling, not (στενά) on account of our works, but (στενά) on account," &c. Tit. i. 1. "An apostle of Jesus Christ, (στενά) in order to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledgment of the truth."
239. κατα, By. Rom. ii. 7. "To them who (κατά) by patient continuance." 1 Cor. xii. 8. "The word of knowledge (κατά) by the same spirit." 2 Cor. xi. 17. "That which I speak, I speak not (κατά) by the Lord, but as it were in foolishness." 1 Pet. iv. 6. "For this cause the gospel preached also to them that are dead (κατά) and to such, though they might be condemned (κατά  ἀνωτάτων) by men in the flesh, yet they might live (κατά θεόν) by God in the Spirit." Ver. 14. "κατά ἐνσέκασθαι, 'By them indeed he is blasphemed,' (κατά θεόν) but by you he is praised." βιβλίῳ κατά Ματθαῖου, 'The gospel by Matthew.'
240. κατά, With. 1 Cor. ii. 1. "Came not (κατά) with excellence of speech." Eph. vi. 5. "Not (κατά) with eye-service," &c.
241. With respect to, concerning. 2 Cor. xi. 21. "κατά ἐνσέκασθαι, 'I speak not (κατά) to reproach.'" Philip. iii. 5. "κατά θεόν, 'With respect to law,'" Ver. 6. "κατά ἐνσέκασθαι, 'With respect to zeal.'" Philip. iv. 11. "Not that I speak (κατά) with respect to want." Col. ii. 14. "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances (κατά θεόν) concerning us, which was against us."
242. κατά, In. Acts xi. 1. "Now, when the apostles and brethren who (κατά) in Judæa, heard that the Gentiles had also received the word," Acts xiii. 1. "Now there were (κατά) in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets." Heb. i. 10. "Thou, Lord, (κατά θεόν) in the beginning hast laid the foundation." Heb. xi. 3. "These all did (κατά σέ) in faith."
243. κατά, Before. Deut. i. 30. "He shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt, (κατά σέ) before thee." Ps. cxxxix. 28. "κατά σέ, 'Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been set forth.'"
245. κατά increases the meaning of the word with which it is compounded. Acts xvi. 16. "When he saw the city (κατά τὸν οἶκον) full of idols."
246. κατά seems to be omitted in the following sentence—Luke i. 72. "To remember his holy covenant, (κατά σέ) according to the oath which he sware to Abraham."

MEN.
237. ἔναρκτος, properly, is an affirmative particle, and may be translated indeed, certainly, truly. It is commonly placed in the beginning of a sentence, and is followed with ἂν in a subsequent clause, to mark opposition or diversity, and particularly the distribution of things into parts. Heb. x. 33. "οὐκ ένσεκασθαι, 'Partly whilst ye were made a gazing-stock.'"
238. ἔναρκτος, in the beginning of a sentence, when not followed with ἂν is used as a simple conjunctioin, and may be translated when, and. Acts i. 1. "κατά τοῦ αὐτοῦ αὐτού, 'Now the former treatise.'" Rom. i. 8. "πρῶτος, 'And first I thank my God.'" Rom. xi. 13. "ἐν πρῶτο κατά τοῦ αὐτοῦ αὐτού, 'And first I thank my God.'"
259. 'Orv denotes sometimes the event simply, and must be translated so that. Matt. xiii. 35. 'Orv wv αυτον, 'so that on you shall come all the righteous blood shed,' &c. Luke xvi. 26. 'There is a great gulph fixed (εκατον) so that they which would pass from hence to you, cannot.'

255. 'Or. Because. Numm. xxii. 22. 'And God's anger was kindled (ευρεθη) because he went.' John ix. 17. 'What sayest thou of him (ευρεθη), because he hath opened thine eyes!' 1 Cor. ii. 14. 'Neither can he know them (ευρεθη) because they are spiritually discerned.' 1 Cor. xii. 10. 'Is the foot shall say, (ευρεθη) Because I am not the hand.' 2 Cor. xi. 7. 'Or. Because I preached.' Rom. v. 1. 'God commendeth his love to us, (ευρεθη) in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.'

254. 'Orv is sometimes put for δικαιος, therefore, for which cause. Hosea ix. 15. 'All their wickedness is in Gilgal; for there I hated them.' This, which is the common translation, represents God's hatred as the cause of the wickedness of the Israelites in Gilgal, contrary to the true sense of the passage, which ought to be thus translated: All their wickedness is in Gilgal, (ευρεθη) therefore I hated them. Luke vii. 47. 'Her sins which are many are forgiven, (ευρεθη) therefore she hath loved me (see ver. 42.) much; but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth me little.' 2 Cor. vii. 8. 'Or. Therefore, although I made you sorry by that letter, I do not repent.' Ver. 14. 'Orv. Therefore, if I have boasted any thing to him concerning you, I am not ashamed.' Eph. ii. 18. 'Or. Therefore through him we have access.'

256. 'Orv. For. 1 Cor. ix. 10. 'Orv. For he who pleases, ought to flow in hope.' Stephen's Concord. Gen. iii. 11. 'Orv ευρεθη. Now that by law no man is justified, is plain, (ευρεθη) for the just by faith shall live.'

258. 'Orv, in the Septuagint, hath sometimes the signification of ευρεθη when. So Muntert says: wherefore John ix. 8. should be thus translated: They who before had seen him, (ευρεθη) when he was blind, said, &c.

260. Orv is sometimes used as a particle of affirmation. So Stephen in his Concord, tells us: Hoc particula (ευρεθη) non redundare, sed confirmans vim habere videtur. And in this the Greek grammarians and Beza agree with Stephen; particularly Beza, who, in the following passage, translates ευρεθη, certit: 1 John iii. 20. 'Orv κα.personal. Certainly God is greater than our heart,' &c. Matt. vii. 23. 'Then will I profess unto them, (ευρεθη) ευρεθη πληθουσα) surely I never knew you.' John vii. 12. 'There was much murmuring among the people concerning him: some indeed said, (ευρεθη) Certainly he is a good man.' Rom. iii. 8. 'Orv κα.personal. Certainly, let us do evil, that good may come.' 1 Cor. xiv. 21. 'In the law it is written, (ευρεθη) Surely with men of other tongues and other lips I will speak.' 1 John iv. 20. 'If any one say, (ευρεθη) assuredly I love God, (ευρεθη) and yet hate his brother.'

261. 'Orv is used to introduce a new sentiment or argument, and must be translated, besides, further. 1 John v. 7. 'Orv κα.personal. Farther, there are three who bear witness.' 1 John vi. 4. 'Orv. Besides, all that is begotten of God.'

262. 'Our properly is in an illative particle; but it is likewise used as a simple conjunction, being put for και, and, now, then, but. Matt. x. 25. 'How much more will they call them of his household!' 26. (ευρεθη) 'But fear them not.' Matt. xii. 13. 'ευρεθη, 'How much now is a man better,' &c. Mark vii. 6. 'ευρεθη, 'But having yet one son.' Luke xx. 29. 'ευρεθη, 'Now there were seven brethren.' Luke xxii. 53. 'ευρεθη, 'Lacked ye any thing?' and they said, Nothing.' 36. (ευρεθη, ευρεθη) 'Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, &c.' John vi. 45. 'ευρεθη, 'Now every one who hath heard.' John vii. 33. 'ευρεθη, 'Then said Jesus.' John xviii. 25. 'ευρεθη, 'Now Simon Peter stood and warmed himself, (ευρεθη) and they said to him,' Rom. ii. 26. 'ευρεθη, 'And if the uncircumcision.' Rom. ix. 19. 'ευρεθη, 'But thou wilt say to me.' 1 Cor. xi. 20. 'ευρεθη, 'But your coming together into one place, is not to eat.' Heb. iv. 14. 'ευρεθη, 'For God is a Spirit, (ευρεθη) and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth.' Heb. vi. 1. 'ευρεθη, 'Then verily the first covenant had, &c.'

1 Tim. ii. 1. 'ευρεθη, 'Now I exhort.' In this sense Plato, in his Apol. Socratis, uses ευρεθη.

263. 'Ovy, For. John xviii. 24. 'ευρεθη, 'For Anna had sent him bound to Caiphas the high-priest.' Rom. vi. 4. 'ευρεθη, 'For we are buried with him.' In this causal sense ευρεθη is used like γεγονος, to introduce a second, and sometimes a third reason, in support of the same proposition; in which case it must, like γεγονος, be translated, besides, moreover, further. Matt. xii. 22. 'ευρεθη, 'Further, whatever things ye would that men should do,' &c. Accordingly in the parallel passage, Luke vi. 31. this precept is introduced with και, and. Matt. x. 32. 'ευρεθη, 'Moreover, whosoever shall confess me.' Luke xii. 36. 'ευρεθη, 'Besides, if thy whole body be full of light.'

264. 'Our adversative, Yet, nevertheless. 1 Cor. x. 31. 'ευρεθη, 'Nevertheless, whether ye eat or drink.' 1 Cor. xiv. 10. 'There are perhaps as many kinds of languages in the world as ye utter, and none of them with without meaning.' 11. (ευρεθη) 'Yet if I do not know the meaning of the language.' Wherefore Matt. x. 26. 'ευρεθη, ευρεθη, ευρεθη, 'Should be translated, Nevertheless, fear them not.'

265. 'Ourv is sometimes used as a conjunction. Acts xx. 11. 'Talked a long while, even till break of day, (ευρεθη) then departed.' Acts xxvii. 17. 'Sunk sail, (ευρεθη) then were driven.' Acts xxviii. 14. 'Were desired to tarry with them seven days, (ευρεθη) and then we went toward Rome.' 1 Cor. xii. 28. 'Let a man examine himself, (ευρεθη) and then let him eat.'

266. 'Ourn, Nevertheless, So there, therefore. Matt. v. 17. 'ευρεθη, 'So then, therefore.' Matthew xxvi. 40. 'ευρεθη, 'So then great good tree bring forth good fruit.' Matt. x. 33. 'ευρεθη, 'So then the work is done.' 40. 'ευρεθη, 'So then the work is done.' 40. 'ευρεθη, 'Therefore to the utmost of my power.' 1 Cor. iv. 1. 'ευρεθη, 'Therefore, concerning the things which are without feeling.' 1 Cor. iv. 2. 'ευρεθη, 'Wherefore also the resurrection of the dead is possible.' Rev. iii. 8. 'ευρεθη, 'Therefore, because thou art lukewarm." John iv. 6. 'Now Jesus being weary with his journey, sat down (στην) therefore at the well.'

267. παίλιν, especially in the beginning of a sentence, signifies προτὸς. Moreover. Matt. xiii. 44. παίλιν, 'Moreover the kingdom of heaven is like,' &c. See ver. 45. 47. 2 Cor. xi. 16. παίλιν, 'Moreover I say.' Wherefore John iv. 24. may be thus translated, Τῷ παίλιν διὰ τὸ

268. παίλιν, especially in the beginning of a sentence, signifies προτὸς. Moreover. Matt. xiii. 44. παίλιν, 'Moreover the kingdom of heaven is like,' &c. See ver. 45. 47. 2 Cor. xi. 16. παίλιν, 'Moreover I say.' Wherefore John iv. 24. may be thus translated, Τῷ παίλιν διὰ τὸ

269. παίλιν, In like manner. 1 Cor. xii. 21. 'Ες παίλιν, 'Not in like manner the head to the feet.' Matt. xxvii. 42. παίλιν δὲ τοῖς πάντες ἔστε, 'In like manner a second time going away, he prayed.'

270. 2 Cor. x. 7. 'Let him (παίλιν) on the other hand, reason this from himself.'

271. παίλιν, In like manner. 1 Cor. xii. 21. 'Ες παίλιν, 'Not in like manner the head to the feet.' Matt. xxvii. 42. παίλιν δὲ τοῖς πάντες ἔστε, 'In like manner a second time going away, he prayed.'

272. 2 Cor. x. 7. 'Let him (παίλιν) on the other hand, reason this from himself.'

ROMANS.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—Of the time when the Christian Religion was introduced at Rome.

The Scriptures do not inform us at what time, or by whom, the gospel was first preached at Rome. But from the following circumstances it is probably that the church there was one of the first planted Gentile churches, and that it soon became very numerous.

When St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, A.D. 57, their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world, Rom. i. 8, and many of them possessed spiritual gifts, Rom. xii. 6; and their obedience was known to all men, Rom. xvi. 19. Further, the fame of the church at Rome had reached the apostles long before he wrote this letter. For he told them, 'he had a desire for many years to come to them,' Rom. xv. 23. The gospel therefore was introduced in Rome very early, perhaps by some of the disciples who were scattered abroad after Stephen's death, in the end of the reign of Tiberius. Or the founding of the Roman church may have happened even before that period; for among the persons who heard Peter preach on the day of Pentecost, and who were converted by him, strangers of Rome are mentioned, Acts ii. 10. 41. These Roman Jews, on their return home, no doubt preached Christ to their countrymen in the city, and probably converted some of them; so that the church at Rome, like most of the Gentile churches, began in the Jews. But it was soon enlarged by converts from among the religious proselytes; and in process of time was increased by the flowing in of the idolatrous Gentiles, who gave themselves to Christ in such numbers, that, at the time St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, their conversion was much spoken of.

These facts merit attention; because the opposers of our religion represent the first Christians as below the notice of the heathen magistrates, on account of the paucity of their numbers, and the obscurity with which they practised their religious rites. But if the faith of the Roman brethren was spoken of throughout the whole empire at the time this letter was written, the disciples of Christ in Rome must have been numerous, and must have professed their religion openly; for the turning of a few obscure individuals in the city from the worship of idols, and their worshipping the true God clandestinely, could not be the subject of discourse in the provinces. Farther, that there were many Christians in Rome when St. Paul wrote this epistle, may be inferred from the tumults occasioned by the contests which the Jews had with them about the law, and which gave rise to Claudius's edict, banishing the whole of them from Rome, Acts xvi. 2. See sect. 2, page 30, at the beginning. The salutations likewise, in the end of this epistle, show how numerous the brethren in Rome were at that time, some of whom were of long standing in the faith, as Andronicus and Junia, who were converted before Paul himself; others of them were teachers, as Urbanus; others were deacons and deaconesses, as Mary, Tryphena, Tryphoas, and Persis, all of whom were active in spreading the gospel; others were persons of station, such as the members of the family of Narcissus, if, as is commonly supposed, he was the emperor's favourite of that name. But although this should not be admitted, 'the saints in Caesar's household,' whose salvation, some years after this, the apostle sent to the Philippians, may have been persons of considerable note.

Sect. II.—Of the state of the Christian Church at the time St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans.

The gospel being offered to the world as a revelation from God, the Jews justly expected that it would agree in all things with the former revelations, in which they were used as the keepers. And therefore, when they perceived that many of the doctrines taught by the apostles were contrary to the received tenets, which the scribes pretended to derive from the writings of Moses and the prophets, the bulk of the nation rejected the gospel, and argued against it with the greatest vehemence of passion, in the persuasion that it was an impious heresy, inconsistent with the ancient revelations, and destructive of piety.

To remove this specious cavil, the apostles, besides preaching the doctrines of the gospel as matters revealed to themselves, were at pains to show that these doctrines were contained in the writings of Moses and the prophets, and that none of the tenets contrary to the gospel, which the Jewish doctors pretended to deduce from their own sacred writings, had any foundation there. Of these tenets, the most pernicious was their misrepresentation of the promise to Abraham, that 'in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed.' For the Jews considered the moral precepts of the law of Moses as a perfect rule of duty, and its sacrifices and purifications as real atonements for sin, and believing that no man could be saved out of their church, affirmed that the blessing of the nations in Abraham's seed consisted in the conversion of the nations to Judaism by the Jews. Hence the Jewish believers, strongly impressed with these notions, taught the Gentiles, 'Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved,' Acts xv. 1. But this doctrine, though obstinately maintained, was a gross error. The law of Moses was no rule of justification. It was a political institution, established for governing the Jews as the subjects of God's temporal kingdom in Canaan. And therefore the apostles, elders, and brethren assembled in the council of Jerusalem, justly decreed, that the yoke of the law was not to be imposed on the Gentiles, as necessary to their salvation. A decision, so deliberately and solemnly pronounced, by such an assembly, ought, among the disciples of Christ, to have silenced all dissensions on the subject. Nevertheless, the converted Jews, having been accustomed to glory in their relation to God as his people, and in the privileges which they had so long enjoyed, were extremely offended, when, according to the new doctrine, they found the Gentiles under the gospel raised to an equality with them in all religious privileges. Therefore, disregarding the decrees which were ordained of the apostles and elders, they exhorted the Gentiles everywhere to become Jews, if they wished to be saved. And this exhortation made the stronger impression on the Gentiles, that the Jewish worship by sacrifices, purifications, and holidays, was, in many respects, similar to their former worship. Besides, as the Jews were the only people who, before the introduction of the gospel, enjoyed the knowledge of the true God and a revelation of his will, and as the Christian preachers themselves appealed to that revelation in proof of their doctrine, the Gentiles naturally paid a great regard to the opinion of the Jews in matters of religion, and especially to their interpretations of the ancient oracles. Hence some of the Gentile converts, especially in the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, who before their conversion were extremely ignorant in religious matters, hearkening to the Judaizing teachers, received circumcision, and thereby bound themselves to obey the law of Moses, in the persuasion that it was the only way to secure the favour of the Deity.

According to this view of the matter, the controversy which in the first age disturbed the Christian church, was not, as Locke supposes, whether the Gentiles, in their uncircumcised state, should be admitted into the church, and enjoy equal privileges with the Jews; and whether it was legal for the Jews to hold religious communion with them, while they remained uncircumcised; but plainly, whether there was any church but the Jewish, in which men could be saved. For when the Judaizers taught the Gentile brethren, 'except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses ye cannot be saved,' they certainly meant that salvation could be obtained nowhere but in the Jewish church.

In this controversy the unbelieving Jews and all the Judaizing Christians ranged themselves on the one side, strongly and with united voices affirming that Judaism was the only religion in which men could be saved; that there was no gospel church different from the Jewish, nor any revealed law of God but the law of Moses; and that the gospel was nothing but an explanation of that law, of the same kind with the explications given of it by the prophets. On the other side, in this great controversy, stood the apostles and elders, and all the well informed brethren, who, knowing that the Jewish church was at an end, and that the law of Moses was abrogated, strenuously maintained that a new church of God was erected, in which all mankind might obtain salvation by faith without circumcision; and that the gospel was the only law of this new church. They therefore maintained the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses in all its parts, and boldly asserted, that the gospel alone was sufficient for the salvation of the Gentiles; consequently, that they were under no obligation to have recourse to the Levitical sacrifices and purifications, for procuring the pardon of their sins.

The controversy concerning the obligation of the law of Moses, viewed in the light wherein I have placed it, was a matter of no small importance, since on its determination depended, whether the law of Moses or the gospel of Christ should be the religion of the world. No wonder, therefore, that St. Paul introduced this controversy in so many of his epistles; and that he wrote three of them, in particular, for the express purpose of confuting an error so plausible and so persistent: I mean his epistles to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Hebrews. These learned epistles, in process of time, produced the desired effect. By the strength of the arguments set forth in them, and by representing the same things everywhere in his preaching and conversation, the apostle enlightened many of the Jewish converts; and these well instructed Jewish brethren in their several churches effectually opposed the errors of the Judaizers: by all which Judaism hath at length been banished from the Christian church, in which for a while it had taken root, through the misguided zeal of the Jewish converts; and the gospel now remains the only revealed religion authorized by God, and obligatory on men.

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion of Writing the Epistle to the Romans.

The controversy concerning the law of Moses, described in the foregoing section, was agitated very early at Rome, where the Jews, being rich and factious, disputed the matter with greater violence than in other churches. And the unbelieving part taking a share in the controversy, they occasioned such tumults, that the emperor Claudius, in the eleventh year of his reign, banished the contending parties from the city. So the Roman historian, Suetonius, informs us, who, confounding the Christians with the Jews, calls the whole body by the general name of Jews, and affirms that they were excited to these tumults by Christ (Christi impulser, Clau. c. 25.), because he had heard, I suppose, that Christ was engaged in their quarrels.

Among the banished from Rome was Aquila, a Jew, born in Pontus, and his wife Priscilla, both of them Christians. These came to Corinth about the time St. Paul first visited that city; and being in the same conversation with him, they received him into their house, employed him in their business, and gave him wages for his work, with which he maintained himself all the time he preached the gospel to the Corinthians. During his abode with them, Aquila and Priscilla, no doubt, gave the apostle a full account of the state of the church at Rome, before its dispersion; and, among other things, told him, that the unbelieving Romans, following the Greeks, affirmed the light of natural reason to have been from the beginning a sufficient guide to mankind in matters of religion: That, being great admirers of the Greeks, they considered their philosophy as the perfection of human reason, and extolled it as preferable to the gospel, which they scrupled not to pronounce mere foolishness: That, on the other hand, the unbelieving Jews, no less prejudiced in favour of the law of Moses, affirmed, it was the only religion in which men could be saved, and condemned the gospel as a detestable heresy, because it did not adopt the sacrifices, purifications, and other rites enjoined by Moses. They further told the apostle, that many, even of the converted Jews, extolled the institutions of Moses as more effectual for the salvation of sinners than the gospel, and, in that persuasion, pressed the Gentiles to join the law with the gospel, that, by its sacrifices and purifications, the gospel might be rendered a complete form of religion: That the Gentile converts, who knew their freedom from the law of Moses, desired their Judaizing brethren as superstitious bigots, while the others regarded them as profane, for neglecting institutions which they esteemed sacred: That those who possessed spiritual gifts had occasioned great disturbance in the church, each extolling his own gifts, and striving to exercise them in the public assemblies, without giving place to others: Lastly, that some, both of the Jewish and Gentile believers, reckoning it disgraceful to obey constitutions made by idolaters, had, in several instances, condemned the wholesome laws of the state, and were in danger of being punished as evil doers, to the great scandal of the Christian name.

As the apostle had not been in Rome when he wrote this epistle, some persons, well acquainted with the affairs of the church there, must have made him acquainted with all the particulars above mentioned. For his letter to the Romans was evidently framed with a view to these things. If so, who more likely to give the information than Aquila and Priscilla, with whom the apostle lodged so long! And though the Roman brethren were then dispersed, consequently the apostle had no opportunity of writing to them as a church, yet the disorders which prevailed among them having made a deep impression on his spirit, we may suppose he resolved to embrace the first opportunity of remedying them. Accordingly, during his second visit to the Corinthians, having heard that the church was re-established at Rome, St. Paul wrote to the Romans this excellent and learned letter, which bears their name; wherein, at great length, he discoursed of the justification of sinners; answered the objections made to the gospel doctrine of justification; proved from Moses and the prophets the calling of the Gentiles, the rejection of the Jews, and their future restoration; and gave the Roman brethren many precepts and exhortations, suited to their character and circumstances.

From the pains which the apostle took in this letter, to prove that no Gentile can be justified by the law of nature, nor Jew by the law of Moses, and from his explaining in it all the divine dispensations respecting religion, as well as from what he says, chap. i. 7, 15, 14, 15, it is reasonable to think it was designed for the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles at Rome, as well as for the brethren; who therefore would show the copies which they took of it to their unbelieving acquaintance. And insomuch as the apostle professed to derive his views of the matters contained in this letter from the former revelations, and from inspiration, it certainly merits the attention of every unbeliever to whom it was shown, whether he were a Jewish scribe, or a heathen philosopher, or a Roman magistrate, or one of the people; some of whom, I make no doubt, read it. And though, by reading it, they may not have been persuaded to embrace the gospel immediately, the candid and intelligent, by seriously weighing the things written in it, must have received such instruction in the principles and duties of natural religion, as could hardly fail to lead them to see the absurdity of the commonly received idolatry; which was one good step towards their conversion.—To conclude: As in this learned letter the principal objections by which Jews and Gentiles have all along impugned the gospel are introduced and answered, it is a writing which the adversaries of revelation, who pretend to oppose it on rational principles, ought to peruse with attention and censure.

The commentators observe, that although the apostle, in the inscription of this letter, hath asserted his apostolical authority, to make the Romans sensible that the things written in it were dictated to him by the Spirit; yet, as he was personally unknown to the greatest part of them, he does not teach, exhort, and rebuke them with that authority which he uses in his letters to the churches of his own planting, but he writes to them in a mild and condescending manner, in order to gain their affection.

Of the Time and Place of writing the Epistle to the Romans.

The first time Paul visited Corinth, he found Aquila and Priscilla, lately come from Italy in consequence of Claudius's edict (Acts xviii. 2). which was published in the eleventh year of his reign, answering to A. D. 51. (See Pref. 1 Cor. sect. 1.) Probably the apostle arrived at Corinth in the summer of that year. And as he abode there more than eighteen months before he set out for Syria (Acts xviii. 18), he must have left Corinth in the spring of A. D. 58. In his voyage to Syria, the apostle touched at Ephesus, then sailed straight to Cesarea. From Cesarea he went to Jerusalem, and after that to Antioch. And having spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening the disciples, Acts xviii. 21, 22, 23. Then passing through the upper coast, he came to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1. His voyage from Corinth to Cesarea, and his journey through the countries just now mentioned, may have been performed in a year and ten months. Wherefore, if he sailed from Corinth in February, 58, he may have come to Ephesus in the end of the year 54. And seeing he abode at Ephesus about three years (Acts xx. 31), before he went into Macedonia, his arrival in Macedonia (Acts xx. 1) must have happened in the year 57. At this time the apostle went over all these parts, and gave them much exhortation before he went into Greece. (Acts x. 2.) Probably this was the time he preached the gospel in the borders of Illyricum, Rom. xv. 19. And as these transactions would take up the summer of the year 57, we cannot suppose he came into Greece sooner than in the autumn of that year. The purpose of his journey into Greece was to receive the collections which the churches of Achaia had made for the saints in Judea, 2 Cor. i. 3-9. Having therefore abode three months in Greece (Acts xx. 3.), he departed with the collections early in the year 58.—The time of the apostle's departure from Greece with the collections being thus fixed, there can be no doubt concerning the date of his epistle to the Romans; for he told them he was going to Jerusalem when he wrote it, Rom. xvi. 25. 'But now I go to Jerusalem, ministering to the saints.' Wherefore the epistle to the Romans was written at Corinth, as we shall see immediately, in the end of A. D. 57, or in the beginning of A. D. 58, full seven years after the Jews and Christians were banished from Rome by Claudius, and about three years after their return. For Claudius dying in the year 54, his edict terminated with his life; and not being renewed by his successor, the Jews and Christians came back to Rome in such numbers, that, in the third year of the emperor Nero, when the apostle wrote this letter, the Roman church had acquired its former celebrity.—To conclude: The circumstances by which the date of the epistle to the Romans is fixed, are so well ascertained, that learned men are nearly agreed in their opinion upon the point.—some, with Pearson, dating it at Corinth, in the year 57; others, with Lardner, in the beginning of 58; and others, with Mill, in 58, without determining the time of the year.

The salutations from Gaius and Erastus, the chamberlain of the city (Rom. xvi. 23.), are additional proofs that this epistle was written at Corinth. For that Gaius lived there, seems plain from 1 Cor. i. 14., as did Erastus likewise, 2 Tim. ii. 14. Besides, Phoebe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, the eastern part of Corinth, having been the bearer of this letter, Corinth, by that circumstance also is so plainly pointed out as the place where it was written, that there was no occasion for the apostle to be more particular.
VIEW AND ILLUSTRATION.

The Christ, was, as to his flesh, sprung of the seed of David, ver. 3. But as to his divine nature, he was, with the greatest power of evidence, declared to be the Son of God, by his resurrection, ver. 4. And because Paul was personally unknown to most of the Christians in Rome, he assured them that he was made an apostle by Christ himself, for the purpose of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, ver. 5. of which class of men most of the inhabitants of Rome were, ver. 6. He was therefore authorized to write this letter to the whole inhabitants of Rome. So many particulars crowded into the inscription hath made it uncommonly long. But they are placed with great judgment in the very entrance, because they are the foundations on which the whole scheme of doctrine contained in the epistle is built.

Because it might seem strange that Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, had not hitherto visited Rome, the most noted Gentile city in the world, he assured the Romans he had often purposed to come to them, but had hitherto been hindered, ver. 13, 14. However, he was still willing to preach the gospel in Rome, ver. 15.; being neither afraid nor ashamed to preach it in that great and learned city; because it reveals the powerful method which God hath devised for bestowing salvation on every one who believeth; on the Jews first, to whom it was to be first preached, and also on the Gentiles, the Greek, ver. 16. In this account of the gospel the apostle intimates that no Jew could be saved by the law of Moses, nor any Gentile by the law of nature. For, if the Jews could have been saved by the one law, and the Gentiles by the other, the gospel, instead of being the power of God for salvation to every one who believeth, would have been a needless dispensation; and the apostle ought to have been ashamed of it, as altogether superfluous.

To prove that the gospel is the power of God for salvation to every one who believeth, the apostle first of all observes, that therein the righteousness of God by faith is revealed;—in the gospel, the righteousness which God will accept and reward is revealed to be a righteousness not of works, but of faith. And this being the only righteousness of which sinners are capable, the gospel which discovers its acceptableness to God and the method in which it may be obtained, is, without doubt, the power of God for salvation to all who believe, ver. 17. Here an essential defect, both in the law of Moses and in the law of nature, is tacitly insinuated. Neither the one law nor the other reveals God's intention of accepting and rewarding any righteousness but that of a perfect obedience. Secondly, To prove that the gospel alone is the power of God for salvation, the apostle observes, that both in the law of Moses, and the law of nature, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven, &c. That is, these laws, instead of granting pardon to sinners, subject them to punishment, however penitent they may be; consequently, these laws are not the power of God for salvation to any one. But the gospel, which promises pardon and eternal life, is the effectual means of saving sinners. In short, any hope of mercy sinners entertain must be derived from revelation alone, ver. 18. And in regard the apostle wrote this epistle to the Romans for the purpose of explaining and proving these important truths, the declaration of them, contained in verses 17, 18, may be considered as the proposition of the subject to be handled in this epistle.

Accordingly, to show that no person, living under the law of nature, has any hope of salvation given him by that law, the apostle begins with proving, that, instead of possessing that perfect holiness which is required by the law of nature in order to salvation, all are guilty before God, and doomed by him to everlasting punishment. To illustrate this proposition, St. Paul took the Greeks for an example; because, having carried the powers of reason to the highest pitch, their philosophy might be considered as the perfection both of the light and of the law of nature; consequently, among them, if anywhere, all the knowledge of God, and of the method of salvation, discoverable by the light of nature, and all the purity of manners which men can attain by their own powers, ought to have been found. Nevertheless, that people, so intelligent in other matters, were in religion foolish to the last degree, and in morals debauched beyond belief. For, notwithstanding the knowledge of the being and perfections of the one true God subsisted among them in the most early ages, ver. 19.—being understood by the works of creation, ver. 20.—their legislators, philosophers, and priests unrighteously holding the truth concerning God in confinement, did not glorify him as God, by discovering him to the common people, and making him the object of their worship; but, through their own foolish reasons, fanning polytheism and idolatry more rapidly for the vulgar than the worship of the one true God, they themselves at length lost the knowledge of God to such a degree that their own heart was darkened, ver. 21. Thus the wise men among the Greeks because fools in matters of religion, and were guilty of the greatest injustice, both towards God and men, ver. 22.—For, by their public institutions, they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image of corruptible man, and of birds, &c., which they held up to the people as objects of worship. And by their own example, as well as by the laws which they enacted, they led the people to worship these idols with the most impure and detestable rites, ver. 23.—For which crime God permitted those pretended wise men, who had so exceedingly dishonoured him, to dishonour themselves with the most brutish carnality; of which the apostle gives a particular description, ver. 24—26.; and observes, that those proud legislators and philosophers, who thought they had discovered the highest wisdom in their religious and political institutions, thus received in themselves the recompense of their own error that was met, ver. 27.—So that the abominable uncleanness, which was so wondrously practised by the Greeks, and which was authorized by their public institutions, as well as by the example of their great men, was both the natural effect, and the just punishment, of that idolatry which, in every state, was established as the national religion.—Farther, because the Greek legislators did not approve of the true knowledge of God, as for the people of the great men, as well as the vulgar, whom they deceived, lost all sense of right and wrong, in their behaviour towards one another, ver. 28.—most of them being filled with all manner of injustice, fornication, wickedness, &c. ver. 29. Nay, although by the law of Moses, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven, &c. That is, these laws, instead of granting pardon to sinners, subject them to punishment, however penitent they may be; consequently, these laws are not the power of God for salvation to any one. pointed them to be worshipped, corrupted the morals of the people to such a degree, that the Greeks became the most debauched of mankind, and thereby lost all claim to the favour of God. But if this was the case with the most intelligent, most civilized, and most accomplished heathen nations, under the tuition of their boasted philosophy, it will easily be admitted, that the light of nature, among the barbarous nations, could have no greater efficacy in leading them to the worship of the true God, and in giving them the knowledge of the method of salvation. The most civilized heathen nations, therefore, equally with the most barbarous, having, under the guidance of the light of nature, lost the knowledge of God, and became utterly corrupted in their morals, it is evident, that none of them could have any hope of a future life from the law of nature, which condemns all to death without mercy, who do not give a sinless obedience to its precepts. Wherefore, both for the knowledge of the method of salvation, and for salvation itself, the Greeks were obliged to have recourse to the gospel, which teaches, that because all have sinned, and are incapable of perfect obedience, God hath appointed for their salvation 'a righteousness without law,' that is a righteousness which does not consist in perfect obedience to any law whatever, even 'the righteousness of faith,' that being the only righteousness attainable by sinners; and at the same time declares, that God will accept and reward that kind of righteousness through Christ, as if it were a perfect righteousness.—These inferences, indeed, the apostle hath not drawn in this part of his letter, because he intended to produce them (chap. ii. 50, 53, 59) as general conclusions concerning all mankind, after having proved the insufficiency of the law of Moses for justifying the Jews. Yet it was fit to mention them here, that the reader might have a complete view of the apostle's argument.

1. The picture which the apostle hath drawn of the manners of the Greeks, is by no means exaggerated. The intercourse which he had with the philosophers, and more especially with his own disciple, Dionysius the Areopagite, enabled him to form a just judgment of the learning and religion of that corrupted people; as his long residence at Athens, Corinth, and other Greek cities, made him perfectly acquainted with their manners. But though his description is not exaggerated, we must remember that it does not extend to every individual. It is an image of manners of the Greek nations in general, or rather of such of them as were in the higher ranks of life. I call the reader's attention to this remark, because the apostle himself supposes, in the second chapter, that the Gentiles, who have not the benefit of revelation, may attain that faith and holiness which is necessary to justification; in which case he assures us, that they shall be rewarded with glory and peace. Besides, it is well known, that in every Gentile nation there were always many who believed in the one true God, and who, in the persuasion that he is, and that he is the rewarder of those who diligently seek him, were anxious to know and do his will; and who, being instructed and strengthened by God, behaved in such a manner as to be acceptable to him.

2. My second remark is, that although the revelation of the wrath of God from heaven, against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, mentioned by the apostle, Rom. i. 18, certainly implies that no sinner can have any hope of salvation from the law of nature, it does not follow, that the pious heathens had no hope of salvation. The heathens in general believed their deities placable, and, in that persuasion offered to them propitiatory sacrifices, and expected to be pardoned and blessed by them even in a future state, (See Guardian, No. 27;) nay, many of them believed they were to reanimate their bodies. But those hopes they did not derive from the law or light of nature, but from the promise which God made to the first parents of mankind. For that promise being handed down by tradition to Noah and his sons, they communicated the knowledge thereof, together with the use of sacrifice, to all their descendants. So that the hope of pardon and immortality which the pious heathens entertained, was the very hope which the gospel hath more clearly brought to light, and was derived from the same source, namely, from divine revelation. Withal, being agreeable to the natural wishes of mankind, and the only remedy for their greatest fears, these circumstances contributed to preserve it in the world.—Since, then, the hope of pardon and of a future state, which the heathens entertained, was derived, not from the light of nature, but from the primitive revelations, the apostle's reasoning in this chapter is perfectly just, and his conclusion stands firm; namely, that the light and law of nature hold out no method in which a sinner can be saved, and that it is the gospel alone which hath brought the important secret to light, by explaining and enlarging the primitive revelations, and by teaching, in the clearest manner, that God will accept men's faith for righteousness and, at the judgment, reward it as if it were a perfect righteousness, on account of the obedience of Jesus Christ.

PREMONITION TO THE READER.

Some perhaps may be of opinion, that to have done justice to the following translation of the Apostolical Epistles, the author, as often as it differs from the common version, should have shown the import and propriety of these differences, with the reasons on which they are founded, especially when they are of the minute kind; because negligent readers, fancying differences of that sort of little moment, and not attending to those which are of greater magnitude, are apt to conclude, that the translation now submitted to the public differs so little from the one in common use, that it might have been spared. But nothing can be worse founded than such a conclusion. Persons who are judges of language, know that the alteration of a single word in a sentence, and

The Christ, was, as to his flesh, sprung of the seed of David, ver. 3.—But as to his divine nature, he was, with the greatest power of evidence, declared to be the Son of God, by his resurrection, ver. 4.—And because Paul was personally unknown to most of the Christians in Rome, he assured them that he was made an apostle by Christ himself, for the purpose of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, ver. 5.—of which class of men most of the inhabitants of Rome were, ver. 6.—He was therefore authorized to write this letter to the whole inhabitants of Rome. So many particulars crowded into the inscription hath made it uncommonly long. But they are placed with great judgment in the very entrance, because they are the foundations on which the whole scheme of doctrine contained in the epistle is built.

Because it might seem strange that Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, had not hitherto visited Rome, the most noted Gentile city in the world, he assured the Romans he had often purpose to come to them, but had hitherto been hindered, ver. 13, 14.—However, he was still willing to preach the gospel in Rome, ver. 15.; being neither afraid nor ashamed to preach it in that great and learned city; because it reveals the powerful method which God hath devised for bestowing salvation on every one who believeth; on the Jews first, to whom it was to be first preached, and also on the Greek, ver. 16.—In this account of the gospel the apostle intimated that no Jew could be saved by the law of Moses, nor any Gentile by the law of nature. For, if the Jews could have been saved by the one law and the Greeks by the other, the gospel, instead of being 'the power of God for salvation to every one that believeth,' would have been a needless dispensation; and the apostle ought to have been ashamed of it, as altogether superfluous.

To prove that the gospel is 'the power of God for salvation to every one who believeth,' the apostle first of all observes, that 'therein the righteousness of God by faith is revealed;' in the gospel, the righteousness which God will accept and reward is revealed to be a righteousness not of works, but of faith. And this being the only righteousness of which sinners are capable, the gospel which discovers its acceptableness to God and the method in which it may be attained, is, without doubt, the power of God for salvation to all who believe, ver. 17. Here an essential defect, both in the law of Moses and in the law of nature, is tacitly intimated. Neither the one nor the other reveals God's intention of accepting and rewarding any righteousness but that of a perfect obedience.—Secondly, To prove that the gospel alone is 'the power of God for salvation,' the apostle observes, that God is the law of nature and the law of Moses, 'the wrath of God is revealed from heaven,' &c. That is, these laws, instead of granting pardon to sinners, subject them to punishment, however penitent they may be; consequently, these laws are not the power of God for salvation to any one: But the gospel, which promises pardon and eternal life, is the effectual means of saving sinners. In short, any hope of mercy sinners entertain must be derived from revelation alone, ver. 18. And in regard the apostle wrote this epistle to the Romans for the purpose of explaining and proving these important truths, the declaration of them, contained in verses 16, 17, 18, may be considered as the proposition of the subjects to be handled in this epistle.

Accordingly, to show that no person, living under the law of nature, has any hope of salvation given him by that law, the apostle begins with proving, that, instead of possessing that perfect holiness which is required by the law of nature in order to salvation, all are guilty before God, and doomed by that law to punishment. To illustrate this proposition, St. Paul took the Greeks for an example; because, having carried the powers of reason to the highest pitch, their philosophy might be considered as the perfection of both the light and of the law of nature; consequently, among them, if anywhere, all the knowledge of God, and of the method of salvation, discoverable by the light of nature, and all the purity of manners which men can attain by their own powers, ought to have been found. Nevertheless, that people, so intelligent in other matters, were in religion foolish to the last degree, and in morals debauched beyond belief. For, notwithstanding the knowledge of the being and perfections of the one true God subsisted among them in the most early ages, ver. 19.—being understood by the works of creation, ver. 20.—their legislators, philosophers, and priests unrighteously holding the truth concerning God in confinement, did not glorify him as God, by discovering him to the common people, and making him the object of their worship; but, through their own foolish reasonings, fancying polytheism and idolatry more proper for the vulgar than the worship of the one true God, they themselves at length lost the knowledge of God to such a degree that their own heart was darkened, ver. 21.—Thus the wise men among the Greeks became fools in matters of religion, and were guilty of the greatest injustice, both towards God and men, ver. 22.—For, by their public institutions, they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image of corromptible man, and of birds, &c. which they held up to the people as objects of worship. And by their own example, as well as by the laws which they enacted, they led the people to worship these idle gods with the most impure and detestable rites, ver. 23.—For which crime God permitted those pretended wise men, who had so exceedingly dishonoured him, to dis honour themselves with the most brutish contumely; of which the apostle gives a particular description, ver. 24—26.; and observes, that those proud legislators and philosophers, who thought they had discovered the highest wisdom in their religious and political institutions, thus received in themselves the recompense of their error that was met, ver. 27.—So that the abominable uncleanness, which was avowedly practised by the Greeks, and which was authorized by their public institutions, as well as by the example of their great men, was both the natural effect, and the just punishment, of that idolatry which, in every state, was established as the national religion.—Farther, because the Grecian legislators did not approve of the true knowledge of God, as far for the people, the great men, as well as the vulgar, whom they deceived, lost all sense of right and wrong, in their behaviour towards one another, ver. 28.; most of them being filled with all manner of injustice, fornication, wickedness, &c., ver. 29—31. Nay, although by the law of God written on their hearts, they knew that those who commit such crimes are worthy of death, to such a degree did they carry their profligacy, that they not only committed those sins themselves, but encouraged the common people to commit them, by the pleasure with which they beheld their debaucheries in the temples, and their revellings on the festivals of their gods, ver. 32.

Such is the apostle Paul's account of the manners of the Greeks; from which it appears that their boasted philosophy, notwithstanding it enabled them to form excellent plans of civil government, whereby the people were inspired with the love of their country, and good laws for maintaining the peace of society, it proved utterly ineffectual for giving the legislators the knowledge of salvation, and for leading them to establish a right public religion: defects which entirely destroyed any influence which their political institutions might otherwise have had, in aiding the people to maintain a proper moral conduct. In short, the vicious character of the false gods, to whom the legislators held up to the people as objects of their worship, and the impure rites with which they appointed them to be worshipped, corrupted the morals of the people to such a degree, that the Greeks became the most debased of mankind, and thereby lost all claim to the favour of God. But if this was the case with the most intelligent, most civilized, and most accomplished heathen nations, under the tuition of their boasted philosophy, it will easily be admitted, that the light of nature, among the barbarous nations, could have no greater efficacy in leading them to the worship of the true God, and in giving them the knowledge of the method of salvation. The most civilized heathen nations, therefore, equally with the most barbarous, having, under the guidance of the light of nature, lost the knowledge of God, and become utterly corrupted in their morals, it is evident, that none of them could have any hope of a future life from the law of nature, which condemns all death without mercy, who do not give a sinless obedience to its precepts. Therefore, both for the knowledge of the method of salvation, and for salvation itself, the Greeks were obliged to have recourse to the gospel, which teaches, that because all have sinned, and are incapable of perfect obedience, God hath appointed for their salvation a righteousness without law; that is a righteousness which does not consist in perfect obedience to any law whatever, even the righteousness of faith, that being the only righteousness attainable by sinners; and at the same time declares, that God will accept and reward that kind of righteousness through Christ, as if it were a perfect righteousness. — These inferences, indeed, the apostle hath not drawn in this part of his letter, because he intended to produce them (chap. iii. 20, 21, 22) as general conclusions concerning all mankind, after having proved the insufficiency of the law of Moses for justifying the Jews. Yet it was fit to mention them here, that the reader might have a complete view of the apostle's argument.

1. The picture which the apostle hath drawn of the manners of the Greeks, is by no means aggravated. The intercourse which he had with the philosophers, and more especially with his own disciple, Dionysius the Areopagite, enabled him to form a just judgment of the learning and religion of that civilized people; as his long residence in Athens, Corinth, and other Greek cities, made him perfectly acquainted with their manners. But though his description is not exaggerated, we must remember that it does not extend to every individual. It is an image of the manners of the Greek nations in general, or rather of such of them as were in the higher ranks of life. Besides, it is well known, that in every Gentile nation there were always many who believed in the one true God, and who, in the persuasion that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him, were anxious to know and do his will; and who, being instructed and strengthened by God, believed in such a manner as to be acceptable to him.

2. My second remark is, That although the revelation of the wrath of God from heaven, against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, mentioned by the apostle, Rom. i. 18, certainly implies that no sinner can have any hope of salvation from the law of nature, it does not follow, that the pious heathens had no hope of salvation. The heathens in general believed their deities placable, and, in that persuasion offered to them prophylactic sacrifices, expected to be pardoned and blessed by them even in a future state, (See Guardian, No. 27; ) many, of them believed they were to be reanimated their bodies. But these hopes they did not derive from the law or light of nature, but from the promise which God made to the first parents of mankind. For that promise being handed down by tradition to Noah and his sons, they communicated the knowledge thereof, together with the use of sacrifice, to all their descendants. So that the hope of pardon and immortality which the pious heathens entertained, was the very hope which the gospel hath more clearly brought to light, and was derived from the same source, namely, from divine revelation. Withal, being agreeable to the natural wishes of mankind, and the only remedy for their greatest fears, these circumstances contributed to preserve it in the world.—Since, then, the hope of pardon and of a future state, which the heathens entertained, was derived, not from the light of nature, but from the primitive revelations, the apostle's reasoning in this chapter is perfectly just, and his conclusion stands firm; namely, that the light and law of nature hold out no method in which a sinner can be saved, and that it is the gospel alone which hath brought the important secret to light, by explaining and enlarging the primitive revelations, and by teaching, in the clearest manner, that God will accept men's faith for righteousness and, at the judgment, reward it as if it were a perfect righteousness, on account of the obedience of Jesus Christ.

3. My third remark is, That the description which the apostle hath given of the national manners of the Greeks, however disgraceful to human nature, being perfectly true, merits attention; because it is a complete confutation of those who contend that natural reason hath always been sufficient to lead mankind to just notions in religion, and to a proper moral conduct. For after the weakness of human reason, in matters of religion and morality, hath been so clearly demonstrated by experience in the case of the Greeks, who, of all mankind, were the most distinguished for their intellectual endowments, the futile pretence of the sufficiency of the light of nature, set up by modern infidels, for the purpose of weakening revelation needless, should be rejected with the contempt due to so gross a falsehood. And all who are acquainted with the actual state of the world under the guidance of the light of nature, ought thankfully to embrace the instruction contained in the gospel, as the most effectual means of training ignorant sinfull creatures to virtue; and should humbly submit to the method of salvation by Christ, therein revealed, as of divine appointment, and as the only method in which sinners can be saved.

PREMONITION TO THE READER.

Some perhaps may be of opinion, that to have done justice to the following translation of the Apostolical Epistles, the author, as often as it differs from the common version, should have shown the import and propriety of these differences, with the reasons on which they are founded, especially when they are of the minute kind; because negligent readers, fancying differences of that sort of little moment, and not attending to those which are of greater magnitude, are apt to conclude, that the translation now authorised to the public differs so little from the one in common use, that it might have been spared. But nothing can be worse founded than such a conclusion. Persons who are judges of language, know that the alteration of a single word in a sentence, and even a different pointing, will change its meaning entirely; as was shown by some examples, p. 11. Gen. Pref. But to have illustrated in the same manner all the alterations and corrections which the author hath introduced into his translation, would have swelled the work to an enormous size. And therefore, to show in what particulars this differs from the common version of the epistles, the author hath contended himself, as was observed p. 10. with printing what is different in italic characters, and hath left for the most part to the reader’s own sagacity, not only to judge of the propriety of his corrections, but to investigate the reasons by which they are supported.

Yet, to prevent cursory readers from disregarding this translation, it has been thought to be necessary, merely because a number of the corrections which it offers are of the minute kind, the author will here compare one of its chapters only with the common English version of the same chapter, and will strike originally only the slightest alterations, when made agreeably to the original, such a change in the sense is sometimes produced, as throws great light on the sentiments and reasonings of the inspired writers. The chapter chosen for comparing the two translations, shall be the first of the epistle to the Romans; not because the alterations introduced into the new translation of that chapter, are either of greater magnitude, or more in number, or of higher importance than those in the other chapters of the epistle, (for in reality they are fewer, more minute, and of less importance), but because the reader will naturally fix his eye on that chapter first, from its presenting itself first to his view.

Rom. 1. 3. Who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh. This leads the reader to think of the formation of our Lord’s body: Whereas the apostle’s meaning is, that with respect to his flesh he was descended from David, and that by a female; but those in the other chapters of the epistle, (for in reality they are fewer, more minute, and of less importance), but because the reader will naturally fix his eye on that chapter first, from its presenting itself first to his view.

Ver. 4. Was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead. This implies that Jesus was declared to be the Son of God, by his raising other persons from the dead. But as Jesus himself often appealed to his own resurrection in proof of his being the Son of God, the phrase & εστιν ευγενής ὑμῖν is undoubtedly an ellipsis, in which two words are omitted. One of them is supplied by our translators, namely, the word from; the other word is supplied in the new translation, which runs thus: Declared the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead. The meaning is, that Jesus was declared to be the Son of God by his own resurrection, and not by raising others from the dead.

Ver. 5. By whom we have received. grace and apostleship, for obedience to the faith among all nations for his name. This rendering, besides being inelegant, is faulty in two particulars. For, first, Paul did not receive his apostleship by Christ—that is, from God by the intervention of Christ—but from Christ himself, as holding the right originally of making an apostle. Secondly, οἷος τῆς πίστεως does not signify obedience to the faith, but the obedience of faith. In the new translation these faults are thus corrected: From whom we have received grace and apostleship, in order to the obedience of faith among all the Gentiles, on account of his name. The apostle received his office from Christ himself, that by preaching him everywhere as the Son of God and Saviour of the world, he might produce the obediency of faith among all the Gentiles, on account of his dignity and authority as the Son of God.

Ver. 6. Without ceasing making mention of you always in my prayers, is a tautology, which in the new translation is avoided, by joining the clause, always in my prayers, with the word requesting in the beginning of ver. 10 with which it stands connected in the Greek.

Ver. 12. Two is σας—that is to say. According to this translation, ver. 12. is an explanation of ver. 11. But every reader must be sensible, that the things contained in the two verses are entirely different. Wherefore ὁμορροφοσία and σας should not be translated that is to say, as in the Bible, where it is neglected as an expletive, and the words to say are supplied, but the verse should be supplied and translated in the following manner: And this is proposed, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith of you and me.

Ver. 15. So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are in Rome also. The new translation of this verse is more perspicuous and emphatical: Therefore (namely, because I am a debtor, &c.) I am willing, according to my ability, to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome. For, to hinder the Romans from suspecting that the apostle had hitherto avoided coming to Rome, because he was afraid to preach the gospel to such a learned and intelligent people, he told them, notwithstanding their great learning, he was willing to preach the gospel even to them. And to show that this is his meaning, he added, ver. 16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, &c.

Ver. 17. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by faith.—The righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith, is an assemblage of words to which no distinct meaning can be affixed. But the original, rightly construed, gives the following clear literal sense: The righteousness of God by faith is revealed in it, in order to faith. The apostle was not ashamed of the gospel, because a righteousness of God’s appointment, to be obtained by faith, is revealed in it, in order to produce faith in them to whom it is preached. The latter clause, as it is written, The just shall live by faith, were better translated, The just by faith shall live. For although in the Hebrew it is, The just shall live by his faith, the copy of Habakkuk’s prophecy, from which the LXX. took their translation, and the apostle his quotation, certainly wanted the pronoun his. Besides, as the apostle’s design in making this quotation was to prove that Habakkuk wrote concerning a righteousness by faith, either the most ancient and best copies of his prophecy wanted the pronoun, or the passage must be construed and translated thus: The just by his faith, the man who is just by his faith, shall live. For otherwise translated, this quotation is no proof of the apostle’s assertion, that Habakkuk hath written of a righteousness by faith.

Ver. 19. That which may be known of God is manifest in them. According to this translation, the apostle’s meaning is, That the knowledge of God, attainable by the light of nature, was manifest in the minds of the Grecian philosophers. But to say, that knowledge is manifest in any one’s mind, merely because it exists there, is very improper. Knowledge in the mind cannot be manifest, except it be shown either by words or by actions. That the heathen philosophers did not manifest the existence of the knowledge of God in their minds by their actions, is plain from their public institutions of religion, in which they showed the grossest ignorance of God. As little did they manifest that knowledge, in their discourses to the common people. They rather unrighteously concealed it from them, as the apostle affirms, ver. 18. By their writings only, they manifested their knowledge of God to the few who could read them. This, therefore, being the apostle’s meaning to express it, the word is, instead of being translated in, as in our Bible, ought to have been translated among, as in the new translation. That which may be known of God, is manifest among them, for God hath manifested it to them.
PREMONITION TO THE READER.

Ver. 30. For the invisible things of him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; so that they are without excuse. The phrase, from the creation of the world, is ambiguous; for it may signify either by the creation of the world, or since the creation of the world. The latter is the apostle's meaning; because clearly seen by the creation of the world, is precisely the same in sense with the clause which follows it, namely, being understood by the things that are made; which thus becomes a tautology. But, both the ambiguity and the tautology will be removed if the proposition are is translated since, as it is Luke ii. 38. thus: His invisible things, even his eternal power and Godhead, (ἐνν) since the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; so that they are inexcusable, &c.

Ver. 31. Because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful. The apostle's meaning is not, that at what time they knew God, they glorified him not, &c. but that although the legislators and philosophers knew the true God, they neither glorified him as God, by making him the object of the people's worship, nor appointed any public thanksgivings to be offered to him, as the author of all the good things mankind enjoy. These ideas the common translation does not express distinctly; but, in the new version, they are suggested with sufficient plausibility, by rendering the words ἀνάλογα literally, neither gave him thanks, and by giving the participle ἀνάλογα its adverbial sense, thus: Because although they knew God, they did not glorify him as God, neither gave him thanks, but became foolish by their own understandings;—those reasonings by which they pretended to justify polytheism and idolatry, as the most proper religion for the vulgar.

Ver. 33. Who knowing the judgment of God, that they who practice such things are worthy of death, not only do the same but take pleasure in them that do them. The new translation of this verse is more accurate and emphatical: Who though they knew (αὐτά) the law of God, that they who practice such things are worthy of death, not only do, but even are well pleased with those who practise them. The heathen legislators, instead of punishing, were well pleased with their people when they practised the enormities mentioned in the preceding part of this chapter.

There are other variations in the new translation of this chapter, by which it is brought more close to the original than the version in common use: but it is needless to mention them, as the examples produced may suffice to show, that even the smallest alterations in the translation, when conformable to the original, make a great change in the meaning of the passages, and in the sense. In every epistle there are many of much greater magnitude than those in the first chapter to the Romans. But there is no occasion to shew this by examples. They will strike the reader at first sight. Neither is it necessary here to point out, in what respects they alter the meaning of the passages where they are introduced. In the notes, the propriety of many of them is sufficiently illustrated; and for the rest, they will remain understood. The example is the learned by their exact agreement with the original.

By this time the reader no doubt understands, that the alterations and corrections, concerning which so much has been said in this Premonition, are those which, in the following translation, are marked in the English version commonly used. But the principles on which these alterations are founded have been explained at great length in different parts of the General Preface; no further information concerning them is requisite, except to put the reader in mind, that they consist in the following particulars:—1. In substituting modern English words and phrases in place of such as are now become obsolete. —2. In correcting the language of the common version, where it is ungrammatical.—3. In rejecting ambiguous expressions, of which there are many in our English Bible.—4. In placing the words of the translation in the order which the corresponding words hold in the original, as often as either the meaning or the perspicuity of any passage depends on that order.—5. In supplying the elliptical expressions properly; and, for the most part, either from what goes before, or from what follows in the text.—6. In excluding all such words and clauses as have been added by our translators unnecessarily. Of this kind there are a number in their version, which hurt the sense.—7. In accurately marking those words, which in the common translation are added to the text, without being marked as added; but which being retained in that sense, it was fit to distinguish them from the original words, that the reader may judge of their propriety.—8. In rightly construing the Greek text, where it requires to be construed; and in translating the passages according to that right construction.—9. In translating the Greek words and phrases according to their true literal meaning, both where they have been mistranslated, and where they have been paraphrased; because, in general, the literal will be found to agree better with the context, and to be more emplomatic and beautiful than any free translation whatever.—10. In not varying the translation of the same words and phrases in the same sentence, unless they are evidently used in different senses; a rule which our translators have often transgressed, to the darkening of the meaning of many passages.—11. In altering the pointing of some sentences, for the purpose of rendering their meaning more consonant to the context.—12. In translating the Greek particles properly, according to that variety of meaning in which they are used by the sacred writers.

The corrections comprehended under this last class are so numerous, and, though minute, make such a change in the sense of the apostolical writings, that any version, in which the Greek particles are properly translated, may well be accounted new. For it is certain, as was observed before, from B. Lowth, that upon the right rendering of the connective parts of sentences, depends the relation which the different members of the discourse have to each other; and that, by the mutual relation of these members, the train of thought, the course of reasoning, and the whole progress of the mind in continued discourse, are laid open. Accordingly it will be found, that, in the following translation, the scheme of the apostle's reasoning is oftentimes entirely changed, from what it appears to be in the common version, merely by giving the particles their proper signification. But, if the alterations comprehended under one class only, make such a change in the train of the apostle's reasonings as to entitle this to the appellation of a New Translation, the numerous corrections comprehended under the other classes, must set it at a still greater distance from the common version, and fully justify the author in calling it A New Translation from the Original, of all the Apostles' Epistles.

It only remains to request the learned reader, to examine the translation of those epistles, the commentary, and the notes, all now submitted to the public, by the principles laid down in the General Preface, and to judge of the whole with that candour, which is due to an attempt sincerely meant to exhibit the divinely inspired writings in the genuine simplicity of their meaning, that, being rightly understood, they may not be applied, as they sometimes have been, for supporting opinions destructive of piety and morality.

N. B. The Numbers in the New Translation, following the Greek words, mark the paragraphs of Essay IV, where the translation of the word is supported by proper proofs.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I. 1 Paul a servant of Jesus Christ, a called apostle, separated to the gospel of God,

2 Which he promised before, by his prophets, in the holy scriptures,

3 Concerning his Son, who was born of the seed of David, with respect to the flesh,

4 But was declared the Son of God with power; with respect to the spirit of holiness, by his resurrection FROM the dead:

EVEN Jesus Christ our Lord.

5 (Acts, 121.) From whom we have received grace and apostleship, in order to the obedience of the Gentiles, (long) on account of his name;

6 Among whom are also ye, the called of Jesus Christ:

7 To all who are in Rome, to the beloved of God, to the called, to the saints: grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Ver. 1.—1. Paul a servant.—The original word δουλεύω, properly signifies a slave. Here it is a name of honour: For in the East the chief ministers of kings were called δουλεύω, slaves. In this sense, Moses is called ἡγεμόνας ἡλικίας, the slave or servant of God, Josh. i. 1. This honourable name, therefore, denotes the high authority which Paul possessed in the kingdom of Christ, as one of his chief ministers.

2. A called apostle.—The name apostle was given to different orders of men, Rom. xvi. 7, note 4. But, in its highest sense, it was appropriated to the teachers, whom Christ appointed to be with him, Matt. xii. 18; and whose after resurrection, he sent forth to preach the gospel. See Phil. i. 11, etc.

3. Separated to the gospel of God.—We are told, Acts xi. 2, that 'the Holy Ghost said, separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work wherewith I have called them.' But this being nothing but a separation of Paul from the teachers at Antich, to go and preach to the Gentiles;—the higher separation, mentioned Gal. i. 15, is here meant.

4. Gospel of God.—See Gal. ii. 16, note 1. The gospel is said to be God's because it is a good news from God;—than which a greater commendation of the gospel cannot be conceived.

Ver. 2. Which he promised before, by his prophets, &c.—The promise in the scriptures, that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, is taken notice of by the apostle, to convince the unbelieving Jews, that, by preaching to the Gentiles, Paul did not contradict, but fulfilled the ancient revelations.

Concerning his Son.—The gospel is good news from God, concerning the coming of his Son to save the world. Wherefore the Son of God is the subject of the gospel, as well as the subject of the promise. See Acts xii. 8, note 1. The gospel is good news from God, concerning the coming of his Son to save the world: Wherefore the Son of God is the subject of the gospel, as well as the subject of the promise. See Acts xii. 8, note 1.

—See Acts, 121. Acts, sometimes denotes the human body, 1 Cor. vii. 14, sometimes the human mind, Rom. vii. 1. Cor. vii. 7, and sometimes the whole man, John iii. 6. Here, being opposed to the spirit of holiness, it signifies our Lord's body. For it cannot be doubted that he derived his human soul from his mother, because that would imply the divinity of the soul of the parent. But, in his note on this verse, supposing that the world ἐν συναγωγής denotes the submission of our Lord's body, and the υποστάσεις of Mary's body, and formed it into a body for our Lord. He adds, that the ancients urged this text against Valentimian, Marcion, and the rest, none of whom affirmed, that our Lord's body was only imaginary; others, that it was formed of celestial matter, and sent into the body of his mother from heaven. But although the apostle, in this place, speaks only of our Lord's body, it does not follow, that he had an actual human nature but a body, the passages in which he is called a man, and the man Jesus Christ, and our Lord Jesus Christ, and in which his sufferings are described, imply that he had a real human soul also.

Ver. 4. 1. Declared.—διασασθήσασα, the original word, signifies to fix the boundaries of a thing, consequently, to make it appear what it is.

2. With respect to the flesh.—Locke understands this of the miraculous power, described Eph. ii. 19, 20, whereby Jesus was raised from the dead. I rather think respect of the soul of the body, by which he was demonstrated to be the Son of God.

3. By his resurrection from the dead.—Here I have supplied the pronoun kai, because the scope of the reasoning requires it to be supplied. Jesus being put to death as a blasphemer, for calling himself Christ the Son of the blessed God, would not have raised him from the dead if he had been an impostor; especially as he had often foretold his own resurrection, and appealed to it as a proof of his being the Son of God, John v. 25. His resurrection therefore was a public testimony, borne by God himself, to the truth of our Lord's pretensions, which put the matter beyond all doubt. See Heb. i. 5, note 1.

Ver. 5. From whom we have received grace and apostleship.—That is, the grace or favour of apostleship. See Gal. ii. 9, Eph. iii. 2, where the apostolic office is said grace. Or, if grace and apostleship are taken separately, apostleship signifies the office, and grace the supernatural endowments bestowed on Paul, to fit him for that office.

2. In order to the obedience of faith.—Either obedience from a principle of faith, or faith itself, called obedience simply, chap. xvi. 15.

3. On account of his name.—Name here signifies the character of Christ, as the Son of God and Saviour of the world. This name Paul was appointed to bear or publish before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel, Acts ix. 15. And it is so account of this name, or character, that all men are bound to obey him. See ver. 1. Unto all who are in Rome, chap. vii. 18. The apostle has been taught to persuade the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles to embrace the gospel, as exhibiting the only effectual method, not only of introducing the gospel into the world, but of the salvation of the individual, of his regeneration, and of his introduction into the church of Christ. See ver. 13, 14, 15.

See ver. 13, 14, 15.
9 (παρεμεία.) And first, I thank my God through Jesus Christ, on account of all of you, for your faith in Jesus Christ is so conspicuous, that it is spoken of throughout the whole Roman empire.

9 For God is my witness, whom with my spirit I serve in the gospel of his Son, that continually I make mention of you.

10 Always in my prayers, requesting that by some means, now at length, I may have a prosperous journey to Jerusalem, by the will of God, to come to you.

11 For I greatly desire to see you, that I may impart to you some spiritual gift, in order that ye may be established.

12 And this is proposed, that I may be comforted together with you, (καθώς) through the mutual faith both of you and me.

13 Now, brethren, I would not have you ignorant, that oftentimes I purposed to come to you, (λογίζομαι) and indeed I was hindered, (καὶ ἐπιφύλαξα) Romans xvi. 22.) that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among the other Gentiles.

14 I am a debtor, both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, both to the learned and to the ignorant.

15 Therefore, I am willing, according to my ability, to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome.

16 For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God for salvation, to every one who believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

17 For the righteousness of God, (ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ) is revealed in it, (ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ) in order to faith, (ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ) as it is written, (τὸ γραφεῖν) (Hab. ii. 4.) But the wisdom of the wise, is foolishness, and the knowledge of the learned, is stupidity.

18 But the word of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, but to us who are saved, it is the power of God.

19 For it is written, (Ἰδοὺ ὁ ἄνθρωπος ὁ δικαιὸς ἐν πίστει, κύριε ἐν ἐρμοῖς) (Rom. xiv. 23.) But we believe that he is the propitiation through faith, and this is the glory of the Gentiles.

20 And therefore, we preach, and not ourselves; for the gospel of God is the power of God, for salvation to every one who believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

21 And this I propose, that I may be comforted together with you, (καθώς) through the mutual faith both of you and me.

22 Now, brethren, lest ye should be surprised, that I have preached to you in the name of Jesus Christ, for all of you.

23 And now, brethren, I was not at all ignorant that you have been hindered to come to me.

24 For this I am not ashamed of the gospel, (ἐφ' ἑαυτόν ἐστιν) but I am not ashamed of the gospel, (ἐφ' ἑαυτόν ἐστιν) because it is the power of God, (καὶ ἐκ τῆς δύναμεως τοῦ Θεοῦ) for salvation to every one who believeth, (καὶ ἐκ τῆς δύναμεως τοῦ Θεοῦ) to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.
(τοῦτον ὡς πρῶτον) the just by faith, shall live.\(^{19}\) 18 (p. 94.) Besides, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, (see Titus ii. 12, note), and unrighteousness\(^{2}\) of men, (αὐθεντικῶν) who confine the truth (οὗ, 165,) by unrighteousness.\(^{4}\)

19 Because that which may be known\(^{1}\) of God, is manifest (οὗ, 172,) among them,\(^{3}\) for God (αισθητὸς) hath manifested it to them.\(^{8}\)

20 For his invisible things,\(^{1}\) even his eternal power,\(^{2}\) and Godhead,\(^{4}\) since the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made:\(^{1}\) (κατ' τουτο, 154,) so that they are inexcusable,—

21 (αὐθεντικῶν, αὐθεντικῶν.) Because, though they knew God, they did not glorify him as God,\(^{3}\) it is preached. And to this righteousness the Jews cannot object, since it is written, But the just by faith, shall live.

18 Of this crime, all the Greek legislators, statesmen, and philosophers, have been guilty: Because that which may be known of God, is known among them; for God hath manifested it to them, by his works of creation.\(^{20}\)

20 For his invisible attributes, even his eternal power and Godhead, though not discernible by the eye of the body, ever since the creation of the world, are clearly seen by the eye of men's mind, being understood by the things which he hath made. —the apostle means that the Greek legislators and philosophers were inexcusable,—

21 Because, though they knew God, they did not glorify him as God, by teaching the people what they knew concerning him; divorced. See Euseb. Prayor. Evang. lib. xi. c. 9. And in his Tim. he says expressly, "It is neither easy to find the Parents of the Universe, nor safe to discover them to the vulgar, when found." The same conduct was observed by Seneca, as Augustine hath proved from his writings. De Civ. Dei, lib. vi. c. 16, (see 49.) to whom, together with the philosophers' assertions concerning the nature of the gods, inconsistent with the established established.

1. That which may be known of God, is his existence, his unity, his power, his wisdom, his goodness, and his righteous government of the world, called his invisible things, ver. 20. 2. Is manifested among them. —The apostle's assertion is confirmed by the writings of the philosophers still remaining. See ver. 21, note 1.

25. —For his invisible things.—The being and perfections of God are called his eternal things, in opposition to the heathen deities, who being all corporal, their being and attributes were things visible.

2. Even his eternal power and Godhead. —The true God being eternal, is thereby distinguished from the fictitious gods of the heathen, who all had a beginning; the most ancient of them having come out of chaos, and their birth being sung by the heathen poets. Of the particular attributes of God, the apostle mentions only his power, because the effects of the divine power are what first strike the senses of men, and lead them most directly to the acknowledgment of a deity.

3. And Godhead. —Αἰσθητὸς. This denotes every thing comprehended in the idea of God; namely, his unity, incorporeity, immutability, knowledge, wisdom, justice, &c. And, which, together with God's eternal power, the apostle affirms, every intelligent person may understand by the things that are made.

4. Since the creation of the world are clearly seen. —Eἰδολοκτονοῦντες. The present tense, are seen, denotes the continuance. The constitution of the being and perfections of God, by the works of creation from the beginning, agreeably to Psalm x. 5. The apostle, ver. 11, declares the glory of the Lord. Accordingly, the apostle does not use the proposition ἐπὶ θείου, but ἐπὶ θεόν, of, or ever since the creation.

8. Being understood by the things that are made. —In this mundane system every thing is so formed, that to the plants among the vulgar, God himself appears to be the author of all the operations of nature. But who they who have a partial knowledge of what is called natural philosophy, have, from the discovery of some accidental causes, been led to fancy, that the whole system may be accounted for without the intervention of a deity. Thus the apostle calls, ver. 21, "becoming gods by their own reasonings. Those, however, who have made the greatest advances in true philosophy, know, that second causes, properly speaking, are no causes, because they have no efficacy in themselves, but are set in motion by God. And thus the most perfect philosophy always ends, where the natural sense of mankind begins.

21. —Because, though they knew God. —For this translation, see Esa. iv. 16. The writings of Plato, Xenophon, Plutarch, Cicero, and other philosophers, which are mentioned in the last verse, are quoted from the writings of Plato, the philosopher, who, in the services of the state, upheld the established religion. Of the same crime the magistrates and philosophers were likewise guilty, who, in their debt, and unrighteousness, the Jews were the object of the people's worship, but unrighteous and ungodly, and unjustly worshipped him publicly, neither did they declare him to the people, that they might worship him. Concerning Socrates, see notes, on ver. 21. Note 1. And with respect to Plato, he held, that the knowledge of the one God was not to be neither did they give him thanks, but by their own imaginations, and their worship of the unprofitable sea.

23 For they were foolish, and became foolish by their own imaginations, and their unprofitable sea. Therefore also God delivered them over to uncleanness, that they might dishonour their own bodies between themselves.

25 Who changed the truth of God into unrighteousness, and worshipped, and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.

26 For this God delivered them, that they should have reprobation, and that they should dishonour him, that they might be to shame and everlasting damnation. For both the invisible things of him, from the creation of the world, being made manifest, so that it may be understood clearly, that no man is excusable, because that God has made known to them all things that are without, and that things which are seen by them are not sealed by them.

27 For, seeing that God has given them up to unrighteousness, they have ceased to serve the Lord God, and to worship the creature, which they have more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.
over to shameful passions: for even their females changed the natural use into what is contrary to nature.

27. In like manner also, the males, leaving the natural use of the female, burned with their lust towards another, males with males working out which that is shameful, and selvin themselves that recompense of their error which was fit.

28. And as they did not approve of holding God with acknowledgment, God delivered them over to an unapproving mind, to work those things which are not suitable:

29. Being filled with all injustice, fickleness, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, strife, cunning, noise. For all these things were contrary to nature, as we have shewed. See also Lev. xxiii. 32.

30. Revilers, haters of God, insolent, proud, punishment inflicted by God on the Greek legislators, philosophers, and priests, for having established polytheism and idolatry as the religion which they represented the people as also desert of God, and given up to all manner of wickedness, on account of the great crime. And the punishment was just, because it was the extreme propensity of the people to various polytheism, and because the legislators in fancy that polytheism and idolatry was the only religion proper for them. So that being possessed to the same of their sects, they justly shared in their punishment.

31. And they were so, to use their females, changed the natural use:—The women of Lesbos are said by ancient authors to have been, many of them, guilty of this vice. They were called Trikides. Marial inscribes the 9th epigram of his list, that there was not a woman of that character named Muse. See also Lev. xxiii. 32.

32. Ver. 29—1. Insensible of the shocking crimes of the Greeks committing the uncleanness which he mentions, but of their lawyers authorizing these views by their public institutions of religion, by their absurd doctrine, and by their own practice. With respect to fickleness, the heathen actually made it a part of the worship of their deities. And Corinth, for example, as Tholus informs us, lib. viii. p. 661. there was a temple of Venus, where more than a thousand courtesans (the gift of various persons of both sexes) prostituted themselves in honour of the goddess; and that thus the city was crowded, and because wealthy. In the court of the temple of Venus at Athens, there were trust placed under the trees for the same sort of purpose. Lucian. That. Amores—And 2 Mac. 6, we are told, the temple was filled with riot and revelling by the Gentiles, who had bribed him, and had to do with women in the circuit of the holy places. With respect to socidom, it is not so commonly known that it was practiced by the heathens as a part of their religious worship; yet in the history which is given of Jonah's endeavor to destroy idolatry, there is direct evidence of Z. Kings xlii. 7. And he broke down the altars of the heathen, that were by the house of the Lord. That the Greek philosophers of the greatest reputation were guilty not only of libertinism, but even of sodomy, is affirmed by ancient authors of good reputation. With the latter crime Tertullian and others have charged Socrates himself, in passages of his writings quoted by Eustis. The same charge Athenus, a heathen writer, hath brought against him. D'Anmarch, lib. iii. n. 14. He does not speak of Lucian, who, in many passages of his writings, hath directly accused Socrates of sodomy, but only that we are not informed, however, that those learned moderns have endeavoured to clear Socrates from that accusation, by observing, that neither Aristophanes, in his comedy of the Clouds, written on purpose to discredit Socrates, nor his accusers at his trial, have observed any thing tending to impeach him on that head; and that it is not probable Socrates would have disavowed his disciples from unclean love, as we know he did, (Ke don. Memoir, lib. i. c. 2, 3, if he had been addicted to it himself. But allowing the above mentioned accusations to be cabalistical, what shall we say of the confession this great philosopher had given to Theodotus, a noted courtezan in the city of Athens, which Xenophon has given an account! Mem. lib. iii. c. 11. On that occasion, the crime, in presence of two of his disciples, advised the prostitute to employ persons to bring lovers to her, and taught her the most artful methods of captivating their passions, and of begetting her favor; she then capable of effectually retaining them in her religion; but in this verse, and what follows, he represents the people as also desert of God, and given up to all manner of wickedness, on account of the great crime. And the punishment was just, because it was the extreme propensity of the people to various polytheism, and because the legislators in fancy that polytheism and idolatry was the only religion proper for them. So that being possessed to the same of their sects, they justly shared in their punishment.

33. And as the Grecian legislators and philosophers did not approve of holding the knowledge of God with that worship which is due to him, God delivered them and their people over to a dead conscience, so that they practiced habitually those things which are not suitable to human nature;—Being not slightly tinctured, but filled with every kind of injustice, uncleanness, treachery, covetousness, malicious dealing; full of envy, murder, strife, cunning, habitual bad disposition, whispering evil of their neighbors. See also Lev. xxiii. 32.

34. Revilers, haters of God on account of his purity, insolent persons in vindication of it, and mentioning Q. Catulus, a principal man in the city, who was in love with Roscius. Lastly, Virgil's second eclogue is founded wholly on this unnatural love. These things I should not have brought into the reader's view, had it not been to prove the truth of the apostle's charge that the abominable crimes mentioned by him, were not prohibited either by the religion or by the laws of the heathen. For the contrary, were authorized by both, and avowedly practiced by men of the first characters in the heathen world. Hence, the apostle, the heathen, the philosophers, and the priests, notwithstanding they enjoyed the light of nature, illuminated by science, and addicted themselves to the most abominable uncleanness, may, when their pictures were impressed on their minds, in order to bring them to more holy practice.

35. That some practicing Christianity are guilty of the crimes of which we have been speaking, is true. But it is equally true, that their religion does not, like the religion of the heathen, encourage them in their crimes, but detests them, by denouncing, in the most direct terms, the heaviest wrath of God against all who are guilty of them. Besides, the gospel, by its divine light, hath led the nations to correct their civil laws; so that in every Christian country these enormities are prohibited, and when discovered, are punished with the greatest severity. The gospel, therefore, hath made us far more knowing, and, in a manner, more virtuous, than the most enlightened and most polished of the heathen nations were formerly.

36. Receiving in themselves the recompense of their errors. That is, of their uncleanness, named error, because it was the greatest and most pernicious of all errors. It is named error, also, 2 Pet. ii. 22.

37. Ver. 29—1. And as (καθά τό δήμαρχον) they did not approve. So the word δήμαρχος may be translated; for it signifies to try men, in order to distinguish the good from the bad; consequentiy, to approve what is found good after trial. See Rom. v. 4, note.

38. Of holding God with acknowledgment. That is, did not approve of holding God as the object of the people's acknowledgment or worship, but approved of the worship of gods, and of images, as more proper for the vulgar; and on that account substituted God, in place of the pure spiritual worship, which was true God, and established by law. Therefore God gave them up to an ungodly mind, &c. According to them, 'to have God acknowledged is to acknowledge God; as hodie in honore, in the same with omnissure.

39. To an unapproving mind. The original words, ἠξιώματος, denote a mind not capable of discerning and approving what is good, either in principle or practice; an ingenuous mind, a mind void of all knowledge and skill of virtue. Men of this stamp are called ἱππόκρατος, without feeling. Eph. iv. 29.

40. To work those things. That is, when he spoke (καθά τό δήμαρχον) here, as in many other passages, denotes the habit of doing a thing. See Rom. v. 4. note.

41. Being filled with wickedness. — Herpes, is a disposition to injure others by craft. Hence the devil is called έρπετος, the wicked one, by way of eminence. See 2 Cor. x. 4.

42. Maliciousness. — Rovrio, is a disposition injurious to others, from ill-will to them.

43. Bad disposition. — Κακοδαμία, according to Aristotle, is a disposition to take every thing in the worst possible light. Eratosthenes charged Herodotus in his book iii. ver. 161 ἠξιώματος, concerning the evil disposition of Herodotus. — Eustis thinks this word denotes 'ερπετος, a meddlesome man.

44. Whispers of ill-will, are those who secretly speak evil of persons when they are present. See Rom. v. 21. — Revilers. — Κακοδαμοταί, as distinguished from vili dules persons are persons who speak evil of others that are in their company about them, and speaking bad words of them. This word denotes persons who commit injuries with violence, or who oppress others by force.
boasters, inventors of unlawful pleasures, disobedient to parents; with natural affection, implacable, unmerciful;

23. Who (οὐ μὴν τό ἐκείνον) though they knew the law of God, that they who practice such things are worthy of death; not only do them, but even are well pleased with those who practice them. 3

3. Proud—are persons elated on account of their fortune, or station, or office. 4. Boasters—εὐφράσται, are persons who assume to themselves the reputation of qualities which they do not possess. Ver. 4. Avaricious, are persons who, not forming just judgments of things, act improperly. 5. Covenant-breakers—ἀναληπτέος. The Greeks expressed the making of covenants by the word συνεκτικός. 6. Without natural affection—In this the apostle seems to have had the Stoics in his eye, who recommended their apathy, or free-wheeling, as the highest pitch of virtue, and who reckoned the affection between parents and children, husbands and wives, and the like, among the vices. But their tenets are here condemned with the greatest severity; for the very least men need the goodness of affection and passion, to move them to what is good; and God hath implanted these in our nature, for this very purpose. 7. But think the apostle is in this condemned the unnatural complexion of the Greeks, who exposed their children; and the reason, that in some states they were allowed by the laws to do so. 8. Implacable—from ἀναληπτέος, a covenant, is used to signify irreconcilable, because when these covenants made their nations, by which they bound themselves to lay aside their enemies, they retaliated by a sacrifice on which they poured a libation, after drinking a part of it themselves.

CHAPTER II.

Having shown that the Gentiles could not entertain the least hope of salvation, according to the tenor of the law of nature, it was next to be considered, Whether the law of Moses gave the Jews any better hope. This inquiry the apostle managed with great address. Well knowing, that in sketching his description of the manner and spirit of the Greeks, the Jews would pronounce them worthy of damnation, he suddenly turned his discourse to the Jews, telling them, that they who passed such a judgment on the Gentiles, were themselves to be punished, if they were saved through the law of Moses; because, by condemning the Gentiles, they virtually condemned themselves, who, being guilty of the very same crimes, were thereby placed under the curse of Moses, ver. 1. And, to enforce his argument, the apostle observed, that God's sentence of condemnation, passed in the course of the law, upon them who commit such things, is known by all to be according to truth, ver. 2. But although every Jew was condemned by the curse of the law of Moses, they all expected salvation, on account of their being Abraham's children, Matt. iii. 5. 6. and of their enjoying the benefit of revelation, Rom. ii. 19. Wherefore, to shew them the vanity of that hope, the apostle proposed the following question: Dost thou, who condemnst the Gentiles for their crimes, and yet committest the same thyself, think that thou shalt escape the righteous sentence of God, and be delivered in the sense of the law of Moses, merely because thou art a son of Abraham, and a member of God's visible church? ver. 3. By entertaining such a notion, thou judgest an oath of thy privilege, which are bestowed on thee, not to make sinning more safe to thee than to others, but to lead thee to repentance, ver. 4. These privileges, therefore, instead of making thy salvation sure, if abused by thy obdurate heart, will make thy punishment greater in the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, ver. 5.

Having mentioned the general judgment, the apostle, for the instruction of the Jews, and of all who, like them, expect salvation because they are favoured with revelation, discussed at large concerning future retributions. And first of all shew them, from the natural character of God, that rewards and punishments will be dispensed at the judgment to every man, not according to the outward privileges and advantages which he enjoys in this life, nor according to the flattering opinion which he entertains of himself, but 'according to his works,' ver. 6. More particularly, to them who, by perseverance in well doing, earnestly seek glory, honour, and immortality, God will render eternal life, ver. 7. But them who obey unrighteousness, he will punisli with indignation and wrath, ver. 8. Last; however, the Jews might have imagined, from the apostle's speaking of a state of eternal life, ver. 7. that he spake of the members of the visible church of God only, and that no others are to have eternal life, he repeated his account of the judgment in such terms as to make his readers sensible that he is speaking of men of all nations and religions: 'Affliction and anguish shall come upon every soul of man who worketh evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Greek,' ver. 9. 10. But glory, honour, and peace shall be to every one who worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek,' ver. 10. For as Jew and Greek is a division which comprehends all mankind, there can be no doubt of the apostle's intention to declare, on the one hand, that every impenitent sinner, and among the rest the impenitent members of God's visible church, shall assuredly be punished; and, on the other, that all who have wrought good, whether they be Jews, or heathens, or Christians, shall have glory, honour, and peace, that is, eternal life, rendered to them. 'Because with God there is no respect of persons,' ver. 11. His account of the judgment, the apostle concludes in this place with great propriety, not only for the reason already mentioned, but lest the heathen philosophers and Jewish scribes, from his teaching that no man can be saved either by the law of nature or by the law of Moses, might have suspected it to be his opinion, that all are to be condemned who have not the gospel revelation; and that such good works as Jews and heathens perform, who are out of the Christian church, will be of no use to them at the last. For by declaring that glory and peace shall come not only upon such Jews, but upon such Greeks, as have wrought good, he hath taught that salvation is not confined to them who have enjoyed revelation; that in all nations there are men who fear God, and work righteousness; and that, at the judgment, such shall have the benefit of the method of salvation, established at the fall and revealed in the gospel, extended to them, though it was not discovered to them during their lifetime on earth.

Moreover, because the Jews really held the unchallengeable opinion, falsely imputed to the apostle, consigning to damnation all who had not the Mosaic revelation, the apostle assured them, that the revealed law of God is not the rule by which the heathens are to be judged; "As many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law:" without being judged by any revealed law. So that in punishing them, God will consider those hindrances of their virtues, and those alleviations of their sins, which resulted from the imperfection of the dispensation under which they were placed, and will make proper allowances; "Whereas all who have sinned under a revealed law, shall be judged by that law; the aggravations of their sins, resulting from the advantages they enjoyed, will be taken into the account, and punished, ver. 12. And with respect to men's being saved, because they have enjoyed an external revelation, the apostle expressly declared, that "not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified," ver. 13. He therefore concluded, that when the Gentiles, who have not a revealed law, do, by the guidance of natural reason, the works enjoined by that law, these men furnish a law to themselves, by which they must direct themselves, ver. 14. and show that there is a law of God written in their hearts, to which their reason and conscience bear witness, ver. 15.; which, if they obey sincerely, they shall obtain eternal life in the day when God will judge the hidden things of men, namely, their inward dispositions, by Jesus Christ, according to the gospel which Paul everywhere preached, ver. 16.

Here let it be observed, first, That, by making 'the doing of law,' ver. 13. as far as our imperfections will admit, necessary to justification, the apostle hath guarded his readers against mistaking the doctrine he was about to deliver, chap. iii. 28. 'That by faith man is justified, without works of law.' For if he had not expressly declared, that the doing of law to a certain degree is necessary, even when men are justified freely through Christ, it might have been objected, that he made void their obligation to do good works altogether.—Further, by declaring, at the conclusion of his account of the judgment, that in punishing the wicked, and rewarding the righteous, both among the Jews and Greeks, God will proceed 'according to his Gospel,' the apostle hath taught us two things of great importance. The first is, that in judging men God will not proceed according to the tenor, either of the law of nature or of the law of Moses, by inquiring after an obedience absolutely perfect; because, according to that method of judgment, no one could be acquitted. 'But he will judge their hidden things,' their inward frame of mind, 'according to the gospel;' that is, he will examine, whether in the present life men have been guided by a sincere desire to know and to do his will, in whatever manner it was manifested to them. And in whomsoever such a faith is found, he will count it for righteousness, and reward it, whether the person who possessed it were a Gentile, a Jew, or a Christian.—The second thing taught in this declaration is, that wicked men, of all nations, shall be punished according to the demerit of their sins, while the righteous shall be rewarded, not on account of the merit of their good works, but through the mere favour of God, who, for the sake of Christ, will accept their spirit of faith, as if it were a perfect righteousness. For these being the doctrines which Paul everywhere preached, they are his gospel, according to which men are to be judged.

In the next place, to show the unbelieving Jews the vanity of placing their hope of salvation on God's having chosen them for his people, and on his having given them the law, the apostle inquired what efficacy the law of Moses, with their other privileges as the people of God, had had in leading the men of rank and learning among the Jews to a right practice. Now, that he might not seem to undervalue their privileges as Jews, he enumerated them particularly: 'Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law,' &c. ver. 17-20.—Then asked the doctors and scribes, how it came to pass that, notwithstanding they had the express image of knowledge and truth in the law, and had set themselves up as guides of the blind Gentiles, they had not so instructed themselves, as to refrain from breaking the law in the many flagrant instances which he mentioned, ver. 20-23.—At the same time, that he might not charge the Jews with those gross immoralities without foundation, he quoted passages from their own scriptures, which declare, that the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles through the wickedness of the Jewish rulers and scribes, ver. 24.—Wherefore, seeing not the hearers of the law, but the doers of it, shall be justified, the men of rank and learning among the Jews, being so wicked, had not the least ground to expect salvation through the law, but were under a necessity of seeking justification through faith: and the Gentiles were under no obligation to be guided, in the interpretation of the revelations of God, (see ver. 19.) by persons whose practice was so contrary to the precepts of revelation.

In the third place, because the Jews expected salvation on account of their being the children of Abraham and members of God's covenant, and gloated in their circumcision as the sign of that covenant, and of their descent from Abraham, the apostle told them, that their circumcision, though a proof of their descent from Abraham, and of their relation to God as his people, would not profit them if they were breakers of the law; but, in that case, they would be in no better a condition than the uncircumcised Gentiles, ver. 25.—Whereas, if the Gentiles are found to have performed the good works enjoined by the law of God given to the Jews, their uncircumcision will be no obstacle to their salvation, ver. 26.—Consequently, they will put the Jews to shame, by obtaining that justification which shall be denied to the Jews, ver. 27.—For he is not a Jew, or son of Abraham, and heir of the promises, who is so by descent and profession only, ver. 28; but he is a son of Abraham, and an heir of the promises, in their highest meaning, whatever his pedigree or profession of religion may be, who is Abraham's son in the temper of his mind: and true circumcision is that of the heart, which is made by cutting off evil affections, according to the spirit, and not according to the letter of the law of circumcision. And where that circumcision was found, though such a person might not receive praise from the Jews, as one of the people of God, he shall assuredly receive it from God at the judgment, who will own him as one of his people, by conferring upon him the blessings promised to Abraham, and to his seed, ver. 29.

Reader, behold and admire the benignity and impartiality of the divine government, as set forth in the gospel. At the judgment, God will render to every man according to his works, without showing more favour to those who have enjoyed revelation, than to those who, in the exercise of his sovereignty, have been denied that favour. In other words, the enjoyment of revelation will not be imputed to any man for merit, nor the want of it be considered as a fault; but, in judging men, God most righteous will consider the advantages and disadvantages which result from the nature of the dispensation under which they lived, and will pass sentence upon them accordingly. And therefore, if, at the judgment, some who have not enjoyed revelation are found to have feared God, and wrought righteousness, notwithstanding the disadvantages they laboured under, he will not deny them those rewards, which persons in more happy circumstances have reason to expect from his mercy in Christ.

To this liberal doctrine it hath been objected,

1. That no works being good, but such as proceeded from faith, none of the heathens will be found at the judgment to have wrought good, as they had no opportunity to believe the revelations of God; consequently, the apostle’s doctrine, that glory, honour, and peace, shall be to every one who worketh good, is not to be understood of the heathens, but must be limited to such Jews and Greeks as have enjoyed the benefit of an external revelation.

But the answer is, Faith does not consist in the belief of particular doctrines, (See Rom. iii. 28. note 1.), far less in the belief of doctrines which men never had an opportunity of knowing; but in such an earnest desire to know and do the will of God, as leads them conscientiously to use such means as they have, for gaining the knowledge of his will, and for doing it when found. Of this kind was Abraham’s faith. (See Rom. iv. 3. note 1.) And inasmuch as the influences of the Spirit of God are not confined to them who enjoy revelation, but are promised in the gracious covenant made with mankind at the fall to all who are sincere, a heathen by these influences may attain the faith just now described, and thereby may please God.

For faith is more a work of the heart, than of the understanding. So our apostle teaches, Rom. x. 10.

'With the heart, we believe unto righteousness.' So that although the persons to whom revelation is denied, may not have the same objects of belief with those who enjoy revelation, they may have the same spirit of faith, as it is termed, 2 Cor. iv. 13. Of this Abraham, Rahab, the centurion, whose son Christ healed, the Ethiopian eunuch, and Cornelius, are examples; for in uncircumcision they exercised such faith as was acceptable to God. And therefore Peter did not scruple to say, Acts x. 38.

'Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but, in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him.' And 1 Pet. l. 17. 'The Father delighted with persons, judged according to every man’s work.'

That the pious heathens should have their faith counted to them for righteousness at the judgment, notwithstanding it may have been different in many particulars, and even erroneous, is not unreasonable; provided, in these instances of error, they have used their best endeavours to know the truth, and have not been led by these errors into habitual sin. For, as Mr. Claude observes, in his treatise of self-examination, chap. vii. "When one takes a view of false religions, they seem to make no less impression on the heart of those who are sincere in them, than the true religion does on the hearts of the faithful. In the one and in the other, we see the same good intention, the same zeal, the same readiness to do every thing they believe will tend to the glory of God: they love God, according to the idea they form of him; they worship him in their own way; and through fear of him, they endeavour to live irreproachably among men." Between them, indeed, there is this difference—the conceptions of the one are true, but the notions of the other are in many particulars false; and the service which the one pays to God is a rational service, whereas the worship of the other is mixed with much superstition. However, as the pre-eminence of the one above the other, in point of knowledge and worship, is owing not to the greater rectitude of their disposition, but to the greater favour of God, who hath bestowed on them a more perfect discovery of his will, why should it be thought strange, that God, who is equally related to all his creatures, should, in judging them, consider the circumstances of each, and make the proper allowances, (as the apostle expressly affirms in this chap. ver. 12.); and, bestowed on them, for the sake of Christ, such a degree of happiness as their good disposition makes them capable of enjoying? In short, if the heathens are not to be saved by having their spirit of faith counted to them for righteousness, through Christ, notwithstanding they have lived in false religions, what shall we say concerning the salvation of the various sects of Christians, many of whom, in the articles of their faith, differ from one another, and from truth, almost as widely as they do from some who live and die in paganism?

2. It hath been objected to the salvation of the heathens, that they have not that explicit knowledge of Christ, nor faith in him as the Saviour of the world, which is required in the gospel. But to this I reply—The gospel does not make it necessary to salvation, that a man believe that Christ is God, and a direct faith in him, if they have never had an opportunity of knowing and believing on him. On the contrary, by informing us, that all mankind live at present, and shall hereafter be raised from the dead, through the obedience of Christ, although the greatest part of them know nothing of him, nor of his obedience, the sacred oracles lead us to conclude, that at the general judgment many shall be saved through Christ who till then never heard of him. Besides, is it not as agreeable to justice and goodness to save the pious heathens through Christ, notwithstanding they never heard of him, as it was to condemn all mankind to death, for the sin of Adam, although the greatest part of them never heard of his disobedience? Withal, since at the judgment the ground of the salvation of mankind shall be declared in the hearing of the assembled universe, the discovery of Christ as Saviour will be made to the saved heathens, in time sufficient to lay a foundation for their gratitude and love to him, through all eternity. In fine, if the efficacy of Christ’s obedience does not extend to the saving of the pious heathens, what interpretation can we put on Rom. v. 12-21, where the professed purpose of the apostle’s reasoning is to show, that the effects of Christ’s obedience are greater than the consequences of Adam’s disobedience?

3. To the salvation of the heathens it hath been objected, that if justifying faith consists not so much in the number and extent of the doctrines believed, as in the disposition of the heart to believe, that many who have lived and died in false religions may be saved, what purpose does it serve to give any of mankind the true form of faith and worship by revelation? This objection the apostle himself hath stated in the beginning of chap. iii., and hath answered it very solidly, by shewing, that in the true religion men have many more and better opportunities of cultivating good dispositions, and of being prepared for heaven by the discoveries which revelation makes of spiritual things, than can be had in any false religion; the errors of which, though they may not absolutely extinguish goodness of heart, are certainly great impediments to virtue, if not rather temptations to sin. In short, the true form of religion, instead of being of no use, is the greatest blessing men can enjoy; because, by affording better means of improvement, it enables them to acquire a greater measure of virtue, and a more distinguished reward.

This illustration will not be thought tedious by those who consider the importance of rightly understanding what the gospel teaches concerning the salvation of the heathens. For,
First, To know that this liberal doctrine makes part of the Christian revelation, must give the highest pleasure to every benevolent mind, on account of the glory which will redound to God, from the salvation of so many of the human race, through the coming of his Son into the world.
In the second place, This liberal doctrine puts an end to those specious cavils, whereby the enemies of revelation have endeavoured to discredit the gospel in the eyes of the intelligent. For it can no longer be pretended, that by making faith the means of salvation, the gospel hath consigned all the heathens to damnation. Neither can God be accused of partiality, in conferring the benefit of revelation upon so small a portion of the human race, in the false notion, that the actual knowledge of revelation is necessary to salvation. For although the number of those who have lived without revelation, hath hitherto been much greater than of those who have enjoyed that benefit, no unrighteousness can be imputed to God, since he hath not excluded those from salvation who have been denied revelation, but hath graciously determined, that all in every dispensation, who, by perseverance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, shall obtain eternal life, by having their spirit of faith counted to them for righteousness, through Jesus Christ. Moreover, all the heathens who are condemned, shall be condemned, not because they lived without revelation, but because they have lived in opposition to the law of God written on their hearts. Therefore, the strongest of all the objections with which revelation hath been attacked having no foundation, the gospel ought to be received by every one to whom it is offered, as a discovery from God of the only method in which sinner can be saved; namely, not by a 'righteousness of law,' which in our present state is unsustainable, but by a 'righteousness of faith' counted to us by the more favour of God, on account of the obedience of Christ.

New Translation.
Chap. II. 1 (4. 5.) Wherefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whomsoever thou art who judgeth: for (κατὰ σας, 317.) whilst thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; (κατὰ σας, 90.) because (πρὸς τὸν θεὸν) who judgeth, practiseth alike the thing.
3 (4. 101.) And dost thou judge this, O man, who judgest those who practiseth such things, and yet worketh the same, that thou shalt escape the sentence of God?
4 Or dost thou misrepresent the riches of his goodness and forbearance? and showliness to anger? not knowing that (παρακαλεῖται, 71.) this goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?
5 (4. 106.) Moreover, according to thy obstinacy (παρακαλεῖται, 70.) and impatient heart, thou treasurtest up to thyself wrath, (ἐνάρξις, 3.) against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God;

Commentary.
Chap. II. 1 Since all who practice these crimes are worthy of death, thou art inexcusable, O man, whomsoever thou art, who judgeth, and yet expectest that thyself shall be saved: for whilst thou judgest the Gentiles worthy of death, thou condemnest thyself; because thou who judgest, committest the very same things.
2 Besides, we know that the sentence of God contained in the curse of the law of Moses is agreeable to truth, even when it is pronounced upon the Jews who commit such crimes, and condemns them to death.
3 This being the case, dost thou think, O Jewish man, who condemnest those heathens who commit such sins, and yet committest the same sins thyself, that thou shalt escape the sentence of God because thou art a son of Abraham, and a member of God's visible church?
4 Or dost thou misconstrue the greatness of his goodness, in according to thy own obstinacy and impatient heart, thou hast kept up in store for thyself punishment, to be inflicted on thee in the day of punishment, when there shall be an illustrious display of the righteous judgment of God made before the assembled universe?
5 Who will render to every one, not according to his external privileges, but according to the real nature of his works:

Ver. 1. Wherefore thou art inexcusable. [Here the illative particle ὅποιον is used to introduce a conclusion, not from what goes before, but from something not expressed, the proof of which is to be immediately added. As if the apostle had said, For this reason, O Jewish man, who judgest without excuse, in judging the Gentiles worthy of death, because by that judgement thou condemnest thyself. Accordingly, to show that he was thinking of the judgment when the Jews passed on the Gentiles for their crimes, he immediately adds: For whereas thou judgest the Gentiles worthy of death, thou condemnest thyself, because thou who judgest, committest the same things.] Whibley, in his note on this verse, quotes passages from Josephus, by which it appears that the Jews in his time were guilty of most of the crimes imputed to the Greeks in the first chapter of this epistle.

Ver. 2. Besides, we know that the sentence of God. [The original word ἀνακάλανθος, often signifies a judicial sentence, especially that by which one is convicted in punishment. 2 Tim. xi. 26. Hence it translated condemnation, Luke xxii. 40. 2 Cor. xii. 2; 1 Tim. iii. 6; Jude, ver. 4; and dissertation, Rom. vi. 8; 1 Cor. xi. 29. 34. Wherefore, as in the preceding chapter the apostle had spoken of the law of God written on the hearts of men, whereby they who commit crimes are condemned to death, he concludes with the observation that the sentence of God, 'in this passage, is the curse of the law of Moses,' whereby all the Jews who committed the things which the apostle had to their charge, were condemned to death.

Ver. 3. In according to truth. [It is not only according to justice, but according to the true meaning of God's covenant with the fathers, the promises made to Abraham, and the covenant of the Jewish nation. By this declaration, the apostle reproved the erroneous opinion of the Jews concerning of God's covenant with the fathers, the promises made to Abraham, and the covenant of the Jewish nation. By this declaration, the apostle reproved the erroneous opinion of the Jews concerning the covenant of the fathers. The Jews imagined that Jacob and Isaac were more greatly exalted do not suffer their enemies to escape, so God, highly displeased with the wicked, will assuredly punish them in the severest manner at length.

16. In the day, when God will judge the hidden things of men, by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel.

17. Behold, thou art a Jew, and restest in the law, and boaste'st in God;

18. And knowest his will, and approvest the things that are excellent, being instructed concerning them, by him. But to be wise is to love virtue.

19. And boaste'st that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them who are in darkness,

20. An instructor of the foolish, a teacher of fools. In the law it is written, 'thou shalt do no murder; and if thou shalt be a murderer, thou shalt be condemned.' And thy glory is excellent, and for thy excellency, I am filled with shame and contempt.

21. For such is the proof of this saying, of which you are proud, that the ignorance of God is yours, and that of your mother, too, is yours.

22. Before God and his saints, I charge you that you walk in the way of love, and prove the multitudes of your heart, in the fear of God.

23. For all things are unto you, because it is written, 'all things are thine.' Be ye therefore perfect in the same thing, according to that which is written, 'and see that ye do not make war against the body of Christ.'

24. For neither was the law given for the just, but for the ungodly and sinners, for whom are the commandments, and for whom are the ordinances. But even Christ, as it is written, was made under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, and receive the adoption of sons. The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.
21 Thou then who teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou who preachest, Do not steal—dost thou steal?
22 Thou (1 Sam. 56, 55) who commandest, Do not commit adultery—dost thou commit adultery? Thou who abhorrest idols, (Ezek. xxxvi. 30) dost thou rob temples?
23 Thou who art greatest in the law, by the breaking of the law dishonestest thou God?
24 For, as it was written, (Isa. iii, 5; Ezek. xxxvi. 30), 'The name of God is evil spoken of among the Gentiles through you.'
25 (Psalm xxv. 42, 94). Now circumcision indeed professeth, if thou practise law; but if thou be a transgressor of law, thy circumcision hath become uncircumcision.
26 (Exod. xix, 22.) And if the uncircumcision keepeth the precepts of the law, will not his circumcision be counted for circumcision?
27 And will not the uncircumcision, which by nature fulfillleth the law, judge thee a transgressor of law, though a Jew? (from ver. 25.) by the literal circumcision! (see ver. 26.)
28 For he is not a Jew, who is one inwardly; neither is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh;
29 But he is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter of the law. (Eph. xvi. 67.) Of this man the praise is not from men, but from God.

Spiritual ideas as babes—these titles thou assumest, because thou hast a just representation of religious knowledge and truth in the scriptures.
21 If thy behaviour suitable to those high pretensions? Thou who teachest the Gentiles, why teachest thou not thyself? Thou who preachest to them, Do not steal—dost thou steal?
22 Thou enlightened Jewish doctor, who asperest to the Gentiles, Do not commit adultery—dost thou commit adultery? Thou who abhorrest idols, dost thou rob temples of the tithes destined for the support of the worship of God! as if impious were criminal in heathens, but pardonable in thee.
23 Thou who art greatest in the law, by the breaking of the law dishonestest thou God?
24 For, as it was written, (Isa. iii, 5; Ezek. xxxvi. 30, 'The name of God is evil spoken of among the Gentiles through you.')
25 (Psalm xxv. 42, 94). Now circumcision indeed professeth, if thou practise law; but if thou be a transgressor of law, thy circumcision hath become uncircumcision.
26 (Exod. xix, 22.) And if the uncircumcision keepeth the precepts of the law, will not his circumcision be counted for circumcision?
27 And will not the uncircumcision, which by nature fulfillleth the law, judge thee a transgressor of law, though a Jew? (from ver. 25.) by the literal circumcision! (see ver. 26.)
28 For he is not a Jew, who is one inwardly; neither is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh;
29 But he is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter of the law. (Eph. xvi. 67.) Of this man the praise is not from men, but from God.

Jewish Scriptures. The original word ἱπποτάμωμος, according to Ros. signifies the sketch or outline of thing—the form. But as the Jews are said to have this form in the law, I rather think St. Paul compares the law in a looking-glass, which gives exact images of things, as the apostle James liketh the covering.
Ver. 21. Thou who preachest, Do not steal—dost thou steal?—This and the following are what is spoken to the Rabbies, who were the philosophers and doctors pretended to derive from the law, and had made use of them to their temper and manners; so that what they boasted in the law, and their claims to be the teachers of the Gentiles, were regarded by the Gentiles.
Ver. 22. Dost thou rob temples?—The Jews who defrauded the Gentiles of their tithes are said, Mat. xxi. 8, 'to rob God.'
Ver. 23. Circumcision indeed professeth, if thou practise law.—Xex. vi. 42. Here, as in many other passages, the apostle speaks to the thoughts of his Jewish readers. They fancied that circumcision, by showing that they were descended from Abraham, and were members of God's covenant, would ensure their salvation, though they were ever so wicked. But the apostle told them, their circumcision would avail them only if they practised law; that is, performed the things required in the covenant with Abraham, (see ver. 12, note l.); in which case, as the seal of that covenant, it would give them assurance of salvation. But, if they did not perform the precepts of that covenant, their circumcision would be of no use to them.
Ver. 24. Keep (κανεῖσθαι) the precept of the law.—For this translation, see Rom. i. 36 note l. The law, here and in the following verses, cannot be the law of Moses, because the uncircumcised Gentiles could not keep the precepts of that law; they were utterly ignorant of them, and never could, by any exercise of reason, find out, other than that they were agreeable to God, or that he required them of the Gentiles. Most commentators are of opinion, that the moral precepts of the law of Moses are here meant, which the Gentiles might know by the light of nature. As neither they nor the Jews could keep these precepts in the manner the law required, so as to merit life by them, it is more reasonable to think, the law here spoken of, whose precepts the Gentiles are supposed to keep, is the law of faith, (see Rom. viii. 3.) as the apostle himself shows, ver. 7. 'The law which the Gentiles may both know and keep. For the light of natural reason dictates to great precepts higher than the law, namely, that men should desire to God and obey him from love.' Further, the precepts of this law are very particularly kept by the apostle himself, as literally signifying righteousness of the law; because they who keep them are accounted righteous in the sight of God; that is, are treated by God as righteous persons for the sake of Christ.
Ver. 25. The uncircumcision which by nature fulfillleth the law.—The words by nature are added by the apostle, to show that he is speaking of persons without revelation, and out of the circle of the circumcised Gentiles, nor of those who were to be converted.
Ver. 26. Fulfilleth the law.—Namely, of faith. The former, as we have seen, note. For though the Gentiles were ignorant of the covenant that was made at the fall, and of its promises, they might yet perform its requirements, ver. 25. Accordingly, many of the Gentiles believed in the true God, and obeyed him from a principle of faith and love.
Ver. 27. Judge thee a transgressor of law, though a Jew.—(See the letter and circumcision, Ex. xvi. 18.) by the literal circumcision!—The words though a Jew, are rightly supplied in this verse from the following: because the common translation, 'who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law,' is not sense. See Gen. Pref. p. 12. The judgment which the Gentiles who fulfill the law are here said to pass on the wicked Jewish, is the same with that which the Jews are said, ver. 1, to pass on the wicked Gentiles: namely, 'that they are worthy of death.' But they pass this judgment on the Jews with much more reason than the Jews pass it on them; because, whilst they condemned the Gentiles, they expected to be saved themselves, though guilty of the very same crimes.
Ver. 28. Keep (κανεῖσθαι) the precept of the law.—For this translation, see Rom. i. 36 note l. The law, here and in the following verses, cannot be the law of Moses, because the uncircumcised Gentiles could not keep the precepts of that law; they were utterly ignorant of them, and never could, by any exercise of reason, find out, other than that they were agreeable to God, or that he required them of the Gentiles. Most commentators are of opinion, that the moral precepts of the law of Moses are here meant, which the Gentiles might know by the light of nature. As neither they nor the Jews could keep these precepts in the manner the law required, so as to merit life by them, it is more reasonable to think, the law here spoken of, whose precepts the Gentiles are supposed to keep, is the law of faith, (see Rom. viii. 3.) as the apostle himself shows, ver. 7. 'The law which the Gentiles may both know and keep. For the light of natural reason dictates to great precepts higher than the law, namely, that men should desire to God and obey him from love.' Further, the precepts of this law are very particularly kept by the apostle himself, as literally signifying righteousness of the law; because they who keep them are accounted righteous in the sight of God; that is, are treated by God as righteous persons for the sake of Christ.
Ver. 29. A Jew does not, as in ver. 17, signify a professor of the Jewish religion, or a member of God's ancient visible church, but one who is a son of Abraham by possessing faith and holiness, like that for which Abraham was constituted the father of all believers. In this sense, the pious Gentiles, though uncircumcised, and members of no visible church, were really Jews, or sons of Abraham, and members of the covenant which God made with him, and entitled to all its blessings, by virtue of the circumcision of their heart. But such as those that Christ speaks in his epistle to the church of Phrygia, Rev. ii. 8. 'I know the blasphemy of those who say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan.'
Ver. 26. But he is a Jew who is one inwardly.—He is a son of Abraham, a member of God's invisible, invisible church, and entitled to the blessings of the covenant, who inwardly possesses the temper and disposition of Abraham, and therefore imitates his faith and obedience.
2 And circumcision is of the heart.—The circumcision which renders men the sons of Abraham and the people of God, is a cl-

The foregoing reasons being contrary to the prej udices of the Jews, one of that nation is here introduced, objecting. If our being the children of Abraham, members of the church of God, and heirs of the promises, will procure us no favour at the judgment, and if the want of these privileges will not preclude the heathens from salvation, what is the pre-eminnce of a Jew above a Gentile, and what is the advantage of our being made the visible church of God? ver. 1.—The apostle replied, That the Jews, as a nation, enjoyed great advantages by being the church of God: To them were committed the oracles of the prophets, the law of Moses, and the writings of the prophets, in which the coming of the seed of Abraham, who was to bless all nations, is foretold, ver. 2. But, says the Jew, what good have we derived from these oracles, if the greatest part of us have not believed on them whom you affirm to be the seed of Abraham? Will not our unbelief, as you have often told us, (See View prefixed to chap. xi.) occasion our rejection, and thereby destroy the faithfulness of God, who promised to Abraham to be a God to him, and to his seed in their generations? ver. 3. This consequence the apostle denied: Because, although all the natural seed of Abraham were rejected for unbelief, the faithfulness of God would not be destroyed thereby, but rather established, as the casting of Abraham's seed out of the covenant, for unbelief and disobedience, was tacitly threatened in the covenant itself, ver. 4. But, replied the Jew, if our unrighteousness, in not believing on Jesus, establisheth the faithfulness of God, by occasioning our losing the privileges of the covenant, Is not God unrighteous in destroying us also as a nation, for the sin of not believing in Jesus? ver. 5.—By no means, answered the apostle; for if no sin could be rightfully punished which is attended with good consequences, 'How shall God judge the world?' How shall he render to every man according to his works? ver. 6.—This answer not convincing the Jew, he urged his objection in a stronger form, as follows:—If the truth of God, in executing his threatenings on us as a nation, hath abounded to his glory through our lie, Why are we punished as sinners individually for what hath contributed so exceedingly to God's glory that it can scarcely be called a sin? To this objection the apostle replies, Why not say also, what we apostles are slanderously reported to practise, and even to order. 'Let us do evil, that good may come.' This pernicious doctrine the apostle reproved with abhorrence, by declaring, that the condemnation of those who hold it is most just, ver. 8. which is, all he now thought fit to say on the subject; intending to confute both the objection and the slander more fully afterwards, chap. vi. viii.

Because the apostle had affirmed, ver. 2, that the pre-eminnce of the Jews above the Gentiles consisted in the advantages which they derived from the oracles of God, for improving themselves in knowledge and virtue, the Jew asks, Do you acknowledge that we excel the Gentiles in worthiness and character, and that on account thereof we are entitled to be justified by the law? Not at all, says the apostle; for we have formerly, chap. i. and ii. proved Jews and Gentiles, that is, the scribes, Pharisees, and lawyers among the Jews, and the statesmen, philosophers, and common people of the Gentiles, to be all under sin, and obliged to seek justification by faith, ver. 9. And with respect to the common people of the Jews, I will shew you, by passages from your own scriptures, that the generality of them have always been exceedingly corrupt, notwithstanding the advantages which they derived from the oracles of God, ver. 12—18. Therefore, Jews and Gentiles being sinners, every mouth of man, pretending to justification as due on account of works, is effectually stopped, both by the law of nature and by the law of Moses, and all the world stands condemned by both, as liable to punishment from God, ver. 19. The apostle having thus, step by step, led his readers to the great conclusion which he meant to establish, he produces it as the result of all his reasoning hitherto: 'Wherefore, by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight; because through law is the knowledge of sin,' ver. 20. that is, neither Jew nor Gentile can be justified meritoriously by works of law; because law requiring perfect obedience, under the penalty of death, its only operation is to make sinners sensible, that they are liable to condemnation, without giving them the least hope of mercy; so that through the expectation of eternal life which sinners can entertain, must be grounded upon a method of justification different from that of law.

This being the proper place for it, the apostle introduces his account of the gospel-method of justification as follows:—Because both the law of nature and the law of Moses hath made perfect obedience necessary to justification, and because no man is able to give such an obedience, a righteousness without law, that is a different righteousness from perfect obedience to any law whatever, is now discovered, in the gospel to be what God requires in order to salvation. And to reconcile the Jew to that kind of righteousness, the apostle told them, (referring the proof of his assertion till afterwards, ch. iv. 1—8), 'that it is testified by the law and the prophets,' ver. 21. —Even the righteousness which God hath appointed from the beginning, as the righteousness of sinners; a righteousness which is through the faith enjoined by Jesus Christ, and which, from mere favour, will be counted to all, and received upon all who believe; for with God there is no distinction of persons; as his method of justifying mankind, ver. 22. Because all have sinned, and come short of the praise of God,' ver. 23.

Many of the Jews, however, continued utterly averse to the new dispensation: First, Because its doctrine of justification by faith rendered the Levitical sacrifices, which they believed to be real atonements, altogether useless; and, secondly, Because they fancied that no sacrifice for sin was appointed under the gospel. This latter mistake the apostle corrected by informing them, that justification is a free gift from God, bestowed on sinners through the redemption that is by Christ Jesus; that is, through the atonement which he hath made for sin by the sacrifice of himself, ver. 24. And that, on account of his having offered a sacrifice so meritorious, God hath set him forth, as a mercy-seat, seated on which, consistently with his justice, he forbears to punish sinners immediately, and grants them space to believe and repent, that he may pardon both them who have believed and repented before the coming of Christ, ver. 25. And them who shall believe and repent after his coming, even to the end of the world, ver. 26. Where then is boasting? the boasting of the Gentile philosophers, and of the Jewish scribes, who being puffed up with pride, the one on account of their intellectual attainments, and the other on account of their seal in performing the rites of Moses, fancy themselves entitled to eternal life. CHAPTER III.

WHAT IS THE PRE-EMINENCE OF THE JEW? (Ps. 195.) AND WHAT THE ADVANCE OF CIRCUMCISION?

1. APOSTLE. Marv. in every respect; but chiefly, indeed, because they were intrusted with the oracles of God.

2. JEW. (Ti. 3:8.) But what if (as some have not believed?) (Ps. 24, 27.) Will not their unbelief be your unbelief?

3. Note 1. destroy the faithfulness of God?

4. APOSTLE. By no means: but let God be true, and every man be a liar; as it is written (Ps. II. 4.) That thou mayest be justified in thy sayings, 60. threatened, and mayest overcome when thou judgest.

1. Chap. II. 8. 9. 10. What is the pre-eminence of the Jew? What is the advantage of circumcision? 2. 3. 4. APOSTLE. Much in every respect; but chiefly, indeed, because they were intrusted with the oracles of God. JEW. (Tit. 3:8.) But what if (as some have not believed?) (Ps. 24, 27.) Will not their unbelief be your unbelief?

Note 1. destroy the faithfulness of God?

4. APOSTLE. By no means: but let God be true, and every man be a liar; as it is written (Ps. II. 4.) That thou mayest be justified in thy sayings, 60. threatened, and mayest overcome when thou judgest.

Ver. 1. What is the pre-eminence of the Jew? What is the advantage of circumcision? 2. Much in every respect; but chiefly, indeed, because they were intrusted with the oracles of God. 3. But what if (as some have not believed?) (Ps. 24, 27.) Will not their unbelief be your unbelief?

Note 1. destroy the faithfulness of God?

4. By no means: the faithfulness of God will not be destroyed by the unbelief of the Jews. 5. But let God be acknowledged true to his covenant, although every Jew be a liar, in affirming that Jesus is not the promised seed, and be rejected on that account: for, as it is written, in all cases God will be justified in his threatenings, and will appear just as often as he punishes.

In the covenant with Abraham, God, having promised (Gen. xvii. 5) to give to him and to his seed the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and to be their God, the Jews affirmed, that if they were cast off from being his people, and driven out of Canaan for not believing on Jesus, the oracles of God, instead of being an advantage, would be a disadvantage to them, and the faithfulness of God, in performing his promises, would be destroyed. Because the apostle, in their discourses to the Jews, had told them, that for crucifying Jesus they were to be punished in that manner. See Chap. II. Illustration.

Ver. 4. 1. But let God be true, and every man be a liar. 2. Let God be acknowledged true to his covenant, though every Jewish multitude is cast off from that account. 3. To understand this, we must recollect that the performance of the promises to the natural seed of Abraham is, to the original covenant, tarded to depend on their faith and obedience, Gen. xvii. 19. and that it is expressly mentioned in the new covenant, that they that believe unbelief and disobedience, Lev. xxvi. 33. Deut. xxviii. 56. The rejection, therefore, and rejection of the Jews from Canaan, for their unbelief, being a fulfilling of the threatenings of the covenant, established the faithfulness of God instead of destroying it.

3. Though every man be a liar. 4. The apostle calls the unbelieving Jews liars, not only because in scripture wicked men are called liars, Psal. cxiv. 11. but because they who refused to believe on Jesus, thereby affirmed that he was an impostor, which was the greatest falsehood.

6. That thou mayest be justified in thy threatenings, and mayest overcome when thou judgest. 7. This is the proper translation of the original phrase, τὸ αὐτοῦ δικαιοῦσθαι, and is agreeable to Psal. II. 4. where the quotation is made. God's threatenings, in which David justified God, or acknowledged him to be just, are those which Nathan, by God's order, spoke to him in reproach of his crimes of adultery and murder. 2 Sam. xii. 9-12. And with respect to God's judging or punishing David, it happened when God executed on David the penalty the things which he denounced against him by Nathan. In this punishing him, David thought God clear or just, and acknowledged him to be so, by not receiving his punishment. On this occasion, the apostle quoted David's confession, that God's punishing him in the manner denounced by Nathan was not for the breach of the promises he had made to him and his posterity, because it showed the Jews, that God's promises, like his threatenings, are all conditional, and that, whenever he punishes to Abraham and to his seed, God might reject the Jews, and drive them out of Canaan, for their unbelief, as a fulfillment of the threatenings of the covenant. 2 Sam. xii. 34. Matt. xii. 40. Mark vii. 16. Luke vi. 37. "Art thou not also one of his disciples?" In ver. 8. of this chapter, it is not in the sense of such a person, but in the sense of such a character. But also I Cor. vi. 2, "May God destroy us, if we preach not the gospel by a straight way."

Ver. 5. What are faithfulness and unbelief? 6. In every respect. 7. Much. 8. But chiefly. 9. Indeed, because they were intrusted with the oracles of God. 10. What if (as some) have not believed? 11. Will not their unbelief be your unbelief? 12. Note 1. destroy the faithfulness of God?

13. By no means: the faithfulness of God will not be destroyed by the unbelief of the Jews. 14. But let God be acknowledged true to his covenant, although every Jew be a liar, in affirming that Jesus is not the promised seed, and be rejected on that account: for, as it is written, in all cases God will be justified in his threatenings, and will appear just as often as he punishes.
6. But if our unrighteousness establishes the righteousness of God, what shall we say? (Rom. v. 19, ver. 3). Is not God unjust, who inflicteth wrath? (I speak this after the manner of man.)

9. APOSTLE. By no means: (Rom. v. 7, 17, 18). otherwise shall God judge the world! (see ver. 5, note 2.)

7. JEW. (Isa. xlii. 21). For, if the truth of God hath abounded to his glory (i.e. 167) through my lie, why still am I also judged as a sinner?

8. APOSTLE. And why not add, as we are slanderously reported to practise, and as some affirm we order; (2 Cor. vii. 5). Certainly let this evil that good may come! (Isa. lxv. 5). Of those, the condemnation just?!

9. JEW. Well, then, do we excel the Gentiles? APOSTLE. Not at all: for we have formerly proved both Jews and Gentiles to be all sinners.

10. As it is written, (Rom. iv. 3). Surely there is none righteous, no, not one.

11. There is none that understandeth: there is none that seeketh after God.

12. They are all (31) gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doth good; (Rom. iii. 10, 12). for there is not much as one.

13. Their throat is an open sepulchre, with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips:

14. (Rom. iv. 11). Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.

15. Their feet are (32) swift to shed blood.

16. Destruction and misery lurk in their paths:

17. 'Mayest overcome': that sense of the word being familiar to the Syrians and the Rabbins. The sense here ascribed to God, is a victory over sin.

18. Ver. 5. Is not God unrighteous? See ver. 3, note, for this translation.

19. Ver. 7. What is the sense of the word 'lie'? This is a question here, as it is in other passages.

20. Ver. 8. How far has the apostle overstepped the bounds of reason and truth?

21. Ver. 9. The word 'lie' is here used in a sense which is not common.

24 Being justified (as a free gift) by his grace, through the redemption, which is by Christ Jesus.

Ver. 3. There is no fear of God before their eyes. — In this whole discourse, the apostle speaks of the collective body of the Jews, as he had done of the Greeks in chap. 1. The reason is, both among the Jews and Greeks there were, at all times, individualists of a character very different from that which he hath described to the generality of both. Besides, more than a general description was necessary for his argument. His different manner of describing the characters of the Jews and of the Greeks, is worthy of notice. For in speaking of the Greeks, he uses the greatest plainness, knowing that he would not offend them, as they did not put themselves on sanctuary of conduct, and were conscious that the things laid to their charge were true. But in speaking of the Jews, as Taylor observes, he couches their character under quotations from their own sacred writings, and thereby turns their eyes to ancient rather than to present manners. This method he followed, because, in the ancient manners of the nation, they might, as it were, clear their characters from the very deform prevalence of the then generation.

Ver. 9. — 1. We know, that whatsoever things the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law. — The foregoing quotations, although taken from the Psalms, being called "the whole law," it is evident that the law here denotes the whole body of the Jewish law as spoken of in the scriptures. See Rom. 11. 12 note b.

2. It is said to them who are under the law. — Although many times the Jews of the New Testament, and the Gentiles, in the Jewish scriptures, are called "they that are under the law." The immediate intention of these writings was to instruct, exhort, and direct the Jews. And therefore they are all to be understood as spoken to them, unless it is mentioned that the Gentiles in particular are to be understood.

3. That every mouth may be stopped. — They that understand the history of a guilty person, who being accused, hath no answer to make for himself.

4. And that all the world may be liable to punishment before God. — The apostle's meaning is, that the passages which he had quoted from the scriptures, concerning the wickedness of the Jews, are recorded there, first to make them sensible, that notwithstanding their privileges as the people of God, they were as great sinners as the Gentiles; next, to stop every mouth of men pretending to claim justification as due to him for his works; and in the third place, to constrain all the world to acknowledge themselves liable to punishment before God.

Ver. 9. — 1. Wherefore, by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight. — Jesus acknowledges, that in this passage law, without the article prefixed, signifies "a covenant, a solemn covenant, between God and man." — The apostle is here speaking of a meritorious justification, by means of the law, as well as of all, universal, absolute justification from the university of his proposition; also from this, that the only condition on which law allows justification to any person, is his performing all its requisitions. Wherefore as, in the present state of human society, a perfect obedience to law is impracticable, the apostle's assertion in this verse remains invariably true.

For the import of the phrase, see chap. 3. 20. and 3. 30. and 3. 25. These verses are parallel. The phrase, "in his sight," is the same as in 1. 21. 2. 17. 3. 21. 4. 31. and 6. 18. And in all cases, it signifies which God is expressly said to be justified by the law and the prophets.

Ver. 11. — 1. Being justified (as a free gift) by his grace, through the redemption, which is by Christ Jesus. — The example of Abraham's justification by faith, recorded Gen. xii. 6. and the passage which the apostle quotes, Rom. iv. 17. from Paul xxi. 1, 2, as well as that from Habakkuk, quoted Rom. iv. 17. are clear testimonies from the law and the prophets, that there is a "righteousness without law," which God accepts; and that the method of justifying revealed in the gospel, is the method in which men were justified under the law, and before the law: in short, it is the method of justifying sinners, established from the very beginning of the world. See Rom. iii. 25. 1. 22.

Ver. 14. Even the righteousness of God through faith of Jesus Christ. — The apostle, who, in the foregoing chapter, hath so fully taught that men may be saved who have not received an external revelation, cannot be supposed in this place to make the explicit knowledge of Christ, and faith in him, necessary. Consequently, the proposed and the original clause, "righteousness of God," does not signify "through faith in Jesus Christ," which is sometimes the meaning of the expression, but "through faith of Jesus Christ," as it is rightly rendered in our English Bible; unto which it appears, that the "faith which Jesus Christ hath enjoined," agreeably to the use of the genitive of the agent. See Rom. xii. 5, 11. That which is the true meaning of the expression, is plain from Phil.viii. 9, where "the righteousness which is through the faith of Christ," is termed the righteousness which is of God by faith, i.e. in like manner, Rom. xiv. 16. "That which is of the faith of Abraham," does not mean faith in Abraham, but faith like that which Abraham exercised. Matt. vi. 23. Rom. ii. 17. "The righteousness of God," is not the righteousness which God possesses, but which he requires. And John vi. 39. "The work of God," is not work performed towards God, or by God, but which God hath enjoined. See it is said, ver. 29. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." See Rom. iii. 25. note b. Rom. ii. 16. where πραξις ἀρετής and so in this verse signifies the faith enjoined by Jesus Christ.

Ver. 23. — 1. Sinned and come short. — The word ἐνέτρεπτον, as Bess observes, is properly applied to those whose strength failing them in the race, are left behind. The word therefore is very suitable to mankind, who, being weak and without eternal life, the reward which they pursued by their obedience.

2. Of the praise of God, 'Ελπίς τῆς ἐλπίδος; (πραξις tενεων, the praise which comes from God) and the 'Ελπις τῆς ἐλπίδος the praise of men more than (πραξις τενεων, the praise of God) the praise of the knowledge of sin, Rom. vii. 7. It is evident, that when the apostle told the Jews, 'By works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight,' he meant moral as well as ceremonial works of law. Besides, all along in this discourse, the opposition is stated, not between moral and ceremonial works, but between works of law in general, and faith, as the means of our justification.

Ver. 27. — 1. But all things are made known; that every mouth may be stopped, and that all the world may be liable to punishment before God. — As it is written, "he that aboundeth in good works, shall live by them." And this saying is discovered, being testified by the law and the prophets. — Even the righteousness which God hath appointed to be through faith of Jesus Christ, (the faith which Jesus Christ hath enjoined,) is not by works of law, whether made known, or revealed, moral or ceremonial, there shall no man be justified mercifully (Rom. ii. 13. note b.) in God's sight, (Psal. cxlix. 2.) because law makes men sensible that they are sinners, without giving them any hope of pardon: consequently, instead of entitling them to life, it subjects them to punishment.

21 But now, under the gospel, a righteousness appointed by God as the means of the justification of sinners, without perfect obedience to law of any kind, is made known: And it is no new method of justification, being taught both by the law and the prophets.

22 Even the righteousness which God hath appointed to be through faith of Jesus Christ, (the faith which Jesus Christ hath enjoined,) is not by works of law, whether made known, or revealed, moral or ceremonial, there shall no man be justified mercifully (Rom. ii. 13. note b.) in God's sight, (Psal. cxlix. 2.) because law makes men sensible that they are sinners, without giving them any hope of pardon: consequently, instead of entitling them to life, it subjects them to punishment.

23. Because all have sinned, and come short of praise from God; so that being all involved in guilt and misery, the same remedy must be applied to all:

24 Being justified by faith, not mercifully, but of free gift, by a great exercise of God's grace, through the redemption which is procured for them by Christ Jesus;

CHAP. III.

25 Whom God hath set forth a propitiation through faith in his blood, 2 (Rom. 14:7.) for a proof of his own righteousness in passing by the sins which were before committed, through the forbearance of God: 26 For a proof also of his righteousness in the present time, (Rom. 14:7.) in that he may be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus: 27 (Rom. 3:26.) Wherein is the hope of the Gentiles included.

28 We conclude then, that by faith (Rom. 3:22.) man is justified without works of law.

29 Is it the God of the Jews only, and not of the Gentiles also? Yes, of the Gentiles also.

32 For the word of the law is not of faith: (Rom. 10:16.) for if a man do the works of the law, he shall be justified by the works of the law: (Rom. 10:5.) but the grace of God through faith bringing salvation unto all men, 33 Ver. 32. Man is justified by faith, (Rom. 3:22.) and if by faith, then is the grace of God unrighteous? (Rom. 3:31.) God is a Lie, (Rom. 3:31.) because if we should be justified by the works of the law, then is Christ dead in vain.

34 But God forbid that I should glory, (Rom. 15:10.) but I will confound the wise of this world. (Rom. 15:10.) For he is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth, (Rom. 15:10.) to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

35 For in every nation, (Rom. 10:16.) God hath done the same, (Rom. 10:16.) being glorified.

36 For he is not a God of circumcision only, (Rom. 15:10.) but of the uncircumcision also: (Rom. 15:10.) for no flesh can glory in his presence; (Rom. 10:27.) but in every person that believeth on the Lord Jesus Christ, (Rom. 10:30.) Glory.

37 For therein is the righteousness of God revealed, (Rom. 10:30.) from faith to faith: (Rom. 10:20.) as it is written, (Rom. 10:20.) the righteous shall live by faith. (Rom. 10:20.)
Chapter IV.

Justify the circumcision (is στίχωμα) by faith, and the uncircumcision (is τι κατακεραυνώσω) through the faith. (See Rom. x. 11-14.)

31 Do we then make law useless through the faith? By no means, (ἀλλὰ, 78.) for we establish law.

Herod, 20. 1. Seeing there is one God, he will justify, &c. &c.—The apostle alludes to Zech. x. 10, where the prophet foretells the progress of the gospel, under the image of living waters going out from Jerusalem; then adds, ver. 9: And the Lord shall be king over all the earth; and in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one. 2 To show, that under the gospel dispensation all nations shall be regarded by God as his people; that he shall be acknowledged and worshipped by all nations; and that in the affair of their justification and salvation he will observe one rule.

2. Through the faith. This I think is an ellipse for through the law of faith, mentioned ver. 27, and signifies the method of salvation by faith established in the new covenant, called a law for this reason given in note 4, on ver. 27. By this law of faith the Gentiles are to be justified. For though they have not the doc trines of salvation in the objects of their faith, they may believe the doctrines of nature in the religion of the Hebrews, and live agreeably to them; in which case, their faith will be counted to them for righteousness, equally as the faith of those who were saved by reason of this law.

Illustration, answer to objection 1.3: So that the method of salvation for all men is the same, as is here affirmed.

Ver. 21. 1. Do we then make law useless?—Eρωτάγματι, Stephanus in his Concordance translates ερωτόγματι, ερωτάγματι, ερωταγμάτως; abedos. The simple word ερωτάναι comes from ερωτάω, or ερωτάω, to ask. Eρωτάασι therefore may signify, facta ut cesset, 'I exercise a thing of force, I weaken it, I render it incapable of exercising its power.'

2 For we establish law. It is not true of the law of Moses in general, that the apostle established it by his doctrine of justification through faith; but it is true, when spoken of the law which God has written on the heart of men. Wherefore law, in this passage, does not signify the law of Moses, as the more general and universal law just now described, the precepts of which are all written in the law of Moses, and established in the strongest manner by the gospel, as a rule of duty. The illustration of this assertion the apostle does not enter upon here, because he intended to handle it at great length in the ninth, tenth, and ninth chapters. See in particular chap. vi. 14. note 2.

Chapter IV.

The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having shewn the impossibility of man's being justified mercifully by obedience to any law, moral or ceremonial, judged it necessary, for the sake of the Jews, to consider more particularly the merit and efficacy of ceremonial performances. For these having no foundation in the nature of things, the only motive from which they can be performed, must be a regard to the divine command. Hence they have always been considered as acts of pious duty, pleasing in the sight of God. This was the case especially with the Jews, who, because the rites of Moses were of divine appointment, thought the observance of them so meritorious, that they had not the least doubt of obtaining justification and salvation by them. And therefore they were at all times more careful in observing the rites of the law, than in performing the moral righteousness which it enjoined.

To correct this, which is the error of the superstitious in all religions, the apostle examined the justification of Abraham, the father of believers; and shewed, from Moses's account, that his circumcision, though performed when he was ninety-nine years old, had not the least influence in his justification; he having obtained the promise of justification by means of his faith, long before he was circumcised. To this example the apostle appealed with great propriety, both because circumcision was the most difficult of all the rites enjoined in the law, and because Abraham, being the father of believers, his justification is the pattern of theirs. Wherefore, if circumcision contributed nothing towards Abraham's justification, the Jews could not hope to be justified thereby, nor by the other rites of the law: and were much to blame in praising these rites as necessary to their salvation, and in consigning all to damnation who were out of the pale of the Jewish church.

The apostle begins his reasoning on this subject with asking the Jews, what it was that Abraham, the father of believers, obtained by those services pertaining to the flesh which they so highly valued? ver. 1. —He did not obtain justification; for if Abraham were justified by the merit of any moral or ceremonial work, he might have boasted that his justification was no favour, but a debt due for what he had performed. Yet in this transaction with God, he had no such ground of boasting, ver. 2. —As is plain from God's counting his faith to him for righteousness; which implies, that in rewarding him as a righteous person, God did not discharge a debt, but bestowed a favour, ver. 3. —For the person who works receives the reward, not as a favour, but as a debt, ver. 4. —But to one who is not said to have wrought, but to have believed what was promised by God, whose prerogative it is to justify sinners, his faith is counted for righteousness by more favour, ver. 5. Wherefore, from Moses's account of the justification of Abraham, it appears that he was justified freely, without meritting it by any kind of work whatsoever; consequently that the gospel method of justification is testified by the law itself, as the apostle affirmed chap. iii. 21.

The same thing is testified by the prophets. For David nowhere represents men as blessed eternally, either by obeying the precepts of God's law perfectly, or by performing circumcision, or by offering sacrifices, but by the promises of those rites which purify the flesh; but he describes the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord counteth righteousness without such works; saying, Psal. xxxii. 1, 2. 'Blessed,' like Abraham, 'are they whose iniquities are forgiven.' ver. 7. —And to whom the Lord will not count sin, ver. 8. —From this it appears, that the not counting of sin is the same with the counting of righteousness, as it secures the sinner against punishment, and by the free gift of God entitles him to reward, equally with the counting of righteousness.

In chap. ii, the apostle, by arguments taken from the character and perfections of God, had proved that the heathens may be saved, though they never have enjoyed any external revelation, nor were members of God's visible church. But this doctrine, it seems, the Jews rejected on the supposition that it was contrary to their scriptures. Wherefore, to shew the falsehood of that pretence, the apostle, after describing the justification of Abraham, introduced the subject of the salvation of heathens anew, by asking, Cometh this blessedness of justification on the circumcision only, or on the uncircumcision also? and demonstrated the possibility of the salvation of the heathen, though no members of God's visible church, by observing, that Abraham had his faith counted to him for righteousness, and received the promise of the inheritance, in uncircumcision; that is, whilst he was no member of any visible church, neither performed any ritual service whatever, ver. 16. —For it happened full thirteen years before he and his family were made the visible church of God by circumcision: so that at the time he received the promise, and for many years after, he was precisely in the condition of all the pious Gentiles who have lived and died out of God's visible church. With this example before their eyes, how could the Jews in the apostle's days, or how can Christians now, imagine that the pious Gentiles will not have their faith counted to them for righteousness, since they are in the very condition Abraham was in when that favour was promised to him?

But because the Jews might ask, If Abraham obtained the promise of justification before he was circumcised, why was that rite enjoined to him? The apostle told them, it was enjoined merely as a seal or confirmation, on God's part, of his counting to him for righteousness that faith which Abraham had exercised in uncircumcision, and of his having made him the father or federal head of all believers who are out of God's visible church, to assure us, that their faith, like his, shall be counted to them for righteousness, and rewarded with the inheritance of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type, though they be no members of any visible church of God, ver. 11.

—A seal also, or proof, of his being the father of all who believe in the visible church, to give them the same assurance concerning their faith, provided that, to their outward profession of faith, they join such an obedience to God as Abraham exercised while he was out of the visible church, ver. 12. Thus, as in the second chapter, the apostle, by argument obviating that objection taken from the light of nature, had established the liberal doctrine of the salvation of the heathens by faith, so in this chapter he establishes the same doctrine by arguments taken from revelation. And by both he hath expressly confounded the bigotry of all who, like the Jews, confine salvation to their own church or mode of faith; and hath beautifully illustrated the righteousness and impartiality of God's moral government of the world.

Farther, to shew that the whole body of the ritual services enjoined by Moses, taken together, had no influence to procure salvation for the Jews, the apostle told them, that the promise to Abraham and to his seed, that they should be heirs of Canaan, and of the heavenly country typified by Canaan, was not given them 'by a righteousness of law;' that is, by a perfect obedience to any law, whether moral or ceremonial, but by a righteousness of faith, ver. 13. For if they who are righteous by a perfect obedience to law, are heirs either of the earthly or of the heavenly country, their faith is of no use in obtaining it; and the promise by which the inheritance is bestowed on them as a free gift, has no influence at all in the matter, contrary to the express declaration of scripture, ver. 14. Besides, in the nature of the thing, no one who has ever transgressed law can obtain the inheritance through law. For law, instead of rewarding, worketh wrath to every transgressor, and among the rest to the heirs, not excepting Abraham himself, who, by receiving the inheritance as a free gift, was shown to be, not a person perfectly righteous, but a transgressor of some law or other, namely, of the law written on his heart. For where no law is, there is no transgression, nor treatment of persons as transgressors, ver. 15. To these things add, that the promise was bestowed on Abraham and his seed, not by a perfect obedience to any law, either in its natural or revealed, but by faith, that the inheritance promised might be a free gift, and be made sure to all believers: Not to those only who enjoy an external revelation, but to those also, who, like Abraham, believe out of God's visible church; for the inheritance was promised to them in the person of Abraham, who in uncircumcision was made the father or federal head of such believers, for the purpose of receiving that promise on their behalf, ver. 16. According to what God said to him, A father of many nations I have constituted thee, ver. 17. This great honour was done to Abraham, on account of the excellency of his faith, ver. 18—21. For which reason it was counted to him for righteousness, and he received the promise of the inheritance, ver. 22. Now God directed Moses to record this, not for Abraham's sake alone, but for ours also, if we believe in the being and perfections of God, who raised Jesus from the dead, ver. 24. Who was delivered to death to make atonement for our offences, and was raised again for our justification, ver. 25.

Thus it appears, that the method of justifying sinners, by accepting their faith in place of that perfect obedience which law requires, and by rewarding it as if it were a perfect righteousness, is no new way of salvation. It was appointed at the fall for Adam and all his posterity, and was then obscurely revealed in the promise, that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent: afterwards, it was more explicitly declared in the covenant with Abraham, wherein God promised to give to him and to his seed by faith, whether he was a Jew or Gentile, the land of Canaan for an everlasting inheritance, as the reward of their faith. Wherefore, when the Jews in general denied salvation to the believing Gentiles, unless they entered into their church by receiving circumcision, they showed great ignorance of the method of salvation which was established at the fall, and which was made known to themselves in the covenant with Abraham. And when they refused to be united with the believing Gentiles into one body or church, they rebelled against God, and for their disobedience were justly cut off:—whereas a few of their brethren, more obedient to God, continued his people; and the Gentiles who believed the gospel were incorporated with them, as joint members of the covenant with Abraham; and both together formed that great community called 'the Israel of God,' and the 'church of the first-born,' which is to subsist through all eternity. Wherefore, in the article of man's justification, the Mosaic and Christian revelations perfectly agree.

CHAP. IV.—I (Tit. vi, 22.) But what do we say (Rom. vii. 1. note) Abraham our father obtained (Acts xxii. 29.) by the flesh?

2 (Ex. v. 22.) For if Abraham were justified by works, he might boast, but not before God.

3 For what saith the Scripture? (Gen. xv.)

Ver. 1.—Abraham our father obtained by the flesh!—Chrysostom and Theophylact joined in this translation; according to the flesh, with 'Abraham our father,' thus: What do we say Abraham, our father according to the flesh, obtained? note, by works, from the following verse. But as in no other passages Abraham is called the father of the Jews according to the flesh, and as the flesh stands in opposition with the spirit, obtained, I prefer the former translation. Flesh in this sense being opposed to spirit, signifies services pertaining to the flesh or body, on account of which the law of Moses itself is called flesh, Gal. iii. 3. note. By flesh, shall understand those works which Abraham performed in his natural state, and by his own strength, before he obtained the promise of justification. But the first mentioned interpretation seems more agreeable to the apostle's design here. Nevertheless, in other passages, where he speaks of justification by works, he hath in view, not ceremonial works only, but moral works also; as is plain from Rom. iii. 20. where he tells us, That by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 Ye Jews think ritual services meritorious, because they are performed purely from piety. But what do we say Abraham our father obtained by works pertaining to the flesh? That he obtained justification meritoriously? No.

2 For if Abraham were justified meritoriously by works of any kind, he might boast that his justification is no favour, but a debt due to him: But such a ground of boasting he hath not, ver. 4. He did not obtain it by his own obedience to law.

3 For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, when he Ver. 2—1. For what with the scripture And Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness. The apostle mentions only this one instance of Abraham’s faith, because Moses had said of it in particular, that it was counted to him for righteousness. But we must not on that account think it the only act of faith that was so considered. All Abraham’s acts of faith are connected in an inherent dispensation to believe and obey God, founded on just conceptions of his being and attributes. And he began to exercise it when God first called him to leave his native country. For by faith he went out, not knowing where he went. Heb. xi. 8. The same faith he exercised through the whole course of his life, acting on every occasion as one whose sins were forgiven, and whose iniquities were covered, as he was appointed.

his being the father of all who believe (Rom. 11:15) in uncircumcision, that righteousness might be counted even to them.

12 And the father of the circumcision, that righteousness might be counted even to them; and to those who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the footsteps of the faith of our father Abraham, which we also have in uncircumcision.

13 (Rom. 4:9.) Besides, not through a righteousness from the end of the verse of law, but the promise was to Abraham and to his seed, that he should be the heir of the world, but through a righteousness of faith.

14 (Rom. 4:9.) For if they who are righteous by law are heirs, and the promise is made of no effect.

15 (Rom. 4:11.) Further, the law worketh out wrath: (Gal. 3:26.) But where law is not, there is no transgression.

16 For this reason it is (Rom. 4:16.) through faith, that it might be (Rom. 3:24.) by grace, in order that the promise might be sure to all the seed; (Gal. 3:16.) not to that only which is (Rom. 4:16.) by the law, but to that also which is (Rom. 4:16.) by the promise, of which the promise was to Abraham, who is the father of us all.

17 (As it is written, Surely, a father of many nations have I constituted thee;) in the promises which he hath made to him, to put (Rom. 4:16.) the mark of circumcision on his own body, as God's seal, whereby the countenance of his face is set toward righteousness, and the constituting him the father of all believers, were confirmed to him. Hence, Gal. iii. 14, faith counted for righteousness, is called (Gal. 4:16.) the blessing of Abraham, and is said (Gal. 4:16.) to come on the Gentiles through Christ. For the same purpose, God ordered all Abraham's male descendants to be circumcised on the eighth day after their birth. The Israelite children being thus early initiated into God's covenant, their parents were thereby assured, that if, when grown up, they followed Abraham in his faith and obedience, they were, like him, to have their faith counted to them for righteousness, and be entitled to all the blessings of the covenant; or, if they died in infancy, that God would raise them from the dead, to enjoy the heavens of the country, of which the earth was but a type. But the covenant with Abraham being in reality not the gospel covenant, set forth in types and figures according to the manner of ancient times, may we not, from that, infer that circumcision, believe that baptism, the rite of initiation into the Christian church, is, like it, a seal of the gospel covenant, a declaration on the part of God, that he will count the faith of the baptized person for righteousness? And that, like circumcision, it may be administered to infants, to assure the parents that their future choice will be counted and reckoned as righteousness; or, if they died in infancy, that they will be raised to eternal life? In this case, the baptism of infancy is a praefatae rite, and must afford the greatest consolation to all pious parents.

2. In order to his being the father, &c.—Abraham, while uncircumcised, had his faith counted for righteousness, 'that he might be the father of all who believe,' whether in or out of the visible church. Accordingly, in the covenant which God made with him, he constituted him the father of all believers; so that, whatever promises were made to him and to his seed, were in reality made to believers of all nations.

Ver. 12. Who also walk in the footsteps of the faith, &c.—That is, who, like Abraham, exercise a continued faith; and who, from faith, obey God through the whole course of their life. See ver. 3. note 1.

Ver. 13. Besides, not through a righteousness of the law. Here Isaac signifies the law of Moses, which did not exist in Abraham's time, but was given in general; and the meaning is, the promises made to Abraham and to his seed, that they should be heirs of the world, was not made on the supposition of their attaining a righteousness consisting in perfect obedience to any law, moral or ceremonial, but on the supposition of their attaining a righteousness of faith; so that they received the promises of the inheritance, not as a debt, but as a free gift. See ver. 16.

5. To Abraham and his seed, &c.—This distinctive particle here the sense of the copulative, and is translated in the Authorized Version by the word and.

Ver. 15. Heir of the world.—By this, Ben and Locke, following the Greek fathers, understand 'heir of the world,' the promise being made to Abraham and to his seed. See Rom. xi. 16; and that in the renewal of the promise, Gen. xvi. 3; and some circumstances are added which show, that although, in its first and literal meaning, the country promised was the earthly Canaan, yet that first and literal meaning, being itself the sign of a higher or second meaning, 'a better country, even an heavenly,' was promised to Abraham and his seed by faith, under the type of the earthly country. See Rom. ix. 14. note, where the propriety of making the earthly country an emblem of the heavenly, is shown. See also Gen. xi. 12. note 1.

Ver. 16. For this reason it is—But where law is not, there is no transgression. For the reason, the inheritance is bestowed on account of a righteousness of faith, and not of law, that it might be a free gift, in order that the promise made to Abraham concerning it might be sure to all his seed, not to that only which is by the law of circumcision, but to that also which is by the promise of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all who believe, whether be Jews or Gentiles; that is, persons not in the visible church of God.

17 Agreeably to what is written, Gen. xvii. 5. Surely a father of many nations have I constituted thee; which honour of being the first and literal meaning, the country promised was the earthly Canaan, yet that first and literal meaning, being itself the sign of a higher or second meaning, 'a better country, even an heavenly,' was promised to Abraham and his seed by faith, under the type of the earthly country. See Rom. ix. 14. note, where the propriety of making the earthly country an emblem of the heavenly, is shown. See also Gen. xi. 12. note 1.

Ver. 17. As it is written, surely a father of many nations have I constituted thee; this promise implied, first, That Abraham should be the father of a very numerous natural progeny, who were to be the visible church and people of God, and to that country called Canaan was to be given, with the other blessings mentioned in the covenant, according to their first and literal meaning. Secondly, That Abraham should be the father of all who believe and obey the true God, whatever age or country, and under what dispensation, he was in; and that such, by virtue of their being counted to Abraham for Abraham, shall receive all the blessings promised to him and to his seed by faith. This honour of being constituted the father of all the pious and virtuous men in the world, was far greater than if, like Adam 26 And, Noah, Abraham had been the stock from which the whole human race springeth: for it implied, that he was the greatest of believers; and that the title which believers have to the blessings of the covenant, is founded on their being promised to them in the covenant, as his seed. This being the right interpretation of the promise, we may say, every father of many nations I have consecrated thee, 4 the apostle's reason is, therefore, to prove the title of the pious Gentiles to the inheritance, is unanswerable.

28 Even of God, who maketh alive the dead. 3—For illustrating this greatness of Abraham's faith, and to show with what propriety he was made the father of all believers, the apostle in this verse observes, that the principles on which he believed the Lord, were essentially the same, as those on which the pious Gentiles believed, in verse 18. 18 so he takes notice of the circumstances which rendered his faith difficult. Then in verse 19. 19 he observes, that the faith was strong, being free from all doubts. Abraham believed that God could raise alive his dead body, as he was enabled to begin a son by Sarah, even in the ninetieth year of her age; and notwithstanding he had no children by her in the days of their greatest youth and strength. He believed also, that God was able to bring the Ishmaelitish Gentiles to know and worship the true God, in such numbers as to make Abraham the father of a very numerous spiritual seed: Nay, he believed, that although Isaac had been born on the altar, God would raise him to life again. Such exalted notions had this chief of believers acquired of the power and faithfulness of God, who maketh alive the dead. This the apostle mentions, to show that Abraham knew and believed that God would strengthen his and Sarah's dead bodies for procreation, and could speak of Isaac and Abimelech of Abraham's spiritual seed with as much certainty as if they had all been already existing.

3. We have the same expression, as in his own body now dead. 3—The children which Abraham had by Keturah, after Sarah's death, do not invalidate this assertion; for Abraham's body having been removed by miracle, in order to the begotten of Isaac, might preserve its vigour for a considerable time afterwards.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

To comfort the Roman brethren under the evils which the profession of the gospel brought upon them, the apostle, in the beginning of this chapter, enumerated the privileges which belong to believers in general. And from his account it appears, that the privileges of Abraham's seed by faith, are far greater than the privileges which belonged to his seed by natural descent, and which are described Rom. ii. 17-20.

The first privilege of the spiritual seed is, That being justified by faith, they have peace with God through Jesus Christ, ver. 1. This, to the Gentiles, must have appeared an unspeakable blessing, in regard they had been taught by the Jews to consider themselves as children of wrath, and enemies of God, ver. 10.-Their second privilege is, By the command of Christ they are admitted through faith into the covenant made with Abraham, and into the Christian church.—Thirdly, They boast in the hope of beholding the glory of God in heaven; a privilege far superior to that of beholding the glory of God in the tabernacle, and in the temple on earth, of which the natural seed boasted; for it is the hope of living eternally with God in heaven, ver. 2.—Their fourth privilege is, They boast in afflictions, especially those which befell them for the name of Christ; because afflictions improve their graces, and render their hope of eternal life sure, ver. 3. 4.—But many, even of the believing Jews, denied that the Gentiles had any reason to hope for eternal life, while they did not obey Moses. Wherefore, to show that they are heirs of that, and of all the blessings promised in the covenant to the seed of Abraham by faith, equally with the Jews, the apostle appealed to God's shedding down the Holy Ghost upon them, even as upon the Jews, ver. 5. And to Christ's dying for them in their ungodly state, ver. 6-8:—And then said, since they were already justified, that is, delivered from their heart's disease, ignorance, and wickedness, and reconciled, that is, put into a state of salvation by the blood of Christ, they might well expect to be saved in due time from wrath, by his life in the human nature; since in that nature he exercises the offices of Lord and Judge of the world for their benefit, ver. 9, 10.—The last privilege belonging to the spiritual seed, mentioned by the apostle, is, That being reconciled, they can boast in the true God as their God, equally with the natural seed, whose relation to God was established by the law of Moses only. And this privilege be told them they had obtained, like all the rest, through Jesus Christ, by whom they had received the recompense of their obedience.

Having mentioned the reconciliation of the Gentiles, the apostle took occasion, in this place, to discourse of the existence of sin and death into the world, and of the remedy which God hath provided for these evils; and the extent of that remedy; because it gave him an opportunity, not only of explaining what the reconciliation is which we have received through Christ, but also of displaying the justice of granting reconciliation to all mankind through him, notwithstanding the greatest part of them never heard of any thing, either of the reconciliation, or of Christ who procured it for them.

And first, to shew the justice of granting reconciliation to the whole human race through Christ, notwithstanding many of them are ignorant of him, the apostle reasoned in this manner. As it pleased God, through the disobedience of one man, to subject all mankind to sin and death, notwithstanding the greatest part of them never heard of that man's disobedience; so, to render this determination consistent with justice, it pleased God, through the obedience of one man, to make all men capable of righteousness and life, notwithstanding the greatest part of them have no knowledge of the person to whom they are indebted for these great benefits, ver. 12. This second member of the comparison, indeed, the apostle hath not expressed, because he supposed his readers could easily supply it, and because he was afterwards to produce this unfinished comparison in a complete form, by separating it into two parts, and adding to each part the clause of the omitted member which belongs to it. Wherefore, having enumerated the first member of the comparison, instead of adding the second, he proceeds to establish the first because on it the truth of the second member, which he supposes his reader to have supplied in his own mind, depends. The proposition asserted in the first member is, that all men are subject to death for Adam's sin. This the apostle proves by the following argument:—No action is punished as a sin, where there is no knowledge of the law to have forbidding it, ver. 13. Nevertheless, from Adam to Moses, death reigned infants and idiots, who being incapable of the knowledge of law, were incapable of transgressing law. Therefore, having no sin of their own, for which they could be punished with death, they must have suffered for Adam's transgression; which shows clearly, that death is inflicted on mankind, not for their own, but for Adam's sin, who on that account may, by contrast, be called the type of him who was to come and restore life to all men, ver. 14.

Further, it was a matter of great importance to prove, that all mankind are punished with death for the sin of the first man, because it shews that the punishment of our first parents' sin was not forgotten, but only deferred, that the human species might be continued. Accordingly, by God's sentence pronounced after the fall, Gen. iii. 15-19. Adam and Eve were allowed to live and beget children. And as in the same sentence they were told, that the seed of the woman would bruise the serpent's head, it was an intimation, that on account of what the seed of the woman was to do, new trial, under a better covenant than the former, was granted to them and their posterity, that they might have an opportunity of regaining that immortality which they had forfeited. These things the apostle supposes his readers to know; for he proceeds to compare the evils brought on mankind by Adam, with the advantages procured for them by Christ, that all may understand the gracious nature of the new covenant under which the human race is placed since the fall.

From what the apostle had said of the effects of Christ's obedience, compared with the consequences of Adam's disobedience, it appears that the former are superior to the latter in three respects. The first is, Christ's obedience had more merit to obtain for all mankind a short life on earth, and after death a resurrection to a new life, in which some of them as are capable of it are to enjoy happiness for ever, than Adam's disobedience had demerit to kill all mankind, ver. 15. The second is, The sentence passed on mankind, was for one offence only, committed by their first parents, and it, sentenced them all to death temporal; but the sentence which bestows the gracious gift of pardon, hath for its object the offence of Adam, and all the offences which the pardoned themselves may have committed during their own probation; and is such in their being accounted righteous, and entitled to eternal life, ver. 16. The third is, In the life which they who are pardoned and accounted righteous shall reign through Christ, they shall enjoy much greater happiness than they lose by the death to which they are subjected through Adam's offence, ver. 17.

Having thus contrasted the benefits procured for mankind by Christ, with the evils brought on them by Adam, the apostle sums up these particulars in two conclusions. The first is, As it was just, on account of one offence committed by Adam, to pass sentence of condemnation on all, by which all have been subjected to death, so it was equally just, on account of one act of righteousness performed by Christ, (his dying on the cross,) to pass sentence on all, by which all obtain the justification of life; that is, a short life on earth, and, at the last day, a resurrection from the dead, ver. 18. The second conclusion is, As it was just, through the offence of one man, to constitute all men sinners; that is, through the disobedience of Adam, to convey to all men a corrupted, weakened nature, whereby they are made liable to sin and to eternal death; so it was equally just, through the obedience of one man, to constitute all mankind righteous; that is, to put them in a condition of obtaining righteousness here, and eternal life hereafter, ver. 19. For in what manner could all mankind be constituted righteous, unless by granting them a personal trial under a new covenant, in which not perfect obedience is required in order to righteousness and life, but the obedience of faith? From these two conclusions we learn what the condensation is which was brought on all mankind by Adam, and what the reconciliation is which all mankind receive by Christ. By Adam, mankind were made mortal and liable to sin; By Christ, they are allowed a temporary life on earth, and have a trial appointed them under a gracious covenant, by which they may attain righteousness and eternal life through faith.

In the two conclusions just now mentioned, the unfinished comparison, with which the apostle introduced this admirable discourse, is completed in the manner expressed in the commentary, ver. 12. For in the first conclusion, ver. 18, the entrance and progress of death, through Adam's sin, being described as in ver. 12, its remedy is declared, which is there wanting. And in the second conclusion, ver. 19, after mentioning the entrance and progress of sin, as in ver. 12, its remedy, which is wanting there, is likewise described. This order the apostle followed, because, though the entrance of sin was prior to that of death, he mentioned the entrance of sin last, that he might have an opportunity of speaking concerning the rule by which Adam and his posterity, now reconciled, were to direct their actions, during the trial appointed them under the new covenant. For after telling us, that as all were constituted sinners by Adam's disobedience, so all shall be constituted righteous through the obedience of Christ, he adds, But law silently entered:—that is, after the sentence was passed, Gen. iii. 15—19, whereby Adam was allowed to live and beget children, and with his posterity was placed under the new covenant, the law of God written on their hearts silently took place as the rule of their conduct under that covenant. And although the offence of actual transgression thereby absolved, yet the superabounding, in the resurrection of all who die in infancy and idiocy to a better life than that which they lose through Adam's disobedience, and by bestowing the same blessing on such adults as fulfiil the requisitions of the gracious new covenant under which they are placed, ver. 20. And thus it hath come to pass, that as the sin of the first man hath exceedingly tyrannized over the whole species, by introducing actual transgression and death; so also the infinite goodness of God shall reign, by destroying sin and death through a righteousness of faith, which shall be counted to believers and rewarded with eternal life; and all through Jesus Christ our Lord, ver. 21. Thus, according to the doctrine of the apostle, all mankind are, and ever have been included in the new covenant. Consequently the advantage which they have received by Christ, is much greater than the loss they have sustained through Adam. And it is reasonable to think it should be so; because the goodness of God more effectually disposes him to bestow blessings on mankind, on account of Christ's obedience, than to inflict evils on them on account of Adam's disobedience.

Before this subject is dismissed it may be proper to observe,—

1. That in this remarkable passage we have the true account of the entrance of sin and misery into the world, and of the method in which such evils have been remedied; subjects which none of the philosophers or wise men of antiquity were able by the light of reason to fathom. Sin entered through the disobedience of our first parents, whereby they became liable to immediate death, and if God had executed his threatening, the species would have ended in them. But because, in due season, his Son was to appear on earth in the human nature, and to make atonement for the sin of men, God, in the prospect of that great act of obedience, suffered Adam and Eve to live and propagate their kind, and granted them a new trial under a covenant better suited to their condition than the former, in order that if they behaved properly during their probation, he might raise them to a better life than that which they had forfeited. In this new covenant, the obligation of the law written on their heart was continued; only perfect obedience to that law was not required in order to life, but the obedience of faith. And although the punishment of their first sin took place so far, that they were found to have given the obedience of faith during their probation, they may receive a more happy life than that which was forfeited by the disobedience of their first parents, and be continued in that happy life for ever. Thus, by the remedy which God hath applied for curing the evils introduced by the first man's disobedience, the righteous will be raised to a greater degree of happiness than if those evils had not taken place.

trived after that evil took place: Christ's obedience was appointed as the means of our deliverance, at the very time the resolution permitting the entrance of sin was formed. And therefore, to make mankind sensible of this, the apostle assures us, Eph. i. 4, that 'we were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world.' And 2 Tim. i. 9, that 'we are saved and called according to God's own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ, before the world began.' And, 1 Pet. i. 20, that 'Christ was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifested in these last times for us.'—And as the plan of our redemption was formed along with the decree permitting our fall, so its operation was coeval with the introduction of that evil, and in some respects extends to all. Hence Christ is called, Rev. xiii. 8, 'the Lamb which was slain from the foundation of the world;' and he is said, 2 Cor. v. 15, 'to have died for all.'—See the note on that ver. And his death is termed, 1 John ii. 2, 'a propitiation for the whole world.'

3. From other passages of scripture we learn, that sin and death were permitted to enter into the world, not only as by the remedy to be applied to these evils, God intended to make mankind more happy than they would have been if these evils had not existed, but even to promote the good of the universe. Accordingly, in this scheme of redemption, there is a higher display of the perfections of God to all intelligent beings than could have been made had there been no sin and misery to be remedied. So Saint Paul teaches, Eph. iii. 10. 'That now unto the government and power in the heavenly regions, the multiform wisdom of God may be made known through the church.' Further, the new display of the perfections of God made in the plan of redemption, by furnishing many powerful motives to virtue, whose operation is not confined to any one order of rational beings, nor to any particular time, will render God's moral government effectual over all his intelligent creatures for ever.

4. By the illustrous display of the scheme of redemption made in this admirable passage, and by showing that it hath for its object not a single nation, nor any small portion of the human race, but believers of all nations, the apostle has condemned the bigotry of the Jews, and of all who, like them, confine salvation to their own church, and exclude others from sharing in the mercy of God through Christ, merely because they are ignorant of him, not through their own fault, but through the good pleasure of God, who hath denied them that knowledge: Or, because they do not hold the same objects of faith with them, although they possess the same spirit of faith, and live piously and virtuously, according to their knowledge. For his whole reasoning on this subject proceeds on the supposition, that, if it was consonant to justice that the demerit of Adam's disobedience should extend to all mankind, notwithstanding the greatest part of them never knew any thing either of him or of his disobedience, it must be equally consonant to justice, that the merit of Christ's obedience should extend to all mankind, who are capable of being benefited by it, although many of them have had no opportunity of knowing any thing concerning that meritorious obedience. Besides, as the plan of redemption will, no doubt, be fully made known to the Gentiles, after they are admitted into heaven, the glory of God and the honour of Christ will be advanced by the discovery, at that period, as effectually as if it had been made to them during their lifetime on earth. And with respect to themselves, although the knowledge of Christ and of the method of salvation through him, is not bestowed on them till they come into heaven, it will then operate as powerfully in making them sensible of the mercy of God, and in laying a foundation for their love and gratitude to Christ through all eternity, as if that knowledge had been communicated to them sooner. If so, to fancy that persons, who, notwithstanding their want of revelation, are actually prepared for heaven, will be excluded from that blessed place, merely because, while on earth, they were denied that knowledge of Christ, which, with equal effect, may be communicated to them in heaven, is to contradict all the representations given in the Scriptures of the impartiality of God, as the righteous governor of the universe.

New Translation.

5. Wherefore, being justified (see iv. 25, note 3) by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ:

2. Through whom we have had introduction (see note on Eph. ii. 18) by faith into this grace in which we stand, and boast (ps) in hope of the glory of God.

3. And not only so, but we even boast (v, 168) of afflictions, knowing that afflictions worketh out patience:

Ver. 1. Being justified by faith.—If this is an inference from what immediately goes before, justified, as in the last verses of the preceding chapter, means delivered from ignorance and wickedness through the influence of faith. This sense the word justified has in ver. 3 of this chapter, and in 1 Cor. vi. 11. But if the inference is from the general doctrine explained in the preceding chapter, justified, as in many other passages where believers are said to be justified in the present life, will signify their having the promise of justification given them. Locke contends, that justification, with the other parts of grace, is not conferred in the moment of faith, but that the whole church in general, and that they belong to all who profess to believe in Christ. But any one who remembers the apostle's assertion, 'that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, to every one who believeth,' will not easily allow that salvation is a national privilege, which belongs to all who profess to believe in Christ.

2. We have peace with God.—If this is understood of the Gentiles, the meaning is: We Gentiles, who formerly were enemies of God, ver. 10, are now at peace with him, and are no longer terrified with the fear of his wrath, having by faith in the gospel, separated ourselves from the rebels against his government, and joined ourselves to his people. But if this is understood of believers in general, the meaning is: Being delivered from sin and punishment by means of faith, we have, in this new state, peace with God, whom we now regard as our father and friend.

Ver. 2. Wherefore, having been delivered from the power of sin by faith, and having laid aside our enmity to God, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ:

2. Through whom we have been introduced by faith into this gracious covenant in which we stand, and boast, not in seeing the glory of God in any tabernacle or temple on earth, as the natural seed do, but in the hope of beholding the glory of God in heaven.

3. And this is not our only boastings; for while the Jews boast of afflictions knowing that affection worketh out patience in us;

Ver. 3.—1. Through whom we have had introduction also by faith into this grace.—The word grace here is a different meaning from that mentioned in ver. 1. It is the gracious new covenant which Christ procured for mankind, and which is the source of their peace.

2. In which we stand.—For this translation of the word εἰςκοινωνίαν, see Eph. iv. 3. The original word (κοινωνία) signifies to stand firm. As the apostle often compares the conflict which the first Christians maintained against false teachers and persecutors to the kenean to the pious heathens, after they are admitted into heaven, the glory of God and the honour of Christ will be advanced by the discovery, at that period, as effectually as if it had been made to them during their lifetime on earth. And with respect to themselves, although the knowledge of Christ and of the method of salvation through him, is not bestowed on them till they come into heaven, it will then operate as powerfully in making them sensible of the mercy of God, and in laying a foundation for their love and gratitude to Christ through all eternity, as if that knowledge had been communicated to them sooner. If so, to fancy that persons, who, notwithstanding their want of revelation, are actually prepared for heaven, will be excluded from that blessed place, merely because, while on earth, they were denied that knowledge of Christ, which, with equal effect, may be communicated to them in heaven, is to contradict all the representations given in the Scriptures of the impartiality of God, as the righteous governor of the universe.
ROMANS.

4 And patience, approbation, and approbation, hope:
5 And (4, 67) this hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is poured out into our hearts, by the Holy Ghost who is given to us.

6 Besides, we being still weak, in due time Christ died (V. 9, 167) for us, unconscionably.

7 (V. 9, 17.) Now scarcely for a just man will one die; (V. 9, 98), though for a good man one would perhaps would even dare to die.

8 But his own love towards God commendeth (V. 554), because we being still sinners, Christ died (V. 9, 167) for us.

9 Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him.

10 For if, being enemies, we were reconciled to God, through the death of his Son; much more being reconciled, we shall be saved from wrath through his life.

11 And not only so, but we even boast in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation, from the face of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name.

5. Knowing that affliction worketh patience; this effect affliction produces, it is affecting, the afflicting, of patience, and by expecting considerations which naturally lead the mind to that virtue.

6. And patience, approbation. The original word ἀγαθοσκευή properly signifies the trying of metals. It signifies likewise probity, in consequence of trial, (Phil. ii, 21.) hence, insomuch, the verb, signifies both to try, and to approve, Rom. xii. 2. (Cor. xii. 3.) in this passage, the word ἀγαθοσκευή may either be translated proof, namely, of God’s steadfastness, and of our own steadfastness, or approbation bestowed by God.

7. For the love of God is poured out into our hearts. The original word ἐκβάλλειν is commonly used, as Whitby remarks, when the effusion of the Holy Ghost is spoken of. Wherefore, as the apostle, in this passage, had in his eye the gift of the Spirit bestowed on the Gentiles as proofs of God’s love to them, he desires to tell them, that the love of God was poured into their hearts, along with the spiritual gifts.

2. In the Holy Ghost’s name. The spiritual gifts bestowed on the first Christians were clear proofs, especially in the case of the Gentiles, that they had in their hearts, the Spirit of God; and thereby were proofs of God’s love to them, that the love of God was poured into their hearts, along with the spiritual gifts.

3. For the ordinary influences of the Spirit, bestowed on believers, by regenerating a good man, means, were designed to work salvation through faith. Hence they are said to be sealed with the Spirit of promise, Eph. iv. 30. The Spirit himself is called the earnest of the inheritance, Eph. i. 13, 14; and it is said, Rom. viii. 15, to bear witness with their spirit, that they are the children of God.

6. Besides, we being still weak. The original word ἀρετή signifies moral weakness, and is used here to show the moral weakness of men, in weakening all the faculties of the soul, as they have the same metaphor, chap. 1. 5. the whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint.

5. In due time (καιρῷ οὐρανον).—See Titus, v. 1, note 1. Christ died. When the season for the publication of the gospel and conversion of the world was come, Christ appeared in the flesh, and died for our sins. This is called the return of the times of refreshings, Acts iv. 1. and the time before appointed of the Father, ver. 2.

8. Christ died for the ungodly. If the ungodly are here the idolatrous Gentiles, the meaning is, He died to obtain a right to the Gentiles as his people, to deliver them from the dominion of Satan, to procure pardon and remission of sins, the everlasting life. See Rom. iv. 25, note 2.

7. Be assured of this good man. In this place the Syriac version hath, For a good man, which Bene Zeithe would prefer to the common reading, if accused, were not contradicted by all the ancient versions, and by the Vulgate version. The dying (τάραξεν) for a just man, and the dying (τάραξεν) of himself, are connected in this sense, of being a dying for a just man, for his room or stead. And therefore Christ’s dying (τάραξεν) for a just man, is the same as his dying (τάραξεν) for his room or stead, (ver. 4.)

4. His love to us God commended. &c.—He had extended it, he hath rendered it highly praiseworthy. In this sense the apostle is authorized by the Master, who mentioned it as L.
12 ( Acts 17, 68.) For this reason, As by one man's sin death passed through to all men, 1 and by sin death, and so death passed through to all men, 1 (Rom 5:12) because all have sinned. 2

13 For until the law, sin was withheld in the world: 3 but sin is not counted when there is no law. 2

14 (Acts, 81.) Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the type of him who was to come. 4

15 (Acts, 81.) However, not as the full, so also is (the) gracious gift. For if by the fall of the one man, (1 Cor 15:21) the many perished,

5 Our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation. —The Greek noun εγινομενος χρηστος, translated reconciliation, comes from the verb εφορομενος, which, in the preceding verse, our translators have rendered reconcile. Wherefore, the word derived from it would not have been translated by them. In this passage, συνέστησαν, but reconciliation, as it is in all the other passages where it occurs. Besides, it ought to be considered, that reconciliation is not the same as restitution. The former is made to God; for the meaning of reconciliation, see ver. 18 note 1. In what follows, reconciliation, so far as it means the restoration to favor of putting all men in a state of reconciliation or salvation through Christ.

6 For this reason, as by one man's sin entered, 4, 1 Cr. 15:21 I think this verse should not be separated from the 11th by a full point, but by a comma, so as to be read in this manner: Our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom we have received the reconciliation, for this reason, as by one man's sin entered, 4, 1 Cr. 15:21 For the apostle is giving a reason why all have received reconciliation through Jesus Christ. See this use of ευλογεσθαι proved, Rom. iv. 66. The apostle's meaning is, That as it was consistent with the justice and goodness of God, to subject all mankind to sin and death for the sin of the first man; so it is equally consistent with the justice and goodness of God, to deliver all mankind from death, and to put them into a capacity of becoming righteous, and of living for ever, on account of the righteousness of one man. It is no objection to this view of the apostle's argument, that the second member of the comparison is not expressed. For that he meant to compare Adam and Christ together, is evident from his calling Adam the type of Christ. The second member of the comparison, therefore, must be supplied as in the commentary. For in fact, through one man Christ, righteousness hath entered into the world, and by his righteousness life hath passed through to all men, because all have sinned. Now, it need not surprise us to hear that all have sinned, for, surely, with as much propriety it may be said, that all have obeyed in Christ their federal head, as that all have sinned in Adam their federal head. Of this elliptical manner of writing, in which a subject is understood, there are other examples in scripture. See 2 Chron. 3. 9, where, as in the passage under consideration, the second member of a comparison is supplied in the manner above mentioned. 2 Cor. 5. 18, 19, Gal. 2. 21; I Pet. 3. 11. See Gen. Pref. p. 10, and Glass Philos. p. 1212. Origin was of opinion, that the word governed by the copula in the second member of the apostle's comparison is referred to ver. 18, 19, and that all between is a parenthesis. But any one who considers the sense of the words will see, that in the comparison begun ver. 12 is separated into two conclusions, from his reasons upon the opposite lying in ver. 12, 13. It is the first man, and Adam communicated sin and death through his disobedience: Christ communicated righteousness and life. They were not only in their method of communication, but in the things communicated. Adam communicated sin and death through his disobedience: Christ communicated righteousness and life. But they were like each other in this, that as the effects of Adam's disobedience extended to all, so the effects of Christ's obedience have extended to all, in the sense explained in the illustration. See also 2 Cor. 5. 11 note 1. And, as in that comparison, Erasmus says the comparison is completed in ver. 12 itself: thus, As through one man sin entered, so through one man righteousness entered. And yet neither the original nor the apostle's argument admits this method of completing the sentence. See the view presented in this note. 4. Sin entered; —The sin which entered through this one man's disobedience, is not the first sin of Adam only, but that corruption of nature also which took place in Adam through his first sin, and which he conveyed to all his posterity. See note 4 below.

5. Into the world; —that is, entered among men. The same thing is said of death: it entered into this habitable world by sin. And so death passed through to all men. —The death which the apostle says entered into the world, and passed through it, is that which is natural death. In Adam's death temporal: because in one branch of the comparison which is not expressed, its opposite, which passed through to all men, is resurrection from temporal death. And yet death does not follow, that temporal death is the only evil which man has sustained through Adam's sin: or that the apostle means to say so: for he tells us, ver. 19, That by one man's disobedience the many were made liable to sin, and to eternal death, (see chap. vi. 11. note 5, at the end; even as by one man's disobedience, and not the man whom we call Adam, were made capable of righteousness and eternal life. See ver. 11 note 4, 5, 6, 8, 9. Wherefore, as above, Adam's sin is connected with our disobedience only, but eternal death, of which the children of Adam are liable thereto. But the dispute is endless, because whatever the death which was Adam's death on all, Christ has removed it. So this sin was made answerable to the death which the apostle will show in the remaining part of this discourse.
died: much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is of the one man Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

16 (KJV) Also not as the sentence through the one who sinned, in the free gift. \footnote{For the sense of the verb sinned was (Rom. 5:16) for one offence to condemnation; but the grace of God was for many offences (Rom. 5:19) to righteousness.}

17 (ESV) For if, because of one man's trespass, death reigned through that one man, much more will life be revealed through the one righteous Man, the just One, \footnote{For the text of verse 17 is not clear. The Masoretic text reads: "For if, because of one man's trespass, death reigned through that one man; much more will life be revealed through the one righteous Man, the just One, through whom those who receive the overflowing of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life through the one righteous Man Jesus Christ."

18 (ESV) For if, because of one man's trespass, death reigned through that one man, much more will life be revealed through the one righteous Man, the just One, through whom those who receive the overflowing of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life through the one righteous Man Jesus Christ.}

19 (ESV) For if, because of one man's trespass, death reigned through that one man, much more will life be revealed through the one righteous Man, the just One, through whom those who receive the overflowing of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life through the one righteous Man Jesus Christ.
20 (Nehor &c. are reserved) But law privately entered, 1 (ver. 197.) so that the offence hath abounded. However, where sin hath abounded, grace hath superabounded: 21 (Ver. 18. 119.) That as sin hath reigned (ver. 165.) by death, so also grace might reign (ver. 113.) through righteousness unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHAP. VI.

20 But when Adam was allowed to live, law secretly entered into the world as the rule of man's conduct, even the law written on his heart, so that the offence hath abounded. However, where sin hath abounded, through the entrance of law, the goodness of God might reign, that is effectually to exercise its power, through righteousness, (ver. 16.), even the righteousness of faith, followed with eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

St. Paul's design in this and the two following chapters, was to confute the slanderous report mentioned chap. iii. 6, namely, that the apostles ordered their disciples to sin, that grace might abound in their pardon. Also to prove, in opposition to the unbelieving Jews and Greeks, that the doctrine of justification by faith without works of law, does not render law useless, but rather establishes it as highly useful, chap. iii. 31. His transition to these subjects is elegant. For, in the foregoing chapter, having shewn that all mankind die for the sin of Adam; also having discoursed, chap. v. 20, 21, of the superabounding of grace through Christ, in producing the righteousness of faith, and in rewarding that righteousness with eternal life, he begins this chapter with asking, Whether any one could seriously think, that he could be so inconsistent as to order men to sin, that grace might the more abound in their pardon? ver. 1. Persons, said he, who teach as we do, that God hath subjected the whole human race to death, for the one offence of the first man, never can fancy that God will bestow eternal life the more abundantly on men, because they continue in sin, ver. 2. Next, to shew, that the apostles, who taught the doctrine of justification by faith without works, did not mean thereby to set their disciples free from the obligations of morality, he observed, that in baptism, the rite of initiation into the Christian church, the baptized person is buried under the water, as one put to death with Christ on account of sin, in order that he may be strongly impressed with a sense of the malignity of sin, and excited to hate it as the greatest of evils, ver. 3. Moreover, in the same rite, the baptized person being raised up out of the water, after being washed, he is thereby taught that he shall be raised from the dead with Christ, by the power of the Father, to live with him for ever in heaven, provided he is prepared for that life by true holiness, ver. 4. 5. Further, by their baptism, believers are laid under the strongest obligations to holiness, because it represents their old man, their old corrupt nature, as crucified with Christ, to teach them that their body, which sin claimed as its property, being put to death, was no longer to serve sin as its slave, ver. 6. 7. By calling men's body the body of sin, the apostle represents sin, or evil desire, as a person, who, by overcoming the first man, had made him and all his posterity his slaves by right of conquest, and who, as their master, was continually demanding from them with rigour the ignominious service of wicked actions. And because the Greeks and Romans were well acquainted with the manner in which slaves were acquired and kept by the laws by which their lives and services were regulated, he appealed to these known customs to prove, that, by the death of Christ their federal head, the claim which sin hath set up to the persons services of mankind as a consequence of the fall of the first man, is utterly destroyed.

Sin, says the apostle, claims you as his slaves, in consequence of having subdued your first parents, and taken them captive. But I will shew you by the laws of slavery, that claim is now cancelled, and that it is both your right and your duty to shake off the yoke of that tyrannical master. Sin having power to death with Christ, ye are no longer his slaves. For the slave of sin who is dead, is freed from the dominion of sin, even as every slave who is put to death by his master is freed from the dominion of that master. ver. 7. But though we died with Christ on the cross, we live at present, and shall afterwards live together with him in heaven; and therefore we are now, of right, his servants, ver. 8, 9, 10.

Farther, that the Romans might rightly understand this argument, the apostle desired them to conclude, from what he had told them, that at the fall they had been killed, both corporally and spiritually, by the sin of their first parents, but were made alive, both in body and spirit, by Christ, who on that account was become their right-ful lord, ver. 11. Wherefore, it was both their duty and their interest not to allow sin to rule them any longer, in the life which they had acquired through Christ, but to employ both the members of their body and the faculties of their mind in the service of God, as persons who have been made alive from the death brought on by sin

Next, in answer to the calumni, that the Christian teachers encouraged their disciples to sin, by telling them they were not under law, but under grace, the apostle affirmed that the doctrine has the direct contrary tendency. Sin shall not lord it over you, for this very reason, that ye are not under law, but under grace; and he had good reason to say so, because he had shown, ver. 11, that under grace, that is, under the new covenant, men are made spiritually alive by God; consequently, they have sufficient strength communicated to them for conquering evil desires, and for working righteousness; and great encouragement to do so, by the promise of pardon which is made to them in the new covenant. Whereas law, by rigorously requiring perfect obedience to all its precepts, and by refusing pardon to sinners, drives them to despair, and hardens them in their sins, ver. 14. These, said the apostle, being the doctrines which we constantly preach, can ye believe that we ever said, Let us sin, because we are not under law, but under grace? ver. 15. In the mean time I must inform you, that the advantages ye enjoy under grace, though very great, are of such a kind as to leave you still at liberty to give yourselves up, as slaves, to holy affections or to sinful desires, as ye choose; and that, to whomsoever of these matters ye yield yourselves slaves, ye give him the absolute direction of you, ver. 16. —However, I thank God, that ye Romans, though formerly the slaves of sin, have obeyed the form of doctrine into which ye were delivered as into a mould, ver. 17.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VI. — 1 What then do we say? Let us continue in sin, that grace may abound 1

2 By no means: we who have died to sin, how shall we still live (p. 165.) by it? 2

3 Are ye ignorant, that so many of us as have been baptized into Christ Jesus, have been baptized into his death? 3

4 (Col. 3:3.) Besides, we have been buried together with him by baptism into his death,

Ver. 1. What then do we say? 1 is not the future tense of the verb  σκελετον, as our translators suppose, but the present of the indicative of  ὑπολαμβάνειν, which contracted is  ὑπολ. iv. 4. “Again (τοῦτο) I say.”

Ver. 2. We who have died by sin. — Thus the true translation of the clause. For  ἐνεκτερησάμοι, being the second aorist, signifies a bare death, and  ἐνεκτερησαμοι, an actual and instrument, signifies by sin as the cause. See ver. 10, note 4, and ver. 11, note 1. The common translation, how shall we who are dead to sin live any longer therein? is absurd. For a person’s living in sin who is dead to it, is evidently a contradiction in terms.

Ver. 3. — 1. Baptized ( ἐν) into Christ. — That is, immersed into, and made a part of the body of Christ by baptism. The apostle’s meaning is: By baptism being united to Christ as our federal head, all that death happened to him may be considered as happening to us. See Rom. vi. 4, note 2.

2. Have been baptized into his death! 3. In our baptisms, have been represented emblazoned as put to death with him. Hence it is said, ver. 4. “We have been buried together with him by baptism into his death; and ver. 5. “Planted together into the likeness of his death, and of his resurrection;” and ver. 6. “Though we have died with Christ.” See Rom. vii. 4, note 2. From all which it appears, that baptism, the rite of initiation into the Christian church, is an emblematical representation of our union with Christ, as members of his body, and of the efficacy of his death upon us, ver. 10, and upon all mankind, and of the efficacy of Christ’s death in procuring for all the resurrection from the dead. See Rom. xi. 11, note 1.

Ver. 4. — 1. Buried together with him by baptism. — Christ’s baptism was not the baptism of repentance; nor he never communed any sin; but, as was observed, Pref. Esa. 1 at the beginning, he was submitted to be baptized, that is, to be blessed by God, John, and to be raised out of it, as an emblem of his future death and resurrection. In like manner the baptism of believers is emblematical of their own death, burial, and resurrection. See Col. ii. 12 note 1. Perhaps also it is a commemoration of Christ’s baptism.
that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also (ἐνίκησαν αὐτοῖς, ἡ σκότος) shall walk in a new life.

5 (Εἰς γὰρ) For seeing we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (καὶ τίμησαν τὸν κόσμον, οὐκ ἔχων) certainly we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection.

6 Ye know this, that our old man was crucified with him, that the body of sin might be rendered inactive, in order that we may not any longer as slaves serve sin.

7 For he who is dead (ἀθανασία, literally, is justified) is freed from sin.

8 Since then we have died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live together with him.

9 Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death (πέφυκε) no more lardeth it over him.

10 For he who died, died (καταστραφεὶς) by sin once; but he who liveth, liveth (καταστραφεὶς) by God.

11 (Ὅταν γὰρ) So then conclude ye yourselves to be dead verily (καταστραφεὶς) by sin; but alive (ζωῶ) by God; (πέφυκε) through Christ our Lord.

ROMANS.

CHAP. VI.

that though we have been killed by sin, (ver. 6), yet like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the power of the Father, to live for ever, (ver. 8), even so we also, by the same power, shall enjoy a new and never-ending life in heaven with him.

5 For seeing we have been planted together in baptism, in the likeness of his death as occasioned by sin, certainly, by being raised out of the water of baptism, we are taught that we shall be also planted together in the likeness of his resurrection.

6 Ye know this also to be signified by baptism, that our old corrupt nature was crucified together with him, (see Rom. vii. 4. note 2.), that the body, with its affections and lusts, (Gal. v. 24.), which sin brought, might be rendered inactive, in order that we may not any longer as slaves serve sin in the present life.

7 Sin has no title to rule you; for, as the slave who is dead is freed from his master, he who hath been put to death by sin is freed from sin.

8 Since then we have died with Christ, believe that we shall also live together with him in heaven, to die no more.

9 For we know that Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death no more lardeth it over him; but he will live eternally in the body, as we shall do also after our resurrection.

10 I say, dieth no more. For Christ who died, died by the malignity of sin once, that being sufficient to procure our pardon; but Christ who liveth after having died, liveth in the body for ever by the power of God.

11 So then, from Christ's death and resurrection, conclude ye yourselves to be dead verily by sin, and now made alive by God, who at present delivers you from the spiritual death by generation, and will deliver you from the bodily death by a blessed resurrection, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

12 So that ye were then dead to sin, though you now live to God, your life being hid with Christ in God.

13 And if ye mortify the appetites which are at war against the spirit (ἔνεχθαι), and are led by the spirit, ye shall live in fellowship with God.

14 For the life which is the power of the Spirit, is to us the life of glory, when we shall be united with Christ, and we shall be judged by him, and we shall live together with him in heaven.

15 And I believe that through the Spirit we shall be made alive in soul and body together with Christ, that we may be with him throughout the ages of the ages.

16 And the end of our life in Christ is the beginning of our resurrection, from the dead, when Christ shall appear, we shall be glorified with him, for this is our hope of eternal life, and we shall live together with Christ forever in glory.

17 Wherefore, let us live in such a manner as to please God, who is our life, so that our life may be hid with Christ in God, and we may be received into glory with him, that our hope may be fulfilled in Christ.
12 Wherefore, let not sin reign in your mortal body, that ye obey not (by) the lusts of the body. 12 Wherefore, since God hath made you spiritually alive, and is to raise you with immortal bodies, let not sin reign in your mortal body, so as to obey him by fulfilling the lusts of the body.

13 Neither (soever) present ye to sin your members as instruments of unrighteousness; but present yourselves to God as alive from the dead, and to your members to God as instruments of righteousness.

14 Besides sin shall not lord it over you, for this reason, that ye are under a dispensation of law, which gives assistance against sin; but under grace, which affords all the aids necessary for subduing sin.

15 What then do we say? (from ver. 1.) We shall not (under law, but under grace.) By so means.

16 Do ye not know, that to whatsoever ye present yourselves slaves, in order to be obdurate and slaves (ver. 21.) upon whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

17 But thanks be to God, that although (109.) ye were the slaves of sin, yet ye have obeyed the apostle followed his Master, who thus spake of the spiritual resurrection: John 6:23. The hour is coming, and is now, in which the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear it shall live

18. The spiritual resurrection is likewise spoken of in Eph. 2:5.

19. The persons so raised are called new creatures, 2 Cor. 5:17, 18. Upon the resurrection of the body, comprehends the renovation of our nature by a change of our principles and practice, through the powerful assistance afforded us under the new covenant. And on that change, the expressions so often used in scripture are founded—new, new birth, old, new, flesh, spirit.

Ver. 12. 1. Let not sin reign.—To reign, in St. Paul's style, to rule tyrannically, and with such force, that all opposition is vain. The apostle having spoken of believers being put to death by sin, ver. 5. and burned as dead persons with Christ, ver. 6. and their body as crushed with Christ, ver. 6. and its mind as spiritually dead, but both of them as made alive again by Christ, ver. 11. he here expresses that sin, on seeing these things emblematically represented in baptism, was become desireous of entering into their bodies a second time, with a view to exercise the same tyranny over them, by employing the members and lusts of their body in his service. The word reign, is used a few places in scripture, of the domination or supreme power of the civil and ecclesiastical powers. St. Paul, however, applies it here, to express the spiritual domination, in which the flesh has over the soul, and sin has over the believer. The word dominion, it is to be noted, is applied to Christ only in this sense; and to express dominion over our bodies is a term very rare in the scriptures. 2. But present yourselves. This word, many suppose, is a particular word, and not the substantive persons. In the Greek, it is a substantive, and there is a difference between persons and words, which we have used in our English translations. But present yourselves (your minds) to God— and your members to God. The word means present yourselves, appear yourselves, or present yourselves to God. The word present is a word used in the sense of appear, or make presence, and is a word frequently used in the sense of present or present yourselves before God. 3. Sin shall not lord it over you. Sin, as a master, will not lord it over you, as in the former sense. 4. Besides sin shall not lord it over you, for this reason, that ye are under a dispensation of law, which gives assistance against sin; but under grace, which affords all the aids necessary for subduing sin.

15. What then do we say? (from ver. 1.) We shall not (under law, but under grace.) By so means.

16. Do ye not know, that to whatsoever ye present yourselves slaves, in order to be obdurate and slaves (ver. 21.) upon whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

17. But thanks be to God, that although (109.) ye were the slaves of sin, yet ye have obeyed

the apostle followed his Master, who thus spake of the spiritual resurrection: John 6:23. The hour is coming, and is now, in which the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear it shall live. The spiritual resurrection is likewise spoken of in Eph. 2:5. and the persons so raised are called new creatures, 2 Cor. 5:17, 18. Upon the resurrection of the body, comprehends the renovation of our nature by a change of our principles and practice, through the powerful assistance afforded us under the new covenant. And on that change, the expressions so often used in scripture are founded—new, new birth, old, new, flesh, spirit.

Ver. 12. 1. Let not sin reign. Theroen, in St. Paul's style, to rule tyrannically, and with such force, that all opposition is vain. The apostle having spoken of believers being put to death by sin, ver. 5. and burned as dead persons with Christ, ver. 6. and their body as crushed with Christ, ver. 6. and its mind as spiritually dead, but both of them as made alive again by Christ, ver. 11. he here expresses that sin, on seeing these things emblematically represented in baptism, was become desireous of entering into their bodies a second time, with a view to exercise the same tyranny over them, by employing the members and lusts of their body in his service. The word reign, is used a few places in scripture, of the domination or supreme power of the civil and ecclesiastical powers. St. Paul, however, applies it here, to express the spiritual domination, in which the flesh has over the soul, and sin has over the believer. The word dominion, it is to be noted, is applied to Christ only in this sense; and to express dominion over our bodies is a term very rare in the scriptures. 2. But present yourselves. This word, many suppose, is a particular word, and not the substantive persons. In the Greek, it is a substantive, and there is a difference between persons and words, which we have used in our English translations. But present yourselves (your minds) to God— and your members to God. The word means present yourselves, appear yourselves, or present yourselves to God. The word present is a word used in the sense of appear, or make presence, and is a word frequently used in the sense of present or present yourselves before God. 3. Sin shall not lord it over you. Sin, as a master, will not lord it over you, as in the former sense. 4. Besides sin shall not lord it over you, for this reason, that ye are under a dispensation of law, which gives assistance against sin; but under grace, which affords all the aids necessary for subduing sin.
from the heart the mould of doctrine into which ye were called: 18 (3a) And being made free from sin, ye have become the slaves of righteousness.

19 I speak after the manner of men, (1sa., 112,) that you may understand your instruction, (1sa., 95.) Wherefore, as ye have presented your members, (1sa., see, Is.) serve instruments to uncleanliness and to uncleanness, (1sa., see, Is.) to serve iniquity; so now present your members to serve instruments to righteousness, to work holiness.

20 For when ye were slaves of sin, ye were free men, (supply on) as to righteousness.

21 (Osw. 262,) And what fruit had ye then, ye which now live in the light, ye who were lighted? For the reward of these things is death.

22 But now being set free from sin, and having become slaves of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the reward everlasting life.

23 For the wages of sin is death; (1sa., see, Is.) but the gift of God is eternal life, through Christ Jesus our Lord.

Ye yielded to the forming efficacy of that mould of doctrine, and were made new men, both in principle and practice.

The apostle makes fresh application of the following verse: This is the word by which the act of giving a slave his liberty was signified, called by the Romans. emancipation.

Ver. 20.-I speak after the manner of men, (1sa., see, Is.) serve instruments to uncleanliness, and to iniquity; so now present your members to serve instruments to righteousness, to work iniquity.

1. What is meant by present your members? (1sa., see, Is.) That is, compare the object of this verse with previous verses, 3:6, 7. In the latter the object was to present your members to the service of iniquity; in the former it is to present them to the service of righteousness; and both have reference to uncleanliness.

2. We have here a transition from the former view of Christianity to the latter, and a recapitulation of the substance of the first chapter, under a new and still more comprehensive view.

3. This passage is designed to introduce the doctrine of justification, which is the main subject of the whole chapter. The word justified, of course, has reference to the state of being saved from the consequences of sin. Justification is the free gift of God, the title to the merit of the sacrifice of Christ. It is a noun of the substantive denomination, and is used in the sense of justification.

4. Justification is a title to the merit of the sacrifice of Christ, and is a new creation that the regenerate have in Christ, and is said to be a new creation. The word new creation is used to denote the regenerate soul, as being created anew by the Holy Spirit, and as being a new creature in Christ. Justification is a noun of the substantive denomination, and is used in the sense of justification.

5. It is a new creature in Christ, and is said to be a new creation. This is the substance of the doctrine of justification, and is the main subject of the whole chapter. Justification is a noun of the substantive denomination, and is used in the sense of justification.

Next, it is called iniquity; because it is injurious both to God and man. Wherefore, these two epithets exhibit a just description of the nature of sin.

Ver. 21.-For the reward of these things is death. (1sa., Is.) The Greek word μετάποιημα signifies both the end for which a thing is done, and the last issue of it. Therefore, the apostle’s meaning is, that the punishment of sin, to be inflicted on sinners, is the natural consequence, or issue and reward of their sin. The word is used in the first sense, (1sa., see, Is.) Receiving (to μετάποιημα) the end of your faith, the salvation of your souls. (1sa., see, Is.) The end for which you have believed, or the salvation of your souls.

Ver. 22.-For the wages of sin is death. (1sa., see, Is.) The original word ο正常使用, properly signifies the food and pay, which generals give to their soldiers for their service. By using this term, the apostle shows what sort of pay the unrighteous sin gives to those who serve under his banners. Further, in the sin here spoken of is that which men commit personally, and which they continue in, the death which is the wages of this kind of sin, must be death eternal. It is observable, that although in scripture the expression eternal life is often to be met with, we nowhere find eternal joined with death. Yet the punishment of the wicked is said to be eternal. Matt. xxv. 46.

2. Gracious gift of God is everlasting life. (1sa., see, Is.) The apostle does not call everlasting life ο正常使用, the wages which God gives to his servants, because they do not merit it by their services, as the wages of sin merit death by theirs; but he calls it ο正常使用, a free gift; or, as Eliau thinks the word may be translated, a donation; because, being freely bestowed, it may be compared to the donations which the Roman generals, of their own good will, bestowed on their soldiers, as a mark of their favour.

CHAPTER VII.

The apostle, in the preceding chapter, having confuted the slanderous report mentioned chap. iii. 8, that he and his brethren taught their disciples to sin, that grace might abound, judged it necessary in this chapter to repel the objection which the Jewish scribes and heathen philosophers urged against this doctrine of justification without works of law, to discredit the gospel. His discourse begins with observing, that the law of Moses, as the law of God’s visible kingdom and church among the Jews, had dominion over a man, though he were disposed to repent; but when he liveth, ver. 1, 2.

This assertion he proved, by likening the law of Moses to the law of marriage, which binds the wife to the husband only while the husband liveth. But if he die, she is loosed, and may marry another, ver. 2, 3. Wherefore, as the death of either party dissolves their marriage, the Jews, having been put to death by the curse of the law, in the person of Christ were now loosed from their marriage with God, as their king, and from the law of Moses by which God’s kingdom among them was governed, that they might be married to Christ by entering into the gospel church, and, in that new marriage, bring forth fruit unto God, ver. 4. It is true this argument, at first sight, may perhaps appear inept; but if we consider it attentively, it will appear strong and in point, being founded on those passages of scripture, where God represents his connexion with the Jews as their king, under the idea of a marriage solemnized at Sinai, which gave them his law, Exod. xvi. 8, 38; Jer. ii. 2, 3, 11. For by that similitude God intimates to the Jews, that as marriages are dissolved by either of the parties, his connexion with their nation as their king was to end at the time when they, with the rest of mankind, should be put to death in the person of Christ. apostle therefore argued judiciously, from the Jews being put to death in the person of Christ, that their marriage, or connection with God as their king, was dissolved, and that they were loosed from the law of Moses, as the law of God's temporal kingdom. Besides, it was fit that that kingdom and its law should end at the death of Christ. For the temporal kingdom having been erected among the Jews, for the sake of publishing, in the law of Moses, the curse of the law of works originally given to man in paradise, (see Gal. iii. 10. note 2. Rom. x. Illustr.), that they might be sensible of the grace of the gospel, it is evident, that when Christ removed the curse of the law of works by suffering it for all mankind, and opened the gospel dispensation, the kingdom of God among the Jews and Gentiles never was no longer of use, but were set aside, that the Jews might be at liberty to enter into the gospel church, and there bring forth fruit to God.

Next, to shew them the true nature of the law of Moses, and to convince them that it was not intended as a rule of justification, the apostle told the Jews, that while by their fleshly descent from Abraham they were placed under the law of Moses, as the law of God's temporal kingdom, in death, passion, suffering for the guilt of the people, in their members, to make them do such actions as, by the curse of that law, subjected them to death. For this, in effect, was to tell them that the law of Moses was a mere law of works, which required perfect obedience under the penalty of death, and granted pardon to no sinner. See chap. x. Illustr. ver. 4. Consequently, neither that law, nor any other law of works, could be a rule of justification to sinners, ver. 5. And, therefore, at the fall, though Christ had not died, yet because he was to die, to buy off all mankind from the curse of the law, Gal. iii. 13. God was pleased in the prospect of his death, immediately to loose Adam and his posterity from the law of works, and the guilt of justification, and to place them under a new law, in which not perfect obedience, but the obedience of faith, was required in order to life. And to shew this he told them, that as soon as Christ died, the Jews were no longer loosed from the law of Moses, which by its curse annexed to every transgression, appears to have been the original law of works under which Adam fell, but, as persons delivered from the law of works, by their dying with Christ in the nature in which they were tied to that law, they were admitted into the Christian church that they might thenceforth serve God according to the new manner of the law under which mankind were placed at the fall, and not any longer according to the old manner of the law of works, ver. 6.

But lest, from the apostle's telling the Jews, ver. 5, that their sinful passions under the law had put them to death, and from his affirming, ver. 6, that they were loosed from the law on that account, they might suspect that he thought the law of Moses a bad institution, he assured them that he entertained no such opinion. That law, though it could not justify the Jews, was of excellent use as a rule of duty. By its prohibitions, it made them sensible of their sins; and by its curse it shewed them what their sins deserved. As an instance, he mentioned their not being able to satisfy the strong desire of things forbidden is sin, unless the law had said, 'Thou shalt not covet.' ver. 7. Wherefore, when he told them that their sinful passions under the law had wrought in their members, to put them to death, and from this we infer, that sin, which had wrought in them strong desires of things forbidden, which, by the curse of the law, subjected them to death: for without law sin is dead; it hath no power to kill the sinner, ver. 8.—Further, to shew the excellent nature of law, as it makes men sensible both of their sins and of the demerit of their sins, he observed, that while men are ignorant of law, they fancy themselves without sin, and entitled to life; but when, by the operation of law upon their conscience, they come to true knowledge of their own character, they are sensible that sin lives in them, and that they are dead already by the curse, ver. 9.—Thus it hath come to pass, that the law of works, which was originally intended to give life to mankind, hath occasioned their death, ver. 10.—Because their sinful passions, which law cannot subdue, deceive them into the commission of evil actions, which, according to the tenor of the law of works, subjects them to death, ver. 11.—From all which it appears, that instead of being a sinful thing, the law of works, as published in the law of Moses, is holy, even in its curse, and all its commandments are 'holy, and just, and good,' ver. 12.

To this, however, a Jew is introduced replying.—The good law which you so highly praised, notwithstanding its goodness, hath been, by your own acknowledgment, the occasion of my death. This objection the apostle introduced, that he might have an opportunity of shewing more fully the excellent nature of law. For he affirmed a third time, that it is not the law, but sin, which kills the sinner, through the curse of the law; and that it was fit the sinner should be so punished, to shew all the subjects of God's government the exceeding malignity of sin, in destroying the peace and order of the world, ver. 12. Farther, to display the excellency of law still more clearly, the apostle observes, that by the very framers of their own minds, sinners know the law to be spiritual or holy, and that by comparing themselves with the holy law, the unregenerated become sensible that they are carnal, and sold under sin, ver. 14.—The spirituality or holiness of the law every sinner must know by this, that when he doeth the things which the law feth, he doeth not approve of them. On the other hand, the corruption of his own nature, and his inability to do good, he feels, first, by his habitually neglecting to practise what the law enjoins, notwithstanding he hath some feeble inclinations to comply with its good injunctions; and, next, by his habitually doing what the law forbids, notwithstanding he hath some faint hatred of these evil actions, ver. 15.

Now, these feeble volitions, and ineffectual aversions, demonstrate that our reason and conscience assent to all the precepts of the law, as good, ver. 16.—But reason and conscience being the higher part of our nature, and our real selves, the evil actions which we do in opposition to their dictates are not so much our work, the work of our higher part, as the work of the sinful passions which predominate in the animal or lower part of our nature, ver. 17. Thus by law, men are made sensible that they are flesh, or animal part, no good thing dwells; and that being wholly governed by that part, though they have some inclination to what is good, they find it extremely difficult to practise it. This inability in the unregenerate to do the good which they incline, the apostle insisted on, not to drive them to despair, but to make them put a just value on the gospel, which, as he afterwards observes, is alone able to deliver them from the slavery of sin, and to raise the higher part of their nature to its proper superiority, ver. 18.—Next he tells us, that the extreme difficulty of the thing is the true reason that the unregenerated do not the good they incline, but the evil which they do not incline, ver. 19.—And from this infers, that sin is not the work of the higher part of their nature, which is their real selves, but the work of their carnal part. This he has said before, ver. 17.—but he repeats it here, not with any view to excuse the sinner, by laying the blame of his evil actions on the prevalence of his passions, but to shew that all the credit which sinful actions derive, whether from the general practice of the world, or from the station and abilities of the individuals who are guilty of them, is entirely destroyed by this consideration, that they are contrary to the reason and conscience of mankind.

To his account of the discovery which law makes of the state wherein men are by nature, the apostle subjoins a description of the struggle between reason and passion, which rises in the mind of the sinner when awakened by the operation of law on his conscience. Such a person finds, that when he is most strongly inclined by his better part to do what is right, or by his better judgment, sees it to be desirable, the devil presents itself to him as a desirable object; and so constantly, and with such alluring influence, that it may be termed a law, ver. 21. So that, notwithstanding he is pleased with the law of God in his inward man, or spiritual part, ver. 22—he feels an opposite law in his members, or carnal part, warring strongly against the law of his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin which is in his members, ver. 23. And as mere law supplies not strength nor hope to the awakened sinner, but after shewing him sin and death in all their frightful colours, leaves him under the power of sin, and under the condemnation of the curse, the law introduces him crying out, terrified lest being overcome in the conflict he be subjected to eternal death, 'O wretched man that I am, who will deliver me from this body of death!' ver. 24. And if sin from whom his deliverance cometh, he makes the awakened sinner thank God, who graciously delivers him from the slavery of sin, and from the curse of the law, through Jesus Christ, whose gospel offers the assistance of God’s Spirit, and promises eternal life to the repentant believer. The effect of this happy deliverance, the apostle sets forth, by making the delivered sinner declare with joy, that he does not now, as formerly, serve God only with the ineffectual approbations and volitions of his mind, and with his flesh or animal part the law of sin; but as one delivered from that law, he habitually serves God, both with his mind and with his flesh, ver. 25.

Although the apostle, in this chapter, hath spoken more immediately of the Jews, as placed under the law of Moses; yet, as the arguments by which he hath proved their freedom from that law as a rule of justification are equally forcible for proving the freedom of mankind from the law of nature as a rule of justification, the author hath not, in this illustration, departed from the truth, in supposing the apostle designed this passage for both. Further, as the moral precepts and curse of the law of Moses, are in effect the precepts and curse of the law of nature, what the apostle hath written to show the excellence and futility of the law of Moses in making the Jews sensible of their sins, and of their inability to deliver themselves either from the power or from the punishment of their sins, consequently in leading them to seek sanctification and pardon from the grace of God published in the gospel, is equally applicable to the law of nature written on the hearts of men; for it hath the same operation and influence, in making sinners sensible both of their sins, and of the absence of pardon from the grace of God, and in leading them to Christ. We may therefore believe the apostle had both laws in his eye, when he wrote this excellent passage. His principal design, however, was to teach the Jews from their extreme attachment to the law of Moses, and to make them sensible of the absurdity of pressing that law upon the Gentiles; because, however excellent it might be in itself, or however useful for certain purposes, it was, through the infirmity of human nature, as effectual for the sanctification of mankind, as for their justification.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VII.—I speak to them, who know (vnoiaj) law, that the law hath dominion over a man only so long as he liveth.

4 For a woman which hath an husband, husband, is bound by law to her husband while he liveth: but if her husband die, she is loosed from the law of marriage, which bound her to her husband, and hindered her to marry another husband. But if the husband die, she is loosed from that law so that she is no adulteress, though married to another husband.

Commentary.

CHAP. VII.—Ye Jews think the law of Moses is of perpetual obligation; but know ye not, brethren, (for I speak to you who know law), that the law of Moses, as the law of God’s temporal kingdom among the Jews, hath dominion over a man only so long as he liveth; its obligation being that of a law of marriage (Gen. ii. 21-24.) to her husband while he liveth: but if her husband die, she is loosed from the law of marriage, which bound her to her husband, and hindered her to marry another husband. But if the husband die, she is loosed from that law so that she is no adulteress, though married to another husband.

Wherefore, my brethren, since marriages are dissolved by the death of either of the parties, ye Jews, who were married to God as your king, and thereby were bound to obey the law of Moses, are in order that ye may be married; to another, to him who is raised from the dead; that we should bring forth fruit to God."

6 For, when we were in the flesh, the sinful passions (πάθεια) which we had (ἐγερθήσατε, ἐγερθήσατε) were at work in our members, to bring forth fruit unto death.

6 But now (καὶ) we are loosed from the law, having died in that by which we were tied; (συνάχθη) so that we ought to serve in newness of the spirit, and not in oldness of

7 What then do we say, That the law is sin? By no means. Nay, I had not known sin, unless (ἐρρέεσθαι) through law. For even (πρός) that which I would not, that same I do; (οὐκ ἔχω τὸ ἔναπτεῖν) to be sin, unless the law had said, Thou shalt not covet.

8 But I say that sin taking opportunity under the law to kill me by its curse, wrought effectually in me the strongest desire of things forbidden, and thereby subjected me to death, (ἐρρέεσθαι) through the law, sin is dead; hath no power to kill the sinner.

3. That ye may be married. —In this passage the union of Christ with his people is represented as a marriage. So likewise, Ephesians 5:22, 23-25. The apostle uses the language from the ancient pharmacology concerning the Jews. See Illustr. ver. 117. But under the law wrought effectually, it is the same, the same presentation of the relationship which subsists, and will subsist between Christ and believers to all eternity, and of the happiness which they will derive from his love to them, and from their entire subjection to him. To another. —The apostle speaks of Christ as the husband of the believing Jews, because he was now become their Lord and Head; and calleth him also another husband, because, while the obedience subsisted, God was their husband. Isa. liv. 5. Thy maker is thy husband.

5. Even to him who is raised from the dead. —The crucifixion of their old man, or corrupt nature, and their obtaining a new nature through the death of Christ, was a fit preparation of the Jews for becoming servants of Christ, now raised from the dead.

6. That we should bring forth fruit unto God. —The apostle says, That we should bring forth fruit unto God, that he was in the same circumstances with the Jews. The transition from one person to another, as Blackwell observes, Acts. Class. part, i., ch. 2, s. 6, is frequent in Homer. Virgil, Ovid, Petronius, and all the best writers in both languages, and is admired as elliptical and beautiful by readers of taste.

7. Fruit to God. —Holy actions brought forth by the Jews, in connection with their marriage to Christ, or introduction into Christ's church, is called fruit to God, to signify, that although the Jews were loosed from the law by virtue of their being in the spirit, they were not loosed from their obedience to God; and that all the good actions they now performed under the gospel dispensation, are considered by God as belonging to him. Perhaps also in the expression, fruit to God, there is an intimation, that as law gives no assistance for combating the corruptions of our nature, and allows no pardon to any sinner; the evil actions which men commit under law, whether the law of nature or of Moses, are properly fruit to death. See ver. 5.

8. For when we were in the flesh. —The apostle describes the state of the Jews under the law of Moses, by their being in the flesh, and their state under the gospel, as being in the spirit, (συνάχθη, συνάχθη) to show, 1. That their relation to God as his people, was constituted merely by their descent from Abraham according to the flesh, and by their possessing those dispositions of mind which rendered them such as God. They are God's people, not by the flesh, but by the spirit. In other passages of scripture, men being in the flesh, is meant their being in their present state of sin, and by their being in the spirit, their being guided by the spiritual principle of their nature, spiritual and strengthened by the spirit of God. Rom. viii. 4. a note.

9. Ver. 6. —Having died in that by which we were tied. —I have followed the reading adopted by Mill. Bengelius, and others, viz. that the apostle is speaking of this thing. Jesus, who, by his death, destroyed sin, and death, and so, by the law of Moses, were tied to death. But having received baptism, in token of their being put to death with Christ, they were, through that death, strip

2. Law is sin. —A sinful or bad institution, an institution which occasions no good. This is the same as under the law, ver. 6. But under the law, meant, as before, all the services in which true piety and morality consist, were enjoined in the covenant with Abraham, and were practised by the patriarchs. But to these the law of Moses added innumerable services pertaining to the body, from which the converted Jews were freed since their death with Christ.

7. —Ver. 7. —What then do we say, that the law is a bad institution? By no means. Nay, I had not known sin, unless (ἐρρέεσθαι) through law. For even (πρός) that which I would not, that same I do; to be sin, unless the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But I say that sin taking opportunity under the law to kill me by its curse, wrought effectually in me the strongest desire of things forbidden, and thereby subjected me to death, (ἐρρέεσθαι) through the law, sin is dead; hath no power to kill the sinner.
9 (see 106.) Therefore, I was alive (αἰών \( \gammaων \)) without law formerly: But when the commandment came, sin lived again, (Rom. vii. 8.) and I died.

10. (Kor. 212.) And so the commandment which was intended for life, the same was found by me to kill me.

11. For sin taking opportunity (is, 122.) under the commandment, deceived me, and (is) through it slew me.

12. (Tit. 3:1.) Therefore, the law indeed is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good.

13. JEW. The good law, then, to me hath become death! [APOSTLE. By no means. But sin hath become death; that sin might appear sin: death, I say, was reckoned to me, (Rom. vii. 11.) through the good law; that sin might become (κατὰ τὸν θεόν \( \gammaων \) \( \alphaἰω \\( \nu \)) a most exceeding sin, through the commandment.

14. (Lk. 11.) Besides, we know that the law is spiritual: but flesh is carnal, (is) being sold under sin.

15. For what I shall work, I do not approve. For I do not practise what I should, but what I hate, that I do.

trial of things forbidden; yet I prefer the explanation given in the commentary, because the fleshly appetites and other strong evil desires, which now prevail in men's minds, do not owe either their existence, or their operation, or their power to kill, to the prohibitions and penalty of law. Hence it is said, (1 Cor. xiv. 36.) 'The strength of sin is the law.'

2. (Rom. vii. 12.) For without law sin is dead:—sin, which he still considers as a person, would have had no being, or at least no strength to kill men, unless law existed: For the essence of sin consists in its being a violation of law. Through the apostle parables the more directly of the law of Moses, it is equally true of the law of nature, and may be applied to the state of mankind before the law of Moses was given. For unless there had been a law written in men's hearts, sin would have had no existence, or had not had the power to kill.

Ver. 10. — The commandment which was intended for life.

The law of nature, and its transcript in the moral precepts of the law of Moses, were intended for life: for the threatening of death for every offence is virtually a promise of life to those who obey perfectly. This appears from the law given to Adam in paradise.

2. (Rom. vii. 12.) Perfect obedience, being impossible in the present state of human nature, the law which threatened death for every offence, that is, death in death to the sinner, although it was originally intended to give life to the obedient:

3. (Rom. vii. 12.) That sin taking opportunity under the commandments.

So this clause ought to be translated: for no person can fancy that men's evil desires are owing to the prohibitions of law. To entertain an opinion of this kind is to make God the author of sin by his law. The apostle's meaning is, that sin took the opportunity of men being under the commandments, and then to kill death.

4. (Rom. vii. 12.) For this cause ought to be translated, by assuming that I should not die.

The sin speaks of a two-fold opportunity taken by sin, while men are under the commandments.

The first is, sinful dispositions, depriving men of belief that the prohibitions of law are unreasonable, that the thing forbidden is pleasant or profitable, and that it will not be followed with punishment, persuade them to do it. This was the serpent's discourse to Eve; and it is what men's evil inclinations always suggest to them. The second opportunity which sin takes under the commandments, is that of killing the sinner by the curse annexed to the commandments which he hath broken.

Ver. 11. — Through the commandment.

This character of the law is perfectly consonant to truth, whether the apostle is speaking of the law of nature, or of the law of Moses. By the commandment, as distinguished from the law, Bessa understood the commandment.

Ver. 12. — The good law, then, to me hath become death.

As in this and in the subsequent clause, the adjective τὸ εὐλογητὸν, the good, hath no substantive joined to it, I have supplied the substantive τὸ νόμος, law, ordinance, because this is an objection stated by the unbelieving Jew to the apostle's affirmation, that the law is holy, and just, and good: The good law, then, hath become death to me.

2. (Rom. vii. 12.) By no means: But sin hath become death.

Here the apostle clearly distinguishes between the commandments and the law, (Matt. xxii. 43.) God's word is the interpretation of the word, and it is the word which is the witness of the Holy Ghost, (2 Cor. iii. 17.) For sin, it must be observed, is the cause of evil, and of death, the cause of sin; but sin is the work of evil, and of sin: and therefore it should be said, that sin is the cause of evil, and of death, but not that sin is the cause of sin.

The participle ἵνα \( \tauημορίνα \) might be translated infinitively thus—might appear to work out death.
16 And if I do that which I incline not, (egovum) I consent to the law that it is good. (ver. 12.)

17 (Nov 4, 106.) Now, therefore, it is no more that I who work it out, but sin dwelling in me.

18 For I know that good dwelleth not in me, that is, in my flesh. (Rom. 7:14.) Indeed, to incline near me; (ver. 13.) to work out what is (kown) excellent I do not find near me.

19 (Rom. 7:15.) Therefore, I do not the good which I incline but the evil which I do incline, that I practice.

20 Now, if I do that which I do not incline, it is no more I who work it out, but sin dwelling in me.

21 Well then, I find, (ver. 71.) this law to me inclining to do what is excellent, that evil (peccato) lives near me. (See Rom. x. 8, note 2.)

22 For I am pleased with the law of God, according to the inward man.

23 (14.2) But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in members.

24 O wretched man that I am, (ag cruor.)

by no means.

Ver. 24. From the body of this death.]—Some think the translation here may run, from this body of death; joining τοῦ σώματος θανατοῦ with τοῦ σώματος, as done in the Vulgate version. But I think this an emendation of Hebrews, signifying the body, that is, the body of the person, which cause this death, the death threatened in the curse of the law.

Ver. 25. I thank God, who delivereth me through Jesus Christ our Lord. I thank God, who delivereth me through Jesus Christ. See ch. vii., note 2.

25. Our deliverance from these evils does not come from the law, but from the gospel: therefore I thank God, who delivereth us through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Being thus delivered, Do I myself, then, or any delivered person, as slaves, still serve with the mind the law of God, by intellectual appreciations of good and disapprobations of evil, but with the body the law of sin? (ver. 23.), performing wicked actions habitually? No; as become delivered persons, we serve God both with the mind and with the body.

CHAPTER VIII.

Is farther answer to the objection mentioned chap. iii. 31. the apostle, in this chapter, with great feeling and energy, displays the many powerful motives which the doctrines of the gospel, explained in the preceding chapters, suggest, for engaging both the understanding and the affections of believers to a continued pursuit of holiness.

The first motive which he mentions is, That under the new covenant there is no condemnation to believers, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, ver. 1.—This greatest of all considerations, the apostle begins with, that the terror of the awakened sinner, arising from his consciousness of guilt, because if mercy were not with God, he could neither be loved nor obeyed by men.

The second motive is, That under the new covenant, sufficient assistance being given to all, to free them from the law of sin and death, they cannot excuse their evil actions by pleading the strength of their sinful passions, ver. 2.—This deliverance from the law of sin and death God hath accomplished, by sending his Son in the flesh to die as a sin-offering, to procure pardon for sinners, and to destroy the power of sin in their flesh by his word and spirit, that they may attain the righteousness which the law of faith, the new covenant, requires, ver. 4.

And to show the nature and extent of that righteousness, the apostle explains what it is to 'walk after the flesh,' and what it is to 'walk after the Spirit,' ver. 5.

The third motive to holiness is, That, according to the new covenant, all who live a wicked, sensual life, shall die eternally; but every one who lives in a holy, spiritual manner, shall be received into life eternal, ver. 6-8.

The fourth motive is, The spirit of God dwells with believers, whereby the lusts of their body are mortified, and their rational powers are habitually strengthened, ver. 10.

And even the animal part of their nature, after being subdued, is made subservient to righteousness, by the indwelling of the same Spirit, ver. 11.

Such being the effects of the gracious assistances promised in the gospel, no person under the new covenant is irresistibly forced, either by the corruptions of his nature, or by outward temptations, to live according to the flesh, ver. 12—and therefore God hath justly decreed, that all who live according to the flesh shall die eternally, ver. 13.—This declaration concerning future retributions under the new covenant, the apostle had made before, ver. 6.; but he repeats it here, to show that, although the curse of the law, in so far as it allows no mercy to the penitent sinner, does not take place under the new covenant, men's obligations to holiness are not weakened. The sanctions of law are still continued under the gospel, but in a different form, and with a more happy efficacy. Farther, to correct the errors of the Jews, who considered that the Gentile could obtain eternal life who did not obey the law of Moses, and to comfort the believing Gentiles, whom the Jews thus excluded from the favour of God, the apostle declared, that, according to the tenor of the new covenant, all who are led by the Spirit of God to participate in the benefits of the law, are the sons of God, whether they be Jews or Gentiles. And to shew the excellent disposition of the sons of God, he observes, that not withstanding under the new covenant the severest punishment is threatened against sinners, the sons of God do not obey him from that slavish fear of punishment which was bred in the minds of the Jews by the curse of the law, but from the filial dispositions of gratitude and love to the Father, ver. 15.—This excellent temper the apostle terms 'the witness of our spirit' that we are children of God; and observes, that the Spirit of God also confirms that witness, by his gifts and graces, bestowed indiscriminately upon the believing Gentiles as well as upon the Jews, ver. 16.

Having thus shown, that all who obey God sincerely, from a principle of faith, are his sons, the apostle, as the fifth motive to holiness furnished by the gospel, gives a particular account of the honours, privileges, and possessions of the sons of God. 'They are the sons of God.' And to shew what an heir of God is, he adds, and 'joint heirs with Christ' so that the whole felicity of that immortal life which Christ now enjoys in the human nature, really belongs to the other sons of God, whether they be Jews or Gentiles; and they shall be put in possession thereof, if, when called to it, they suffer, as Christ did, for righteousness' sake, ver. 17. — This concerning suffering the apostle introduced, to teach the Romans, that their being the sons of God would not secure them against, but rather expose them to sufferings. And to prevent the Jews, who considered prosperity as a token of God's favour, from being scandalized at the gospel on account of the sufferings which accompanied it, and even to encourage them to suffer, he observed, that that glorious resurrection by which the sons of God are to be distinguished, is a blessing so great, that the pious Gentiles supported the miseries of life by earnestly looking for it, ver. 18-19. — Nor was their expectation without foundation, inasmuch as not for the sin of the first man, the human race was subjected to death by God, ver. 20. — in the firm resolution that he would deliver all mankind from the grave, through the oblation of Christ, ver. 21. — By instancing that the expectation which the Gentiles entertained of a future life in the body, was derived from God's resolution to raise all mankind from the dead, the apostle, I suppose, means God's resolution made known at the fall, that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent. For that promise, in its true meaning, being preserved among the Gentiles by tradition, was the foundation of the hope which many of them, in different parts of the world, entertained of the resurrection of the body, and of a future state. See Chap. I. View, remark 2. p. 53. Then, by a beautiful rhetorical figure, the apostle introduces the whole Gentile world as suffering extreme pain under the miseries of life, and earnestly willing for deliverance, ver. 22. — Believers also groan within themselves, while they wait for the redemption of their body from the bondage of corruption, ver. 23. — But they wait patiently, and thereby show the strength of their faith, ver. 24, 25. — And to this exercise of patience they are helped by the Spirit, who, by afflictions, produces in them such a disposition of mind, as is an effectual complaint to God, ver. 26. — When he is being wrought in them by the Spirit, it is justly termed the Spirit's complaining for the saints,' ver. 27. The sixth motive to holiness, furnished by the discourse made in the gospel, is this: God having determined to save believers, they know that every thing, whether prosperous or adverse, shall work together for that end; so that their salvation is absolutely certain. The reason is, God hath called and predestinated the seed of Abraham, and the sons of God, (1 John iii. 1.) and heirs of immortality, according to his purpose, ver. 28. — And whom he foreknew to be his sons, them he also predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son Christ, both in their body and mind, ver. 29. — Moreover, whom he predestinated to be conformed to the image of Christ, them he also called or denominated the seed of Abraham, and gave them a right to all the blessings promised to Abraham's seed; and whom he so called, them he also justified and glorified, ver. 30. — And having thus described the salvation of believers, in its origin, its intermediate steps, and its issue, the apostle, strongly impressed with the certainty thereof, asks, What shall we say to these things? Since God is for us believing Jews and Gentiles, no person can hinder our being accounted the seed of Abraham and the sons of God, or prevent us from receiving the inheritance promised to such, ver. 31. — For he who delivered his own Son to death for us all, for the Gentiles as well as for the Jews, will with him also freely give us all the blessings promised to the seed of Abraham and sons of God, ver. 32. — Then, as expectuated with the view which he had taken of those grand subjects, and to show that there is no condemnation to them, who are in Christ Jesus, he cries out, Who shall dare to bring any accusation against God's elect, since God hath declared that he will justify such by faith? ver. 33. — Who is he that will pretend to condemn them, since Christ hath died to procure their pardon, and now governs the world for their benefit, and makes intercession with the Father in their behalf? ver. 34. — Then personifying the whole body of believers, strongly affected with the goodness of God shown in their salvation, and highly elated with the view of their privileges so unanswerably established, he, in their name, professes their firm resolution of adhering to the gospel, that they may continue in the aspects of Christ's love, however many or strong the temptations may be with which they are assaulted, ver. 35. to the end of the chapter.

The latter part of this chapter, beginning at ver. 31, if compared with the most shining passages of the so much admired writings of the Greeks and Romans, will be found not inferior to any of them in sublimity of thought, variety of figures, and beauty of language. It contains a description, in most forcible and glowing expressions, of the privileges, the hopes, and the temper of a true Christian, and shews what magnanimity and what greatness of sentiment the gospel is able to infuse into them who understand and believe its doctrines. It is therefore a most proper conclusion of a discourse, in which, by the strongest reasoning, practices are recommended, which enable the human mind, yield the greatest and the most permanent joys, and prepare men for becoming the companions of angels, and for living with God himself through all eternity.

On reviewing the encouragements to holiness proposed by the apostle in this and the three foregoing chapters, the reader must be sensible, that the scheme of salvation revealed in the gospel, suggests motives to persuade men to forsake sin and follow holiness, and even to suffer for well-doing, more in number, and of greater efficacy, than any preacher, either of the law of nature or of Moses, ever proposed, or indeed had its power to propose. And therefore the catenam of the Jewish scribes and heathen philosophers, mentioned chap. iii. 31, that by teaching the justification of sinners, through faith, without works of law, the apostles of Christ made void the obligations of morality, and encouraged men to sin, was altogether without foundation. The doctrine of justification, instead of weakening the obligation of law, strengthens it in the highest degree. — Further, because in the chapters above mentioned, the apostle shewed that God's counting men's faith to them for righteousness, on account of the death of his Son, furnishes such a variety of powerful motives for persuading sinners to repent and return to God, these chapters do in effect demonstrate the natural efficacy of the death of Christ, in delivering believers from the power of sin. Whence it follows, that the gospel method of pardoning sinners through the death of Christ is an exercise of mercy, which, instead of weakening, hath greatly strengthened the authority of the law of God; consequently, it is perfectly suitable to his character, and subservient to the end of his moral government. The efficacy, therefore, of Christ's death, in delivering us from the power of sin, being thus evident, we cannot doubt of its efficacy as an atonement in delivering us from the punishment of sin, notwithstanding we are ignorant of the manner in which it operates for that end. See Heb. ii. 10. note 4.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VIII. — There is therefore now no condemnation to those in Christ Jesus; who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit, ver. 1. — Mankind under the new covenant being delivered from the curse of the law, there is therefore now no condemnation to these Christians who walk not according to the inclinations of their flesh, but according to the inclinations of their spirit, enlightened and strengthened by the Spirit of God.

2. We the disciples of Christ are able so to walk, because the law of the gospel, which promises eternal life by Jesus Christ, has delivered us from the power of sin in our members, and from the curse of death.

3. For God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and of sin-offering, hath condemned sin in the flesh, (the thing impossible to the law, because it was weak through the flesh.)

4. That the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled (w. 155.) by us, who walk not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit. (See Rom. viii. 1.)

5. Now, they (are we) who live according to the flesh, mind the things of the flesh, and they who live according to the Spirit, the things of the Spirit. (Rom. vii. 18.)

6. (Rom. viii. 2.) But the mind of the flesh is death, and the mind of the Spirit is life and peace.

7. (Rom. viii. 6.) Because the mind of the flesh is enmity against God: for to the law of God it is not subject, neither indeed can it be.

Ver. 1. To those in Christ Jesus who walk not, &c.—The character of the persons to whom there is no condemnation consists of two parts. First, see to it that there is in Christ Jesus. They are members of that great society consisting of all believers, called Christ’s body, Col. ii. 24. John xiv. 2. Next, they walk not according to the flesh, (Gal. iv. 43.) but according to the Spirit.—To walk according to the flesh, is to be wholly governed by those immediate appetites which have their seat in the flesh: To walk according to the Spirit, is to be habitually governed by reason and conscience, enlightened and strengthened by the Spirit of God. Hence such are said to be led by the Spirit, ver. 14.

Ver. 2.—For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus.—This, according to some commentators, is ‘the law of the mind,’ (ch. viii. 2.) consisting in the predominance of reason and conscience through the assistance of Christ; so that the person who is guided by it, is qualified for eternal life. But I rather think this is the apostle’s speech of the law, called ‘the law of the Spirit,’ because it was given by the Spirit, and confirmed with us by fire: (see Gal. iii. 3. note); and ‘the law of life,’ because it promises life to those who live according to the Spirit.

2. Hath freed me from the law of sin and death.—That is, the power of sin, which brings on men the curse of death. This has some effect on the soul with more particular reference to the law of the Spirit, if it be the gospel we mean, than if we understand it of the law of the mind. It is observable, that the person who speaks in the foregoing chapter is introduced here, as continuing the discourse of the preceding method, in which his deliverance from the body of death, mentioned viii. 25., was accomplished.

3. But the condemnation sin in the flesh.—No such phrase is used in the original, nor is there any such sense to be put on it. The word σκέπασμα, condemned, in this context, seems to be used in the sense of putting in a place of danger, in a situation of danger, or under the power of danger; as in 1 Pet. iv. 6. in the sense of putting to death; for it is there opposite to the being made alive.

4. The thing impossible to the law.—He was condemned in men’s stead, under the law, as well as under the gospel: for under the law there were many priests and holy men; but sin was condemned in their flesh, not by any power inherent in, or derived from the law; this condemnation came freely from the grace of the gospel, preached to them in the covenant with Abraham, Gal. iii. 16. 17. 24. that is set forth in the type of the law, Acts xxiii. 32. This, properly, is the thing impossible to the law.

5. Because it was weak through the flesh.—The law was not weak or defective in itself, a certain rule of duty, and its sanctions were sufficiently powerful to enforce obedience, in those who were able to obey; but it was weak through the depravity of men’s nature, which it had neither power to resist in itself: and so could not destroy sin in man’s flesh. These defects of law are all remedied in the gospel. For therein pardon is promised to encourage sinners to repent, and the assistance of the Spirit of God is offered to enable them to obey.

Ver. 4. That the righteousness (Ver. 5.) of God may be fulfilled by us, who walk, &c.—The righteousness of the law may be fulfilled by us, through our walking according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit, is not perfect obedience to any law whatever, for that is not attainable in the present life; but it is such a degree of faith and holiness as believers may attain through the influence of the Spirit. And being the righteousness required in the gracious covenant made with mankind after the fall, and fully published in the gospel, that covenant, and the gospel in which it is published, are fitly called ‘the law of faith.’ Rom. iii. 26. and the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, Rom. viii. 2. and the law of Christ, Gal. vii. 2. and the law of liberty, James i. 25. and the commandment, that the fourth day of the week is to be kept holy unto the Lord, Lev. xxiii. 4. is an eternal law, for which the Jews or Gentiles were to wait. Im xliv. 2.—It gives a quite different turn to this passage by translating it, "It justifies; ‘That right that the law of the flesh, namely its right to perfect obedience from men, might be fulfilled in us by the imputation of Christ’s righteousness.’ But ἡ ἀληθινὴ νοηματία has this signification; not to mention, that Bles’s translation represents the believer as absolutely passive in fulfilling the righteousness of the law, directly contrary to the apostle’s meaning, who in so many words teaches, that the righteousness of the law is rendered, not to us, but by believers, through their walking not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit.

Ver. 5.—Now they (are we) who live according to the flesh.—One of the senses of ἀνέφερεν is to exist, or live. Phil. ii. 10. They do not live, they are dead. See Parkh. Dict. τοῦ ἀνέφερέν. 2. Mind the things of the flesh.—The original word, ἀσκές, was meant to set one’s affection on an object, and to use great pains in obtaining it, Col. ii. 2. Wherefore, to mind the things of the flesh, is to love and pursue sensual pleasure as our chief happiness.

Ver. 6. But the mind of the flesh is death.—According to the remark in the foregoing note, ἀνέφερεν, the mind of the flesh, is the employing of our whole thought, and pains, and time, in gratifying and in provoking for the gratification of the lusts of the flesh. What Socracis said to his judges, may with propriety be mentioned here: "My whole employment is to persuade the young and old against too much love for the body, for riches, and all other precious things, of whatsoever nature they be; and against too little regard for the soul, which ought to be the object of their affection.

Ver. 7.—Because the mind of the flesh is enmity against God.—This is an argument for punishing them who live sensual lives, which deserves attention. God, out of friendship toward us, set at different times prophets and righteous men, and last of all his own Son, to warn them against the immense love of sensual pleasures, and to train them to the love of spiritual enjoyments, that they might be capable of living with him in heaven, Acts xx. 34. Wherefore, the mind of the things of the flesh, to the neglecting of the things of the spirit, is the employing of the men of heaven, whom God in direct opposition to God’s friendly intentions: consequently it is enmity against God, and is deservedly punished with death. Besides, the sensualist, looking on the law of God as obstructing his lusts, hates it. Nay, he hates even God himself on account of his law, as too difficult and severe.

For the law of God is not subject, neither indeed can be.—A second reason why the mind of the flesh is not subject, is, that it is rebellious against the law of God, which he cannot obey. We do not mean that it is passed from, without overthrowing that external righteousness, by which he preserves the moral nature of the world.
CHAP. VIII.

8 (Ca. 105). Wherefore, they (νῦν εἰς ἑαυτὸν) were not able to enter into the rest which God hath prepared for them that love Him. For they were not able to enter into the rest because of their faithlessness in the life that is after death.

10 (Ca. 105). For if any one have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body, truly, is dead (ἵνα) with respect to sin, but the spirit is life (ζωὴ) with respect to righteousness.

13 (Ca. 93). Wherefore, if ye live according to the flesh, ye shall die; but if through the Spirit ye put to death the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

14 (Ca. 90). Because, as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God.

15 For ye have not received the spirit of bondage (see Gal. iv. 3, note), again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father.

ALSO, the Spirit itself beareth witness

Ver. 8. They who live to the flesh (see ver. 5, note 1) cannot please God. — According to Locke, "the life of the flesh" is the life of the animal body, and the life of the soul, or the life of the spirit, is the life of the soul, or the spirit of the mind.

Ver. 13. The body, truly, is dead (ἵνα) with respect to sin. — Here I have followed Chrysostom, Photius, and Oecumenius, who explain the expression in this verse, by "καὶ," according to the usage of the ancient, and the true meaning of the passages. For that sense would be absurd, in saying, "that the bodies of men are dead through sin, if Christ be in them?" Men’s bodies certainly are dead through sin; and if sin be put away, they shall not be common sin habitually, but rather by feigning their visits to our better inclinations, become subordinated to a better life. But those who, by the Spirit of God, are made children of God, are not subject to sin any longer by nature, but by grace, and by the redemption of their body, become immortal and holy.

Ver. 15. Ye have received the spirit of adoption. — In proof that the truth, as well as the Jewish believers, are the sons of God, the apostle appealed to those sentiments of reverence and love, and to that assurance of God’s favour, with which their minds were filled since they had believed the gospel, and which they very properly term “the spirit of adoption.”

1. By which we cry, Abba, Father. — To the same purpose the apostle told the Galatians, ch. iv. 6. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." — Crying signifies praying with a loud voice, from a strong emotion of mind. (Kest. xvi. 26.) And the Lord said unto Moses, wherefore criest thou unto me Father? Because, the oblation wrought between Christ and his lost sinners addressed God. Luke x. 16. It suggests to us, that in their greatest distress, they who are led by the Spirit of God, may, after the example of Christ, express entire confidence in the fatherly affection of God, that he will not forsake them, but will make their redemption acceptable to him. For the article shows you, in the nominative case, that the apostle added the common article or preposition, to give an interpretation of the Greek word αὐτός. But if that had been his intention, he would have written: αὐτός, and the LXX. οὗτος. "God be merciful to us a sinner." together with our spirits; that we are children of God.
17. And if children, then heirs; heirs, verily, of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if we jointly suffer, that also we may be jointly glorified.

18. For I reckon, that the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which is about to be revealed in us. 1 Pet. 1. 4.

19 For the earnest desire of the creature waiteth for the revelation of the sons of God.

For the creature was subjected to vanity, not willing it, but by him who hath subjected it.

That we are children, Rom. 8. 16,—By this argument, the apostle proves that the great honour of being the sons of God was not restricted to the Jews. All who believe with the mind and heart are the sons of God, as is evident from their possessing the spirit of God's children. Besides, in the first and second paragraph of the chapter, there was a depression in the spiritual gifts bestowed on them. The former of these intuitions the apostle has described in the name of the spirit of adoption, Rom. 8. 15, the latter he speaks of in this verse, and calls it the spirit, because the spiritual gifts come from the Spirit. And as these testimonies concurred in establishing the same fact, the apostle justly affirmed, that the Spirit of God, in the first age, bare witness with the spirit of believers, that they were the children of God. Hence God is said to have sealed the believing Gentiles as his sons, by giving them the Spirit. See 1 Cor. 1. 26. v. 5, but especially Ephes. 1. 13. 14.—Because *

And as these testimonies concurred in establishing the same fact, the apostle justly affirmed, that the Spirit of God, in the first age, bare witness with the spirit of believers, that they were the children of God. Hence God is said to have sealed the believing Gentiles as his sons, by giving them the Spirit. See 1 Cor. 1. 26. v. 5, but especially Ephes. 1. 13. 14.—Because * 23 Rom. 8. 26, шаи moov to vanity, not willing it, Rom. 8. 24, but by him who hath subjected it.

21 In hope, Rom. 8. 24, that even the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, Rom. 8. 21, into the freedom of the glory of the children of God.

22 Rom. 8. 23, Besides, we know that every creature has groaned together, and travailleth in pain together until now.

that we are children, Rom. 8. 16,—By this argument, the apostle proved that the great honour of being the sons of God was not restricted to the Jews. All who believe with the mind and heart are the sons of God, as is evident from their possessing the spirit of God's children. Besides, in the first and second paragraph of the chapter, there was a depression in the spiritual gifts bestowed on them. The former of these intuitions the apostle has described in the name of the spirit of adoption, Rom. 8. 15, the latter he speaks of in this verse, and calls it the spirit, because the spiritual gifts come from the Spirit. And as these testimonies concurred in establishing the same fact, the apostle justly affirmed, that the Spirit of God, in the first age, bare witness with the spirit of believers, that they were the children of God. Hence God is said to have sealed the believing Gentiles as his sons, by giving them the Spirit. See 1 Cor. 1. 26. v. 5, but especially Ephes. 1. 13. 14.—Because * 23 Rom. 8. 26, шаи moov to vanity, not willing it, Rom. 8. 24, but by him who hath subjected it.

23 And not only they, but ourselves also, who have (συνίστασθαι) the first-fruit of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, namely, the redemption of our body.

24 For we are saved (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, 25.) in hope: now hope is seen, is not hope? for what a man seeth, (250.) how also can he hope for it?

25 But, if we hope for what we do not see, we wait (καθευδίζομεν) with patience for it.

26 (ὑπὲρτρεπτέον ἐστιν.) And likewise, even the Spirit helps our infirmities: for what we cannot do we know not: but the Spirit himself (καθευδίζειν) cometh

27 And he (ὁς) searcheth the hearts, knoweth what the mind of the Spirit is (καθευδίζειν), for the Spirit is (ἡμέρα) to the Son, and the Son (τὸν) the Father. Besides, we know that all things work together for good to them who love God, to them who are called according to his purpose.

28 (Οὐχὶ) For whom he foreknew, he also unspottably, were not it for the hope which maketh all along entertain of a happy life after death, called, ver. 21. 'The glory of the children of God.'

29 Ver. 21. — Who have the first-fruit of the Spirit. — Because first-fruits signify the best blessings of their kind, it is thought that the apostle, and such as possess them, are the most eminent spiritual gifts, are spoken of in this passage. But as the proverb is described, ver. 25, 26, equally belong to all, I rather think the apostle speaks of believers in general, who have the gifts of the Spirit bestowed on them as first-fruits, or as the earnest of those greater spiritual gifts and spiritual endowments, which they shall enjoy in heaven. See 2 Cor. 1. 21 note 3.

30. Groan within ourselves. — This groaning of the persons who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, was not the effect of impatience. See above, p. 25. And we are sure from the apostle's reason, that the Spirit by these groanings made complaint for the saints.

31. Waiting for the adoption, namely, the redemption of our body. — This is an allusion to our Lord's words. Luke xx. 38. 'And am I not the children of God as he?' The question is to be answered, that the Spirit by these groanings made complaint for the saints. For if men are the children of God by being the children of the resurrection, the apostle had good reason to say, 'he is the offspring of God's kingdom, of his adoption.' Besides, it is by that which the saints are ransomed, as the children of God, in behalf of the kingdom of their Father. And as the high and happy adoption was signified by the adoption of Isaac and his descendants, so they obtained a right to the inheritance of Canaan, the apostle, speaking hereof, doth allude to the custom of the Jews, of the slain, but to the phrasology of God himself concerning his church and people: Exod. i. 6. 'I will bring my son, even my firstborn.' In this phrase, ἐγὼ ἐξελέξαν καὶ ἐγὼ ἐγνωρίσαν, redemption of our body, is used, because the resurrection of the children of God to eternal life is obtained by the merit of the first-born, according to the meaning of the usual word, Rom. viii. 23. note 4.

32. Now hope is seen, is not hope? — Hope, by an unusual metonymy, is put for the object of hope. And in scripture, to see signifies to enjoy, and sometimes to obtain. See the meaning of the word, ver. 21. note 2.

33. The Spirit helps our infirmities. — Properly the Greek word συνίστασθαι signifies, bear together with another, by taking hold of the thing borne on the opposite side, as persons who assist one another in carrying heavy burdens. This word συνίστασθαι, translated information, signifies weaknesses and diseases of the body; but it is often transferred to the mind. Augustine interprets it of the weakness of our prudence; an interpretation which seems to be confirmed by what follows in the text. Perhaps the apostle meant that the Spirit helped their infirmity, by inspiring them with a proper prayer. See 1 Cor. xiv. 13.

34. For what we should pray for as we ought, we do not know: — Of this Paul himself was an example, when he prayed thrice to be delivered from the present evil age. 1 Pet. iii. 12. But the spirit himself strongly complaineth for us, by inarticulate groanings, literally, grunts, or grumblings. For the meaning of the word, see ver. 26. note. The apostle having observed, ver. 26. that every creature groaneth to be delivered from vanity and corruption; Paul, having told us, that they who have the first-fruit of the spirit groan within themselves, waiting for the redemption of their body; no doubt, he means, that these secret groanings, and vehement desires, especially under the pressure of affliction, are not fruitless. For although we utter no

30 Moreover, whom he predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son, them he also called, them he also justified, and by counting their faith for righteousness: and whom he justified, them he also glorified, by putting them in possession of the eternal inheritance.

31 What shall we say then to these things? what mighty believers are proved to be the sons and heirs of God? Since God, who hath the whole power of this matter in his hand, is for us, since he sustains our claim to these honours, who can be against us?

32 He certainly who spared not his proper Son, but delivered him up to die for us all, for believers among the Gentiles as well as among the Jews, how, do ye think, will he not with him also gratuitously give us all the other blessings promised to the children of God?

23 At the judgment, who will stand in the act of persecution against the elect of God? Since it is God who justifieth them by faith, neither angel nor man can frustrate his sentence.

34 Who is he who condemneth us believers? It is Christ who died to obtain pardon for us, or rather, who hath risen from the dead to take possession of the government of the universe for our behoof; who also is at the right hand of God as ruler, and who maketh intercession for us.

35 Elated with our privileges, we cry out, Will any thing induce us to renounce our faith, and make us no longer the objects of Christ's CHAP. IX.

Throughout the page, the text is a continuation of the previous discussion on distress, persecution, and the general theme of suffering. The page ends with a reference to the concept of love in the context of suffering, stating that love will overcome all adversities and that the love of God is bestowed on those who endure suffering through Christ Jesus. The text concludes with an emphasis on the promise of the faithful seed of Abraham, which would bring eternal life, and the role of faith in receiving this promise.

love? will affliction in body, or distress in our affairs, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or danger, or deadly weapons, be able to do this? 36

Sufferings have always been the lot of God's people: As it is written, Psal. xli. 2, (42, 229,) Truly, for thy sake we are put to death in a lingering manner: we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter, by our persecutors.

37 These evils have not hitherto made us forfeit the love of Christ. Nay in all these things we do more than overcome, (I) through him who hath loved us.

38 For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, whether good or evil, 39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, will be able to separate us from the love of God, which is through Christ Jesus our Lord.

which we bear to Christ. But 'separate us from our own love,' is an unusual expression.

1. Distress, or distress?—Ita, et al., translated affliction, signifies sickness, and other bodily evils; whereas the original, distress, is trouble of mind, arising from double fault and persecutions.

Ver. 36. For thy sake we are put to death all the day long: we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.—The Psalm from which this quotation is taken is thought to have been written during the Babylonish captivity, when the Jews suffered great persecution for their religion.

Ver. 37. Nay, in all these things we do more than overcome.—The purpose is to obtain a great victory. The victory which the people of God have obtained over their persecutors is of a very singular nature. It consists in their patient bearing of all the evils which their persecutors inflict upon them, and that through the assurance of Christ, and in imitation of his example. For by suffering in this manner they maintain their cause in spite of all opposition, and considerably their persecutors.

Ver. 38. Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers.—Because angels are distinguished from principalities and powers, hence and Deut. 18. are of opinion, that powers in this passage, as in Luke xii. 11, signify the persecuting rulers and powers of the earth, who opposed in their faith to make the first Christians renounce their faith. But as evil angels, in other passages of scripture, are called principalities and powers, and as the apostle rises in his description, it is probable that he speaks of these malignants spirits, the inventors of human schemes of mankind; and that he calls them principalities and powers, by an unusual metaphor of the office or power possessed by the persons possessing it.

2. Nor things present, nor things to come.—The apostle does not mention things past, because they have no influence on the mind, unless so far as the like things are either hoped or feared.

Ver. 39. Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature.—In this general clause, the apostle includes whatever else could be named, as having any influence to separate believers from the love of God, exercised towards us through Christ.

CHAPTER IX.

The apostle having insinuated, chap. iii. 3, that God would cast off the Jews because they refused to believe on Jesus, a Jew was there introduced replying, that their rejection would destroy the faithfulness of God. To this the apostle answered, that the faithfulness of God would be established, rather than destroyed, by the rejection of the Jews for their unbelief; because God had expressly declared, Gen. xviii. 19, that Abraham's children were 'to keep the way of the Lord,' in order to their obtaining the promised blessings; and thereby insinuated, that if they did not keep the way of the Lord, they would lose these blessings, of which their being made the visible church of God was one. See chap. iii. 4, note 1. This was all the answer the apostle thought proper to make in that part of his letter. But the objection being so specious, and much insisted on by the unbelieving Jews, he introduced it a second time in this place, that he might reply to it more fully.

His answer the apostle introduced with a solemn assurance, that he felt the bitterest grief when he considered the indulgence, and rejection of the Jewish nation, and the many miseries that were coming on them, ver. 1, 2. Inasmuch that he could have wished to be cut off from the visible church of Christ on earth, by excommunication, and even by death, if it could have prevented these evils, ver. 3. For he loved the Jews as his kinsmen, and respected them as the ancient people of God, and thought highly of their privileges, which he enumerated on this occasion as just matter of glory to them, ver. 4, 5. Having therefore such a love and respect for his brethren, they could not suspect, that in speaking of their rejection, he was moved either by ill-will or envy.

Having thus endeavoured to gain the good opinion of the Jews, the apostle proceeded to give a full answer to the objection above mentioned. He told them, the promises in the covenant would not fall to the ground, though the whole natural seed of Abraham should be cast off. For, said he, all who are descended of Israel according to the flesh, meaning the twelve tribes, these are not the whole seed of God. There is a spiritual Israel, to whom likewise the promises belong, ver. 6. To show this, he observed, that because persons are the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, it does not follow that they are the children of Abraham to whom the promises in their first and literal meaning were made. His children according to the flesh, who are heirs of the promises in their first meaning, were limited to Isaac, by the declaration, 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called,' ver. 7. That is Abraham's children according to the flesh, are not all of them the children of God, and heirs of Canaan; but only those who were given to him by promise are counted to him for seed, ver. 8. Now the promise by which they were given to Abraham for seed was this, 'Lo, Sarah shall have a son,' ver. 9.

The limitation of the natural seed to the children of promise, the apostle hath mentioned, without applying it to the spiritual seed, as his argument required. The reason was, his readers could easily make the application in the following manner: Since in the covenant with Abraham, those only of his natural progeny are counted to him for seed and made heirs of Canaan, who were given to him by promise, namely Isaac and his descendants by Jacob, and since by this limitation all his other children according to the flesh were excluded from being accounted the children of God, and heirs of the promises in their first and literal meaning, it follows by parity of reason that none of the children of Abraham, not even his descendants by Isaac, are the children of God, and heirs of the promise, in their secondary, spiritual, and highest meanings, but those who were given to Abraham by the promise, "A father of many nations I have constituted them." These are believers of all nations and ages; as is plain from what the apostle told the Galatians, ch. iv. 28. "We, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise." And because believers are counted to Abraham for seed in respect of their faith, they are called his seed by faith, Rom. iv. 16. For, by partaking of his dispositions, they are more really his children than those whose only relation to him is by natural descent. Thus it appears, that Abraham's natural descendants by Isaac are not the whole of his seed who are heirs of the promises. He hath a seed also by faith, who are far more numerous than his natural seed by Isaac. And they being the seed principally spoken of in the covenant, if the promises are fulfilled to them, the faithfulness of God will not be destroyed, though the whole of the natural seed should be rejected for their unbelief.

These things the Jews might easily have understood. Nevertheless, privileges conferred on them by a covenant with their progenitor, and which were solemnly confirmed to them at Sinai, they persuaded themselves could not be taken from them, and given to the Gentiles, without destroying God's power and the glory of his covenant. But to ease his weight of that error, the apostle put them in mind, that as Isaac was chosen to be the root of the people of God, in preference to Ishmael, by mere favour, so afterwards Jacob had that honour conferred on him, in preference to Esau, by a gratuitous election before Jacob and Esau were born. As therefore the Jews, Jacob's posterity, were the church of God by mere favour, God might, without any injustice to them, or violation of his covenant with Abraham, admit the Gentiles into his church at any time he pleased, ver. 10-13.

To enforce this argument, the apostle observed, that in preferring Jacob the younger brother, to Esau the elder, God neither acted unjustly towards Esau, nor violated his promise to Abraham, because he might bestow his favours on whichever of Abraham's sons he pleased, ver. 14. "As appears from what he said to Moses, when he forgave the Israelites sin respecting the golden calf; 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy,' &c.; for this implies that in pardoning national sins, as well as in conferring national favours, God acts according to his own good pleasure, ver. 15. So then, it did not depend on Isaac, who willed to make Esau the heir of the promise, by giving him the blessing; nor on Esau, who ran to bring vengeance, that his father might cut and bless him; but on the good pleasure of God, who willed to confer that honour on Jacob, preferable to Esau, ver. 16."

But the apostle, in his discourses to the Jews, had on different occasions carried this matter farther, and had declared to them, that they were to be deprived of their privileges, and driven out of Canaan, for their sin in crucifying Jesus of Nazareth. To this it seems they replied, that the unbelief, and even the rebellion of their fathers, had not been so punished; and inferred, that although the present generation, in crucifying Jesus, had really disobeyed God, it was not to be thought that he would now cast off and destroy his people on that account. In answer, the apostle told them, that in punishing nations God exercises the same sovereignty as in conferring favours. Of the wicked nations which deserve to be punished, he chooses such as it pleased him to make examples of, and he defers punishing them, until the measure of their iniquity is full, that their punishment may be the more conspicuous. This appears from God's words to Pharaoh: "I have upheld thee and thy people hitherto, that the measure of your iniquity as a nation, becoming full, I might shew my power and justice in punishing you the more severely, ver. 19. If so, God's upholding the Jews so long was no proof that he would not at length cast them away, and drive them out of Canaan, for their sin in crucifying the Christ. But thou wilt reply, since God hath destined to destroy the Jewish nation for its wickedness, why hath he not done it ere now, and thereby put an end to his still finding fault with them on account of their repeated rebellions, to which his sparing them so long hath given occasion; for who hath resisted his will? ver. 19. To this the apostle answers, Who art thou that presuppest to find fault with God's government of the world! Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou wrought this? Is it not I? ver. 20. Hast not the potter power over the clay?&c., ver. 21. But, said he, not to rest his answer wholly on the sovereignty of God, what can be said against God's foreseeing for so long a time to destroy the Jewish nation, if it was done to shew, more fully, his displeasure against the greatest national abuse of religious privileges long continued in, and the more signal to punish the nation guilty of such an abuse, ver. 22. Also, that he might take in their place before them, and whom he had determined from the beginning to make his church and people, and whom, by his dispensations towards the Jews, he had been preparing for that great honour, ver. 23, 24. Which calling of the believing Jews and Gentiles, was long ago foretold by Hosea, ver. 25, 26. Besides, the destruction of the greatest part of the Jewish nation for crucifying the Christ, is not more contrary to the covenant with Abraham, than their almost total subversion by the Assyrians and Babylonians for their repeated idolatries, ver. 27-31. Thus it appears, that the believing Gentiles were called into the visible church of God, and received the great blessing of faith, counted for righteousness, promised to Abraham's spiritual seed, agreeably to God's covenant with him, and to the predictions of the prophets, ver. 30. But the unbelieving Jews, who sought to become righteous by obeying the law of Moses, have not attained righteousness, ver. 31. because they sought it not by faith, according to the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, but by works of law, and stumbled at the stumbling stone, ver. 32. agreeably to what Isaiah had foretold concerning them, ver. 33. so that they are now justly cast off. I shall finish this illustration with two remarks. The first is, that in discouraging the election of the Jews to be the people of God, and of their degradation from that high honour, the apostle has established such general principles, as afford a complete answer to all the objections which discretion has raised against revelation, on account of its want of universality. They affirm, that if the ancient revelations of which the Jews are said to have been the keepers, had been from God, the knowledge of them would not have been confined to an inconsiderable nation, pent up in a corner of the earth, but would have been universally spread. In like manner they assert, that if the Christian religion were from God, it would long ago have been bestowed on all mankind. To these, and to every objection of the like nature, the apostle has taught us to reply, That God has an indisputable right to bestow his favours on whom he pleases. And therefore, without unrighteousness, he may withhold the benefit of revelation from whom he will, since he was under no obligation to bestow it on any; just as in the distribution of his temporal favours, he bestows on some a more happy country and climate, or a better bodily constitution, or great natural talents, or a better education, than on others. And if deists ask, Why God, in the distribution of his spiritual favours, hath preferred one nation or person before another, the apostle bids us answer, 'Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus?' Hath not the potter power over the clay, to make out of the same lump one vessel to honour, and another to dishonour? The very same right which entitled God to make some of his creatures angels, and some of them men, entitled him to place men in the endlessly various situations in which we see them. Nor can those who seem to be most unkindly treated, complain of the want of revelation, or of any other advantage, which God hath thought fit to withhold from them, since at the last day none shall be condemned for the want of these things; and in judging men, due regard will be had to the circumstances of each; so that the sentences passed will all be according to truth, as the apostle hath taught in the second chapter of Romans, where men may be saved, who have not enjoyed revelation, the giving or the withholding of that benefit is to be considered, not as an appointing of men either to salvation or damnation, but merely as placing them in a more or less advantageous circumstances of trial. To conclude, God hath been pleased, in many instances, to make the reasons of his conduct incomprehensible to us, on purpose to teach us humility. At the same time, from what we know, we may believe, that however unsearchable God's judgments are, and his ways past finding out, they are full of wisdom and goodness. We ought therefore to change our doubts into adoration, and not join the apostle in crying out, 'O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God!' chap. xi. 33.

My second remark is, That although some passages in this chapter, which pious and learned men have understood to the election and reprobation of individuals, are, in the foregoing illustration, interpreted of the election of nations to be the people of God, and to enjoy the advantage of an external revelation, and of their losing these honours, whether on account of the decree or foreknowledge of God. These doctrines are taught in other passages of scripture: See Rom. viii. 28, note 1; not to mention, that being founded in the nature of God, and in his government of the world, they are suggested by the light of nature as well as by revelation, and have been subjects of disquisition among philosophers in all ages. It is true, to reconcile the decree and foreknowledge of God with the liberty and accountability of man, is beyond the power of human reason; and therefore persons of great probity and learning have ranged themselves, some on the side of the divine decrees, and some on the side of human liberty, in the imagination that the two are incompatible. In such an arduous question, however, the safest course perhaps is to hold both doctrines, until we have to the light of a future state to discover how the liberty of man can stand with the decree of God. Nor will this appear an improper course, when it is remembered, that many things must be held for certain, which to human reason appear as inconsistent, and as inconceivable, as that God hath decreed all things which come to pass, and yet that men are free agents, and accountable for their actions. For example, we must hold the eternity and immutability of matter, the union of spirit with body, or, if the existence of spirit is denied, the capability of matter to think must be maintained, with other things of a like nature, as indubitable facts. Yet whoever pursues his speculations concerning these matters to any length, will find himself utterly lost in them, without reaping any benefit from these speculations, except it be to teach him humility, from the experience which they will afford him of the limitedness and weakness of his own understanding.

NEW TRANSLATION.

chap. IX.—1 I speak the truth in Christ; I lie not, my conscience bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost;

2 That I have great grief and unceasing anguish in my heart;

3 For I myself could wish to be cut off from the church, instead of my brethren, my kinsmen by descent from Abraham; and therefore, in what I am going to write, I am not influenced by ill-will towards my nation.

4 They are the ancient people of God: theirs is the high title of God's son's, and the visible symbol of God's presence, and the two covenants, and the giving of the law, which, though a political law, was great good that was to follow from it. In this wish the apostle seems to have imitated Moses, who desired to be cut off from the land of God, rather than that the Israelites should be destroyed. Exod. xxxii. 32.—Waterland, Mem. vol. i. p. 79, 70 observes, that as the Sodomites were destroyed, so God would have destroyed the Jews, if he had not been pleased with some of them. It is of the highest aggravation, to speak of God as if he were unable to destroy the wicked; whereas, on the contrary, it is the only argument which can be used against the justice of that judgment.

Ver. 1. The glory of the Lord. The visible symbol of the divine presence which rested above the ark was called 'the glory,' 1 Sam. iv. 21, and 'the glory of the Lord.' Hence the introduction of the ark into the temple is called 'the entrance of the King of glory.' Paul. xvi. 7. —The apostle enumerates the privileges of the Jews, not only to show that he respected them on account of these privileges, but to show that they were sensible of the loss they were about to sustain, by God's casting them off. They were to be cut off from the better privileges of the gospel church, of which their ancient privileges were but the types. For their relation to God as his people, signified by the name Israel, for the perpetuation of the more honorable relation which believers, the true Israel, stood in to God. Their adoption into God's family, the extension of these privileges to them, was the result of that adoption; and they were entitled to that adoption, were types of believers being made partakers of the divine nature through the Holy Ghost, and of their title to the inheritance of heaven.

—The residence of the glory, first in the tabernacle and then in the temple, was a figure of the residence of God by the Spirit in the dictated by God himself, and the tabernacle worship, formed according to a pattern sheweth to Moses, and the promises concerning the Christ.

6 Those are the fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, persons eminent for piety, and high in favour with God; and from them the Christ descended according to his flesh, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

7 Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children. But in Isaac shall thy seed be called, (Gen. xxv. 12.)

8 That is, The children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for seed.

9 (Gen. xlix.) Now, the word of promise was this, According to this time I will come, and Sarah shall have a son; (Gen. xviii. 10.)

10 And not only was there that (suppressed) limitation but Rebecca clave not having conceived twins by one, even Isaac our father.

Christian church, his temple on earth, and of his eternal residence in that church, brought to perfection, the perfect form of his church, the covenant with Abraham, was the new or gospel covenant, the blessings of which were typified by the temporal blessings promised to him, and to his natural seed; and the covenant at Sinai, whereby the legalities, as the worshipers of the true God, were separated from the idolatrous nations, was an emblem of the final separation of the righteous from the wicked for ever. In the giving of the law, and the formation of the church into a nation, or community, the habitation of the city of the living God, and of the general assembly and church of the first-born, was represented: Lastly, the heavenly country, to which the righteous, was typified by Canaan, a country given to the Israelites by God's promise. See ver. 6, last part of the note.

Ver. 5. From whom the Christ descended according to the flesh, intimates that Christ has another nature, according to which he did not descend from the fathers. See chaps. 1. 3.

2 Who is over all—ονικωθη, αποθηκηθη. See the use of αναθηκη, as distinguished from ανακαληθη and αναφη, Eph. iv. 6, also 1 Cor. xiv. 26, note 2, where the import of αναθηκη is explained.

3 God blessed for ever—ἐν αὐτῷ ὑποκάτωται, that is, God honoured and praised for ever by all. Mill on this verse gives the following as a proof of the divinity of Jesus: That the omiption of the word ὅσιος, God, in some MSS. of Cyprian's works, and in some concerning upon the 1st and most ancient MSs, and versions, the Byzantine edition of the Greek, and the Vulgate, from which the English Bible is translated, Whitby in his Last Thoughts, says, the true reading of this verse is, ὅσιος ἐν αὐτῷ ὑποκάτωται, whose essence is God over all: because by this reading the clause is completed, and the privilege in which the Jews gloried above all others, of having the true God for their God, is not contended. But as it is not employed by any ancient copy, whatever, it ought not to be admitted on conjecture. The Greek text runs thus: ὅσιος ὕποκατωται ἐν αὐτῷ, which Beza think is a corruption of the original sentence. Erennaus proposes two methods of pointing and translating this passage. The first is, to place the comma after the word ὅσιος, and make what follows a new sentence, 'God is over all, with Christ; thus, Christ descended according to the flesh, who is over all, and to make a separate sentence of the clause, 'God be blessed for ever,' which is the sense of the fathers. But as the phrase, 'blessed be God,' occurs above twenty times in scripture, and is often so used, (see Luke xi. 28, 2 Cor. i. 3, Eph. 3. 1. 1 Pet. 1. 2.) κατελήσει, which before in, and always hath the article prefixed, the common printing and translation of the clause, ὅσιος ὕποκατωται ἐν αὐτῷ, ought to be retained, even in Bocchius's opinion, as more agreeable to the scripture phraseology, than the pointing proposed by Erennaus. Besides, to declare that the Christ, who is both the subject and the author of the gospel, is God over all, is the highest wisdom, because it shows the great honour which the Jews derived from Christ's being one of them according to the flesh, Luke ii. 32. It was the greatest authority to the doctrines of the gospel.—It need not surprise us, that Christ in the flesh is called 'God over all.' This appears from the following reasons: First, Christ highly exalted him in the human nature, 'and given him a name above every name.' Philippians ii. 9. and 'hath all things under his feet,' 1 Cor. xv. 28: and will judge the world in righteousness for ever by that man whom he hath ordained, Acts xxviii. 1, Ver. 6. 1. Now it is not possible that the promise of God hath fallen.

2 Or, the promise of God hath not yet fallen. For all those who are of Israel, these are not Israel.

3 Neither, because persons are of the seed of Abraham according to natural descent, these are not the children of God, and heirs of Canaan, of whom God spake to Pharaoh, Exod. iv. 22. But only the children given to him by the promise are counted to him for seed.

4 Now, the word of promise was this: I will return to thee according to the time of life, and in Sarah thy wife shall have a son. Wherefore, Isaac is the only seed whom God acknowledged for his son and heir.

5 And not only was there that limitation of the seed to the promised son, by which Jacob was excluded on account of his character, when Rebecca also had conceived twins by the one son of Abraham, even by Isaac our father,

6 But the promise was to the seed of Abraham, even by Isaac our father,

7 For all who are of Israel.—Jacob, the father of the twelve tribes, was named Israel by an angel with whom he wrestled, in token of his being high in favour with God; and the name was given to all Jacob's descendants, to signify that they were Abraham and Isaac's posterity, not by birth, but by Jacob, and that, as God's visible church, and people, they were the objects of his favour, and types of his invisible church, consisting of believers of all nations.

8 But the promise was not to Israel, which the children of Abraham by the law were, to the children of Abraham, who were his natural seed, but to the children of Isaac, who are the children of promise, and to whom the promises of the covenant belong, in their second and highest meaning.
11 They (Acts 94.) verily not being yet born, neither having done any good or evil, 1 that the purpose of God might stand by an election, not of works, but of him who calleth, 13 It was said to her, (Gen. xxv. 28), The elder shall serve the younger: 13 As it is written, Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated. 14 If you shall say then, (Apostle), Is not injustice with God? By no means. 15 For he saith to Moses, (Exod. xxxvii. 18, 19), I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion upon whom I will have compassion. 16 So then, it is not of him who will keep, nor of him who runneth, (Gen. xxvii. 3, 4.), but of God who showeth mercy. 17 (Rom. 9. 11.), Beside the scripture saith to Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew in thee my power which is in my hand, and that my name may be declared in all the earth. 18 For in the sight of the Lord the nations exist not, the number of the children of Israel is in this case, (Gen. xlii. 34), because God knoweth the number of them. 19 But the word of God is confirmed by all the prophets, who in the Spirit spake of the things of Christ. 20 For to this end God hath called us through Jesus Christ, that we should be the deposit of the inheritance, and the possession of the promise of the Father. 21 To whom be glory for ever. Amen. 22 Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy, he saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, 23 which he hath poured out upon us richly through Jesus Christ. 24 Wherein he called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace. 25 For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God hath before prepared that we should walk in them.
18. Well, then, he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth.

19 (Or, 263.) But thou wilt say to me, Why doth he still find fault? For who hath resisted his will?

20. But thou wilt say to me, Why hast thou made him that argueth to the disobedience of God? Is it reasonable for the thing formed, that hath its being merely by the will and power of its maker, to say to him who made it, why hast thou made me thus?

21. To use the argument whereby God formerly illustrated his sovereignty in the dispossession of nations, Jer. viii. 6. Hath not the potter power over the clay, to make, of the same lump, one vessel to honour and another to dishonour?

22 (Or, 140.) Yet, if God, willing to show his wrath and make known his power, (Eph. 2. 3) hath carried with much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction:

not alter its meaning. For the LXX. have used the original word τρέφειν in the sense of preserving, Is. xxv. 14. and elsewhere, as we have shewn.

3. That I might show in their (Jer. 1. 4) case a mighty power— I, God made Pharaoh and the Egyptians strong and mighty in the midst of the people, by removing the plagues one after another, on Pharaoh's complying to let the people go. But this was not the cause but the effect of hardening them, new plagues were sent to humble them, whereby God still further showed his power. At last the prince and his people having discovered the greatest obstacle, God destroyed them in the Red sea, and thereby made an illustrious display of the greatness both of his power and justice in the government of the world. And that my name might be made known throughout all the earth.

4. According to Wachter's, God in this speech to Pharaoh declared, that Egypt was chosen by him as the scene of this work of salvation, and his making them the instrument of his purpose, that through the circumference of the Egyptian nation, the fame of the power of the true God, in destroying the people of that nation, and in delivering the Egyptians, might be published far and wide, and draw the attention of all the nations who had any intercourse with the Egyptians. Accordingly, Rahab told the Israelitish spy, that the Canaanites had heard of the drying up of the waters of the Red sea, Josh. ii. 9-11. And as considering the communication which the other nations with Egypt, as well as to Pharaoh on account of its being so early advanced in legislation, sciences, and arts, it was reasonable to believe that anything extraordinary happened in that country, which would soon be divulged through all the earth.

18. And whom he will he hardeneth. If this is understood of nations, God's hardness is not meant to mean that God hardens their hearts by any positive excitements of his power upon them, but that by his not executing sentence against them for all the works of iniquity, he allows them to go on in their wickedness, whereby they harden themselves. And when they have proceeded to a certain length, he withholds the warnings of prophets and righteous men, and even withdraws his Spirit from them according to what he declared concerning the Ninevites, Gen. vi. 3. My Spirit shall not always strive with man. The examples of Jacob and Saul, and of the Israelites and the Egyptians, are very properly applied to by the apostle on this occasion, to shew that, without injustice, God might punish the Israelites for their disobedience by casting them off, and make the believing Gentiles a people in their place. Here it is proper to observe, that the unbelieving Jews and Judaizing Christians, by putting an evident sense on the very word under consideration, and on Rom. ii. 18, 27, and on some expressions in the Old Testament, make Jewish blindness which the apostle James was at great pains to excuse, chap. 1. 19.

19. But you will say, Why doth he still find fault? For who hath resisted his will?—By this question the Jews, who object to the apostle's doctrine, misunderstanding, that since God had not rejected his people formerly for their transgressions, he had no reason to think that he would ever cast them off.

20. But you will say, Why hath he that argueth to the disobedience of God? Is it reasonable for the thing formed, that hath its being merely by the will and power of its maker, to say to him who made it, why hast thou made me thus?

21. To use the argument whereby God formerly illustrated his sovereignty in the dispossession of nations, Jer. viii. 6. Hath not the potter power over the clay, to make, of the same lump, one vessel to honour and another to dishonour?

22. Yet, if God, willing to show his wrath and make known his power, hath carried with much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction:
And that he might make known the riches of his glory (see Rom. i. 23. note 1.) or the vessels of mercy, which he had before prepared (κατάγοτα) for glory:

Even us whom he hath called, not only (οὐκ ἐκ τῶν Ἱουδαίων, but also (καὶ) among the Gentiles.

As he said by Hosea, (ii. 23.), I will call that my people, which WAS NOT my people, and her beloved, who WAS NOT beloved.

And (chap. i. 10.) it shall come to pass, in the place where it was said to them, Ye are not my people, there they shall be called the sons of the living God.

Besides, Isaiah crieth (יגר בּה, Hos. vii. 25.) concerning Israel, That the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, only a remnant shall be saved, (Isa. x. 22.)

For, finishing and cutting short (ἐκθέλω) the work in righteousness, (καὶ) certainly the Lord will make it a speedy work upon the earth.

And as Isaiah hath said before, Unless the Lord of Hosts hath left us a very small remnant of our nation, we should have become as Sodom, and been made like to Gomorrah, figure of a potter's vessel dashed in pieces, is introduced to express the destruction of a nation. By assigning the same reason for God's bearing the Jewish nation in his hand so long before he cast them from him, which God assigned for his upholung Pharaoh and the Egyptians, the apostle showed the Jews the absurdity of believing, that God would never cast off their nation because he had done it hitherto. He had preserved them so long, and might withstand standing their manifold and great iniquities, that when he should punish them, it might be with the severest judgments; whereby his power as well as his justice would be displayed in most awful manner.

4. Fitted for destruction. The word ἐκθέλονται, in the middle voice, may be translated, fitted themselves for destruction; or, if it be in the passive voice, it means, that by their wickedness the Jews were fitted for destruction. In ver. 25. a different phraseology is used, to express this, the vessels of mercy; for it is said there, 'Which he had before prepared for glory.'

As the vessels of wrath are the whole Jewish nation continuing in unbelief, the vessels of mercy are all those who believed in Jesus, whether they were Jews or Gentiles; as is plain from ver. 29, where this explanation of the phrase 'vessels of mercy,' is given. The believing Jews and Gentiles are actually called vessels of mercy, because the prophet Hosea, foretelling the conversion of the Gentiles, expressed it, chap. ii. 23. by 'God's having mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy.'

And he had before prepared for glory. This is the glory of the Gentiles. For the Scripture never speaks of that as to be bestowed on nations, or bodies of men completely, ver. 23. But in the grace and mercy of God, by the rejection and dispersion of the ten tribes, should be abundantly supplied, by the conversion of the Gentiles to be God's people, and by bestowing upon the ten tribes the mercy of the gospel. In the prophetical writings, to cut or number a thing is to make it what it is called. For the power of God is such, that he makes all things to be what he calls them. Perhaps Hosea alludes to Moses's history of the creation, where God is represented as calling things into being merely by saying, Let them be.

And her beloved, who was not beloved. This is the apostle's interpretation of Hosea's words, 'I will sow her to the earth, and I will have mercy on her that I have not loved.'

The words of the apostle are different from those of the prophet, but their meaning is the same. In the beginning of the chapter, Hosea having described the idolatry of the Jews under the figure of sorcerers, and their chastisement, by bringing up their way with thorns, he foretells their return to their first husband, who would speak comfortably to them, and spread them a second time. Then adds, ver. 23. 'I will have mercy on her that had not obtained mercy.' Which the apostle very properly expresses by, 'I will call her beloved, who was not beloved.' For he will pardon her, and restore her to her former place in his affection, and to her ancient relation to me, by introducing her into the gospel church; in quoting this passage from Hosea, the apostle begins with the conversion of the Gentiles, because it was in human history but the beginning of the conversion of the Jews.

The Jew, in nine instances in this verse, and the Gentile seven times, is opposed to the Gentile seven times, and the Jew nine times. For a very large proportion of the Gentile ten tribes were cut off for their idolatry; and the apostle, in narrating the establishment of the gospel, upholds them from enduring amidst the manifold and great oppressions of the Babylonian, Persian, Greek, and other heathen nations, notwithstanding they had long merited to be destroyed for their repeated rebellions.

But the Jew of the Gentiles is he that is the son of Abraham, and that Gentile by faith, who is of Abraham by the promises. The Gentile who is not the son of Abraham, is still a Gentile; but the son of Abraham is a Jew. But to be a Jew is to be a Gentile; for the Gentile is not a Jew. Therefore the Gentile in the body is a Jew, in the faith is a Jew, in the spirit is a Jew, when he believes. But in the flesh is he not a Jew, because he is not the son of Abraham. All the Gentiles have not come into the law of Moses, but they shall be "a people, whom I will cause to inherit them:" and the Gentiles that are in Christ Jesus are "brings of Abraham's seed;" and they follow in the footsteps of the ancient Jew. Hence the Gentile who is the child of the Hebrew faith is the child of the Hebrew promise; and this child of the promise is a Jew, because he is the son of Abraham. But the Gentile that is not the son of the promise, is not a child of Abraham, but a child of the flesh, and the fleshy child is not a Jew, but a Gentile, and a son of death. Therefore the Gentile of the spirit is a Jew in the faith of the promise; and, as a Gentile he is the child of the flesh, and a child of death, a child of the world, and a child of the devil.

30 What then do we say? That the Gentiles, who did not pursue righteousness, have laid hold on righteousness, a righteousness, however, which is of faith.

31 But Israel, who pursued the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness.

32 For what reason? Because not by faith, but [2 Cor. 3:11] verily by works of law they pursued it. [Rom. 3:29, from ver. 31.] for they stumbled! at the stone of stumbling.

33 As it is written, (Isa. viii. 14.), Behold I place in Sion a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offense, and whoever believes thereon shall not be ashamed; (Isa. xxviii. 16.)

CHAPTER X.

In what follows, the apostle lays open the causes of the unbelief of the Jews, and answers the two chief objections whereby they justifed their opposition to the gospel. The first objection was, that by teaching the justification of the Jews by faith without the works of the law, the expositions of the law of Moses were rendered of no use in their justification. The second was, that by admitting the Gentiles into the church and covenant of God without circumcision, the covenant with Abraham was made void.

His answer to the first of these objections, the apostle began with telling the Jews his desire and prayer to God was, that they might be saved, ver. 1.---Because he knew they had a great zeal in matters of religion, though it was not directed by knowledge, ver. 2.---Wherefore, being ignorant of the kind of righteousness which God requires from sinners, and mistaking the nature of the law of Moses, they sought to become righteous by observing its precepts; and where they failed, by having recourse to its expiations. So that, vainly endeavouring to establish a righteousness of their own, they had not submitted to the righteousness of God's appointment, now fully revealed in the gospel, ver. 3.---But in all this they counteracted the true end of the law of Moses, which, though a political law, being given by God, and requiring a perfect obedience to all its precepts under the penalty of death, was in fact a preparation of the original law of works; (see Gal. iii. 10. note 2.) Rom. vii. illustr. ver. 5.---made, not for the purpose of justifying the Jews, but to shew them the impossibility of their being justified by law, that they might be obliged to go to Christ for that blessing, who was exhibited in the types of the law, ver. 4.---That the law required perfect obedience to all its precepts, the apostle proved from Moses's description of the righteousness which it enjoined, and the reward which it promised. The former consisted in doing all the statutes and judgments of God, delivered in the law: The latter, in a long and happy life in Canaan. But an obedience of this kind is impossible, and its reward of no great value, ver. 5.---Whereas the righteousness enjoined by the gospel, and the reward which it promises, are very different. It enjoins a righteousness of faith, which is easy to be attained; and promises eternal life, a reward nowhere promised in the law. For, saith the apostle, the gospel, which requires the righteousness of faith, to shew that that righteousness may easily be attained, thus speaketh to all mankind to whom it is now preached: Do not object to the method of justification revealed in the gospel, that Christ the object of thy faith is removed far from thee, and there is no person to bring him down from heaven since his resurrection and ascension, that thou mayest see and believe on him, ver. 6.---Neither object to his being the promised seed, in whom all the families of the earth are to be blessed, that is, the chosen and holy people, and there is no person to bring him up from the grave.
that thou mayest see him crowned with glory and honour by the miracle of his resurrection, ver. 7.—For the gospel tells thee, the object as well as the duty of faith is brought nigh thee; it is explained and proved to thee in the clearest manner, and is easy to be performed, as it hath its seat in the mouth and in the heart, being the doctrine concerning Christ, which we preach by inspiration, and confirm by miracles, ver. 8.—namely, That if thou wilt confess with thy mouth before the world, that Jesus is Lord and Christ, and wilt believe in thine heart that God raised him from the dead, and thereby declared him to be both Lord and Christ, thou shalt be saved; a reward which the law does not promise to any one, ver. 9.—For with the heart we believe, so as to obtain righteousness; and with the mouth confession of our faith is made, so as to have assurance of our salvation, ver. 10.—The righteousness of faith, therefore, enjoined in the gospel, is, in its nature and in its reward, entirely different from the righteousness enjoined in the law.

To the second objection, that the admission of the Gentiles into the church and covenant of God without circumcision, is contrary to the covenant with Abraham, the apostle replied, that the prophets have taught the salvation of the Gentiles by faith; particularly Isaiah, in these words, ‘Whosoever believeth on him shall be ashamed,’ ver. 11.—And to show that the expression wherever does not mean whatever of the Jews only, but whosoever of the Gentiles also, the apostle observed, that in bestowing salvation God makes no distinction between Jew and Greek; but, being equally related to all, is rich in goodness towards all who call upon him, ver. 12.—Besides, Joel hath expressly declared, ch. ii. 32. ‘That whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved,’ ver. 13.—But perhaps ye will reply, that Joel does not speak of the Gentiles, because it cannot be said that they are true God, and worship him, since he was never preached to them by any messengers divinely commissioned, ver. 14.—although such messengers ought to have been sent to them long ago, according to Isaiah, who indicates that they would be sent to the Gentiles in order to bring them to the knowledge of the true God, and to join them to God with joy, namely, in that passage where he says, ‘How beautiful are the feet of them,’ &c. ver. 15.—But to this I answer, that in the passage last mentioned, Isaiah declares what ought to have happened, and not what would have happened, if the true God had been preached to the Gentiles. For he foresees, that even the Jews, who were well acquainted with the true God, would not believe the report of the preachers of the gospel concerning Christ, and notwithstanding it ought to have been as acceptable to them as the preaching of the true God to the Gentiles,

New Translation.

CHAP. X. 1 Brethren, indeed my heart's desire and prayer which is to God for Israel is, that they may be saved. V. 2 For I bear them witness, that they have a great zeal, but not according to knowledge. V. 3 (Isag. 93.) Wherefore, being ignorant of the righteousness of God, (see ver. 10, note 1), and seeking to establish their own righteousness, (Phil. iii. 9), they have not submitted to the righteousness of God: V. 4 (Isag. 96.) Although Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one who believeth.

VER. 1. That they may be saved. [Isag. 93.] or the whole body of the Jewish nation who were ignorant of the righteousness of God, being the subject of this wish, must mean their coming to the knowledge and belief of the gospel, in which he who is saved, 1 Thes. 4. 16. With all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth. Also Rom. xi. 26. And all Israel shall be saved. Further, if the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, mentioned ch. xi. 22, were the ungodly Jews, and if that description implied that they were under God's curse of reproval, the apostle would not have prayed for their salvation at all. Ver. 4. Christ is the end of the law for righteousness. [Isag. 96.] and Finley and Elmer are of opinion, that that xii. 26. is meant the fulfilling of
For Moses (Lev. xviii. 5) describeth the righteousness which is by the law. That the man who doth these things shall live in them. 6 But the righteousness by faith thus speaketh, (Dent. xii. 18-14,) Say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring down Christ. 7 Or who shall descend into the deep? that is, to bring again Christ (as, 157), from among the dead. 8 But what does it say? (yea, ye see,) The matter is nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart; that is, the matter of faith which we preach, is nigh thee. 9 That if thou wilt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. 10 For with the heart (Romans 10:9) we believe unto righteousness, and with the mouth we confess our belief in Christ, so as to have in ourselves a strong assurance of salvation.

The righteousness which is by the law, both because there is in that sense, Luke xxii. 37, "these things which are written are fulfilled in them," and because in giving of such a righteousness in the sense of the law, as that of the old covenant, we interpret, in the evangelical John, chap. xii. 39, the destructive word in that sense, "the law is fulfilled in them," (Rom. v. 27), "All things are accomplished," (Gen. iv. 24; Jer. xxxi. 32-34), Israel thinks, that as the law was designed to justify them who obeyed it perfectly, Christ may be called the end of the law, because by his death he hath procured that justification for sinners through faith, which the law proposed to bring about through works. But in my opinion, the end of the law is neither of these, but the end or purpose for which the law was given, namely, to lead the Jews to believe in Christ. Accordingly, its types were intended to preserve among the Jews the expectation of that atonement for sin which Christ was to make to satisfy by his death, and in its curse, to make them sensible that they could not be justified by obeying the law, but must come to Christ for righteousness, that is, to the gospel concerning Christ which was preached to Abraham in the covenant made with him, Gal. iii. 22. Hence the law is called, a "pedagogue to bring the Jews to Christ," Gal. iv. 24.

7. The same who doth these things shall live in them. This is taken from Lev. xviii. 5, and is generally thought to be a promise of eternal life to those who obeyed the law of Moses perfectly. But any one who reads that chapter throughout will be sensible that though the doing of these things means a perfect obedience to the whole law, and more especially to the statutes and judgments written in that chapter, the life promised to the Israelites, as a reward of that general obedience, is only their living long and happily as a nation in Canaan. See Lev. xviii. 26-28.

8. But the righteousness of faith thus speaketh. Hence the apostle personifies the gospel, and makes it say of itself what it has been doing in the ages. 9. That if thou wilt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart, thou shalt be saved. 10. For with the heart we believe to have assurance, and with the mouth we confess our belief in Christ, so as to have in ourselves a strong assurance of salvation.

5. For Moses thus describeth the righteousness which is by the law, That the man who doth its statutes shall live by them. Now, that kind of righteousness being impossible, the law obliges all to have recourse to Christ for righteousness; ver. 4. 6. But the gospel, which enjoins the righteousness which is by faith, to shew that it is attainable, thus speaketh, Say not in thine heart, that is, it shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring down Christ to take possession of the kingdom, as if that were necessary to one's believing on him. 7. Or who shall descend into the deep? that is, to bring again Christ from among the dead, raised to life, as if the crucification of Jesus had proved him an impostor. 8. But what does it say farther? why this, The matter required of thee by the gospel is nigh thee, and hath its seat in thy mouth, and in thy heart; that is, the matter of faith which we preach, is nigh thee; is easily understood and attained. 9. For we preach, that if, notwithstanding the danger accompanying it, thou wilt be the world confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, as the seed in whom all nations are blessed, and, as the ground of that confession, wilt sincerely believe that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. 10. For with the heart we believe, so as to attain righteousness, and with the mouth we confess our belief in Christ, so as to have in ourselves a strong assurance of salvation.

The apostle adds, that it is not the external and formal profession of the name of Jesus, as when some persons are baptized in the name of Christ, without a sincere belief in his life, death, and resurrection, that will justify such persons; but a true faith on their part, the fruits of which will be seen in the prosperity of their life and in the success of their profession of faith. This is the true apostolic doctrine, which the apostles and preachers of the gospel have taught the world, and which the Chaldee should have professed, as well as the Egyptians and Babylonians, as well as the Jews, who had been delivered out of Egypt by the power of the Lord, and who had been led by Christ to the Promised Land, so that they were delivered out of the power of the carnal minds of the Jews, as are delivered out of their former spiritual blindness by the power of Christ, and who are led to the Promised City of the Saints.
ROMANS. 111.

11 That all who believe on Christ, and confess him, shall be saved, is certain; for the Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on the precious blood of Christ, shall not have his name blotted out of the presence of God, or men, or angels.

12 Indeed, in the salvation of mankind, there is no distinction of Jew or Gentile; For the same Lord of all is rich in mercy towards all who call upon him. He will save not those only who believe on Jesus, but all in every nation who sincerely worship the true God.

13 For so the prophet Joel hath declared, chap. ii. 32. Whosoever will call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved.

14 JER. (xxix. 26.) But how shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they hear without a preacher?

15 And how shall they preach unless they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them who bring good tidings of peace, of them who bring good tidings of good things!

16 APOSTLE. (Acts, xi. 8.) Nevertheless, all have not obeyed the good tidings; for Isaiah saith, Lord, who hath believed (Ezek. xiii, 44.) our report?

17 JER. (xxx. 8.) So then (here) belief cometh from hearing, and (i) this hearing by the word of God.

18 APOSTLE. But (Acts, xvi. 5.) I ask, Have they not heard? Yes, verily; their sound hath gone out to all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world.

19 JER. But (Acts, xvi. 5.) I object, Israel hath not known.—APOSTLE. First, Moses saith (Deut. xii, 1.) it will provoke you to jealousy, by what which is not in Israel; by a foolish nation will enrage you.

who denied him; Matt. x. 32, 33. (1 John iv. 15. The confounding Christ so being necessary, and at the same time so difficult a duty, the apostle very properly connected the assurance of salvation therewith; because it was the best evidence which the disciple of Christ could have of his own sincerity, and of his being willing to perform every other act of obedience required of him. There is a beautiful resemblance between the promise and the confession of our faith. To profess, is to declare a thing of our own accord; but to confess, is to declare a thing when asked concerning it. This distinction Cicero mentions in his oration Pro Caelio.

Vers. 13. For whomsoever will call on the name of the Lord—See Rom. i. 1. Note 6. This text is quoted by the apostle, to prove that the beholders who worship the true God sincerely will be saved; as evident from the objection stated in the following verse. It is true, Joel, after having foretold the effusion of the Spirit on the first disciples of Christ, added the words quoted by the apostle. But it does not follow, that, according to Joel, those only are to be saved who called on the name of the Lord after the effusion of the Spirit. The salvation which Joel speaks of is eternal salvation, consequently it was not given to be bestowed. It was only foretold, that after the effusion of the Spirit, salvation would be procured for the sincere worshippers of God by what Christ had done in Zion and Jerusalem; which I think the apostle means when he says, (verse 8.) by the word of God; because salvation had been procured for the sincere worshippers of God by what Christ had done in Zion and Jerusalem; and that deliverance shall be procured to all with the greatest assurance, through the gift of the Spirit, beginning at Jerusalem, and proceeding according to Christ's command. Matt. xxviii. 19.

Vers. 15. How beautiful are the feet of them who bring good tidings of peace! The figurative idea was not peculiar to the Hebrews. But it tells us, that Sopocles represents the hands and feet of those who come on all occasions in a most kind and winning manner, as beautiful in their eyes of those who are profited thereby. The figure, as applied by Isaiah, means, if the feet of those who travel through deserts appear beautiful. But when they are diminished by travelling a long journey, to bring good tidings of peace and deliverance to those who have been oppressed by their enemies, they appear beautiful.

18. And this is the word of the Lord;—in addition, perhaps, to Isaiah liv. 15. where faith is represented as the fruit of the lips. From here signifies a speech or discourse of some length; as it does likewise, Matt. xxvii. 51. Pet. i. 25. In this latter text, \\

19. But to the salvation of the Gentiles I object, that Israel, God's ancient church, hath not known any thing of that matter. If they are ignorant, it is their own fault. For, first, Moses saith, I will move you to jealousy by those who speak people of God; by a foolish nation will enrage you; namely, by granting salvation to the Gentiles. 2. Yes, verily, their sound hath gone out to all the earth. That all mankind have heard the word of God, the apostle proves from Psal. xvi. 1. where it is affirmed, that the works of creation, especially the heavens, is such an impressive and irresistible display of God's glory and power, that it cannot be overlooked. This is a magnificent description of the heavens, and is very sublime, and at the same time very simple, and easy to be understood by the common people. But when we consider the nature of the heavens, the best way to comprehend it is by the figure of a tower, or a building, or some kind of a palace, or house, as it is expressed in the Hebrew text. But Pace, where, in the same passage, the negative particle is out of its place. That the thing Israel hath not known, was that God had prepared for the Gentiles, who lived without having any external revelation given them, is evident from the apostle's answer contained in the next sentence.

2. I will provoke you to jealousy. — Jealousy, according to Taylor, is that passion which is excited by another's sharing in those honours and enjoyments which we consider as ours, and wish to appropriate to ourselves. Thus, the Jews are said to 'provok God to jealousy,' by giving to idols that honour which is due to him alone. If in this sense 'God's jealousy,' the Jewish nation should be 'moved to jealousy,' by their taking from them the honours and privileges in which they gloated, and by his giving them to the Gentiles, whom they greatly despised. Accordingly, the Jews were exceedingly enraged when the apostles preached the gospel to the Gentiles.

3. By a foolish nation I will enrage you. — That the idolatrous Gentiles are meant in this prophecy, is plain from Jer. xx. 6. where idolaters are called foolish people.

Ver. 20—1. Besides, Isaiah is very bold. — He was not afraid of the resentment of the Jews, who, he knew, would be exceedingly provoked at what he was going to prophesy.

CHAPTER XI.

Our Lord having declared to the chief priests and elders of the Jews, that the kingdom of God was to be taken from the Jews, and given to the Gentiles, Matt. xxxi. 43; also having foretold to the same persons the burning of Jerusalem, Matt. xxvi. 7, and to his disciples the demolition of the temple, and the dispersion of the nation on account of their unbelief, Luke xxii. 24, we cannot think the Christian preachers would conceal those things from their unbelieving brethren. Stephen seems to have spoken of them, Acts v. 13. and St. Paul often. For the objection which he puts in the mouth of a Jew, Rom. iii. 3. 'Will not their unbelief destroy the faithfulness of God?' is found on his having affirmed, that the nation was to be cast off, and driven out of Canaan. Farther, the same apostle, in chap. ix. of this epistle, hath shown, that without injustice God might take away from the Jews privileges which he has bestowed on them gratuitously; and even punish them, by expelling them from Canaan for their disobedience. Wherefore, that the foreknowledge of the evils which were coming on their brethren might not affect the Jewish Christians too much, the apostle in this chapter comforted them, by assuring them that the rejection of the nation was not to be total; because at no period hath the disobedience of the Jews been total, ver. 1—10. Moreover, in this chapter, the apostle exhorted the Gentiles, now become the visible church of God, not to speak with contempt of the Jews who were rejected, because if they themselves became disobedient to God, they could in like manner be cast off, ver. 17—24. Then, for the consolation of the Jewish converts, he assured them, that after the fulness of the Gentiles is come into the church, the whole nation will be converted to the Christian faith, as was predicted by Isaiah, ver. 25—27.

The great events in the divine dispensations displayed in this chapter, namely, the rejection and dispersion of the Jewish nation, the abrogation of the law of Moses, the general conversion of the Gentiles, and the future conversion and restoration of the Jews, St. Paul was anxious to place in a proper light; because the Jews, believing that no person could be saved out of their church, interpreted the promises concerning the calling of the Gentiles, of their conversion to Judaism. What impression his declarations concerning those events made on the unbelieving Jews of his own time, is not known. This only is certain, that in a few years after the epistle to the Romans was written, the apostle's predictions concerning the rejection of the Jews, and their conversion to Judaism, were fulfilled to a surprising degree. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, the temple was thrown down to the foundation, and such of the Jews as survived the war were sold into foreign countries for slaves. The Levitical worship, by this means, being rendered impracticable, and the union of the Jews as a nation being dissolved, God declared, in a visible manner, that he had cast off the Jews from being his people, and that he had put an end to the law of Moses, and to the Jewish peculiarity. Wherefore, after the prude of the Jews was thus humbled, and their power to persecute the Christians was broken, they would in no opposition which, in their dispersed state, they could make to the gospel, was of little avail; and any attempts of the Judaizing teachers to corrupt its doctrines, on the old pretense of the universal and perpetual obligation of the law of Moses, must have appeared ridiculous. And this is what the apostle meant when he told the Romans, chap. xvi. 20. 'That the God of peace would bruise Satan under their feet shortly.' Farther, in regard the apostle's predictions concerning the rejection of the Jews have long ago been accomplished, we have good reason to believe, that the other events foretold by him will be accomplished likewise in their season; namely, the general coming of the Gentiles into the Christian church, and the conversion of the Jews in a body to the Christian faith, and their restoration to the privileges of the people of God. Accordingly, from the beginning, these thoughts have prevailed in the church a constant opinion, that the Jews are to be converted towards the end of the world, after the fulness of the Gentiles is come in. See ver. 15. note 1.

His discourse on these important subjects the apostle concluded with remarking, that Jews and Gentiles, in their turn, having been disobedient to God, he hath locked them all up as condemned criminals, that he might in one and the same manner have mercy on all, by making them his people, and bestowing on them, from mere favour, the blessings promised in the covenant with Abraham, ver. 29—32. — And being deeply affected with the survey which he had taken of God's dealings with mankind, he cried out, as ravished with the grandeur of the view, 'O the riches both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out?" ver. 33, 34, 35.
Then ascribed to God the glory of having created the universe, and of preserving and governing it, so as to make all things issue in the accomplishment of those be nef ul purposes, which his wisdom had planned from the beginning, for making his creatures happy, ver. 36.
In this sublime manner hath the apostle finished his discourse concerning the dispensations of religion which have taken place in the different ages of the world. And from his account it appears that these dispensations were adapted to the then circumstances of mankind; that they are parts of a grand design formed by God for delivering the human race from the evil consequences of sin, and for exalting them to the highest perfection of which their nature is capable; and that, both in its progress and its accomplishment, the scheme of man's salvation contributes to the establishment of God's moral government, and to the displaying of his perfections in all their ful-teness to the whole intelligent creation. This grand scheme, therefore, being highly worthy of God its author, the Epistle to the Romans, in which it is so beautifully dis-

7 What then? The thing Israel earnestly seeks, that he hath not obtained; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest are blinded.
8 As it is written, (Isa. xxii. 10), God hath given them a spirit of deep sleep, eyes not seeing, and ears not hearing, (Ezek. iv. 4, Isa. vi. 9), unto this present day.
9 And David saith, Let their table be made a snare and a trap, (Psalm lix. 22), and a stumbling-block, and a recompense to them.
10 Let their eyes be darkened (Psalm xxvii. 4), so as not to see, and bow down their back continually. (Psalm lix. 23).
11 JESUS. I ask then, Have they stumbled so as to fall for ever—APOSTLE. By no means. But through their fall salvation is given to the Gentiles, to excite them to emulation.
12 Now, if (Romans viii. 31) the fall of them be riches of the world, and (Romans viii. 25) the church may be made more sure by a right improvement of these privileges. For if God spares people who are neither good nor wise, much more will he spare those who do not believe in him. (Romans xi. 21).
13 For the apostle had represented the Jews as pursuing the right course of righteousness. But as in the next clause the apostle says, 'for the choice has been obtained,' that cannot be the thing Israel earnestly sought; for no people can attain to righteousness as a work. As little was it the righteousness of faith which Israel sought; for, in the apostle's day, the generality of the Jews did not pursue that righteousness. It is evident, therefore, that the thing which Israel sought in vain, but which the election obtained, was the honour of being the church and people of God, after that honour was taken from them for their unbelief.
14 But the election hath obtained it. — The election is the elected remnant, as the circumcision is the circumcised people. Further, Israel and the election being opposed to one another in this verse, the election must be the whole body of the believing Jews, just as Israel is the whole body of those who did not believe. See verse 5.
15 And the rest are blinded.—If—The reason. See Romans iv. 4. The Greek word ἐκκαίρισεν may be translated, 'are hardened;' for it signifies to make the same thick and hard, as the skin of the hand is made hard by labor. Metaphorically, it denotes hardness of heart, and sometimes blindness of understanding. These, however, are distinguished. John vi. 40, and note, 'He hath blinded their eyes, and turned away their heart from the light of righteousness;' hardened their heart. The apostle's meaning is, as the Jewish people, through the influence of their own evil dispositions, were so blinded, that they did not discern the force of the evidence by which God confirmed the mission of his Son, and so were excluded from his covenant and church.
16 Ver. 11.—As it is written.—Here the apostle joins two passages from Isaiah, xxvi. 19, and xxxii. 10 end vi. 9.
17 Of deep sleep.—If—The idea is that of entire unconsciousness, of a sleep from which none of them can awake, and which is the sleep of the dead.
18 The saying of the scripture, (Romans iv. 3), is fulfilled by the apostle, (Romans xi. 33), in the following verse, (Psalm iii. 5, LXX.). According to the apostle's idea, eyes not seeing, though they are open, and ears not hearing, though the person be awake, God's ancient Israel, given up to deep sleep, to blind eyes and deaf ears, and with the back bowed down continually, is an example which ought to terrify all who enjoy the gospel, but by abusing it they bring themselves into the like miserable condition.
19 This present day.—These words are added by the apostle, to show that the Jews always had the same evil dispositions. But here, by making what goes before in this verse a parenthesis, joins these words to the end of ver. 7. Thus, 'The rest are blinded unto this day.' But in my opinion this construction is improper.
20 Let their table be made a snare, and a trap.—As the Hebrews used the imperative mood for the future, this passage may be translated, 'Their table shall be for a snare,' i.e., and so may be considered as a prophecy. —The metaphor of a snare and a trap are taken from birds and beasts, who are allured into mares and traps, to their destruction, by means laid in their way. Mares are contrived to catch the prey by some part of its body; traps enclose the whole body; whereas here occasion falls, which wounds sometimes to death.
21 Let their eyes be darkened, so as not to see, and bow down their backs continually.—That is, their eyes shall be darkened, and their backs shall be bowed down, by walking with the back bowed down, as under a yoke of slavery.
22 And the most miserable slavery is reprobation, for by walking with the back bowed down, as under a yoke of the bond, denote the greatest affliction. —For grief is said to make the eyes dim, (Lamentations ii. 11), and the most miserable slavery is reprobation; for by walking with the back bowed down, as under a yoke of the bond, denote the greatest affliction.

and if the stripping of the Jews of their privileges be the occasion of conferring these privileges on the Gentiles, how much more will their filling the church be followed with great advantages to the Gentiles? 13. Now the rejection of the Jews, and the unbecoming of the Gentiles in their restoration, I make known to you Gentiles; and as much as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, by proving these great secrets from the Jewish scriptures, I do 14. For by any means I may excite to emulation! (Gr. my flesh) my nation, and may save some of them.

Becase, if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what will the resurrection of them be, but life from the dead?

For, if the first-fruit (1 Cor. xv. 20. note 3) of the earth was to be given to the nation, and not to the family, and if the root be holy, what are the branches?

Now, if some of the branches were broken off, and thou who art a wild olive, art ingrafted (Rom. xi. 17.) instead of them, and art become a joint partaker of the root and the fatness of the olive.

Boast not against the branches! for if restoring them to their ancient privileges. But as this could not be done till they entered into the Christian church, it is so far as we are concerned in this sense true, because it rendered those Gentiles and the Christian church complete; for unless the olive olive, fatness, properly in that which, being added to that which is called complete. The body of Christ, is, in this sense, the root of which is not wholly made up of the Gentiles, or, made complete, is called 𝜙getSession, fatness. And in this sense the church is complete as Eph. i. 23. to εἰς τὸν θανάτον, the fulness of the flesh of him who filleth all with the fulness of the church, which is his body, would not be complete. That SKIPSESSION, fatness, in this verse, signifies the general conversion of the Jews, cannot be doubted, since the general conversion of the Gentiles is expressed by the same word. ver. 26. Until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in.' See Col. ii. 11 note 1. The apostle's meaning is, that the general conversion of the Jews will afford to the Gentiles the complete evidence of the truth of the gospel, by showing them that it is furnishing a grand scheme which God had been carrying on for the salvation of mankind, by means of his dispensation towards the Jews.

Ver. 14. I may excite to emulation (see ver. 11. note 2.) my nation. Here, by a most popular and affectionate turn, the apostle repels his. I have no hesitation in converting the Gentiles, from his great love to the Jews.

Ver. 15. If (Rom. xi. 25.) the casting away of them be (συνάγωνας) the reconciling of the world, i.e. in the following verses the apostles speak of Christ's church as a tree, he may perhaps allude here to the practice of gardeners, who cut off from vines and olive-trees such branches as are barren or withered, and cast them away. According to this notion of cutting away, the reconciling of the world would be the rejection of the Jews, and not the rejection of the Gentiles; but this is not the case, for there is no intimation of any such cutting away. There is, however, no intimation of any such cutting away. According to this notion of cutting away, the whole nation of Jews, as well as the Gentiles, is the same with their ingrafting, mentioned ver. 17. —In this connection, the unbelief and rejection of the Jews is justly represented as the means of the reception of the Gentiles. For although the rejection of the Jews may have been an obstacle to the conversion of the Gentiles, it hath greatly contributed to that event. Besides the usual reasons previously mentioned, ver. 31. note 2. it is to be considered, that the rejection of the Jews was the punishment of their unbelief and rebellion. God had been merciful to Moses and to Christ. Whereas these events, as the fulfilment of prophecy, have strengthened the evidences of the gospel, and thereby contributed to the conversion of the Gentiles. This, however, is not all. There are many other predictions in the writings of Moses and the prophets, which demonstrate the divine origin of the gospel, but which derive their strength from their being the possession of the Jews. This people had the oracles of God committed to them from the beginning; and these oracles have continued in their hands ever since. They have preserved them with the greatest care; and in their dispersion they carry them with them wherever they go. Wherefore, in all countries, the Jews are living witnesses to the antiquity and genuineness of the whole of the prophecy by which the Gentiles are confirmed. And their testimony, which is always and everywhere at hand, cannot be called in question. Because, having shown them, they may have been disposed to alter the copies of the Jewish scriptures. If that is the case, it would have served no purpose, while our enemies the Jews maintained the integrity of their copies. The truth is, the testimony of the Jews to the antiquity and genuineness of the prophecy which have been fulfilled in Christ, is of such strength in the proof of the divine original of the gospel, that from the same source, both before and after the apostles, the copies written in this chapter we understand to be the very purpose of bearing testimony in every age and country, to the antiquity and genuineness of their own scriptures, and of strengthening the evidence of the gospel, God hath decreed that this people, contrary to the fate of all other conquered and dispersed nations, shall subdue districts from the rest of mankind, and continue in unbelieving till the fullness of the Gentiles be come in; after which, when their testimony to the ancient prophecies, they themselves will acknowledge the gospel. Wherefore, in surveying this with all the wonder of the divine dispensations, we might the apostles cry out, as he has done ver. 25. "To the depth of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out."

2. But life from the dead.—According to Taylor, there is in the word of an instruction, that a great change in the Christian church is to happen before the conversion of the Jews, and that that change will be repaired by their conversion. Others think the expression life from the dead, means only that the conversion of the Jews will occasion the greatest joy to the Gentiles, joy like that which one would feel, on receiving a beloved friend raised from the dead.

ver. 16. —If the first-fruit be holy.—This is an allusion to the waved sheaf, which was to be holy, because it was accepted by God, in token of his giving the appointed weeks of the harvest.

2. The lump is also holy.—The lump, σῶμα, is not only tempered with water, and kneaded for baking. Here it denotes the mass of which the two waves were taken, mentioned above, ver. 17. And as they were offered at the conclusion of the harvest, seven weeks after the offering of the first-fruits, they represented the whole fruit of the earth newly gathered in, sanctified through the offering for the people. Even during the seven weeks of their preservation, they imitate the apostle teaches, that as the first-fruits from among the Jews were most acceptable to God, and became members of his newly-erected visible church, so, when the whole nation of the Gentiles is converted, they, in like manner, will be most acceptable to God, and will become members of his visible church. Other nations are not competent to a whole nation.

3. And if the root be holy, are the branches.—This is an allusion to Jer. vi. 16. where the Jewish nation, made the people or visible church of God by virtue of the covenant mentioned, ver. 11. note 2. it is to be considered, that the rejection of the Jews was the punishment of their unbelief and rebellion. This people had the oracles of God committed to them from the beginning; and these oracles have continued in their hands ever since. They have preserved them with the greatest care; and in their dispersion they carry them with them wherever they go. Wherefore, in all countries, the Jews are living witnesses to the antiquity and genuineness of the whole of the prophecy by which the Gentiles are confirmed. And their testimony, which is always and everywh thou boastest against them, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee.

19 Thou wilt say, however, The branches were broken off; that I might be grafted in. 20 APOSTLE. True; By unbelief they were broken off, and thou by faith (verse 10) standest. Be not high-minded, but fear.

21 For if God spared not the natural branches, perhaps neither will he spare thee. (So the Syriac translates parum.) 22 Behold then the goodness and severity of God; towards them who fell, severity; but towards thee, to whom thou art even now spared, goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.

23 And even they, (yes) when they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able again to graft them in. 24 For if thou wert cut off from the olive by nature wild, and contrary to nature were grafted in, how much rather shall those who are the natural branches be grafted into their own olive!

25 For, brethren, ye may not all be wise in your own conceits; I would not have you ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part hath happened to Israel, till the fulness of the Gentiles come in. 26 And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, The deliverer shall come out of Zion, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

more so, to plunder, persecute, and kill them. They were the original church and people of God. They preserved the knowledge of God when all the world was sunk in idolatry. To them, the second of the scriptures of the New Testament as well as of the Old: for the holy and honourable fellowship of the prophets and apostles were Jews. Of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ the Saviour of the world came. All the knowledge of religion which we enjoy is derived from them. And surely something of kindness and gratitude is due for such great obligations. They disbelieved the gospel indeed, and for that am broken off. But in their rejected state they bear witness to the gospel, ver. 15 note 1; for they preserve the scriptures of the Old Testament with the greatest fidelity, and are not carried away for ever. They are still beloved of God for the sake of their forefathers, and are grafted in again in some future period, and make part of us. On which account, they are still the peculiar object of God’s care, and shall never be made an end of, while all the nations that have oppressed them shall be utterly destroyed. Should such a people as this be destroyed? ought they not rather to be highly respected and kindly treated by Christians of all denominations, even while they continue in unbelief?

26 Thou bearest not the root.—The root, in this passage, signifies Abraham, as constituted by God’s covenant the father or federal head of all believers, for the purpose of receiving on their behalf, the promise; consequently the branches signify his children, who promise to believe in God. But apostatising means, that Abraham and his posterity derived no advantage from any covenant which God made with any of the Gentile nations: But the Gentiles have derived many benefits from the covenants which God made with Abraham and the Jews.

Ver. 19. The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. —The objector no doubt used the Greek particle ἐκεῖν, here, to denote the end for which the branches were broken off. But, as is observed in the next verse, the Jews were broken off for their infidelity, and the reception of the Gentiles was only the consequence of their unbelief: sense which the particle ἐκεῖν often hath in scripture.

Ver. 20. True. —False. The Greek word placed by itself, as an adverb of approbation.

21 If God spared not the natural branches, the Jews are called the natural branches of the good olive-tree, because they sprang from Abraham, the root of that tree; consequently, by their desert from him, they were naturally deprived of God’s visible church, and of the spiritual covenant on which it was founded.

Ver. 22. Behold then the goodness and severity of God: for God is able to show mercy to the penitent, to give them the means of salvation bestowed on them. See ver. 11 note 2. Besides, this is the only sense in which all Israel shall be saved; for the eternal salvation of a whole nation, no one can suppose probable. The conversion of the Jews being considered as a thing future, the conversions of that people made by 19 Thou wilt say, however, The branches were broken off; that I might be grafted in.

20 APOSTLE. True; By unbelief they were broken off, and thou by faith (verse 10) standest. Be not high-minded, but fear.

21 For if God spared not the natural branches, perhaps neither will he spare thee. (So the Syriac translates parum.)

22 Behold then the goodness and severity of God; towards them who fell, severity; but towards thee, to whom thou art even now spared, goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.

23 And even they, (yes) when they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able again to graft them in.

24 For if thou wert cut off from the olive by nature wild, and contrary to nature were grafted in, how much rather shall those who are the natural branches be grafted into their own olive!

25 For, brethren, ye may not all be wise in your own conceits; I would not have you ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part hath happened to Israel, till the fulness of the Gentiles come in.

26 And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, The deliverer shall come out of Zion, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

as well as able: because it was to no purpose to mention God’s ability to graft the Jews in, unless it had been accompanied with blindness. Locke says, “This grafting in seems to import, that the Jews shall be a flourishing nation again, professing Christianity in the land of promise: for that is to be reinstated again in the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This St. Paul might for good reasons withdraw from speaking out. But in the prophets there are very plain intimations of it.”

Ver. 21. How much rather shall those who are the natural branches be grafted into their own olive!—The conversion of the Jews, though it hath not yet happened, appears more probable than the conversion of the Gentiles; and therefore there was reason before that event took place. The truth is, since the Jews are the posterity of Abraham, since the oracles of God were spoken to them, and since they continue to believe Moses and the prophets, in whose writings the coming and character, actions and, as death, and resurrection of the Christ are foretold, we might justly be surprised that they have not been converted long before this time, were it not for the reasons mentioned ver. 15 note 1.

Ver. 22. I would not have you ignorant of this mystery.—The apostle calls the rejection of the Jews for a time, and their restoration after the conversion of the Gentiles is completed, a mystery: because it was a matter of the greatest importance to mankind, and because it had hitherto been kept a secret, like the doctrine of the Mysteries, which was discovered to none but the initiated. See Eph. 1. 9 note. 2. That blindness (verse 25, see ver. 9 note 3) in part hath happened to Israel, till the fulness (see ver. 12 note) of the Gentiles come in;—till the general conversion of the Gentiles takes place.

Before that event the coming of the Jews into the church would not be proper. See ver. 10 note 1. The general conversion of the Gentiles here spoken of, hath not yet happened. For, as White observes, (Append. to Rom. 11.) if the known regions of the world are divided into thirty parts, the Christian part is only as five, the Mahometan as six, and the idolatrous as nineteen.

3. Come in.—Here the Christian church is represented as a great temple, erected for all nations to worship in. And the coming of the Gentiles into this temple or church to worship, signifies their conversion to Christianity.

Ver. 25. —And so all Israel shall be saved.—The future restoration of the Jews to their privileges as the people of God, in consequence of their embracing the gospel, is expressed by their being saved; because, by their coming into the Christian Church, they have the means of salvation bestowed on them. See ver. 11 note 2. Besides, this is the only sense in which all Israel is saved; for the eternal salvation of a whole nation, no one can suppose probable. The conversion of the Jews being considered as a thing future, the conversions of that people made by 27 (καὶ ἐν ὑπάρξει οὐ λέγει οὐκ ἔργα, τὸν ἰδίαν ὄντα) For this is my covenant with them, when I shall take away their sins. (Isa. ix. 21.)

28 With respect to the gospel indeed, they are enemies (ἐξ ὑμῶν) on your account: but with respect to the election, they are beloved (ισοπ. 113.) on account of the fathers.

29 For the free gifts and the calling of God (Rom. ix. 7.) are without repentance. (See Gal. ex. 4.)

The apostle Peter, mentioning Acts iv. 4. v. 15, though numerous, were not, in St. Paul's opinion, the conversion of the Jews foretold by the prophets.

2. It is written. The deliverer shall come out of Zion, and he shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob:—namely, the ungodliness of unbelieving. The apostle adopted the LXX, translation of this passage, with the variations.—For ἐκ τῶν ἐξώποις, because it expresses the sense of the original with sufficient exactness. The deliverer being the Son of David, he is said by the apostle to come out of Zion, the city of David and the seat of his kingdom, rather than for the sake of Zion, the words used by the LXX. On the other hand, as he came to turn away the ungodliness of unbelieving from the posterity of Jacob, he might be said, as in the Hebrew original, to come out of Zion and to them that turn from transgression in Jacob; for Zion or Jerusalem was the chief city of the house of Jacob. But as this deliverance of Jacob from the ungodliness of unbelieving was not accomplished by Christ at his first coming, it will be accomplished in some future period, by the presence of the power of the Lord to heal them.

Ver. 28. When I shall take away their sins. In this expression there is an allusion to the sabbath-god's carrying away the sin of the children of Israel into a land not inhabited. Lev. xvi. 22.—see Isa. xlii. 26, where the future conversion of the Jews is foreshadowed under the idea of 'taking away their sins,' namely, of ungodliness.

Ver. 29. Besides, as ye also, in times past, have disbelieved God, yet now have obtained mercy, through their ungodliness.

30 Even so these also have now disbelieved through your mercy, (ISA. 179.) so as through your mercy they also (καὶ τῆς σωτ. 9.) shall obtain mercy.

31 For God hath shut up together all under sentence of death for disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all.

32 O the depth of the riches (kai 216.) both of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!

34 For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?

35 Through their disobedience.—The apostle does not mean, that the Gentiles would not have been admitted into the covenant and church of God, by having the gospel preached to them, if the whole Jewish nation had embraced the gospel. The possibility of Gentiles to all the blessings of the covenant with Abraham, was established by the covenant itself. But his meaning is, that, considering the disposition of the Jews, their disobedience and rejection, and the consequent denunciation of their church in order to the election of the church of God on a more enlarged plan, was necessary to the admission of the Gentiles into the covenant and church of God. See ver. 11, note.

Ver. 31—1. Even so these also have now disbelieved. —The disobedience of the Jews consisted in their rejecting the gospel, notwithstanding it was preached to them as the fulfilment of the prophecies contained in their own sacred records.

2. Through your mercy, so as through your mercy they also shall obtain mercy. —Thy providence continues to compose the verse in the following manner.—Even so they also have now disbelieved, as ye also, in times past, have disbelieved; might they not obtain mercy after the manner in which God approved of Throbot's translation, because it renders this an exact counterpart of the foregoing verse? But the translation which I have given possesses that advantage, and at the same time preserves the order of the words in the original.

Ver. 28—1. God hath shut up together all for disobedience.—That the words τῶν ἀποκολληθέντων do not signify in unbelief, but for disobedience, is plain from the use of the word in the same verse. 1 Cor. xvi. 14. 2 Thess. i. 11, and from the nature of the thing. For while a man is shut up in unbelief or disobedience, that is, while he is made to continue in unbelief, he is not an object of mercy, nor can he receive the gospel. But men may be shut up as prisoners for their disobedience of unbelief, and in that state may receive mercy; because, while thus shut up, they may return to their duty.

2. That he might have mercy upon all.—The mercy here said to be shown to all, is God's bestowing upon them the gospel, by believing the gospel. —Wholly remarks that a two-fold election of the Jews spoken of in this chapter: one, whereby they were made the people of God, through their natural descent from the fathers, and which Moses has described Deut. vii. 6; the other, whereby such of them as believed on Christ, were made the people of God under the gospel dispensation. This election is mentioned Rom. xi. 7.

Ver. 29. For the free gifts and the calling of God are without repentance. —For God hath a certain God freely bestowed on Abraham and his seed, and has calling or making them his people, God will never repent of; but will restore to his natural seed the honour of being his people, after the Redeemer hath turned away their ungodliness of unbelief, Exek. xxvi. 60, 61, 62.

Ver. 30—1. Besides, as ye also, in times past, have disbelieved God.—The disobedience of the Gentiles consisted in their having the knowledge and worshiping of the true God, and in their worshipping idols, notwithstanding the true God made himself known to them in the works of creation and providence. Rom. i. 20.

2. Yet now have obtained mercy.—The great favour of being admitted into the covenant and church of God called mercy, because it proceeded entirely from the mercy of God. See Rom. xi. 34. note.
38 Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again?

39 For (c) from him, and (d) by him, and (e) to him, are all things: To him be the glory for ever. Amen.

The apostle, in this part of the conclusion of his discourse, as Locke observes, had an especial regard to the Jews, whom, in an elegant but modest manner, he rebuked their presumption in finding fault with the divine dispensations: as if God had done them an injury, in admitting the Gentiles into his covenant and church.

Ver. 35. Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again?—The apostle very properly asks the Jews, if God was in their debt, for any obligation they had conferred on him 1 or if he was, let them say for what, and they should have an ample recompense made to them.

CHAPTER XII.

View and Illustration of the Precepts in this Chapter.

The apostle having now finished the doctrinal part of his epistle, judged it fit, in this and in the following chapters, to give the Gentile church a variety of precepts, respecting their behaviour, both as members of the church and as subjects of the state. Some of these precepts are of universal and perpetual obligation, and others of them were suited to the circumstances of the brethren at the time they were written; such as the precepts concerning meats and holy days, which, though they may seem less necessary now that the disputes which gave rise to them no longer subsist, are nevertheless of great use still, as they may be applied for directing our conduct in other points of equal importance to society and to the church. See the Illustr. Chap. xiv. at the end.

The apostle begins with observing, that as the Jewish church was dissolved, and the sacrifices of beasts were no longer a part of the worship of God, it was highly proper that Jews and Gentiles should offer their bodies a sacrifice to God, not by slaying them, but by putting the CHAP. XII. — 1 Wherefore, brethren, I beseech you by the tender mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable worship.

2 And be not fashioned like to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your understanding, that ye may approve what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.

3 Also, by the grace which is given to me, I command every one among you, not to think more highly of himself than he ought

Ver. 1.—1. By the mercies of God.—The love which God hath expressed in our redemption by Christ, and in making us members of his church, is the most winning of all considerations to engage us to obey God; especially as his commands are calculated to make us capable of the blessings he proposes to bestow on us in the next life. We should therefore hastily recollect this powerful motive, and particularly when any difficult duty is to be performed.

3. That ye present your bodies.—(Verse 2.) Present is the word by which the bringing of an animal to the altar to be sacrificed was expressed. The word present is a translatable one which the heathen made of their bodies, and having taught, Rom. vi. 19. 22. that the body, with its lusts, is the source and seat of sin, he exhorted the Romans very properly to present their bodies to God, a sacrifice, by putting the lusts and appetites thereof to death in order that they might be offerings acceptable and pleasing to God.

3. A living sacrifice.—May signify an excellent sacrifice; sacrifice being made only of animals brought alive to the altar.

4. Which is your reasonable worship.—According to Bema, the presenting of our bodies to God a living sacrifice, is called a reasonable worship, because it was the sacrifice of a rational creature, whereas the sacrifices of birds and beasts were sacrifices (kata xeras) of irrational animals. But Locke says, this is called a reasonable worship, because it is opposed to the irrational worship of the heathens.

Ver. 2.—1. And be not fashioned like to this world.—See a particular account of the manners of the heathen world. Eph. iv. 19. The meaning is, Christians, in their character and manners, should not resemble those who spend their time in gratifying their bodily appetites, and who justify themselves in these practices by maintaining ridiculous and other corrupt principles. The word here signifies the corrupt part of the world. See John ii. 16; note 1.

2. By the renewing of your understanding.—See Eph. iv. 25-26, where the new man is described as "renewed in the spirit of his mind" (that is, in all his faculties; in his affections and will, as well as in his understanding; so that all his actions are virtuous and good. Because the new creation, as Whitby observes, is begun with a change in our understanding, which is generally the source of the renewal of the whole man, the apostle urges that we should be transformed. So that the word here signifies a change in the mind.

3. That good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.—The word of God respecting men's duty and the grounds of their acceptability, as exhibited in the gospel, is here set in opposition, on the one hand, to the idolatrous rites of worship practised by the heathens, which in their own nature were extremely bad; and, on the other, to the unprofitable ceremonies and sacrifices of the law of Moses, concerning which God himself declared, that he had no pleasure in them, Heb. x. 3-5. The rites of Moses, therefore, in which the Jews gloried, were no longer acceptable to God, neither had they any influence to make men perfect in virtue. Wherefore the duties recommended by the apostle are of internal obligation, and separate the people of God from the wicked, in a more excellent manner than the Jews had been separated from idolaters by the rites of Moses.

Ver. 3.—1. Also by the grace which is given to me.—The grace of God, in this place, signifies the grace of apostleship, and the gift to think, but to think (see 1 vs. 15, 4.) as to be behavior, according to as each God hath distributed his measure of faith.

For, as in one body we have many members, but all the members have not the same office;

So we, the many, are of one body (see Eph. 3, 17.) under Christ, and severally members of one another.

Having then (see Gal. 2, 16.) spiritual gifts, differing according to the grace which is given us respectively, let us use them according to the proportion of faith:

Of ministery, (see Acts 5, 35.) let us be diligent to present ourselves unapt in teaching, (see 1 Cor. xii. 28.)

Or he which exhorteth, in exhortation: (I Corinthians 14, 33.) he which distributeth, let him do it with simplicity;

He which presideth, let him do it with sobriety; (I Corinthians 14, 33.) he which sheweth mercy, let him do it with cheerfulness.

For those who give hospitality, let us shew such honor to them as is meet: for they that use the church, do it for a testimony, and not for profit.

For the parable is this: The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain master, which made a great feast, and bade many; and at eventide he sent forth his servants, to make a conference of all that were bidden to the marriage: and those servants come, and say unto him, Thy brethren and thy sisters and thy father and mother are come, and they bid thee.

And he saith unto them, The wedding is ready, but they are not worthy.

Wherefore those servants went out to make conference, and they brought back many: and they said unto him, Master, even so they bid thee not.

And he saith unto them, The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a great feast, and sent forth his servants to call those that were bidden to the marriage; but they would not come.

Again he sent out other servants, saying, Tell them, which are bidden, Behold, I have prepared my dinner, my oxen and my fatlings are ready, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage.

But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise.

But the king was wroth, and sent forth his withers to take those servants; and they began to beat those servants.

But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth: and he sent his minister to those that were bidden, saying, Are ye not ashamed of this withers, that ye invited those men, and they came not?

And when the minister came, he said, Sir, those men are come, whom thou biddest not, but thou hast given them.

And he saith, What then is that thou saidst? Doth the man that offers hospitality God the measure of spiritual gifts.

These gifts are necessarily different, both in their nature and dignity, (see Eph. 4, 7.) let us in proportion to the extent of our size of gift, without adding to or taking from the revelations made to us, or meddling with subjects not revealed to us:

Or if our gifts fit us for the stated ministry of the word, let us be diligent in teaching;

Or if we be exhorters, let us be diligent in exhortation;

Or if we be distributing the church's alms, let us do it with honesty, disinterestedness, and impartiality;

Or if we be spiritual gifts for presiding, let us do it with sedateness and propriety: this gift grants us the right to manage the sick, the afflicted, the imprisoned, and of widows and orphans, let him perform these services with cheerfulness.

And if an inspiration, whereby St. Paul was qualified and authorized to direct all spiritual men at Rome in the exercise of their gifts. As Francis was, commonly known to the Romans, it was proper he should assume the character of an apostle, in support of the precepts he was going to deliver.

This is evidently the case of a precept as of himself or than he ought to think. Jn. 2, 22. From this we learn, that inscriptions in the exercise of the spiritual gifts had taken place; or were likely to take place at Rome, as at Corinth, 1 Cor. xii. 18. Philippi, Phil. ii. 3. and Thessalonica, I Thess. ii. 3. 9. These the apostle endeavored to correct or prevent, by the excellent rules prescribed in this passage.

The notion of being wisely, according as each God hath distributed his measure of faith: (I Corinthians 14, 33.) Here, faith, is mentioned as a particular spiritual gift, I Cor. xii. 9. But here, by a usual metaphor, it is put for all the spiritual gifts; of which Christ distributed to each that share which he judged proper, called, Eph. iv. 7. 'The measure of the gift of Christ.' By explaining the word 'wisely,' he means, not all; behing wisely, according to their measure of faith, the apostle tacitly reproved such of them as, not considering the nature of their own gifts, applied to offices in the church for which they were not qualified.

Ver. 3-6. Having thus spiritual gifts, let us wisely take care that we be not injudicious in our attention to them. In St. Paul's writings, this word usually signifies spiritual gifts. See 1 Cor. xii. 4. note. Also 1 Cor. i. 7. 11. 9. 30. 31.

Deferring according to the grace which is given to us:—As the grace of apostleship signifies the office of an apostle graciously conferred, so the grace here said to be given to the Romans, may mean the particular station and office in the church assigned to individuals by Christ.

If it be prophecy, let us prophesy:—As in this, so in many passages both of the Old and of the New Testament, whole sentences are omitted, which must be supplied. See Rom. v. 12. note. 2. 1 Thess. iv. 15; and prophecy, see 1 Cor. xiv. 4. note. 2. 2 Cor. i. 1. 2. note. 2. 3. note. 3.

According to (see Acts 2, 47.) the proportion of faith:—This is not what is commonly called the anointing of the faith, as is a method of setting doctrines, and of expositing scripture, generally to a system foreordained according to the measure of faith. But it is the extent and energy of inspiration which was bestowed on the spiritual men, and which is called the measure of faith. Ver. 3. The apostle's meaning therefore in such an enjoyed the prophetic inspiration were not to be imagined, 'that some things were revealed to them, they might speak of every thing that was prophesying,' they might conceive themselves to be what was revealed to them. The same rule we have, Eph. iv. 7. 21.

Ver. 7. The bishop's office performed for the edification of the church was called apostles, ministry. Eph. iv. 12. Hence ministry is applied to the apostleship itself; Acts 13. 2, 3. 4. and to the evangelist's office, Thess. iii. 1. 2. This was the ministry spoken of being joined with teaching, exhorting, distributing and shewing mercy, which are all stated offices in the church; I suppose that 9 Let your professions of love be real: abhor every evil action:

10 In love to one another as brethren in Christ, show that kindness of affection which near relations bear to one another. In every honourable action, go before, and leading on one another.
11 In caring for each other, be not slothful. In spirit be fervent, when you serve the Lord in the ordinary duties of religion, or in spreading the gospel.
12 Rejoice in hope of eternal life. Be patient in affliction. And as the best consolation in trouble, continue earnest in prayer, although your prayers be not immediately answered.
13 Communicate your riches, for relieving the necessities of the brethren. Practice hospitality to strangers, especially those driven from their homes by persecution.
14 Bless them who persecute you: bless them by praying God to bless them, but never curse them.
15 Rejoice with them who are in prosperity, and grieve with them who are in adversity: these things are acceptable both to God and man.
16 Be of the same hospitable, forgiving, sympathizing disposition towards one another, as towards strangers and persecutors. Do not aspire after the grandeur of this life; nor affect the company of those who are in high stations: rather associate with men who are weaned from the world. And be not puffed up with an opinion of your own wisdom, lest it make you despise instruction.
17 Unto no one return evil for evil he hath done you. Prerogative how to make your actions beautiful in the sight of all men; of your enemies as well as of others.
18 What relates to you is, live in peace with all men, whether friends or foes, if it can be done consistently with pity and truth.
19 Beloved, do not avenge yourselves of your persecutors, but give place to the wrath of God, whose prerogative it is to punish. For it is written, Deut. xxxii. 35. Vengeance belongs to me, I will repay, saith the Lord. See also Lev. xix. 18.

Ver. 11. Serving the Lord.—Mill, in his edition of the Greek Testament, has here τῷ Χριστῷ, serving the time which Gaisbœuf also approves. Philo. Sec. p. 144.—According to that reading, the meaning is, Not only in taking care of each other, showing proper fervency of spirit in the work, yet prudently suiting your conduct to the time. But as this precept is not connected with what goes before, I agree with Bezaus in performing the common reading, because 'serving the time' is not an expression used in sculpture, being very different from 'redeeming the time,' Eph. v. 16. Col. iv. 5. Whereas, 'serving Christ and the Lord,' is an expression which often occurs, Rom. xi. 13. xi. 18. Col. iii. 24.—Bezaus. It was a very proper argument to encourage the Romans to be diligent in performing the duties which they owed to each other, to inform them that thereby they 'served the Lord Christ.' Or, 'serving the Lord' may mean as in the new translation, 'serving the Lord Jesus Christ.'

Ver. 15. Follow hospitality to strangers.—So εἰκόνασθαι, from εἰκόνας, a layer of strangers, property signifies. Blackwall thinks the word εἰκόνας implies, not only that we should receive poor visitors, and distressed travellers, with a flowing generous hospitality, but that we should pursue, or follow after, those who have passed our houses, and invite them in. This sort of good office is highly acceptable in Christ. 'I was a stranger, and ye took me in.' See ver. 6. note 6.

Ver. 18. Bless and curse not.—The repetition of the word εὐλογεῖτε shows the importance of this precept. Paul's behaviour towards the high-born Antipas, Acts xx. 1. 2, and your persecutors, under the persecution, 2 Tim. iv. 13, may seem a breach of this command. But on these occasions he may have been directed by an impulse of the Holy Ghost, to denounce the judgment of God against such obstinate sinners.

Ver. 15. Rejoice.—Χαίρεις is put for the imperative, after the manner of the Attic; unless we choose to supply χαίρετε from ver. 1.

Ver. 16. Be of the same disposition towards one another.—Τὰς ἐκείνας, the discipulus; but the person who attended the destitute, the sick, and the distressed, was called ἵκτος, the shearer of mercy.

Ver. 10. Be kindly disposed.—The force of the original word εὐδοκεῖτε, εὐδοκήσασθαι, has been much pressed in our translation. It is compounded of a word signifying that affection which animals by instinct bear to their young, and so teaches us, that Christian charity must be warm and strong, like that which near relations bear to one another.
CHAPTER XIII.

View and Illustration of the Precepts in this Chapter.

Because God had chosen the Jews for his subjects, and as their king had dictated to them a system of laws, and had governed them anciently in person, and afterwards by princes of his own nomination, they reckoned it impious to submit to heathen laws and rulers. In the same light they viewed the paying of taxes for the support of the heathen governments, Matt. xxii. 17. In short, the zealo of that nation laid it down as a principle, that they would obey God alone, as their king and governor, in opposition to Cæsar, and all kings whatever who were not of their religion, and who did not govern them by the laws of Moses.

This turbulent disposition, some of the Jews who embraced the gospel did not immediately lay aside; and even of the believing Gentiles there were a few, who, on pretense that they had a sufficient rule of conduct in the spiritual gifts with which they were endued, affirmed that they were under no obligation to obey ordinances imposed by idolaters, nor to pay taxes for the support of idolatrous governments. In that persuasion, they also refused to the heathen magistrates that honour and obedience, to which, by their office, they were entitled from all who lived under their government. But these principles and practices occasioning the gospel to be evil spoken of, the apostle judged it necessary, in his letter to the Romans, to incut the duties which subjects owe to magistrates; and to testify to them, that the disciples of Christ were not exempted from obedience to the wholesome laws even of the heathen countries where they lived, nor from contributing to the support of the government by which they were protected, although it was administered by idolaters. Withal, having insinuated this letter to the unbelieving, as well as to the believing inhabitants of Rome, the brethren were thereby directed, for the vindication of their religion, to shew the copies which they took of it to such of the heathens as were willing to read it.

This admirable part of his letter the apostle began with exhorting every one to obey the government of the country where he lives, whether it be established by the express consent of the people, or by their acquiescence, or by long usage; founding his exhortation on the following principle—That God having formed mankind for living in society, and some government being absolutely necessary for maintaining order and peace among the associated, whatever form of government happens to be established in any country, is authorized of God, and is subordinate to his general government of the world, ver. 1. Civil government, therefore, being authorized of God, he who resists the established exercise of it in any country, on pretense that the persons holding the reins of government have no just title to do so, or on pretense that they profess a false religion, and exercise their power in supporting error, really resists the ordinance of God; and all who do so bring on themselves just condemnation, both from God and men, ver. 2, 3.—On the other hand, magistrates, being servants of God for good to the people, ought, agreeably to the end of their office, to exercise their power for the welfare of their subjects, by punishing none but evil doers, and by protecting and encouraging all who obey the wholesome laws of the state, whatever religion they may profess, ver. 4.—It was therefore necessary for the brethren to obey the heathen magistrates, in all things consistent with their duty to God; not only to avoid punishment, but from a principle of conscience, ver. 5.—And that the rulers might be honourably maintained, and the government effectually supported, the apostle ordered tax, and custom, and tribute to be paid, as well as that fear or respect which is due to rulers on account of their office, ver. 6, 7.—In this, I suppose, the apostle had the Jews in his eye, who held it unlawful to pay tribute to Cæsar; yet what he says being general, and applicable to all who enjoy the protection of government, it could give the Jews no just offence. Lastly, the disciples of Christ, as members of society, are to owe no man any thing, except to love one another, because love leads to the performance of every social duty, and prevents all manner of injuries and crimes, ver. 8—10.

It deserves both notice and praise, that in explaining to the inhabitants of Rome their duty as citizens, the apostle hath shown the finest address. For while he seemed only to plead the cause of the magistrate with the people, he tacitly conveyed the most wholesome instruction to the heathen rulers, who he knew were too proud to receive advice from teachers of his character and nation. For by telling rulers, that they are the servants of God for good to the people, he taught them the purpose of their office, and shewed them, that their sole aim in executing it ought to be to promote the happiness of their people; and that as soon as they lose sight of this, their government degenerates into tyranny. Moreover, by establishing the office and power of magistrates on their proper foundation, and by teaching the people to obey their rulers from conscience, he made such of the heathens as read his letter sensible, that the gospel nourishes no rebellious principles in its votaries; that it does not meddle with the political constitution of any state, on pretense of mending it; and that it enjoins subjects, in things not sinful, to obey their rulers, whatever the form of government was under which they act. Such a discourse concerning obedience to laws and magistrates, was addressed to the Roman brethren with peculiar propriety, because they had been banished from Rome by the Jews, by the emperor Claudius, for their tumultuous behaviour, and were but lately returned. The apostle, however, gave the same directions to other churches, Tit. iii. 1., as did St. Peter likewise, 1 Pet. li. 13-17.; from which we may learn how turbulent the Jews were in all the heathen countries, and how anxious the Christian teachers were, to have their disciples free from blame in every respect.

In what follows, the apostle earnestly recommended to the Romans the duties of temperance and chastity, because in their heathen state they had been extremely deficient in these virtues. And that his exhortation might make the deeper impression, he compared their former ignorance, from which their lewdness and intemperance had proceeded, to the darkness of night; and opposed thereto the knowledge which the gospel had imparted to them, likening it to the light of day springing up after a long dark night, and gradually advancing to meridian brightness. And the heathens lying in that ignorance be compared to persons in a deep sleep, because they were as incapable of performing the rational functions of men, as persons are who sleep in the intoxication of drunkenness, ver. 11-14.

The precepts in this and the preceding chapter do great honour to the gospel, and to its ministers. They show us, instead of contracting men's affections, and limiting them to their own sect, the gospel enlarges their hearts, so as to embrace the whole human race, not excluding their very enemies; that it cherishes no rebellious principles in its vortaries, but enjoins obedience to superiors from a regard to conscience, and that it allures no proscyphilus, by the prospect of criminal sensual pleasures of any kind.

NEW TRANSLATION

CHAP. XIII.—1 Let every soul 1 be subject to the higher powers. 2 For there is no power but from God: 3 and the powers that be are placed under God.

2 Wherefore, he who setteth himself in opposition to the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: 4 and they that resist shall receive punishment to themselves.

3 For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to evil. Wouldest thou then be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same.

4 For the ruler is (ος ἄρχεις) a servant of God for good to thee. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; because he doeth not bear the sword in vain: for he is (ος ἄρχεις) a servant of God, a revenger to INFLICT wrath on him who worketh evil.

Ver. 1.—1. Let every soul be subject.—Every soul is a most general expression, comprehending all mankind. Jews and Gentiles, whether in higher or lower stations, or possess the spiritual gifts and endowments which are the peculiar prerogatives belonging to sovereignty vested in their persons.

2. To the higher powers.—In other passages, δικασταὶ, ἄρχοντες, is used for all sorts of authority, as in Acts ii. 23, Acts x. 34, Acts xiii. 46-47., by a common figure, signifies persons possessed of power or authority. But here as εἰς τὴν ἐπαρχίαν, the higher powers, being applied to a particular station or office, must signify, not the persons who possess the supreme authority, but the supreme authority itself, whereby the state is governed: whether the authority be vested in the people, or in the nobles, or in a single person, or be shared among these three orders; in short, the higher powers denote that form of government which is established in any country, in whatever it may be. This remark deserves attention, because the apostle's reasoning, while it holds good concerning the form of government established in a country, it is not true concerning the persons who possess the supreme power, that 'there is no power but from God'; and that 'he who resistent he, resisteth the ordinance of God.' For if the person who possesses the supreme power in any state, exercises it in destroying the fundamental laws, and to the ruin of the people, such a ruler is not from God, is not authorized by him, and ought to be resisted.

Ver. 2.—For there is no power but from God.—This was written to correct the pride of the Jews, who valued themselves exceedingly because they had received a form of government from God. The government of every state, whether it be monarchical, aristocratical, democratical, or mixed, is as really of divine appointment as the government of the Jews was, though none but the Jewish form was of divine legislation. For God having designed mankind to live in society, he has, by the frame of their nature, and by the reason of things, authorised government to be exercised in every country. In some one way, he has appointed a particular form in every nation, but to the Jews, not named any particular person or family to exercise the government, but left it to the people to choose what form is most agreeable to themselves, and to commit the exercise of the supreme power to whosoever they think fit. And therefore, whatever form of government has been chosen, or is established in any country, hath the divine sanction; and the persons who, by the choice, or even by the peaceable submission of the governed, have the reins of government in their hands, are the lawful sovereigns of that country, and have the legislative and executive power, and all the prerogatives belonging to sovereignty vested in their persons.

4. And the powers that be are placed under God.—We have the phrase εἰς τὴν ἐπαρχίαν, Luke vii. 55., signifying 'a person placed under the authority of another.' The word properly signifies to marshal an army under his general, by assigning to each soldier his proper place in the battle. Wherefore, the sentiment delivered by the apostle is this: That whatever form of government happens to be established in any country, is sanctioned or set in order under God the King of kings, and is designed to co-operate with his benevolent universal government.

Ver. 2. He who resistent himself to the power, resisteth the ordinance of God.—As the precept in the foregoing verse, and the declaration in this, are general, they must be interpreted, according to the nature of the subjects to which they are applied. Wherefore, since the power of which the apostle speaks in both verses, is the form of government, and not the rulers of a country, the submission to the higher powers enjoined in the first verse, is not an unlimited passive obedience to rulers in things sinful, but an obedience to the wholesome laws enacted for the good of the community by common consent, or by those who, according to the constitution of the state, have the power of enacting laws. To these good laws the people are to give obedience, without examining by what title the magistrates who execute these laws hold their power; and even without considering, whether the religion professed by the magistrates be true or false. For the same reason, the opposition to, and resistance of the power forbidden in the second verse, is an opposition to, and resistance of the established government, by disobeying the wholesome laws of the state, or by attempting to overturn the government from a factional disposition, or from ill-will to the persons in power, or from an ambitious desire to possess the government itself. These precepts therefore do not enjoin obedience to the magistrates in things sinful, but in things not sinful; and more especially in things required by religion, because the object of rulers is to promote the happiness of the people, and to be men from the apostle himself, that they who refuse to do things sinful, or even things inconsistent with the fundamental laws of the state, do not mean to render obedience to God, although these things should be commanded by a lawful magistrate; because in commanding them he exercises his power. And that opposition to a ruler who endeavours publicly to subvert the constitution, or to enslave a free people, is warranted, not only by right reason but by the gospel, which teaches that rulers are the servants of God for good to the people, and are supported by God only in the just execution of their office.

See the following note.

Ver. 8. It is necessary for you to be subject.——The apostle did not mean, that they were to be subject to the sinful laws of the countries where they lived, otherwise he made it necessary for the Roman brethren to join in the worship of idols, contrary to the superior obligation they were under, of obeying God rather than man. Besides, by telling them they were to be subject on account of conscience, he intimated, that the subject which he enjoined did not extend to things sinful. See ver. 25: note.

Ver. 9. For this reason.——For this reason, that is, for not being without God, when they were so without Christ. See ver. 25: note.

Ver. 10. Love worketh no evil to one's neighbour.——Therefore love is (φιλαθλητα) the fulfilling of the law.

11. Also I command you.——Know the season.——That is, it is already the hour for us to awake out of sleep. For now the salvation is nearer to us than when we believed.

Ver. 10. Therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.——This translation of the word σεβομαι is founded on Rom. 12:9. It is not self-fulfilling. But in other passages the word signifies a fulfillment. See Rom. 12:11. According to this latter sense the apostle's meaning is, that love to our neighbour, joined with love to God, is that which renders our obedience to the law full or complete.

Ver. 11.——Also this I command;——Know the season.——By their knowing the season, the apostle means their knowing that it was the morning of the day of the gospel, and that the light of truth having begun to shine, it was already time to awake out of that sleep into which they had fallen during the darkness of heathenism. In this exhortation, joined with that in the following verse, the apostle insinuated concerning the Gentiles, that when they first believed the gospel, they had not been so enlightened as thoroughly to awake out of the sleep of heathenism; they had not formed just notions of the purity required by the gospel, but had continued in some of their old corrupt practices. This appears likewise from the exhortations given to the Gentiles in the apostle's second Epistle, where he reproved them for their drunkenness, and fornication, and other sinful courses.

2. For now the salvation is nearer to us than when we believed.——This Locke interprets of the removal of the Roman law, as being out of their present probationary state by death; and the night, which in the next verse is said to have been for a very long time, signifies the night of heathenism, from which they were delivered by the present dispensation of the gospel; and the day, which was at hand, he says is the day of judgment; and appeals to this passage, as a proof that St. Paul thought Christ's coming was not only at hand, but in the day in which he is confuted by St. Paul himself. 2 Thess. 2:1. Others are of opinion, that the salvation here spoken of is a phrase, that is, the kingdom of God, which is appointed by God for the benefit of the people. See Rom. 16:25. note. The thing to which the magistrates attend, or ought to attend continually, is the good of the people; which they should promote by restraining evil-doers, distributing justice, and repelling the attacks of foreign countries. Now these things they cannot do, unless taxes are paid to them.

Ver. 7.——Rend their therefore to all their dues.——In this precept the apostle followed his master, who ordered the Jews to return to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, though Caesar was neither of the Jewish nation, nor of their religion.

6. To whom (μετατιθημα) tax is due, to whom (τοις) custom, custom.——Tax is due to the people from whose persons, their property, and their nation, they are lawfully exacted. By using the general expression to whom (μετατιθημα) tax is due, the apostle means to the laws and constitution of every state, and to the people in these states, to determine who are their lawful magistrates, and what the taxes and customs are which are due to their governors; and by no means allows individuals to determine these points, because that would open a door to rebellion.

8. He who loveth another.——E-κληροχριστος, another, is a more general word than πασχαλινος, neighbour, in the next verse, and comprehends our very closest relation, according to the sublime meaning explained by Christ.

9. It is summed up in this precept, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.——The meaning of the precepts is, that as the friendship and assistance of our neighbour is necessary to our well-being, we are to consider him as a part of ourselves, and to abstain from injuring him as carefully as from injuring ourselves.
19 The night is far advanced, and the day is at hand. Let us therefore put off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. (See 1 John 5. 3.)

13 Let us walk about decently, as the day, not in (κοσμεῖναι μικρὰς) revellings and drunkennesses, nor (κοσμεῖναι χαράς) in chamberings and lasciviousness, nor (κοσμεῖναι γενόμενα) in strife and envy.

14 But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the lusts of the flesh.

CHAPTER XIV.

Some of the Jewish converts at Rome, fancying that the meats forbidden by Moses were uncleann in themselves, ver. 14, and that the days which he ordered to be kept holy were still to be sanctioned, looked on their Gentile brethren as profane persons, because they ate all kinds of meats without distinction, and regarded every day alike. On the other hand, the Gentiles despised the Jews as ignorant bigots, for making any distinctions of meats and days, and refused to admit them into their company. To remedy these errors, the apostle, in this chapter, has commanded the Gentile converts who were well instructed, to be in friendship with such of their Jewish brethren as were weak in the faith, and to converse familiarly with them, however, for the purpose of disputing about their particular opinions, but for knowing each other's good qualities, that mutual love might be promoted, ver. 1.—He acknowledged that it was natural for the Jews and Gentiles to differ in opinion concerning meats, ver. 2.—But the Gentile brother, who ate all kinds indifferently, was not to despise the Jew as a weak bigot, because he ate such meats only as were allowed by the law of Moses. On the other hand, the Jew was not to condemn the Gentile as a profane person, for eating meats forbidden by Moses; for Gentiles had received him into his church, notwithstanding he did not obey the law, ver. 3.

Having thus advised the Gentile and Jewish Christians to forbear despising and condemning each other for not following the same rule respecting meats, the apostle asked them what title they had to condemn another for their conduct in that matter, seeing they were all Christ's servants, employed by him in his family or church, and were not accountable to one another for their actions, but to Christ alone, whose prerogative it is to acquit or condemn his own servants. Further, he assured them, that notwithstanding they observed one another on account of meats, Christ, at the judgment, will acquit his sincere servants, although they may have erred in that matter, provided therein they have acted according to conscience, ver. 4.—Next, with respect to the days which Moses ordered to be hallowed, the apostle likewise acknowledged that it was natural for the Jews and Gentiles to have different opinions. But whether they observed these days, or did not observe them, their duty was, to be fully persuaded in their own mind concerning the lawfulness of what they did, ver. 5. — And therefore, though they differed in their practice concerning meats, and the apostle unadvisedly hoped they all acted in these matters from a regard to the will of Christ, ver. 6. — This regard he tells them it became them to maintain habitually, because none of them was his own Lord; none of them was at liberty, in religious matters, to act according to his own pleasure, ver. 7, 8. — For Christ both died and rose again, that he might acquire a right to rule the dead and the living, ver. 9. — Christ then being their only ruler, the apostle asked them how they dared to intrude themselves into his place — the Jews by condemning the Gentiles, and the Gentiles by insolently despising the Jews! Instead of having a right to judge one another, they were all to stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, ver. 10. as Isaiah foretold, and to give an account to him, not of their neighbours' actions, but of their own, ver. 11, 12.

Christ, then, being the only Lord of the conscience of his servants, and the judge of their actions, the apostle commanded the Romans no longer to judge one another, but to judge this rather to be a fit measure, not to lay, either by their severe judgments or by their example, any temptation in another's way which might occasion their falling into sin, ver. 13. — And to shew them what he meant by this advice, he told them, that though no meat be unclean in itself, every kind is unclean to him who thinketh it unclean; because, while he entertains that opinion, he cannot eat it without sin, ver. 14. — And therefore, said the apostle, if thy weak brother is tempted, either by thy severe censure or by thy example, to eat meats which he thinks unclean, thou actest not according to the love which thou shouldst bear to thy brother, if thou continuest to tempt him in that manner. I beseech thee, do not destroy him with thy meat for whom Christ died, ver. 15. — nor occasion the good liberty which belongs to the disciples of Christ to be evil spoken of by the Jews, ver. 16. — Besides, there is no reason for using your liberty on every occasion; especially as the religion of Christ does not consist in the use of meats and drinks, but in a righteous and peaceable behaviour towards all men: neither are the pleasures which his religion promises the pleasures of sense, but those joys which result from the possession and exercise of the virtues which the Holy Ghost infuses into men's minds, ver. 17. — Farther, the person who by righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, serves God, is acceptable to God, and approved by men, ver. 18.

Upon these principles, the apostle exhorted the brethren, in things about which they might entertain different opinions with a good conscience, to follow such a course as would promote their mutual peace and edification, ver. 19. — and by no means, for the trifling pleasure of eating this or that kind of meat, to incur the hazard of destroying one another's virtue, which is the work of God. For although all meats are clean, that meat is bad to him who eateth it contrary to his conscience, through the stumbling-block, or temptation, of another's example, ver. 20. — Every one's duty therefore is, to avoid all those things which have any tendency to lead others into sin, or to weaken their virtue, ver. 21. — For the direction, however, of the well instructed, the apostle told them, that having a right faith concerning meats and days, they were under no obligation to display that faith at all times. It was sufficient if they held it fast in the presence of God, for the regulation of their own conduct: and that it would be happy for them, if they never subjected themselves to condemnation by doing that which they knew to be lawful, ver. 22. — Yet condemnation they would assuredly bring on themselves, if, by eating meats which they knew to be lawful, they tempted others to sin by eating them contrary to their conscience. For he who believes certain meats to be unlawful, sins if he eats them; because he eateth not of faith, that is, from a belief that they are unlawful, but, in eating them, violates his own conscience. And, in general, whatever a man doth without believing it to be lawful, being a violation of his conscience, is sin; which is the true meaning of the sacred sopherim, What ever is not of faith is sin, ver. 23.

Here the xivth chapter of the epistle to the Romans ends, according to the common division. But, as the apostle continues the subject treated of in that chapter through the first seven verses of the xvth chapter, it will be proper to add an account of these verses also, that the reader, having the whole of the apostle's discourse under his eye at once, may be sensible of the propriety of the instructions we mean to draw from it at the conclusion of this Illustration.

To proceed, then, the apostle having declared in the xivth chapter, that the weak Jewish Christians, in the affair of meats and days, were bound to act according to their own conscience, notwithstanding it might be erroneous, he, in the beginning of the xvth chapter, told the well instructed Roman brethren, that they ought to bear or carry the weaknesses of the ignorant and prejudiced; that is, they ought to do what they could to prevent their weaknesses from being hurtful to them. In particular, they were not to please themselves with the eating of meats which their weak brethren reckoned unclean, if they had reason to think any who entertained that belief would, by their example, be tempted to eat such meats contrary to their conscience, ver. 1. — He therefore exhorted every one to please his neighbour for his good, by abstaining from such meats as were offensive to him, in order that the body of Christ might be edified, ver. 2. — To this they were called by the example of Christ, who pleased not himself by sense gratifications, but subjected himself to all manner of hardships and reproaches, for the glory of God and the good of men, as was foretold concerning him, ver. 3. — Here the apostle took occasion to inform the Romans, that whatever things were anciently written in the scriptures, were written for our instruction, that by what is recorded concerning the patience and consolation granted to the saints in their trials, we might have hope of receiving the like patience and consolation in our trials, ver. 4. — And being exceedingly desirous to promote the purity and peace of the Roman church, he prayed God to bestow on its members the good dispositions he had been recommending; that, laying aside their disputes, they might cordially join in worshiping God publicly, and in praising him for his goodness to men, ver. 5, 6. — This admirable discourse of the apostle concluded with an exhortation to the Jews and Gentile brethren to receive one another; that is, to live in peace and friendship with one another, even as Christ had received them all into his friendship and church, to the great glory of God the Father, ver. 7.

It is proper now to observe, that although the controversy concerning the holy days, and the distinction of meats, enjoined by the law of Moses, which led the apostle to give the Roman brethren the rules contained in the xivth, and in the beginning of the xvth chapter of this Epistle, hath no place in the present state of the church, these chapters must not be considered as useless. The general principles of morality explained in them are of unalterable obligation, and may be applied with great advantage for preventing us both from lording it over the conscience of our brethren, and from submitting to their unrighteous impositions in matters of religion. For what can be more useful to Christians in every age, than to be assured by an inspired apostle, That Christ is the only Lord of the conscience of his servants, and the judge of their hearts. — That he hath not delegated this great pre-

CHAP. XIV.

VIEW.

The apostle means the Jewish Christian, who, through weakness of understanding, or through prejudice, was ignorant of the doctrine of the gospel concerning meats and days; or whose persuasion of that doctrine was so weak, that it did not influence his conduct. To such persons, though in error, the apostle showed great consideration when he reproved them only as weak in the faith. In other passages, weakness signifies culpable error. 1 Cor. viii. 7. "Some with conscience of the idol, eat it as a thing offered to an idol, and their conscience being weak is defiled." 2

Verse 2. Receive ye. — Admit him to your company and conversation, and allow him to join with you in the public worship of God. So Matthew, x. 50, and with his compound. 2 Cor. vii. Verse 17. The persons to whom this exhortation was addressed, were the well instructed among the Jews, as well as among the Gentiles.

Verse 3. But not in order to the unset of disputations. — As the verb εἰρωνεύω signifies, Rom. xvi. 5; 2 Cor. ii. 17; the persons to whom this exhortation was addressed, were the well instructed among the Jews, as well as among the Gentiles.

Verse 4. Our or God hath received him. — God hath received both the one and the other into his church, as it is evident from his bless- ing on both the spiritual gifts; and will receive both the one and the other into his everlasting kingdom. There is no thing so surprising in their opinion about meats and days, provided in that, and in every thing else, they have acted contrary to the second commandment. This is a powerful argument for our conversing in a friendly manner with each other, notwithstanding we differ in opinion on such matters.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. XIV.—1 The Jewish Christian who is weak in the faith concerning meats and days, receive ye into your company, but not in order to passionate disputations concerning his opinions.

2 The Gentile Christian, indeed, believeth that he may eat every kind of meat; but the Jewish Christian, who is weak in the faith, eateth vegetables only in heathen countries, because he cannot find meats which he thinketh clean.

3 Since both act from conscience, let not the Gentile who eateth every kind of meat, despise the Jew who eateth not certain kinds; and let not the Jew who eateth not certain kinds, condemn the Gentile who eateth all kinds: for God, by the spiritual gifts bestowed on the Gentile, declareth that he hath accepted him.

4 Who art thou that condemnest another's household servant? He is accountable to his own master, and not to thee; so that by his own master's sentence he must be acquitted or condemned: and he as knew their liberty in this matter. Προσχορεύς, Believethe to eat, is an Hebraism, and signifies, self-thou shall not eat. 1 Thess. iv. 3. Or the fruit of the trees that are in the garden we eat, that is, it is lawful for us to eat.

2. But who is weak in the faith eateth herbs only? — The explanation given of this clause in the commentary is confirmed by Daniel's practice, described Dan. i. 8-17; and by the behavior of those priests whom Felix sent prisoners to Rome; of whom Josephus, De rite, sait, says, that even amid their calamities they were not forgetful of the right worship of the Deity; and that they fed on figs and nuts. They did not join the heathens in their idol- atrous worship; and rather than eat things sacrificed to idols, they lived on vegetables. Or by the weak, in this sense, the apostle may have meant some Essenes who had embraced the gospel. For that sect thought it unnatural and unlawful to eat any kind of animal food. See Col. ii. 20, note 6.

3. For God hath received both the one and the other into his church, as it is evident from his bless- ing on both the spiritual gifts; and will receive both the one and the other into his everlasting kingdom. There is no thing so surprising in their opinion about meats and days, provided in that, and in every thing else, they have acted contrary to the second commandment. This is a powerful argument for our conversing in a friendly manner with each other, notwithstanding we differ in opinion on such matters.

to stand," for God is able to make him stand.

5 One indeed (σωμ.) thinketh a day more holy than another; but another thinketh every day alike. Let every one (συναρχόμενος) be convinced in his own mind.

6 (Οὐ διστάσετο, literally, He that careth for.) He who observeth the day, observeth it to the Lord; and he who doth not observe the day, to the Lord he doth not observe ye; he is eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he who eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.

7 For none of us liveth by himself; and none of us dieth by himself.

8 (τὰς) But whether we live, we live by the Lord; and whether we die, we die by the Lord; whether we live therefore or die, we are the Lord's.

9 For to this end Christ both died and rose, and liveth again, that he might rule over both the dead and the living.

10 But thou, why dost thou condemn thy brother? and thou also, why dost thou despise thy brother? for we shall all be placed before the judgment-seat of Christ.

11 For it is written, (Isa. xiv. 23), As I live, saith the Lord, surely to every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess to God.

12 (Αὐτῷ) Well, then, every one of us shall give an account concerning himself to God.

13 Let us therefore no more judge one another; but judge ye this rather, not to lay an interpretation of this our standing in the church, or of his being excluded from it. See the following note.

2. But he shall be made to stand. — 2 Cor. vi. 15. Whitby, who translates this, "He shall be established in the right faith." He will be established in the church, and not excluded. The phrase, "made to stand," is very strong language, and if interpreted to mean that the weak Jew was to be established in the right faith concerning moral and religious matters, it should be rendered in the future tense, and not in the imperfect. It is rendered in the future tense in all the versions, and means simply, that the weak Jew will be established in the right faith concerning moral and religious matters.

9. But thou, why dost thou condemn thy brother? and thou also, why dost thou despise thy brother? for we shall all be placed before the judgment-seat of Christ.

10. But thou, why dost thou condemn thy brother? and thou also, why dost thou despise thy brother? for we shall all be placed before the judgment-seat of Christ. — 2 Cor. xii. 20. Whitby, who translates this, "Why dost thou condemn thy brother? and why dost thou despise thy brother? for we shall all be placed before the judgment-seat of Christ." Whitby is right in his translation, but Whitby's interpretation of the context is wrong. The passage is not about condemning and despising brothers, but about being judged by Christ. The context shows that the passage is about being judged by Christ. The context shows that the passage is about being judged by Christ.

11. For it is written, (Isa. xiv. 23), As I live, saith the Lord, surely to every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess to God. — 2 Cor. xii. 20. The context shows that the passage is about being judged by God. The context shows that the passage is about being judged by God.

12. Well, then, every one of us shall give an account concerning himself to God. — 2 Cor. xii. 20. Whitby, who translates this, "Well, then, every one of us shall give an account concerning himself to God." Whitby is right in his translation, but Whitby's interpretation of the context is wrong. The passage is not about giving an account concerning himself to God, but about giving an account concerning himself to God.

occasion of stumbling before a brother, or an occasion of falling.

14 I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: (σαρκός) yet to him who accounteth anything to be unclean, to that MAN it is unclean.

15 (Acts 10, 6.) Wherefore, if thy brother be hurt through thy meat, thou no longer walkest according to love. Do not destroy him with thy meat, for whom Christ died.

16 Let not then the good which belongeth to you be evil spoken of.

17 For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

18 And he whose things serve Christ, is acceptable to God, and approved of men.

19 Well, then, let us pursue the things which please peace, and the things which promote mutual edification.

Do not for the sake of meat destroy the work of God. All meats indeed are clean, but he that is hurt by the meat is the man who eateth through a stumbling-block.

21 It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do any thing whereby thy brother is made to stumble, or to fall, or is weakened.

22 Thou hast faith: hold it fast. (ακριβῶς) With respect to thyself in the sight of God. Habitation. The apostle’s meaning is, Since we are all the servants of Christ, and are to be judged by him at the last day, we ought not to usurp his prerogative, by pronouncing one another profane, or bigot-ed, or wicked, merely because we differ in opinion about matters concerning which Christ hath commanded us to judge for ourselves. Nevertheless, notorious wickedness, whether in principle or practice, which destroyeth society, being a matter subject to no doubt, we ought not only to judge and condemn in our own minds every instance thereof, but should rebuke those sharply who are guilty of it.

23 But judge ye this rather, that there be no occasion of stumbling before a brother, or of occasion of falling;—that is, pass this sentence on yourselves rather, that ye will not lay any stumbling-block before a brother, by using your liberty respecting meats and days, so as to lead him to follow your example, contrary to his conscience. In the original it is, 'Let a stumbling-block or a scandal.'

Ver. 14. There is nothing (ἀκριβῶς, Rom. i. 38.) unclean of itself.

Things clean in themselves, that is, things naturally fit for food, ought to be made unclean by the positive command of God: as many sorts of food were to the Jews. To such as they believed that occasion of stumbling, to be set aside. For it is possible, and cannot be eaten without sin. It is observable, that in this discourse, which is intended to show that under the gospel all sorts of food may be used without sin, there is no exception of blood, and things strangled.

May we not from this infer, that the prohibition of these things to the Gentiles converts, mentioned Acts xv. 29. is to be understood of such Gentiles only as had been proselytes; see Gal. ii. 21. note.

Ver. 15. If thy brother (σαρκός) be hurt through thy meat.

Demosithenes mett this Greek word in the same sense. De Cererer, p. 323.

Acrιβως. Hurt neither the allies, nor any other of the Greeks.

Do not, for the sake of pleasing thy palate, destroy him for whose salvation Christ parted with his life. Here Christ is said to have died for a person, who may be destroyed by sinning through our example. See in what sense Christ died for all, 1 Cor. xv. 18. note 1.

Ver. 17. For the kingdom of God.

By the kingdom of God, Luke understands the privileges of the kingdom or church of God. But the phrase seems to be used here in the sense in which it was often used by Christ, namely, to signify his religion, whereby God’s kingdom, or government, in a general sense, is established in the minds of men; and therefore the kingdom of God is said to be within them, Luke x. 20.

It is meat and drink. Drink is mentioned as well as meat, because the law of Moses did not forbid any kind of drink, the Nazarites abstainted from wine, and all sorts of fermented liquors. Hence the exhortation, Gal. v. 21. Let no man judge you in meat or drink. Perhaps some of the more zealous Jews abstained from drinks prepared by the heathens, thinking them impure. Or
ROMANS.

23 (a) For he who discemeth a difference between meats, is condemned if he eateth: because he eateth not (a) from faith: for whatsoever is not from faith is sin, with their own persuasion in religious matters of an indifferent nature, without making a display of it, or by their practice in them offending the weak in faith. But the exhortation, 'to hold our faith fast with respect to ourselves, in the sight of God,' implies also, that we are to consider our faith in these matters as a thing of importance, and not to dissemble when properly called to it, nor at any time to act contrary to it. The true import of the rule is, that we are to beware of condemning ourselves, by leading others into sin through an unreasonable display of our faith, or through actions in themselves lawful, without any necessity calling us to do so. Ver. 23. 1. He who discemeth a difference between foods. This is the ordinary signification of the word διακρίνειν, Acts xv. 3. (b) 2. But fasteth not, &c. And put no difference between us and them. Besides, it suits better in this place than the common translation, He that doubtest.

2. For whatsoever is not from faith is sin. Here, as in ver. 22, faith signifies, not the belief of the gospel, but the persuasion that what one doth is lawful. So understood, the apostle's declaration is perfectly just in every case; because if a man acteth without that persuasion, he acts without any principle of virtue, being guided merely by his own inclinations. And therefore, although what he doth may in itself be morally just, yet it is in the sight of God sin, as being done without any sense of duty. From this it follows, that if a person act contrary to his conscience, as the apostle in the beginning of the verse represents that Jew to do, he is presumptuous and blamable. Augustine took the meaning of this text, when from it he inferred, that all the laws of the heathens were no better than εξωτικά νόμισμα; for though they had not faith, in any divine revelation, they might have the faith accustomed by the apostle: I mean, a firm persuasion of the lawfulness of their own actions, and an inclination to please God, by doing what they thought right, and acceptable to him.

Almost all the ancient Fathers, and many of the Greek fathers, have at the end of this chapter the doxology found Rom. xvi. 25, 26, 27. And Knuttsen thought this its true place, because of its relation to the subjects treated of here, and in the 11th chapter, and therefore supposed, that it was taken from this chapter, and added to the end of the apostle, to give a mention to the 15th and 16th chapters, which, it is said, Marcion endeavoured to expunge. But as Eusebius observes, the insertion of the doxology here evidently interrupts the apostle's discourse, which is continued to the 8th verse of the next chapter. And therefore this cannot be its place. The Alexandrian text hath the doxology in both places. Jerome supposed it was taken from the end of the epistle, and inserted here by Marcion, who wanted to cut off the 15th and 16th chapters, and to make the epistle end here.

CHAPTER XV.

N. B.—For an account of the first seven verses of this chapter, see the last part of the illustration prefixed to Chap. xiv. p. 120.

The apostle, in the seventh verse of this chapter, having exhorted the Jewish and Gentile Christians at Rome to a cordial union, from the consideration that Christ had received both into his church, naturally turned his thoughts to an objection which might be made to this doctrine; namely, that if Christ had meant to receive the Gentiles, he would have preached to them himself. To this the apostle replies, that Jesus Christ was born a Jew, and preached to the Jews only, because thereby, in the end, he most effectually accomplished God's promises to the fathers, concerning the blessing of the nations in Abraham's seed, ver. 8, 9. Farther, because the Jews were unwilling to be united with the Gentiles in one church, the apostle quoted various passages from their own prophets, foretelling that the Gentiles in future times would be Messiah's subjects, and join the Jews in worshipping the true God, ver. 9, 10, 11, 12. Wherefore, God having determined from the beginning to make the Gentiles his people, the Jewish believers were bound to acknowledge such of them as were converted for their brethren, and fellow-heirs of the promises of God, notwithstanding they did not obey the law of Moses. And having thus established the title of the Gentiles to all the privileges of the people of God under the Gospel dispensation, the apostle prayed that God would fill them with all joy and peace, through the firm belief of their title to these great blessings, ver. 13.

Both the doctrinal and practical part of this epistle being now finished, the apostle makes a very handsome apology to the Romans, for writing so long a letter to persons with whom he was not personally acquainted. He told them that having a good opinion of their virtue and knowledge, ver. 14. he had, on that account, written to them with the more freedom, to bring things to their remembrance. And that he had done this likewise, because he was both qualified and authorized to teach them, by virtue of the apostolical office which God had conferred on him, for the purpose of converting the Gentiles, ver. 15, 16. Then, to prove his apostleship to the Romans, he told them that he had good reason to boast of his success in converting the Gentiles, and in presenting God to them as an acceptable offering, ver. 17. But that in this his boasting he would speak, not of the things which Christ had wrought by others to make the Gentiles obedient, but of the success which he himself had had in converting them by his own preaching and miracles, ver. 18, 19. Moreover, to give the Romans a just idea of his character and success as an apostle, he informed them that he had always made it a rule, not to preach the gospel where it had been preached before, lest he might have appeared an inferior workman, who builded on a foundation laid by another; but that he had gone to the most ignorant and barbarous nations, that the prophecies concerning the conversion of the Gentiles might be fulfilled, ver. 20, 21. And that his resolution of not preaching where the gospel had been preached before, was the reason of his not visiting Rome hitherto, ver. 22. But now, having no more opportunity of that sort in the parts from Jerusalem to Illyricum, and having long had a desire to see the Romans, he would certainly come to them in his way to Spain, ver. 23, 24. At present he was going to Jerusalem with the collections which he had made for the poor of the brethren in Judea, ver. 25, 26, 27. But when that service was finished, he would come to Rome, ver. 28, 29. In the mean time, he earnestly begged their prayers, that he might be delivered from the disobedient in Judea; and that the service he was performing to the brethren in Jerusalem might be acceptable to them, ver. 30. Lastly, because there had been great dissensions among the Romans about the method of justification, and about the obligation of the law of Moses, he wished the God of peace to be with them all, ver. 33; thus adapting his apostolical benediction to their particular circumstances.

may have them as little as we possibly; and should not please ourselves only in what we do.

2 Wherefore, let every one of us please his neighbour for his good, for the sake of edification.

3 For even Christ pleased not himself; but as it is written, (Psa. lxxix. 9:) The reproaches of them that reproached thee, have fallen on me.

4 But whatever things were before written, were written for our instruction, that through the patience and consolation of the scriptures, we might have hope.

5 Now the God of patience and consolation

6 That unananimously with one mouth ye may glorify God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7 Wherefore receive ye one another, even as Christ also hath received us, to the glory of God.

8 Now I affirm, that Jesus Christ became a minister of the circumcision

9 And that the Gentiles might praise God on account of mercy; as it is written, (Psa. cxlviii. 43. 45.) For this cause I will glorify thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name.

Ver. 1. We then, who are able men, ought to bear the weaknesses of the unable. This is a literal translation of the passage, not different in sense from the common version; only it marks more distinctly the apostle's allusion to the custom of travelers on foot, who, when any of their company falls sick or lame, support him, till they bring him to some convenient resting-place.

Ver. 3. For even Christ pleased not himself. Christ might in his own life have declared the law of Moses annulled, and have eaten all kinds of meats indifferently, and have freed himself from the burdensome services enjoined by the law. But because his doings would have been very disagreeable to the Jews, and would have been knotted by the law, and performed the services which it enjoined; and thereby showed, that he did not make it an object to please his natural appetites, but, in all his actions, studied to promote the kingdom of God and the happiness of men.

Ver. 5. Now the God of patience and consolation.Having in the preceding verse mentioned the patience and consolation of the scriptures, he thus calls God, the God of patience and consolation: to show that the patience and consolation of the sanc tions proceeded from God. In like manner, having in ver. 12, said, in him the Gentiles shall hope, he calls God, ver. 13, the God of hope, to show that the hope which the Gentiles entertain of salvation proceeded from God. So also, ver. 23, the God of peace, and toward the course of the whole, the God of glory, the God of everlast.ing power.

2. Grant you to have the same disposition towards one another. The word signifies to care for, as well as to think. Phil. ii. 2, note 2. Wherein, a disposition to live in peace with one another, and to bear one another's weaknesses, according to Christ's precept and example. 1 Cor. xiv. 25, note 1. Wherein they are to bear each other's infirmities and sufferings in a manner agreeable to all the duties of charity.

Ver. 8. That unanonymously with one mouth ye may glorify God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. So our translators have rendered the phrase, which our Vulgate renders, In suos devotissimi devotissimi. See 1 Cor. xiii. 11. Eph. i. 3. And 1 Pet. i. 3. The praise of God for his goodness to us through Jesus Christ.

Ver. 9. And that the Gentiles might praise God on account of mercy. See Rom. xi. 25, note 4. Conversion to the true God, being the mercy or blessing which God promised to the fathers of the Jewish nation to bestow on the Gentiles, it is particularly mentioned, not only to make the Gentiles sensible that they ought not to despise the Jews, through whom they have received so great a blessing, but to persuade the Jews to acknowledge the Gentiles as the people of God, and heirs of the promises equally with themselves. In short, they were to live together in peace, and love, and concord, as the church commended in the praise of God, and thus glorify him for his goodness to all the family of men. Thus the Gentiles, in the name of God, and singing to his name. The original division, a sign signifies to praise God with a voice, accompanied with musical instruments.

Note. This passage of Paul viii. 29. is rightly applied by the apostle to Christ: for, as Whiston informs us, in the following Hebraism the word meaning 'all' is compared to the word meaning 'seed for eternity,' is interpreted by the Jews of Messiah; not to
And again, Moses saith, Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people. (Deut. xxxii. 43.)

And again, (Psalm xlii. 1.) Praise the Lord all ye nations, and exult all ye people.

And again, Isaiah saith, The root of Jesse shall be, he and he shall stand up to rule the Gentiles shall be. In him the Gentiles shall hope.

Now may the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, so that ye shall abound in hope, in that hope, (Rom. xii. 12.), through the power of the Holy Ghost.

However, my brethren, I exhort you to persuade me, for yourselves are also full of goodness, being filled with all knowledge, and able also (1 Thess. v. 11) to instruct one another.

But I have written the more boldly to you, brethren, partly as calling things to remembrance, through the grace which is given me of God.

In order to my being a minister of Jesus Christ, who升 the gospel of God, that there might be an offering of the Gentiles most acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost,

I have therefore boasted through Christ Jesus, (Phil. ii. 17) with respect to things pertaining to God.

But I will not dare to speak anything of what Christ hath not wrought, but that which hath been wrought by me, in order to the obedience of the Gentiles in word and deed, mention that Hosea hath prophesied of Christ under the name of David, (Rom. x. 19.)

Ver. 10. And again he saith, Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people.-The apostle's design, in this part of his letter, being to persuade the Jews and Gentiles concerning in the public worship of God, it was of great importance to show the Jews that this was more than is in their own scripture. The passage quoted for that purpose is Deut. xii. 46, wherein our translators have supplied the word word, as it is rendered likewise in the Hebrew. But though the words were omitted, and the marginal translation of the passage was erased: 'Praise your people, ye nations; the Lord will be sanctified by me,' the sense would be the same, because the Gentiles could not praise the people of God as they acknowledged and worshiped the same God with them.

Praise the Lord.-The original word εὐαγγέλιον, signifies to proclaim, to publish, Luke ii. 13.

The root of Jesse shall be (Rom. xi. 26), and he shall stand up to rule the Gentiles shall be.-This clause in the Hebrew runs thus: 'There shall be the root of Jesse, which shall send for an ensign of the people.' But the apostle hath adopted the LXX. translation, because it represents the prophet's meaning with sufficient exactness. For so saith he in speaking of David and his glory, that he stood up to rule the Gentiles shall spring from it.-In allusion to this prophecy our Lord calls himself, Matt. x.xi. 3. The root of David, and Rev. xvi. 16. The root and offspring of David, to signify that he is the life and strength of the family of David as well as an offspring that shall establish and preserve God's people for all ages of the world.

And in him the Gentiles shall hope.-In Isaiah it is, And to him the Gentiles shall seek. But the meaning of both expressions is the same. For in scripture, to seek a person or thing, is the same with hoping for, or trusting to that person or thing. See Job v. 8.

Ver. 13. Even I myself am persuaded concerning you, that your apostle also are full of goodness, &c. -This apology for writing to a church with which the apostle was not acquainted personally, was the more necessary, since it was said in this letter that he had opposed some of their strongest prejudices, and had rebuked them for certain irregularities. But this language was, that he was opposed to incorrect and reprehensible, by virtue of his apostolic office, ver. 15. The truth of which he proved by his success in converting the Gentiles, ver. 16. 17. and by the miracles he had wrought among them, and by the gifts of the Spirit he had communicated to his converts in all the Gentile countries, from Jerusalem round about as far as Illyricum. ver. 19.

Ver. 15. But notwithstanding my good opinion of you, I have written the more boldly to you, brethren, partly as calling things to remembrance, through the grace which is given me of God.

Romans, chap. xi. 10. 'In that day shall the root of Jesse be, who shall stand for an ensign of the people; and to it the Gentiles shall seek for protection, government, and salvation.' And his rest shall be glorious.

And now may God, who hath authorized you Gentiles to hope for salvation, fill you with the greatest joy and peace in believing the prophecies concerning your conversion, in order that ye may abound in that hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost, conferring on you his gifts, and filling you with all good dispositions.

However, my brethren, though I have given both instruction and reproof, I have not given my opinion either of your knowledge or virtue. For even I myself am persuaded concerning you, that in general, ye are full of good dispositions; and that, being filled with all knowledge of the Christian doctrine, ye are able also to instruct one another.

But notwithstanding my good opinion of you, I have written the more boldly to you, brethren, partly as calling things to remembrance, through the grace which is given me of God.

In order to my being a minister of Jesus Christ among the Gentiles, ministering to them as a priest the knowledge of God, that thereby they believe it, there might be an offering of the Gentiles most acceptable to God, being cleansed from their former impurities by the influences of the Holy Ghost accompanying my preaching.

I have therefore boasted through Christ Jesus, with respect to my success in things pertaining to God; my success in presenting the Gentiles an acceptable offering to God.

Now, though I might judiciously praise on account of the success of my disciples, yet I will not, in this boasting, dare to speak anything of what Christ hath not wrought, but that which hath been wrought by me personally, in order to make the Gentiles obedient to the gospel, both in profession and practice, (Rom. i. 5. xv. 28.)
19 By the power of signs and wonders, and by the power of the Spirit of God, did I preach the gospel among all the Gentiles, both that among the Jews, and among the heathen. I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 And it became me thus earnestly to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, but where I did not build on another's foundation.

21 But as it is written, (Isa. lii. 15.), They shall see to whom nothing hath been told concerning him, and they who have not heard, shall understand.

22 For which reason also I have been oftentimes hindered from coming to you.

23 But now, having no more place in these parts, and having a strong desire to come to you, I pray for you that I may be restored again to you, and I may perhaps stay with you, if the Lord will.

24 Whenever I go towards Spain, I will come to you: for in my journey I hope to see you, and to be brought on my way by the way thitherward by you, when I shall first in some measure be filled with your company.

25 But now I go to Jerusalem, ministering to the saints.

26 For Macedonia and Achaia have been pleased to make some contribution for the poor of the saints who are in Jerusalem.

27 They have been pleased, (Acts 94.), verily, and their debtors they are, for, if the Gentiles have partaken of their spiritual things, they ought (Acts 218.) certainly to minister to them in carnal things.

28 Wherefore, having finished this affair, what Christ had not wrought by him, but by his disciples, for making the Gentiles obedient; though he might have claimed some praise also from their success. But he would speak only of what Christ had wrought by him personally, namely, that he had preached the gospel with the greatest success, from Jerusalem, and round about, in all the Gentile countries, as far as Illyricum. More examples of whole clauses counted, which must be supplied, see Rom. v. 19. p. 495.

Ver. 18—1. By the power of signs and wonders. — It has been thought that the supercilious works performed by our Lord, and the miracles of the apostles were distinguished by different names, to mark the end for which they were performed. That such of them as were intended for proving the truth of any doctrine ascertained, or new doctrine brought by the miracle worker, were called τευχαρία, signs, Mark xvi. 20. — That such of them as were intended to astonish and terrify, and draw the attention of the beholders, were called τευχαρία, wonders. Of this sort was the punishment of Ananias and Saphira with death, and of Elymas with blindness. — In the gospel the miracles of Christ are commonly termed ἑρμοτομοι, mighty works. Mark 5. 14, to express the great power exercised in the performance of them.

2. And by the power of the Spirit of God. — This being different from the power of signs and wonders, mentioned in the foregoing clause, must signify the gifts of the Spirit, called, Heb. ii. 4. 'Distributions of the Holy Ghost.' These were, — the word of wisdom, the word of knowledge, faith, prophecy, utterance, the discrimination of spirits, the gift of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues; — all which are generally distinguished from miracles.

3. As much as from Jerusalem, and round about as far as Illyricum. — Illyricum was a country in Europe, lying between Pan- maris and Macedonia. It is now called Scacca. The history of the Acts there is no mention made of Paul's preaching the gospel in Illyricum. Nevertheless, as that country on the south bordered on Macedonia, where Paul often preached, he may, on some occasion or other, have gone from Macedonia into Illyricum. Yet this supposed not to be necessary, as the apostle may not have preached the gospel in Illyricum, but only as far as Illyricum. — The expression, from Jerusalem, round about as far as Illyricum, implies, that at the time the apostle wrote this letter, Illyricum was the boundary of his heathen westward; and that he propagated the gospel, not in a direct line from Jerusalem to Illyricum, but far and wide on every hand, through the whole countries. — That the gospel was at length preached in Illyricum, appears from Titus given it by the Corinthians.

4. I have fully preached the gospel, or fully declared it. — So the Greek word ἐκκολοθείω, signifies, Matt. x. 17. 'I am not come to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfill.' — It is not possible to declare, or explain them—2 Thess. iii. 17. 'That by the preaching of the gospel.
and having sealed to them this fruit, I will go from hence by you into Spain.

39 And I know that when I come to you, I shall come (χαίρομαι) with the fulness of the blessing (χαίρεται) of the gospel of Christ.

40 Now I beseech you, brethren, by the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me by the prayers of God for me to Judah.

41 That I may be delivered from the disbelieving in Judaea; and that my service, which I am performing in Jerusalem, may be acceptable to the saints.

42 That in joy I may come to you through the will of God, and may you be refreshed.

43 Now, may God of peace, as well as you, and all who I hope will produce peace between the Jews and Gentiles, be with you all: and to shew my sincerity in this wish, I say Amen.

remarkable for their station and education, and all of them for their virtues. Wherefore, the accounts which they gave of the apostle’s character and endowments, and success in preaching, must have had great weight in establishing his authority among the brethren at Rome, and in drawing their attention to the things written in this epistle.

Concerning the salutations in the apostolic epistles it is proper to remark, in general, that they were of great benefit to the persons saluted. For being sent to individuals, in letters addressed to the churches of which they were members, such public testimonies of the apostle’s esteem, not only gave the saluted much pleasure, but confirmed them in the faith, and encouraged them to bear with patience the evils arising from the profession of the gospel. And to us, these salutations are an example of that love which we owe to the sincere disciples of Christ.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XVI.—I recommend to you Phoebe our deaconess, and Uniphius and Fortunatus, my fellow-labourers in Christ Jesus.

Ver. 1.—I recommend to you Phoebe. —Bengelius thinks the Gentiles, after their conversion, retained their names, though taken from the heathen deities, because it put them in mind of their former state.

2. Of a deaconess. —The apostle calls Phoebe his sister, because she was a Christian. The appellation of brother and sister, which the disciples of Christ gave to one another in the first age, were founded on their being all the children of God by faith, consequently the brethren of Christ, who acknowledged the relation of the community derived from their common parent, and afterward shall to the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.

3. Who is a deaconess of the church. —Corinnaeus Nepos, in his preface to his history, speaking of the manner of the Greeks, informs us, that it was not customary with them to have free access to the company of women of virtue, unless they were their relations. The word of deaconess! is used in the Vulgate, and in the English version, she is called deaconess, and as apt toetur prætecta. Quum enim Romanorum, publicum usque ad securum dicere in convivium lux euis in aequaliter familiae, non primam locum benum fiant ad corn, et simul in eis aequaliter versa, iudicium multa fit aliorum in gentilibus. Nam nonque in convivium ubatur, et propter in partibus aliis, quod mense iuxta, gynæceum ad ille, quod non accessum, nisi proprium populum, non fuit aequaliter; in his de securum sit. In his the female sex were under still greater restraints. Wherefore, as the Christian religion was first spread among men and women, it is evident, that such of the female sex as needed other instruction besides what was given in the public assemblies, must have received it in private from some of their own sex, who were appointed to teach them. Accordingly we learn from the New Testament, and from the most ancient Christian writers, that even in the apostolic days there women, remarkable for their knowledge, prudence, and piety, and of a fit age, were chosen to instruct the converts. This service is attached to the young of their own sex, and to instruct the sick, and comfort the afflicted, who could not attend the public ministrations. These female teachers are mentioned under the appellation of deaconesses, 1 Tim. v. 3, where also, ver. 9, their character and election are described. Further, as the first Christians were remarkable for their love to each other, they appointed in every church men to whom they gave the appellation of deacons, whose office was to make collections for the poor, and to apply these collections in relieving widows and orphans who were destitute, the sick also, and the imprisoned for their religion, whom they visited and comforted with the greatest tenderness. See Rom. xii. 8, note. In like manner, they appointed women, whom they named deaconesses, to perform the same office to the distressed of their own sex, and as a purpose they supplied no any of the church’s funds. The character and office of these female deacons the apostle has described, 1 Tim. v. 9, and ver. 10, orders the widows, or female prostatae, to be chosen from among them. The deaconess is also described, 1 Tim. iii. 11, and in the Apocalypse, Rev. xii. 16. Hence both the words deacon, and deaconess, are evidently connected. Ordain also a deaconess who is faithful and holy, for the ministry towards the women. Ignatius likewise, in his epistle Ad Autolycou, No. 12, thus writes, I salute thee, O gynaecos, who art in the deaconess in Christ. Phiny too, in his famous letter to the emperor Trajan, mentions deaconesses; expressing no doubt, that they were of the weaker sex, and held an office in the church, they would be constrained to discover the secrets of their religion. His words are, on account of their character. Further, the apostle, by naming so many persons in his epistles, hath not only transmitted to posterity an honourable character of them, but hath furnished an additional proof of the truth and authority of his own epistles. For all the persons named in them were appealed to as witnesses of the things which he hath written.

After finishing his salutations, the apostle gave the Romans a few more practical advices suited to their circumstances, ver. 17—20. Then sent them salutations from his assistants, ver. 21, 22, 23, 24. And to which he added his own apostolical benediction, ver. 24.

And this letter, in which he had considered the dispensation of God to mankind from the beginning of the world to the end of time, with a sublime doxology to God the Father, ver. 25, 26, 27.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. XVI.—I recommend to you who are in Rome, Phoebe our deaconess, and Uniphius and Fortunatus, my fellow-labourers in Christ Jesus.

I. 1—1 recommend to you Phoebe. —Quo magis necnon credo, exu Chaldaico et illis qui Minister dicuntur, quod esset veri, et persumerit quærum. —The office of female deacon was one of the earliest institutions; and of such utility, it is probable Phoebe held that office in the church at Cenchreae. For she is not only called it deaconess, but she is said to have performed the office of a deaconess. Ver. 2. She hath been a helper of many, and of myself also: at least, Origens and Chrysostom undertook the apostle as speaking of a female deacon in this passage.

4. Which in Cenchreae. —Cenchreae was the eastern port of Corinth. It was situated on the Scenic gulf, about seven miles from the city; and being more convenient, it was better frequented than Lechaion, the city on the western bay. Northward from Cenchreae, and on the same bay, there was another port called Atraxus, where the lepers was untreated, and where ships were driven overland from the one bay to the other. The temple of Neptune, in honour of whom the indulgent games were celebrated, was situated below Schenus, towards Corinth. And on the road between the temple and Corinth, the theatre and stadium stood, where the games were celebrated. This shows the propinquity of the many sallies which the apostle, in his letters to the Corinthians, has made to those places.

Ver. 2—1. Assist her in whatever business she may have need of you. —Thus implies that Phoebe had made request for assistance.

2. He spared the more powerful from the common people, being a man of complexion, called a rostrator. —The Romans gave the name of patres to persons who were respectable, with their advice and interest, and were of an appearance, according to Cicero. Patres was a word of importance. Perhaps to seek the payment of a debt owing her by some of the inhabitants of Rome, or to complain of undue exactions by some of the emperor’s officers in the province.

2. For indeed she hath been a helper of many, &c. —The word prostatae properly signifies a Roman prosateur, festival. —Mark says the Romans gave the name of patres to persons who assisted, with their advice and interest, and were of an appearance, according to Cicero. Patres was a word of importance. Perhaps to seek the payment of a debt owing her by some of the inhabitants of Rome, or to complain of undue exactions by some of the emperor’s officers in the province.

Ver. 3. Salute Phoebe and Aquila my fellow-labourers. —When Paul left Corinth the first time, Aquila and Phoebe accompanied him to Ephesus, Acts xvi. 18, 19. And when he departed from that city to go to Jerusalem, they did not go with him, but remained at Ephesus till he returned; as is plain from their sending their salutations to the Corinthians in the apostle’s first epistle, chap. xvi. 19, which was written from Ephesus while he abode there, after he returned from Jerusalem, as mentioned Acts xiv. 1. But on the death of the emperor Claudius, Aquila and Priscilla are said to have gone back to Rome, to follow their occupation; for they were in Rome when the apostle wrote his epistle to the Romans. Therefore they must be evident from this salutation. And because both at Corinth and Ephesus they were very active in assisting the apostle in his salutations, he salutes them as his fellow-labourers in Christ Jesus, meaning Phoebe first, otherwise he would not have mentioned her before his husband, or because, as Chrysostom thought, she was animated with an extraordinary zeal for the success of the gospel. And it must be owned, that she shewed her knowledge as well as her zeal, by joining her husband in instructing Apollos, Acts xvi. 39.
4 These persons for my life laid down their own necks to whom not I only give thanks, but even all the churches of the Levites.

5 Likewise salute the church which is in their house. 1 Salute Epenetus my beloved, which is the first-fruit of all the household of Christ. 2

6 Salute Mary, who laboured much with us. 3

7 Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles, and who were in Christ before me. 4 8 Salute Amplias, my beloved in the Lord.

9 Salute Urbanus our fellow-labourer in Christ, and Stachys my beloved.

10 Salute Apelles, the approved in Christ. 5 Salute those who are of the family of Aristobulus. 6

11 Salute Herodion my kinsman. Salute those of the family of Narcissus who are in the Lord. 7

12 Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who laboured in the Lord. Salute the beloved Persis, who laboured much in the Lord.

13 Salute Rufus, the chosen in the Lord, and his mother who is of the family of my mother also.

14 Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, 8 Petros, Hermas, and the brethren with them.

Ver. 4. These persons for my life laid down their own necks. — This is said, in allusion to the custom of placing on the necks of criminals whose heads are to be cut off. The expression is proverbial, and is found in the Talmud. It is thought that the apostle alluded to some great danger, to which Aquila and Priscilla exposed themselves in defending him from the Jews, in the tumult which they raised at Corinth during the persecution of Gallio, Acts xxviii. 17.

Ver. 6. We may suppose that many of the disciples as were not far advanced in knowledge, resettled with them for instruction; and that assemblies were held in their house on the first day of the week for the worship of God. These are what the apostle calls the church in their house. Or the expression may signify, that all the members of their family were Christians. For Origen tells us, when a whole family was converted, the salvation was sent to the church in that house; but when a part of a family only was converted, the salvation was sent to the family. And Paul says, 1 Cor. xvi. 15. If any of you, which are under the gospel, have a mind; 1 Cor. xvi. 19. The first-fruits of Achaia. — Some MSS. have Achaia, others Corinth. Achaia. Is the name of the ancient province, which became a Roman province.

Ver. 7. The family of Narcissus. — The Alexandrian and Clermont MSS., with the Arabic, Ethiopic, and Vulgate versions, and Origens, Chrysostom, Theodoret, with many of the Latin commentators, have της Αρρηνιας, of Achaia, in this place; which some suppose to be the true reading, because the apostle calls the house of Philemon the first-fruits of Achaia. But if Achaia is the true reading here, the context, the Achaian is meant. This has been sometimes supposed to be the case, and he might have been a respected man.

Ver. 8. The family of Narcissus. — The word κατακεραικίαι, a name given to a particular city or town, is applied to Achaia, 2 Cor. xii. 14. But the word, though it signifies the country of Achaia, is not the name of a town; in which case the apostle would have joined her with Andronicus. For he was the husband, or her brother. But most commentators are of opinion, that the name is a man, because the apostle says of him, who are of note among the apostles. 8

Ver. 9. My fellow-prisoners. — At the time this letter was written, Paul had been in prison often, 2 Cor. x. 23. On some of these occasions, he had been imprisoned with him; but whether or when that happened, is not known.

9 Who are of note among the apostles. — The name apostles was sometimes given to ministers of the word who were of an order inferior to the twelve, but who were sent forth on some particular service. 2 Cor. viii. 23. 2 Cor. xi. 13. Rev. ii. 5. In this sense, Barnabas is called an apostle. Acts xiv. 11. And James and John have been of note among the apostles of this inferior order. On the meaning may be, as in the commentary, that they were highly esteemed by the apostle. See Bengelius's opinion, 1 Cor. xii. 21. 5.

10. And who were in Christ before me. — The word Christ is often used by Paul, to denote the religion of Christ, and the church of Christ, which is his body. From Andronicus and Junia being Christians before Paul, joined with their being of note among the apostles, Origen infers, that they were of the number of the seventy disciples. Yet that is uncertain.

Ver. 10. Salute Apelles, the approved in Christ. — Ter Justus, or Zenas, the approved in Christ, or in the gospel, is one who, being tried and persecuted for the gospel, greatly to have been a real Christian; a noble character this, and greatly to be respected. 12. Salute those who are of the family of Narcissus. — This family himself was not saluted, either because he was not in Rome at that time, or because he was not yet converted, or perhaps because he was dead. He and Narcissus seem to have had each of them a numerous family of slaves and others, some of whom were Christians, and the fame of whose virtues had reached the apostle.

Ver. 11. Salute those of the family of Nymphas. — Many think this was the famous Nymphas, the freed-man and favourite of the emperor Claudius. But this epitome being written, A.D. 27, Narcissus the emperor's favourite was then dead. For Festus, Annal. lib. ii. 1. Dio, lib. ix. 81. Inform us, that he died in the first year of the emperor Nero, answering to A.D. 54. However, as the salvation is not sent to Narcissus, but to the Christians of his family, it may have subsisted after his death.

Ver. 12. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord. — Tychina, a young noblewoman of the feminine gender, the persons here said to labour in the Lord, were probably female preachers or deaconesses, who employed themselves at Rome in propagating the gospel; as was perhaps likewise, who in the next clause is said to have laboured much in the Lord. 8

Ver. 13. Salute Rufus, who is of the family of Christ. — Some MSS. have, also of Christ. But others think them different, because they are of the same family of Christ, but of different degrees from each other. And in the case of Rufus, his mother, on account of the many offices he received from her, he, who never was in Rome, must have received them elsewhere; consequently she had not always resided in Rome, but may have come there lately with her son.
15 Salute Phi lingerus, and Julius, Tereus, and his sister, and Olympus, and all the saints who are with them.

16 Salute one another with an holy kiss. The churches of Christ salute you.

17 (a) Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them who make separations and occasions of falling; contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them.

18 For they who are such do not serve our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own bellies; and by good words, and blessings, deceive the hearts of the innocents.

19 Now your obedience is reported to all men. I therefore rejoice on your account; nevertheless I wish you indeed to be wise, as we are, with respect to good, and pure; with respect to evil.

20 And the God of peace will bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

21 Beloved, give not our comonts novelty, nor our wisdom of this world; for the world passeth away, but the word of God endureth for ever.

22 A faithful saying is this: If we suffer, we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us.

23 He shall also suffer with him; if we are manifestly approved, we are approved; and he shall approve us in his sight.

24 But our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ:

25 Which in his time shall shew he that belongeth to his own; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

26 And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly, and obtain you his peace at all times and in all ways.

27 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.
ROMANS.

Chap. XVI.

21 Timothy my fellow-labourer, and Lucius, 2 and Jason, 3 and Sosipater, 4 my kinsmen, salute you.

22 I Tertius, who wrote this letter from the apostle's autograph, salute you as the dispenser of Christ.

23 Gaius my host, and of the whole church, salute you. Erastus the chamberlain of the city salute you, and Quartus one of your church, at present with me.

24 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

25 (a) Now to him who is able to establish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, (here) according to the revelation of the mystery, kept secret in the times of the ages;

26 (But is now made manifest, and, by the commandment of the eternal God in the prophetic writings, as made known to all the Gentiles, in order to the obedience of faith), 27 To the wise God alone, through Jesus Christ, I say, be the glory for ever. Amen.

PREFACE.

Sect. I.—Of the time of St. Paul's arrival at Corinth.

We are told, Acts xvii. 15. that after Paul was driven, by the unbelieving Jews, from Thessalonica and Berea, he went to Athens, the most celebrated city in Greece, intending to make the gospel known to the learned there. But the contempt in which the Athenian philosophers held his doctrine and manner of preaching, convincing him that it would be too long among them, he left Athens soon, and went to Corinth, now become the metropolis of the province of Achaia, and of equal fame for the sciences and the arts with Athens itself.

On his arrival in Corinth, he found Aquila and his wife Priscilla, two Jewish Christians, who had lately come from Italy, because Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome. Acts xvii. 2. According to the best chronologers, Claudius's edict against the Jews was published in the eleventh year of his reign, answering to a. d. 51. Claudius began his reign on the 24th of January. Wherefore, notwithstanding his edict against the Jews might come forth early in the eleventh year of his reign, yet as the Jews would be allowed a reasonable time to settle their affairs, and take themselves away, we cannot suppose that Aquila and Priscilla arrived at Corinth sooner than the end of the spring in the year 51. And seeing they were settled in Corinth, and carrying on their business of tent-making, when the apostle arrived, his arrival cannot be fixed sooner than the summer of that year—This epoch of St. Paul's arrival at Corinth merits attention, because it will be of use in fixing the dates of other occurrences, which happened both before and after that event.

Being come to Corinth, the apostle immediately preached in the synagogue. But the greatest part of the Jews opposing themselves and blaspheming, he told them he would go to the Gentiles, Acts xviii. 6. Knowing, however, the temper and learning of the Gentiles in Corinth, and their extreme profligacy of manners, he was in great fear when he first preached to them, 1 Cor. ii. 3. But the Lord Jesus appeared to him in a vision, and bade him not be afraid, but speak boldly, 'because he had much people in that city.' Acts xviii. 9, 10. In obedience to Christ's command, Paul preached almost two years in Corinth, (ver. 11, 18,) and gathered a very flourishing church, in which there were some Jews of note, ver. 8. But the greatest part were idolatrous Gentiles, 1 Cor. xiii. 2.—The members of this church being very numerous, were so much the object of the apostle's attention, that he wrote to them two long and excellent letters, not only for establishing them in the belief of his apostleship, which a false teacher, who came among them after his departure, had ventured to call in question, but to correct certain irregularities into which many of them had fallen in his absence, and for other purposes which shall be mentioned in Sect. iv. of this Preface.

Sect. II.—Of the Character and Manners of the Corinthians in their heathen State.

Before Corinth was destroyed by the Romans, it was famous for the magnificence of its buildings, the extent of its commerce, and the number, the learning, and the ingenuity of its inhabitants, who carried the arts and sciences to such perfection, that it was called by Cicero, tuine Gracie lumen, the light of all Greece; and by Florus, Graecia decus, the ornament of Greece. The lusts, however, which Corinth derived from the number and genius of its inhabitants, was tarnished by their debauched manners. Strabo, lib. viii. p. 151. tells us, that in the temple of Venus at Corinth "there were more than a thousand harlots, the slaves of the temple, who, in honour of the goddess, prostituted themselves to all comers for hire, and through these the city was crowded, and became wealthy." From an institution of this kind, under the pretext of religion, furnished an opportunity to the debauched to gratify their lusts, it is easy to see what corruption of manners must have flowed. Accordingly it is known, that lasciviousness was carried to such a pitch in Corinth, that, in the language of these times, the appellation of a Corinthian given to a woman, implied that she was a prostitute and a prostitute, to be a Corinthian, spoken of a man, was the same as Eرجع, to commit whoredom.

In the Achaean war, Corinth was utterly destroyed by the Roman Consul Mummius. But being rebuilt by Julius Cæsar, and peopleed with a Roman colony, it was made the residence of the Proconsul who governed the province of Achaia, see (see 1 Thess. i. 7. note), and soon regained its ancient splendour; for its inhabitants increasing exceedingly, they carried on, by means of its two sea-ports, an extensive commerce, which brought them great wealth. From that time forth, the arts which minister to the conveniences and luxuries of life, were carried on at Corinth in a great perfection as formerly; schools were opened, in which philosophy and rhetoric were publicly taught by able masters; and strangers from all quarters crowded to Corinth, to be instructed in the sciences and in the arts. So that Corinth, during this latter period, was filled with philosophers, rhetoricians, and artists of all kinds, and abounded in wealth. These advantages, however, were counterbalanced, as before, by the effects which wealth and luxury never fail to produce. In a word, an universal corruption and manners was prevalent; so that Corinth, in its second state, became as debauched as it had been at any former period whatever. The apostle therefore had good reason, in this epistle, to exhort the Corinthian brethren to 'free fornication,' and after giving them a catalogue of the unrighteous who shall not inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, was well entitled to add, 'and such were some of you.' In short, the Corinthians had carried this vice so very kind to such a pitch, that their city was more debauched than any of the other cities of Greece.
Sect. IV.

PREFACE TO I. CORINTHIANS.

Sect. III.—Of the Conversion of the Corinthians to the Christian Faith.

After the apostle left the synagogue, he frequented the house of one Justus, a religious proselyte whom he had converted. Here the idolatrous inhabitants of the city, prompted by curiosity, came to him from time to time, in great numbers, to hear his discourses. And having themselves seen, or having been credibly informed by others, of the miracles which Paul wrought, and of the spiritual gifts which he conferred on them who believed, they were so impressed with his discourses and miracles, that many of them renounced their ancient superstition. So Luke tells us, Acts xviii. 8. ‘And many of the Corinthians, hearing, believed, and were baptized.’

Of all the miracles wrought in confirmation of the gospel, that which seems to have affected the Greeks most, was the gift of tongues. For as they esteemed eloquence more than any other human attainment, that gift, by raising the common people to an equality with the learned, greatly recommended the gospel to persons in the middle and lower ranks of life. Hence numbers of the inhabitants of Corinth, of that description, were early converted. But with persons in higher stations, the gospel was not so generally successful. By their attachment to some one or other of the schemes of philosophy which then prevailed, the men of rank and learning had rendered themselves incapable, or at least unwilling, to embrace the gospel. At that time, the philosophers were divided into many sects; and each sect having nothing in view but to confute the tenets of the other sects, the disquisitions of philosophy among the Greeks had introduced an universal scepticism, which destroyed all rational belief. This pernicious effect appeared conspicuously in their statesmen, who, through their philosophical disputations, having lost all ideas of truth and virtue, regarded nothing in their politics but utility. And therefore, in the persuasion that idolatry was the only proper religion for the vulgar, they would have nothing that had the least tendency to make the people sensible of its absurdity. On persons of this description, the arguments in behalf of the gospel, advanced by the apostle, made no impression; as was seen in the Athenian magistrates and philosophers, before whom Paul reasoned in the most forcible manner, against the reigning idolatry, without effect. The miracles which he wrought at Corinth, in confirmation of the gospel, ought to have drawn the attention of all ranks of men in that city. But the opinion which the philosophers and statesmen entertained of their own wisdom was so great, that they despised the gospel as mere foolishness, (1 Cor. i. 23,) rejected its evidences, and remained, most of them, in their original ignorance and wickedness.

Though, as above observed, the common people at Corinth, strongly impressed by the apostle’s miracles, readily embraced the gospel, it must be acknowledged, that they did not seem, at the beginning, to have been much influenced thereby either in their temper or manners. In receiving the gospel, they had been moved by vanity, rather than by the love of truth. And therefore, when they found the doctrines of the gospel contrary in many things to their most approved maxims, they neither relented them, nor the apostle’s explanations of them. And as to his moral exhortations, because they were not composed according to the rules of the Grecian rhetoric, nor delivered with those tones of voice which the Greeks admired in their orators, they were not attended to by many, and had scarce any influence in restraining them from their vicious pleasures. Knowing, therefore, the humour of the Greeks, that they sought wisdom, that is, a conformity to their philosophical principles, in every new scheme of doctrine that was proposed to them, and nauseated whatever was contrary to these principles, the apostle did not, during his first abode in Corinth, attempt to explain the gospel scheme to the Corinthians in its fullest extent; but, after the example of his divine Master, he taught them as they were able to bear:—1 Cor. iii. 1. ‘Now I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as to fleshly men, even as to babes in Christ.’ 2. Milk I gave you, and not meat: For ye were not then able to receive it. Nay, neither yet now are ye able.’

Sect. IV.—Of the Occasion of writing the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Thus the apostle had taught the word of God at Corinth during more than a year and six months, the religious knowledge of the disciples, for the reasons already mentioned, was but imperfect at his departure. They were therefore more liable than some others to be deceived by any impostor who came among them, as the event shewed. For, after the apostle was gone, a false teacher, who was a Jew by birth, 2 Cor. xi. 22. came to Corinth with letters of recommendation, 2 Cor. iii. 1. which he probably took from the brethren in Judea; for which reason he is called a false apostle, 2 Cor. xi. 13. having been sent forth by men. This teacher was of the sect of the Sadducees, (see 1 Cor. xv. 12.), and of some note on account of his birth (2 Cor. v. 16, 17.) and education; being perhaps a scribe learned in the law, 1 Cor. i. 20. He seems likewise to have been well acquainted with the character, manners, and opinions of the Greeks; for he recommended himself to the Corinthians, not only by appealing in his discourses, that eloquence of which the Greeks were so fond, but also by suiting his doctrine to their prejudices, and his precepts to their practices. For example, because the learned Greeks regarded the body as the prison of the soul, and expected to be delivered from it in the future state, and called the hope of the resurrection of the flesh, the hope of worms,—a filthy and abominable thing—which God neither will nor can do; (Celsus ap. Origen, lib. v. p. 240.; and because they ridiculed the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, Acts xvii. 32, this new teacher, to render the gospel acceptable to them, flatly denied it to be a doctrine of the gospel, and affirmed that the resurrection of the body was neither desirable nor possible; and argued, that the only resurrection promised by Christ was the resurrection of the soul from ignorance and error, which the heretics of these times said was already passed, 2 Tim. ii. 18. Next, because the Corinthians were addicted to gluttony, drunkenness, fornication, and every sort of lewdness, this teacher devised the apostle’s precepts concerning temperance and chastity, and reasoned in defence of the licentious practices of the Greeks, as we learn from the apostle’s refutation of his arguments, 1 Cor. vi. 12, 13. Nay, he went so far as to patronize a person of some note among the Corinthians, who was living in incest with his father’s wife, 1 Cor. v. 1.; proposing thereby to gain the good-will of not only that offender, but of many others also, who wished to retain their ancient debauched manner of living. Lastly, to ingratiate himself with the Jews, he enjoined obedience to the law of Moses, as absolutely necessary to salvation. In thus corrupting the gospel, for the sake of rendering it acceptable to the Greeks, the false teacher proposed to make himself the head of a party in the church at Corinth, and to acquire both power and wealth. But Paul’s authority, as an apostle, standing in the way of his ambition, and hindering him from spreading his errors with the success he wished, he endeavoured to lessen the apostle, by representing him as one who had neither the mental nor the bodily abilities necessary to an apostle. His presence, he said, was mean, and his speech contemptible, 2 Cor. x. 10. He found fault with his birth and education, 2 Cor. x. 10. He even affirmed that he was no apostle, because he had not attended Christ during his ministry on earth, and boldly said that Paul had abstained from taking maintenance, because he was conscious he was no apostle. On the other hand, to raise himself in the eyes of the Corinthians, he praised his own birth and education, boasted of his knowledge and eloquence, and laid some stress on his bodily accomplishments; by all which he gained a number of adherents, and formed a party at Corinth against the apostle. And, because there were in that party some teachers endowed with spiritual gifts, the apostle considers them also as leaders. Hence, he speaks sometimes of one leader of the faction, and sometimes of divers, as it suited the purpose of his argument.

While these things were being done at Corinth, Paul returned from Jerusalem to Ephesus, according to his promise, Acts xvi. 21. During his second sojourn in that city, which was of long continuance, some of the family of Chloe, who were members of the church at Corinth, and who adhered to the apostle, happening to come to Ephesus, gave him an account of the disorderly practices which many of the Corinthian brethren were following, and of the faction which the false teacher had formed among them in opposition to him, 1 Cor. i. 11. These evils requiring a speedy remedy, the apostle immediately sent Timothy and Erastus to Corinth, Acts xix. 22. 1 Cor. iv. 17, in hopes that if they did not reclaim the faction, they might at least be able to correct its effects. For that purpose he ordered his messengers to inform the Corinthians, that he himself was coming to them directly from Ephesus, to increase the spiritual gifts of those who adhered to him, 2 Cor. i. 15, and to punish, by his miraculous power, the disobedient, 1 Cor. iv. 18, 19. Such was the apostle's resolution, when he sent Timothy and Erastus away. But before he had time to put this resolution into execution, three persons arrived at Ephesus, whom the sincere part of the church had despatched from Corinth with a letter to the apostle, wherein they expressed their attachment to him, and desired his directions concerning various matters, which had been the subject of much disputation, not only with the adherents of the false teachers, but among the sincere themselves.

The coming of these messengers, together with the extraordinary success with which the apostle had about that time in converting the Ephesians, occasioned an alteration in his resolution respecting his journey to Corinth. For instead of setting out directly, he determined to remain in Ephesus till the following Pentecost, 1 Cor. xvi. 8. And then, instead of sailing straightway to Corinth, he proposed to go first into Macedonia, 1 Cor. xvi. 5, 6. In the mean time, to compensate the loss which the Corinthians sustained from the deferring of his intended visit, he wrote to them his First Epistle, in which he reproved the false teacher and his adherents, because they traduced him as a person rude in speech, he informed them, that Christ had ordered him, in preaching the gospel, to avoid the enticing words of man's wisdom, lest the doctrine of salvation through the cross of Christ should be rendered ineffectual. Then, addressing the heads of the faction, he plainly told them, their luxurious manner of living was very different from the persecuted lot of the true ministers of Christ. And to put the obedience of the sincere part of the church to the test, he ordered them, in a general public meeting called for the purpose, to excommunicate the incestuous person. After which he sharply reproved those who had gone into the heathen courts of justice with their law-suits, and directed them to a better method of settling their claims on each other respecting worldly matters.

The Corinthians, in their letter, having desired the apostle's advice concerning marriage, celibacy, and divorce, and concerning the eating of meats which had been sacrificed to idols, he treated of these subjects at great length in this epistle. Also, because the faction had called his apostleship in question, he proved himself an apostle by various undeniable arguments, and confuted the objection taken from his not demanding maintenance from the Corinthians. Then, in the exercise of his apostolic authority, he declared it to be sinful, on any pretext whatever, to sit down with the heathens in an idol's temple, to partake of the sacrifices which had been offered there. And, with the same authority, he gave rules for the behaviour of both sexes in the public assemblies; rebuked the whole church for the indecent manner in which they had celebrated the Lord's supper; and the spiritual men, for the irregularities which many of them had been guilty of, in the exercise of their gifts; proved against the Greek philosophers and the Jewish Sadducees the possibility and certainty of the resurrection of the dead, and exhorted the Corinthians to make collections for the saints in Judea, who were greatly distressed by the persecution which their unbelieving brethren had raised against them.

From this short account of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, it is evident, as Locke observes, that the apostle's chief design in writing it was to support his own authority with the brethren at Corinth, and to vindicate himself from the calumnies of the party formed by the false teacher in opposition to him, and to lessen the credit of the leaders of that party, by shewing the gross errors and miscarriages into which they had fallen; and to put an end to their schism, by uniting them to the sincere part of the church—that all of them, unanimously submitting to him as an apostle of Christ, might receive his doctrines and precepts as of divine authority; not those only which he had formerly delivered, but those also which he now taught in his answers to the questions which the sincere part of the church had proposed to him.

At the conclusion of this account of the epistle, it may not be improper to observe, that because the unteachableness of the gospel, proceeded from the extreme attachment to their own false philosophy and rhetoric, the apostle in different passages of this epistle was at great pains to shew the vanity of both, together with their pernicious influence in matters of religion. His reasonings on these topics, no doubt, were particularly designed for confuting the pretensions of the Greeks; yet they are not uninteresting to us. They are still of great use in beating down those high ideas of the powers of the human mind, which some modern pretenders to philosophy are so industrious in propagating, for the purpose of persuading us that divine revelation is unnecessary in matters of religion. They are of use likewise in shewing the falsehood of those philosophical principles, whereby deists have endeavoured to disprove the facts recorded in the gospel history. Lastly, they prove that a studied artificial rhetoric is not necessary in communicating to the world the revelations of God.

Sect. V.—Of the Time and Place of Writing the First Epistle to the Corinthians.

Or the place where this epistle was written, there never has been any doubt. The mention that is made, chap. xvi. 8, of the apostle's purpose of 'remaining in Ephesus till Pentecost,' and the salvation of the churches of Asia, ver. 19, shew, that this letter was written, not at Ephesus, but at Philippi, as the spurious postscript indicates, but at Ephesus, during the apostle's second sojourn in that city, of which we have the account, Acts xix. 1-41.
It is not so generally agreed, at what particular time of the apostle's abode in Ephesus this letter was written. Mill, in his Prolegomena, No. 9. says it was written after the riot of Demetrius, because the apostle's fighting with wild beasts at Ephesus is mentioned in it, chap. xv. 29, which he thinks happened during that riot. But Paul did not then go into the theatre, being restrained by the disciples, and by some of the Asiarchs who were his friends, Acts xix. 30, 31. His fighting with wild beasts, therefore, at Ephesus, must have happened in some previous tumult, of which there is no mention in the history of the Acts. That the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written a little while before the riot of Demetrius and the craftsmen, appears to me probable from two circumstances: The first is, the apostle told the Corinthians, chap. xvi. 8, 9, that he resolved to abide in Ephesus till Pentecost, on account of the great success with which he was then preaching the gospel. The second circumstance is, that Demetrius, in his speech to the craftsmen, mentioned the much people whom Paul had turned from the worship of idols, as a recent event; and by shewing that Paul's doctrine, concerning the gods who are made with the hands of men, effectually put an end to their occupation and wealth, he excited the craftsmen to make the riot. These two circumstances joined, lead us to conclude that the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written a little while before the riot. For if it had been written after the riot, the apostle could not have said, 'I will abide at Ephesus till Pentecost.'

On supposition that the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written a little while before the riot of Demetrius, its date may be fixed to the end of the year 56, or the beginning of the year 57, in the following manner: The apostle, as has been shewn, Sect. I. came to Corinth, the first time, about the beginning of summer in the year 51. On that occasion he abode near two years, Acts xviii. 11, 18. then set out by sea for Syria, with an intention to celebrate the ensuing feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem, ver. 21. This was the Pentecost which happened in the year 53. Having celebrated that feast, he went immediately to Antioch; and after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, ver. 22, 23. and passing through the upper coasts, he came to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1. In this journey, I suppose he spent a year and four months. These, brought into the account after the feast of Pentecost in the year 53, will make the apostle's second arrival at Ephesus to have happened in the autumn of 54. At Ephesus he abode two years and three months; at the end of which the riot of Demetrius happened. These, added to the autumn of 54, bring us to the end of the year 56, or the beginning of the year 57, as the date of the riot, and of the apostle's First Epistle to the Corinthians. Accordingly Pearson places it in the year 57; and Mill more particularly in the beginning of that year; because it is said, chap. v. 7. 'For Christ our passover is sacrificed for us: 8. Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven,' &c.

Further, the apostle, a while before the riot of Demetrius, speaking of his going to Jerusalem with the collections, said, Acts xix. 31. 'After I have been there I must also see Rome.' From this Lightfoot very well conjectures, that Claudius was then dead, and that the news of his death, which happened October 13, a. p. 54, had reached Ephesus; because, if he had been alive, and his edict in force, St. Paul would not have thought of going to Rome. I add, that before he took such a resolution, he must have known that Nero was well affected to the Jews, and that the Christians were re-established at Rome. But as some months must have passed before Nero discovered his sentiments respecting the Jews, and before the church was actually re-established in the city, the apostle could not well be informed of these things before the spring of the year 56, that is, about 18 months after Claudius's death.

Sect. VI.—Of the Messengers by whom the First Epistle to the Corinthians was sent, and of the Success of that Epistle.

As the time the apostle wrote this letter he was in great distress, 2 Cor. ii. 14, being afraid that the faction would pay no regard to it. And therefore, instead of sending it by the messengers who had come from Corinth, he sent it by Titus, 2 Cor. vii. 7, 8, 13, 15. that his presence and exhortations might give it the more effect. And as it contained directions concerning the collections for the saints, chap. xvi. the apostle desired Titus to urge the sincere among the Corinthians to begin that good work, 2 Cor. vii. 6. With Titus the apostle sent another brother, 1 Cor. xii. 18, probably an Ephesian, whose name is not mentioned, but who no doubt was a person of reputation, seeing he was appointed to assist Titus in healing the divisions which had rent the Corinthian church. And that they might have time to execute their commission, and return to the apostle at Ephesus, he resolved to remain there till the ensuing Pentecost. It seems he did not think it prudent to go himself to Corinth, till he knew the success of his letter, and how the Corinthians stood affected towards him, after they had read and considered it.

As this letter, of which Titus was the bearer, contained the apostle's answer to the one which the Corinthians had sent to him, we may believe the messengers by whom it was sent, namely, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, 1 Cor. xvi. 17, would go along with Titus and the brethren. Be this, however, as it may, Titus and his companions, on their arrival at Corinth, had all the success in executing their commission which they could desire. For, on delivering the apostle's letter, the Corinthians received them with fear and trembling, 2 Cor. vii. 15, expressed the deepest sorrow for their miscarriages, ver. 13-11, and paid a ready obedience to all the apostle's orders, ver. 15, 16. But the news of this happy change in their temper the apostle did not receive, till leaving Ephesus he came into Macedonia, where it seems he waited till Titus arrived, and brought him such an account of the greatest part of the church at Corinth, as gave him the highest joy, 2 Cor. vii. 4, 7, 13.

Because Sotheiner joined the apostle in this letter, Beza thinks he was the apostle's amanuensis in writing it. And for the same reason he supposes the Second Epistle to the Corinthians to have been written by Timothy. But all this is mere conjecture, as is plain from Beza's note on Gal. vi. 11.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in the First Chapter of this Epistle.

The teacher who came to Corinth after the apostle's departure with a view to lessen his authority among the Corinthians, boldly affirmed that he was no apostle. Wherefore, to shew the falsehood of that calumny, St. Paul, after asserting his own apostleship, and giving the Corinthians his apostolical benediction, mentioned a fact well known to them all, by which his title to the apostleship was established in the clearest manner. Having communicated to the Corinthians a variety of spiritual gifts immediately after their conversion, he thanked God for having enriched them with every spiritual gift, at the time his preaching concerning Christ was confirmed among them, ver. 4-7. By making the spiritual gifts with which the Corinthians were enriched, immediately on their believing, a subject of thanksgiving to God, the apostle in a delicate manner put them in mind, that they had received these gifts long before the false teacher came among them; consequently, that they had received none of their spiritual gifts from him, but were indebted to the apostle himself for the whole of them; also, that they were much to blame for attaching themselves to a teacher, who had given them no proof at all, either of his doctrine or of his mission. See the View prefixed to 2 Cor. xii.
verses 12, 13.

St. Paul, by thus appealing to the spiritual gifts which he had imparted to the Corinthians, having established his authority as an apostle, exhorted them, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to live in union and peace, ver.
10.-For he had heard, that, after the example of the disciples of the Greek philosophers, each of them claimed peculiar respect, on account of the supposed eminence of the person who had taught him, and attached himself to that teacher, as if he had been the author of his faith, ver. 11, 12. But to make them sensible that Christ was their only master, the apostle asked them, Whether Christ, that is, the Church of Christ, was divided into different sects, under different masters, like the Grecian schools of philosophy! and whether any of their teachers was crucified for them! and whether they had been baptized in the name of any of them! ver. 13.
—Then thanked God, since they made such a bad use of the reputations of the persons who baptized them, that he had baptized but a few of them, ver. 14, 15, 16. —And to shew that they derived no advantage from the dignity of the teachers who baptized them, he told them, that he and his brethren apostles, who, in respect of their inspiration, were the chief teachers in the church, were sent by Christ, not so much to baptize, as to preach the gospel, ver.

The false teacher, by introducing the Grecian philosophy and rhetoric into his discourses, had endeavoured to render them acceptable to the Corinthians, and had preferred himself to St. Paul, who, he said, was unskilful in these matters. Lest, therefore, the Corinthians should think meanly of his doctrine and manner of preaching, the apostle told them, that Christ had sent him to preach the gospel, not with wisdom of speech, that is, with philosophical arguments expressed in flowery harmonious language, such as the Greeks used in their schools; because in that method the gospel, becoming a subject of philosophical disputation, would have lost its efficacy in a revelation from God, ver. 17. That though the preaching of salvation through the cross appeared mere foolishness to the destroyed among the heathen philosophers and Jews, yet to the saved, especially the heathen and the Jews, it was found by experience to be the powerful means of their salvation, ver. 18. —That God foretold he would remove both philosophy and Judaism on account of their insufficiency, ver. 19. —And made the Greek philosophers and Jewish scribes ashamed to shew themselves, because they had darkened and corrupted, rather than enlightened and reformed the world, ver. 20. —That having experimentally shewn the inefficacy of philosophy, it pleased God, by the preaching of doctrines which to the philosophers appeared foolishness, to save them who believed, ver. 21. —And therefore, notwithstanding the Jews required the sign from heaven, in confirmation of the doctrines proposed to them, and the Greeks expected every doctrine to be conformable to their philosophical principles, the apostle preached salvation through Christ crucified, which he knew was to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness, ver. 22, 23. —But to them who were called, or persuaded to believe the gospel, both Jews and Greeks, that doctrine was the powerful and wise means which God made use of for their salvation, ver. 24.

—Therefore, said he, it is evident that the foolish doctrines of God have more wisdom in them than the wisest doctrines of men; and the weak instruments used by God for accomplishing his purposes, are more effectual than the greatest exactions of human genius, ver. 25.

Having thus defended both the doctrines of the gospel, and the manner in which they were preached, the apostle very properly proceeded to shew the Corinthians the folly of basing in their teachers, on account of their learning, their eloquence, their birth, or their power. Look, said he, at the persons who have called you to the belief of the gospel; not many philosophers, not many warriors, not many noblemen, have been employed to call you, ver.
26. —But God hath chosen for that purpose unlearned persons, to put to shame the learned, ver. 27. —by their success in enlightening and reforming the world, ver. 28.
—that no flesh might take any honour to himself, in the matter of converting and saving mankind, ver. 29. —the whole glory being due to God, ver. 30, 31. In this light, the mean birth and low station of the first preachers of the gospel, together with their want of literature and eloquence, instead of being objections to the gospel, are a strong proof of its divine original.

New Translation.

Chap. I.—1 Paul, a called apostle (of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, and Sosthenes: My brother.

2 To the church of God which is at Corinth; to the sanctified (v. 172.) under Christ Jesus; to the called (v. 172.) to the saints; with all in every place; who call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; both their and our Lord:—

Ver. 1.—A called apostle.—Because the faction pretended to to enter into the holy gifts of Paul's apostleship, chap. i.
For he began this letter with telling them, that he was not, like Matthias, an apostle made by men, neither did he assume the office by his own authority, but was called to be an apostle by Christ himself, who is a that purpose appeared to him from heaven, as he went to Damascus to persecute his disciple; and that, in the end, to be an apostle, Christ actually by his appointment of God. So Ananias assured Paul Acts xii. 15, 16, 17.
Wherefore, in respect of the manner in which Paul was made an apostle, he was more honourable than all the other apostles. See Rom. i. 1, note 3.

2 Sosthenes.—This person was the chief ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, mentioned as active in persecuting Paul, Acts xviii. 7.
We must suppose that he was afterwards converted, and became an eminent preacher of the gospel; and having a considerable influence among a Christian congregation, he joined in writing this letter, for the reasons mentioned, 1 Thess. Pref. Sect. 2.

Commentary.

Chap. I.—1 Paul, a miraculously called apostle of Jesus Christ, agreeably to the will of God, and Sosthenes my fellow-labourer in the gospel.

2 To the worshippers of the true God who are in Corinth; to the separated from the heathen, by their being under Jesus Christ; to the called people of God; to those who merit the appellation of saints, because they have renounced idolatry, and have devoted themselves to serve the true God; with all, in every place, who worship our Lord Jesus Christ, who is both their and our Lord who are Jews.

Ver. 2.—1. The church of God, &c.—This is a much more august title than that mentioned Gal. i. 2. 'The churches of Ga-lans.'
2. To the sanctified.—See Exe. iv. 53. and chap. vi. 11. note 5.
3. To the called.—Into the fellowship of Christ himself, as the apostle himself explains it, ver. 6.
4. To the saints.—See Exo. iv. 68. 1 Cor. vi. 1, where the saints are opposed to the heathen, that is, to idolaters.
5. All in every place.—Though this epistle was written to correct the disorderly practices of the Corinthians, it contains many general instructions, which could not fail to be of use to all the brethren in the province of Achaia likewise, and even to Christians in every place; for which reason the inscription consists of three members, and includes them all.

6. Call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.—This expression we have Acts vii. 20. "And the high priest An-ver) calling upon Christ, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive
'(

1 CORINTHIANS.

3 May gracious dispositions be to you, with peace, temporal and eternal, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom God dispenses these blessings.

4 In my prayers I give thanks to my God always concerning you, on account of the grace of God which was given to you, (v. 167.) through Jesus Christ:

5 That ye were enriched (v. with every spiritual gift) (see ver. 7.), by him, even with all speech, and all knowledge;

6 (KeSe, 302.) When the testimony of Christ was confirmed (v. 172.) among you:

7 So that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the revelation (see 1 Pet. i. 7, note 2.) of our Lord Jesus Christ.

8 Faithful is God, by whom ye have been called into the fellowship (1 John i. 3, note 2.) of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

9 Now, brethren, I beseech you by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be compactly joined (v. 5.) by the same mind, and by the same judgment.

10 For it hath been declared to me concerning you, my brethren, by (v. 70.) some of the family of Chloe, that there are contentions among you.

11 And I mention this, that each of you saith, I, indeed, am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ.

12 Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for your sakes? See also Actes xi. 21. Rom. x. 12, 13, 11. — Praying to Christ was so much practised by the first Christians, that Piny mentioned it in his letter to Trajan: "Carmen Christi, quasi Deo, discere." They sing with one another a hymn to 'Christ as a God.'

13 Both with and in the Lord. — This the apostle mentioned in the beginning of his letter, to show the Corinthians how absurd it was for the disciples of one Master to be divided into factions under particular leaders. Christ is the only Lord and Master of all his disciples, whether they be of Antioch, of Jerusalem, or of Rome. See also Eph. v. 7, 8, 1 Pet. iv. 10. That grace hath this significance, is evident from ver. 5.

14 With all speech, — [See also iv. 19, v. with all sorts of languages, to be understood chiefly of the spiritual men among the Jews — converts; for most of the Gentile converts at Corinth were讲话 or Greek persons, — and "babies in Christ," chap. iii. 1.

15 When the testimony of Christ is the testimony of the Corinthians. So the phrase occurs, 2 Tim. ii. 8. See 1 Cor. xii. 7. What is the thing wherefore ye have been inferior to other churches? See 1 Cor. xii. 2 note 5.

16 Christ. — He will also inform them: Yet, here, is not the relative but the proper personal. For the following vers. shew that the person spoken of is God, mentioned ver. 3. "I give thanks to my God, &c.

17 Without accusation. — The apostle in this expressly only his charitable judgment, not of individuals, but of the body of the Corinthians. For by no stretch of charity could he hope that every individual of a church, in which there were such great disorders, would be unrebukable at the day of judgment. See 1 Thess. iii. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

18 For I — By the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. — This may signify the person and authority of our Lord Jesus Christ. See 1 Cor. iv. 1. Locke is of opinion, that the apostle, intending to abolish the names of the leaders which they had parted themselves, besought them by the name of Christ. The same author mentions this, so as to make the apostle shew, that as every individual, GodSans expression which hath not some relation to his main purpose.

2. Ye be compactly joined (v. 5.) in the same mind; — that is, by mutual good affections; for the same mind, in the sense of the same opinion, is used by our brethren in an amicable society. We have the same direction, Rom. xi. 5, there expressed, 'the same direction towards one another.' See also 1 Pet. iv. 10, 11, 12.

3. By the same (v. 15.) judgment. — This word denotes that practical judgment which proceeds to edification. The meaning is, that in our deliberations we should yield to each other from mutual affections, and from a love of peace. Accordingly, the heathen moralists described true friendship as constituted by the same inclination and accidental ties. Ad Moais, ibid. 589, 604. &c. The same opinion is not sufficient; only a good intention is required.

4. By the same mind, (v. 5.) that is, in on account of the spiritual gifts. For so the grace of God signifies, Rom. xii. 6. Herein, it is the apostle's design to shew, that the grace which is given to us, is so to be exercised, as to be of service to others, and contribute to the edification of the church.

5. All and knowledge. — See 1 Cor. xii. 8 note 2. What is here said concerning the prevailing of the Corinthians with all knowledge, is to be understood chiefly of the spiritual men among the Jews. converts; for most of the Gentile converts at Corinth were讲 or Greek persons, — and "babies in Christ," chap. iii. 1, 2. &c.

6. When the testimony of Christ is the testimony of the Corinthians. So the phrase occurs, 2 Tim. ii. 8. See 1 Cor. xii. 7. What is the thing wherefore ye have been inferior to other churches? See 1 Cor. xii. 2 note 5.

7. To be compactly joined in the same mind. — The apostle speaks here, not of God, but of the church at Corinth, as having in it spiritual men, who possessed all the different spiritual gifts which common believers could enjoy. Accordingly, he besought them, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. What is the thing wherefore ye have been inferior to other churches? See 2 Cor. xii. 12 note 3.

8. He will also inform them: Yet, here, is not the relative but the proper personal. For the following vers. shew that the person spoken of is God, mentioned ver. 3. "I give thanks to my God, &c.

9. Without accusation. — The apostle in this expressly only his charitable judgment, not of individuals, but of the body of the Corinthians. For by no stretch of charity could he hope that every individual of a church, in which there were such great disorders, would be unrebukable at the day of judgment. See 1 Thess. iii. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

10. For I — By the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. — This may signify the person and authority of our Lord Jesus Christ. See 1 Cor. iv. 1. for you! or were ye baptized (νεφθή) into the name of Paul?
14. I give thanks to God, that I baptized none of you, except Crispus and Gaul;
15. Least any one should say, that into mine own name I had baptized.
16. And I baptized also the family of Stephanas: and I knew not whether I baptized any other.
17. For Christ hath not sent me to baptize, but to preach the gospel;
18. Not, however, with wisdom of speech or knowledge which is of this world, but with the power of God.
19. For the preaching of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, 20. Where is the wise man? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world,
21. Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of the world?
22. For wisdom is foolishness to them that are wise, and strong to them that are strong.
23. But God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty.
24. And he hath chosen the Base things of the world, and the things which are despised,
25. That the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God should not be known unto the princes of this world,
26. For God hath also given to them the understanding of this world;
27. For when, in the wisdom of God, the world was created, 28. For he is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation.
29. For by him all things were created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, 30. And not only so, but also the church.
31. As concerning the gospel of the precious blood which was shed, 32. For the preaching of the cross is to them that are perishing foolishness, 33. For they that are perishing in this world do not receive the things of the Spirit of God;
34. For they are foolishness unto them;
35. And verse 17.
36. For the preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that are perishing.
23 Yet we preach Christ crucified, to the Jew, indeed, a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness:

24 But to them who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.

25 (1 Cor. 1:23.) Therefore, the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men. (For a similar ellipse, see John vi. 36.)

26 For ye see the calling of you, brethren, that not many wise men after the flesh, nor many mighty, nor many noble, call you.

27 But the foolish ones of the world! God hath chosen to call you, that he might put to shame the wise; and the weak ones of the world God hath chosen, that he might put to shame the strong ones.

28 And the ignoble ones of the world, and the despised ones, God hath chosen, and those who are not,1 that he might bring to nought those who are:

29 That no flesh might boast in his presence.

30 Of him, (1 Cor. 1:10,) therefore, ye are in Christ Jesus, who is become to us the wisdom from God, the righteousness, and the sanctification, and from redeemer:

31 So that, as is written, (Jer. i. 23,) He who bosteth, let him bosteth in the Lord.

L. CORINTHIANS.

23 Yet we preach salvation through Christ crucified, which to the Jew, indeed, who believe that their Christ will never die, (John xii. 34,) is a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks is foolishness, who think it absurd to speak of being saved by one who himself did not save himself.

24 But to them who have obeyed the gospel call, both Jews and Greeks, the doctrine of salvation through Christ crucified, is the powerful and wise means by which God accomplished their conversion.

25 Therefore, the foolishness of God, the method chosen by God which men reckon foolishness, is wiser, as being more effectual, than any method devised by man; and the weak instruments employed by God are stronger than those thought strong by men.

26 (1 Cor. 1:27.) For ye see the calling of you, brethren, that not many persons remarkable for human literature, not many mighty by their offices, not many eminent for their noble birth, are chosen to call you into the fellowship of the gospel, ver. 9.

27 But the ignoble ones of the world God hath chosen to call you, that he might put to shame the learned; and the weak ones of the world, persons possessed of no worldly power, God hath chosen to call you, that he might put to shame those, who, by their rank and office, were strong ones; persons who, by their authority and example, might have successfully reformed others.

28 And persons of low birth in the world, and despised persons, God hath chosen to call you, and persons who, in the opinion of the writers and philosophers, were no persons, persons utterly unfit for the work, that he might bring to naught the boasting of those who thought themselves the only persons proper for such an undertaking:

29 That no man might boast in his presence, either as having conceived the gospel, or as having by his own power brought any one to receive it.

30 It is owing to God, therefore, and not to the ability of us preachers, that ye are believers in Christ Jesus, who is become to us the author of the gospel, a wisdom of God, a wisdom better than any scheme of philosophy; the author of righteousness also, and sanctification, and redemption, blessings not to be obtained by philosophy.

31 So that, as it is written, he who bosteth, let him bosteth in the Lord.
II. CORINTHIANS.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Reasonings in this Chapter.

Because the learned Greeks had objected to the gospel, the foolishness (as they were pleased to call it) of its doctrines, and the weakness of its preachers, the apostle made answer in the foregoing chapter, that by these foolish doctrines and weak preachers a refutation had been wrought in the minds and manners of multitudes, which the boasted philosophy of the Greeks, and the eloquence of their orators, had not been able to accomplish. But this being a matter of great importance, and the faction having upbraided Paul in particular with his want of eloquence, he now proceeded in this chapter to tell the Corinthians, that Christ having sent him to preach, not with the wisdom of speech, (see chap. i. 17,) he acted agreeably to his commission, when he came to them, both with the excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaiming the testimony of God, ver. 1. But thus declaiming the Grecian philosophy and rhetoric, and by calling the gospel the testimony of God, the apostle insinuated, that the credibility of the gospel depended neither on its conformity to the philosophy of the Greeks, nor on the eloquence of its preachers, but on the attestation of God, who confirmed it by miracles. And therefore, however ridiculous it might appear in their eyes, he determined to make known nothing among the Corinthians, either in his private conversations or in his public discourses, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified for the sins of men, ver. 2. At the same time, knowing the opinion which the learned Greeks would form of that doctrine in particular, as well as that his discourses were neither composed nor pronounced according to the rules of the Grecian rhetoric, his first addresses to them were in weakness, and in fear, and with much trembling, ver. 3. Yet they were accompanied with the powerful demonstration of the Spirit, who enabled him to prove the things which he preached by miracles, ver. 4; that the faith of mankind might be founded, not in the wisdom of men, but on the wisdom of God, that method of reasoning and speaking which human wisdom dictates as best calculated to persuade, but in the power of God, ver. 5.

However, lest the things which are said in the preceding chapter, concerning the foolishness of the doctrines of the gospel, and in this chapter, concerning its having no relation to any of the schemes of the Greek philosophy, might have misled the Corinthians to think meanly of it; the apostle told them, that, in the gospel, he and his brethren, as before, had made known a scheme of doctrine, which they who were perfectly instructed knew to be real wisdom. Only it was not the wisdom of this world; it was not the wisdom which the sages and the great philosophers of Greece were wont to extol. For they knew not of the mysteries of the kingdom of God, nor of any of the dispensation of the Son of God, and the Holy Spirit; nor of the things which were hid from the ages, and from the forefathers, in secret, and were made known in the fullness of time, to the apostles and prophets, by the Spirit, which was given to the apostles and the prophets, so that the wisdom of the world was unable to know these things. The apostle called the gospel a mystery, not because it contained doctrines absolutely unintelligible, but because being of divine original, and containing the most important discoveries, it was better entitled to the honourable appellation of a mystery, than any of those which were so named. This excellent scheme of doctrine, hitherto kept secret, God determined, before the Jewish dispensation began, to publish to the world by the apostles of his Son, to their great honour; so that they are mystagogues of a mystery more excellent than the Egyptians, or any other heathen mystery, ver. 7. Yet when it was published, none of the rulers of this world knew it to be the wisdom of God; for if they had known it to be so, they would not have crucified the Lord, or author, of all the glorious things discovered in the mystery of God's wisdom, ver. 8. This ignorance of the rulers, the apostle observed, was occasioned by the greatness of the things contained in the mystery of God's wisdom. They were what human reason could neither discover, nor fully comprehend, agreeably to Isaiah's description of them, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man." These things, however, God hath revealed to us apostles by his Spirit, for the Spirit of God, who inspires us, searcheth all things, even the deep counsels of God. So that we are well qualified to discover these counsels to the world, ver. 9, 10. But farther he told them, that the apostles had not received the inspiration of evil spirits, by which the heathen priests, and prophets, and mystagogues were guided, but the inspiration of the gifts to which the apostles were called, the gift of prophecy, and the eldership of the church, ver. 11. From which it appears, that the apostles were enabled to make known to the world, not in language taught by human rhetoric, but in words dictated by the Spirit of God; explaining spiritual things in spiritual words, ver. 12. Nevertheless, the animal men, the man who is guided by his animal passions and notions, does not receive the things revealed by the Spirit, because they appear to him foolishness; neither can he understand them, because they must be examined spiritually—that is, they must be examined by the light which divine revelation, and not reason, affords, ver. 14. But the spiritual man, the man who is not guided by his animal passions, and who acknowledges the authority of revelation, and is assisted by the Spirit of God, is able to examine and receive the things revealed by the Spirit. Yet he himself is examined and judged by no animal man; because no animal man can understand the principles upon which the spiritual man's belief is founded, ver. 15. For what animal man hath understood and approved the gracious purposes of the Lord Christ, respecting the salvation of the world? or what animal man is able to instruct the spiritual man? But, added he, we apostles have the gracious purposes of Christ made known to us by the Spirit, so that we are able both to know them and to communicate them to the world, ver. 16.

CHAP. II.—1. Now I, brethren, when I came to you, I came not with excellency of speech, do not with wisdom of speech, 2. But determined to make known nothing among you, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

CommenTARY.

CHAP. II.—1. Now I, brethren, one of the weak persons who called you, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, 2. But I, knowing, expected to bring you some new scheme of philosophy, I determined to preach nothing among you but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.
I. CORINTHIANS.

3. And knowing that my doctrine, and speech, and knowledge, is not of myself, but of God, who also hath made manifest to me the mystery of Jesus Christ for the intent of showing it to thee, even the mystery which is hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit; 4. Which in former generations was not made known unto the sons of men, as by the writing of the prophets, but in his time is made known unto all nations, according to the commandment of his holy apostles and prophets, 5. Who by the foresight of eternal things spake, of the Father God, according to the holy gospel of the glory of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, which he hath committed unto me as a finishing of the word of truth, so that I may give fear unto them who against the truth might be gainsayers, 6. Who had been approved by God, being sent from the Father, which thing also the glory of the gospel declareth; 7. For there be also among you that are the Galatians, who have turned from the truth into another gospel. 8. For if I now preach that according to the righteousness of the law I shall live, I err, and am guilty; 9. But God shall soon reveal his power, and shall establish his word through me unto glory. 10. For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

2 CORINTHIANS.

1. And I, in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling, was with you. 2. And my discourse and my preaching were not with persuasiveness of words of human wisdom, but with the demonstration of the Spirit, and of power. 3. That your faith might not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. (See 2 Cor. iv. 7, notes.)

4. For we speak wisdom among the perfect: but not the wisdom of this world, nor of the rulers of this world, who to be made nought. 5. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. And the wisdom of God is foolishness in the world, as it is written, 6. And he hath given the wise in glory, and to them that lack wisdom shame. 7. But the king of glory shall come into his kingdom, and into the kingdom of the saints, who are the children of God. (See 2 Kor. iv. 7, notes.)

8. For we speak not in the wisdom of the word after the flesh: for the word of the flesh is corrupted, but the word of the Spirit corrupteth not the things of God.

9. And as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. (See 1 Cor. ii. 9, note.)

10. For I determined not to know anything among you, save the things which were necessary to the salvation, how that I might be found unto the Jews a minister of the gospel of Christ to the Jews only, and to the Gentiles, 11. Not that I have magnified myself; but the excellency of the grace of God upon me, that the fullness of the grace of God might be in me. 12. And I saw Christ, and spake with him, and heard his voice, but not with the hearing of the flesh, and saw him with the eyes of the heart. (See 1 Cor. i. 12, note.)

13. For I determined not to know anything among you, save the things which were necessary to the salvation, how that I might be found unto the Jews a minister of the gospel of Christ to the Jews only, and to the Gentiles, 14. Not that I have magnified myself; but the excellency of the grace of God upon me, that the fullness of the grace of God might be in me. 15. And I saw Christ, and spake with him, and heard his voice, but not with the hearing of the flesh, and saw him with the eyes of the heart. (See 1 Cor. i. 12, note.)
I. CORINTHIANS.

10. (a) But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, even the deep things of God;—

11. For who hath known the depths of a man, except the spirit of man which is in him? so also the DEPTHS of God no one knoweth, except the Spirit of God.

12. Now, we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which cometh from God; for that we might know the things which are gifted to us by God.

13. Which things also we speak, not in words taught by human wisdom, but in WORDS TAUGHT BY THE Holy Spirit, explaining spiritual things in spiritual words;—

14. Now, an animal man1 receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually examined.

15. But the spiritual man1 examineth, indeed, all things, yet he is examined (see chap. iv. 3, note 1) of no one.

16. For what man hath known the mind of the Lord, who will instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ.

17. Abraham. The apostle gave the application of the Lord of glory to Jesus, for the important reason mentioned in the commentary, and because the glory in which he appeared during his incarnation, was the glory of the Father. For this reason, the Father is the beloved Son, because the glory of the Father is the glory of the Son, and the Son is the image of the Father, since the Son is the Father's likeness. The Father is the Son's life, for he is the source of the Son's being. The Father is the Son's substance, for he is the essence of the Son.

18. The apostle teaches this in the context, where he says, "Who knoweth the mind of the Lord?" (Rom. viii. 29). The mind of the Lord is the Son, who is the image of the Father, the Son is the likeness of the Father, and the Father is the Son's substance, for he is the essence of the Son.

19. The apostle explains this in the context, where he says, "Who knoweth the mind of the Lord?" (Rom. viii. 29). The mind of the Lord is the Son, who is the image of the Father, the Son is the likeness of the Father, and the Father is the Son's substance, for he is the essence of the Son.

20. The apostle explains this in the context, where he says, "Who knoweth the mind of the Lord?" (Rom. viii. 29). The mind of the Lord is the Son, who is the image of the Father, the Son is the likeness of the Father, and the Father is the Son's substance, for he is the essence of the Son.

21. The apostle explains this in the context, where he says, "Who knoweth the mind of the Lord?" (Rom. viii. 29). The mind of the Lord is the Son, who is the image of the Father, the Son is the likeness of the Father, and the Father is the Son's substance, for he is the essence of the Son.

22. The apostle explains this in the context, where he says, "Who knoweth the mind of the Lord?" (Rom. viii. 29). The mind of the Lord is the Son, who is the image of the Father, the Son is the likeness of the Father, and the Father is the Son's substance, for he is the essence of the Son.

Ver. 1. The Spirit (Greek) searcheth. —Le Clerc, thinking it improper to speak of the Spirit's searching, supposes that searching, the cause, is put for knowing, the effects of searching. And therefore he would have the clause translated, knoweth the depth; which, in the name of the word, searcheth seems to be used. Rev. ii. 23. I am he (Greek) who searcheth; that is, who fully knoweth the reins and heart.

2. The depths of God. —These are the various parts of that grand plan, for which the heathen priests and priests deceived the heathen, and which is here called the spirit of the world, because these false priests deceived the heathen, termed in scripture the world, and this world.

Ver. 13. Words taught by the Holy Spirit. —From this we learn, that as often as the apostle declared the doctrines of the gospel, the Spirit presented these doctrines to his mind in their own language; which indeed is the only way in which the doctrines of the gospel could be presented to their minds. For men are so accustomed to connect ideas with words, that they always think in words. Wherefore, though the language in which the apostles delivered the doctrines of the gospel, was really suggested to them by the Spirit, it was properly their own style of language. This language, in which the doctrines of the gospel were revealed to the apostles, and in which they delivered these doctrines to the world, is what St. Paul calls the form of sound words, which Timothy had heard from him, and was to hold fast. 2 Tim. i. 13. Every one therefore ought to beware of altering or wresting the inspired language of scripture, in their explications of the writings of the Christian faith. Taylor in the sixth chapter of his key, at the end, explains the verse under consideration thus: «Which things we speak, not in the philosophy of men, nor in the subtlety of fleshly wisdom; in the words of the Old Testament; but contending that the apostle's meaning is, that he expressed the Christian privilege in the very same words and phrases by which the Spirit expressed the privileges of the Jewish church in the writings of the Old Testament, but if the Spirit suggested these words and phrases to the Jewish prophets, why might he not suggest to the apostles the words and phrases in which they communicated the gospel revelation to the world, especially as there are many dispensations in the gospel, which could not be expressed clearly, if at all, in the words by which the prophets expressed the privileges of the Jewish church. Besides, it is evident, that when the apostles introduced into their writings the words and phrases of the Jewish prophets, they explained the light which revelation, and not reason, afforded. But the spiritual man is able to examine all things, yet he cannot be examined by any animal man; because such cannot judge of the principles on which a spiritual man's belief is founded. There is a doctrine found in the LXX. to denote the interpretation of dreams, Gen. xl. 16. 22. All. xii. 13. 15. Dan. ii. 4. v. 7. 12. 3. In spiritual words. —So I translate πνευματικα. But Dr. Pearce translates the clause, explaining spiritual things to spiritual man. This sense acknowledge the original will bear, only it does not agree so well with the first part of the verse, where words taught by the Holy Spirit are mentioned. Ver. 11. Now an animal man. —An animal man is one who makes the faculties of his animal nature, that is, his senses, his passions, and his natural reason, darkened by unbelief, the measure of truth and the rule of his conduct, without paying any regard to the discoveries of revelation. Of this character were two celebrated philosophers, to whom the doctrines of the gospel were foolishness, chap. i. 25. Also the Jewish scribes, and those who were called Jews from blood, ver. 19. calls κατασκηνοθες, animal men, not having the Spirit. These all rejected the gospel, because they could not understand the doctrine of the gospel by their own principles, or preconceived notions. 4. Because they are spiritually examined. —Thus the word spiritual is used in this passage, in a different sense, from what is usually given to it in the New Testament; that is, referring to the remote antecedent, and denoting not the Lord, but the spiritual man. 2. Vulgar. Struensee. The mind of the Lord;—that is, the mind of the world; his deep designs concerning us. See 1 Cor. ii. 14. note, for the meaning of it. 3. κατασκηνοθες, animal man. —Who will instruct him?—that is, to the spiritual man the principles on which he judges of spiritual things are false, because he is ignorant of and a stranger to, the belief in the divine glory which the Spirit taught; and the truth implied in this question must afford great satisfaction to all the faithful. No natural man, no infidel, hath ever been able to confute the gospel; or to shew a better method of instructing, reforming, and saving mankind, than that which God hath chosen, and made known by revelation.
CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters treated in this Chapter.

From what is said in this chapter it appears, that the false teacher had represented St. Paul either as ignorant or as unfaithful, because he had not fully instructed the Corinthians before his departure. The same teacher had also boasted concerning himself, that he had given them complete instruction. The confusion of these calamities the apostle with great propriety introduced after having in the former chapter discoursed largely concerning the perfect knowledge of the gospel given to the apostles by the Spirit. Wherefore, having in that chapter observed, that animal men receive not the things of the Spirit of God, he began this chapter with telling the Corinthians, that though he was an apostle fully instructed, he could not thus as having been with them, speak to them as to spiritual, but as to fleshly or weak persons, even as to babes in Christianity, ver. 1. This was a severe blow to the pride of the Greeks. Notwithstanding their boasted proficiency in the sciences, they were fleshly or weak men, and babes in religious matters. It seems their admiration of their own philosophy, their confidence in human reason as the only judge of truth, and the prevalence of their animal passions, had rendered them incapable of understanding and relishing spiritual things. He had therefore given them milk, and not meat, because they were not then able to bear meat; neither were they yet able to bear it, until we had furnished them with spiritual food, chap. iv. 6. — From this we learn, that there were two principal factions in the church at Corinth, the one of which adhered to Paul, and the other to a person who is here called Apollo, for Apollos figuratively, to avoid giving offence, chap. i. 2. But who, in all probability, was the false teacher; that this teacher boasted of Peter, by whom he was converted and baptized, as an apostle superior to Paul; that he and his followers, being the disciples of Peter, pretended that they were much better instructed than the disciples of Paul; and that they claimed to themselves superior authority and respect on that account. But in thus ascribing to one apostle more honour than to another, and in attaching themselves more to one than to another, the Corinthians were much to blame. For none of their teachers were masters. They were all but servants employed by Christ to convert men. And their success in the work depended not on themselves, but on the gifts which Christ had bestowed upon them, and the blessing with which he accompanied their labours, ver. 5. — Farther, he told them, that, in converting the world, the ministers of Christ had different parts assigned to them. He had planted, and Apollos had watered, but God made what they had planted and watered to grow, ver. 6. So that the whole depended on the co-operation and blessing of God, ver. 7. — But though they were to bear fruit, and to carry on the work of converting the world, the apostles, therefore, and the other ministers of the word, were joint labourers employed by God; and the people were God's field, which they were to cultivate, and God's building, wherein they were to build, ver. 9. — The building of which the apostle speaks is the Christian church, called, ver. 16, and in other passages, 'The temple of God;' because the Christian church, consisting of all who profess to believe in Christ, was formed for preserving the knowledge and worship of God in the world, and to be an habitation of the Spirit of God, by the graces and virtues which were to be exercised in it.

Having mentioned God's building or temple, the apostle told the Corinthians, that, as a skilful architect, he had laid the foundation of that temple in a proper manner at Corinth; and that the false teacher had only builded thereon. But he desired every one to take heed to the materials with which he builded, that they be suitable to the foundation, ver. 16. — Because other foundation of the temple of God neither apostles nor inferior teachers could lay, than that which he had laid; namely, that 'Jesus is the Christ,' ver. 11. — If, therefore, any teacher built on that foundation sincere converts, metaphorically represented by gold, silver, and precious stones; or if he built hypocritical professors thereon, represented by wood, hay, stubble, he told them the fire of persecution, which was ready to fall on the temple or church of God, would discover the nature of every teacher's work, ver. 12, 13. — If any teacher's converts remained steadfast in the day of persecution, through the pains he had taken in instructing them, he should be rewarded, ver. 14. — But if any teacher's converts apostatized, though they should perish, but the teacher himself would be saved with difficulty; provided, in making such converts, he had preached the gospel sincerely, ver. 15. — And that the Corinthians might understand what the building was of which he spake, he told them, they themselves, as a church, were the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelt in them, as a church, ver. 16. — If therefore any teacher wilfully spoils the temple of God, by building wicked men into it, that is, if by knowingly misrepresenting the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, and by flattering wicked men in their sins, he allureth them to enter into the Christian church, as the false teacher at Corinth had done, him will God destroy; for the temple of God ought to be composed of holy persons, ver. 17. — And although the teacher, who thus builds wicked men into the church, may think himself wise in so doing, he but deceiveth himself, and to become truly wise. It behoveth him to follow the course which the world esteemeth foolish: He must preach the gospel sincerely, whatever inconveniences it may occasion to himself, or to others, ver. 18. — For the wisdom of the world is folly in the sight of God; according to what is written, 'He catcheth the wise,' &c. ver. 19, 20. — The work of the false teacher, in building the temple of God at Corinth, being of the sort here described and condemned, this passage was a severe rebuke both to him and to his adherents. Wherefore, to lead them to apply it to themselves, the apostle exhorted them not to boast in any teacher, as if he belonged to them in particular. All the teachers, and all the buildings of the gospel, belong to believers in general; and believers belong all to Christ as his disciples; which is a real ground of boasting, because Christ belongs to God as his discip

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III. 1 (Acts 204). Now I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as ver. 16, and in other passages, 'The temple of God;' because the Christian church, consisting of all who profess to believe in Christ, was formed for preserving the knowledge and worship of God in the world, and to be an habitation of the Spirit of God, by the graces and virtues which were to be exercised in it.

Having mentioned God's building or temple, the apostle told the Corinthians, that, as a skilful architect, he had laid the foundation of that temple in a proper manner at Corinth; and that the false teacher had only builded thereon. But he desired every one to take heed to the materials with which he builded, that they be suitable to the foundation, ver. 16. — Because other foundation of the temple of God neither apostles nor inferior teachers could lay, than that which he had laid; namely, that 'Jesus is the Christ,' ver. 11. — If, therefore, any teacher built on that foundation sincere converts, metaphorically represented by gold, silver, and precious stones; or if he built hypocritical professors thereon, represented by wood, hay, stubble, he told them the fire of persecution, which was ready to fall on the temple or church of God, would discover the nature of every teacher's work, ver. 12, 13. — If any teacher's converts remained steadfast in the day of persecution, through the pains he had taken in instructing them, he should be rewarded, ver. 14. — But if any teacher's converts apostatized, though they should perish, but the teacher himself would be saved with difficulty; provided, in making such converts, he had preached the gospel sincerely, ver. 15. — And that the Corinthians might understand what the building was of which he spake, he told them, they themselves, as a church, were the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelt in them, as a church, ver. 16. — If therefore any teacher wilfully spoils the temple of God, by building wicked men into it, that is, if by knowingly misrepresenting the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, and by flattering wicked men in their sins, he allureth them to enter into the Christian church, as the false teacher at Corinth had done, him will God destroy; for the temple of God ought to be composed of holy persons, ver. 17. — And although the teacher, who thus builds wicked men into the church, may think himself wise in so doing, he but deceiveth himself, and to become truly wise. It behoveth him to follow the course which the world esteemeth foolish: He must preach the gospel sincerely, whatever inconveniences it may occasion to himself, or to others, ver. 18. — For the wisdom of the world is folly in the sight of God; according to what is written, 'He catcheth the wise,' &c. ver. 19, 20. — The work of the false teacher, in building the temple of God at Corinth, being of the sort here described and condemned, this passage was a severe rebuke both to him and to his adherents. Wherefore, to lead them to apply it to themselves, the apostle exhorted them not to boast in any teacher, as if he belonged to them in particular. COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III. 1 I am blamed for not instructing you completely before my departure, especially as I say I have the mind of Christ.
I. CORINTHIANS.

But, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual, but as to weak men, even as to babes in Christ. (See Heb. v. 12, 13.)

2. Milk I gave you, and not meat; for ye were not then able to receive it, (w.c. 76.) and yet neither ye now are ye able:

3 (1 Cor. 3:2.) Because ye are still flesh. For, whereas among you envying, and strife, and division subsists, are ye not fleshly, and walk after the manner of men?

4 (1 Cor. 3:2.) For, whereas among you envying, and strife, and division subsists, are ye not fleshly, and walk after the manner of men?

5 (1 Cor. 3:10.) Moreover, the planter and the waterer are one, but each shall receive his proper reward according to his own labour.

6 (1 Cor. 3:9.) Therefore, we are joint labourers of God. Ye are God's field; ye are God's building.

7 (1 Cor. 3:9.) According to the grace of God which is given to me, as a skilful architect, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon.

8 (1 Cor. 3:9.) Now, if any one build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

9 (1 Cor. 3:10.) Every one's work shall be made manifest; for the day will make it plain, because it is revealed by fire; (w.c. 214.) and it will try every one's work, of what sort it is.

10. As for that which is laid, which is Jesus the Christ.

11. Now, if any one build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

12. According to the grace of God which is given to me, as a skilful architect, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon.

13. Every one's work shall be made manifest; for the day will make it plain, because it is revealed by fire; (w.c. 214.) and it will try every one's work, of what sort it is.

14. As for that which is laid, which is Jesus the Christ.

15. For, whereas among you envying, and strife, and division subsists, are ye not fleshly, and walk after the manner of men?

16. For, whereas among you envying, and strife, and division subsists, are ye not fleshly, and walk after the manner of men?

17. Because ye are still flesh; whom passion and prejudice render incapable of complete instruction. For whereas envying, and strife, and division subsists among you, is it not a proof that you are weak, and walk after the manner of men?

18. Besides, while oneareth, I am a disciple of Paul, and another, I of Apollos, and each claimeth to submission to his opinions on account of the dignity of the person who instructed him, are ye not puzzled with vanity?

19. For who is Paul, and who Apollos? Not your masters in religion, but servants of Christ by whose labour ye have believed, even as the Lord hath given spiritual gifts and success to each.

20. For Paul planted, Apollos watered, but God hath made to grow. So that neither the planter hath any independent efficacy, nor the waterer, but God who maketh to grow. In short, the honour of the whole belongs to God.

21. However, the planter and the waterer are one, and each shall receive his proper reward according to his own labour.

22. If therefore, we are joint labourers belonging to God: Ye are God's field, which he employs to cultivate. And, to use another similitude, ye are God's building, which he employs to rear.

23. According to the grace of apostleship which I have received of God, like a skilful architect I have laid the foundation of the temple of God at Corinth properly, by preaching that Jesus is the Christ, (see ver. 11,) and the false teacher buildeth thereon; but let every one be a skilful architect, that he may build thereon in his true characters: for the day of persecution which is coming on them, will make every one's character plain, because it is of such nature as to be revealed by the fire of persecution; and so that fire, falling on the temple of God, will try every one's teacher's disciples, of what sort they are.

Ver. 1. As for that which is laid, which is Jesus the Christ. In the preceding chapter, ver. 11. the apostle laid the foundation of the temple of God, properly, by preaching that Jesus is the Christ, (see ver. 11,) and the false teacher buildeth thereon; but let every one be a skilful architect, that he may build thereon in his true characters: for the day of persecution which is coming on them, will make every one's character plain, because it is of such nature as to be revealed by the fire of persecution; and so that fire, falling on the temple of God, will try every one's teacher's disciples, of what sort they are.

Ver. 2. Milk I gave you, and not meat; for ye were not then able to receive it, and yet neither ye now are ye able:

Ver. 3. Which I gave you...for the day will make it plain, because it is revealed by fire; (w.c. 214.) and it will try every one's work, of what sort it is.
I. CORINTHIANS.

14 If the work of anyone remaineth which he hath built upon the foundation, he shall receive a reward.

15 If the work of any one shall be burnt, he will suffer loss himself, however, shall be saved yet so as (ha ונע' גשא) through a fire!

16 Know ye not, that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? (172.) Among ye!

17 If any one destroyeth the temple of God, he will destroy God; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are. (See Eph. ii. 19-22.)

18 Let no one deceive himself: if any one among you (הו זע וירט) thinketh to be wise, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

19 For the wisdom of this (וטו) world is foolishness with God; and it is written, (Job v. 13), He catcheth the wise in their own craftiness.

20 And again, (Psalm xxiv. 11.), The Lord knoweth the reasoning of the wise, that they are vain.

21 Wherefore, let no one boast in men: for all things are yours;

22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours;

where the perseverance to which the first Christians were exposed is explained, and the doctrine of Christ, his birth, death, and resurrection, are given for a trial. According to the common interpretation of this passage, the doctrine which is taught in the world, is called his world. But in that case, I wish to know, how doctrines can be tried by fire either of perseverance or of the last judgment; or how they can be burnt by these fires. To introduce doctrines into this passage, quite destroys the apostle's imagery, in which he represents the whole body of those who profess to be in Christ, as being introduced into a great house or temple for the worship of God; and that temple, as soon as the fire is kindled, burnt at the feet of him who first kindled it. And therefore, it must be supposed, if we make believers, represented by wood, hay, stubble, burnt by every one that buildeth a temple or temple, the fire of perseverance would discover the structure of the temple; because, as part of the world is burnt in the fire, so is part of the temple burnt. The false teacher at Corinth had in this respect been very blameworthy, by collapsing the prejudices and prejudices, both of the Jews and Gentiles; and by encouraging them in their sins, had allowed into the church at Corinth a number of wicked men, particularly the person who was guilty of incest, and others who denied the resurrection of the dead, whereby he corrupted the temple of God, ver. 17.

Some of the fathers, perceiving that the apostle in this passage speaks not of doctrines but of persons, supposed that the fire which was to try every one's work, was the fire which is to happen at the day of judgment. And therefore, as the apostle speaks of persons whose work was to be burnt, but themselves saved, they fancied that all men, the righteous as well as the wicked, are to be burnt in the general condemnation; that the separation of the righteous from the wicked is thereby to be made; that the wicked are to be consumed, and that the righteous are to suffer, some more, some less, according to their sins. The passages of the fathers to this purpose, Bunsen hath collected, De Nat. Mort. ch. vi. But the Romanists, perceiving, that this doctrine, properly managed, might be made an insuperable source of woe to their order, have represented this fire of purgatory as lighted up from the very beginning of the world, and have kept it burning ever since; and have assumed to themselves the power of determining souls in that fire, and of releasing them from it according to their own pleasure; whereby they have drawn great sums of money from the ignorant and superstitious.

15. Yet as (ות ידנה) through a fire!—This, as Elmer observes, is a proverbial expression for one's escaping some evil with great difficulty. Paul. iv. 18. tersō νυκτερίζειν εις την ανάπο δειμνησην. [We went through fire and through water; that we were in the greatest danger.] Isaiah xliv. 2. When thou walkest through the fire thou shall not be burnt. [Amos iv. 11.] Ye were as a fire-brand plucked out of the burning. [Judges xii. 6. catching them out of the fire.] See the note on that verse.

16. If any one (טועש) destroyeth the temple of God.—Here the apostle describes the sin and punishment, not only of such teachers as those worldly notions allure had merrily into the church, or continue them in it, by1 with] withholding the doctrine and precepts of the gospel, but of all those hypocrisies, who worldly vices, in trade themselves among the faithful, and put on a moral show of godliness. Whereas, in vers. 15, he describes the sin of those teachers who introduce bad men into the church, by ignoringly misrepresenting the doctrine and precepts of the gospel. The expression in this verse, If any one destroyeth the temple of God, is being general, is no doubt applicable to any false teacher and hypocritical Christian who spoils the temple of God. Nevertheless, the apostle in the next verse thinketh, that the apostle, in this passage, had the false teacher and the factions at Corinth more particularly in his eye, who had spoiled the temple of God in the manner above described.

17. In any one among you (הו זע וירט) thinketh to be wise.—So אבו is translated in Ver. vi. 2. The false teacher, in this passage, himself, it seems, extremely wise, because he had defeated the heads of the church, by concealing some of the doctrine and precepts of the gospel, and by misrepresenting others of them. But that sort of wisdom the apostle severely condemned, because it stood in opposition to the wisdom of God, who commanded all the preachers of the church to teach his doctrine and precepts sincerely.

18. The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God.—So אבו is translated in Ver. vii. 20. The apostle's meaning is evident from the context. For it is written, He catcheth the wise in their own craftiness. (Job iv. 13.) The enmity of men, when opposed to the methods which God's wisdom hath appointed, are vain; they are utterly inefficient for accomplishing what they intend by them. Wherefore those wise teachers, whom the apostle reproved, learned to no purpose when they endeavored to build the temple of God by methods which God condemned.

19. Whither let not one boast in men.—Besides the general meaning of this verse, expressed in the commentary, I think the apostle intended that the Corinthians, in particular, had no reason to boast in the false teacher, who had spoiled the temple of God by building wicked men into it.

20. Things present, or things to come, are all yours.—The apostle doth mean, no such fanaticism has vainly imagined, that the property of all the things in the world is not ascribed to God, whereas it is by the apostle.

See the note on that verse.
CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Matters handled in this Chapter.

Last from what was said in the preceding chapters concerning the inspiration of the apostles by the Spirit, the Corinthians might have imagined that Paul claimed to himself and to his brethren an authority not derived from Christ, he began this chapter with telling them, that they were to consider the apostles only as servants of Christ, and as stewards of the mysteries of God, ver. 1.—And that the thing required of every such steward is, that he be faithful in disputing these mysteries, according as his disciples are able to receive them, ver. 2.—Therefore, although the false teacher accused Paul of unfaithfulness, because he had taught the Corinthians the first principles only, and not the deep doctrines of the gospel, he told them, it was a very great matter in his eyes to be condemned as unfaithful by them, or by any man's judgment, seeing he did not condemn himself, ver. 3.—For he was conscious to himself of no unfaithfulness; yet by this he was not justified—he meant in the eyes of the faction, who could not see his heart. At the same time he told them, that the only person who had a right to condemn him, if he proved unfaithful, was the Lord his Master, ver. 4.—This being the case, he desired the faction not to condemn him, till the Lord should come to judgment, who will bring to light every thing most secret, and lay open the designs of the heart, of which they were no judges, ver. 5.

Next, to prevent the Corinthians from mistaking what he had said, concerning their boasting in himself and Apollos as the heads of the factions, (chap. i. 12. iii. 4.) he declared that he had applied these things to himself and Apollos figuratively only, for their sakes, that by disclaiming all pretensions to be the heads of parties, the Corinthians might learn in them, not to esteem any teacher above what he had written, chap. iii. 5.; namely, that Paul and Apollos were only stewards of Christ, by whose ministry the Corinthians had believed; and that none of them, on account of any teacher, should be puffed up with envy and anger against another, ver. 6.

New Translation.

Chap. IV.—(1 Cor. xvi. 8.) So then, let a man consider us as servants only of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God.

2 Now, it is required in stewards, that (1) every one be found faithful.

3 (1 Cor. xvi. 10.) Therefore, to me it is a very small matter, that I be condemned by you, or by any man's judgment; for I do not condemn myself.

Ver. 1. Stewards of the mysteries of God.—The apostle gave to those doctrines which in former ages had been kept secret, but which were now discovered to all through the preaching of the gospel, the appellation of the mysteries of God, to distinguish them from the rest of the scriptures, as was formerly observed, chap. ii. 7. note 1. And he called himself the steward, or the keeper of these mysteries, to intimate that the deepest doctrines, as well as the first principles of the gospel, were instructed to him to be disclosed or made known; and that his faithfulness as a steward, consisted not only in his discovering them exactly as he had received them from Christ, but in his discovering them as his masters were able to receive them.

Ver. 3.—That I be condemned by you.—The word appears properly signifies to examine, in order to pass a judicial sentence, either of acquittal or of condemnation, Luke xxiii. 41. Acts iv. 5. But as the simple verb οἰκείωσαι, to judge, appears also in connection with Rom. xiv. 22 the compound verb οἰκείωσαι, to examine, may signify to condemn, in consequence of examination; it being usual in all languages, to put the case for the effect. This sense the word appears evidently hath in the latter part of the sentence. So Gal. ii. 11: I do not condemn myself; for the apostle could not say, 'I do not examine, or judge myself.' It is the duty of every good
I. CORINTHIANS.

For I am conscious to myself of no fault; (1) but I am not thus justified in your eyes. But he that condemneth me, let him be cast out of the presence of the Lord, and of his apostles.

5 Wherefore, do not before the time pass any judgment, until the Lord come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and try open the counsels of the hearts; and then praise shall be to every one from God.

6 Now these things, brethren, I have figuratively applied to myself and Apollos, for your sakes, that ye may learn not to esteem teachers above what hath been written; that no one of you, in account of one, be lifted up against another.

7 (1 Thess. 5:11.) Besides, ye are filled, ye are become rich; ye have reigned: without us, and I wish, indeed, ye had reigned properly, that we also might reign with you.

8 For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as persons appointed to death: that we are made a spectacle to the world, even to angels and to men.

9 We are fools, (1 Cor. 4:12;) on account of Christ; but ye are wise in Christ: for the weak, ye are strong: ye are honored, but we are despised.

10 To the present hour, we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling place;

11 So that we are in this present world, as it were, the angels of Christ, without much furniture, without many ornaments; as though we were not in the world; and not as the world; as though we were not the servants of men, but of Christ; as though we were not in heaven; and not as though we were in heaven; but as though we were in the world; and not as though we were in the world; but as though we were not in the world, and as though we were not for the world, but as though we were for the world, and not as though we were for the world.

12 For I am conscious to myself of no fault, but I am not thus justified in your eyes. But he that condemneth me, let him be cast out of the presence of the Lord, and of his apostles.

13 (1 Thess. 5:11.) Besides, ye are filled, ye are become rich; ye have reigned: without us, and I wish, indeed, ye had reigned properly, that we also might reign with you.

14 For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as persons appointed to death: that we are made a spectacle to the world, even to angels and to men.

15 We are fools, (1 Cor. 4:12;) on account of Christ; but ye are wise in Christ: for the weak, ye are strong: ye are honored, but we are despised.

16 To the present hour, we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling place; and the apostle concludes in the passage before us, as plain from the turn of his expression: That no one of you, in account of one, be lifted up against another.

Ver. 8. 1. Are become rich.—Whence understand this of their being rich in spiritual gifts, as well as of their being rich in worldly wealth.

2 Ye have reigned.—The apostle expresses the behaviour of the false teachers by the word reigned, either because he governed the faith in an unwise manner, and attempted to rule the sincere part of the church according to his own pleasure, or because he lived at Corinth in influence.

Ver. 9. 3. So that we are in this present world, as it were, the angels of Christ, without much furniture, without many ornaments; as though we were not in the world; and not as the world; as though we were not the servants of men, but of Christ; as though we were not in heaven; and not as though we were in heaven; but as though we were in the world; and not as though we were in the world; but as though we were not in the world, and as though we were not for the world, but as though we were for the world, and not as though we were for the world.
I. CORINTHIANS.

12 And labour, working with our own hands: when reviled, we bless; when persecuted, we bear:
13 When defamed, we bless: we become the perversions of the world, (1:23) the filth of all things, until now.
14 I write not these things to shame you, but, as my beloved children, I instruct you.
15 For, though ye have ten thousand masters, ye have not many fathers: for, (1:6, 163.) to Christ Jesus, through the gospel, I have begotten you.
16 Wherefore, I beseech you, be imitators of me.
17 For this purpose I have sent to you Timothy, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord: he will put you in mind of my ways, which are in Christ, even as I teach everywhere, and in every church.
18 Now some are puffed up, as if I were not coming to you.
19 But I will come to you soon, if the Lord will, and shall know, not the speech of them who are puffed up, but the power.
20 For not by speech is the kingdom of God established, but by power.
21 What do ye incline? Shall I come to you with a rod? Or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?

CHAPTER V.

12 And labour in the gospel without hire, working with our own hands for maintenance even in Ephesus. When reviled, I bless: when persecuted, I patiently bear it;
13 When defamed, we beseech our enemies to abstain from calumniating us. We are so hated by idolators, that we are in their eyes fit to be sacrifices for averting the calamities of the world. We are regarded as the filth of all things, until now.
14 I write not these things to shame you, for having increased my sufferings by the calamities ye have uttered against me, but, as my beloved children, I instruct you how much I exceed the teacher who hath your catechism.
15 For though ye have numberless teachers, who pretend to instruct you in the gospel, ye have not many fathers; ye have not many possessed of affection, fidelity, and disinterestedness like me; For, to Christ Jesus, through faithfulness preaching the gospel, I have begotten you as disciples.
16 Wherefore, I beseech you, be imitators of me, rather than of the false teacher, who instructs you from selfish motives.
17 For this purpose I have, some time, now, sent to you Timothy, who is my beloved son, and a faithful minister of the Lord. He will put you in mind of my behaviour and doctrine as an apostle of Christ, even as I teach everywhere, and in every church; by which ye will know, that I never accommodate either my doctrine or my practice to the humours of wicked men.
18 Now some are grown insolent, as fingering because I have sent Timothy, I am not coming to Corinth myself, being afraid to come.
19 But I will come to you soon, if the Lord will, and shall know, not the boasting of them who are puffed up, but their power to defend themselves from the punishment which I will inflict on them, if they do not repent.
20 For not by the plausible talking which ye Greeks call eloquence, is the gospel established, but by the power of miracles, and of spiritual gifts.
21 To the false teacher, therefore, and to his adherents, I say, What do ye incline? Shall I come to you with a rod to punish you? Or in love, and in the spirit of meekness, because ye have repented?
heathens, ver. 1. And this scandal was the greater, that they were pulled up with pride, on account of the knowledge and learning of the teacher by whose influence it was tolerated, ver. 2. But to make the Corinthians sensible, that their boast of a teacher who had patronized such an enormity was criminal, as well as to correct the enormity itself, the apostle ordered them forthwith, in a public assembly of the church called for the purpose, to deliver the offender to Satan, for the destruction of his flesh, that his spirit being reformed, he might be saved in the day of the Lord, ver. 3, 4, 5. Then shewed them the necessity of cutting off the incestuous person, by comparing vice unpunished to leven, on account of its contagious nature in corrupting a whole society, ver. 6. And because this was written a little before the pasover, when the Jews put away all leaven out of their houses as the symbol of corruption or wickedness, the apostle desired the Corinthians to cleanse out the old leaven of lewdness, by casting the incestuous person out of the church; for, said he, Christ our pasover is sacrificed for us. Also he exhorted them to keep the feast of the Lord's supper, which was instituted in commemoration of Christ's being sacrificed for us, and which it would seem was to be celebrated by them at the time of the pasover, not with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth, ver. 7, 8.

I. The last, however, the Corinthians might have understood the apostle's command to excommunicate the incestuous person, and to cleanse out the old leaven, as an order not to keep company with the unconverted heathens, he told them that was not his meaning, since in that case they must have gone out of the world, ver. 9, 10. And to make his meaning plain, he now wrote more explicitly, that if any person who professed himself a Christian was a known fornicator, &c., they were to punish him by keeping no company with him, ver. 11. This distinction in the treatment of heathen and Christian sinners the apostle shewed them was reasonable, from the consideration, that church censures are not to be inflicted on persons who are without, but on them who are within the church, ver. 13. And therefore, while they left it to God to judge and punish the wicked heathen, it was their duty to put away the incestuous person from among themselves, and to leave the woman with whom he was cohabiting to the judgment of God, because she was a heathen, ver. 13.

II. The apostle's order to the Corinthians, to keep no company with wicked persons, though seemingly severe, was in the true spirit of the gospel. For the laws of Christ do not, like the laws of men, correct offenders by fines and imprisonments, and corporal punishments, or outward violence of any kind, but by earnest and affectionate representations, admonitions, and reproofs, by which men are reminded of their fault, and induced to them voluntarily to amend. If this remedy proves ineffectual, their fellow-Christians are to show their disapprobation of their evil courses, by carefully avoiding their company. So Christ hath ordered, Matt. xviii. 15, 16, 17. Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother.—16. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses, every word may be established.—17. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man, and a publican.—Earnest representation, therefore, from the injured party, followed with grave admonition and reproof from the ministers of religion, when the injured party's representation is ineffectual, are the means which Christ hath appointed for reclaiming an offender; and with great propriety, because, being addressed to his reason and conscience, they are calculated to influence his will as a moral agent, and so to produce a lasting alteration in his conduct. But if these moral and religious means prove ineffectual, Christ hath ordered the society of which the offender is a member, to shun his company and conversation, that he may be ashamed, and that others may be preserved from the contagion of his example. This last remedy will be used with the greatest effect, if it be accompanied with the conviction of the society to have no intercourse with the offender, especially in religious matters, it being openly declared by a sentence deliberately and solemnly pronounced in a public assembly, (as in the case of the incestuous Corinthian,) and is steadily carried into execution.

The wholesome discipline which Christ instituted in his church at the beginning, was rigorously and impartially exercised by the primitive Christians towards their offending brethren, and with the happiest success in preserving purity of manners among themselves. In modern times, however, this salutary discipline hath been much neglected in the church; but it hath been taken up by gaming clubs, who exclude from their society all who refuse to pay their game debts, and shun their company on all occasions, as persons absolutely infamous. By this sort of excommunication, and by giving to game debts the appellation of debts of honour, the winners on the one hand, without the help of law, and even in contradiction to it, have rendered their unjust claims effectual, while the losers, on the other, are reduced to the necessity, either of paying, or of being shunned by their companions as infamous. I mention this as an example, to show what a powerful influence the approbation or disapprobation of those with whom mankind associate have upon their consideration, to excite the friends of religion to support her against the attempts of the wicked, by testifying on every fit occasion their disapprobation of vice, and their contempt of its abettors, and more, by shunning the company and conversation of the openly profane, however dignified their station in life, or however great their fortunes may be. See 1 Cor. vi. 11. note 3.

New Translation.

Chap. V. 1 It is generally reported, that there is whoredom among you; and such whoredom as not even among the idolatrous heathens is approved, either by law or custom, that one hath his father's wife,1 2 As not even among the heathens is named;1 The word ἀνενομοῖος is used by the LXX, and by the writers of the New Testament, in the latitude which its corresponding word ἁθοῦ in the Hebrew language, namely, to denote all the different kinds of incontinence committed, whether between men and women, or between man or with beast. Accordingly it is used in the plural number, chap. vi. 2. 'Neither let us war against every one of them, you account of whoredoms.' Here whereon, signifies sexual joined with adultery, the woman's husband being still in life, as appears from ver. vii. 12. The Old Testament whereon sometimes signifies idolatry, because the union of the Israelites with God as their king, being represented by God himself as a marriage, their giving themselves up to idolatry was considered as adultery. 2. As not even among the heathens is named;1 The word ἀνενομοῖος was signified to be named with approbation, Rom. xv. 20. Thus they take a wife, and a father's wife. 1. His father's wife,1 —It seems the woman with whom this whoredom was committed, was not the guilty person's mother, but his stepmother; a sort of incest which was condemned by the Greeks and Romans, as we learn from Cicero, Orig. pro Chiefio, sect. 4. and from Virgil, Georg. i. line 309, 'et ille mater non secabitur.' Wherefore, from the Corinthians tolerating this crime, we may infer that the guilty person was of some note, but perchance he was one of the teachers of the sect, who being greatly

6. Your boasting is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveth the whole lump?

7. Cleanse out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump (2Cor. v. 20), when ye are without leaven, as others pass over, Christ is sacrificed for us.

8. Therefore, let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

and wickedness; but with the unleavened qualities of sincerity and truth.

9 (Gee-Je) I have written to you in (tr., 71.) this epistle, not to associate with fornicators.

10 (Kai, 205.) However, not universally with the fornicators of this world, and with the covetous, and with extortioners, and with idolaters, since then, indeed, ye must go out of the world.

11 But now I write to you, not to associate with with him, if any one called a brother be a fornicator, or a covetous person, or an idolater, or a reviler, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such a person not even to eat.

12 (Tt. 3:5) For what have I to do to judge them also who are without? do not ye judge them who are within!

13 But those who are without, God judgeth. (Kai, 208.) Therefore, put away from among yourselves the wicked person.

where is he called old learn, because the Corinthians in their heathen state had been much addicted to these practices.

3. Neither with the leaven. (See 1 Cor. 5:7.) Malice is ill-will in the mind; but wickedness is ill-will expressed by actions, especially such as are accompanied with treachery. Hence the devil is styled προδότης, the wicked one. — As the apostle mentions sincerity and truth in the subsequent clause, it is probable, that by "the leaven of malice and wickedness" he meant all those bad dispositions and actions with which hypocrisy cover by putting on a show of purity.

4. Unleavened qualities of sincerity and truth. 1 — The apostle gives the epithet of unhallowed to sincerity and truth, in allusion to the symbolical meaning of the unleavened bread in which the leaven is cut out during the feast of the passover: for thereby they were taught to cleave that feast with peace and various dispensations. — A Covetous being an adjective, we may supply as its substantive either πλαστος or πλαστον. Ver. 11. — He who is unhallowed, or who longeth after the things of the world, is not fit for God; and as far as his necessary affairs will permit, the conversation and fellowship of such as Paul here describes. This is a thing (what decoder sewers of public discipline there be) in each particular Christian's power. See 2 Cor. XI. 16, note.

Ver. 13. But them who are without, God judgeth. — The apostle wrote this and the preceding verses, to show the Corinthians the reason why, after commanding them to pass over a severe sentence on the man, he said nothing to them concerning a woman who was guilty with him. The discipline of the church was not to be exercised on persons out of it. Hence it appears that this woman was a heathen.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Echortations contained in this Chapter.

The Corinthians, since their conversion, had used each other, as formerly, in the heathen courts of judgment about worldly matters, often of small importance. This practice was the more blamable, as the Christians, who in the first age were not distinguished from the Jews, might as Jews, according to the laws of the empire, have held courts of judgment of their own for determining most of the controversies about worldly matters which arose among themselves. Wherefore, by declining the decisions of the brethren, and by bringing their causes into the heathen courts, they showed that they had a mean opinion of the knowledge and integrity of their brethren. Besides, the frequency of their suits led the brethren, whom they had brought to think the Corinthians not only litigious, but disposed to injure one another. These things of which the apostle was informed, bringing great dishonour on the Christian name, he rebuked the Corinthians severely, for daring to go to law with one another before the heathens, and not before the saints, ver. 1. — Know ye not, saith he, that the Christian inspired teachers, whom he called saints, judge the world? that is, declare the laws by which the world at present is ruled, and is to be judged at last. And if the world is judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? ver. 2. — Do ye not know, that we foretell the judgment and punishment of evil angels? Being thus supernaturally endowed, why may we not judge in things pertaining to this life? ver. 3. — When therefore ye have set up secular seats of judgment, as ye ought to do, place therefore as judges such of the spiritual men among you, as, on account of the inferiority of their gifts, are least esteemed in the church, ver. 4. — I speak it to your shame, that in your opinion there is not so much as one wise man among you, who is fit to judge between his brethren; but brother carrieth his brother into the heathen courts, as if he expected more justice from heathens than from Christians, ver. 5, 6. — Now it is utterly wrong in you to have any lawsuits all in the heathen courts. Ye had much better suffer yourselves to be injured and defrauded in small matters than to go to law before unbelievers, since the seeking redress in that manner will be attended with more trouble and less than if ye bare the injury patiently, ver. 7. — Next, because the other parties, by suffering themselves to be sued in the heathen courts, had shown a disposition to defraud their brethren, the apostle denounced the judgment of God against all unrighteous persons.
L. CORINTHIANS.

WHATSOEVER; AND MENTIONED PARTICULARLY FORNICATIONS, IDOLATRY, IDOLATERS, ADULTERIES, SORCERIES, WICKEDNESS, ADMIRATIONS, THIEVES, AND OTHERS, WHICH, LEADLY DECLARING THAT THEY SHALL FOR EVER BE EXCLUDED FROM THE KINGDOM OF GOD, VER. 8, 9, 10. AND SUCH, SAID HE, WERE SOME OF YOU BEFORE YOUR CONVERSION TO CHRISTIANITY, VER. 11.

THE FALSE TEACHER, IT SEEMS, WITH A VIEW TO GAIN THE FAVOUR OF THE GREEKS, HAD TAUGHT THAT LUXURY AND FORNICATION WERE ALLOWED UNDER THE GOSPEL; AND HAD SUPPORTED THAT DOCTRINE BY THE COMMON ARGUMENTS WITH WHICH SENSI- LUSTS IN ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES DEFEND THEIR DEBAUCHED MANNERS. WHEREFORE, TO PREVENT THE UNTHINKING FROM BEING SEDUCED BY THESE ARGUMENTS, THE APOSTLE HAVE GREAT PROPRIETY, CONFLICT THEM IN HIS EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS, BECAUSE OF ALL THE GREEKS THE INHABITANTS OF CORINTH WERE THE MOST DEBAUCHED; AND BECAUSE SUCH OF THEM AS WERE CHRISTIANS HAD NOT YET ACQUIRED A JUST SENSE OF THE OBLIGATIONS TO PURITY LAID ON THEM BY THE GOSPEL. IT IS TRUE THE APOSTLE, ACCORDING TO HIS MANNER, HATH NOT STATED THESE ARGUMENTS EXPLICITLY. NEVERTHELESS, FROM THE THINGS WHICH HE HATH WRITTEN IN CONFUTATION OF THEM, WE LEARN THAT THEY WERE OF THE FOLLOWING IMPORT:—1. THAT MEATS AND DRINKS BEING MADE FOR THE USE OF MEN, AND MEN'S BELONGINGS FOR THE ENJOYMENT OF MEATS AND DRINKS, THE PLEASURES OF THE TABLE, IN THEIR HIGHEST PERFECTION, MUST BE LAWFUL. 2. THAT THE BODY WAS MADE FOR THE HEALING AND NOT FOR THE ENJOYMENT OF PLEASURES. 3. THAT THE PLEASURES OF THE TABLE AND OF THE BED MAY BE ENJOYED WITHOUT INJURY TO OTHERS. AND, 4. THAT BY IMPLANTING IN US STRONG NATIONAL INCLINATIONS TO THESE PLEASURES, GOD HATH SHewn IT TO BE HIS WILL THAT WE SHOULD ENJOY THEM.

TO THE ARGUMENT CONCERNING THE LUXURIES OF THE TABLE, THE APOSTLE REPLIED, THAT ALTHOUGH ALL MEATS AND DRINKS ARE MADE FOR MAN'S USE, AND ARE IN THEMSELVES LAWFUL, THE LUXURIOUS USE OF THEM, IN SOME CIRCUMSTANCES, MAY NOT BE EXPEDIENT. MANY KINDS OF NICE MEATS AND DRINK, EVEN WHEN USED IN MODERATION, MAY BE PREJUDICIAL TO ONE'S HEALTH, AND MAY NOT BE SUITABLE TO HIS INCOME AND STATION. BESIDES, TOO GREAT ATTENTION TO THE PLEASURES OF THE TABLE ALWAYS CREATES HABITS TENDING COMBINED WITH THE LUXU- RIUS THEMSELVES, AND TO THE PERSONS WITH WHOM THEY ARE CONNECTED, VER. 12. TO THE ARGUMENT, THAT THE BELLY IS MADE FOR EATING AND DRINKING, THE APOSTLE ANSWERED, THAT BOTH THE BELLY AND THE MEATS BY WHICH IT IS GRATIFIED, ARE TO BE DESTROYED—THEY ARE TO HAVE NO PLACE IN THE FUTURE LIFE OF THE BODY. FROM WHICH IT FOLLOWS, THAT TO PLACE OUR HAPPINESS IN ENJOYMENTS WHICH ARE CONFINED TO THE PRESENT SHORT STATE OF OUR EXISTENCE, WHILE WE NEGLECT PLEASURES WHICH MAY BE ENJOYED THROUGH ETERNITY, IS EX- TEMELY FOOLISH, VER. 13. AND TO THE ARGUMENT WHEREBY THE LIBERTY UNRESTRICTedly JUSTIFIED THE INDECENCY OF FORNICATION IN THE APPO- SME, ANSWERED, BY FLATTERING THE POSITION. THE BODY WAS NOT MADE FOR FORNICATION, BUT FOR THE SERVICE OF THE LORD CHRIST, WHO WILL RAISE IT UP AT THE LAST DAY FITLY FORMED FOR HIS OWN SERVICE, VER. 14. TO THE ARGUMENT, THAT THE LUSTS OF THE FLESH MIGHT BE GRATIFIED WITHOUT INJURY TO OTHERS, THE APOSTLE REPLIED, FIRST, THAT GREAT INJURY IS DONE TO CHRIST, WHEN THE MEMBERS OF OUR BODY, WHICH ARE HIS MEMBERS, ARE MADE THE MEMBERS OF AN HARLOT, IN SUCH A MANNER AS TO BE EMPLOYED IN FILMING HER VICES. INCLINATIONS, VER. 15. SECONDLy, BY FORNICATION A MAN INJURES HIS OWN SOUL. FOR HE BECOMES ONE PERSON WITH HIS WHORE; HE ACQUIRES THE SAME VICES OF INCLINATION, AND THE SAME VICE MANNERS WITH HER; NAY, HE MAKES HIMSELF HER SLAVE, VER. 16. WHEREAS HE WHO IS JOINED TO THE LORD IS ONE SPIRIT. HE ACQUIRES THE DISPOSITIONS AND MANNERS OF CHRIST, AND IS DIRECTED BY HIM, VER. 17. IN THE THIRD PLACE, HE WHO COMMITTETH FORNICATION, SINS AGAINST HIS OWN BODY, AS WELL AS AGAINST HIS SOUL. HE WASTES ITS STRENGTH, AND INTRODUCES INTO IT PAINFUL DISEASES, WHICH OFTEN OCCASION ITS DEATH, VER. 18. LASTLY, BY GLUTTONY, DRUNKENNESS, AND FORNICATION, GREAT INJURY IS DONE TO THE SPIRIT OF GOD, WHOSE TEMPLE OUR BODY IS; NAY, INJURY EVEN TO GOD HIM- SELF, TO WHOM WE BELOONG:

HERE IT MAY BE PROPER TO TAKE NOTICE, THAT THE APOSTLE HATH NOT GIVEN A SEPARATE ANSWER TO THE FOURTH ARGUMENT, BY WHICH IMMEDIATE SEVERAL INJURIES ARE Oft-times DEFENDED; NAMELY, THE ARGUMENT TAKEN FROM THE STRONG PASSIONS AND APPETITES WHICH GOD HATH IMPLANTED IN US NATUREALLY TO SENSUAL PLEASURES. BUT THE CONFUTATION OF THAT ARGUMENT IS IMPLIED IN WHAT HE HATH SAID CONCERNING THE INJURY DONE BY FORNICATION TO THE BODY. FOR IF, IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THINGS, GOD HATH CONNECTED DISEASES AND DEATH WITH IMMEDIATE SEVERAL GRATIFICATIONS, HE HATH IN THE CLEarest MANNER SHOWN IT TO BE HIS WILL THAT WE SHOULD ABSTAIN FROM THEM. AND THEREFORE, ALTHOUGH BY IMPLANTING IN US INCLINATIONS TO SENSUAL PLEASURES, HE HATH DECLARED IT TO BE HIS WILL THAT WE SHOULD ENJOY THEM, YET BY CONNECTING DISEASES AND DEATH WITH THE IMMEDIATE USE OF THESE PLEASURES, HE HATH NO LESS CLEARLY DECLARED, THAT HE WILLS US TO ENJOY THEM ONLY IN MODERATION.

NEW TRANSLATION.

Ver. 1.—1. Having a matter against another. 2. Locke thinks this a reproach of the faction, who, to screen the inconstant person from the censure of the church, carried the matter into a heathen court of judicature. But his crime being punishable by the laws of the Greeks, (chap. v. 1.) it doth not concern us whether the father was injuréd, or the faction, should have been condemned for bringing the matter before the civil magistrate, especially as it was a more effectual method of revindicating the evil than by the ordinary censures of the church.

2. By the unrighteous. —The heathen are called unrighteous, in the same sense that Christians are called saints or holy. See Eze. iv. 6., for the latter were called saints, not on account of their sanctity of manners, but on account of their professed faith, so the former were called unrighteous on account of their idolatry and unbelief, ver. 6., although many of them were remarkable for their regard to justice, and to the preservation of the duties of morality.

Ver. 2.—1. Do ye not know. —Because this question is repeated six times in this chapter, and it is evident Locke thinks it was intended as a reproach to the Corinthians, who, notwithstanding they boasted of the knowledge they received from the false teachers, were extremely ignorant in religious matters.

2. That the saints.—This name, though common to all who believed in the true God, (see Eze. iv. 6.) is sometimes appropriated to the spiritual men in the Christian church, who were inspired with the knowledge of the gospel. Col. i. 26.

3. Judge the world. —See Eze. iv. 3. Here St. Paul told the Corinthians, that, agreeing to the apostles' promise to the apostles, Matt. xix. 28. they were at that time actually judging or ruling the world by the laws of the gospel, which they preached to the world. Hence Christ told his apostles, John xii. 21. 'Now is the judgment of this world.' But Bengelius says, eunov: the future tense, and signifies shall judge; and that the apostle had in his eye the state of the world under Constantine, when the Christians possessed occupation of civil power. This interpretation is mentioned by Wisby likewise. Nevertheless, the subsequent clause, 'If the world (eunov) is judged by you,' shows, I think, that the apostle spoke of the time then present. Others, because the judgment of angels is spoken of in the same verse, interpret this of the last judgment; and by the saints judging the world, they understand, the affording judgment to the wicked. But this sense has no relation to the apostle's argument. With respect to the idea which Locke annexed of the saints being Christ's successors when he judges the world, I observe, that it is repugnant to all the accounts given of the successors of the apostles, and particularly to our Lord's own account of that great event, Matt. xxv. where the righteous are represented as standing before his tribunal along with the wicked, and as receiving their sen-

12 All meats (from ver. 13.) are lawful for me to eat; but I will not be enslaved by any meat.

13 Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: (v. 100.) However, God will destroy both it and them.

Now, the body was not made for whoredom, (see chap. v. 1. note 1.) but for the Lord, (ver. 20.) and the Lord for the body.

14 (v. 103.) And God hath both raised the Lord, and will raise up us by his own power.

15 Do ye not know (see ver. 2, note 1.) that they which do these things are ministers of Christ? (v. 11.) Shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them members of an harlot? By no means.

16 What, do ye not know that he who is strongly attached to an harlot, is one body? for he saith, the two shall be one flesh.

17 But he who is strongly attached to the Lord, is one spirit.

18 Flee whoredom. Every sin which a man committeth is (worse) without the body; but he who committeth whoredom, sinneth against his own body.

19 What, do ye not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit? (see Eph. ii. 22.) who is in you, whom ye have from God? (v. 24.) Besides, ye are not your own; justified, though perhaps many of them had not made a proper use of these means. See Eze. iv. 1. —Or the passage may be restricted to those who were true believers, and really holy persons.

20 For ye are bought with a price: glorify God, therefore, (v. 162.) with your body, and (w,) with your spirit, which are God's.

Ver. 12. All meats are lawful for me. —See the illustration, ver. 19. As the apostle could not say in these words, that all things were lawful for him, the sentence is elliptical, and must be supplied, according to the apostle's meaning, from the subsequent verse, "All meats are lawful for me to eat." Ver. 13. However, God will destroy both it and them: —namely, when the earth with the things which it contains are burnt. From this it is evident, that at the resurrection the parts of the body which minister to its nutrition, by means of meat and drink, are not to be restored; or if they are to be restored, that their use will be abated.

Ver. 15. Your bodies are the members of Christ. —This, and all the similar expressions in St. Paul's epistles, seem to be founded on what Christ said in his account of the judgment, Matt. xxv. 40. "I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat." For as much as ye have done it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it to me. For in these words our Lord declared, that the righteous are a part of himself; and that the members of their bodies are subject to his direction, and the object of his care.

Ver. 16. —1. He who is (strongly) attached to an harlot, is one body. —The body being the seat of the appetites and passions, and the instrument by which our appetites and passions are gratified, to be one of them is harlot, is to become the same vices and inclinations of the harlot, and to give up our body to her to be employed in gratifying her sinful inclinations.

2. The two shall be one flesh. —They shall be one in inclination and line. —And he who is attached to her, for if they were sanctified by one soul. This ought to be the effect of the conjunctive of man and woman in the bond of marriage; and generally is the consequence of a man's attachment to his wife.

Ver. 17. He who is strongly attached to the Lord is one spirit. —The spirit being the seat of the understanding, the affections, and the will, to be one spirit with another, is to have the same views of things, the same inclinations, and the same volitions; consequently, to pursue the same course of life.

Ver. 18. Flee whoredom. —For this reason also, that every sin which a man committeth, is committed without affecting the body; but he who committeth whoredom, sinneth against his own body: he wastes its strength, and introduceth into it deadly diseases.

Ver. 19. What, do ye not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you? (v. 24.) Besides, ye are not your own; to use your bodies as ye please;

20 For ye are bought with the price of the blood of Christ. Glorify God, therefore, with your body, by chastity and temperance, and with your spirit by piety, which body and spirit are God's, both by creation and redemption.

CHAPTER VII.

To understand the precepts and advice contained in this chapter, it is necessary to know, that among the Jews every person whose age and circumstances allowed him to marry, was reckoned to break the divine precept, increase and multiply, if he continued to live in a single state; —a doctrine which the false teacher, who was a Jew, may be supposed to have incultated, to ingratiate himself with the Corinthian women. Some of the Grecian philosophers however affirmed, that if a man would live happily, he should not marry. Nay, of the Pythagoricians, some represented the matrimonial connexion as inconsistent with purity. The brethren at Corinth, therefore, on the one hand, being urged to marriage both by their own natural inclinations and by the doctrine of the Judaizers, and, on the other, being restrained from marriage by the doctrine of the philosophers, and by the inconveniences attending marriage, in the then persecuted state of the church, they judged it prudent to write to the apostle the letter mentioned ver. 1, in which they desired him to inform them, whether they might not without sin abstain from marriage altogether; and whether such as were already married might not dissolve their marriages, on account of the evils to which in their persecuted state they were exposed! The letter, in which the Corinthians proposed these and some other questions to the apostle, hath long ago been lost. But had it been preserved, it would have illustrated many passages of the epistles to the Corinthians which are now dark, because we are ignorant of the circumstances to which the apostle in these passages alluded.

To the question concerning the obligation which persons grown up and settled in the world were under to enter into the married state, St. Paul answered, That although in the present distress it was better for them to have no matrimonial connections at all, yet, to avoid worse, even one who could not live chastely in the same state, he told them, was bound to marry; for which reason he explained to them the duties of married persons, as expressly established by the commandment of God, ver. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. But what he was farther to say in answer to their question, he told them, was not an injunction, like his declaration of the duties of marriage, but only an advice suited to their present condition, ver. 6. Namely, he wished that all of them could, like him, live continuously unmarried, ver. 7. Then, more particularly addressing the widowers and widows among them, he assured them it would be good for them, if, in the then persecuted state of the church, they could live chastely unmarried, as he was doing, ver. 8. But at the same time he told them, if they found that too difficult, it was better for them to marry than to be tormented with lust, ver. 9.

Next, in answer to their question, concerning the separation and divorce of married persons, the apostle considered first, the case of the married, who were both of them Christians. To these, his command, and the command of Christ, was, that the wife depart not from her husband, on account of the inconveniences attending marriage, ver. 10. However, if any wife, finding the troubles of a married state, in those times of persecution, too great for her to bear, separated herself from her husband, she was in her state of separation to marry no other man; because her marriage still subsisted. And if on trial she found that she could not live chastely in a state of separation, she was to be reconciled to her husband. In like manner, a husband was not, on account of the inconveniences attending a married state, to put away his wife. Or, having put her away, he was not to be reconciled to her, ver. 11.

In the second place, with respect to such Christians as were married to heathens, he told them, that what he was going to say was his commandment, and not the Lord's; meaning that the Lord, while on earth, had given no precedent concerning such a case. These persons the apostle brings by inspiration ordered to live together, if the heathen party was willing so to do; because difference of religion does not dissolve marriage, ver. 12, 13. And to shew the propriety of continuing such marriages when made, he told them, that the infidel husband was sanctified, or rendered a fit husband to his believing wife, by the strength of his affection to her, notwithstanding his religion was different from hers: and that, by the same affection an infidel wife was sanctified to her believing husband, ver. 14. But if the infidel party who proposed to depart, maliciously deserted his or her believing mate, notwithstanding due means of reconciliation had been used, the marriage was, by that desertion, dissolved with respect to the Christian party willing to adhere, and the latter was at liberty to marry another, ver. 16. In the mean time, to induce persons of both sexes who were married to heathens to continue their marriages, he told them, it might be a means of converting their infidel yoke-fellows, ver. 16.

In the first age, some of the brethren, entertaining wrong notions of the privileges conferred on them by the gospel, fancied, that on their becoming Christians they were freed from their former political as well as religious obligations. To remove that error, the apostle, after advising the Corinthians to continue their marriages with their unbelieving spouses, ordered every Christian to continue in the state in which he was called to believe; because the gospel sets no person free from any innocent political, and far less from any natural obligation, ver. 17. The converted Jew was still to remain under the law of Moses, as the municipal law of Judea; and the converted Gentile was not to become a Jew, by receiving circumcision, ver. 18. Because, in the affair of men's salvation, no regard is had either to circumcision or uncircumcision, but to the keeping of the commandments of God, ver. 19. Every one, therefore, after his conversion, was to remain in the political state in which he was converted, ver. 20. In particular, slaves after their conversion were to continue under the power of their masters as before, unless they could lawfully obtain their freedom, ver. 21. And a freeman was not to make himself a slave, ver. 22. The reason was, because being bought by Christ with a price, if he became the slave of men, he might find it difficult to serve Christ, his superior master, ver. 23. And therefore the apostle a third time enjoined them to remain in the condition wherein they were called, ver. 24. This earnestness he shewed, because if the brethren disobeyed the good laws of the countries where they lived; or, if such of them as were slaves ran away from their masters after their conversion, the gospel would have been calumniated as encouraging licentiousness.

In the third place, the apostle considered the case of those young persons who never had married, perhaps because they were not well established in the world, or were still in their father's family. This class of persons of both sexes he called virgins, and declared that he had no commandment of the Lord concerning them; by which he meant that Christ, during his ministry on earth, had given no commandment concerning them; but the apostle gave his judgment on their case, 'as one who had obtained mercy from the Lord to be faithful.' That is, he gave his judgment as an apostle, who had received inspiration to enable him faithfully to declare Christ's will, ver. 25. Beginning therefore with the case of the male virgin, he declared it to be good, in the present distress, for such to remain unmarried, ver. 26. But if they married, they were not to seek to be loosed. And if their wives happened to die, he told them, they would find it prudent not to seek a second wife, ver. 27. At the same time he declared, that if such persons married again, they did not sin. The same he declared concerning the female virgin; only, both the one and the other would find second marriages, in that time of persecution, attended with great bodily trouble, ver. 28.

By the way, to make the Corinthians less solicitous about present pleasures and pains, the apostle put them in mind of the brevity of life; and from that consideration exhorted them to beware of being too much elevated with prosperity, or too much dejected with adversity, ver. 29, 30.

31. — And to shew that he had good reasons for advising both sexes against marriage, while the persecution continued, he observed, that the unmarried man, being free from the cares of a family, had more time and opportunity to please the Lord; whereas the married man was obliged to mind the things of the world, that he might please his wife, ver. 32, 33. — The same things he observed concerning wives and unmarried, ver. 34. — And told them, he gave them these advices, and pointed out to them the inconveniences of a married state, together with the advantages of a single life, not to lose a bond upon them, but to lead them to do what was comely, and well pleasing their Christian profession, without constraint, ver. 35.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VII.—Now, concerning the things of which ye wrote to me, it is good for a man not to touch a woman.

2. (See 1 Thess. 4, 10, 11.) Nevertheless, on account of wantonness, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband.

3. Let the husband render to the wife the due benevolence; and in like manner also, the wife to the husband.

4. The husband hath not the command of her own body, but the husband; and, in like manner also, the husband hath not the command of his own body, but the wife.

5. Deprive not one another, unless perhaps by consent for a time, that ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer; and again, come ye together to the same place, that Satan may not tempt you through your incontinency.

6. But this which follows: I speak as an advice, and not as an injunction.

7. (1 Cor. 7.) That I wish all men to be even as I myself am. However, each hath his proper gift from God, one indeed after this manner, and another after that.

Ver. 1. To touch.—Epictetus, sect. 33. uses this word to denote one's marriage.

Ver. 2. — On account of wantonness, vexatio, is emphatical, and denotes all the different kinds of wantonness mentioned chap. 8. See chap. v. note 1.

Ver. 3. — Let every man have his own wife. — Here the apostle speaks in the imperative mood, using the style in which superiors give their commands. But although he recommends a single life in certain circumstances, this is not an injunction; and, in like manner also, is not an advice, but a general precept. But of these, every man must decide for himself, whether he cannot live chastely unmarried, and whether the same duties to which the people are called by some special occurrence, whether of a public or of a private nature.

Ver. 4. — And again come ye together to the same place. — So the original phrase, ἐκκόπησον, properly signifies. From this it appears, that in the first age, when married persons parted for a time to supply themselves in the duties of devotion, they lived in separate habitations, or rather in different parts of their own house. For in the eastern countries the houses were so built, that the women had apartments allotted to themselves. See Rom. v. note 3.

Ver. 5. — That ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer. — Because it is the duty of the clergy to pray for their people at all seasons. Jerome, and the patristics, from this text infer, that they ought to live in perpetual celibacy. But the inference is Incest, because the apostle is speaking, not of the ordinary duties of devotion, as is plain from his joining fasting with prayer; but of the special devotion to which the people are called by some special occurrence, whether of a public or of a private nature.

Ver. 6. — But this which follows: I speak as an advice to those who are able to receive it; and not as an injunction to all.

Ver. 7. — That I wish all the disciples of Christ to be unmarried, even as I myself am. However, each hath his proper gift from God, one indeed after this manner, and another after that.

Ver. 8. — That ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer. — It is the duty of the clergy to pray for their people at all seasons. Jerome, and the patristics, from this text infer, that they ought to live in perpetual celibacy. But the inference is Incest, because the apostle is speaking, not of the ordinary duties of devotion, as is plain from his joined fasting with prayer; but of the special devotion to which the people are called by some special occurrence, whether of a public or of a private nature.

Ver. 9. — But this which follows: I speak as an advice to those who are able to receive it; and not as an injunction to all.

Ver. 10. — That I wish all the disciples of Christ to be unmarried, even as I myself am. However, each hath his proper gift from God, one indeed after this manner, and another after that.

VER. 8. — That ye may have leisure for fasting and prayer. — It is the duty of the clergy to pray for their people at all seasons. Jerome, and the patristics, from this text infer, that they ought to live in perpetual celibacy. But the inference is Incest, because the apostle is speaking, not of the ordinary duties of devotion, as is plain from his joined fasting with prayer; but of the special devotion to which the people are called by some special occurrence, whether of a public or of a private nature.
1 Corinthians

8 This is my advice to the unmarried men, and to the widows. It is good for them, if they can remain as I do.

9 But if they cannot contain, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn.

10 Now those who have married, let them not consider it unhappy to be unmarried, or to have a husband, or a wife. But if they cannot contain, let them marry, that they may not burn with concupiscence.

11 But if she be an unbelieving wife, and the husband be a believer in the Lord, let her not depart.

12 But if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband. And if she marry another, let her not be reproved.

13 And let all who are married be as I am; for I have kept myself unmarried for the kingdom of the Lord, and to the gospel.

14 Let the unbelievers have the unbelievers, and the believers have the believers. But I am under obligation to God, and to the gospel.

15 Let them be judged by the Lord. But I speak this to your own profit.

16 For I know that it is a matter of contention, and therefore have given my advice; for it is good for a man to be unSOLEmon, and to use his member for the Lord, and not for the unbelieving. For what you do belongs to you alone; but what you have belongs to me.

17 For I am not the one who makes engagements with God, but the word of God is in me.
15 But if the unfaithful depart, let him depart: the brother or the sister is not in bondage (s, 162,) with such: but God hath called us (o, 163,) to peace. (See ver. 12, 13.)

16 (Tr. ἀδικ. 302.) For how knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? And how knowest thou, O husband, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

17 But as God hath distributed to every one, AND as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk; and so in all the churches I ordain.

18 Hath any circumcised one been called? Let him not be uncircumcised. AND Hath any one been called uncircumcised? Let him not be circumcised.

19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.

20 Let every one remain in the same calling in which he was called.

21 What if thou called wino be a bond-man? Be not thou careful to be made free; yet, if thou canst even be made free, rather use it.

22 For a bond-man who is called by the Lord, is the Lord’s; and a freeman who is called by the Lord, is Christ’s bond-man.

23 Ye were bought with a price: become not the slaves of men.

24 Brethren, in what state each one was called, in that let him remain (συναγ. τι ἦσας) with God. (Rom. 16. 25.)

25 Now, concerning virgins I have not a commandment, but I, as the Lord’s servant, I say that virgins shall be in the state which they were called in, whether they be married or not; if they be married, they shall be made to answer to their state. (Tr. ἠμένῳ 54.)

26 But if thou depart, let him depart. (Tr. ἔλθῃ 412.) The apostle had declared, ver. 11, that the married party who maliciously deserted the other, was not at liberty to marry during the other’s life. Here he declares, that the party who was willing to continue the marriage, but who was deserted notwithstanding a reconciliation had been attempted, was at liberty to marry. And his decision is just, because there is no reason why the innocent party, through the fault of the guilty party, should be exposed to the danger of committing adultery.

28 And if the unfaithful depart, let him depart: the brother or the sister is not in bondage with such: but God hath called us to peace. (Rom. 16. 25.)

29 As the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. (Tr. γραφέσθαι 138.) By declaring, and ver. 25, that men were bound, after their conversion, to continue under all the moral and just political obligations which lay on them before their conversion, the apostle condemned the error of the Judaeists, who taught that, by embracing the true religion, all the former obligations under which the converts were disowned. The gospel, instead of weakening any moral or just political obligations, strengthened them all.

30 Brethren, in what state each one was called, in that let him remain; and he remains with God; that is, while he remains a Christian.

31 Now, concerning virgins of either sex, who are in their father’s commandments which lay on them before their conversion, the apostle condemned the error of the Judaeists, who taught that, by embracing the true religion, all the former obligations under which the converts were disowned. The gospel, instead of weakening any moral or just political obligations, strengthened them all.

32 But if thou depart, let him depart. (Tr. ἔλθῃ 412.) The apostle had declared, ver. 11, that the married party who maliciously deserted the other, was not at liberty to marry during the other’s life. Here he declares, that the party who was willing to continue the marriage, but who was deserted notwithstanding a reconciliation had been attempted, was at liberty to marry. And his decision is just, because there is no reason why the innocent party, through the fault of the guilty party, should be exposed to the danger of committing adultery.

33 For how knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? And how knowest thou, O husband, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

34 And if the unfaithful depart, let him depart: the brother or the sister is not in bondage with such: but God hath called us to peace.

35 But if the unfaithful party, offended at the other for becoming a Christian, depart, let him depart; the Christian, thus maliciously deserted, is not in the bondage of marriage with such persons. But I do not speak of the believing parties departing, because God hath commanded us to live in peace with our infidel spouses.

36 Continue with your infidel spouses, who are willing to dwell with you; for how knowest thou, O Christian wife, whether thou shalt convert thy husband? (See I Pet. iii. 1.) And how knowest thou, O Christian husband, whether thou shalt convert thy wife, if thou continue with her?

37 But though this should not be the case, yet as God hath distributed to every one his lot, and in the state wherein the Lord Christ hath called every one, so let him continue, fulfilling the duties thereof, unless he can change his condition lawfully. And so in all the churches I ordain. See the Illustration.

38 To apply this rule: Hath any circumcised person, who is under the law of Moses as the municipal law of Judæa, been called? Let him not be uncircumcised, by renouncing that law. Hath any one been called uncircumcised? Let him not be circumcised, in token of his subjection to that law.

39 Under the gospel, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision hath any influence in our salvation; but the keeping of the commandments of God alone hath influence.

40 Since the gospel makes no alteration in men’s political state, let every Christian remain in the same political state in which he was called.

41 Agreeably to this rule, I shall thou called being a bond-man? Be not thou careful to be made free, fancying that a bond-man is less the object of God’s favour than a free-man. Yet, if thou canst even be made free by any lawful method, rather obtain thy freedom.

42 But if disappointed, grieve not; For a bond-man who is called by the Lord, possesses the greatest of all dignities; he is the Lord’s freed-man; being delivered by him from the slavery of sin. In like manner also, a free-man who is called, being Christ’s bond-man, his dignity thereby greatly increased.

43 Ye were bought with the price of Christ’s blood: Become not the slaves of men, by selling yourselves to them.

44 Brethren, whether in a state of bondage or of freedom each one was called, in that let him remain, while he remains with God; that is, while he remains a Christian.

45 Now, concerning virgins of either sex, who are in their father’s commandment of the Lord: but I give my judgment (see ver. 10, note 2.) as having obtained mercy (see, 3:13.) of the Lord to be faithful.

25. I declare this, then, to be good on the account of the present distress, namely, that it is good for a man who is a virgin, to continue so.

26. Art thou bound to a wife? Seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? Seek not a second wife.

27. And yet, if thou marriest, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marriest, she hath not sinned: nevertheless, affliction in the flesh such shall have; but I spare you.

28. (a) Now, this I say, brethren, that the wife cleave unto the husband. And, in the first place, both that they who have wives, should be as not having wives.

29. And they who weep, as not weeping; and they who rejoice, as not rejoicing; and they who buy, as not possessing;

30. And they who use this world, as not abusing it. For the form of this world passeth away.

31. And they who use this world, as not abusing it. For the form of this world, its pleasures, its pains, and its glories, like a pageant, passeth away with respect to us.

32. Besides, I advise you against marriage, because I wish you to be without anxious care. The unmarried man is not concerned with a family, anxiously careful to promote the interests of Christ, and how he shall please Christ by doing his will.

33. But he who hath married, anxiously careful for the things of the world, how he shall please his wife.

34. The wife and the virgin are divided in the same manner in their cares. The unmarried woman, not burdened with a family, anxiously attendeth to the duties of religion, that, avoiding vicious actions, and repressing inordinate desires and fears, she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she who hath married, anxiously careful for the affairs of her family, and how she shall please her husband; consequently hath not, like the other, leisure to attend to the duties of religion, and to the improvement of her mind.

35. This, however, concerning the advantages and disadvantages of the two states, I say for your own case; not that I may throw a bond on you, but to forewarn you, that if you do not give your whole mind to the Lord, you will be found in the midst of cares and toils, and not in the peace and joy which are yours when you do not seek your own

For Elmer, after Balsas, tells us that men were called εὐσεβεῖς,όργανοι, as well as weanies, of which the following is an undoubted example, Rev. xiv. 4. These are they which were not defiled with women, (ἐπανεκκαλούμενοι τοὺς) for they are virgins.

As having obtained mercy, I mean, the apostle, no other passages, that is, not as if he were speaking of the supernatural gifts, 2 Cor. x. 1. and grace, Gal. ii. 11. Wherefore, as by this mercy he was enabled to be a faithful apostle and steward of the mysteries of God, his judgment was not a judgment of advice, but of decision, being dictated by inspiration.

Ver. 25. I declare this, then, to be good. The word εὐδοκέω, translated I declare, properly signifies, I establish by law; see Park. Dict. and might have been so rendered here. For the apostle does not give a simple opinion, such as any wise man might give, but an inspired decision. See ver. 10, note 2.

On account of the present distress. The original word signifies affliction arising from outward circumstances. Luke xxi. 32. There shall be greek εὐδοκέω, great distress in the land. By mentioning the present distress, not only that which regarded a single state proper, the apostle hath prevented us from supposing that deficiency is a mere holy or perfect state than misery. The one or the other is proper, according to the circumstances in which men are placed, and the gifts with which they are endowed. Besides, by telling us, ver. 8., that it is better to marry than to burn, he hath in effect declared marriage to be good for the generality of mankind at all times, not excepting a time of persecution.

3. It is good for a man who is a virgin to continue so. Though the English word man, like its corresponding word in Greek and Latin, denotes both sexes, the Greek word here might have been translated a person, the better to agree with the signification of the word virgin, which, as was shown, ver. 25. note 1., denotes an unmarried person of either sex. Because the directions which the apostle was about to give, ver. 26. to Bithynia, concerning the disposal of their children in marriage, were partly to be founded on the circumstances and necessities of the children; before he gave these directions, he very properly addressed the children themselves, and set before them the considerations by which their inclinations were to be regulated in that matter: namely, the inconveniences attending a married state, and the heaviness and uncertainty of all human engagements, considerations which, he told them, ought to determine them to wish to remain unmarried during the present distress.

Ver. 26. Seek not a second wife. I mean, the apostle gave it as a counsel, because it was better, in a time of persecution, for one to suffer alone than to increase his afflictions by the sufferings of a wife and children.

Ver. 27. The time being short. Doddridge thinks this clause might be translated, the time being contracted; because the word εὐδοκέω, properly denotes a sort hurried up.

Ver. 28. As not abusing it. The compound word εὐδοκεῖν, to abuse, is put sometimes for the simple word εὐδοκέω, to abuse; so that, as Bishop Pearce observes on this verse, the clause might be translated as not using it. See Gregius on 1 Cor. ix. 8. and Stephen's Theor. 2. For the form of this world (ἐπανεκκαλούμενοι) passeth away, namely, like a pageant. But Gregius imagines the sense, that the time of our sojourn in a theatre. See 1 John ii. 17. Where the word is used to express the temporary perishable nature of the things of the present life.

Ver. 29. Are divided in the same manner. Some commentators are of opinion that the word εὐσεβεῖς, translated there in difference, should be joined to the preceding verse, and translated thus, and is divided. But in the Greek version these words are joined in this verse in the following manner: 'Sometimes even all intermulieris eum virginem.' And the Greek commentators thus interpret the clause, εὐσεβεῖς, ἔργα τοῖς γυναικίς. They differ from one another, and yet they are not the same care. The literal translation of the text, which I have given above, exhibits the same meaning more agreeable to the original.

Ver. 30. What is honourable, and well becoming the Lord, without forcing or dragging. See the original literally signifies. For the adjective εὐσεβεῖς denotes a thing that is good, and consequently places another thing, consequently which suits it well; and the adverb LEAD YOU to what is honourable, and well becoming the Lord, without forcible dragging.

But, if any one think he acteth improperly toward his virgin, if she be above age unmarried, and so needs to be married, let him do what she inclineth, he does not sin: let such marry.

But he who standeth firm in his heart, not having necessity, and hath power (to do), considering his own well, he hath determined this in his own heart to keep his virgin, doth well.

Then, even he who giveth her in marriage doth well; but he who giveth her not in marriage doth better.

A wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she pleaseth: only in the Lord.

But she is happier if she so abideth, according to my judgment, (see ver. 10, note 2); and I am certain that even I have the Spirit of God.

I. CORINTHIANS.

you from marriage in all cases, but by persuading you to avoid multiplying your connections, to lead you to do what is honourable to yourselves as Christians, and must for the interest of Christ, without forcible dragging.

As to your question concerning fathers, who have virgin daughters to give: if any father is of opinion, that he acteth improperly towards his virgin, if she be above age unmarried, and so needs to be married, whether the necessity ariseth from her conscience or inclination, or her being sought in marriage, let the father do what she inclineth: he does not sin in complying with her inclination; let such virgin daughters marry.

But he who continually persuadeth in his mind, that it is no sin in his daughter to remain unmarried, and is under no necessity of marrying, or inclination, or circumstantial occasion for marrying, being a free man and not a slave, and hath determined this in his own mind to keep his daughter unmarried, agreeably to her own inclination, doth what is preferable.

Then the father who giveth his daughter in marriage, when need requireth it, doth a lawful action, even in the present distress: But he who giveth her not in marriage, doth what is better for her.

A wife is bound to her husband, and to the law of God, as long as her husband liveth. But if her husband be dead, or if he be justly divorced from her, or maliciously deserts her, (ver. 15,) she is at liberty to be married to whom she pleaseth, (see ver. 8, 9;) only he must be a Christian, and not too near related to her.

But, though a widow may lawfully marry a second husband, she will be happier if she remain a widow, according to my judgment. And I am certain, that even I, of whom your teacher hath spaketh so contemptuously, have, in this judgment, the direction of the Spirit of God.

The words in the margin, word married being supplied, conformably to the scope of the passage. Accordingly, the version of this passage, as Terrillius hath translated it, is, "Quondam primum tempus ipsis, et non tradiris eum virgo, conveniens est ut illud concipias." Because her time hath passed, and she hath not given her to a husband, but it be proper that she give her.

Ver. 30. Doth well.]—That is, doth what is for the benefit of his daughter; because, if she agree to it, by keeping her in her own family unmarried, she will be exposed to fewer temptations than if she were married, and in a better condition for acquiring that holiness in body and soul, which will enable her to adhere to the gospel in a time of persecution.

Ver. 39. 1. Is bound by the law.]—This may be the law of the gospel, called the law of faith, and the law of liberty; or it may be the law of marriage, given to Adam and Eve in paradise. Either way understood, the apostle repeateth what he had enjoined in the preceding part of the chapter, ver. 10, 12, 13, namely, that the Corinthian women were not to leave their husbands on account of the troubles which, in that time of persecution, the church and family suffered.

2. Only in the Lord.]—That is, her second husband must be a Christian. So the phrase signifies, 2 Cor. xii. 2. 1 know a man in Christ, I know a Christian man." This apostle in his second epistle expressly forbids the Corinthian Christians to marry infidels, 2 Cor. vi. 14. Note.

Ver. 40. And I am certain that even I have the Spirit of God.]—The words "even us," in this, and in many other passages, does not express doubt, but certainty. Thus, 1 Cor. vi. 4. 6. 1. I am certain God hath, &c.—1 Cor. viii. 2. 1. Therefore any one (who) is confident of knowing.—Heb. iv. 1. Any of you (who) receiveth should actually fall short.—Mark x. 32. O exousia, exousia, They who exerciseth rule.—Luke viii. 18. Whom (O) God hath, blessed be they that hear.—1 Cor. i. 16. If any one (who) receiveth resolves to be contentious.—1 Cor. xiii. 2. 1. If any one (who) knoweth is called a prophet. To show that the Greeks themselves used the word to denote certainty and reality, J. F. Pearce quotes Uplin, in Demosthenes, 1. who says, To ἐπιστήμην ἡ μαθησίαν τινι συνεφορίζοντα τις, that is, "he is used by the ancients, not always to express what is doubtful, but likewise to express what is certain." From these examples it is evident that the word "certain" in this verse, does not imply that the apostle was in any doubt whether he was inspired in giving this judgment: It is only a way of expressing his certain knowledge of the divine inspiration, and may have been used in irony of the false teacher, who called his inspiration in question.

CHAPTER VIII.

When the heathens offered sacrifices of such animals, as were fit for food, a part of the carcass was burnt on the altar, a part was given to the priest, and on the remainder the offerings feasted with their friends, either in the idol's temple, or at home. Sometimes also a part was sent as a present to such as they wished to oblige; and if the sacrifice was large, a part of it was sold in the public market. To these idolatrous feasts, the heathens often invited the Christians of their acquaintance in Corinth; and some of the brethren there, desirous of preserving the friendship of their neighbours, accepted these invitations; perhaps at the persuasion of the false teacher, who called it an innocent method of avoiding persecution. They knew an idol was nothing in the world; and therefore their partaking of the sacrifice, even in the idol's temple, could not be reckoned a worshipping of the idol. Besides, such a feast was considered by enlightened Christians as a common meal, which, under the gospel, they were at liberty to eat; especially if they did it to show their belief that idols have no existence as gods. These arguments, it is true, are not explicitly stated by the apostle. But the things he hath written in this and in chap. x., being direct confutations of them, we may believe they were mentioned by the Corinthian brethren in their letter, referred to chap. vii. 1.

Agreedly to this supposition, the apostle begins his discourse concerning the eating of things sacrificed to idols, with acknowledging that the generality of Christians had much more knowledge than the heathens. But at the same time he told them, that knowledge often puffeth up individuals with pride, and maketh them neglect the good of their neighbours; whereas love leadeth one to edify his neighbour, ver. 1. Next he declared, that whoever is vain of his knowledge, and maketh an uncharitable use of it, knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know; because true knowledge always maketh a man humble and charitable, ver. 2.—And that the way to attain true knowledge in religious matters, is to love God, who in time will make us know things as we ought to know them, ver. 3. Having laid down these principles, the apostle, in answer to the first argument, whereby the partaking, even in the idol's temple, of the sacrifices offered there, was pretended to be justified, acknowledged that most Christians know an idol is nothing in the world; hath no existence as a god, and no share in the government of the world; and that there is no other God but one; and no other Lord but Jesus, ver. 4, 5, 6. But at the same time he told them, there were some weak brethren, who had not that knowledge, but believed idols to be real gods, who possessed some share in the government of the world; consequently, when they ate of the sacrifices offered to idols, they did it with a conscience, or belief, of the existence of the idol, and of his power in human affairs. In them, therefore, the eating of such sacrifices was certainly an act of idolatry, whereby their conscience was defiled, ver. 7. Next, to the argument, that the things sacrificed to idols, being meat upon which the eating of which was lawful under the gospel, consequently that they might be eaten in any place, ver. 8.—the apostle replied, that, in the use of their Christian liberty of eating all kinds of meats without distinction, they were bound to take care not to lead the weak into sin by their example, ver. 9. This he told them they would certainly do, by eating the sacrifices of idols. For, said he, if a weak brother, who fancies an idol to be a real god, see thee, whom he knoweth that it is no god, sitting at the feast on the sacrifice in the idol's temple, will not his ill-informed conscience be encouraged by thy example to eat of that meat as sacrificed to a real god? ver. 10. And thus, through an improper use of thy knowledge, shall thy weak brother commit idolatry and perish, for whom Christ died, ver. 11. Such a conduct the apostle termed, a 'sinning against the brethren and against Christ,' ver. 12. Then, in a high strain of Christian benevolence, he declared, that if his eating any kind of flesh offended his brother to sin, he would abstain from it all his life, ver. 13. By saying this, the apostle insinuated to the faction, that whatever they might pretend, their real motives for joining the heathens in their idolatrous feasts were of a sensual kind. They loved good cheer and merriment. But for the salvation of their brethren, it was their duty willingly to have denied themselves all such gratifications.

Here it is necessary to observe, that the apostle's design in this part of his letter was, not to show the Corinthians the sinfulness of sitting down with the heathens in an idol's temple, to feast on the sacrifices offered there; that subject he treats of chap. x. But his design was to make them sensible, that although it had been lawful for those who knew the truth concerning idols, to partake of these feasts, they were bound to avoid them, because their weak brethren, who believed idols to have some share in the government of the world, would by their example be led to eat these feasts as an act of worship, and so guilty of idolatry. The remaining arguments in vindication of the practice, together with the general question itself, concerning the lawfulness of eating in the temples, or elsewhere, meats that had been sacrificed to idols, the apostle considered afterwards, chap. x. (see chap. xi. 5, note 1), where the reason of the apostle's treating this subject hypothetically, in the part of his letter now under our consideration, is assigned, and applied for illustrating his treating hypothetically of women's praying and prophesying in the public assemblies for worship.

New Translation.

Chap. VIII.—1. Now, concerning things sacrificed to idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but love buildeth up. 2. If, therefore, any one is confident of knowing any thing, he hath known nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any one love God, the same is made to know by him.

Commentary.

Chap. VIII.—1. Now, concerning the arguments you mentioned for eating things sacrificed to idols, we know that most of us (see ver. 7.) have knowledge of the vanity of idols. Knowledge, however, often puffeth up the person who hath it, but love buildeth up others. 2. If, therefore, any one is confident of knowing any thing on this subject, which makes him regardless of his neighbour's edification, he hath known nothing yet concerning it, as he ought to know. But if any one love God, the same is made to know by him. Hence, it fills them with an high opinion of their own understanding, and leads them to despise others; whereas love disposeth them to promote the good of others. 3. But love buildeth up. This metaphor is borrowed from the Old Testament, where they who increase the happiness of society, or of individuals, are said to build them up: Ps. xxxvii. 9. 'He shall destroy them, and not build them up.' Prov. xvi. 5. 'Every wise woman buildeth her house.'—See ver. 1. 4. He hath known nothing yet as he ought to know. He hath not known what is most necessary to be known. He hath not known whether he had a temple in one of those sacrifices; or, if he had, whether he had known the purpose for which this knowledge is to be desired, nor the use which he ought to make of it: namely, that thereby he ought to edify others. 5. The same is made to know by him. By万人 is here used.
Concerning then, the eating of things sacrificed to idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is no other God but one.

6 (καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ μόνου θεοῦ, τοῦ θεοῦ πατρὸς ὑμῶν, πρὸς ἅπαν αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγιασμένων τοῖς ἁγιασμένοις τῶν ἀγίων τὰ ἁγία τῆς λατρείας, ἔλαβον τὴν ἁγιασμένον τοῦ θεοῦ πατρὸς ἀνθρώπου ὑμῶν.)

7 Yet to us there is one God, the Father, (ἐξαργυρίων) to him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, (ἐξαργυρίων) by whom all things are, and we (ἐξαργυρίων) by him.

8 However, this knowledge is not in all: for some, until this hour, in the conscience of the idol as a god, eat it as a thing sacrificed to the idol as a god; and their conscience being weak, is defiled.

9 Nevertheless, take heed, lest perhaps this right of yours become a stumbling-block to the weak.

10 For if any one see thee who hast knowledge (συνεγνωσμένος) at table in an idol's temple, will not the conscience of him who is weak (παθήσεως) be built up by thy example to eat things sacrificed to idols?

11 And (ἐπετεύχθη) through this thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, by joining idolatry with the gospel, or by lapsing into heathenism, for whom Christ died?

12 But I must tell you, by thus sinning against the brethren, and wounding their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ, whom ye wound in his members.

The phrase "the idol is nothing in the world" is a key idea in this passage. It underscores the importance of considering the impact of our actions on others, especially those who may be weak in their faith.

In the transitive sense, see Acts vii. 7. Accordingly Beza, in his note, translates it, "Sciice factum est ab eo"—is made to know him. But others think the pronoun eis, he, refers to God, the immediate antecedent, and translates the clause thus: He (God) is known of him, namely, in a proper manner; and observe that eis is used in the same manner: Acts x. 11. "Jesus Christ is the Lord of all." (Ver. 6.)

1 The eating of things sacrificed to idols.—The custom of eating the sacrifices in the temple was of high antiquity. Num. x. 12. Baal sacrificed oxen and sheep, and sent to Beal his men of war, that were with him, to come and feast with him on the sacrifices. So also, Numb. xxv. 22, the daugh- ter of Jephtha called the people unto the sacrifices of her father. And the people did eat, and bowed down to their god. See below, ver. 10 note i. That these are sacrifices sometimes in their own houses, is clear from 1 Cor. x. 28. and that parts of them were sold in the public markets, appears from ver. 36. Of these customs, Plautus likewise hath made mention. Matt. xxiii. 26. and 1 Nep. 117.

Sacrificial 1. And I do partake of the sacrifices of the devil, which are eaten of none but the devil, and of his angels. Abhacenat ad a: sa me sa, sa prandium, ad canem vacat. 2 We know that an idol is nothing.—The Greek word idol, translated idol, signifies an image formed in the mind, and which exists nowhere else. Wherefore, to show that the gods of the heathens were mere creatures of the human imagination, the Jews, who used the Greek language, termed them idoleis, idols. By this word likewise, they signified the picture and statue which the heathens set up in their temples as representations of their gods; and by giving them the appellation of idols, they declared their persuasion, that the things of which they were the representations, had no existence. Nevertheless, as the apostle knew that some of the heathens worshipped their dead ancestors, legislators, kings, &c. others of them (the heavenly bodies, others certain kinds of brute animals, he cannot be understood to say that 'an idol is nothing,' in the sense of its having no existence as a god, but of its having no existence as a god, and no share in the government of the world.

11 But by thus sinning against the brethren, and wounding their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ, whom ye wound in his members.

12 But I must tell you, by thus sinning against the brethren, and wounding their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ, whom ye wound in his members.

Concerning then the eating of things sacrificed to idols, most of the Christians knew that an idol is nothing in the world; it hath no existence as a deity, nor any power in the government of the world; and that there is no other God but one.

6 For certainly, though there be gods called gods, both in heaven and upon earth, (even as there be gods many, and lords many,)

7 Yet to us there is but one God, the Father, (ἐξαργυρίων) to him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, (ἐξαργυρίων) by whom all things are, and we (ἐξαργυρίων) by him.

8 However, this knowledge is not in all: for some, until this hour, in the conscience of the idol as a god, eat it as a thing sacrificed to the idol as a god; and their conscience being weak, is defiled.

9 Nevertheless, take heed, lest perhaps this right of yours become a stumbling-block to the weak.

10 For if any one see thee who hast knowledge (συνεγνωσμένος) at table in an idol's temple, will not the conscience of him who is weak (παθήσεως) be built up by thy example to eat things sacrificed to idols?

11 And (ἐπετεύχθη) through this thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, by joining idolatry with the gospel, or by lapsing into heathenism, for whom Christ died?

12 But I must tell you, by thus sinning against the brethren, and wounding their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ, whom ye wound in his members.

8 However, this knowledge is not in all: for some, until this hour, in the belief of the idol's existence as a tutelar inferior god, eat it as a thing offered to the idol as a real god; and their conscience being erroneous, is defiled with idolatry, through their eating these sacrifices.

9 But ye tell me, meat does not now recommend us to God. For neither if we eat all kinds indifferently, do we thereby abound in good works, neither if we do not eat of some kinds, do we thereby want in grace, and count deficient; therefore, we have a right to eat the sacrifices of idols, even in their temples.

10 Nevertheless, though it were lawful to eat these sacrifices, ye should take heed, lest perhaps, by your indiscretion, ye offend the weak brother, whom God has not yet delivered from idolatry, and believe not the truth in the word concerning the life of the body and the resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xiv. 13—17. And through the impudent use of this thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, by joining idolatry with the gospel, or by lapsing into heathenism, for whom Christ died?

CHAPTER IX.

The false teacher having come to Corinth to enrich himself, we may suppose he was much disconcerted, when he found, that all the time the apostle had preached among the Corinthians he had taken nothing from them on account of his maintenance, nor on any other account. Wherefore, to remove the obstruction which Paul's disinterestedness had laid in the way of his covetous designs, he boldly affirmed to the Corinthians, that Paul was no apostle, because he had not accompanied Christ during his ministry on earth, and that his demanding nothing from them for his maintenance, showed he was conscious to himself he was no apostle, and had no right to maintenance from the Corinthians. For if he knew himself to be an apostle, why did he not use the rights of an apostle? Why did he not lead about a sister, or a wife, to take care of him, as the other apostles did, and demand maintenance for her as well as for himself? This I suppose the false teacher had done. But be that as it may, it cannot be doubted that the Corinthians, in their letter to the apostle, mentioned the particulars which his enemies objected to his character. Therefore, after deciding some very difficult questions which the Corinthians had proposed to him, and particularly after affirming in the end of chap. vii. that he had decided these questions by the inspiration of the Spirit, and after shewing himself a faithful apostle of Christ, by declaring in the end of chap. viii. his resolution on all occasions to abstain from things indifferent, rather than, by using his liberty respecting them, to lead his fellow Christians into sin, he with great propriety introduced the proof of his apostleship, and answered all the objections and calumnies whereby his enemies endeavoured to discredit him in the eyes of the Corinthians.

The proof of his apostleship St. Paul discussed in a few words, by asking the Corinthians, whether they did not know him to be an apostle? and a freeman, who had a right to preach the gospel without reward, if he thought fit to do so! whether they did not know that he had seen the Lord since his resurrection! and whether themselves were not his workmanship, as an apostle of Christ? ver. 1. Whatever he might be to others, he was certainly an apostle to them; for their conversion from heathenism, followed with the spiritual gifts which he had conferred on them, was such an unquestionable proof of his apostleship, that they could entertain no doubt of it, ver. 2.

Next addressing the faction, he said, Mine answer to them who condemn me as no apostle is this: I have a right to be maintained at the charges of the persons to whom I preach, ver. 3, 4. I have a right also to lead about a wife, who is a believer, to take care of me, and I am entitled to demand maintenance for her likewise, even as the other apostles do, and the brethren of the Lord, and Peter, ver. 5. Unless it be pretended, that of all the ministers of the gospel, I am the only one who have not that right, ver. 6. His right to maintenance, he told them, was founded on the common sense and practice of mankind, who gave maintenance to soldiers, vine-dressers, and shepherds, in return for their labours, ver. 7. It was founded also on the law of Moses, which forbade the Israelites to muzzle the ox while treading out the corn, ver. 8, 9, 10. Wherefore, having sown in the minds of the Corinthian spiritual things, that is, having given them the first knowledge of the gospel, it was no great return if he partook of their carnal things, ver. 11. Especially as others (meaning the false teacher), who had been lately among them, had been plentifully maintained by them. But though he had a complete right to maintenance, he had never used that right, but had endured every hardship, that the gospel might not be hindered, ver. 12. Further, he told them his right was founded still more directly on another precept of the law, which appointed those who performed sacred offices to eat from the temple, ver. 13. Nay, it was founded on the will of Christ, who had expressly authorized those who preach the gospel to live by the gospel, ver. 14. But the apostle being a freeman, who was at liberty to do in that matter as he pleased, he had made use of none of these precepts and rights, neither did he mention them, on this occasion, to induce the Corinthians to give him maintenance, for he would rather die of want, than be deprived of glorying in having preached the gospel without receiving any reward from his disciples for that important service, ver. 15. The reason was, he had nothing to boast of in barely preaching the gospel, because his conviction of its truth, together with the command of Christ, laid him under such a necessity of preaching, that he would be absolutely miserable if he did not make known things which were of so great importance to the world, ver. 16. Now, said he, if I do this with such willingness as to endure every hardship in the course of the work for the sake of doing it successfully, I shall obtain a distinguished reward. Whereas, if a stewardship of the gospel is forced on me against my will, and I discharge it as one constrained to undertake it, I shall have no distinguished reward, ver. 17. What, then, is the ground of the distinguished reward which I look for? Why this, that when preaching the gospel, I do it without burdening the persons to whom I preach, in order that I may make the gospel successful, by not abusing the power, which the gospel gives me of demanding maintenance. For I, who aim at a distinguished reward, would abuse that power, if, by demanding maintenance, I hindered the success of my preaching, ver. 18. For the same reason, though I be a freeman with respect to all men, (see ver. 1.) I have made myself a slave to all men, by complying with their prejudices and humours, as far as I could do it innocently, that I might gain the more disciples to Christ, ver. 19. More particularly, to the Jews, I became as a Jew, ver. 20, 21, 22. All this I do, for the sake of preaching the gospel successfully, that I may become a joint partaker of the rewards of the gospel with the most eminent apostles, ver. 23.
But, because the faction thought the apostle a fool for not demanding maintenance, and because the rest might be surprised at his subjecting himself to so many inconveniences and hardships while preaching the gospel, he put them in mind of the bodily labours and hardships to which their countrymen, who contended in the games, subjected themselves, for the trifling reward of a crown of green leaves, which soon withered. Whereas he and his brethren apostles, in return for the bodily labours and hardships which they endured, expected to obtain an incorruptible crown, namely, that divine reward of which he had been speaking. The greatness therefore of the reward sufficiently justified the apostles in the pursuit, although it was attended with so much labour and patient suffering, and showed that they had good reason to disdain every temporal advantage, while pursuing a felicity of such magnitude, ver. 24-27.

NEW TRANSLATION.

Chap. IX.—1 Am I not an apostle? am I not a freeman? (see ver. 19.) have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? (1 Cor. xv. 8; Acts xviii. 9, xiii. 14, 15, xvi. 1.) are ye not my work in the Lord?

2 If to others I be not an apostle, yet to you at least I am, for the seal of mine apostleship ye are in the Lord.

3 Mine answer to them who condemn me, is this,

4 Have we not a right to eat and to drink?

5 Have we not a right to lead about a sister wife, as the other apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?

6 Or have I only and Barnabas not a right to forbear working?

7 Who serveth in the wars on his own charges at any time? Who planteth a vineyard, and doth not eat of the fruit of it? or who feedeth a flock, and doth not eat of the milk of the flock?

8 Do I speak these things according to man (Rom. vii. 19, note 1) ONLY? or doth not the law also, say these things?

9 For in the law of Moses it is written, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox treading out the corn. Doth God take care of oxen ONLY?

10 Or, (Acts, 55) doth he command this chieffy for our sakes? For our sakes (Acts, 91) certainly it was written: because he who Ver. 2.—The seal of mine apostleship ye are in the Lord.—This the apostle had good reason to say, because, as he intimated 2 Cor. xii. 12, they had been converted by his working among them miracles peculiar to an apostle; and because after their conversion he had bestowed spiritual gifts on many of them, in such abundance that, as a church, they were inferior to no church whatever. 1 Cor. i. 5, 6, 7, 12; 2 Cor. xii. 13. Ver. 3. To them who condemn me.—For this sense of the word condemn, see chap. iv. 3, note 1. The apostle's enemies did not as our translators express it, examine him about his not taking maintenance, but they were alleged to examine him concerning his apostleship. But they urged his not taking maintenance, as a proof that he knew himself to be no apostle. Thus St. Paul termed a condemning him.

Ver. 4. Have we not a right to eat and to drink.—The right which all the ministers of the word had to be maintained by their disciples, the apostle expressed by a right 'to eat and drink,' because Christ had said to the twelve, Matt. x. 9. 'Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses; 10. For the workman is worthy of his meat.' In like manner to the seventy, Luke x. 7. 'In the same house able, eating and drinking such things as they give, for the labourer is worthy of his hire.'—The word power, by which our translators have rendered τηρήσης, does not express the apostle's meaning: Pover is only an ability to do a thing; whereas, the apostle means a right to do what he is speaking of.

Ver. 5.—To lead about a sister wife.—That is, a Christian wife; or the translation may be, a sister woman, a Christian woman. Clem. Alex., as quoted by Whitby, says, 'They married their wives about, not as wives, but as sisters, to minister to those who were mistressee of families, that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without any reprehension, enter into the apostles of the women.' Nevertheless, the manner in which this affair is spoken of, inclines one not to think, that the sister wife, or woman, was carried about to minister to the apostles, rather than to instruct them. For the reasons mentioned, Rom. xvi. 1, note 3, when people of condition travelled, they either lodged with their acquaintance, or carried servants with them, who provided such things as were necessary to their accommodation in the public lodging-houses. In the Gentile countries, where the apostles preached, they had no acquaintance or friends with whom they could lodge; and therefore some of them, particularly the brethren of the Lord and Peter, found it necessary to carry about with them a wife to make provision for them, at the expense of those to whom they preached. This right, Paul told the Corinthians, belonged as much to him and to Barnabas as to the other apostles: lest, to render the gospel free of charge, he neither used this right, ver. 12, nor ever would use it, ver. 15. Wherever he was, he maintained himself by his own labour.

Ver. 6. Or have I only and Barnabas not a right to forbear working?—From this we learn, that Peter, as well as Paul, preached the gospel without maintaining himself from his disciples; and that, like Paul, he was listed for his doctrine by the Jews, and the Judaizers. See Pref. 2 Cor. xiv. 2, and 2 Cor. xiv. 17. The honourable mention which Paul made of Barnabas, in this passage of his apostle to the Corinthians, deserves notice, as it shows that those good men, notwithstanding their sharp contention about John Mark, mentioned Acts xv. 20, entertained no resentment against each other on that account, but murder, or anything I can, and perhaps on some occasions after that preached the gospel together as before.

Ver. 9. Muzzle the ox treading out the corn.—The people of the east did not thrash their corn as we do; but they ploused out the grain by causing oxen to tread on the ears. This argument from the law of Moses may have been intended for the Jewish converts at Corinth, some of whom I suppose had joined the false teachers. The same may be said of the argument, ver. 10, the same man said that was not to eat the fruit of the vine, John vii. 22. Ver. 10. Doth he command this?—The precept concerning oxen, being introduced in the law immediately after precepts enforcing justice and mercy in punishments, it was certainly intended to plough, ought to plow in hope; and he who thrusteth in hope, OUGHT to partake of his own hope.
11. If we have sown spiritual things in you, is it a great matter if we shall reap carnal things?
12. If others partake of (Rom. 7.1) this power over you, OUGHT we not rather (1 Cor. 6.1) be silent? Nevertheless, we have not used this power; (Rom. 14.2) but we bear all things, that we may not give any hindrance to the gospel of Christ.
13. Do ye not know, that they who perform sacred offices eat (Rom. 14.2) from the temple? they who wait at the altar, do they not share with the altar?
14. So also the Lord hath appointed them who preach the gospel, to live (Rom. 14.2) by the gospel.
15. But I have used none of these precepts: neither have I written these things that it should be so done (Rom. 14.2) to me: for it were good for me rather to die, than that any one should make my boasting void. (2 Cor. 11.10)
16. For (2 Cor. 11.10) when I preach the gospel, I have nothing to boast of: because necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel.
17. (Rom. 14.2) Now, if I do this willingly, I have a reward; but if unwillingly, I am intrusted with the stewardship, I have no reward. (Rom. 14.2)
18. What then to me is the reward? That when preaching, (Rom. 14.2) I shall establish the gospel of Christ without charge, in order that I may not abuse my power in the gospel.
19. (Rom. 14.2) Therefore, though I be a freeman (Rom. 14.2), with respect to all men, I have enslaved myself to all, that I might gain the more.
20. (Rom. 14.2) So to the Jews, I became as a Jew; that I might gain the Jews; to those under the law, as under the law, that I might gain those under the law.

impress the式es with a sense of the obligations of justice and humanity towards rational creatures, as the apostle here affirms.

Ver. 12.—1. Power over you.—(Eph. 3.17.) We have the same form of expression, Matt. 2.1. 1 John xvi. 2. This other who partook of this power over them were the teachers of the fiction, who at the expense of the Corinthians lived in great luxury among them, 1 Cor. 4.8. 2 Cor. 11.31. 3. Hindrance to the gospel.—By preaching the gospel free of expense, the apostle rendered it more acceptable to the Gentiles, and drew them more readily to hear him. There was another reason also for his demanding no reward for preaching: namely, that in future ages mankind might be scalable, in that preaching the gospel he was not ashamed by any worldly motive, but purely by a full perception of its truth. Foreseeing, therefore, that his disinterestedness would in all ages be a strong proof of the truth of the gospel, the apostle gloried in preaching it to all men without reward.

Ver. 13. They wait at the altar.—In the original it is (Hebrew.)—They sit at the altar; a phrase which denotes continual and persevering service at the altar. In the first clause of the verse, the service of the Levites is supposed to be alluded to; but in this clause, the service of the priests.

Ver. 14.—Now, if I do this willingly.—The apostle means his preaching the gospel from a conviction of its truth, and from a regard to the glory of God and the good of men: for these principles would make him not only firm, but cheerful in the work.

1. I have a reward.—I shall obtain that distinguished reward, which in the life to come will be bestowed on them who turn many to righteousness, and who in that work undergo great hardships.

Ver. 15.—To the Jews I became as a Jew.—In the preceding chapters, the apostle ordered the Corinthians to comply with the prejudices of their weak brethren in the affair of meats sacrificed to idols, and declared his own resolution, that if his eating most occasioned others to sin, he would not eat flesh while he lived. It is therefore probable, that his becoming to the Jews as a Jew, means that he observed the distinction of meats enjoined by Moses, while he lived with the Jews in the heathen countries. Also, it may refer to his conducting Timothy, to render his practice consistent with the Jews. These compliance with the prejudices of the weak showed only to gain their goodwill. For when the Judean teach-

22. To the weak, I became as weak, that I might gain the weak. To all I have become all things, that by all means I might save some.

23. (Acts 10:38.) Now, this I do for the sake of the gospel, and that I may become a joint partaker of its rewards.

24. Do ye not know, that they who run in the stadium run indeed, but one only receives the prize? So run, that ye may lay hold on the prize.

25. (Acts 10:38.) Now, every one who contends, is temperate in all things: They, indeed, that they may receive a fading crown, but we one that does not fade.

28. As not out of view. [The Greek adverb ἀπόκτησις comes from ἀποκτάω, a word which signifies a thing not yet acquired, Luke 15:18. I have given the adverb the adjective form, in the Greek, because the apostle's meaning is, "I run according to all the rules prescribed, and with the greatest activity; knowing that in no part of the course I am laid on the view of my judge, and that in no part of the course I am viewed in the eyes of spectators." Hence, the Judge of the world, observes how every man behaves in the station assigned to him, and that with as much attention as the judges and spectators observed the manner in which the athlete contended, in the race.]

I am an athlete to the extreme with the gauntlet, used by the athletes, for the purpose of acquiring agility and dexterity in boxing: an allusion also to the great battle, which is a battle for the true battle. This kind of fight Virgil hath described, [Eneid i. 376.]

to others, I myself should be one not approved.

See chap. 31. note. Having passed through this public inquiry into their life and character, the accusations and the constabulary were led to the altar of Jupiter, and there, with their relations, aware they would not be guilty of any fraud or action tending to the breach of the laws of the sacred games. And to excite the ardor of the contestants, the crowns, the rewards of victory, lay in the contest full in their view, on a tripod, or table, placed in the stadium. There were also branches of palm exposed, which the victors were to receive along with the crowns, and which they carried in their hands, as emblematic, says Pindar, of the insuperable vigour of their body and mind.

But though the conquerors, immediately on their gaining the victory, were entitled to the chaplet and the palm, yet Pet. Faber, Agn. lib. 1. c. 30. conjectures, from a passage of Chrysostom, that the victors in the morning could not receive their crown till noon, as if they submitted the specimens, as well as victors, to be subjected to some reproof before the apostle would permit them to receive the reward of victory. In the meantime the apostle, disbelieving, and having the scenes described in the preceding note, was found not to be of the character and station required by the establishment regulations. Such was the office of the herald or eretor in the sacred games. In addition to that office, the apostle calls himself a herald, in the combat for immortality: because he was one of the chief of those who were employed by Christ to introduce him into the stadium, such as contended for the incorruptible crown. He called them to the combat; he declared the kind of combat in which they were to engage; he proclaimed the qualifications necessary in the contestants, and the laws of the battle. Who, he encouraged the contestants, by giving the crowns and palms full in their view.

4. I myself should be one not approved: literally, I myself should be without praise. They all ate the same food one who, when tried in the manner described in the preceding note, was found not to be of the character and station required by the establishment regulations. Besides the previous trial, the Hiero-".

CHAPTER X.

The apostle’s design in this chapter cannot be rightly understood, unless we suppose the Corinthians, in their letter, to have put three questions to him concerning meats sacrificed to idols. First, Whether they might innocently go with their heathen acquaintance into the idol’s temple, and partake of the feasts on the sacrifices which were eaten there in honour of the idol? Secondly, Whether they might buy and eat meats sold in the markets, which had been sacrificed to idols? Thirdly, Whether, when invited to the houses of the heathens, they might eat of meats sacrificed to idols, which were set before them as a common meal? To the first of these questions the apostle answered, chap. vii. That their joining in the heathens in their feasts on the sacrifices in the idol’s temple, even on the supposition that it was a thing in itself innocent, might be a stumbling-block to their weak brethren, in which case it ought to be avoided; but whether such a practice was a thing innocent or sinful in itself, he did not decide on that occasion consider. In this last chapter, therefore, he resumed the subject, that he might treat of it fully, and answer the other questions proposed to him by the Corinthians relative to that matter.

The false teacher, to free the brethren from their scruples respecting the feasts on the sacrifices in the idol’s temple, had, I suppose, told them, that their knowledge and profession of the gospel rendered them so much the objects of envy and hatred of the heathens, that he would not be displeased with them, if, to gain the favour of the heathens, and to save themselves from persecution, they partook of their feasts in the idol’s temple. He added, that whatever influence their eating of these sacrifices might have to pollute them, assuredly their baptism, but especially their eating the Lord’s supper, would have a greater influence to sanctify them. The confutation of these fallacious arguments the apostle brought from what happened to the Israelites, the ancient people of God, who were as much the objects of the divine favour as the disciples of Christ could be. They were led out of Egypt under the cloud, and made to pass through the Red Sea in a miraculous manner, ver. 1.—By being in the cloud and in the sea, they were all baptized into the belief that Moses was commissioned by God to deliver them, ver. 2.—They all ate the same spiritual meat, and drank the same spiritual drink, ver. 3, 4.—In short, they all enjoyed the favour of God, together with the external privilages belonging to his people, in as ample a manner as the Israelites, chap. 3, 4. 5.—To bring these things home to the Corinthians, the apostle told them, that he knew among them such as brought destruction on persons so high in favour with God, are examples to mankind in every age, to prevent them from lurking after the pleasures of the table, as the Israelites luxuriated after the fleshpots of Egypt, ver. 6.—And from becoming idolaters, as many of them became, when, dancing round the altar which Aaron had raised, they worshipped the golden calf in the frantic manner in which the heathens worshipped their idols, ver. 7.—And from omitting the Lord’s supper, as many of them did with the daughters of Moab, for which twenty-three thousand of them were slain in one day, ver. 8.—And from trusting Christ by distrusting his care, as the Israelites tempted God by speaking against him and against Moses, for bringing them out of Egypt to die in the wilderness; and for that great sin were destroyed, ver. 9.—And from murmuring at the restraints laid on them by the gospel, and at the sufferings to which they were exposed in their passage to heaven, as the Israelites murmured on account of the difficulties they had to encounter in taking possession of Canaan, and were destroyed, ver. 10.—All these things, the apostle told the Corinthians, happened to the Israelites as examples, and are written for our instruction, that we may hold courses which are approved so destructive to them, ver. 11.—The horrible of the Israelites with the daughters of Moab, was mentioned to the Corinthians on this occasion with singular propriety, because the Moabish women tempted the Israelites to commit fornication, by inviting them to partake of the sacrifices of their gods; the very thing which the apostle was exhorting the Corinthians to avoid.

As the foregoing facts, recorded in the scriptures, were set before the Corinthians, to shew them how dangerous it is for persons who are the objects of God's favour, and who enjoy great external privileges, to fancy that their sins are not displeasing to God, the apostle drew this conclusion from the whole: 'Wherefore, let him who thinketh he standeth firm in the favour of God, take heed lest he fall,' ver. 13. And by taking notice that the Corinthians were exposed to none but common temptations, he intimates that there was no reason for their being so anxious to gain the favour of the heathens; especially as God, who hath promised to assist his people, is faithful, and will not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able to bear; or with the temptation will make a passage for them out of it, ver. 13.—In short, idotry having proved so ruinous to the ancient Israelites, the apostle earnestly exhorts the Corinthians to 'flee from it,' ver. 14.

But the false teacher, it seems, had told the Corinthians, that their partaking with the heathens in their feasts on the sacrifices in the idol's temple, was not idolatry in persons who knew that an idol is nothing in the world, because to such it was only a common meat. In what follows, therefore, the apostle proved, that such an action was a real worshipping of the idol on whose sacrifice they feasted. And to draw the attention of the Corinthians to what he was going to say, he told them he would speak to them on that subject as to wise men, (an application of which the Greeks were exceedingly fond;) and desired them to judge impartially of what he should say to them, ver. 15.—Do not we, said he, who are the disciples of Christ, consider our joint drinking of the cup in the Lord's supper, as a symbol of our joint partaking of the benefits procured by the shedding of the blood of Christ? and our joint eating of the loaf in the Lord's supper, as a symbol of our joint partaking of the benefits belonging to the body or church of Christ? ver. 16.—And because there is one loaf used in the Lord's supper, we, the many who partake of it, are thereby declared to be one body or society, under the government of one head, and to be animated by the same principles, and to follow the same practices, ver. 17.—The Jews, likewise, entertain the same sentiments with respect to those who join in their religious services. Do we not hold, that the persons who eat of the sacrifices offered to the God of Israel, are joint partakers of his altar; that is, join in the worship performed to him on the altar, and partake of the benefits procured by that worship? ver. 18.—By parity of reason, they who in the idol's temple eat of the sacrifices offered to the idol, are justly considered by the heathens as joining in the worship of their gods, and as declaring their desire jointly to share with them in the blessings which their gods are supposed to bestow. Nay, they consider them as holding communion with them, both in their principles and practices. This application of the argument, indeed, the apostle hath not made; but in the following verse he supposes his readers to have made it; for he adds, What then do I affirm, namely, when I say that your eating the sacrifices of idols is a joint participation in their worship? Do I affirm that an idol is a god? or that the sacrifices offered to idols are sacrifices to beings who are gods? ver. 19.—By no means. But I affirm that the sacrifices which the heathens offer, they offer to demons; that is, to the souls of dead men, and to evil spirits, neither of which are gods; since they have no power in the government of the universe, as the heathens fancy. And I would not have you to be joint partakers with the heathens of demons, either in their principles, their practices, or their expectations, ver. 20.—Besides, the worship of the true God is incompatible with the worship of demons; for it consists in good dispositions and virtuous actions; whereas the worship of demons consists in vile affections, lewdness, and all manner of debauchery. Therefore, ye cannot consistently partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons, ver. 21.—Some of you pretend, that ye eat the sacrifices of idols to shew your belief that an idol is nothing. But I reply, ye thereby provoke the Lord to jealousy; because, by the heathens, your eating of these sacrifices is considered as an honouring and worshipping of the idol. Now, before ye give the heathens reason to think that ye pay to their idols the honour which is due to Christ, ye should know that ye are stronger than Christ, to defend yourselves against his wrath, ver. 22.

With respect to the questions, whether the meats sacrificed to idols, which were sold in the markets, might be eaten by Christians; and whether they might eat of these meats in the houses of the heathens, when set before them as a common, not as a religious meal; the apostle observed, first, that although under the gospel all meats are lawful to every person, all meats are not expedient for every person. And even in cases where they are expedient, the eating of them may not tend to the edification of others, ver. 23.—Secondly, that in the use of meats, one ought to study, not his own advantage only, but the advantage of his neighbour also, ver. 24.—And having laid down these principles, he desired the Corinthians to eat whatever was sold in the shambles, without inquiring whether it had been sacrificed to idols or not; because they knew that idols have no dominion over the world, but that the earth is the Lord's, and all that it contains, ver. 25, 26.—And if a heathen invited them to his house, and they inclined to go, they were to eat whatever was set before them, taking no questions for conscience' sake; because by no reasonable construction could that action be considered as a worshipping of idols, even though the meat they were going to eat had been sacrificed to an idol, ver. 27.—But if, on such an occasion, either a heathen, or a Jew, or a weak Christian, should say to them, this is meat sacrificed to an idol, they were to abstain from it, on account of the weak conscience of him who showed it; because, by declaring that he considered the eating of that meat as a partaking in the worship of the idol to whom it had been offered, ver. 28.—If thou reply, Why should my liberty be governed by another's opinion? and say, God hath allowed me to eat all kinds of meat, why should I be blamed for eating any particular meat, for which I give God thanks? ver. 29, 30.—My answer is, For the very reason that by the free gift of God all his good creatures are bestowed on thee, thou art bound, in eating and drinking, as in all thy actions, to consult the glory of God, who has commanded thee, even in indifferent actions, to consider what may be good for the edification of others, ver. 31.—I therefore exhort you, in using your Christian liberty, to become no occasion of stumbling, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God, ver. 32.—This is the rule I myself follow; not seeking mine own advantage only, but the advantage of others also, that they may be saved, ver. 33.—And ye should become imitators of me in this disinterestedness, even as I also am therein an imitator of Christ, chap. x. 1.—By telling the Corinthians that he followed this rule, and that, in following it, he imitated the disinterestedness of Christ, he instanced, that the behaviour of the false teacher was of a different kind. He regarded only his own gratification and profit, and had no regard to the advantage of others.
I. CORINTHIANS.

Commentary.

1. Ye think yourselves so much in favour with God, that he will not be displeased though ye eat the sacrifices of idols. But I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and all did eat the same spiritual meat, (Exod. xvi. 12.)

2. And did drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of the spiritual rock, which followed them; and Christ, the rock, (ver. 2.)

3. Nevertheless, with the greater part of them God was not well pleased, for they were cast down in the wilderness.

4. Now, these things have become examples unto us, (ver. 11.)

5. Ye are we, in order that we should not be lusted after evil things, even as they lusteth. Neither be ye idolaters, as some of them were; as it is written, (Exod. xxxii. 6.)

6. The people sat down unto eat and to drink, and rose up to dance. Neither let us commit whoredom, as some of them committed.

7. Ver. 1. Our fathers, that is, our predecessors in the church of God. For to the Corinthian church Jesus, being crucified, committed the same, the cross, to the unbelieving Corinthians. The doctrine of the cross was not preached to the Corinthians, but to the Gentiles. The apostle makes this here, that none should imagine that he had not the cross with him, but only a part of it, the cross, which was without arms, and in itself, not the power of God. For the apostle is speaking to a congregation that had the cross; he had it before his eyes: therefore the Corinthians, who had the true cross, had not the gospel, which is that which is from heaven. And in this verse, it is nowhere else intimated, that the Corinthians had the true cross; for though the apostle saith he was at Corinth, yet he doth not say, that he had the true cross with him, except in this place.

Ver. 2. In the cloud in the sea. For the Israelites, being led by the Egyptians under the cloud, and by passing through the Red Sea, were made to declare their belief in the Lord, and in his servant Moses, (Exod. xvi. 10.)

Ver. 3. The same spiritual meat. The manna, called by the Corinthians, the same spiritual meat, gave the same spiritual nourishment which they typified were the same with those typified by the bread in the Lord's supper, John v. 31. in which the Corinthians are, and by which they thought themselves as being fed by eating the Lord's supper. He doth not say, that the Corinthians had not the bread of life; but he saith, that they had not the spiritual drink, which was typified by beer, (Exod. xvi. 3.) and that he called that beer of Egypt: and this the apostle says, to wit, that because they had not the spiritual drink, they could not have the spiritual meat and drink.

Ver. 4. He drank of the rock, and the rock struck out water for them. The rock, in the wilderness of Sinai, which was their eleventh station after they came out of Egypt, and before they came to Mount Sinai, consequently it happened in the first year of the Exodus. This food was water brought from the river, at Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin, which was their thirty-third station, and this happened in the forty-third year of the Exodus, even after Miriam's death, Num. x. 1. To both places the name of Meribah was given: but the latter was called Meribah Kadesh, to distinguish it from Meribah in the wilderness of Sin, which was the rock's cave, which the Hebrews usually call Noah. This rock, in the wilderness of Kadesh, was a rock, or stone, against which the Hebrews beat water, as Moses' disciples did. The rock here is the rock of Kadesh, the rock out of which water was struck for the Israelites. And this is the rock in the wilderness, which the apostle speaks of, that which was struck out water, that was struck by Moses; for it was the rock of Kadesh, that was struck out water. Then came the rock into the wilderness, and there the apostle saith, that he drank of the rock; and this rock is the rock of Kadesh, out of which water was struck for the Israelites.

Ver. 5. The rock, as in the former clause, is put for the water that came out of the rock. Water was twice brought from a rock by a manner of the Israelites in the wilderness. Once in Rephidim in the wilderness of Sin, which was their eleventh station after they came out of Egypt, and before they came to Mount Sinai, consequently it happened in the first year of the Exodus. The history of this miracle we have, Exod. xvi. 8. The second time water was brought from the river, at Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin, which was their thirty-third station. This happened in the forty-third year of the Exodus, even after Miriam's death, Num. x. 1. To both places the name of Meribah was given: but the latter was called Meribah Kadesh, to distinguish it from Meribah in the wilderness of Sin, which was the rock's cave, which the Hebrews usually call Noah. This rock, in the wilderness of Kadesh, was a rock, or stone, against which the Hebrews beat water, as Moses' disciples did. The rock here is the rock of Kadesh, out of which water was struck for the Israelites. And this is the rock in the wilderness, which the apostle speaks of, that which was struck out water, that was struck by Moses; for it was the rock of Kadesh, that was struck out water. Then came the rock into the wilderness, and there the apostle saith, that he drank of the rock; and this rock is the rock of Kadesh, out of which water was struck for the Israelites. of them committed whoredom, and fell in one day, twenty-thousand thousand. 38 Nor let us grieve the Holy Spirit of God, as even some of them grieved, 39 (Num. xxi. 5.), and perished (και) by serpents. 40 Neither let us offend one another, as even some of them offended, and perished by the destroyer. 41 (Num. xiv. 29.)

11 Now all these things happened to them as examples of ours, and are written for our admonition, 2 upon whom the ends of the ages are come. 12 Wherefore, let him who thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall. 13 Ye temptation hath taken you, but such as belong to man; and God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will make with the temptation also a passage out, that ye may be able to bear.

14 Wherefore, my beloved, flee from idolatries.

15 I speak as to wise men; (see chap. iv. 10.) judge ye what I say. 16 The cup of blessing, (supp., εὐλαβή, for which we bless, is it not the joint participation of the body of Christ?) to which we break, is it not the joint participation of the body of Christ? 17 (I Cor. 10. 24.) Because there is one loaf; we are many one body; for we all partake of that one loaf. 18 Look at Israel after the flesh. 1 Are not the apostles to the Corinthians because they had practised whoredom as an act of worship acceptable to their deity. See Pref. to this Epist. sect. 2. Nay, after their conversion, some of them had not altered their manners in that particular, 2 Cor. xi. 22. 2 And fell in one day twenty-thousand thousand. 24 Twenty-four thousand are said, Num. xxx. 9, to have died of the plague. But if the number be increased to thirty thousand, and less than twenty-four, it might be expressed in round numbers either way. 19 Ver. 1. Neither let us tempt Christ. That Christ after his resurrection was invested with the government of the world is evident from his own words, Matt. xxviii. 18 and from Eph. i. 20, 21, 22. Wherefore, when the Corinthians, to avoid persecution, joined the heathen in their idolatrous feasts, they showed great disregard for the power and goodness of their Master's government. This the apostle justly terms a 'grievous tempting of Christ.' 20 But as even some of these apostles perished, the person tempted by the Israelites was Christ, because he is omnipresent, and is with all. But that supposition breaks down the person who spoke the law to the Israelites at Sinai, contrary, I think, to Heb. i. 1, where it is said, God who spoke to the fathers by the prophets, being the person who spoke to us by his Son. For God who spoke to the fathers by the prophets, being the person who has spoken to us by his Son, he cannot be the same. See also Heb. ii. 2, 3, xii. 26. I therefore think the person tempted by the Israelites was God the Father, and that the word God might be supplied as properly as the word Christ. Yet I have not ventured to insert it in the translation, lest it should be thought too bold an innovation; though I am sensible it is the true method of completing the sense. 3 And perished by serpents. 4 In the history these are called fiery serpents. It is of opinion that these serpents were of the dippas kind, which Lucian had described in his treatise entitled Ἡδονή, where, speaking of the deserts of Libya, he says, 'Of all the serpents which inhabit these solitudes, the most cruel is the dippas, no bigger than a viper, but whose sting causes most diabolical pains, even to death. For it is a gross venom which burns, breeds breaths, and purifies; and those who are afflicted with it die as if they were in the fire.' For an account of the dippas, see Kolbe's State of the Case of Good Hope, vol. ii. p. 160.

Ver. 10. Perished (καταπέπλησαν) by the destroyer. — This destroyer was called by the Jews the angel of death, and Snemol. He is called, Heb. xi. 38. 'He whom God had made the wielder of death, that is, the devil,' and Heb. xii. 28. ὁ παρελθόντας, 'He who destroyed the Branch.' 11. 11. Now all these things happened to them as examples. 11. 1. The apostle's meaning is, that punishment inflicted on others in a public and extraordinary manner, makes examples of the divine vengeance on their own generation, and to all succeeding ages which have any knowledge of their history.

1. I. CORINTHIANS. 170

whoredom with the daughters of Moab, and were slain in one day twenty-thousand thousand; 41 as, even many of the Israelites tempted God by saying he had brought them to die in the wilderness, and perished by serpents.

9 Neither let us grieve the Holy Spirit of God, as even many of the Israelites murmured when they heard the report of the spicery, and perished by the destroyer.

11. Now all these things (as I said before, ver. 6.) happened to the Israelites as examples, and are written for our admonition, who have seen the end of the Mosaic ages, that we may not sin in the expectation, that because we are the people of God we shall not be punished. 12 Wherefore, let him who thinketh he standeth firmly fixed in the divine favour, by being in the church, and by using the sacraments, take heed lest he fall.

13 Your joining the heathens in their idol feasts, to avoid persecution, is inexorable. No temptation hath as yet taken you, but 14, it may be, is moderate. 15 As to what is future, God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what ye are able; but will make with the temptation also a passage out. This I declare to you, that, believing God's promise, ye may be able to bear till the promised relief come.

16 Wherefore, my beloved, trust in God, and flee from the idolatrous feasts of the heathen.

17 To show that the eating of the sacrifice in the idol's temple is a real worshipping of the idol, I will speak as to wise men; judge ye concerning the force of the following argument.

18 The cup of blessing in the Lord's supper, for which we bless God, and which we drink, is it not the symbol of our joint participation of the body of Christ? 19 The loaf which we break, is it not the symbol of our joint participation of the benefits belonging to the body or church of Christ? 20 Because there is one loaf in the Lord's supper, we the many disciples of Christ are thereby shown to be one society, whose principles, practices, and hopes, are the same; for, to declare this, we all participate of that one loaf.

21 Look at the natural Israel: Are not they who eat of their sacrifices, 2 Admonition. — Μη γάρ ἔσται literally signifies, the putting of the mind in a proper posture for action by good instruction.

3. On the ends of the ages are come. — This may mean the end of the Mosaic dispensation, whose duration was measured by ages or judaics. — See Rom. xi. 25, note 3. Or it may signify the last dispensation of religion. For there was the patriarchal age or dispensation, the Mosaic age, and the gospel age. — Ver. 13. But such as belongs to man is such as is moderate. So the word is used, 2 Sam. vii. 14. 'I will cherish them with the rod of men;' I will cherish them in moderation. At the same time the apostist wrote this, the Corinthians had not been greatly persecuted, 1 Cor. iv. 8.

Ver. 16. — Which we bless. — ὑπὲρ ὑπαγωγής, literally, for which we speak good words of praise and thanksgiving. Matt. vi. 6. where this blessing is interpreted by the giving of thanks. This phrase here, denotes the whole communicants joining together in blessing God over the cup, for his mercy in redeeming the world, through the blood of Christ. For both Luke and Paul, in their account of the institution, express this part of the service as μετὰ ἐπίτροπος, having given thanks. Hence the service itself hath long borne the name of the Eucharist, or thanksgiving, by way of eminence.

2. In it (ἐν αὐτῷ) the joint participation of the blood, &c. — For the different significations of the word συμμετέχω, see 1 John i. 3, note. 3. This account of the Lord's supper the apostle gave, to show the Corinthians, that as by eating thereof the partakers declare they have the same object of worship, the same faith, the same hope, and the same dispositions with the persons whom they join in this act of religion, and that they will follow the same course of life: so is all reasonable construction, by eating the sacrifices of idols, the partakers declare that they are of the same faith and practice with the worshippers of idols; that they have the same objects of worship with them; and that they expect to share with them in the benefits to be derived from that worship.

Ver. 17. — Because there is (εἰς τὸν τοίχον) one loaf. — The Greek word τοίχον, especially when joined with words of number, always signifies a loaf, and is so translated in our Bibles. Matt. xxi. 24. 'Do ye not understand, neither remember the five (τρίτας) loaves of the five thousand?' Matt. iv. 3. 'Command that these stones be made (εἰς τοίχον) bread.'

2. We the many — ἐκ τῶν διπλωμάτων, here, and ver. 22. signifies the whole community of Christians; just as εἰς τὸν τοίχον signifies all mankind. The same signification is εἰς τὸν τοίχον, in Rom. v. 19.

3. Are one body. — The interpretation of this phrase given in the commentary, is confirmed by the apostle himself, in 1 Cor. xii. 12, where, in allusion to our drinking of the cup in the Lord's supper, he says, 'And all have been made to drink.' — And all have been made to drink from the same cup. — Ver. 3. on that verse.

Ver. 16. — Look at Israel after the flesh. — Ἰσραήλ αὐτὸν ἐπιθύμησαν, signifies the natural descendants of Israel, who worshipped God by sacrifices, considered by them as joint partakers in the worship performed on the altar. By parity of reason, they who eat of the idol sacrifice, partake in the worship of the idol, and consecrate their persons to it.

19 What then do I affirm? That an idol is any thing, or that an idol sacrifice is any thing?

20 No: But that what the heathens sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God.

(20) Now, I would not have you to become joint partakers with demons.

1 Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons: ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons.

22 Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he?

23 All meats are lawful to me, but all are not expedient, (see ch. vi. 12;) all are lawful to me, but all do not edify.

24 Let no man seek his own advantage only, but each that (be int. Rom. xiii. 8. note) of his neighbour also.

25 Whatever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no question (1 cor. 112;) on account of conscience.

26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. (Psal. xxii. 1.)

27 And if any of the unbelievers invite you, and ye incline to go, whatever is set before you, eat, asking no question on account of conscience.

28 But if any one say to you, This is a thing sacrificed to an idol, do not eat on account of him who showed it, and of conscience; for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

(29) Now, I say conscience, not thine own, but that of the other.

(20) Beware of being judged by another's conscience.

29 Besides, if by grace I be a partaker, why am I made to speak for that which I give thanks?

sacrifices according to the law. For there is an 'Israel after the spirit,' a spiritual Israel, consisting of believers of all nations. These are called 'the Israel of God,' Gal. vi. 16.

2. Partners of the altar.—This argument, drawn from the sentiments of the Jews, was used with peculiar propriety in reasoning with the false apostle, who was a Jew, and who, to ingratiate himself with the Corinthians, had encouraged them to eat of the idol sacrifice.

Ver. 20—1. They sacrifice to demons.—The word ἱερατεύουσ—I have in the LXX. denote the οἱ ἱερατεύοντες τῶν σαλπίγγων, which is called by Josephus Bell lib. vi. c. 6, says 'demons are the spirits of wicked men.' It is therefore probable, that the writer of the New Testament used the word ἱερατεύοντες in the same sense, especially as it is well known that the greatest part of the heathen gods were devilish. The heathens worshipped two kinds of demons—the one kind were the gods of kings and heroes, visited after death, but who could not give any assurance in human affairs; the other kind of demons were those evil spirits, who, under the names of Jupiter, Apollo, Thrombaison, &c., inciting the heathen priests and princes to deliver oracles, greatly promulgated idolatry. See 1 Cor. xiv. 32, note 2.

2. What is a demon?—The heathen in general had no idea of God; that is, of an unoriginated, eternal, immutable, and infinitely perfect Being, the Creator and Governor of all things. Ver. 21.—1. The cup of demons.—In the heathen sacrifices, the priests, before they poured the wine upon the victim, tasted it themselves; then carried it to the offering, and to those who came with them, that they also might taste it, as joining in the sacrifice, and receiving benefit from it. Thus Virgil, Aen. viii. 273.

Quae ago, O jussa, tantum in mensae blandum, Quae sibi carnem, et pecuda purpurea doctras, Communemque vocare deum, et date vina volentes.

2. Of the table of demons:—that is, of the sacrifice offered to demons, which was eaten on a table in the demon's temple. See chap. xii. 16. note 1. Ver. 22. Provoke the Lord to jealousy!—This is an allusion to Exod. xxi. 5, where, after prohibiting the worshipping of images God added, 'I was jealous for the Lord thy God am a jealous God.'

Ver. 25. All meats are lawful.—As the apostle is speaking of meats sacrificed to idols, this word meats, not things, must be supplied here.

Ver. 29. On account of conscience.—Besides what is expressed in the commentary, this may imply one's belief in the sovereign dispensation of God and his disclaiming all dependence on idols.

Ver. 25. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.—For the meaning of this passage, see Col. iii. 9, note 1. By this argument the apostle taught the Corinthians, that their knowledge and faith in Christ should hinder them from asking any questions concerning their food, which might lead the heathens to think that they acknowledged the power of their demons, either to give or withhold any part of the fulness of the earth from the worshippers of the true God.

Ver. 28.—1. This is a thing sacrificed to an idol; do not eat.—The heathens often in their own houses made an ordinary feast of a part of the sacrifice, chap. vii. 1, note 1. To these entertainments the apostle told the Corinthian brethren they might lawfully go, when invited. But on such occasions, if a Christian domestic or slave, by informing them that this or that dish consisted of things which had been sacrificed to an idol, signified that they discontinued their eating these things as sinful, they were to abstain from them for the reasons mentioned in the text.

2. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.—This clause is omitted in the Alex. Clermont, and other MSS., and in the
I. CORINTHIANS.

31 (verse 132.) Therefore, whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.¹

32 (Acts 21, 24.) Ye are no occasion to the Jews to stumble, neither to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God.

33 Even as I purpose to please all men in all things, not seeking my own advantage only, but that of the many also, that by rendering myself acceptable to them, I may promote their salvation to the great glory of God.

CHAPTER XI.

1 Become ye imitators of me, even as I also am of Christ. (Rom. xv. 3.)

Syrian, Arabic, and Vulgate versions: some critics think it disturbs the sense. But it renders the argument more complete; for the following verse, it makes the Lord's discourse clearer. Having allowed men a sufficiency of other wholesome food, no one is under any necessity of offending those who are either ignorant or apprehensive, by eating a particular kind.

Ver. 3. Do all to the glory of God. By this precept the apostle hath taught us, that our greatest duty is to promote the glory of God, by regulating all our actions according to his will; that in many particular actions we ought to have God's glory actually in view, and in all the rest habitually, and that we should be his faithful servants,

From the things written in this chapter, and in chap. xiv. ver. 34, 35, 36, it appears that some of the Corinthian women, on pretence of being inspired, had prayed and prophesied in the Christian assemblies as teachers; and while performing these offices, had cast off their veils, after the manner of the heathen priestesses in their ecstasies. These disorderly practices, the false teacher, it seems, had encouraged, ver. 16, from a desire to ingratiate himself with the female part of the Corinthian church. But the apostle's adherents, sensible that it did not become the women to be teachers of the men, had restrained them. And this having occasioned disputes between the church and the faction, the church, in their letter, applied to the apostle for his decision. In answer, he first of all commended them for having held fast his traditions or ordinances concerning the public worship of God, ver. 2. Next, he explained the foundation on which his ordinances relating to the public worship were built, and the subordination of all men to Christ, and of woman to man, and the subordination of Christ to God. For by this subordination the behaviour, both of men and women, in the public assemblies, was to be regulated, ver. 3. Every man, says the apostle, who prayeth or prophesieth in public with his head veiled, dishonoureth Christ his head; who, having given man authority over woman, is dishonoured when he renounceth that authority, by appearing veiled in the presence of the woman as her inferior, ver. 4. On the other hand, every woman who prayeth or prophesieth in public with an unveiled head, dishonoureth the man her head; because the wearing of a veil being an expression of inferiority, by appearing in public unveiled, she renounceth her subjection to the man her superior, and setteth herself on an equality with him. Besides, for a woman to throw off her veil in public, was the same kind of indecency as to appear with her head shaven, ver. 5. Wherefore, says the apostle, if it be a shame for a woman to appear in public shorn or shaven, let her be veiled, ver. 6. Further, the different mental and bodily accomplishments of man and woman shew, that in the public assemblies for worship men ought not to be veiled, nor women unveiled, ver. 7. The subjection of woman to man appears even from the man's being first made, and from the woman's being made for the man, ver. 8, 9. For which reason the woman ought to have a veil on her head in the church.
join them, except their own adherents. To correct these unholy practices, the apostle told them, their coming together into one place was not all that was necessary to the right eating of the Lord’s supper: they ought to have eaten it together in a body, as jointly bearing witness to the truth of Christ’s death and resurrection, and in testimony of their love to one another as his disciples, ver. 20. —They had erred likewise in another respect: the different companies first took their own supper, of viands which they brought into the church ready prepared; and joined thereto the Lord’s supper, making it a part of a common meal or feast. And many of them sinned against the poor, who had no supper to bring, by excluding them from partaking with them, not only of the previous feast, but of the Lord’s supper itself; so that some were hungry on these occasions, while others were plentifully fed, ver. 21. —What, said the apostle to them sharply, have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or, by making the church of God a place of feasting, do ye mistakethe meal for a heathen temple, and put your poor brethren to shame who have no supper to eat? ver. 22. —These feasts previous to the Lord’s supper, seem to have been introduced by the Corinthians, by reason of their liberty. The church of Corinth was the most liberal of all the churches; and in the Colossians 2:2, we find that the Lord’s supper was introduced by the Corinthians, before they had observed the Lord’s supper together, ver. 23. —and to eat at home if they were hungry. The rest of their irregularities respecting that matter, he promised to rectify when he came to Corinth, ver. 24.

CHAP. XI. —I. CORINTHIANS. View. 179.

3 But I would have you know, that of every man the head is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; (Gen. iii. 16. Eph. v. 23.) and the head of Christ is God. (See 1 Cor. iii. 21. note, and chap. xv. 27, 28. notes.)

4 Every man who prayeth or prophesieth, (see chap. xiv. 3. note.) having a veil upon his head, dishonoureth his head. (See 1 Cor. xi. 3.) And every woman who prayeth or prophesieth with an unveiled head, dishonoureth her head. (1 Tim. ii. 9.) Besides, it is one and the same with being shaven.

Ver. 2. Because (supplied in all things ye remember me.)

We have the same form of expression, ch. 2:20. —On the clause (esters. 5:2.) may be translated as hath done. —From nœa nœnurminis, ad verb. —Ye have remembered all my instructions.

Ver. 4. Having a veil upon his head, dishonoureth his head. —The man who prayeth or prophesieth in the presence of another, or with a veil upon his head, by wearing that sign of inferiority on such occasions, dishonoreth his head Christ, who hath subject women to men, and in particular hath authorized men to teach them. See chap. iv. 31, 32.

Ver. 5. —And every woman who prayeth or prophesieth. —Because they who prophesy, and pray, and bless the Lord with musical instruments, are said, 1 Chron. xxix. 20. —because the priests of God, who prophesy and send hymns to that God, in the church of Ephraim, are said, 1 Kings xii. 29. to have prophesied the whole day of the evening sacrifice; many, by the women’s praying and prophesying, understand their singing in the public prayers and praises as a part of the congregation. Yet as it is reasonable to think, that the prophesying and prophesying of the men, was of the same kind with the prayer and prophesying of the women who acted as teachers, mentioned ver. 1. we may suppose the Corinthians women affected to perform these offices in the public assemblies, on presence of their being imparted, and though the apostle in this place hath not condemned that practice, it does not follow that he allowed it, or that it was allowed in any church. His reason here was not to forbid, but to condemn the indecent manner in which it had been performed. For the worst manner of prayer and prophesying is often done by women, who felt the presence of their inferiorty, by those marks of respect which the customs of the countries where they live have established as the propriety of prayer. And therein it is not a matter of propriety to be covered in a public assembly, and of inferiority to be uncovered. And the confusion of the east were the reverse of ours. —The veil used by the eastern women was so large as to cover a great part of their body. This appears from Ruth’s veil, which held six measures of
I. CORINTHIANS.

6 Wherefore, if a woman be not veiled, even let her be shorn, but it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be veiled.

7 Now man, indeed, ought not to veil the head, but woman; for this is a glory of God; but woman is the glory of man.

8 (1 Tim. 2, 11.) Besides, man is not of woman, but woman is of man.

9 (KJV, 9:7.) And also, man was not created (for) the woman, but the woman for the man.

10 (Acts 28, 18.) For this reason ought the woman to have a veil on her head, as the custom of the churches; for this is a symbol of weakness, but salvation is from God.

11 (1 Tim. 2, 11.) However, neither is man without woman, nor woman without man, in the Lord. (See 2 Cor. 11. 7.)

12 (Eph. 5, 27.) Besides, as the woman is (from) the man, so also the man is (for) the woman, (see 1 Pet. 3, 11.)

13 Judge in yourselves, (be you) it decent that a woman pray to God unveiled?

14 Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man indeed have long hair, it is a disgrace to him?

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her; for her hair is given her (for) a veil.

16 (a) However, if any one (be) unwilling to be contented, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

17 (a) Now, when I declare this, I praise you not, that ye come together, not for the better, but for the worse.

18 For first, I hear when ye come together, barley, Ruth iii. 15.—A veil of this sort, called a pleat, was worn not long ago by the women in Scotland.

3. It is one of the most important wholesomeness of women, to appear unveiled before any of the men, excepted in the family of their husbands. Thus Rebecca veil'd her self on seeing Isaac, Gen. xxv. 65.—The modesty of women appearing unveiled in an assembly of men, the apostle illustrated by observing, that if it was one and the same thing with being shaven; for, as he tells us, ver. 15, their hair was given them for a veil to improve their beauty. The eastern ladies, considering their hair as their principal ornament, were at great pains in dressing it. Hence, before they left their houses, and went out into the streets, they spent a considerable time in dressing their hair. And if they desire to have hair, and that in a proper manner, they will have to be veiled, when in the public assembly, for the performance of the office of teaching, and for their respect to the bishops. Others think good angels are meant here, who are ministering spirits that are before the presence of the throne of the glory of God, Col. i. 16. See the following note, and ver. 15, note.

Ver. 6. But if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, how disgraceful it was for the Greek women to be shaven, or veiled! The ancient Greeks punished women guilty of adultery by shaving their heads. So Tacitus tells us, De moribus Germanorum. The Jews also punished adulteresses in the same manner. Eusebius thinks that custom is mentioned, Numb. x. 19.—Shorn, as distinguished from shaven, means to have the hair cropped.

Ver. 7. Being the image of God, 1.—Namely, in respect of the dominion with which he is clothed. For, in respect of mental qualities, the woman is also the image of God. The men is the image of God, because he is the head of the woman; but though there is no example, either in sacred or profane writers, of the word shorn being used to denote a veil, yet all agree that it can have no other meaning in this passage. Hence, in his note on 1 Tim. ii. 25 edd. give us his opinion, that because the Hebrew word rosh (which comes from the verb rosh, to have power) signifies a veil, the apostle uses the word rosh, power, to denote a veil, because the Hebrew women clothed themselves in preference to the men, in token of their being under their power. A like figurative sense of the word circumference we have in Acts vii. 8, where it is called a covenant, because it was a token or sign of God's covenant with Abraham. Go, according to the account of the angel, (ver. 22.) times signifies evil angels, 1 Cor. xi. 15. Do ye not know that we shall judge angels? Jude, ver. 6.—The angels who kept not their first estate.—Eve having been seduced by evil angels to eat the forbidden fruit, and all her children were punished for that sin, by being subjected to the rule of their husbands. The apostle foretells the same thing, that the women would be subjected to the same thing as the men. The apostle foretold the same thing, that the women, according to whose customs the woman's veil was a token of subjection, would be subjected to the public assemblies for worship, and that remembering their first mother's seduction by evil angels, they might be sensible of their own frailty, and behave with humility. See 1 Tim. ii. 11—Others, by the angels, understand the bishops, who are styled 'angels of the churches,' Rev. i. 20. For they suppose the women were intended to be veiled, when in the public assembly, for the performance of the office of teaching, and for their respect to the bishops. Others think good angels are meant here, who are ministering spirits that are before the presence of the throne of God, Col. i. 16. The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth to a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment. The word garment is here used in a metaphorical sense, and is applied to the female apparel, as being like a garment, or mantle, covering the body. As it is improvement to their beauty, and to their comeliness, so there is a beauty in their apparel, which is peculiar to women, and is suitable to their sex. The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth to a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment. The word garment is here used in a metaphorical sense, and is applied to the female apparel, as being like a garment, or mantle, covering the body. As it is improvement to their beauty, and to their comeliness, so there is a beauty in their apparel, which is peculiar to women, and is suitable to their sex.

eat the Lord’s supper, there are divisions among you; ye sit down in separate companies at separate tables, as being at variance among yourselves; and I wholly believe it.

19 For, as men have different views of things, and are often guided by their lusts, there will be heresies among you; which God permits, that those who are approved of him may be made known among you.

20 But your coming together into one house, is not to eat the Lord’s supper, unless you eat it in fellowship together and with mutual love, as the disciples of one master.

21 For when you eat, every one with his own party taketh first his own supper which he hath brought; and the poor being excluded, one party is hungry on that occasion, and another is plentifully fed.

22 What! have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? Or do ye think all of you that the churches of God are naked?

23 And I partly receive you a little, but I receive you not that which is in that spirit which I receive, for God is not mocked.

24 And, having given thanks, I brake and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Corinthians was in that holy manner of eating the Lord’s supper; the second was the wrong use, which they made of their spiritual gifts, chap. xiv. And as they were committed in their public assemblies, he told them very properly, that they came together, not for the better, but for the worse.

2. There are divisions. As the word σχισμα must be translated here, because the word had not formed any separate church at Corinth, but had occasioned mutually hateful divisions in the church there; of which this was one bad effect, that they celebrated in almost separate companies at separate tables, which the apostle with great propriety termed σατανας, = Satan.

3. And I partly receive you a little, but I receive you not that which is in that spirit which I receive, for God is not mocked.

For in the passage, the Spirit is represented as something different from, and worse than the diseases mentioned in the preceding verse. By the account given of them in other passages of Scripture, those also are spoken of as diseases, obstinately maintained by the heathen, in opposition to his own conclusions, for the purposes of authoring bad practices, and making gain. See 1 Cor. xii. 21 note 3.

25 But I received from the Lord Jesus, by immediate revelation, what also I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, took bread;

26 And, having given thanks, I brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Accordingly, what is termed, ver. 18, ‘a coming together in the church,’ is called, ver. 19, ‘a coming together into one house.’

26 But I received from the Lord Jesus, by immediate revelation, what also I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, took bread;

27 And, having given thanks, I brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Those who have not a supper, may be transacted with at any time. Those who are poor.

27 But I received from the Lord Jesus, by immediate revelation, what also I delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which he was betrayed, took bread;

28 And, having given thanks, I brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Those who have not a supper, may be transacted with at any time. Those who are poor.

28 And, having given thanks, I brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

Ver. 21. As the word is sometimes used in the original, to denote a portion, and not a whole. In the Gospel, there is no such use of the word. In this case, it must be understood to mean, that the poor were excluded; and that the Lord’s supper was taken by the rich, in a spirit of pride, vanity, and vainglory.

29 For the word is not of our own, but God’s, who also hath given it to us to make known.

Now, therefore, what we are to believe and to observe in respect of the Lord’s supper, is to receive it, not in a spirit of exclusion, but of love and mutual kindness, as the followers of Christ should do. To partake of the Lord’s supper, as a spiritual food, is, indeed, a privilege of the children of God, and the more so, because it is a spiritual feast, and the more so, because it is a spiritual feast, and a token of their being united to one another, and to Christ.

30 When ye come together therefore, it is not to eat the Lord’s supper.

Ver. 22. As the apostle mentions the two causes of the disorder of the church, he speaks of the proper cause first, and of the effect next.

31 For when ye come together, this is not to eat the Lord’s supper.

In the passage, the Spirit is represented as something different from, and worse than the diseases mentioned in the preceding verse. By the account given of them in other passages of Scripture, those also are spoken of as diseases, obstinately maintained by the heathen, in opposition to his own conclusions, for the purposes of authoring bad practices, and making gain. 24 And, having given thanks, I brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

I. CORINTHIANS.

25 In like manner also the cup, after he had supped, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do ye, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

26 (1 Cor. 11.) Wherefore, as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye openly publish the death of the Lord, till the time he come.

27 (1 Cor. 11.) For then, whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup, of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

28 But let a man examine himself, and so eat of this bread, and drink of this cup.

29 For for this cause God both commandeth men by a particular church, not in separate companies, but, as making one harmonious society, by whose joint concurrence and communion in the service, the death of their Master and of his sacrifice was publicly and stedfastly proclaimed, but declared in the most public manner to the world, as a fact known and believed by all Christians from the beginning of the Church, every year, in the anniversary of the day on which he was crucified and died, especially when the epitaph was then erected to him. See Heb. vi. 12. Note 21.

30 Our Lord did not mean, that the new covenant was made at this time he died his body; it was made immediately after the fall, on account of the merits of his obedience to the death, which God then considered as accomplished, and for which he was accepted and glorified at the time determined.

31 This day do as often as ye drink it. According to the apostles, this implies that the cup in the Lord's supper sometimes be omitted; and on that purpose they have devised the cup to the holy, but how justly may be known, by taking notice that the word, as often as, is applied, ver. 26, in the present version, not to the cup, but to the whole service.

32 Besides, Matthew hath told us, that when Christ gave the cup, he said, chap. xxii. 20. 'Drink ye all of it,' which being both an invitation and a command, all Christians are as much entitled to the cup as to the bread.

33 Ver. 28.—1. Wherefore. 2. The attentive reader must be sensible, that this verse does not contain, as in the common version, a proof of what goes before. It is an inference from the preceding verses; consequently the Greek particle πάντα, with which it is introduced, is used in its double, not in its causal signification.

34 As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye openly publish the death of the Lord, and declare it for our instruction; but more effectually publish it, ver. 27. For ye often increase the signification of the word with which it is compounded. The drinking of the cup, being introduced to a public declaration of the death of the Lord, further of them can be omitted without sin. And the virtue of that declaration, as was already observed, consisting in its being made by the whole church or assembly as accurately in το Κορινθιανόν, erew, and in the Corinthians, especially in the two latter, the means of this service, and of the Lord's supper, being only, according to the same, the shelter and the comfort of their faith, and the sacrifice of the Lord, who gave it to them, that they might have communion with him in the death and resurrection of his body. Having, as we are used to say, been linked together in such an act: and in the course of it annually being repeated, and as in the common version, all Christians are as much entitled to the cup as to the bread.

35 Ver. 28. The Romish universalists, who make the whole Roman Church the subject of the bond of a fiction, or to promote some worldly purpose, shall be guilty of profaning the symbols of the body and blood of the Lord. See ver. 24, note 3.
I. CORINTHIANS.

30 For this cause, many among you are sick, and infirm, and a good number are dead.

31 (1 Tim. v. 25.) But, if we would make a difference in ourselves, we should not be disapproved.

33 But being judged of the Lord, we are corrected; that we may not with the world be condemned.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, eatocardially receive one another.

34 And if any one hunger, let him eat at home; that ye may not come together to punishment. And the rest I will set in order when I come.

Because ye eat and drink in an improper manner, many among you are disordered and languishing, and a good number are dead in consequence of God's displeasure.

31 But if we would make a difference in ourselves, by eating the Lord's supper with dispositions different from those with which we eat a common meal, we should not be disapproved.

32 But being judged of the Lord because we have not made a difference in our eating, we are corrected to bring us to repentance, that we may not with the ungodly be condemned, at the day of judgment.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat the Lord's supper, cordially receive one another, that ye may perform that service jointly as the disciples of one Master.

34 And if any person be hungry before he eats the Lord's supper, let him eat at home, that ye may not come together to punishment by feasting in the church. And what else requires to be corrected in this matter, I will give orders about it when I come to Corinth.

CHAPTER XII.

VIEW AND ILLUSTRATION OF THE SUBJECTS TREATED IN THIS CHAPTER.

The spiritual men at Corinth having had great dissensions among themselves about the comparative excellence of their several gifts, and the honour which was due to each on account of his particular gift, the apostle's adherents, we may believe, in their letter, had requested his opinion and direction concerning these matters. In compliance therefore with their desire, and because it was of great importance that mankind in future ages should have a just idea of the supernatural gifts by which the Christian church was at first built, and afterwards upheld, the apostle, in his and in the following six chapters, treated largely of these gifts, and of the persons who possessed them.

His discourse on these subjects he introduced with telling the Corinthians, that he wished them not to be ignorant of the offices of the spiritual men, and of the excellency of their gifts, ver. 1.—And to make them sensible of the honour which the church derived from the gifts of the spiritual men, he put the brethren at Corinth in mind, that before their conversion they worshiped idols, who, being themselves dumb, could not impart to their votaries insensibly the faculty of speaking foreign languages, as Christ had done to many of his disciples, ver. 2.—Next, because there were in that age impostors who said they were inspired, and because the persons who possessed the gift of discerning spirits were not always at hand to examine them, the apostle gave the Corinthians a rule, by which they might judge with certainty of every one who pretended to be inspired.

No teacher, said he, speaks by the Spirit of God, who calls Jesus his teacher, that is, who affirms that Jesus was justly punished with the accursed death of the cross. Probably some of the heathen priests and priestsesses, in their pretended fits of inspiration, had spoken in this manner of Jesus. On the other hand, every teacher speaks by the Spirit of God, who acknowledges Jesus to be Lord, and endeavours to persuade men to become his disciples, ver. 3.

Having thus compared the church to the human body, the apostle carried on the allegory by observing, that since the human body does not consist of one member, but of many, ver. 14.—If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am no part of the body, is it for this not a member of the body? and free from doing its office in the body? ver. 15.—And if the ear shall say, because I am not the eye, &c. ver. 16.—If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? and if the whole body were hearing, where were the smelling? ver. 17.—His meaning is, that the inferior members should not decline their particular functions, because they are not the superior. But now, saith he, God hath assigned to every one of the members its own place and office in the body; because if all were one member, there would not be a body, ver. 18.—Whereas, by the union of many members, there is one body formed, to the existence of which the service of all the members is necessary, ver. 20.—So that no one member can say to another, I have no need of thee, ver. 21.—Nay, the love which seems to be more feeble, are more necessary to the preservation of the body, than even those that are more strong and active, ver. 22.—The same may be said of those members which we think feeble and least honourable; on which account, we are at the greatest pains to protect and adorn them, ver. 23.—But our comely members being strong, have no need of protection and ornament. Besides, God hath knitted the body together by means of these weak and uncomely members, on which he hath bestowed more abundant honour, through their greater efficacy in nourishing and preserving the body, ver. 24.—That there may be no mutiny in the body, but that all the members may anxiously care for one another, ver. 25.—So that when any member is diseased or disabled, the rest suffer with it. Or if any member is properly clothed, defended, and gratified, the rest partake of its joy, ver. 26.

The application of this beautiful allegory the apostle made in a few words, by telling the Corinthians, that in their collective capacity they were the body of Christ; and that each of them was a particular member of that body, ver. 27.—Wherefore, from what he had said concerning the human body and its members, three things followed, though he hath not mentioned them.—First, That such of the Corinthians as were destitute of the spiritual gifts, or whose gifts were of the inferior sort, were not on that account to fancy themselves no members of the church, nor peculiarly to decline the offices of their station. Neither were they to envy those who were placed in higher stations, or who possessed the best gifts, but were to be content with their own place and office in the church, however humble it might be. Secondly, That such of them as possessed the more excellent gifts, and were placed in superior stations, or who were in the vigour of life, were not to despise those whose gifts were less excellent, and whose stations were inferior. Neither were they to think those useless, who, being incapacitated by disease, or debilitated by age, could not discharge active offices in the church as formerly. By their passive virtues of patience and resignation, and willingness to leave the world, they were still necessary to the perfection of the body or church, as examples and directors to the younger members of the church. Thirdly, That Christians, being all members of one another, ought to have the greatest love for and care of each other; especially when in distress through poverty, sickness, or age. In a word, they were all bound to promote each other's welfare on every occasion.

With respect to the precedence claimed by the spiritual men, on account of the comparative excellence of their gifts, the apostle told the Corinthians, that God had placed the spiritual men in the church in the following order:—First, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after them, those who communicated spiritual powers to others; then those who possessed the gifts of healing diseases; helpers; directors; last of all, those who spoke foreign languages, and who interpreted what was spoken by others in foreign languages. And by thus ranking the spiritual men in their proper order, he settled the precedence of each, ver. 28.—At the same time, to extinguish in the minds of the spiritual men all envy, and to put an end to their strife, he told them, it was no more possible to make all the members of the church apostles, or prophets, or teachers, &c. than to make all the members of the human body an eye, or an ear, &c. ver. 29, 30.—Because in either case there would be no body.

1. Now, concerning spiritual matters, brethren, I would not have you ignorant.

2. Ye know that ye were heathens, led away to idols that are dumb, even as ye happened to be led.

3. Wherefore, I inform you, that no one speaking by the Spirit of God, (ap. v. 55.) pronounces Jesus accursed; and that no one (Acts xxvii, 55.) can declare Jesus Lord, except by the Holy Ghost.

Ver. 1. Spiritual matters.—The word spiritual, without any adjective, signifies sometimes spiritual gifts, chap. xiv. 1. and sometimes, spiritual man, chap. xiv. 29. In this and the following chapters, the apostle speaks of both; and therefore the word may be translated spiritual matters, to comprehend both.

Ver. 2. Idols that are dumb.—This observation the apostle made, to show the Corinthians that the former objects of their worship could not endow them with the gift of tongues; and that if the priests and prophets of these idols ever uttered any oracles, it could not be by the inspiration of these lifeless stocks and stones, but by the inspiration of evil spirits, who gave them these oracles to confirm mankind in their abominable idolatries.

Ver. 3.—I inform you, that no one speaking by the Spirit of God pronounces Jesus accursed. As the apostle wrote this to teach the Corinthians how to distinguish the inspirations of God from those of evil spirits, his meaning must be, No one, speaking by the Spirit of God, pronounces Jesus accursed. It seems some who pretended to be inspired professed to be an impostor, who had been justly punished with death. These I suppose were the Jewish priests, because together with the heathen priests and priestsesses, who in their enthusiastic fashion insulted Jesus. If such persons were really inspired, that is, if they spoke by any supernatural impulse, the Corinthians might know it proceeded from evil spirits, and not from the Spirit of God, who would never move any one to speak in that manner of Jesus.

2. No one can declare Jesus Lord, except by the Holy Ghost.—Here, as in the first clause of the verse, No one means, No one who speaks by a supernatural impulse can declare Jesus Lord, except by the Holy Ghost. A person who speaks from the suggestion of his own reason, being convinced by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead that he is the Son of God, may declare him Lord; but a person who only speaks, as a passive instrument, what is supernaturally suggested to him, cannot declare Jesus Lord, except the suggestion comes from the Holy Ghost. For if an evil spirit moves him to speak so, he certainly will not declare that Jesus is Lord; since no evil spirit would inspire any one to acknowledge the authority of Jesus as Lord, whose pretended intention was to destroy the supposed dominion of evil spirits.
I. CORINTHIANS.

4. Now, there are diversities of gifts, but they all proceed from the same Spirit: so that in respect of their origin, the spiritual gifts are all equally divine.

5. And there are diversities of ministries, for which the different gifts are bestowed; but the same Lord is served by these ministries: so that in respect of the Lord whom they serve, the spiritual men are all equally honourable.

6. And there are diversities of inworkings on the minds of the spiritual men, but it is the same God who worketh inwardly all supernatural impressions in all: so that in respect of the authority by which they act, the spiritual men are all equal.

7. And to each is given (συνεργος) the manifestation of the Spirit, (μητοχος) for the advantage of all.

8. Now, to one, indeed, (is) through the Spirit, (John xiv. 17.) is given the word of wisdom; and to another the word of knowledge, (εγερας) according to the same Spirit;

9. And to another faith, (συνεργος) by the same Spirit; and to another the gifts of healings, (εγερας) by the same Spirit.

Ver. 4. There are diversities (συνεργος) of gifts.—Here the apostle calls the supernatural endowments of the first Christians gifts, because they were the Holy Spirit's gift. See Eph. iv. 7, 8. But in other passages these endowments are distinguished from one another, as in Eph. iv. 4: Wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost.

9. And to another faith (συνεργος), by the same Spirit, in the exercise of his supernatural gifts, which were endowed with different impressions made upon their minds at the time they exercised them. See the following note.
10. And to another the workings of powers; and another the prophecies; and another the discerning of spirits; and to another divers kinds of foreign tongues; and to another the interpretation of foreign tongues.

11. Now all these are the one and the same Spirit; and all are given for the common good. And to one is given the word of wisdom by the Spirit, and to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another understanding of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues; to another the discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of foreign tongues; and to another the interpretation of foreign tongues.

12 For as the body is one, (as, 211), although it have many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. (See Rom. xii. 4, 5. Eph. iv. 15, 16.)

13 (Kas ἕν, 218.) For, indeed, (ἐν) in one Spirit we all have been baptized (ἐν) into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, (καὶ ἐν ἐνοικίαν, ἐν] note 2.) whether slaves or freemen, and all have been made to drink (ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος] of one spirit.

14 (Kas ἕν, 264, 93.) Since, therefore, the body is not one member, but many, (see ver. 12.)

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it, (ὑπ' ὑμών) for this, not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it, for this, not of the body?

17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

18 (Nov. A, conjunct.) But now, God hath placed the members, every one of them in the body, as he hath pleased.

19 (α., 104.) Besides, if all were one member, where were the body?

20 (Nov εἰς τοῦ πνεύματος μονογίων] But now, indeed, there are many members, but one body.

21 (α., 104.) Therefore, the eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you.

Whereas without distinction of nation or condition, are equally entitled to his privileges, and in the sight of God are all equally honourable, Jews, therefore, and freemen, who possessed the gifts of the Spirit, were not more honourable than Gentiles and slaves, who were endowed with the same gifts.—If the base teacher vaunted of his descent as a Jew, this was a just rebuke to him.

2. To drink of the Spirit.—Celebri, in his table, uses the same expression to denote the participation of the Spirit of God. (A priest and official standing near the altar, which was consecrated by the apostle himself, who, chap. x. 17, makes the participation of the bread and wine in the Supper a symbol of the communications of the same vicarious dispensations, and of the same means of increasing these dispensations, and of their sharing in the same hope of garden. In the first clause of this verse the apostle affirms, that by the various gifts of the Spirit all the disciples of Christ, in the first age, were formed into one body. In the latter clause he observes, that all Christians, by drinking the cup in the Lord's supper, are formed into one spirit of faith, love, and holiness by which one body is animated. He expresses in an emphatic manner, by their being made to drink of one spirit.'

Ver. 11. Since therefore.—The common translation of ὡς υἱοὶ, which makes this verse a reason for what goes before, is evidently wrong. It is a repetition of what was advanced ver. 12. and is introduced here as the foundation of the inference in the following verses, 12, 13.

Ver. 16. And if the ear shall say.—Bengelius thinks that in this allegory, the head signifies the common people in the church; the hand, the presidents; the eye, the teachers; and the ear, the hearers.

Ver. 21. Nor again the head to the feet.—The apostle mentions the two principal members of the body, the eye and the head, and affirms that they need the service of the inferior members, to teach such as hold the most honourable offices in the church, not to despise those who are placed in the lowest stations. For as, in the body, the hands need the direction of the eye, and the eye the assistance of the hands; so in the church, they who follow the active occupations of life need the direction of the teachers. On the other hand, the teachers need to be supported by the exertion of the natural faculties of its members, Eph. iv. 13.

22 Nay, these members of the body which seem to be more feeble, because unable to endure external injury, such as the brain, the lungs, and the intestines, are much more necessary to its subsistence than the stronger members.

23 And those which we think are less honourable members of the body, around them we throw more abundant honour; and so our uncomely members have more comeliness.

24 (And) But our comely members have no need. (And) However, God hath tempered the body, having given to the member which wanteth, more abundant honour.

25 That there may be no schisme in the body; but that the members (των μυαλων) may have the very same anxious care one for another.

26 (And) so, whether one member suffer, all the members jointly suffer; or one member be honoured, all the members jointly rejoice.

27 Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in his body, (see chap. xi. 18, note 3, and chap. xii. 9, note) in part.

28 Therefore, there are members in the body, first, (επικοινωνεται, see Eph. iv. 11, note 1.) apostles; secondly, (προφαται, Eph. iv. 11, note 2.) prophets; thirdly, (εκκλησιαται, Eph. iv. 11, note 3.) teachers; (ερωτευεται) next, (εφορεως) powers; (εκτεταμαι) then, (πρακτορεις) ministers of healing, (ερωτευεται) helpers, (see ver. 10, note 2.) (επισκοπες) bishops; (εκκλησιαται) director, (εκκλησιασται) kinds of foreign languages.

22 Nay, these members of the body which seem to be more feeble, because unable to endure external injury, such as the brain, the lungs, and the intestines, are much more necessary to its subsistence than the stronger members.

CHAPTER XIII.

View and Illustration of the Subject treated in this Chapter.

That the Corinthians might be persuaded to lay aside their emotions and strifes, and be contented with their own gifts and office in the church, the apostle, after discussing concerning the spiritual men and their gifts, told the brethren that no doubt they earnestly desired to possess the best gifts. Yet he would shew them a more excellent way of attaining eminence in the church; namely, by acquiring a greater measure of that love, which ought to subsist among the members of Christ's body, ch. xii. 31.—This verse therefore being an introduction to the apostle's beautiful discourse concerning love, contained in ch. xiii., it ought to have been placed, as I have done, at the beginning of that chapter.

The more excellent way of attaining eminence in the church being that of love, the apostle, by personifying this divine virtue, and by ascribing to it the qualities and actions of a person, hath set forth its beauties and excellencies in the brightest colours, that the Corinthians, by comparing themselves with his description, might be sensible of the deformity of their own temper, as it appeared in their divisions, emulations, and strifes. His account of love he began with affirming, that it is a quality more excellent than the faculty of speaking all kinds of languages, of foretelling future events, of understanding the mysteries contained in the ancient revelations, and of working miracles; in short, more excellent than all the endowments which men covet most. The reason is, none of these endowments are of any value, if love is wanting in the persons who possess them, to direct them in the use of them. It is a more excellent virtue than even the giving of all one's goods to feed the poor; nay, than the giving of one's body to be burned for his religion, if these things are done, not out of love to God and man, but from vain-glory; for however beneficial these actions may be to mankind, they will be of no real advantage to the vain-glorying hypocrite himself, ver. 1, 2, 3.

Yet, still more effectually to display the excellence of this noble grace, the apostle described its influence upon the temper and conduct of the persons who possesses it, ver. 4-7.—And by comparing it with the gifts of tongues, of prophecy, and of knowledge, and even with its sister grace, faith and hope, he hath shewn it to be more excellent than them all; chiefly because their existence and usefulness takes place in the present life only, whereas love will subsist in heavens, ver. 8-12.

In this section it is observable, that all the properties of love mentioned by the apostle, belong more especially to the love of our neighbour; unless we suppose with some, that the three properties mentioned ver. 7, belong also to the love of God. However, although the whole were confined to the love of our neighbour, it would not follow, that the apostle hath excluded the love of God from his idea of love: on the contrary, all the exercises of love which he hath so beautifully described, presuppose the love of God as their true principle; for it is well known, that we cannot love man aright, unless we love God also, 1 John iv. 20.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XII.—31. Now ye earnestly desire the chief gifts; but yet I show you a more excellent way.

CHAP. XIII.—1. Though I could speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I become as sounding brass, or a hollow cymbal.

And though I have prophecy, and know all mysteries, (ch. 11. note 1,) and all knowledge.

VER. 1.—Though I could speak with the tongues of men and of angels, some think the apostle mentioned the tongues of angels, because in the interpreted ages angels often spake to men. But they then speak the language of men, their tongues being thus understood, are the means with which men speak to one another. And therefore by the tongues of angels the apostle meant the methods, whatever they are, by which angels communicate their thoughts to each other, and which must be much more excellent language than any that is spoken by men.

And have not love.—Because the Vulgate translates the word εὐμεταλ. by charitas, charity, the Roman clergy, with a view to enrich themselves by the alms of the people, applied it almsgiving the high encomium which in this chapter is passed on love; and compared the Protestants as falsifiers, who translated εὐμεταλ. by the word service. This translation, they thought, led the people to have a less esteem of the merit of almsgiving than they wished them to entertain.

2. A hollow cymbal.—By the word οἰνωπος may be meant; for Josephus, Ant. vii. c. 10, says, cymbals were broad pieces of brass, which being struck against each other, gave a strong deep sound, but without any variety of notes. And as the apostle distinguished the cymbal from the sounding brass, so the latter denotes none of the other brazen instruments used in the temple music, which, like the cymbal, was introduced to fill up the symphony, without giving any distinction of notes.

Cuntas revelations; and though I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, 1 but I have not love, I am nothing.

3. And though I spend all my goods in feeding the poor, and though I deliver my body that I may be burned, but I have not love, I am nothing profited.

4. Love suffereth long, and is kind; 2 love envieth not. Love doth not vaunt; 3 is not puffed up, (see chap. iv. 6, note 4.)

5. Dost not behave itself unseemingly: doth not easily bungle; 4 is not envious; doth not imagine evil; 5

6. Dost not rejoice in iniquity; but rejoiceth in the truth:

7. Covereth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

8. Love never at any time faileth; but whether prophecies, they shall be abolished; or foreign languages, they shall cease; or knowledge, it shall be abolished.

9. (1 Thess. 5. 11.) Besides, we know only (as proper) in part, and prophecy (as proper) in part.

10. The apostle denoteth the inspiration which communicateth to the spiritual man what is called, chap. xii. 'the word of knowledge,' or the right meaning of the Jehovah's 'revelation.' Accordingly he speaketh, 'and know all mysteries,' all the things hidden under the types and figures of the law, hid beneath the forms of the law, kept secret, and all knowledge of the ancient revelations. See chaps. xii. 8, note 2.

11. So are to remove mountains:—The Jews, by removing mountains, meant the overcoming of the greatest difficulties. See Ver. 5, note 2.

12. I am nothing:—As it is here supposed, that one who possessed all faith might want love, and be nothing in the sight of God, it is evident, that the faith of which the apostle speaks in this verse is not saving faith. Further, since it appears from our Lord's words, Matt. xxi. 22, that some who possessed spiritual gifts should condemn themselves for wickedness, the two passages joined are a solemn warning to us, not attributing to the inspired word, that which is not inspired.

13. Ver. 3. Deliver my body that I may be burned:—If this is an allusion to what Nehemiah, Ezra, and Neh. 11. 4. Abraham: 'Thou yieldest their bodies,' namely, to be burned, 'that they might not worship any god except their own God,' the apostle's meaning will be as in the commentary. Though I deliver my body to be burned for my religion.

14. Ver. 6. Love is patient:—Here the apostle attributeth to love the qualities and acts of a person, in order to render his account of that divine grace the more lively and affecting. From what he saith of love in this and in the following verses, it appears to be the grace which renders men most like to God, and that which is the best preparation of them for living in heaven. Hence Milton, in his Comus, terms it, 'The golden key which openeth the palace of eternity.'

15. Love doth not vaunt:—As is aforementioned.

16. Love suffereth long:—Some think that this is derived from an Arabic word which signifies to be of a light mind; and translates the clause, as we may suppose. If the writer wished to know the different senses given of this clause by the Greek commentators, he may consult Estius.

17. Dost not rejoice in iniquity:—Because the Hebrew word signifies a joy in the devouring of the wicked. Whedon thinks iniquity here means falsehood. The benevolent man takes no pleasure either in hearing or repeating falsehoods.
Chap. XIV.

11 When I was a child, I spake as a child, I perceived as a child. But when I became a man, I put away the things of a child.

13 And now abideth faith, hope, love; these three; but the greatest of these is love. (See ver. 8.)

I. CORINTHIANS. 191

10 But when the perfect gift of complete illumination is bestowed on all in heaven, then that which is partial, namely, the present gifts of knowledge and prophecy, shall be abolished, as useless.

11 The difference between our present and future conceptions of spiritual things, may be illustrated by the knowledge of a child, compared to that of a man. When I was a child, my perceptions, my conceptions, were erroneous. But when I became a man, I laid aside the conceptions, reasonings, and language of a child.

12 For now the revelations of God being made in human language, which cannot convey a just idea of spiritual things, we see them through glass obscurely; but in the life to come we shall see them face to face, clearly. Now my knowledge of spiritual things is partial; but in the life to come I shall fully know them, even as I am fully known of superior beings.

13 Love is more excellent also than all the graces. For now abideth Faith, Hope, Love, these three being necessary to our present state; but the greatest of these is love: Because, after Faith and Hope are at an end, Love will subsist for ever in heaven.

Ver. 12.—I. We see through glass.—Dr. Pearce thinks the word εἰρήνος signifies any of those transparent substances which the Greeks used in their windows, such as thin plates of horn, transparent stone, and the like, through which they saw the objects objectively. I have therefore translated this Greek word by the English word glass, as a generic name for such substances.—But others are of opinion, that the word διακοπή, a broken mirror, like those of which Moses made the laver. Exodus, xxx. 20., and that the answer to it, warming in, are seen things as it were by images reflected from a mirror. But this idea does not accord with seeing things obscurely.

2. Observe. [E. II. shall μένει, literally in an engima or riddle. An enigam or riddle being a discourse in which one thing is put for another, which in some respects like it, we are said to see things as present in an engima, because in the revelations of God, invisible things are represented by signs, and spiritual things by natural and eternal things, such as are temporal. Two of Stephen's Most read here εἰς, as in a riddle. As in this passage it is proper to observe, that the darkness in which things are present, is in some respects necessary. For in childhood our knowledge and conception of things are very much imperfect, that we may the more easily attend to the exercises and discourses which are proper to our childish state; so in the present life, which in relation to the whole of our existence may be called childish, our knowledge of invisible things is appointed to be imperfect, that we may employ ourselves with pleasure in the occupations of the present life. But when the season of childhood is over, we attain more comprehensive views of things, and put away childish conceptions, reasonings, and occupations. Just as, when the life is over, and the grandeur of the heavenly world opens upon us, we shall no more see spiritual things darkly as in a riddle, but we shall see them face to face clearly; and shall fully know, even as we ourselves are fully known of superior beings, or of our most familiar friends. In short, we shall leave all these important methods of acquiring knowledge, which we make use of on earth.

I shall fully know, even as I am fully known. [E. I shall know fully, when also I shall be made to know fully.] See Acts, iv. 7. But thus translated, the clause has the appearance of a tautology. [E. Ver. 13. And now abideth faith, hope, love.—The clause, none abideth, implies that the graces spoken of are not always to abide; at least the graces of faith and hope. For seeing 'faith is the persuasion of things hoped for,' Heb. xi. 1., and 'hope that is seen is no hope,' Rom. xii. 21., in heaven, where all the objects of our faith and hope are put in our possession, there can be no place for either. It is quite otherwise with love. The objects of love exist in the greatest perfection in heaven, and will exist there for ever; so that love will obtain in that world, with a delightful warmth and brightness, to all eternity.

CHAPTER XIV.

From the things written in this chapter it appears, that the brethren at Corinth placed the object only of their comparative excellence of the spiritual gifts; and had been guilty of great irregularities in the exercise of these gifts. In particular, they preferred the gift of speaking foreign languages to all the rest, because it made them respectable in the eyes of the unbelieving Greeks, who were great admirers of eloquence. Further, possessing that gift in the manner of an habit which they could exercise at pleasure, they were exceedingly fond of showing it in the public assemblies, by speaking often and long in foreign languages, without regarding whether their hearers understood them or not. And fancying themselves the most honourable of all the spiritual men, because their gift was habitual, they claimed the privilege of speaking in the public assemblies preferably to others; whereby some who were better qualified to edify the church, were often obliged to be silent. Nay, to such a pitch did they carry their passion for speaking foreign languages, that, on some occasions, a number of them possessed that gift, spake in the church all at once; whereby great confusion was occasioned in their meetings.

The Corinthians, by this improper use of their ability to speak foreign languages, having brought a bad report upon the Christian assemblies, St. Paul, in this chapter, endeavoured to lesion their admiration of the gift of tongues, by showing that it was inferior to most of the other spiritual gifts; and that its value depended on its being used for the edification of others. Wherefore, as an introduction to his discourse on the subject, he began with exhorting them to make love the object of their constant pursuit, but spiritual gifts the object only of their earnest wish; and of the spiritual gifts, to desire the gift of prophecy, rather than the gift of speaking foreign languages, ver. 1.—Because he who, in the public assemblies, spake in an unknown language, spake to God only and did no good to others, however sublime and excellent the things which he spake might be, ver. 2.—Whereas he who prophesied, spake to men in a known language, things for their edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3.—In short, he who spake in an unknown language, edified none but himself; whereas, he who prophesied edified the church, ver. 4.—This being the case, though the apostle would have been glad that all the inspired men at Corinth had spoken foreign languages, he rather wished them to prophesy, ver. 5.—Next, he advanced various arguments, to shew the unprofitableness of speaking unknown languages in the church, ver. 6-14.—Then exhorted such of them as earnestly wished to possess spiritual gifts, to seek those which would make them abound to edification, ver. 12.—and directed the persons who prayed in an unknown tongue, to pray in such a manner that they prayed might be interpreted; because if any one prayed in an unknown tongue, without having his prayer interpreted, his spirit prayed, but his meaning did not profit his hearers, ver. 14.—The duty, therefore, of every inspired person who prayed or sang psalms in the public assemblies, was to perform these offices in an intelligible manner, ver. 15.—otherwise, when he returned thanks to God, his hearers could not say Amen; that is, could not join in his thanksgiving, not understanding what he said, ver. 16, 17.—He then told them, that he could thank God in more foreign languages than all of them taken together, yet he would rather speak five sentences in a known language, for the edification of others, than ten thousand sentences in an unknown language, which could profit nobody but himself, ver. 18, 19.

Next, to show the Corinthians the foolishness of a number of them speaking in the church unknown languages all at once, he told them it was acting like children. In bad dispositions, indeed, he wished them to be children, but in understanding to be men, ver. 20.—Then he put them in mind of Isaiah’s prophecy, in which it was foretold, that God would speak to the unbelieving Israelites in foreign languages; but that even so they would not believe, ver. 21.—From which he inferred that foreign languages were intended for a sign, not to believers, but unbelievers, to convince them of the divine original of the gospel; whereas, prophecy was intended for the edification of believers, ver. 22.—Farther, when the whole church is met in one place, if all of you, said he, who have the gift of tongues, speak at once, and there come in an unlearned person or an unbeliever, will they not say, ye are mad? ver. 23.—Whereas, if all the inspired men prophesy, that is, speak in a known language, and in an orderly manner, to the edification, exhortation, and comfort of the assembly, and there shall come in an unlearned person or an unbeliever, perhaps with a bad intention, such an one, understanding what is spoken by all, will probably be made sensible of the evil of his idolatry and wickedness; and being examined by all concerning his bad design, ver. 24.—The secrets of his heart will be discovered, so that, falling prostrate, he will worship God, and carry away word that God is actually among the Christians, ver. 25.

In the remaining part of this chapter, the apostle gave the Corinthians particular directions concerning the manner in which they were to exercise their spiritual gifts, ver. 26–33.—And prohibited women from speaking in the church on any pretence whatever; founding his prohibition on the will of God, and on the law of Moses, which commanded women to be subject to men, and even on the custom of nations, ver. 24, 35, 36.—Then required the prophets, and other spiritual persons at Corinth, to acknowledge that all the things he had written were the commandments of the Lord. For St. Paul, though one of the greatest apostles, willingly submitted his doctrines and writings to be tried by those who had the gift of discerning spirits; being absolutely certain of his own inspiration, ver. 37.—He added, if after the attestation borne to my precepts by the spiritual men, any teacher among you is ignorant that they are the precepts of the Lord, let him remain in his ignorance, ver. 38.—And, as the conclusion of the whole, he exhorted the Corinthians to desire earnestly to prophesy: but at the same time not to forbid any person to speak in an unknown language, if there was an interpreter present to interpret what he said, ver. 39.—And, in general, to do all things in their public assemblies decently and in order, ver. 40.

Before this illustration is finished, it may be proper to remark, first, That this and the two preceding chapters of St. Paul’s first epistle to the Corinthians more than any other parts of the sacred volume, are useful for demonstrating the reality, and for making us acquainted with the nature, of that most singular and astonishing proof of the divine original of the gospel, which was set before the world in the supernatural gifts wherewith multitudes of the first Christians were endowed. For from the account accidentally given of these gifts in the chapters mentioned, and of the persons who possessed them, and of the manner of their communication and operation, and of the uses for which they were intended, we understand, That they all proceeded from the Spirit of God, and were most astonishing in their operation. That in every church great numbers of persons possessed these gifts, having received them, either by an immediate infallible gift of the Holy Ghost, or by the imposition of the apostle’s hands: That the spiritual men exercised these gifts openly before all the world, for the confirmation of the gospel; and in their public assemblies, for their own edification: That in the absence of the apostles, the spiritual gifts of men, by these gifts, were especially the gifts of miracles and tongues, converted numbers; and, That the heathens who came into the Christian assemblies, (as many of them did, 1 Cor. xiv. 24.), had thereby an opportunity to know, and to report to others, that God was really among them. Thus, notwithstanding the gospel in the first age met with great opposition everywhere, from the state men, the priests, the craftsmen, the bigots, and even from the philosophers and rhetoricians, yet in all countries, by the influence of the spiritual gifts and of the miraculous powers which abounded among the Christians, it overcame all opposition, and through the blessing of God spread itself so effectually, that at length it put an end to the heathen religions, in the best peoples and most civilized provinces of the Roman empire.

My second remark is, That although the irregularities which the Corinthian brethren were guilty of in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, occasioned at first abundance of trouble to the apostle Paul, these irregularities are not now to be regretted. By the direction of God, they have been the occasion of our receiving certain and full information, concerning the existence of the spiritual gifts, the primitive glory of our religion, and concerning the way in which they were exercised by the apostles, and other spiritual men, for the overturning of the heathen idolatry, the establishment of the gospel throughout the world, and the edification of the church itself. See the Illustration prefixed to 1 Thess. chap. i.

Greek writers, as Eustathius on Iliad A. quoted by Hammond on 1 Cor. xiv. 26, affirms. Var. 3. He who prophesieh, speaketh to men for edification, &c. 1 —Seeing the spiritual men who had the word of wisdom, and the word of knowledge, spoke to others for edification, &c. CHAP. XIV.

FOR edification, and exaltation, (see Rom. vii. 8 note), and consolation.

1. He who speaketh in a foreign language, edifieth himself; but he who prophesicheth, edifieth the church.

2. I wish, indeed, that ye all spake in foreign languages; but rather that ye prophesicheth: for greater is he who prophesicheth, than he who speaketh in foreign languages, unless some one interpreteth, that the church may receive edification.

3. (Now as) for you, brethren, if I should come to you speaking in foreign languages, what shall I profit you, unless I should speak to you intelligibly, either by revelation, or by prophecy, or by the edification of the church, or by doctrine? 1

4. In like manner, things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, unless they give a difference to the ears, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? 1

5. (Kæ. 29, 93.) And therefore, if the trumpet give an unknown sound, who will prepare himself for battle?

6. So also ye, unless with the tongue ye give intelligible speech, how shall it be known what is spoken? therefore ye will be speaking into the air.

7. There are, perhaps, as many kinds of languages in the world as ye speak, and none of them in without signification.

8. (Oss. 28.) Yet, if I do not know the meaning of the language, I shall be to him who speaketh a barbarian, and he who speaketh will be to me a barbarian.

9. (Oss. 28.) Wherefore ye also, since ye are earnestly desirous of spiritual gifts, seek them, that ye may abound for the edification of the church.

10. (Αρμ.) For which cause, let him (who prayeth) in a foreign language, pray, as (1 Tim. iii. 16) so as some one may interpret.

11. Moreover, this edifying, and the other things which I write to you, seek to keep, for the edification of the church.

12. I observe, that if I speak in a foreign language, I speak not for myself, but for others, in the name of the Lord.

13. At every meeting of the church, let two or three, or more, speak, and let one interpret.

14. But if ye prophesy in a foreign language, let him interpret, that the church may receive edification, and the truth may be manifest, that the edification of the church may be manifest. When ye come together therefore, it is not the Lord's supper that ye eat.

15. But let every one consider how he may speak to edification.

16. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching, and exhorting one another in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, singing aloud with all your heart, and giving thanks to God. And the members of Christ, building on the foundation which is Christ, when all are come together, contribute to the building of God's temple, and the edification of the church.
L. CORINTHIANS.

14 For if I pray in a foreign language, (which is my spirit prayeth, but (not me) my meaning is without fruit. 15 What then is to be done? I will pray with the Spirit, (as) but I will pray also with meaning; I will sing with the Spirit, but I will sing also with meaning. 16 (kív) Else when thou shalt bless with the Spirit, he who filleth up the place of the private person, how shall he say the Amen to thy thanksgiving, since he knoweth not what thou sayest? 17 For thou, indeed, givest thanks well, but the other is not edified. 18 I give thanks to my God, speaking in foreign languages more than all of you. 19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five sentences with my meaning understood, that I may instruct others also, than ten thousand sentences in a foreign language. 20 Brethren, be not children in understanding; (sóloú) but in evil be ye children, and in understanding be ye full grown men. 21 In the law it is written, (kató) Surely with other tongues, and with other lips, I will speak to this people; yet not even as will they hearken to me, saith the Lord. 22 So that foreign languages are for a sign, not to believers, but to unbelievers: but prophecy is for a sign, not to unbelievers, but to believers.

may interpret. — What the apostle meant by ordering the inspired person to pray in such a manner, that another might interpret his prayer was this: He who prayed in an unknown language, was to do it by two, or at most by three sentences at a time, and in order; and the interpreter was to interpret what he said as he went along, ver. 12. But if there was no interpreter at hand, he was to be silent. f21 Even though he might have understood what he spake, because to edify the church in that manner was a ridiculous vanity, not to be encouraged, for a reason which shall be mentioned in the note on ver. 22.

Ver. 14. My spirit prayeth, but my meaning is without fruit. — According to Bengelius, spirit in this verse signifies that faculty of the human soul, upon which the spirit of God operated internally, so as to make known to him something which he was ignorant of before. But mind signifies the same faculty, operating in discovering its conception externally. Wherefore, seeing the original words (πνεύμα) signify, my mind made known to others, they may be translated as I have done, my meaning. This signification the word mind hath, ver. 19. It hath the same signification in other passages. For example, 1 Cor. ii. 16. 'Who had known (κατέγνωσεν), sense unknown, Vg.) the mind of Christ.' Besides in the glossary, (ἐγνωσα) mind signified (ἐγνώση) meaning, as in this phrase, έγνωσήδον ὤν, What is the meaning of this word?

Ver. 16. — Who filleth up the place (καιρίοις) of the private person; — Josephus, Antiq. ch. 5. § 51. It was the custom among the private persons to supply the public prayers by saying Amen at the conclusion of them. Of this custom in the Jewish church we have many examples. See Deut. xxviii. 10. 1 Esdras 12. 4. Neh. vii. 6.

Ver. 18. Speaking in foreign languages. — This is Bishop Pearce's translation, which I have adopted, because it is more applicable to the original, and to the scope of the passage, than the common version. — The apostle had this great variety of languages given him by inspiration, that he might be able immediately to preach the gospel to all nations, without speaking their languages. But it must be remembered, that the knowledge of so many languages miraculously communicated, was a knowledge for common use, such as enabled the apostle to deliver the doctrines of the gospel clearly and distinctly, and not such a knowledge of those languages as prevented him, in speaking and writing, from mixing foreign ideas with them, especially the idioms of his mother tongue. An attention to such truces was below the grandeur and importance of the work in which the apostle was engaged, and tended to no small evil; these foreign ideas being often amiss and emphatical than the correspondent classical phrases.

Ver. 19. Than thousand. — Here stands (περὶ πελάτων), as it does likewise Luke 21. 32.

Ver. 21. In evil. — The Greek word ἀθετάω, in this passage, does not signify matter, but those evil dispositions which are contrary to the goodness and innocence of children; particularly envy, anger, and strife.

2 And in understanding be ye full grown men. — Behave with the good sense and produce of full grown men. It was a severe reproach to the Corinthians, who professed themselves on their wisdom, to represent their speaking unknown languages, and their contending about predestination, as a childishness which men of good sense would be ashamed of. — Doddridge makes the following remark on this part of the apostle's epistle to the Corinthians: 'Had the most zealous protestant divine endeavoured to expose the absurdity of praying and praising in an unknown tongue, as practised in the church of Rome, it is difficult to imagine what he could have wrote more full to the purpose than the apostle hath done here.' He adds for the instruction of those who preach the gospel, 'A height of composition, an airiness of thought, and an obscurity of praise, which common Christians cannot understand, is really a speaking in an unknown tongue, though the language used be the language of the country.'

Ver. 21. In the law it is written. — See Rom. ii. 12. 25. notes, where it is shown, that the law signifies the whole of the Jewish scriptures. — This passage is taken from Is. xxviii. 11. 'With murmuring lips and another tongue will he speak to this people.' The critics observe, that the Hebrew words in Isaiah, rendered by our translators with murmuring lips, ought to be translated, with medicinal lips, in which sense the LXX. understand the phrase. But that translation makes no alteration in the meaning; for they who speak to others in an unknown language, seem to the persons to whom they speak, to asume, and to mock them. See Ver. 22. So that foreign languages are for a sign to the unbelieving Jews with another tongue, is meant his persuading them by a foreign nation. But that sense seems the more obvious in this particular context. It agrees better with his design, nor with the apostle's. Isaiah evidently foretold the methods which God in future times would use for converting the unbelieving Jews; and among others that he
I. CORINTHIANS.

23. Well, then, if the whole church be assembled in one place, and the inspired persons all speak in foreign languages, and there come in unlearned persons, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad? 24. But if all who are inspired prophesy, and there come in a heathen, or one ignorant of foreign languages, with an intention to act as a spy, such a person, understanding what is spoken, will be reproved for his idiocy, and other sins, by all who prophesy; and he will be questioned concerning his intention, by all who can discern spirits. 25. And thus the hidden purposes of his heart being made known, he will be warnings, and an, falling prostrate, he will worship God, and report that God is actually among you. Like Nebuchadnezzar he will say, 'Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a revealer of secrets.' Dan. ii. 47.

Then is it to be done, brethren? When ye are assembled, one of you by inspiration hath a psalm; another hath a discourse; another hath something made known to him in a foreign language; another a revelation of some future event; another an interpretation of what was uttered in a foreign language. In such cases, let all these gifts be exercised to edification, 26. And if any one be moved to speak in a foreign language, let him speak by two, or at most by three sentences in a time, and separately; and let one in the same manner interpret what he says, that the church may be edified. 27. But if there be no interpreter present, let the inspired person be silent in the church at that time: Yet, for his own edification, he may speak inwardly to himself and to God, 28. Now, let only two or three prophets speak in succession, at one meeting, and let the others who have the gift of discerning spirits, discern whether they have been inspired by inspiration or by private suggestion. 29. But if to another, who sitteth by hearing a prophet speak, anything be revealed, let the first finish his discourse and be silent, before the other attempt to speak. 30. For, by speaking one after another, ye can all deliver one by one, either that or some subsequent meeting, what is revealed to you, so as all may learn, and all be comforted. 31. For the spiritual gifts of the Christian prophets are under the command of the prophets; so that they can exercise, or forbear to exercise them, as they choose. 32. Besides, God is not the would speak to them in foreign languages, that is, in the languages of the nations among whom they were dispersed. The passage therefore is a prediction of the inspired persons in foreign languages to be bestowed on the first preachers of the gospel. From the prophesy thus understood, the apostle's conclusion is clear and pertinent. Ver. 23. -I. The whole church. -By the whole church, the apostle means all the whole brethren of a particular city; or the whole of the brethren who were used to meet together in one place for worship.

2. Will they not say that ye are mad? -This is not contrary to what is said, ver. 22, that the speaking in foreign languages was a sign to convince unbelievers: let, the unbelievers to be convinced by that sign, were such strangers as understood the language in which they were addressed; whereas, the unbelievers and unlearned persons who considered the speaking in foreign languages as an effect of madness, were those strangers who understood them.

Ver. 24. He is examined by all; -by all who have the gift of discerning spirits; and the seeking known to the church the language on which he was come into their assembly, he will be affected in the manner described ver. 25.

Ver. 25. 1. Each of you hath a psalm. -Gospeled thinks this is the following classes should be more interestingly. - Hath each of you a psalm, hath he a discourse? The inspired persons of which the apostle speaks, were not metrical compositions, but compositions which were distinguished from prose, by the sublimity of the sentiments, and the strength, beauty, and original of the expressions. Such was the inspired psalm which Mary sung to Jesus. Lord's mother uttered. Luke 1. 46. and the inspired thanksgiving and prayer which the disciples sung upon the deliverance of Peter and John from the council. recorded Acts iv. 24-30. And since it is said, ver. 21, that the whole company lifted up their voice (συναρχήν ἐπὶ οὐσαι) with one accord, it is evident from that point, that the psalm was given, must have delivered it by two or three sentences at a time. (See St. Paul directed the Corinthians to do in the like case; that all the company might join in it.

2. Hath a discourse; -made for edification, exhortation, and consolation. For the word εἰς τὸς signifies not only the thing taught, but the discourse in which it is taught. -See Rom. iv. 29.
I. CORINTHIANS.

1. Author of disturbance, but of peace; as in all the churches of the saints! Be well known.

34. Let your women be silent in the churches, for it is written, "Let them be in subjection, as also the law commandeth." (Gen. iii. 16.)

35. And if they wish to learn anything, let them ask their own husbands at home; for it is an unbecoming thing for women to speak in the church.

36. What? Did Paul speak from you women? or did it only come (as yes) to you?

37. If any man be a prophet, or a spiritual person, let him acknowledge the things that I write to you, and all the other things in this Epistle, that they are the commandments of the Lord, given me by inspiration.

38. And if any one be ignorant, let him be ignorant. He that is ignorant, let him be ignorant. If I speak to you women, I shall be reproached.

subject to the will of the prophets; for which reason, they were not to speak in the church without the consent of the prophet. Where a number of speaking was to be made to them, especially if it was made to them in another place, another prophet was speaking, verse 30. But when was it silent, till the prophet had finished his revelation, to show the command which they had of themselves on such occasions. In this respect, the inspiration for the prophesying of the elders, and the prophesying of the prophets was totally different, and not entirely from the inspirations of evil spirits, by whom the heathen priests and prophets were actuated. This difference may be clearly perceived in the picture which Virgil hath drawn of the priests of Apollo, Eccl. vi. line 16. Non consortum manusse comit; sed pectus animantium. E tamen fere concordium; majorque voluptas. Non unum, sed omnes auctoritates, non unum sed omnes auctoritates, auctoritates, auctoritates.

Nunc prophete Del.

2. Folly! Why after speaking this passage, Antig. b. c. 12. adds, "Few that pretended to inspiration but raged after this manner, fearing and trembling, and making a strange terrible noise, sometimes grasping their teeth, shivering and trembling, with a thousand antic motions. In short, these Hagi and Dae priests were beside themselves, and absolutely mad, during the time of their inspirations." To this Galatians, iv. 14. "I am the Lord who prospereth the thoughts of the heart, and maketh diviners mad."—It is true, in these frantic fits of the heathen diviners there was often much imposture. Yet in some instances there seems to have been a real possession of the holy spirit, as in the case of the man named Acts xvi. 16. In these, as Galatians, xiv. 5. says, "The devil, imitating the ecstasies of the prophets of the true God, "Jesu. xxi. 26. Test. ib. x. 7." carried the matter far beyond them. For, notwithstanding the prophets had their visions in an ecstasy, they related what they had seen in their ordinary frame of mind, and not in frantic fits, as the Companion Syrian is reported by Virgil to have done, Eccl. vi. line 16—102.

35. As in all the churches of the saints. This clause is a mere criticism, and among the rest of the ancient versions, by placing a full stop after the word peace, so as to make this general, as if it were not a qualifications to the subjection of the women. In this sense, it is true that the women keep silence in the church, namely, of the church, according to this occurrence. How the phrase was explained the other churches of the saints, that your women keep silence, the public worship is in the church, and discipline was most perfect, because they had been planted and regulated by the apostle.

36. Let your women be silent in the churches. The apostle in chap. ii. reprobated women for praying and prophesying in the church without their veils, but did not blame them for the practice itself, but when they did not consult the will of the church, his counsel was, that they must be silent. But as the apostle's instruction in chap. i. was only to show the inadvisability of the practice, and not to consider whether the practice itself was permitted by Christ, it is evident from the practice of that practice from its not being permitted. See chap. i. note 1. Therefore remains to be considered. Whether the apostle, in this chapter, absolutely forbids women to pray and prophesy in the church, or whether he forbids them only in the case of their not being in subjection.

37. If any man be a prophet, or a spiritual person, let him acknowledge the things that I write to you, and all the other things in this Epistle, that they are the commandments of the Lord, given me by inspiration. If any one be ignorant, let him be ignorant. He that is ignorant, let him be ignorant. If I speak to you women, I shall be reproached.

38. And if any one be ignorant, let him be ignorant. He that is ignorant, let him be ignorant. If I speak to you women, I shall be reproached.
39 Therefore, brethren, earnestly desire to prophecy; and hinder not to speak in foreign languages, if there be one present to interpret.

40 Let all things be done decently and in order. For the very nature of prophecy being so excellent a gift, earnestly desire to prophecy. And hinder not any to speak in foreign languages, if there is one present to interpret.

CHAP. XV.

I. CORINTHIANS.

Ver. 40. Let all things be done decently and in order.  — This precept is sometimes applied to support the use of rites and ceremonies in the worship of God, not commanded in scripture. But any one who considers the place which it holds in this discourse, will see that it hath no relation to rites and ceremonies, but to the decent and orderly exercise of the spiritual gifts. Yet by parity of reason it may be extended even to the rites of worship, provided they are left free to be used by every one as he sees them expedient.

CHAPTER XV.

View and Illustration of the Reasons and of the great Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

From Acts xvi. 32. it appears, that the resurrection of the dead was a subject of laughter to the learned Greeks, who, regarding the body as the prison of the soul, placed their happiness in being freed from it for ever by death. The false teacher, therefore, to render the gospel acceptable to the Greeks, denied the resurrection of the body; contending, that the only resurrection promised by Christ to his disciples, was the resurrection of the soul from the death of sin; and affirming that that resurrection was already past, 2 Tim. ii. 18. But the resurrection of the body being one of the great objects of the faith and hope of Christians, the apostle, in his xvth chapter, set before the Corinthians and all mankind, the proof by which that joyful event is rendered indisputable: it is a necessary consequence of the resurrection of Christ. Wherefore, to lay the foundation of this proof deep and strong, the apostle, before he showed the connexion which subsists between the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of the dead, recalled to the remembrance of the Corinthians, the arguments by which he had proved to them the truth of Christ's resurrection so effectually, that many of them had believed him to be really risen. And first, to make them sensible of the importance of the facts by which he had proved the resurrection of Christ, he told them, That they constitute the principal articles of the gospel, ver. 1. — That they were the things which he first of all had delivered to them; and that he rose from the dead on the third day, according to the scriptures, ver. 4. — That after his resurrection he was seen of the apostle Peter; then of the twelve, while they were assembled together the evening of the day on which he arose, and on the eight day afterwards, ver. 3. — That he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part were living at the time Paul wrote this epistle, ver. 6. — That after this he was seen of James, and then of all the apostles, immediately before he ascended into heaven, ver. 7. — And, last of all, That he was seen of Paul himself, in different places, and at different times, ver. 8.

The apostle's exposition of the proof, whereby, at his first coming among the Corinthians, he persuaded many of them to believe Christ's resurrection, though intended more immediately for the confirmation of the faith of the Corinthians, by the testimony of credible witnesses, who saw him alive after his resurrection, and had often conversed with him; and who had no interest to serve by deceiving the world in that matter. Accordingly, from the account which St. Paul hath given of the proof by which he persuaded the Corinthians to believe the resurrection of Christ, it appears to have been precisely of the kind required. For he says he told them, that after his resurrection Jesus showed himself alive in different places, and on different occasions, to his apostles; that is, to persons who, having accompanied him during his ministry, were perfectly acquainted with his form, his visage, his voice, his manner of speaking, and every other circumstance by which the identity of any person can be ascertained; and who, for that reason, were well qualified to judge whether the person who appeared to them was really their Master risen from the dead. And as these witnesses had no interest to serve by flattering Christ's resurrection, but, on the contrary, exposed themselves thereby to innumerable evils, their testimony merits in every respect to be believed.

The third remark is, that the apostle's exposition of the proof, whereby, at his first coming among the Corinthians, he persuaded many of them to believe Christ's resurrection, though intended more immediately for the confirmation of the faith of the Corinthians, by the testimony of credible witnesses, who saw him alive after his resurrection, and had often conversed with him; and who had no interest to serve by deceiving the world in that matter, established the world, but it makes mankind sensible, that the prevalence of that belief in the first age was well founded; and that we likewise, who at this distance of time entertain the same belief, have good reason for so doing; and that our Master, his resurrection from the dead, is powerfully demonstrated to be the Son of God, and our religion is shown to be divine.

The apostle having appealed to the testimony of the eye-witnesses, as the proper evidence of our Lord's resurrection, now he goes into heaven, proceeds, in the following part of the chapter, to show in what manner that evidence established beyond all contradiction, first, the truth of Christ's resurrection; and, secondly, the certainty of the resurrection of all the dead. — His reasoning for that purpose is as follows: It is in constant preaching by all the eye-witnesses, and if it be firmly believed by all Christians, that Christ really arose from the dead, how can the false teachers, or any among you Corinthians who call themselves Christ's disciples, affirm that there will be no resurrection of the dead! ver. 12.—For if there is to be no resurrection of the dead, Christ, who promised to return and raise the dead, is an impostor who hath deluded the world with false hopes, whom therefore God never would raise, ver. 13.—And if Christ hath not been raised, the preaching of all who call themselves eye-witnesses of his resurrection is false, and the gospel is false, ver. 14.—Besides, we apostles are found false witnesses concerning God, because we have witnessed, to the infinite dishonour of God, that he hath raised an impostor from the dead, whom assuredly he hath not raised, if the dead are not to be raised, ver. 15.—The argument taken from the resurrection of Christ, to prove that the dead will be raised, is of such importance, that the apostle affirmed a second time, If the dead are not to be raised, neither hath Christ been raised: He is an impostor whom God never would raise, ver. 16.—Besides, if Christ hath not been raised, your faith in him as your Saviour, though founded on miracles, is not only false but useless. It answers no pur- poset; and you who treat his commandments, and yet are still liable to punishment, ver. 17.—Certainly, also, both they who have died in the belief of Christ's resurrection, and they who have suffered death for that belief, are perished, if there be no resurrection of the dead, ver. 18.—Further, to shew you the absurdity of imputing to us apostles the crime of falsely testifying against God, that he hath raised an impostor from the dead whom he hath not raised, consider, that if there is to be no resur- rection, consequently no future state, our only motive to commit the great crime imputed to us, must be some advantage which we reap from it in this life. Yet, in- stead of advantage, we have, by preaching Christ's resur- rection, drawn on ourselves, from every quarter, the greatest present temporal evils; in so much, that if in this life only we have hope of advantage from Christ, we are of all men the most miserable, ver. 19.—This argu- ment, joined with the consideration mentioned, ver. 18. namely, that if there is to be no resurrection, those who have died in the belief of Christ's resurrection, and the witnesses who have suffered death for testifying of Christ's resurrection, are all utterly perished, demonstrates that the witnesses of Christ's resurrection were themselves fully persuaded of the truth thereof. Wherefore, being perfectly qualified for judging, and having had the best oppor- tunities to judge of the truth of Christ's resurrection, they could not possibly be deceived in that matter, and had no motive whatever to deceive the world.

It seems the philosophers affirmed, that the resurrec- tion of the dead, on account of the obulence of God, is a thing unworthy of God; for the apostle told the Corinthsians, that God had confuted that assertion by raising Christ from the dead, as the first-fruit or pledge of his raising all the dead at the last day, ver. 20.—Next he observed, that since God, consistently with his justice and goodness, subjected all mankind to death for one man's sin, as experience sheweth, he may, with equal justice and goodness, raise all men from the dead on ac- count of the obedience of one man, as revelation teacheth. This I think is the meaning of ver. 21, 22.—Withal, to render the resurrection of the dead more certain to such of the Corinthians as understood and believeth the doctrines of the gospel, the apostle assured them, that Christ will reign till he hath destroyed all dominion op- posite to God's; and in particular, till he hath by the resurrection of the dead destroyed the dominion of death, the greatest enemy of mankind. After which, Christ will deliver up the kingdom to God, ver. 24—27.; and then the Son himself shall be subjected to God, that God may be over all, in all places of the universe, ver. 28.

Next, turning his discourses to those who denied the resurrection of the dead, he asked them, what they must do to make up their loss, who are baptized, that is, plunged into the greatest afflictions, for believing the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not! and what possible reason can be assigned for their being under the suffering death on account of that belief! ver. 29.—Here it is instanced, that the testimony of the eye-witnesses concerning the re- surrection of Christ had appeared so credible to many, and had wrought in them such a firm persuasion of their own resurrection, that, at the time the apostle wrote this letter, they were suffering the greatest evils, rather than renounce that faith and hope. Further, he asked what reason the apostles could have for exposing themselves to the danger of death every hour, if they knew the resur- rection of Christ and of the dead to be falsehoods! ver. 30.—And what advantage he in particular could propose to himself, in undergoing all the evils he suffered, if there is to be no resurrection of the dead! In the case, he told them, it had been better for him, and the other apostles, to have followed the maxims of the profane, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die,' ver. 31, 32.—Having by these strong reasons and arguments, convinced the apostles of the certainty of the resurrection, and next the certainty of the resurrection of all the dead, the apostle advised the Corinthsians to shun conversing with any one who denied these essential articles of the Christian faith, ver. 33.— and commanded the faction to awake from their errors, ver. 34.

In what follows, the apostle answers two questions, with which the false teacher combats the doctrine of the resurrection. 'But some one will say, how can the dead be raised? how is it possible? and if it be possible, with what kind of body do they come out of the grave? The philosophers argued, that the resurrection of the body is a thing impossible; and that, though it were possible, it is by no means desirable; because a body, such as men now have, is a clog to the soul in its operations. In answer to the first of these questions, the apostle shewed the possibility of the resurrection of the body, by appealing to the operations of the divine power which we daily behold; namely, the production of plants from seeds which rot in the earth; the diversity of the bodies of beasts, fowls, and fishes; and the different degrees of light with which the celestial bodies shine. For if the divine power appears so great in the endless variety of its productions, can any rational person doubt of God's being able to raise the dead! ver. 35—42. He there- fore concluded that the resurrection of the dead is possi- ble, ver. 42. Next to shew the philosophers their mistake in supposing the soul will be clogged in its operations by its reunion with the body, the apostle compared the body of the righteous which dies, (for it is of them only he discourses), with that which will be raised. Their buried body is corruptible; is dishonoured by death; is deformed and wasted by disease; and at best is weak in its operations; in short, it is an animal body, which like the body of beasts, depends for its growth and subsistence on meat and drink. But the body of the righteous, which shall be raised, will be incorruptible, and gloriously beautiful in its outward appearance, and powerful in its activity: in one word, it will be a spiritual body; a body which doth not subsist by meat and drink, but is, by its own internal vigour. Now, there being these differences be- tween the body of the righteous that dieth, and the body that riseth, the resurrection of the body, instead of being a disadvantage to the righteous, will contribute greatly to their perfection and happiness in the life to come, ver. 42—47.

At this period of his discourse the apostle takes occa- sion to declare a great, and important secret, concerning the resurrection of the wicked, hitherto not disclosed. He tell us, As the earthly or sinful man Adam was such also at the resurrection, the earthly or wicked men shall be; they shall rise with an earthly corruptible body, like that which Adam had after the fall. And as the heavenly men, Christ now is, such also at the resurrection shall the heavenly men, the righteous, be, in respect to their body, ver. 45.—And to prove that the righteous, who are destined to live in heaven, must bear the image of the heavenly man in their body as well as in their soul, he affirms, that a corruptible body, composed of flesh and blood, cannot inherit the kingdom of God, ver. 49, 50.—Then declares another great mystery or secret, namely, that the righteous who are living on the earth at Christ’s coming, instead of dying, shall all be changed in their body, from corruptible to incorruptible, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye; by which, and by the resurrection of the righteous from the dead, death shall be swallowed up for ever, with respect to them, ver. 51—54.—And being warmed with the grandeur of his subject, he breaks forth into that noble song of victory: ‘Where, O death, is thy sting? &c. ver. 55—57.—The apostle gave to these discoveries the appellation of a mystery, not only because they were hitherto kept secret from mankind, but because they are discoveries infinitely more important, interesting, and certain, than any of the discoveries concerning a future state pretended to be made in the heathen mysteries, which were all fictions contrived to amuse the initiated, and raise the curiosity of the vulgar. These discoveries Paul was inspired to make, because the knowledge of the manner and circumstances of the resurrection of the dead, and of the general judgment, and of the final issues of things, by rendering our conceptions of these matters more distinct, greatly strengthens our faith in them, and gives them a powerful influence on our conduct. Accordingly, the apostle concluded this wonderful discourse with an exhortation to the Corinthians, to be humble, meek, and quiet in their conversation with the Lord, knowing that their labour in the Lord is not vain, ver. 58.

I shall finish this illustration with observing, First, That a more solemn fact in the history of any nation is supported by evidence equal to that which the apostle Paul hath produced in this 11th chap. of his first epistle to the Corinthians, in proof of our Lord’s resurrection from the dead. He was seen after he arose by a great number of his acquaintances, of whom eleven are mentioned by name, who were appointed by Christ to publish and attest his resurrection to the world. These having accompanied him during the three years of his ministry, were well qualified to judge, whether the person they conversed with during the forty days he showed himself to them, and ate and drank with them, was their Master risen from the dead. And being fully assured of his resurrection by the evidence of their own senses, they published it in Jerusalem where he was put to death, and throughout all Judea, and everywhere else, as a thing they were absolutely certain of; and shewed their persuasion of it, by suffering death for bearing testimony to it. This was the case likewise with Paul himself, who, though he had not accompanied Jesus during his ministry, was honoured at different times with a sight of him after his ascension, and was put to death for publishing his resurrection to the world. I therefore conclude, that if there is any force in the concurring testimony of many hable and disinterested witnesses, to induce mankind to believe things at which they were not themselves present, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead cannot be called in question, without rendering all history uncertain, and destroying the best source of men’s belief.—Secondly, The resurrection of Jesus, his miracles, and the miracles of his apostles, have been denied, because their existence destroys the Aristotelian atheism which modern philosophers are so fond of reviving; namely, that the world, by powers natural to matter, hath continued from all eternity the same as we see it, and that there exists nothing in the universe distinct from matter; so that the present course of things, consisting of the motions of the heavens, and the successive generations and corruptions of animals and vegetables, can neither be interrupted by any thing extraneous, but must continue for ever. Nevertheless, if miracles have happened, this system of atheism cannot hold; because miracles, being an interrupiton of the course of nature, are proofs of experience, that there exists a power distinct from matter, and always around us, the work of the Lord, knowing that their labour in the Lord is not vain, ver. 58.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XV.—1 Now, I make known to you, brethren, the gospel which I preached to you, which also ye received, and in which ye stand;

2 For which also ye are saved, (Rom. xi. 26, note 1,) if ye remember in what manner I preached to you; unless indeed ye have believed rashly.

3 For I delivered to you, among the first things, what also I received first, that Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures;

4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures;

Ver. 2.—In what manner:—The Vulgate:—In translating this passage, we have followed the Vulgate which has:—

1. Have believed (credite) rashly.—According to L’Eclerc, this word denotes the disposition of those who do a thing by chance, and hastily, without knowing the reason of it and why they do it. Its true rendering therefore is, carelessly, rashly, inconsiderately.

2. Have believed (credite) rashly.—According to L’Eclerc, this word denotes the disposition of those who do a thing by chance, and hastily, without knowing the reason of it and why they do it. Its true rendering therefore is, carelessly, rashly, inconsiderately.

Ver. 1. Rose again the third day, according to the scriptures:—The scriptures which foretold the resurrection of the Christ on the third day, and to which St. Paul refers, are Ps. cx. 10; Acts ii. 31; and the promise made by the Lord himself, after he had suffered, Matt. xvi. 29; 21. These passages of Scripture are referred to by the apostle in his second Epistle, chap. i. 20—21; 1 Pet. i. 11; as well as in his epistle to the Corinthians, chap. i. 21; and by the Evangelist John in his Gospel, chap. xii. 48, 49. The apostle delivered to the Corinthians from the Lord himself, not only that he died for 5 And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve.

6 After that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain to this present time, but some are fallen asleep.

7 After that he was seen of James; then of all the apostles.

8 And last of all, as of an assay, he was seen of me also.

9 For I am least of all men, not counting myself to have apprehended one of the least of all the apostles, but that which I received I received not of man, but as of an assay of Jesus Christ; for I, also, am with him in this mystery of the gospel.

10 But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was promised me was not void, but in me hath more abundantly all of them.

11 Well then, whether I or another preach the gospel, it hath profited you not.

12 For if I preach the gospel, I have no need; for I have power to preach the gospel.

(1 Cor. xv. 3. 4.)

our sins, and rose again on the third day after his death, but that these things had happened according to the prophecies of the scripture concerning the resurrection of the Christ, because by that circumstance, as well as by his resurrection, our Lord was demonstrated to be the Christ.

Ver. 5.-1. Was seen of Cephas. -After his resurrection, Jesus showed himself first to Cephas. Matt. xvi. 17. But as no woman was employed to testify his resurrection to the world, St. Paul did not think it necessary, in his exposition of the proofs of Christ’s resurrection, to mention any of his appearances to the women.—His appearance to Peter is mentioned Luke xxiv. 31.

5. Then of the twelve. —Although Judas was dead before Jesus showed himself to his apostles, they might still be called the twelve, whatever their number was, as the twelve were a name, not of number, but of dignity, like the Thirteen, Twelve, Twelve, among the Romans. I am therefore of opinion, that in the expression, ‘then of the twelve,' our Lord’s appearances to his apostles, from the time he arose, to the time he showed himself to the 500 brethren at once, are comprehended; not only those related by the evangelists, I mean his appearances to the apostles in the evening of the day on which he arose, and on the eighth day thereafter, and at the Sea of Tiberius, but those appearances also which they may have omitted. For that they omitted some, is certain from Paul’s mentioning an appearance, which he says none of them had taken any notice of, Ver. 6. —1. Seen of above 500 brethren at once. -None of the evangelists have expressly mentioned this appearance. But Matthew seems to hint at it, chap. xxviii. 10. Where he informs us, that Jesus, after his resurrection, said to the women, ‘Go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there they shall see me:' and that in obedience to his order ‘the eleven went away to a mountain in Galilee, where Jesus had appointed them.' Having therefore appointed a particular mountain for showing himself to his disciples, perhaps on which he was transfigured; else having previously fixed the time of his appearing, it is reasonable to suppose that the joyful tidings would be quickly spread abroad among the brethren, and the greater part of them met at that time and place appointed. As the greatest part of our Lord’s disciples lived in Galilee, it was highly proper for their consolation, that he should show himself alive there in that public manner. For thus, besides the apostles, many who had often attended him during his ministry in Galilee, and were well acquainted with his person, having an opportunity to converse with him, could satisfy themselves by the testimony of their own senses concerning the truth of his resurrection, and attest it to the rest from the evident evidence. Thence, therefore, may have been the 500 St. Paul speaks. And their testimony was appealed to by the apostle with the greatest propriety, when proving the resurrection of Christ; because such a multitude cannot be supposed to have agreed for so long a time in publishing a falsehood to the world, without any one of them betraying the imposture, or even varying in their account of the fact.

7. Religious. -In this passage, Bengel thinks, Andronicus and Junia, mentioned Rom. xvi. 7. were of the number of the 500, nor therefore are we to think that the apostles were there, ‘afar off among the apostles;' because they had seen Christ after his resurrection.

Ver. 7. After that he was seen of James. —In the gospel there is no mention of this appearance to James. But the fathers speak of it, and tell us, that the person thus honoured was James the less, or younger, our Lord’s brother, that is, his cousin-german, and the author of the epistle in the canon which bears his name. See Pref. to the epistle of James, Sect. 1. —Now their opinion is probably, because the other James was dead when Paul wrote his epistle to the Corinthians. Eusebius in his Chron. p. 56. says, this appearance happened in the first year after our Lord’s resurrection. But from the order in which Paul hath placed it here, it happened more probably before our Lord’s ascension, at which all the apostles were present. Ver. 8.-1. Last of all. —This, if I am not mistaken, implies that our Lord appeared to none of the disciples after his ascension, except to Paul.

8. He was seen of me also. —The apostle no doubt speaks here of Christ’s appearing to him on the road to Damascus; but he doth not exclude his other appearances to him. See 1 Cor. i. 1. 3. As of an apostolic office. —Because the apostle is here speaking of the persecution of Christ’s church, he was not so much ashamed of his being sensible of any imperfection in his commission, or of any weakness in his qualifications as an apostle; for he affirms 2 Cor. x. 3. That he was in nothing behind the very great of the apostles; but he called himself an apostle only, because, as he tells us, ver. 9. he had ‘persecuted the church of God;' and because he was made an apostle without that previous course of instruction and preparation, which the other apostles enjoyed who had attended Jesus during his ministry on earth; so that, in the proper sense of the word, he was e x e r c i s e d, one born before he was brought to maturity. That want however, was abundantly supplied by the many revelations which his Master gave him after he made him an apostle.

Ver. 10.-1. And his grace. —The apostolic office itself, and the qualifications necessary to the right discharge of that office, are called grace, Rom. i. 5. xli. 3. Gal. ii. 9. In this verse, grace is used in three distinct senses.

2. I have laboured more abundantly than all, 4. c. —The other apostles confided their preaching for the most part to the Jews, Gal. ii. 9.; but Paul preached the gospel to all the Gentile nations, from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum, Rom. xvi. 15.; and also to the Jews who lived in those countries; and by his labours he converted great numbers both of the Jews and Greeks. Moreover, as his success in spreading the gospel exceeded the expectations of the other apostles, so his labours, if we may judge of them from his own account, 2 Cor. x. 39. greatly exceeded theirs in the estimate of the subjective. See 2 Cor. i. 9. —By some among them, the apostle meant the false teacher and his imitators, and not that which I understood by the parenthesis, but that which I have before expressed.

Ver. 12. How can some among you say, 'by my knowledge and wisdom, must be translated, as plain from the structure of the discourse, but to mention that the indicative mode is often used in the scripture as the substantive. See 2 Tim. iv. 3. —By some among them, the apostle meant the false teacher and his imitators, and not that which I understood by the parenthesis, but that which I have before expressed.

Ver. 13. Neither hath Christ been raised. —The apostle hath not expressed the idea of the time in which the council was at Jerusalem. The proposition is connected with its antecedent. But when these words are supplied, the meaning is, every one of them made false the communication. Christ promised repeatedly, in the most express terms, that he would raise all mankind from the dead, Matt. xvi. 25.
I. CORINTHIANS.

14 And if Christ hath not been raised, false certainly is our preaching concerning him, and false also is your faith in his death, as an atonement for sin, to not only false, (ver. 14.) but useless: Ye are still under the guilt of your sins. 18 Certainly also they who are fallen asleep (of X. 167) for Christ, are perished.

19 If in this life only we have hope, (e. 165.) by Christ, we are of all men (460.) the most miserable.

20 (Now cf.) But now Christ is raised from the dead, and is become the first-fruits of them that have fallen asleep.

21 For since (it is so) through a man came death, through a man also cometh the resurrection of the dead.

22 Therefore, as by Adam all men die, so also by Christ all shall be made alive.

23 But every one in his proper band: the first-fruits, Christ; afterward they who are Christ's at his coming.
1 Corinthians

Chap. XV.

24 Then the end shall be, when he will deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he shall have destroyed all government, and all authority, and power.

25 For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. Now, if what saith that all things are subjected, which manifestly is that, for he is excepted who hath subjected all things to him.

26 The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed. For the last enemy, death, shall be destroyed. For the last enemy, death, shall be destroyed.

27 Wherefore he saith, The Lord himself shall subject all things to himself, and that God may be over all things, in all places.

28 (Ps. 103.) Now, when all things (και ουσίαι) are subjected to him, then (και συντέλεσθαι) shall all things be subjected to him, who subjected all things to him, that God may be over all things, in all places.

29 (Eph. 1:22, 23.) Otherwise, what shall they do who are baptized (και τους βάπτισαν, suppl. τους αὐτούς) for the resurrection of the dead, who are to be raised by themselves, and the wicked by themselves. In the following clause the subject is undeveloped, that the righteous are not to be raised at Christ’s coming; that is, they are to be raised first, as those who shall live at the resurrection of the wicked are raised. See the next note. Having given this general statement of the apostle, he declares, that “then the end shall be,” and that Christ, after the judgment, will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, completely established. Next, he shows that the resurrection of the dead is possible, verse 39-57; then he describes the body which shall be given to the righteous, verses 42-44; and affirms that the wicked, when he calls earthly men, are to be raised with corruptible bodies, like those which they derived from Adam; but the righteous, or glorified men, are to have bodies like Christ’s glorious body.

30 At his coming. — See the apostle affirms, verse 22, that all men shall be made alive by Christ, and in this verse, that every one shall be made alive in his own body; also, see we are told, 1 Thess. 4:16 that the righteous who are alive in the coming of Christ, and who are to be changed, (verse 18, of this chapter,) shall not anticipate them who are asleep, is probable, as was observed in the preceding note, that they will not be changed till the righteous are raised. Their change, however, will happen before the resurrection of the wicked, who, as they are to awake to shame and everlasting contempt, will be raised, I think, last of all.

31 Ver. 36, Deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father. — Deliver up the mediatorial kingdom, called Matt. xxii. 30, “all power in heaven and in earth, that is to say, over all things, as well as over all men, administered by the Son for the good of his church. See verse 28. This kingdom our Lord received in the human nature, as the mediatorial kingdom, and was solemnly instituted in it after his resurrection, when he ascended into heaven, and was invited by God to sit at his right hand, until he should make his enemies his footstool. Hereafter, he said, Col. 1:17, “He is before all things, and by him all things consist;” and because we are told, Heb. 1:3, that the Son, while he spake the gospel, "spoke all things by the word of his power," it is believed, that, besides the mediatorial kingdom which he administered in the human nature, and which he will deliver up to the Father after the judgment, he possessed the government of the universe from the beginning in his character as Creator. In like manner, when Christ prayed to his Father, John xvii. 24, "Glory thou with me with thy Father, and with him which I have, even from before the world was," it is thought by many, that he referred to the glory of governing the angels, which he enjoyed with the Father before our world was created; and that after the mediatorial kingdom is delivered up, the kingdom which he holds as Creator will remain with him from the beginning. So that after the judgment, the righteous shall enter still into the everlasting kingdom of Jesus Christ, as they are represented to do, 2 Pet. i. 11.

32 See the note here. But to this opinion, verse 39, of this chapter is opposed, where we are told that when all the enemies are subjected, then shall even the Son himself be subjected to the Father, that all government may be administered by God himself, and all obedience and honor be directed immediately to him. See verse 39, note 2.

33 Ver. 39. The last enemy shall be destroyed. — The common version of this passage, as Hallel observes, implies there are some enemies who shall not be destroyed; which is wrong; for all enemies shall be destroyed, verse 25. The same author thinks that because death is called the last enemy, it is to be last destroyed. For this is not true, if the destruction of death is to be accomplished by the resurrection. For the devil and his angels, and wicked men, are to be judged and punished after the devil and angels are destroyed. By Chrysostom’s opinion, death is called the last enemy, because he entered into the world after the devil and man entered.

34 Ver. 27. He is excepted who hath subjected all things to him. — This declaration concerning the Christian’s being subject to Christ is not the subject of verse 24, but of verse 27, that is, it was intended to prevent us from interpreting what is said of the exaltation of the Son’s dominion in such a manner as to have that he is in any respect superior to the Father. Theophylact thought it was intended to prevent the Greeks, who were feeble in their own mythology, from suspecting that the apostle was insinuating the superiority taught in their fables, concerning Jupiter and his son Jupiter. And, by putting his Father Saturn, and confining him to the Fortunate Island. By inferring from the words of the psalm, that the Father did not subject himself to the Son, the apostle intimates, not only that the supreme dominion of the Father is asserted in the psalm, but also, that when the Son’s government is no longer necessary, the Father will resume the kingdom, and govern it for ever in person.

35 Ver. 25-1. Are subjected. — In the preceding verse, the apostle speaks of God’s constituting Christ universal Lord; in this, he speaks of his actually subduing all things to him: this distinction the apostle himself hath made, Heb. ii. 8. Then even the Son himself shall be subjected to him. — This subjection of the Son to the Father is generally understood of the subjection of his human nature, whereas formerly he governed the mediatorial kingdom. But this Arius affirms, that it had been left to him to receive from his Father,专项资金 for the Son’s mediatorial kingdom, and not to subject himself to God, the Father. Why does he lead us to the Godhead, comprehending Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, who, when the king of kings, he was, when the co-eternal Son, he was, and when the Godhead, he was, he was in union govern all things without the intervention of any mediator. But on supposition that the Son, in conjunction with the Father and Spirit, is to govern, two questions will occur. First, How did the Son become to speak of the Son’s subjection to the Father, seeing he is by his very name, in subservience to the highest angel, and is acknowledged by them as their superior through all eternity? Now this superiority being considered as a kind of reign, it is perhaps the apostle means when he said Timothy, 2 Epist. ii. 2. "If we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him." See also 2 Pet. i. 21.

36 Ver. 29. Baptized for the resurrection of the dead. — That the meaning of this passage is to be stanced, is observed, Stier. — That as the phrase, ver. 18, "baptized for Christ," evidently signifies "baptized for believing and justifying the dead in the Son of God," so here, “baptized for the dead” may signify “baptized for believing and justifying the resurrection of the dead.” Next.
I. CORINTHIANS

if the dead rise not at all! and why are they baptized (Lwv 29 vavov) for the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not at all? And what inducement can they have to suffer death for believing the resurrection of the dead? And if the resurrection of the dead is a falsehood, why do we apostles also expose ourselves to death every hour by preaching it? 30 By the boasting concerning you, which I have (cx. 167) an account of from Christ Jesus our Lord, I am in danger of death daily, for preaching the resurrection of the dead. 31 If, after the manner of men, I have fought with wild beasts at Ephesus, what is the eminence of that in comparison to me, if the dead rise not? It had been better to have followed the maxim of the wicked, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. 32 Be not deceived: Evil communications corrupt good manners. 154 Awake, as is fit, and do not sin; for some of you are ignorant of God. 155 How can the dead be raised up? and with what kind of body do they come? 156 Thou fool, (Io x eivov) what thou sowest is not quickened unless it die. 157 as our Lord termed the sufferings he was to undergo at Jerusalem, a baptism with which he was to be baptized, Luke xii. 43, and declared that James and John should be baptized with the baptism he was to be baptized with, Matt. xx. 23, that is, should undergo like sufferings with him, in representing the sufferings which the first Christ was endured under the title of a baptism, the apostle adopted his Master's phrasing, and reasoned strongly, when he asked the Corinthians, What shall they do who are baptized for believing and trusting? the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Others understand the word baptism here in its ordinary meaning. For baptism being an emblematical representation of the death and resurrection, not only of the first Christ, but of all mankind, Rom. vi. 4, it was fully made the rite of initiation into the Christian church; and the person who received it, thereby publicly professing his belief of the resurrection of Christ Jesus and the holiness of God. And the greatest property he added that has been baptized for the dead, that is, for his belief of the resurrection of the dead. Ellis in his Fornuix Sacram, p. 137, translates the clause as baptism with which he was to be baptized, Matt. xx. 23, that is, should undergo like sufferings with him, in representing the sufferings which the first Christ was endured under the title of baptism, and so the translation very well by the following passage from Dionys. Halicar. de. Christ. bapt. ap. Tert. 130. They decreed to call other witnesses (to testify) in place of those who had died in the cause, his interpretation weakens the force of the apostle's argument. The same objection lies against the second interpretation. Some are of opinion, that they are to be put here for he is putting, for the dead man, John 11. 44, as if there were no baptism for the apparently dead, but the resurrection will continue forever. See Ex. xxv. 12. But I doubt whether this phrase can be translated here. Many ancient MSS. have the same word, for them, for the dead. But that reading does not improve the sense of the passage in the least. Upon the whole, the first mentioned seems to be the most probable interpretation of this difficult and difficult passage. 158 Ver. 31. By the boasting concerning you which I have, &c. The clause εαυτοις αὐτον is the accusative of the object, boasting concerning you, as is plain from the apostle's adding αὐτοις, which I have an account of Christ Jesus. It was the custom anciently to swear by such things as were the objects of men's greatest affection. The apostle, therefore, on this solemn occasion, swears by what was the subject of his continual boasting, namely, the conversion of the Corinthians, of which God had made him the instrument. 159 Ver. 32. 1. If (Io x eivov eivov xloiov) I have fought with wild beasts, &c. It would be translated, 'If I had fought, what would have pleased me? But that was a real, not a metaphorical conflict with beasts, may be collected from what the apostle tells Corinthians 2 Cor. 11. 3. and from the phrase manner of men, which means the barbarous custom of the mode of that age. See 2 Peter, sect. 8. p. 17. 2. For the difference of fighting with, and being exposed to, wild beasts, see chap. iv. 9. note 1. 2. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die. This, which may be called the Epicurean's sensual or cruel, hath been the favourite signification of the word so frequently used in this sense. According to Lardner, it means, that we wicked, in deprecation of the prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, used by the Chaldee and other one another. chap. xil. 18. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die. The author of the Book of Wisdom likewise hath very expressively expressed the sentiment of the word so, from which it appears that by dying they meant their own utter annihilation. 3. The Corinthians, as is supposed, that this is from the Thasi of Mosander, the celebrated Athenian poet, because it is found among the fragments of his works, p. 173. And Tertullian remarks, that in quoting, the apostle hath asterlized the poet's expression; by which he seems to intimiate, that he had made it a part of inspired scripture. But it rather think it is a proverbial expression, which need not be referred to any peculiar matter, having been commonly used. The phrase word baptism, signifies not only the ordinance, but every kind of mystical intercourse. And therefore, as Alberii observes, the phrase baptism for the dead, might be translated baptism of the company. The person whose company the apostle desired the Corinthians to shun, were those who remained against the immortality of the soul and a future state. Ver. 33. 1. Awake, as is fit. — 9 σιγισ εἰσίν, literally sign is, is to become sober after having been drunk. The figure is striking. It represents the corrupt part of the Corinthians as intemperate with false doctrine and apostate indulgences. For which reason the apostle called on them to awake, as was fit, out of the deep sleep of drunkenness by that intonation, and to recover the use of their reason. 2. Some of you are ignorant of God. — Such of the Corinthians as denied the resurrection and a future state, showed great ignorance, both of God's character as moral Governor of the world, and of his perfections, especially his power and goodness set forth in the works of creation. Ver. 35. How can the dead be raised up? and with what kind of body do they come? Here, in vs. 12, the present of the indicative is used for the present of the subjunctive. How can the dead be raised up? See 2 Cor. iv. 4. According to this translation, the apostle mentions two questions which were put by the philosophers for the purpose of overthrowing the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. The first, How is it possible that the dead can be raised up? The second, If it be possible, with what kind of body do they come? But if the indicative sense of the verb is retained in the translation, there will be no difficulty in the interpretation. For the question, with what kind of body do they come? is in meaning precisely the same with the question, How can the dead be raised up? and makes a tautology which ought not to be imputed to so logical and concise a writer as St. Paul. Besides, in what follows, these are answered as different questions. For in answer to the first question, How can the dead be raised up? the apostle begins with proving the possibility of the resurrection, by appealing to the power of God displayed in raising from death, and in giving to each of the kinds, when it is grown up, the body proper to it: also in making bodies celestial and bodies terrestrial, each having its own properties by which it is distinguished from all others. And from these instances of the power of God, the apostle infers, that the resurrection of the dead is possible, ver. 36-42. His answer to the second question, What kind of body do they come from the middle of a vessel to the middle of another, beginning with the body of the righteous, (see ver. 32 note 2) whose properties he contrasts with the properties of the body which is laid in the grave. Then at ver. 41, he tells us, that earthly or wicked men are to come out of the grave with an earthly or fleshly body, like that which they derived from the earthly Adam, and which they died. Next, with respect to the righteous who are found alive on the earth at the coming of Christ, he declares that their body will be changed in a moment into an incorruptible and immortal body, because flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, 1 Cor. xv. 50. 36. 1. Thou fool. — The apostle gave the false teacher at Corinth the appellation of fool, in the same sense, and for the same reason that our Lord himself called the Pharisees fools, namely, on account of their ignorance and wickedness, Matt. xxii. 17. 2. What thou sowest is not quickened unless it die. — To illustrate the possibility of the resurrection, the apostle appeals to a thing which men every day behold, and which is little less wonderful than 37 And as to what thou sowest, thou sowest not the body which shall be, but bare grain, or perhaps of wheat, or of some of the other grains.

38 But God giveth it a body, as it hath pleased him, and to each of the seeds (σας ἄνους) its proper body.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh of men, another of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

40 And there are bodies celestial, and bodies terrestrial: but the former is glory, the latter is dishonour.

41 The glory of the moon is one, and the glory of the stars another. If there be glory of the stars in the heaven, is not a greater glory of the sun?

42 (Olyv, καὶ ὑπήρξαν ὑμεῖς.) Wherefore, even, the resurrection of the dead is possible!

43 It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power:

44 The resurrection itself— the reproduction of grain from seed sown, which does not grow unless it be sown in the ground. But, after its body is destroyed, something springs forth out of it, which by a wonderful process, the effect of the power of God, ensues in the reproduction of the same kind of grain, but bare as it was sown, but richly adorned with leaves, stalk, and ear.

Ver. 39.—Then sowest thou not the body which shall be. —By affirming that the grain produced from the seed sown is not the same body which is sown, the apostle shows insinuation, that the body to be raised is not numerically the same with the body deposited at death, but essentially the same kind formed by the energy of God. Having such an example of the divine power before our eyes, we cannot think the reproduction of the impossible, though its parts be utterly disfigured. Further, although the very numerical body is not raised, the body is truly raised, because what is raised being united to the soul, there will arise in the man thus completed a consciousness of his identity, by which he will be sensible of the justness of the retribution which is due to him for his deeds. Besides, this new body will be more than the substance of the old, by serving even to the perfection and happiness of the man in his new state. See ver. 41, note. According to this view of the subject, a distinction is taken from the substance of the particles of the body that dies, has no place; because it does not seem necessary that the body to be raised should be composed of them. For the scripture nowhere affirms, that the same numerical body is raised. But bare grain.—In the opinion of some, the example of the grain, which first dies and then revives, is intended to intimate, that in the human body there is a seminal principle which is not destroyed by death; and which, at the appointed season, will reproduce the power of life, as a cereal plant, when wanted, by the quickening influence of his power. But is a seminal principle any thing different from that power? What occasion then have we to carry our thoughts in that matter beyond God's power? Besides, as there is no insuperable principle in plants, the analogy does not hold. I therefore suppose this wonderful, though common instance, is intended to shew that the resurrection of the body is not beyond the power of God to accomplish; and that it may certainly be expected, according to Christ's promise.

Ver. 40. All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh of men, &c. —Locke thinks flesh in this verse means organized animal body. But I rather imagine it denotes the substance of which animal bodies are composed. For as in the preceding verse the apostle speaks of the substance of the dead body, so in this verse he directs our attention to the same power of God, displayed in that wonderful diversity of animal substances which hath formed into different sorts of organized bodies, each with members properly adapted to the instincts of its habitation; and to the manner of life for which it is adapted. The greatness of the divine power, the apostle observes, is likewise conspicuous in the diversification of animate bodies, both celestial and terrestrial, which hath produced. And from the whole he draws this conclusion, ver. 43, that in God's power being so gloriously manifested in the greatness and variety of the material substances which he hath already formed, and in the diversity of their configuration, he must be a God indeed, ver. 43, who taketh upon him to affirm that he cannot raise up a body for his saints, at the last day, to form and use similar to their present body, and perfectly adapt the faculties of their minds, and to the new world in which they are to dwell.

Ver. 40. But (ὁ δὲ) different indeed is the glory of the celestial, &c. —The apostle does not mean that the glory of the celestial bodies is different from that of the terrestrial, but that the celestial bodies differ from one another, in glory, as plain from ver. 43. In like manner, the terrestrial bodies differ from each other, in glory, that is, in beauty and utility. Ver. 42. Wherefore, even, the resurrection of the dead is possible. —From these examples of the power of God, the conclusion is, that the resurrection of the dead is possible.

43 It is laid in the grave dishonour by death, the punishment of sin; it is raised glorious in beauty: It is buried in weakness through through mutilation, disease, and old age; it is raised in power, with all its members complete, active, and vigorous.
I. CORINTHIANS.

44 It is sown (σπόρον ἐκατέβαλλεν) an animal body, it is raised (εἰς θανάτῳ θεοῦ) a spiritual body. There is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body.

45 For thus it is written, (Gen. ii. 7.) The first man Adam was made (ἐν ἑαυτῷ ἐκτένεια) a living soul; i.e. the last Adam (ὡς ἔδωκεν τῷ ἔκαμφτος) a vivifying Spirit.

46 However, that was not first which is spir-

Ver. 33. — It is sown in dishonour. — The body laid in the grave dead, is to be sown in dishonour, because death is the punishment of sin. Hence our body laid in the grave is called, Philo. ii. 6. "the body sown to dishonour." It is said to be sown in dishonour, because the "first Adam, who was a type of the last," was "brought into the likeness of Adam," in which likeness he was raised up also. Paul affirms, when giving an account of the resurrection of Adam, that he was raised up "in manifest glory and might," and that the glory of God was manifested in him; for God was manifest in his flesh, and in him was "the true image of the invisible God," and "he beheld the heavenly glory," and "he became the brightness of his glory." The resurrection of Adam is said to be "the principle of the resurrection of the body," and the "pattern of the resurrection of the body," because Adam was the "pattern of the new creature," and the "pattern of the new body," and the "pattern of the new life."

Ver. 34. — It is sown in weakness. — The body laid in the grave is raised in glory; and as it was sown in dishonour, so is it raised in glory. But this is not the case with the body of the righteous. The body of the righteous is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is raised in glory, because he is I. CORINTHIANS.

Ver. 50. That which is spiritual.—Here we are taught, that the plan of the divine government is to lead his creatures from a lower to an higher state of perfection. They, therefore, who contend that things should be as perfect at the beginning as at the conclusion of its administration, are wiser than the Lord.

Ver. 51. The second man, the Lord from heaven, is heavenly.—This translation is supported by the Vulgate version; "Second man, of heaven, the earthy." The second man from heaven is Jesus, mentioned by His people, all which have here respect. Nevertheless I have marked the words as heavenly, as in the Greek, because, although I think it was not written by the apostle, I would not alter the pre-supposition, neither on the word or authority. In the Vulgate the word Jesus is wanting, having, as Tertullian states, been added by Marcion. Yet I am less inclined to read it thus.

Ver. 52. As the earth, so also the heaven. —The apostle divides all mankind into two sorts, earthy and heavenly; and describes the first sort as the earthly man, and the second as the heavenly man. But the question is, Whether the likeness of the earth, or the likeness of the heavenly, be a present or a future likeness? Our translators seem to have been divided on this point, whether the apostle speaks of men in the present life, and the likeness to the earthy and the heavenly in the person of Jesus, or whether they are in the transaction supposed, to be in the same tense, as the earth, such as also the heavenly, such as they also are. But I rather think the apostle describes mankind as they were to be in the world to come, and that the likeness to the earthy and to the heavenly man, is likeness in body which is to take place after the resurrection and therefore in the translation, I have supplied the comparative verb in the future tense: "Shall also the earthy be? And in support of my translation, I observe, that throughout the whole of this discourse concerning the resurrection, it is the body only which is spoken of. This is evident, not especially from ver. 44, 45, 46, 47, where we are told, that it is even an earthly body, but raised a spiritual body; that there is an animal and a spiritual body allotted to the righteous in the different stages of their existence; that they derive their animal body from Adam, but their spiritual body from Christ; that the spiritual body is not first given to them, but their animal, and then that which is spiritual; that the first man, Adam, being from the earth, his body was earthly, but the second man the Lord from heaven, his body is heavenly. Wherefore, when the apostle says, ver. 46, 49. As the earthy, such as also the earthly, so also the heavenly, it is plain that he speaks only of the body of the earthly man, and the earthly man, such as they also are heavenly. This appears likewise, wise from ver. 49, where he says, "As we have borne the image of the earthy man, even, in this life, (αὐτοῖς ἡμῶν ἐπιθύμησαν) we shall also bear the image of the heavenly man, even, in the life to come. For to shew that he speaks of our bearing the image of the earthy man, no other image can be in our body only, he adds, ver. 50. And this I affirm, brethren, because flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. I affirm, that in the life to come we shall bear the image of the heavenly man in our body, because a body consisting of flesh and blood, as is the body we have derived from the earthly man, cannot inherit the kingdom of God. That the righteous, after the resurrection, are to bear the image of the heavenly in their spirit, I do not deny; I only contend, that it is not taught in this passage of scripture.

Ver. 50. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, —This is that happy place which Christ hath gone to prepare for the receipt of his people, John xiv. 2. In that place bodies composed of flesh and blood cannot live, because, as is said in the commentary, it affords an object suited either to the senses or to the appetites of a bodily body. See ver. 44, note. 2. Neither can corruption inherit incorruption.—A spirit clothed with a corruptible body, like our present bodies, cannot enjoy objects that are incorruptible. They are not capable of enjoying the divine vision, nor of performing the exalted services, nor of retaining the pure pleasures, which constitute the glory and felicity of the kingdom of God.

Ver. 51. But we shall all be changed.—To prove that the righteous, when raised from the dead, shall be changeable, the apostle affirmed, ver. 60. that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, and that corruption cannot inherit incorruption. Wherefore, lest this might have led the Corinthians to fancy that the righteous, who, at the coming of Christ, are found alive on the earth in fleshly corporeal bodies, could not inherit the kingdom of God unless they were made to be incorruptible; the apostle tells them that they are to be not to die, but that God makes them capable of inheriting the kingdom of God, their body to be changed. Wherefore, though the apostle says, that they shall not all die, but we shall all be changed, be general, yet, as the discourse is concerning them who are to inherit the kingdom of God, the expression, "we shall all be changed," must be restricted to them alone; consequently, though it be true of the wicked that are alive on the earth at the coming of Christ, that they shall not die, it does not follow from the apostle's saying, "we shall all be changed," that the wicked are to be changed. Besides, it is nowhere said in scripture, that the wicked, whether dead or alive at the coming of Christ, shall obtain the honour of incorruptible heavenly bodies. See 1 Thess. iv. 15, note 5.

Ver. 52. At the last trumpet, —At the giving of the law from Sinai, there was heard a great noise, like the sounding of trumpets, exceeding loud, which sounded long, and was heard louder and louder. In like manner, at the descent of Christ from heaven, a great noise, called the trumpet of God. 1 Thess. iv. 16. will be made by the ascending angels, as the signal for the righteous to come forth from their graves. And this noise being made at Christ's command, it is called by himself his voice, John xiv. 25. After the righteous are raised, the trumpet shall sound a second time; on which account it is called here the last, and of the heavenly man. This sounds the righteous who are alive on the earth shall be changed.

And then the dead shall be raised incorruptible.—Though this expression be general, yet, for the reasons before mentioned, ver. 51, note, it must be restricted to the dead in Christ, of whom the apostle is discoursing. Besides, as the circumstances of the resurrection, ver. 16. The dead in Christ shall rise first, demonstrates that the wicked are not to be raised at the same time; therefore, the expression, 'the dead shall be raised incorruptible,' does not refer to them.
I. CORINTHIANS.

53 For, to make us capable of inheriting the kingdom of God, this corruptible body must become incorruptible, not liable to diseases; and this mortal body must become immortal, not liable to death.

54 Now, when this transformation of our corruptible and mortal body into that which is incorruptible and immortal shall have taken place, then shall happen the thing which is written, (Isa. xxv. 8, 9.) Death, who delivered the righteous to the grave to be swallowed up, shall itself be swallowed up for ever by its resurrection to eternal life.

55 Where, O death, is thy sting? Where, O grave! is thy victory?

56 (Is. lix.) For the sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law.

57 Now thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

58 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye (4 eis) stable, unmoveable, abounding in the work of the Lord at all times, knowing that your labour in the Lord is not (ou avew) vain.

Ver. 53. For this corruptible body must (o evkrothene and e yugene) put on incorruption. — That e yugene, body, is rightly supplied here, see ver. 42. note. The words hereafter literally signify, to go into the place, and metaphorically, to put on, or go into clothes. But the metaphorical meaning must not be insisted on here as implying, that our corruptible body shall have one that is incorruptible put over it in another person. These ideas are incongruous, and therefore the meaning is, This corruptible body must be changed into one that is incorruptible, as mentioned ver. 31. — The righteous who are saved shall enter into the glory of Christ, instead of dying and rising again immortal, shall, by the power of Christ, have their corruptible mortal bodies changed in a moment into incorruptible immortal bodies, and that must be fitting for inheriting the kingdom of God equally with those who are raised from the dead incorruptible.

Ver. 54. Death is swallowed up for ever. — So the original phrase ei eis, may be translated, being often used by the LXX. in that sense, as Whitby hath proved. This circumstance likewise shows, that in his discourse concerning the resurrection, the apostle had the righteous chiefly in view. For it cannot be said of the wicked, who are to suffer the second death, that death is swallowed up in any sense with respect to them, or that God hath given them the victory over it, ver. 57. by the resurrection. Ib. Pearce in his note on this verse observes, that the LXX. translation of Isa. xxv. 8, here quoted, runs thus: Ero eis, translated the grave, literally signifies, the invisible world, or the place where departed spirits, both good and bad, remain till the resurrection. Job vi. 8; Psal. xxv. 8; Isa. xiv. 9, and especially Psal. xvi. 10. "Thou wilt not leave my soul (ou avew) in hell." The place where the spirits of the righteous abode, the Jews called Paradise; the place where the wicked are shut up, they called Tartarus, after the Greek. There the rich man is said to have gone when he died. There also many of the fallen angels are said to be now imprisoned, 2 Pet. ii. 4. — In this state the passage the apostle personifies death and the grave, and introduces the righteous, after the resurrection, singing a song of victory over both. In this sublime song, death is represented as a terrible monarch, having a deadly sting, whereby he had destroyed the bodies of the whole human race, and the invisible world; and it is the apostle who had imprisoned their spirits. But the sting being torn from death, and the gates of the invisible world set open by Christ, the bodies of the righteous shall rise from the grave, no more liable to be destroyed by death, and their spirits being brought out of paradise, the place of their abode, shall reanimate their bodies: and the first use of their newly recovered tongue will be to sing this song, in which they exult over death and hades, as enemies utterly destroyed; and praise God who hath given them the victory over these deathless foes through Jesus Christ. Milton hath made good use of the apostle's personification of death, Book ii. l. 666. "The other form, &c."

Ver. 57. Who giveth us the victory. — The victory over death and the grave the saints shall obtain, by their resurrection to an endless life in the body; and the victory over sin, and over the curse of the law, will be given them by their acquittal at the judgment. For their trial being then ended, there shall from that time forth, in the kingdom of God, be neither sin, nor law, with the penalty of death annexed to it.

Ver. 58. Unmoveable. — The Greek word eisvav, literally signifies unmoveable. But here it must be translated unmoveable, because that is a quality not competent to men in the present life. See Rom. ii. 6. note.

CHAPTER XVI.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

Before the apostle concluded his letter to the Corinthians, he gave them directions for making the collection for the saints in Judea. During his eighteen months' abode at Corinth, he had exhorted the brethren to undertake that good work, (as indeed he did the brethren in all the Gentile churches,) with a view to establish a cordial union between the converted Jews and Gentiles everywhere. See 3 Cor. ix. 14. note. And so desirous were the Corinthians of the proposed union, that on the first mention of the collection, they agreed to make it. But the divisions in the church at Corinth, it seems, had hitherto hindered them from beginning it. The apostle, therefore, in this letter requested them to set about it immediately, and directed them how to do it, ver. 1-4. At the time St. Paul wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians, he had altered his resolution respecting his voyage to Corinth, of which he had formerly given them notice by Timothy and Erastus, as mentioned 2 Cor. i. 15, 16. For he now informed them, that instead of sailing directly from Ephesus to Corinth, as he had at first proposed, his intention was, not to come to them immediately, but to take Macedonia in his way, ver. 5- After staying at Ephesus till Pentecost, on account of the extraordinary success with which he was preaching the gospel to the inhabitants of the province of Asia, who resorted to him in that metropolis, ver. 6-9. — In the mean time, to compensate the loss which the Corinthians sustained by his delaying to visit them, he wrote to them this letter, in which he gave them the instructions which he would have delivered to them if he had come to them; and promised, when he came, to abide a considerable time, and perhaps to winter with them, ver. 5, 6. — And because he had sent Timothy to Corinth some time before, he begged the Corinthians to give him a good reception, if he came to them, ver. 10, 11. — With respect to Apollos, whom, it seems, the Corinthians wished to see, he told them, he had entreated him to go to them with the brethren, but that, having no inclination to go to Corinth at that time, he had deferred his visit till he should see a convenient season. Perhaps the inopportune behaviour of the faction, while Apollos was among them, had so disgusted him that he did not choose to expose himself a second time to their attempts. To his apology for Apollos the apostle subjoined a few practical advices: Then desired them to show a particular regard to the members of the family of Stephen, because they were the first fruit of Arabia, and had employed themselves zealously in the ministry to the saints, ver. 13–18.

The apostle, before finishing his letter, sent to the Corinthians the salutations of the churches of the promon-torial Asia, and of the brethren at Ephesus who assisted him in preaching the gospel, ver. 19, 20.—Then wrote his particular salutation to them with his own hand, ver. 21.

CHAP. XVI.—1 Now, concerning the collection which is for the saints, as I orded 1 the churches of Galatia, so also do ye.

2 On the first day of every week let each of you lay somewhat by itself, according as he may have prospered, putting it into the treasury, that when I come there may be then no collections.

3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by letters, then I will send to carry your (Greek, grace) gift to Jerusalem.

4 (3a, 108.) Or, if it be proper that even I should go, they shall go with me.

5 (3a, 108.) Now I will come to you after, when I have passed through Macedonia: (For I do pass through Macedonia.)

6 And perhaps I shall abide, and even winter with you, that ye may send me forward, whithersoever I may go.

7 For I will not now see you in passing, but I hope to remain with you some time, if the Lord permit.

8 However, I shall remain (v. 173.) at Ephesus until Pentecost.

9 For a great and effectual door is opened to me; 1 (v. 211.) yet there are many op-

Ver. 1. As I ordered the churches of Galatia.—The apostle, I suppose, gave these orders to the churches of Galatia, when he went through Phrygia, and the region of Galatia, establishing the churches, as mentioned Acts xvi. 6. And the collections made by the churches of Galatia he may have received, when, in his way to Ephesus, where he now was, he went through all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia in order, Acts xxiv. 31.

Ver. 2.—1 On the first day of every week.—Kρατεῖτε τὴν πρώτην καθ' ἡμέραν τὴν ἑβδομάδον. The Hebreos used the numeral for the ordinal numbers, Gen. i. 5.

2 Two evening and the morning were one day, in the ancient Hebrew.

Ver. 2.—2 I will send to carry your gift to Jerusalem.—Kαταβαίνων ἐμείς ἐπὶ τῆς ἱερουσαλήμ, καταβαίνων τὴν κομοδίαν τῆς ἱερουσαλήμ. This is the same word, παραλαμβάνω, in the LXX. which gives the form of the word. The word is used in the context of sending someone to Jerusalem, sending a gift to Jerusalem.

3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by letters.—Osborne's translation of the verse is, 'Whomsoever ye shall approve, them will I send (ἐκ προθεών) with letters, to carry your gift.' Thayer's note on the word suggests that the translation is correct, as it indicates that the apostle intended to carry the gifts with him personally.

4 Or, if it be proper that even I should go to Jerusalem, your messengers shall go with me, to witness the delivery of your gift.—Orions translation of the verse is, 'Those that shall be approved shall carry your gift.' This translation is also correct, as it indicates that the apostle was inviting the messengers to accompany him to Jerusalem.

5 Now I will come to you after, when I have pass through through Macedonia: (For I do
pass through Macedonia.)

6 And perhaps I shall continue some time, and even winter with you, that ye may send me forward, whithersoever I may go.

Lord permit.

this city is granted to me by God. Yet there are many violent oppressors of the gospel in Ephesus, and its neighbourhood.

In use to assemble on the first day of the week for the purpose of worshiping God. And as the apostle gave the same order to the churches of Galatia, they likewise must have held religious assemblies on the first day of the week. See Whitby's note on this passage.

Ver. 3. Whomsoever (ἐκ προθεών) ye shall approve.—Whomsoever ye shall approve, them will I send (ἐκ προθεών) with letters, to carry your gift.' Thayer's note on the word suggests that the translation is correct, as it indicates that the apostle intended to carry the gifts with him personally.

Ver. 4. Or, if it be proper that even I should go to Jerusalem, your messengers shall go with me, to witness the delivery of your gift.—Orions translation of the verse is, 'Those that shall be approved shall carry your gift.' This translation is also correct, as it indicates that the apostle was inviting the messengers to accompany him to Jerusalem.

Ver. 5. Now I will come to you after, when I have pass through through Macedonia: (For I do
pass through Macedonia.)

Ver. 6. And perhaps I shall continue some time, and even winter with you, that ye may send me forward, whithersoever I may go.

Ver. 7. For I will not now see you in passing, but I hope to remain with you some time, if the Lord permit.

Ver. 8. However, I shall remain (v. 173.) at Ephesus until Pentecost.

this city is granted to me by God. Yet there are many violent oppressors of the gospel in Ephesus, and its neighbourhood.
I. CORINTHIANS.

10 Now, if Timothy be come, whom I sometime ago sent to you, (chap. iv. 17,) take care, by showing your affection and obedience, that he be among you without fear: for he worketh, even as I do, the work of the Lord.

11 Wherefore, let no one despise him; but send him forward in peace, that he may come to me: for I expect him with the brethren.

12 And with relation to our brother Apollos, I entreated him much to go to you with the brethren: (see) but his inclination was not at all to go now; but he will go, when he shall find a convenient season.

13 Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit yourselves like men: be strong.

14 Let all your matters be done with love.

15 Ye know the family of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of Achaia, and that they have devoted themselves to the ministry to the saints. I entreat you, (1 Thes. 5. 10.) therefore, brethren, 16 That ye submit yourselves to each other, and to every joint worker and labourer.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus: for they have supplied your deficiency.

18 (1 Cor. 7. 9.) And have refreshed my spirit and yours: wherefore, acknowledge ye such persons.

19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church which is in their house. (See Rom. xvi. 5. note 1.)

20 All the brethren salute you. Salute one another with an holy kiss. (See Rom. xvi. 16. note 1.)

21 The salutation of Paul with mine own hand.

22 If any one love not the Lord Jesus Christ, he shall be Anathema, Maranatha.

common. For many who used curiosum, the arts of magic and divination, were converted, and burnt their books containing the secrets of those arts, Acts xix. 19-20. This so enraged the brethren at Ephesus, but especially the craftsmen, that they raised the greatest tumult against them, Acts xix. 23-41.

Ver. 9. That he be among you without fear. — At this time, Timothy being young, and extremely attached to the apostle, there was some reason to fear that the faction would treat him ill; more especially if he determined for those disorderly practices. The apostle therefore recommended it to the sincere part of the church, to defend him from any injury which the faction might attempt to do him, either in his character or his person.

Ver. 11. Expect him with the brethren. — Namely, Eratus, who had been sent with Timothy to Corinth, Acts xix. 22. and Titus, who carried this letter, and another brother whose name is not mentioned, (see 2 Cor. x. 17, 18;) perhaps also, some of the Corinthian brethren, whom the apostle had desired Titus to bring with him to Ephesus, having need of their assistance there.

Ver. 12. — 1. His inclination was not at all to go now. — The Latin commentators are of opinion, that Apollos, displeased with the behavior of the faction, had left them as incorrigible, and had returned to Ephesus, from whence he had been recommended to the brethren of Achaia, Acts xviii. 27. xix. 1. But the messengers from Corinth arriving with a letter to the apostle full of respect, he answered it by Titus, and requested Apollos to accompany him, in the hope that he might be useful in assisting Titus to settle the disturbance in that church. But Apollos refused to go, knowing the violent temper of the faction.

2. But he will go when he shall find a convenient season. — Jerome says, Apollos actually went to Corinth, after the disturbances had ceased. But whether or not this is so, derived from his own opinion, or some ancient tradition, is uncertain.

Ver. 14. Let all your matters be done with love. — Namely, your differences about worldly affairs, mentioned chap. vi. your disputes concerning marriage and a single state, chap. vii. your eating things sacrificed to idols, chap. x. your desire about the Lord's supper, chap. x. and your method of exercising your gifts, chapters xiii. in all these ye ought to have a regard to the good of your neighbors, that ye may not occasion each other to sin.

2 D
23. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.
24. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

Wherefore, since the apostle denounced this curse against the man, who, while he professed subscription to Christ, was secretly alienated from his holiness, it is well he had said. Though such a person's wickedness cannot be discovered and punished by the church, yet the Lord at his coming will find it out, and punish him with eternal perdition. This terrible curse the apostle wrote in his epistle to the Corinthians, because many of the faction, but especially their leader, had shown great alienation of mind from Christ. And he wrote it with his own hand, to show how serious he was in the denomination. Eusebius says, from this example, and from the Anathemata pronounced Gal. 1. 9, 5. arose the practice of the ancient general councils, of adding to their decisions, or definitions of doctrines, Anathemata against them who denied these doctrines. See Baxter's Church History, vol. 4. p. 224.

Var. 36. My love be with you all. — Le Clerc suspects that not is a mistake of the transcriber for nor, the abbreviation of neot.

And B. Pearce supposes he is right in that conjecture, because in the conclusion of the second epistle it is, & μετὰ τοῦ τοῦτος, 'the love of God be with you.' But after he wrote the above, without the authority of ancient MSS., are never to be admitted. Besides, there is a great propriety and beauty in this manner of ending an epistle, in which the apostle had so sharply reproved the Corinthians. By assuring them of his love, he comforted them that all the severe things he had written proceeded from his anxiety for their eternal welfare, and thereby removed the prejudices which his reproofs might otherwise have raised in their minds. — Le Clerc's conjecture, mentioned above, that the transcribers of the New Testament have in this passage, by mistake, written not for nor, is one of the many instances which might be produced of conjectural emendations of the sacred text, which, instead of improving, really mar the sense and beauty of the passages into which they would have them introduced.

II. CORINTHIANS.

PREFACE.

SECRET. — Of St. Paul's Design in Writing his Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

When the apostle sent his first letter to the church at Corinth, he resolved to remain in Ephesus till the following Pentecost. (1 Cor. xvi. 8.) That Titus, who carried the other letter, might have time to return, and bring him an account of the manner in which it was received by the Corinthians. But the riot of Demetrius happening soon after, it was sent away, the apostle found it necessary to avoid the fury of the rioters and of the idolatrous rabble, who were all greatly enraged against him, for having turned so many of the inhabitants of Asia from the established idolatry. Wherefore, leaving Ephesus, he went to Tarsus, a noted seaport town to the north of Ephesus, where travellers, coming from Europe into Asia, commonly landed. Here he proposed to employ himself in preaching the gospel of Christ. (2 Cor. ii. 12.) Till Titus should arrive from Corinth. But Titus not coming at the time appointed, St. Paul began to fear that the Corinthians had used him ill, and had disregarded the letter which he delivered to them. These fears so distressed the apostle, that notwithstanding his preaching at Tarsus was attended with uncommon success, he left that city and went forward to Macedonia, expecting to find Titus. But in this expectation he was disappointed. Titus was not in Macedonia when the apostle arrived. He therefore resolved to wait in that country till Titus should come and inform him how the Corinthians stood affected towards their spiritual father. It seems he judged it imprudent to visit them till he knew their state. — In Macedonia St. Paul had many conflicts with the idolaters, (2 Cor. vii. 5.) who were greatly enraged against him, as all the other idolaters were, for opposing both the objects and the rites of their worship. Those fightings, joined with his fears for Titus, and his uncertainty concerning the disposition of the Corinthians, exceedingly distressed the apostle at this time. But his unseasonableness was at length happily removed by the arrival of Titus, and by the agreeable accounts which he gave him of the obedience of the greatest part of the Corinthians, in excommunicating the incestuous person; at which solemn action Titus may have been present. Much encouraged therefore by the good news, the apostle wrote to the Corinthian church this second letter, to confirm the sincere part in their attachment to him, and to separate the rest from the false teacher who had led them so far astray.

To understand this epistle rightly, the reader must recollect, that as Titus spent some time in Corinth after delivering the apostle's first letter, he had an opportunity to make himself acquainted, not only with the state of the sincere part of the church, but with the temper and behaviour of the faction. Wherefore, when he gave the apostle an account of the good disposition of the church, he no doubt at the same time informed him concerning the faction, that some of them still continued in their opposition to him, and in their attachment to the false teacher; and that he was going on in his evil practices. Farther, Titus, by conversing with the faction, having learned the arguments and objections by which their leaders endeavoured to lessen the apostle's authority, together with the scoffing speeches which they used to bring him into contempt, we may believe that he rehashed all these matters to him. Being thus made acquainted with the state of the Corinthian church, St. Paul judged it fit to write to them this second letter. And that it might have the greater weight, he sent it to them by Titus, the bearer of his former epistle. 2 Cor. vii. 17, 18. — In this second letter, the apostle artfully introduced the arguments, objections, and scoffing speeches, by which the faction were endeavouring to bring him into contempt; and not only confused them by the most solid reasoning, but even turned them against the false teacher himself, and against the faction, in such a manner as to render them ridiculous. In short, by the many delicate but pointed ironies with which this epistle abounds, the apostle covered his adversaries with shame, and showed the Corinthians that he excelled in a talent which the Greeks greatly admired. — But while St. Paul thus pointedly defeated the faction and its leaders, he bestowed just commendations on the sincere part of the church, for their persevering in the doctrine he had taught them, and for their ready obedience to his orders concerning the incestuous person. And, to encourage them, he told them, that having boasted of them to Titus, he was glad to find his boasting well founded in every particular.

The Corinthian church being composed of persons of such opposite characters, the apostle, in writing to them, was under the necessity of suitting his discourse to them, according to their different characters. And therefore, if we apply to the whole church of Corinth, the things in the two epistles which apparently were directed to the whole church, but which were intended only for a part of it, we shall think these epistles full of inconsistency, if not of contradiction. But if we understand these things according as the apostle really meant them, every appearance of inconsistency and contradiction will be removed. For he himself hath directed us to distinguish the sincere part of the Corinthians from the factum, 2 Cor. i. 14. "To have acknowledged us in part, that is, a part of you have acknowledged, that we are your boasting."—Chap. ii. 5. Now if a certain person hath grieved me, he hath not grieved me except by a part of you, that I may not lay a load on you all. It is therefore plain, that the matters in the two epistles of the Corinthians which appear inconsistent, are not really so; they belong to different persons. For example, the many commendations bestowed on the Corinthians in these epistles, belong only to the sincere part of them. Whereas, the sharp reproofs, the pointed ironies, and the severe threatenings of punishment denounced in the same epistles, are to be understood as addressed to the faction, and more especially to the teacher who headed the faction. And thus by discriminating the members of the Corinthian church according to their true characters, and by applying to each the passages which belonged to them, every appearance of contradiction vanishes.

SECT. II.—Of the Matters contained in the Epistles to the Corinthians; and of their Usefulness to the Church in every age.

St. Paul's intention, in his Epistles to the Corinthians, being to break the faction which the false teacher had formed in their church in opposition to him, and to confute the calumnies which that teacher and his adherents were industriously propagating for discrediting him as an apostle, many of the things contained in these epistles were necessarily personal to him and to the faction. Nevertheless, we are not on that account to think lightly of these writings, as fancying them of little use now to the church of Christ. The things in them which are most personal and particular, occasional, the apostle to write instructions and precepts, which are of the greatest use to the church in every age. For example, in answering the calumnies by which the faction endeavoured to discredit him as an apostle, he was led to mention facts which demonstrate him to have been an apostle, commissioned by Christ to direct the faith and practice of all the members of the church—such as his having wrought miracles for converting the Corinthians, and his having imparted to them spiritual gifts after they believed; his having preached the gospel to them without receiving any reward from them; his having the whole gospel without reserve; his having endured innumerable hardships in the long journeys in which he undertook for the sake of spreading the gospel, and heavy persecutions in every country from enemies and opposers; 1 Cor. iv. 11, 12, 2 Cor. iv. 8, xii. 23.; his rapture into the third heaven; with a variety of other facts and circumstances respecting himself, which we should not have known, had it not been for the calumnies of the Corinthian faction, and of the Judaizing teachers, who infested the church at Corinth, and other churches, (see Pref. to Galat. Sect. 3.), but which, now that they are known, give us the fullest assurance of his apostleship, and add the greatest weight to his writings. Next, in reproving the faction for their misdeeds, the apostle hath explained the general principles of religion and morality, in such a manner, that they may be applied for regulating our conduct in cases of the greatest importance; and hath delivered rules and advice which, if followed, will have the happiest influence on our temper. For instance, when he rebuked the faction for joining the heathens in their idolatrous feasts, in the temples of their gods, he hath shewed us the obligation Christians are under, in all their actions, not to regard their own interest and pleasure only, but to consult the good of their brethren also; and that they are at no time by their example, even in things indifferent, to lead their weak and scrupulous brethren into sin.—In like manner, when he reproved the Corinthians for eating the Lord's supper in an improper manner, he gave such an account of that holy institution, as shews, not only its true nature and design, but the views also, and the dispositions, with which it ought to be performed.—Finally, the arguments by which the apostle excited the Corinthians to make the collection for the saints in Judea, who, at the time these epistles were written, were in great distress, and the rules by which he wished them to direct themselves in making these collections, are of great and perpetual use for animating the disciples of Christ to perform works of charity with liberality and cheerfulness.

To the things above mentioned we may add, that the epistles to the Corinthians, though suited to their peculiar circumstances, may be read by the disciples of Christ in every age with the greatest profit, because they contain matters of importance not to be found anywhere else in scripture. Such as the long account given in the first epistle of the spiritual men, and of the nature, operation, and use of their gifts, and of the way in which they exercised their gifts for the confirmation of the gospel, and the building of the church; whereby the rapid progress of the gospel in the first and following ages, and the growth of the Christian church to its present greatness, is shewn to be, not the effect of natural causes, but the work of the Spirit of God.—The proof of the resurrection of Christ from the dead, the great foundation of the faith and hope of Christians, is nowhere formally set forth in scripture, but in the 23d chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, where many of the witnesses who saw Christ after his resurrection are appealed to by name, and the times and places of their appearing to them are particularly mentioned; and their veracity is established by the grievous sufferings, sometimes ending in death, which they sustained for witnessing the resurrection of Christ.—In the same chapter, by the most logical reasoning, the resurrection of all the dead at the last day, is shewn to be necessarily connected with Christ's resurrection: so that if he hath been raised, they will be raised also.—There likewise the apostle hath given a circumstantial account of the resurrection of the righteous, and hath described the nature and properties of the body with which they are to rise; from which it appears, that by the reunion of their spirits with their glorious bodies, their happiness will be rendered complete and everlasting. These great discoveries made in the first epistle to the Corinthians, impressed the minds of the disciples of Christ so strongly in the early ages, that they resolutely suffered the bitterest deaths with a rapturous joy, rather than renounce their Master, and their hope of a glorious immortality.—And, to name no more instances, by the comparison which the apostle hath instituted, in the 11th chapter of the second epistle to the Corinthians, between the inspiration of the apostles the ministers of the gospel, and the inspiration of Moses the minister of the law, he hath shewn, that the inspiration of the apostles was far more perfect than the inspiration of Moses: so that, by this discovery, the apostle hath admirably displayed the excellence of the gospel revelation, and raised its authority to the highest pitch.

Before this section is concluded, it may be proper to observe, that from the epistles to the Corinthians, and from Paul's other epistles, we learn that he was the great object of the hatred of all the false teachers in the first age, but especially of the Judaizers. Nor is it any wonder that they were enraged against him, and persecuted him with the bitterest calumnies: For it was this apostle chief who opposed them, in their unrighteous attempt of wresting the yoke of the law of Moses about the neck of the Gentiles. He it was likewise who resisted the introduction of the dogmas of the heathen philosophy into the church, by teachers who, having nothing in view but worldly considerations, endeavoured to convert the Greeks at the expense of corrupting the religion of Christ. In fine, he it was, who openly and severely rebuked the false teachers and their disciples for the licentiousness of their manners.—Yet he was not the only object of these men's malice. Barnabas also had a share of their hatred, (1 Cor. ix. 8.), probably because he had been active in procuring and publishing the decree of the council of Jerusalem, whereby the Gentile converts were freed from obeying the institutions of Moses.

Sect. III. — Of the Place and Time of writing the Second Epistle to the Corinthians; and of the Person by whom it was sent.

Or the place where the apostle wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians, there is little doubt. In the epistle itself, ii. 12, he tells us, that from Ephesus, where he was when he wrote his first epistle, he wrote to Troas, and thence into Macedonia, to meet Titus, whose return he expected about that time: that while he abode in Macedonia, Titus arrived and brought him the good news of the submission of the Corinthians; and that, on hearing these tidings, he wrote his second letter to them, to encourage them to go on with the collection for the saints in Judea, that the whole might be finished before he came to Corinth, 2 Cor. ix. 4, 5. The apostle therefore was in Macedonia, in his way to Corinth to receive their collection, when he wrote his second epistle to the church in that city.

The facts just now mentioned, which show that the apostle's second epistle to the Corinthians was written in Macedonia, in his way from Ephesus to Corinth, after the riot of Demetrius, show likewise that it was written but a few months after the first epistle. For, whether the first was written immediately before or immediately after the riot, there could be but a short interval between the two epistles; namely, the time of the apostle's abode in Ephesus after writing the first letter, and at Troas after leaving Ephesus, and the weeks which he spent in Macedonia before the arrival of Titus; all which, when joined, could not make above half a year at most. Since therefore the second epistle to the Corinthians was written so soon after the first, its date may be fixed to the summer of the year 57. For, as we have shown in the preface, Sect. 5, the first epistle was written in the end of the year 56, or in the beginning of the year 57.

It was observed in Sect. 1. of this Preface, that St. Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians was sent by Titus, who carried his former letter. This excellent person is often mentioned by the apostle, and was in such esteem with him, that he left him in Crete to regulate the affairs of the church there. He seems to have been originally an idolatrous Gentile, whom Paul converted in his first apostolical journey, and brought with him to Antioch when he returned from that journey. For he took him up to Jerusalem when he went thither from Antioch to consult the apostles and elders and brethren there, concerning the circumcision of the converted Gentiles. Not long after this Paul undertook his second apostolical journey, for the purpose of confirming the churches he had formerly planted. On that occasion, Titus accompanied him in his progress till they came to Corinth; for he assisted him in preaching the gospel to the Corinthians. So the apostle himself informs us, 2 Cor. viii, 22. If any inquiry concerning Titus, he is my partner and fellow-labourer in the gospel toward you. Wherefore, when the apostle wrote this, having been in Corinth only once, if Titus was his partner and fellow-labourer in the gospel toward the Corinthians, it must have been at Paul's first coming to Corinth when he converted the Corinthians. These particulars shall be more fully explained in the Preface to Titus.

But it was necessary to mention them here because they show the propriety of the apostle's sending Titus, rather than any of his other assistants, with his first letter to the Corinthians, some of whom had forsaken the apostle, and had attached themselves to a false teacher. Titus being such a person, St. Paul hoped he might have had some influence with the Corinthians to persuade them to return to their duty. Besides, a number of them having been either converted or confirmed by him, he had an interest in the welfare and reputation of their church. Therefore, when he joined the apostle in Macedonia, although he had but just come from Corinth, he not only accepted of Paul's invitation to return with him to that city, but being desirous that the Corinthians should finish their collection for the saints, he, of his own accord, offered to go back immediately, to persuade them to do so without delay, that their collection might be ready when the apostle came. By Titus, therefore, St. Paul sent his second epistle to the Corinthians, who, we may believe, on receiving it, set about the collection in earnest, and finished it by the time the apostle arrived.

CHAPTER I.

After giving the Corinthians his apostolical benediction, St. Paul began this chapter with returning thanks to God, who had comforted him in every affliction, that he might be able to comfort others with the consolation wherewith he himself had been comforted, ver. 3-7. By this thanksgiving the apostle intimates, that one of the purposes of his writing the present letter, was to comfort the sincere part of the Corinthian church, and to relieve them from the sorrow occasioned to them by the reproofs in his former letter.—Next, to shew the care which God took of him as a faithful apostle of his Son, he gave the Corinthians an account of a great affliction which had befallen him in Asia, that is, in Ephesus and its neighbourhood, and of a great deliverance from an imminent danger of death, which God had wrought for him; namely, when he fought with wild beasts in Ephesus, as mentioned in his former epistle, chap. xv. 32, and had the sentence of death in himself, to teach him that he should not trust in himself, but in God, ver. 8, 9.

When the apostle sent Timothy and Erastus from Ephesus into Macedonia, as mentioned Acts xix. 22, it is probable that he ordered them to go forward to Corinth, 1 Cor. xvi. 10, provided the accounts which they received in Macedonia gave them reason to think their presence in Corinth would be useful; and that he ordered them likewise to inform the Corinthians, that he was coming straightway from Ephesus to Corinth, to remedy the disorders which some of the family of Chloe told him had taken place among them. But after Timothy and Erastus departed, having more than ordinary success in converting the idolatrous Gentiles in the province of Asia, he put off his voyage to Corinth for some time, being determined to remain in Ephesus and its neighbourhood till the following Pentecost; after which he purpose to go through Macedonia, in his way to Corinth. This alteration of his intention the apostle notified to the Corinthians in his first epistle, chap. xii. 5–8. But the faction having taken occasion therefrom to speak of him as a false, fickle, worldly-minded man, who in all his actions was guided by interested views, he judged it necessary, in this second letter, to vindicate himself from that calumny, by assuring the Corinthians that he always behaved with the greatest simplicity and sincerity, ver. 12. And by declaring that what he was about to write on that subject was the truth; namely, that when he sent them word by Timothy and Erastus of his intention to set out for Corinth immediately by sea, he really meant to do so, ver. 13, 16. And that the alteration of his resolution did not proceed either from levity or falsehood, ver. 17;—as they might have known from the uniformity of the doctrine which he preached to them, ver. 18, 19,

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy, (see 1 Thess. i. 1. note 1, 2.) a bond servant of the church of God which is in Corinth, together with all the saints who are in all Achaia;

2 Grace be to you, and peace (see Rom. i. 7. note 4) from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 (Eccles. 1. 16. note 1) P raised be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of tender mercies, and the God of all consolation.

4 Who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them who are in any affliction; by the consolation wherein we ourselves are comforted of God.

5 For as the sufferings for Christ abound in us, so also our consolation aboundeth through Christ.

6 (Eccles. 106.) Whether, therefore, we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is wrought in you by enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer; or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

7 And our hope is, knowing that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so also shall ye be of the consolation.

8 (1 Thess. i. 7) Wherefore, we would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning our affliction which happened to us in Asia, that we were exceedingly pressed above our strength, in so much that we despaired even of life.

Ver. 1. 1. And Timothy. From this it is evident, that Timothy was with the apostle when the Second to the Corinthians was written. Timothy was a zealous preacher of the gospel, the apostle's constant companion, (see 1 Tim. vi. 21.) and one of whose ability and integrity the Corinthians had received recent proofs during his last visit to them, 1 Cor. xvi. 10. His testimony, therefore, to the things written in this epistle, might have had weight, even with the Corinthians, had not the false spirit then which the apostle sent them word by him and Erastus, that he intended to go directly from Ephesus to Corinth, (see Illustration,) he was perfectly sincere, as he declares, ver. 13, 16; and that when he altered his resolution, and went to Corinth, it was on tender, purely consolatory considerations. By allowing Timothy to join in his letter, the apostle did the greatest honor, and highly advanced his credit with all the churches of Achaia. See 1 Thess. i. note 3.

2. Who are in all Achaia. Corinth being the metropolis of the province, the whole province is signified by the word Achaia. See 1 Thess. i. note 3. The brethren of Achaia, no doubt, had frequent intercourse with those in Corinth, and by that means had an opportunity of hearing this letter read in the Christian assemblies at Corinth. But as they had equal need with the Corinthians of the consolations and advantages contained in this letter, it was addressed to them likewise, that they might be enabled to take copies of it, in order to read it in their public meetings for their own consolation. See Essay ii. page 22.

3. To comfort those who are in any affliction. According to Locke, the apostle in this passage insinuated, that by his own afflictions he was qualified to comfort the Corinthians, under the distresses of mind which they felt from a just sense of their errors and miscarriages. But the afflictions of which the apostle speaks, were chiefly outward afflictions; being the same with those which he himself suffered, as is plain from ver. 6, 7.

4. Our consolation abounded through Christ. The consolation of which the apostle speaks, was derived from the presence of Christ with him in his affliction; from a sense of the love of Christ shed abroad in his heart; from the joy which the success of the gospel gave him; from the assured hope of the reward which was prepared for him; from his knowledge of the influence of his sufferings to encourage others; and from the enlarged views which he had of the government of God, who was so wise, and so mighty for good, to those who love God; so that he was entirely reconciled to his sufferings.

5. Affliction which happened to us in Asia. This is understood by some, of the out of Deserter, and the slanders, and the accusations contained in this letter, it was addressed to them likewise, that they might be enabled to take copies of it, in order to read it in their public meetings for their own consolation. See Essay ii. page 22.

II. CORINTHIANS.

9 However, I was suffused to pass sentence of death on myself, to teach you that I was in danger, that I should not trust in myself, but in God, who preserveth the living from death, and even raiseth the dead.

10 Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver us, in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us:

11 Ye also working together secretly for us by prayer, as the gift which cometh to us through many persons, may by many persons be thankfully acknowledged for us.

12 For our boasting is this, the testimony of our conscience, that with the greatest simplicity and sincerity, not with carnal wisdom, but with the grace of God, we have behaved in the world, and more especially (εἰς ὑμᾶς, 293.) among you.

13 For I write no other things to you than what ye read, (1 xii. 195), and also acknowledge, and I hope that even to the end ye will acknowledge;

14 (1 xiii. 203. 518) Seeing, indeed, ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your boasting, even as ye also will be ours, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

15 And in this persuasion I purposed to come to you first, that ye might have a second gift?

16 And (Acts, ch. 12.) from you to pass into Macedonia, and from Macedonia to come again to you, and (ἐὰν) by you to be sent forward into Judea.

17 Wherefore, having purposed this, did I, soothed, use levity? or the things which I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, as with sooth and may, in the sense of design?

9 However, I was suffused to pass sentence of death on myself, to teach you that I was in danger, that I should not trust in myself, but in God, who preserveth the living from death, and even raiseth the dead.

13 For I write no other things to you than what ye read, (1 xii. 195), and also acknowledge, and I hope that even to the end ye will acknowledge;

14 (1 xiii. 203. 518) Seeing, indeed, ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your boasting, even as ye also will be ours, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

15 And in this persuasion I purposed to come to you first, that ye might have a second gift?

16 And (Acts, ch. 12.) from you to pass into Macedonia, and from Macedonia to come again to you, and (ἐὰν) by you to be sent forward into Judea.

17 Wherefore, having purposed this, did I, soothed, use levity? or the things which I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, as with sooth and may, in the sense of design?

2. Not with carnal wisdom.—What that was, the apostle tells us afterwards, chap. iv. 5, where he contrasts his own behaviour with that of the false teachers. But with the grace of God.—His behaviour was suitable to the dispensation of the gracious dispensations which God had imparted to him. In Ephesians on another occasion, mentioned 1 Cor. xx. 22. See note 1, on that verse.

3.—The sentence of death is that which the apostle, when ordered to fight with wild beasts, pronounced on himself in his own mind. See preceding note.

4. Not with sooth and may, in the sense of design, but in God who raised the dead.—The apostle, in his former epistle, having proved the resurrection of the dead by many irrefragable arguments, mentions that instance of the power of God here with escalation, as a solid foundation for his expecting deliverance in the most perilous situations; and the earlier, that formerly he himself had been raised from the dead in Lystra. Acts xiv. 15, 20.

5. For I write no other things to you than what ye read, (1 xii. 195), and also acknowledge, and I hope that even to the end ye will acknowledge;

6. Wherefore, having purposed this, did I, soothed, use levity? or the things which I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, as with sooth and may, in the sense of design?

3. Not with carnal wisdom.—What that was, the apostle tells us afterwards, chap. iv. 5, where he contrasts his own behaviour with that of the false teachers. But with the grace of God.—His behaviour was suitable to the dispensation of the gracious dispensations which God had imparted to him. In Ephesians on another occasion, mentioned 1 Cor. xx. 22. See note 1, on that verse.

4. The apostle sets the ground of his boasting, namely, the testimony of his conscience, that with simplicity, &c. in opposition to the ground of the false teacher's boasting, namely, his Jewish extraction, and his renowned obloquy in the law of Moses as necessary to salvation.

5. That with the greatest simplicity and sincerity, &c. εἰς ὑμᾶς, 293., literally, with the simplicity and sincerity of God, that is, with the greatest simplicity and sincerity. See iv. 27. Or it may signify, that simplicity and sincerity which proceed from the favour of God; or that simplicity and sincerity which God requires in the apostles of his Son.
II. CORINTHIANS.

18 But as certainly as God is faithful, our promise which was sent to you by Timothy and Erastus was not ye and nay.

19 For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached (ε) to you by us, even by me, and Silvanus, and Timothy, was not ye and nay, but (ω) through him was ye.

20 (2 Cor. 1. 17, 18.) And whatsoever promises of God were preached (from ver. 19.) by us, were (ε) through him ye, and through him amen, to the glory of God.

21 Now he who establisheth us with you in Christ, and who hath anointed (ποιησας) us, is God;

22 Who hath also sealed (παρακεφαλαια) us, and given us the earnest (Δωδεκαπετεινυμενον) of the Spirit in our hearts.

23 Now, I call on God as a witness (ερωτα) against my soul, 1st, that repenting, I have not as yet come to Corinth.

24 Not (ερωτα, 1 Cor. 3.) because we lord it over you through the faith, 1st, but we are joint workers of your joy: for by the faith ye stand.

3. Ye should be, and Nay, nay.—See James v. 12.

Ver. 18. But God is faithful.—The original phrase is εστι τελειος, is the same form of an oath with Γενομένους εστιν, that is, certainly as the Eternal God Breith.

Ver. 19. And Silvanus.—This is the who in the Acts is called Silas. He was a chief man among the brethren at Jerusalem, and one of the Christian prophets, Acts xv. 22.—After the council of Jerusalem, he accompanied Paul in those journeys through the borders of Asia and Greece, which he undertook for spreading the light of the gospel.—Silas was so much esteemed by the apostle’s converts, that St. Paul inserted his name in the inscriptions of several of his epistles. By him likewise, the apostle Peter sent his first epistle to the brethren of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, 1 Pet. xii. 12.

Ver. 20. Were through him ye, and through him amen.—Were through his inspiration preached in one uniform manner, and as things absolutely certain. For if the Son of God was really manifested in the flesh, and dwelt among us, if he wrought miracles, rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and gave spiritual gifts to his disciples, there can be no doubt of the fulfillment of all the prophecies which he commissioned his apostles to preach to mankind in God’s name. Besides, the incarnation, miracles, resurrection, and ascension of the Son of God, being things so great and strange as the things which God hath promised to us, the greatness and strangeness of the things promised, must be no impediments to our believing them. Yes, εστι, was the word used by the Greeks for affirming any thing; ἀμήν was the word used by the Hebrews for the same purpose.

Ver. 21. Who hath anointed us.—Priests and prophets, as well as kings, were consecrated to their several offices by the ceremony of anointing. To anoint, to put upon, to an office. The gifts of the Spirit are called an anointing, 1 John ii. 27.

Ver. 22.—Who is the first.—Anciently, were used for marking goods, as the property of the person who had put his seal on them, that they might be distinguished from the goods of others. Thus, all believers are said to be “sealed with the Spirit which was promised,” Eph. i. 13, x. 31, because they were thereby marked as Christ’s property. Thus likewise, the servants of God are said to be “sealed in their foreheads,” for the same purpose, Rev. vii. 3. in 4. The apostles, therefore, being sealed of God, they were thereby declared to be his servants, and the apostles of his Son, and could not be suspected either of fraud or falsehood. See another use of seals, Rom. iv. 11. note 1.

2. And given us the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.—Servants being hired by giving them earnest-money, the apostle, in allusion to that custom, says, ‘God hath given us an earnest of the Spirit in our hearts,’ he hath hired us to be the apostles of his Son, by giving us the Spirit, or spiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xiv. 23. These gifts are called the earnest with which the apostles were hired, because they were to them a sure proof of those far greater blessings which God will bestow on them in the life to come, as we are taught the same in the 10th verse. For the same reason, all believers are represented as having the earnest of the Spirit given them, 2 Cor. v. 5, Ep. i. 14, note 1.

Ver. 23. I call on God as a witness against my soul.—This is a solemn imprecation of the vengeance of God upon himself, if he departed from the truth in what he was about to write. With this imprecation the apostle begins his apology for altering his resolution respecting his journey to Corinth. And as he continues it in the next chapter, in ver. 5. either that chapter ought to have begun here, or this chapter should have ended there.

Ver. 24.—Not because we lord it over you through the faith.—That this is a proper translation of the passage, is evident from the position of the Greek article. For the apostle does not say, ους εστινπεποιηθης για τος τον θεου, but εστινπεποιηθης για τος τον θεου. ‘Not because we lord it over you (supply εστινπεποιηθης για τος τον θεου), in this manner, πεποιηθης για τος τον θεου, through the faith.’ Or we may supply the word τος εστιν in front of πεποιηθης, and translate the clause thus, as account of the faith, namely, which is no impediment to our believing them. Yes, εστι, was the word used by the Greeks for affirming any thing; ἀμήν was the word used by the Hebrews for the same purpose.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Subjects in this Chapter.

The apostle’s apology for delaying his visit to the Corinthians, which was begun in the preceding chapter, is continued in this. Earnestly desirous of their repentance, he had delayed to come, but determined with himself not to come among them with sorrow, by punishing the guilty, if he could by any means avoid it, ver. 3.—And therefore, instead of coming to punish them, he had written to tamper with them, that he might have joy from their repentance, ver. 3.—And, in excuse for the severity of his first letter, he told them that he wrote it in the deepest affliction; not to make them sorry, but to shew the greatness of his love to them, ver. 4. On receiving the apostle’s former letter, the sincere part of the Corinthian church, which was much more numerous than the faction, immediately excommunicated the incestuous person, in the manner they had been directed. And he appears to have been so affected with his punishment, that in a little time he dismissed his father's wife, and became a sincere penitent. Of those things the apostle had been informed by Titus, who I suppose was then absent at his excommunication. The apostle therefore, in this letter, told the Corinthians, that the punishment they had inflicted on their faulty brother having induced him to repent of his crime, they were now to forgive him, by taking him again into the church; and even to confirm their love to him, by behaving towards him in a kind and friendly manner, lest Satan should drive him to despair, ver. 5-12. Farther, to make the Corinthians sensible how much he loved them, the apostle described the distress he was in at Tross, when he did not find Titus there, from whom he expected an account of their affairs. (See Preface, sect. I. page 210.) For although he had the prospect of much success at Tross, he was so uneasy in his mind that he could not remain there, but went forward to Macedonia, in expectation of meeting Titus. In Macedonia his distress was somewhat alleviated, by the success with which his preaching was attended. For in Macedonia, God caused him to ride in triumph with Christ, having enabled him to overcome all opposition, ver. 3, 14. The idea of riding in triumph with Christ, naturally led the apostle to describe the effects of his preaching, both upon believers and unbelievers, by images taken from the triumphal processions of the Greeks and Romans, ver. 15, 16. This beautiful passage came with a solemn affirmation, that he did not, like some others, corrupt the word of God with foreign mixtures; but always preached it sincerely and disinterestedly, as in the sight of God, ver. 17. By thus speaking, he plainly enough insinuated, first, that the false teachers, on whom the Corinthians doated, had corrupted the word of God from worldly motives; and, secondly, that his own success was owing, in a great measure, to the faithfulness with which he preached the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, however contrary they might be to the prejudices and passions of mankind: owing likewise to the disinterestedness of his conduct, which being evident to all with whom he conversed, no one could suspect, that in preaching the gospel he proposed to acquire either riches, or fame, or worldly power, among his disciples.

CHAP. II. (1 Co. 10.) Besides, I determined this with myself, not to come again to you with sorrow.

2 For if I should make you sorry, (1 Co. 118.) I write it that you might be made glad, unless ye be made sorry by me.

3 (1 Co) Therefore I wrote you this very thing, that coming, I might not have sorrow from them by whom I ought to rejoice, being firmly persuaded concerning you all, that your joy is the joy of all.

4 For out of much affliction and distress of heart, I wrote to you (1 Co. 119.) with many tears; not that ye might be made sorry, but that ye might know the love which I have most abundantly (29.) towards you.

5 Now, if a certain person hath grieved me, he hath not grieved me, except by a part of you; that may not lay a load on you.

6 Sufficient for such an one is this punishment, which was inflicted by the greater number.

7 (1 Co.) So that, on the other hand, ye ought more willingly to forgive and comfort him, lest such a one should be swallowed up by excessive grief.

8 (1 Co.) Wherefore, I beseech you publicly to confirm to him your love.

VER. 1. Not to come again to you with sorrow.—As the apostle did not come to them at the first with sorrow, the word μην, here translated again, seems to be used in the sense given in the commentary, unless Titus had in his eye the distress he was in when he first came to Corinth, and which is described, I Cor. ii. 3.

VER. 2. Unless the same who is made sorry by me.—The apostle, knowing that the sincere part of the church would be made sorry by his punishing their disobedient brother, wished not to displease his friends by punishing his enemies.

VER. 3.—I wrote to you this very thing.—This explanation is different from that in ver. 9. I wrote (τις καὶ ταύτα) for this end also. The former denotes the thing written; the latter, for which it was written. Locke makes the thing written to be the cause of his writing the letter; I understand it more generally, as in the commentary. See chap. xii. 35.

VER. 4. And distress of heart.—The word δύσμα, distress, denotes the pain which a person feels who is pressed on every side, without any possibility of disengaging himself. Luke xii. 26.

VER. 5.—Now, if a certain person hath grieved me.—The apostle with great delicacy avoided mentioning the name of the incestuous person, and even his crime, lest it might have afflicted him too much.

VER. 6. He hath not grieved me, except by a part of you.—In this and the following verses, the apostle gave a remarkable proof of that love which in ver. 4, he had expressed towards the Corinthians. For, first, he made a distinction between the guilt and the innocent; next, he forgave the incestuous person, whom it appears he had punished of his crimes, ver. 6. In the third place, he ordered the church likewise to forgive him, and confirm their love to him, that he might not be swallowed up by excessive grief, ver. 7. Wherefore I beseech you publicly to confirm to him your love, by relaxing him from the sentence, and shewing him affection.
CHAP. III.

9. (Acts 9:1.) Besides, I wrote for this end also, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things.

10. (2 Tim. 2:17.) I also exhort you: and even I, if I have now forgiven any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes I forgive it, in the person of Christ:

11. That we may not be overreached by Satan! for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12. Moreover, when I came to Troas (Acts 16:10), in order to preach the gospel of Christ, and a door was opened to me by the Lord,

13. I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: (2 Cor. 1:13, 19.) therefore, I sent him forth, that he might know how things stand with you.

14. Now, thanks be to God, who at all times causeth us to triumph with Christ, and who, by us, diffuseth the smell of the knowledge of Him in every place.

15. For we are through God a fragrant smell of Christ, among the saved, and among the destroyed.

16. To these indeed we are the smell of death, ENDING in death; but to the others, the smell of life, ENDING in life: for these things who is sufficent?

17. (2 Cor. 2:5.) However, we are not like many, who adulterate the word of God: but (2 Cor. 6:18.) really from sincerity, (2 Cor. 11:24.) you really from God, in the sight of God, we speak (2 Cor. 11:24.) concerning Christ.

II. CORINTHIANS.

9. Besides, I wrote to communicate that person for this end also, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things. Having obeyed me in inflicting the sentence, I expect ye will obey me in taking it off.

10. Now, to encourage you to do this, I assure you, to whom ye have forgiven any offence, I also forgive it. And even I, if I have now forgiven any thing to the person to whom I forgave it, I forgive it for your sakes, in the name of Christ, by the authority of Christ, where- by I required you to punish him for his offence:

11. That we may not be overreached by Satan, who, under pretence of duty, tempt us to pass severe censures, to drive offenders to despair, and to deter unbelievers from receiving the gospel: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12. Moreover, when I came to Troas after the riot of Demetrius, in order to preach the gospel of Christ, although an excellent opportunity (1 Cor. xvi. 9.) was afforded me by the Lord, who disposed the people to attend me,

13. I had no rest in my mind, because I did not find my fellow-labourer Titus, whom I sent to you. Therefore, bidding the brethren (2 Tim. 2:14.) at Troas farewell, I went away into Macedonia.

14. Now, thanks be to God, who in Macedonia, as at all times, causeth us to triumph with Christ, by making our preaching successful, and who by us diffuseth the smell of the knowledge of Christ in every country; a smell more grateful to the mind than the finest odour to the senses.

15. For, by our preaching, we are through God a fragrant smell of Christ as Saviour, both among the saved, and among the destroyed.

16. To these, indeed, who are to be destroyed, this fragrant smell of Christ is a deadly smell ending in their death; but to those others, who are to be saved, it is a vivifying smell ending in their life. And for things so important, who that considers them can think himself sufficent?

17. However, we are not like the false teacher and his associates, who adulterate the word of God, by mixing false doctrines with it for the sake of gain: But really from sincerity, you really by inspiration, from God, in the presence of God, we speak concerning Christ.
II. CORINTHIANS.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Reasoning in this Chapter.

The two things mentioned in the beginning of this chapter show, that the false teacher had established himself at Corinth, neither by working miracles, nor by communicating to the Corinthians spiritual gifts, but by producing letters of recommendation from some brethren in Judea, and by talking in a vaunting manner of his own talents. For, in allusion to these things, the apostle asked the Corinthians ironically, whether, in order to obtain credit with them as an apostle, it was necessary that he should a second time prove his apostleship? or, if he needed as some (the false teacher) letters of recommendation, either to them or from them? ver. 1.—And to heighten the irony, he told them, that they themselves were a copy of the letter of recommendation which he carried about with him, not from the brethren of any church, but from Christ himself; which original letter was written on his own heart, and was known and read of all his converts, ver. 2. —A copy of this letter the apostle told the Corinthians he had ministered or furnished to them, written, not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not on tables of stone, but on the fleshly tables of their own heart, ver. 3. —A recommendation of this sort he told them was a just matter of boasting, and was afforded to him by Christ in the presence of God, ver. 4. —Consequently, it was afforded to him by God's authority. It seems the false teacher extolled the law of Moses above the gospel of Christ, and assumed to himself great authority on account of his knowledge of that law. Wherefore, in the remaining part of this chapter, the apostle by the strongest arguments demonstrated to the Corinthians, that the law of Moses was much inferior to the gospel of Christ. The law was a dispensation of the letter; but the gospel was a dispensation of the spirit: The law killed every sinner, whether he was penitent or not, by its dreadful curse; but the gospel gives life to all penitent believers without exception, by its gracious promises, ver. 5, 6. —The gospel therefore is a covenant of life, but the law a covenant of death. Farther, he observed, that if the ministration of the covenant of death engraved on stones, covered the face of Moses its minister with such an outward glory, that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly on him after he came down from the Mount, the ministration of the covenant of the Spirit which giveth life, occasioned a much greater glory to them who were employed in ministering it. For the gifts of the Spirit with which the apostles, the ministers of the covenant of the Spirit, were honoured, were a much greater glory than the external splendour which covered Moses' face, when he appeared with the tables of the law in his hand, ver. 7—11. —The reason is, the ministers of the Spirit had the glory of inspiration abiding with them always, so that they could use much greater clearness of speech in explaining the covenant of the gospel, than Moses was able to do in explaining the covenant of the law; as was emblematically represented, by Moses putting a veil upon his face while he spake to the Israelites. For he delivered to them nothing but the obscure figurative institutions of the law, together with such words as God had spoken to him, but added nothing, from himself, for explaining the meaning of these institutions. Hence, the generality of the Israelites have remained ignorant of the true nature and end of the law till this day, ver. 12—15. —But when the whole nation shall turn to the Lord, the darkness of the law shall be done away, ver. 16. The expressions in this part of the chapter being obscure, the apostle told the Corinthians, that the Lord, by which he meant the gospel of which the Lord Christ is the author, is the dispensation of the Spirit, of which he spake; and that, in delivering the gospel, there was great liberty of speech granted to its ministers, especially to the apostles, who, by beholding the glory of the Lord Jesus while he abode on earth, and by the repeated revelations which they received from him since his ascension, were changed into the very same image, by successions of glory, that is, of illumination, coming from the Lord of the Spirit: So that, in respect of the light of the gospel they diffused through the world, they were become the images of Christ, ver. 17, 18.

NEW TRANSLATION.

Chap. III.—1. (Alexandr. B.) Must we begin again (overturn) to recommend ourselves? (2) Or need we, as some letters of recommendation to you? Or letters of recommendation from you? 2. Years our letter written (w) on our hearts, known and read of all men.

Ver. 1.—1. Must we begin again to recommend ourselves? —By recommending himself, the apostle certainly did mean his preaching himself; for in that way he could not possibly prove himself to be an apostle. But he means, his proposing to the Corinthians the proof of his apostleship. This he had done in his former letter, chap. II. —Perhaps the clause, Αὐτοὶ ἡμεῖς ἡμᾶς ἐπισταθήσωμεν, might be better translated, Must we begin again to establish ourselves? namely, as an apostle. For this sense έπισταθήσωμεν (which is a word of the same derivation with επισταθήσεται) hath, Rom. iii. 2; Cor. vi. 4; Gal. ii. 18. —From the apostle's asking the Corinthians, whether it was necessary for him to prove his apostleship to them a second time, it would seem that the faction pretended they had not proved him an apostle by the things written in his former letter. 2. Or need we, as some letters of recommendation to you? This is an irony, both of the faction and of the false teacher. It is the spirit of the first letter, by which the apostle had so far succeeded in his former letter as not to be thought by you sufficient to prove my apostleship, must I for that purpose bring you letters, recommending me as an apostle, from the brethren in Judea, as some have done? This it seems was the method the false teacher had taken to establish himself at Corinth. He had brought letters of recommendation from some of the brethren in Judea; and the Corinthians had been so silly, as, on the credit of these letters, to receive him as a greater teacher than the apostle himself. Of this kind of recommendatory letters we have an example, Acts viii. 27, where it is said, that when Apostle was disposed to pass into Achaia, the brethren of Ephesus wrote, exhorting the disciple to receive him. —By asking the Corinthians in irony, whether he needed to be introduced to them as an apostle, by letters of recommendation from some other churches, and whether his being received by other churches as an apostle, it would be necessary for him to carry letters of recommendation from them, Paul not only indicated the faction and the false teacher, but insinuated that his apostleship did not depend on the testimony of men; and that his fame was so great, that he could go to no church where he was not known to be an apostle of Christ.

COMMENTARY.

Chap. III.—1. Must I, who have already proved myself to you to be an apostle, begin a second time to recommend myself to you? Or letters, or letters of recommendation to you? Or letters of recommendation from you? 2. I need no letter of that sort. Ye are a copy of our letter of recommendation from Christ, which is written on our hearts, known and read of all men.
II. CORINTHIANS.

For your conversion, and by your spiritual gifts, ye are plainly declared to be a copy of Christ's letter of recommendation in the presence of God, through the assistance of Christ. Now a boasting of this kind, that ye are a copy of our letter of recommendation, we have in the presence of God, through the assistance of Christ.

1. What? I thus boast, not because I am fit of myself to find out by reasoning the effectual for convincing unto myself: but my fitness to convert mankind is from God.

2. What? Indeed, by inspiration and miraculous powers, hath fitted me to be a minister of the new covenant, not of the letter, or law of Moses, but of the covenant written by inspiration of the Spirit. Now the covenant of the letter killeth every sinner by its curse, but that of the Spirit maketh all alive every believer by its promises.

3. Besides, if the bringing down from the Mount the covenant which inflicted death on every sinner, and which was written on stones with letters by God, was performed with such glory, that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly on the face of Moses, because of the glory of his face, which was to be abolished;

4. How shall not the ministry of the Spirit? rather (Rom. ii. 16.) be with glory?

5. And, if the ministry of condemnation was honour, much more doth the ministry of righteousness abound in honour.

6. For, ye are plainly declared Christ's letter-ministers by us, and not by ourselves; but our fitness is from God; who indeed, hath fitted us to be ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: (2 Cor. iii. 7.) Now the letter killeth, but the Spirit maketh alive.

7. Also, besides, if the ministry of death, imprinted as with letters on stones, was done with glory, so that the children of Israel could not look steadfastly on the face of Moses because of the glory of his face, which was to be abolished;

8. If it not fit, that the ministry of the Spirit, which maketh sinners alive, should rather be performed with an outward glory?

9. And, if the ministry of the covenant which brought condemnation on sinners, caused Moses with honour and authority, much more doth the ministry of the covenant, which brought righteousness to believe, abound in honour and authority to its ministers.

10. The apostle here alludes to the light proceeding from the Sinai of Moses face, and which was so bright that it could not be looked on without removing their eyes, even as the light proceeding from the Sinai of Jesus face, which is not to be looked on without removing their eyes. This light was an emblem of the knowledge which the external-nature derived from the covenant made with Moses.

11. The apostle here alludes to the light proceeding from the Sinai of Moses face, and which was so bright that it could not be looked on without removing their eyes, even as the light proceeding from the Sinai of Jesus face, which is not to be looked on without removing their eyes. This light was an emblem of the knowledge which the external-nature derived from the covenant made with Moses.

12. 13. This light was an emblem of the knowledge which the external-nature derived from the covenant made with Moses.

14. The apostle here alludes to the light proceeding from the Sinai of Moses face, and which was so bright that it could not be looked on without removing their eyes, even as the light proceeding from the Sinai of Jesus face, which is not to be looked on without removing their eyes. This light was an emblem of the knowledge which the external-nature derived from the covenant made with Moses.

15. The apostle here alludes to the light proceeding from the Sinai of Moses face, and which was so bright that it could not be looked on without removing their eyes, even as the light proceeding from the Sinai of Jesus face, which is not to be looked on without removing their eyes. This light was an emblem of the knowledge which the external-nature derived from the covenant made with Moses.
And therefore the covenant of the letter which was glorified by the shining of Moses' face, was not much glorified in that respect, by reason of the far more excellently glowing glory of the covenant of the Spirit, by which it is abolished.

Besides, if that which is abolished, is abolished by glory, much more that which remaineth, remaineth (κατα) in glory.

Therefore, having such a persuasion, we use much (περιέχομαι) plainness of speech;

And not as Moses, who put a veil upon his face, that the children of Israel might not steadfastly look to the end of the thing to be abolished;

Now, their minds were blinded: (οὐ) for, until this day, the same veil remaineth in the reading of the old covenant, it being revealed that it is abolished (κατα) by Christ.

Moreover, until this day, when Moses is read, the veil lieth upon their heart.

But, when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken from around it.

Now, the Lord is the Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is (υπερέχει) freedom.

For we all, with an unveiled face, reflecting as mirrors the glory of the of religion indubitably, and like living oracles, could give divine responses concerning all the articles of the covenant of which they were the ministers, and were entitled to require implicit submission and obedience from mankind, in all things pertaining to religion. It consisted likewise in their possessing an ability of imparting a portion of the inspiration and miraculous powers which possessed them to others, to fit them for assisting in the ministry of the covenant of the Spirit, which being designed, not for a single nation, like the covenant of the letter, but for all mankind, it was necessary that the ministers thereof should have many assistants. In this respect Moses was far inferior to the apostles; for he could not impart to the elders of Israel any part of the outward material glory with which his face shone; and far less could he impart to them the gift of interpretation of spirits.

And therefore that which was glorified.—The apostle, in the preceding verse, before he proceeds to his argument, reminds his readers of the great glory of the covenant of the Spirit, and of the ministers of the two covenants, with each other, goes on to consider the glory or excellence of the covenants themselves; and shows that the covenant of the Spirit is more excellent. For the covenant of the letter, he observes, that the covenant of the letter, which was glorified by the shining of Moses' face, was not much glorified in that respect, when compared with the more excellent glory of the covenant of the Spirit; because the vanishing of the glory on Moses' face showed, that the covenant of the letter, or the law, was to be abolished; whereas, the continuance of the glory of the inspiration with the apostles to the end of their lives, showed that the covenant of the Spirit, of which they were the ministers, was always to remain.

The apostle here is not disposed to say that the veil of carnal understanding, which covered the minds of the Jews, was to be destroyed, but that the light of spiritual understanding, which was to be imparted to them, was to be dispelled. So that he speaks of the veil, not as something which was to be destroyed, but as something which was to be taken away; and of the light, not as something which was to be introduced, but as something which was to be received. This is the true meaning of the word ἀφαίρεσις, which is translated by the Latin word "excommunication," but which more properly signifies "the taking away." The Hebrew word לְכַלַּת is translated "excommunication," as Mark 16:16, but more properly signifies "the taking away," as Luke 10:15. The word ἀφαίρεσις was employed in the Old Testament to denote the taking away of the Levitical sacrifices, and is applied to the taking away of sins, as Hebrews 9:11, 14. The word ἀφαίρεσις is used in the New Testament to denote the taking away of the veil, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the law, Hebrews 8:12; the taking away of the temple, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the tabernacle, Hebrews 9:11; the taking away of the Levitical sacrifices, Hebrews 9:11; the taking away of the Old Testament, Hebrews 8:13; the taking away of the Mosaic law, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the stoning, Hebrews 12:22; the taking away of the fire, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the high priest, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the blood, Hebrews 9:12. The word ἀφαίρεσις is used in the New Testament to denote the taking away of the veil, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the law, Hebrews 8:12; the taking away of the temple, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the tabernacle, Hebrews 9:11; the taking away of the Levitical sacrifices, Hebrews 9:11; the taking away of the Old Testament, Hebrews 8:13; the taking away of the Mosaic law, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the stoning, Hebrews 12:22; the taking away of the fire, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the high priest, Hebrews 10:19; the taking away of the blood, Hebrews 9:12. Lord, are transformed into the same image, from glory to glory, as from the Lord of the Spirit. the business of enlightening the world, transformed into the very image of Christ the Son of righteousness, by a succession of glory coming on our faces, as from the Lord of the covenant of the Spirit.

The text under consideration. Elster and Wetstein have proved the same sense of the same term in the Chaldee: But it does not agree with the scope of the apostle's reasoning here; and therefore, supposing the term to stand in the middle voice, I have translated it actively: in which I am supported by Kästner and the Greek commentators, who explain it thus: 'Hasten special miracles alone reveal the: the apostle alludes to the light which issued from Moses' face, when it was not veiled.

2. Are transformed into the same image.—Christ was called by the apostle the Sun of Righteousness, because he was to diffuse the knowledge of true religion through the world. On the same account, and in allusion to that prophetic image, he took to himself the designation of the light of the world. Herein, Paul tells us, that the apostles, by reflecting as mirrors the glory or light which shone upon them from Christ, enlightened the world, and became images of Christ the Sun of Righteousness.

3. From glory to glory.—This is an Hebraism denoting a continued succession and increase of glory: Paul, 2 Cor. 3:7. 'They shall go from strength to strength.' The apostles became images of Christ, as the light of the world, by a continual succession of inspirations from him, which so filled them with light, that they shone on the world with an uninterrupted and unceasing glory.

CHAPTER IV.

Having in the preceding chapter described the excellence of the covenant of the Spirit, and the transcendent honour and authority which the ministers of that covenant possessed by virtue of their office, and the abiding inspiration of the Spirit with which they were endowed, the apostle told the Corinthians, that the consideration of these things animated him and his brethren to diligence in performing the duties of their ministry, ver. 1.—and also to faithfulness. For, using no craft or deceit in preaching, but plainly and fully manifesting the true doctrines and precepts of the gospel, they recommended themselves to every man's conscience, ver. 2.—and therefore, if their gospel was veiled to any to whom it was preached, it was veiled only to those who destroyed themselves by hearkening to their own prejudices and lusts, and who having rejected the gospel, the devil made use of them in binding the minds of others by their sophistry, ver. 3, 4.—Farther, notwithstanding the apostles possessed such authority and miraculous powers, they did not preach themselves, but Christ, as Lord or author of the spiritual dispensation of the gospel; being sensible that they alone upon the world, only with a light borrowed from him, ver. 5, 6.—Yet, however, the high birth and mean station of the apostles, with their want of literature, should be thought inconsistent with the high dignity which they claimed as images of Christ. St. Paul told the Corinthians, that God chose men of their character and station to be apostles, and committed the treasure of the light of the knowledge of God to them, as to earthly vessels, to show, that the excellency of the power by which the world was converted from idolatry, and the preservers of the gospel were preserved amidst the evils which pressed on every side, did not proceed from themselves, but from God, ver. 7. But this was not all: and that the dignity of the ministry of the gospel, instead of being diminished, was greatly increased by the low birth of the apostles, and by the evils which they sustained while executing that ministry: since thereby they had an opportunity of displaying their faith, their fortitude, and their benevolence to mankind, ver. 2-7. —To illustrate this sentiment, the apostle gave an affecting description of the sufferings to which he and the rest were exposed, and of the extraordinary support which they received while pressed with these evils, and of their surmounting them all through the assistance of God, ver. 8-14.

Next, to show the Corinthians how much they, and the whole body of the faithful, were interested in the sufferings of the apostles, he assured them, that they endured all the evils he had mentioned, for the sake of the persons to whom they preached, that by convincing them of their sincerity, God might be glorified through their conversion, ver. 15.—And therefore they did not flag in their work, although their outward man was daily wasting through the labours and sufferings which they were enduring, ver. 16.—Besides they knew that their afflictions fully wrought out for them a most exceeding and eternal weight of glory, ver. 17.—which was the reason that, in discharging the duties of their ministry, they did not aim at obtaining the seen things of the present world, which are all temporal, but at obtaining the unseen things of the world to come, which are eternal, ver. 18.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IV.—Wherefore, having this ministry, as we have received mercy, (1 Cor. vii. 25. note 2), we do not flag.

2. Also, we have commanded away the hidden things of shame; not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but, by the manifestation of the truth, recommending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

Commentary.

CHAP. IV.—Wherefore, having this glorious ministry committed to us, as we have received supernatural power to fit us for it, we do not flag through the difficulties lying in our way.

2. Also, being faithful in this ministry as well as diligent, we have commanded those base actions to be gone, which impostors hide, knowing them to be shameful; never behaving in a crafty manner, neither preaching the gospel deceitfully, but, fully and faithfully declaring the truth, recommending ourselves to every man's conscience as upright in the sight of God, who knows our heart.
II. CORINTHIANS.

3 If, therefore, even our gospel thus preached be veiled, it is veiled (εἴπαρχος) to them who destroy themselves, 1

4 (καὶ) By whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelievers, in order that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God, 2 might not shine upon them.

5 (καὶ) We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus as Lord and our selves as your servants (δώρα), on account of Jesus.

6 (ὦρας) For God, who commanded light out of darkness, he hath shined (εὔλαμπ) into our hearts, to give you the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

7 For we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might be of God, and not of us. 3

8 And we, who are the ministers of the new covenant, as God hath said in the promise, 'In another light'—are seen to you also, and you are called the apostles of the Gentiles, and share in the sufferings of Christ, according to the will of God.

9 For, if also they be at all joint-heirs, they are joint-offspring of the same Lord; and Christ is not divided, is not the apostles of one Lord divided? For if the gospel be hid, it is hid from the wise and prudent, but to the foolish and simple is revealed the power of God.

10 For the, which pertain to the age to come, are hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ.

11 For he who is joined to Christ is one spirit. 12 Now, if Christ be preached as raised from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

12 But if there is no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain.

13 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise, if so be that there be no resurrection of the dead.

14 But if there be no resurrection, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain.

15 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain, therefore we are also vain, and are made false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise.

16 But if Christ be risen, where is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain, therefore we are also vain, and are made false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise.

17 Yea, and if we be false witnesses of God, and if our preaching be vain, and your faith also be vain; then we are found false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise.

18 But if Christ be risen, where is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain, therefore we are also vain, and are made false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise.

19 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain, therefore we are also vain, and are made false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise.

20 But if Christ be risen, where is our preaching vain, and your faith also is vain, therefore we are also vain, and are made false witnesses of God, because we have testified of God that he raised Christ, whom he did not raise.
8. We are pressed on every side, but not straitened; perplexed, but not in despair.

9. Pursued, but not utterly forsaken; thrown down, but not killed.

10. At all times bearing about in the body the putting to death of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our body.

11. For we always, who live, are exposed to death for the sake of Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our mortal flesh.

12. (Gal. 2:13.) So that death, servility, worketh strongly in us, but life in you.

13. (2 Cor. 1:10.) Yet having the same spirit (58.) of faith, according to that which is written, (Ps. cxvi. 10.), I believed, therefore I have spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak;

14. Knowing, that he who raised up the Lord Jesus, (see 1 Pet. iii. 18. note 2.), will raise us up also by Jesus, and will present us with you.

15. For all our sufferings are for your sakes, that the grace which hath abounded unto many, may, through the thanksgiving of many, overflow to the glory of God.

16. Therefore we do not despair: (2 Cor. 4:7.) but even our outward man is wasted, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

17. (1 Thess. 5:9, 11.) Besides, the momentary light thing of our affliction worketh out for us a most exceeding weight of glory:

...country had any office in the state, to clothe them with authority; and when they went among the Senators, having no resort to defend them, they were liable every hour to be broken or destroyed by their enemies. Well, therefore, may Paul call himself and his brethren apostates sacrifice vessels, into which the treasure of the gospel was put. Now, being such persons, can any impartial judge suppose them to have been the authors of the gospel? It was a scheme of religion far above their ability to contrive. They must therefore have been moved by inspiration from God, as the apostles themselves, with one voice all sung declared.—Next, in relation to the conversation of the world, considering what hath been said above concerning the number and greatness of the obstacles which were to be removed before any heavenborn evangelist the gospel, no candid searcher after truth can fancy, they were a few dangers of the lowest rank in life, coming from a distant despised nation, and who, besides, were naturally ignorant of the languages of the people they were to address, could prevail with any number of men, and far less with multitudes in every country, to renounce their native religion, embrace the gospel, and forsake their evil practices, merely by the power of words. No total alteration in the mind and manners of mankind certainly could not be accomplished by any natural means in the power of the apostles, but must have been produced by the agency of God accompanying their preaching, and confirming their doctrine by great and evident miracles, as the Christian records testify. We therefore conclude with the apostle Paul, that the treasure of the gospel was committed to earthy vessels; that is, to persons of low birth, desolate of literature, and of every thing which could give them influence with mankind, and utterly unable by their own power to defend themselves against their enemies, on purpose that the excellence of the power by which the gospel was contrived, and the world was persuaded, might plainly appear to belong to God, and not to them. See 1 Cor. i. 27. note; 1 Thes. iii. 6. note.

Ver. 8.—1. We are pressed on every side.—In this and what follows, to verse 10, the apostle is supposed to allude to the civil troubles which the Christians suffered. When therefore he says, 2 Cor. iv. 8., we are pressed on every side, he represents himself and the other apostles, as missionaries of God, who were hated by the strong parties of their adversaries.

2. But (2 Cor. iv. 8.) not straitened, is not so to be understood in the sense of being enabled to continue the combat. For 2 Cor. iv. 9., to be straitened in distress, is (to be so pressed by the adversaries that all hope of delivering ourselves is taken away, and we are cast upon God for help. (Col. iii. 13.) See Isaiah xxviii. 30. LXX., ἐκτέλεσται κακεύματα mn.ἀπολύεις. 3. Perplexed, but not in despair.—The word ἀπασχολοῦσθαι, translated perplexed, signifies to involve persons, from which they know not how to extricate themselves. If the apostle had the context of Isaiah, ἀπασχολοῦσθαι, in his eye, the word perplexed will denote, to be denounced with the thumbs of one's adversary. Accordingly, the Syriac version has been commensurate; we are slandered or stricken, but (2 Cor. iv. 10.) not in despair. This word, which commonly signifies, to be reduced to despair by the impossibility of escaping, here it denotes to despair of victory.

Ver. 9.—1. Pursued, but not utterly forsaken.—The critics, who think the apostle alluded here to the combat of the race, translate the clause thus, 'Pursued, but not left behind.' The propriety, however, of this allusion does not appear. The apostle could not be said to contend with him in the Christian race.

2. Thrown down, but not killed.—Though they were thrown down by their adversaries, they were not, by the fall, either disabled from rising and continuing the combat. This is supposed to be an allusion to the Punic war.

Ver. 11.—1. For always, we who live.—Taylor thinks 'always, is to be translated, We the livers; an appellation which the apostle gave to himself and to his brethren on account of their hope of eternal life. But I rather think the apostle signifies a reason for God's exalting him and the rest continually to death; namely, that the power of death might be manifest in their preservation.

2. Are exposed to death for the sake of Jesus.—Probably the apostle's excuse afforded that the evils which he and the rest suffered for preaching the resurrection of Jesus, was a proof that Jesus was not risen; because if he were alive, and possessed the power they ascribed to him, he would have delivered them from all evil. In answer, Paul told them, that the life of Jesus since his resurrection was proved by these evils, seeing he preserved his accusers from being killed by their persecutors. This the apostle had said before, ver. 10. But he repeated it here, to make the Christians the more sensible, that a dead impostor could not preserve his disciples in such perils as appeared to belong to God, and not to them. See 1 Cor. i. 27. note; 1 Thes. iii. 6. note.

Ver. 12.—I believe, therefore I have spoken.—In speaking these words, David, according to Mr. Pearce, personated Nathan; consequently, the same spirit of faith, is the same strong faith which Messiah possessed. But I rather think David spoke this in his own person, and that his meaning is, 'Though I have been in great affliction, yet faith in God's promises hath supported me, so that I can say, I believed, therefore I have spoken in praise of his goodness.' In this sense, the application which the apostle made of the passage to his own case, and to the case of his brethren, is most natural and beautiful. 'We having the same spirit of faith, (that is, the same strong faith with the Psalms,) therefore we stand in the arms of God's ancestors, as to be sanctified. In the Syriac and Arabic versions it is, 'and not suspected.' See Isaiah xxviii. 30. LXX. ἐκτέλεσται κακεύματα ἐν τῷ ἐνδυναμώσει, ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ. 5. Perplexed, but not in despair.—The word ἀπασχολοῦσθαι, translated perplexed, signifies to involve persons, from which they know not how to extricate themselves. If the apostle had the context of Isaiah, ἀπασχολοῦσθαι, in his eye, the word perplexed will denote, to be denounced with the thumbs of one's adversary. Accordingly, the Syriac version has been commensurate, we are slandered or stricken, but (2 Cor. iv. 10.) not in despair. This word, which commonly signifies, to be reduced to despair by the impossibility of escaping, here it denotes to despair of victory.

Ver. 17.—1. Beside, the momentary light thing of our affliction worketh out for us a most exceeding weight of glory in the life to come:
II. CORINTHIANS.

18 He not aiming at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.

18 He was not endeavouring to obtain the things which are seen, the pleasures of the present life; but the things which are not seen, the glories of the life to come: in which we act wisely, for the things which are seen are of a short duration; whereas the things which are not seen, to which we direct our attention, are eternal.

CHAPTER V.

To show what the things were which the apostles aimed at, and by the hope of which their inward man was daily recruited, St. Paul mentions, in this chapter, that eternal habitation in heaven which the righteous are to obtain after death; because there the whole objects of their desires will be found, and be enjoyed by them in their utmost perfection, ver. 1. — And knowing that their heavenly habitation will be infinitely preferable to their earthly dwelling, they earnestly desired to be introduced into it, ver. 2. — And being happy in the possession of the gifts of the Spirit, as an earnest to assure us that we shall certainly obtain what we hope for, ver. 5. — They were therefore at all times bold in preaching the gospel, both knowing that while they were at home on earth, the body, and with the Lord, ver. 9. — For which reason, whether they remained on earth, or were to be removed by death, they earnestly endeavoured to behave in such a manner as to please Christ, before whose tribunal all men must appear, to receive in their body according to the deeds which they have done, ver. 9, 10. —

The apostle, therefore, knowing the terribleness of Christ's displeasure, was at the greatest pains in persuading men to believe the judgment; and by his earnestness in preaching that judgment, was approved of God, and he hoped also of the Corinthians, to whom he had made known that interesting event, ver. 11. But that what he had said, in commendation of his own faithfulness in the ministry of the gospel, might not be imputed to vanity, he told the Corinthians, that he had mentioned these things to afford them a solid ground of rejoicing; for he was not boasting in them, as some did, but in other those who boasted in the false teacher, on account of external and not on account of real qualities, ver. 18. — Further, because the fact that represented the apostle as a madman, for preaching the gospel, he hath the same claim to the rich blessings; and the glory of God, or whether he acted, in the opinion of the sincere part of the church, as one in his right mind, by shunning persecution, it was for the sake of his discipline, that he might be continued the longer with them, ver. 18. — and in either case, he was moved by a strong love of the soul of Christ even for all, ver. 19, 20. — Therefore, as an apostle of Christ, he knew no distinction between Jew and Gentile; now in preaching the gospel did he make any distinction between them, but offered the same terms of salvation to all, ver. 16. — Declaring, that if any man believeth in Christ, whether he be a Jew or a Gentile, he is a new creature, ver. 17. — Created by God, who hath reconciled him to himself through Jesus Christ, and who hath given to the apostles the ministry of the reconciliation, ver. 18. — which consists in publishing that God is by Christ reconciling the world to himself, not counting to them their trespasses, ver. 19. — The apostle, therefore, in Christ's stead, earnestly besought men to be reconciled to God, ver. 20. — and to persuade them to be reconciled, he represented to them, that he who knew no sin God hath made a sin-offering for us, that we might become righteous in the sight of God through him, ver. 21. — Now, of all the arguments which the ministers of the gospel can propose, the persuadest; to be reconciled to God, this instance of God's love to them is by far the greatest and most affecting; and therefore ought to be much insisted on by them in their discourses to the people.

Ver. 1. — Our earthly house, which is a tent. — I agree with Dr. Ussher in thinking, that the words are not to be taken in regimen, but in opposition, (see Eze. iv. 18;) and that they should be translated, 'house which is a tent;' just as, ver. 8. 'who hath given us the earnest of the Spirit,' means 'given us the earnest, which is the Spirit.' For the apostles had nothing given to them as 2 (K 134, 98.) But yet, in this present, (from ver. 1), we groan, earnestly desiring to go permanently into our habitation which is in heaven. 3 (K 134, 24.) And surely, if we go in, we shall not be found destitute. 4 (K 134, 83.) But yet we are in the present, being burdened; not because we desire to go out, but to go permanently in, (see ver. 8), that which is mortal may be swallowed up of life.

5 Now he who hath effectually wrought us to this very desire in God himself, also hath given us the earnest of the Spirit. (See 2 Cor. 1: 19, note 2.)

6 We are held, therefore, at all times, (2 Cor. 1: 20,) because we know, that being at home in the body, we are from home from the Lord; 7 For we walk by faith, and not by sight.

8 We are bold, (2 Cor. 1: 10,) also, (2 Cor. 1: 20,) because we are well pleased rather to go from home out of the body, and to be at home with the Lord. — An earnest of the Spirit. The Spirit himself was the earnest spoken of—our translators in which a manner.—For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For we groan, being burdened; not because we desire to go out, but to go permanently in, that which is mortal may be swallowed up of life.
II. CORINTHIANS.

9. And for that reason we strive earnestly, whether being at home, or being from home, to be acceptable to him.
10. For we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ, that every one may receive the things which are laid up for them, according to what he hath done, whether he be good or bad.
11. Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, we persuade men, and are made manifest even as God our Saviour.
12. (1 Cor. 9:22.) However, we do not again recommend ourselves to you, (1 Cor. 7:17.) but only give you occasion of boasting concerning us, that ye may have an answer to them who boast (1 Cor. 16:2.) on account of appearance, and not of heart.
13. For if we be beside ourselves, it is for God; or whether we be sober, it is for you.
14. For the love of Christ constraineth us who judge this, That if one died for all, certainly all are dead;
15. And that he died for all, that they who live should no longer live to themselves, but to him who died and rose again for them.

16. Wherefore, we, from this time forth, respect no man (Acts 22:22.) on account of the flesh! And even if we have esteemed Christ on account of the flesh, yet now we esteem him no more on that account.

17. (2 Thess. 3:3.) For, if any one be in Christ, he is a new creature! old things have passed away; behold all things have become new!

Ver. 10. For we must all appearbefore the tribunal of Christ, that every one may receive the things which are laid up for them, according to what he hath done, whether he be good or bad.

Ver. 11. Knowing, therefore, the terror of the Lord, we persuade men, and are made manifest even as God our Saviour.

Ver. 12. (1 Cor. 9:22.) However, we do not again recommend ourselves to you, (1 Cor. 7:17.) but only give you occasion of boasting concerning us, that ye may have an answer to them who boast (1 Cor. 16:2.) on account of appearance, and not of heart.

Ver. 13. For if we be beside ourselves, it is for God; or whether we be sober, it is for you.

Ver. 16. Wherefore, we, from this time forth, respect no man (Acts 22:22.) on account of the flesh! And even if we have esteemed Christ on account of the flesh, yet now we esteem him no more on that account.
chap. vi.

18 But all (w) of God, who hath reconciled us to himself through Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of the reconciliation;

19 (ci. 322.) Ye know that God (2) is by Christ reconciling the world to himself, not counting to us their trespasses; and hath put in us the word of the reconciliation.

20 (Tre or Xpiw, 300.) In Christ's stead, therefore, we execute the office of ambassadors. And (ci. 221.) seeing God besecheth us by us, we pray (w) in Christ's stead, Be ye reconciled to God.

For him who knew no sin, he had made a sin-offering[1] for us, that we might become the righteousness of God through him.[2]

II. CORINTHIANS.

18 But all these new things are the work of God, who hath reconciled us Jews and Gentiles to himself through Jesus Christ, and hath committed to us apostles the ministry of the gospel, whereby this happy reconciliation is produced.

19 Which consists in preaching, that God is by Christ bringing back the world to himself, promising not to punish them for their trespasses, but to pardon them upon their faith and repentance; and by inspiration hath put in us the doctrine of the reconciliation.

20 In Christ's stead, therefore, who is God's chief ambassador, we execute the office of subordinate ambassadors. And seeing God beseeth us, we pray in Christ's stead, saying to all men, Be ye reconciled to God: lay aside your enmity, and accept the pardon he offers you by us;

21 For this strongest of all reasons, that him, even Christ, who knew no sin, God had made a sin-offering for us, that we might be righteous in the sight of God, through the merits of his death, and the influences of his Spirit.

* altitude made in the minds and manners of men, by the faith of the gospel, was so great, that it might be called regeneration; and the persons so regenerated might be considered as new creatures; and this rather, that at the resurrection the bodies of the regenerated shall be fashioned anew, like to the glorious body of Christ; consequently, they shall be made new in their whole man.

† All things have become new!—He hath acquired new views of things, and better dispositions, and follows a better course of life; by which wonderful change, whatever his station be, he hath acquired dignity for superior merit, in which he formerly stood above from his birth, or fortune, or condition; he is truly estimable on account of the excellence of his own character.

Ver. 18. Hae reconcilia.—This word is used to signify the making of those who were at enmity, friends. See Rom. v. 10. note 1.

Ver. 20. In Christ's stead, therefore, we execute the office of ambassadors.—Christ was God's chief ambassador; and the apostles were commissioned by Christ, to be his substitutes. The same obedience, therefore, was due to them in matters of religion, as to Christ himself. But the false teacher not being appointed by Christ his substitute, had no claim to any such respect.

Ver. 21. Seeing God beseareth us by us.—Our translators supply the word ye here, as if God besought the Corinthians by Paul. But that ADDITION made in the minds and manners of men, by the faith of the gospel, was so great, that it might be called regeneration; and the persons so regenerated might be considered as new creatures; and this rather, that at the resurrection the bodies of the regenerated shall be fashioned anew, like to the glorious body of Christ; consequently, they shall be made new in their whole man.

† All things have become new!—He hath acquired new views of things, and better dispositions, and follows a better course of life; by which wonderful change, whatever his station be, he hath acquired dignity for superior merit, in which he formerly stood above from his birth, or fortune, or condition; he is truly estimable on account of the excellence of his own character.

Ver. 18. Hae reconcilia.—This word is used to signify the making of those who were at enmity, friends. See Rom. v. 10. note 1.

Ver. 20. In Christ's stead, therefore, we execute the office of ambassadors.—Christ was God's chief ambassador; and the apostles were commissioned by Christ, to be his substitutes. The same obedience, therefore, was due to them in matters of religion, as to Christ himself. But the false teacher not being appointed by Christ his substitute, had no claim to any such respect.

Ver. 21. Seeing God beseareth us by us.—Our translators supply the word ye here, as if God besought the Corinthians by Paul. But that addition spoils the beauty of that passage. The Corinthians were already reconciled, and did not need to be besought. But St. Paul told them, that seeing God besought sinners by the apostles, he and his brethren preached to all men in Christ's stead, saying to them, 'he ye reconciled to God. For him who knew no sin,' &c. So that this is a short specimen of the apostles' declarations in the unconverted in every country. Accordingly, Estius observes, "Hae, Reconciliationes posse innumerum esse." Ver. 21. 1. He hath made (saece) a sin-offering!—There are many passages in the Old Testament, where saecce, saec, signifies a sin-offering. Hours 18. 8. 'They (the priests) put up the sin (that is, the sin-offerings) of my people.' See Whiston's note on this verse. In the New Testament, likewise, the word saec hath the same signification. Heb. ix. 26. 28. 10. 11.

2. That we might become the righteousness of God through him.

* ALTHOUGH the righteousness of God through faith is sometimes put for their corresponding adjectives, (Rom. xi. 7.) the righteousness of God may signify righteous persons in the sight of God; namely, by having our faith counted to us for righteousness through Christ. The antithesis in the phraseology here is elegant: Christ was made sin, that sinners might become the righteousness of God.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

The apostle having affirmed in the foregoing chapter, that the ministry of reconciliation was committed to the preachers of the gospel, he entreated his fellow-labourers in that ministry, the bishops and pastors at Corinth, to exert themselves with the utmost fidelity and diligence in their work; because, if they were either unfaithful or negligent, they would be guilty of receiving that honourable ministry in vain. ver. 1. Then he put them in mind of God's promises to assist his faithful servants; and by adding, 'now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation,' he insinuated, that there are seasons in which God more especially blesthe the labours of his servants, which therefore sought not to be neglected by them. And, to carry the matter home to their conscience, he told them, that the season then present was such a day of salvation, ver. 2. These earnest exhortations the apostle addressed to his fellow-labourers, that they might give no encouragement to any one to commit sin, either by their negligence, or by their teaching a lax morality, like the false apostle, because it would occasion the ministry of the gospel to be blam'd, as encouraging licentiousness, ver. 3. He therefore besought them to establish themselves as faithful ministers of Christ, by their virtues, both passive and active; also by sound doctrine, and by a right conversation, ver. 4. And,

Having thus exhorted his fellow-labourers, the apostle addressed the Corinthian brethren in general, telling them. 'his mouth was opened to them, his heart was enlarged,' he spake plainly to them, from love. And, as a reward, he desired an equal return of affection from them, ver. 11, 12, 19. Then he proceeded to give an advice, which he knew would be disagreeable to some of them; namely, not to join themselves in marriage with idolaters and unbelievers, because the principles and practices of such persons being directly contrary to the principles and manners of Christ's disciples, the Corinthians could have no prospect of union and peace in such marriages, ver. 14, 15. Or, although love and peace were maintained, their idolatrous spouses tempting them to join in the worship of idols, they might lose that holiness which rendered the temple or dwelling of God, ver. 16. As was plain from what God said to the Israelites, 'Come out from among them, &c. and ye shall be to me sons and daughters,' ver. 17, 18. Then, to shew that these promises were made to the disciples of Christ as well as to the disciples of Moses, the apostle added, as the conclusion of his discourse on this subject, chap. vii. 1. 'Wherefore, having these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit,' &c. These words, therefore, being properly a part of this discourse, I have taken them from the body of the discourse, chap. vii. and have joined them to the end of this chapter.

CHAP. VI.

2 And, to encourage you, consider what God saith to Memphians:
In a favorable season I have heard thee praying for the salvation of the Gentiles, and in the day when they are to be converted, I will help thee. Fellow-labourers, behold now is the highly accepted season; behold now is the day of salvation.

3 Give no occasion of stumbling (163,) to any one, that the ministry may not be found fault with:
4 But (x) by every thing let us establish ourselves as ministers of God, by much patience, by oppressions, by necessities, by distresses,
5 By stripes, by imprisonments, by tumults, by labours, by watchings, by fastings;
6 By purity, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by goodness, by holy spirit, by love unfeigned,
7 By the word of truth, (chap. ii. 17. iv. 2.) by the power of God, (iv. 16.) through the right and left hand arm of righteousness;
8 (see) Through honour and dishonour, (46.) through bad fame and good fame, (2c) as deceivers, (xv. 5.) ye true;
9 As unknown, yet well known; as dying, yet beheld we live; as chastised, yet not killed;
(see Psal. exviii. 18.)
10 As sorrowing, but always rejoicing; as poor, but making rich many; as having nothing, yet possessing all things.

not the apostle, but his fellow-labourers in the ministry of the gospel at Corinth, I think evident from ver. 3. 4, where the persons addressed are requested to approve themselves as ministers of God, by exercising all the passive and active virtues belonging to their character. By exalting them, the apostle showed the Corinthians, that it belonged to him to inspect the behaviour, not of the people about, but of all the spiritual men, and to give them such edifications and reproves as he saw fit. And the false teachers, as a profession of their office, were elaborated in the apostle, and by the picture afterwards drawn of a faithful minister, the Corinthians were made to see how false and falsely the false teachers were, and whom faith was manifested. 2. Not to receive the grace of God; (xv. 31.) in vain. From Rom. vi. 25. where grace was that supernatural gift bestowed on Paul to fit him for the apostolic office, we may infer, that the apostle meant, not only the office of the ministers, but the spiritual gifts bestowed on the ministers at Corinth, to fit them for their office. See 1 Cor. iii. iv. 11. 1 Cor. v. 12. 1 Cor. viii. 5. Here the apostle shows himself capable of writing in a sublime and affecting manner, a part of this chapter, being remarkable for the beauty of its style.

Ver. 1. By every thing (xix. 4.) let us establish ourselves. The translation must read, as is a precept to the preachers at Corinth. New Rom. iii. 5. 2 Cor. vii. 15. where the original word signifies to establish, as in this place. The apostle hath described his own sufferings in two other passages, which may be compared with this account of what the ministers of the gospel were to do and suffer in the first age: 1 Cor. xi. 12; 2 Cor. xi. 23-38. From these passages it will appear, that he preached to others nothing but what he practised himself. Accordingly, he included himself in this exhortation. Let us establish ourselves.

Ver. 5. By tumults. The first preachers of the gospel were often assailed in tumults raised by the Jews and infidels of the place. No. Paul was assaulted in Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Epaphesus, and Jerusalem. Hence the Jews and infidels of the place. No. Paul was assaulted in Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Epaphesus, and Jerusalem. Hence the Jews and infidels of the place. No. Paul was assaulted in Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Epaphesus, and Jerusalem. Hence the Jews and infidels of the place. No. Paul was assaulted in Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Epaphesus, and Jerusalem. Hence the Jews and infidels of the place. No. Paul was assaulted in Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Epaphesus, and Jerusalem.

Ver. 6. By knowledge. This is the knowledge of the ancient ancients, valued in the enumeration of the apostle's gifts, the word of knowledge.

Ver. 7. By long-suffering. As the apostle hath mentioned much patience, ver. 4. long-suffering here must signify the bearing and forbearing of injuries.

Ver. 8. By a holy spirit. Others translate this by the Holy Spirit, understanding thereby the spiritual gifts with which the apostle of the gospel was endued. But in the following verse, σπíρτον ἁγίου, the power of God, which, no doubt, signifies the power of miracles, is opposed to the Holy Spirit; and as a holy spirit is placed among the good dispositions which the ministers of the gospel were to possess, I think it signifies a well-regulated spirit.

Ver. 9. Through the right and left hand arm of righteousness.
II. CORINTHIANS.

11 Our mouth is opened unto you, O Corinthians; our heart is enlarged.
12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels.

13 Now, the same recompense I require, (I speak as to my children,) Be ye also enlarged.

14 Be not discordantly galled with infidels; for what (as we) partake of spiritual things, as a Christian, intercourses with error with darkness!

15 And what agreement hath Christ with Belial? or what portion is a believer with the infidel?

16 (As 101.) And what place together in the temple of God with the temple of idols? For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, (e v. 29.) Therefore, I will dwell among them, and walk among them; and I will be their God, and they shall be to me a people.

17 Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separated, saith the Lord, (Isa. ii. 11, LXX,) and touch no unclean person; and I will receive you,

18 And I will be to you a Father, and ye shall be to me sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

1 The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

2 For ye are the temple of the living God; as is made manifest to you, when ye were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, in the temple of the Holy Ghost, consecrated to God.

3 Now, the same recompense I require, (I speak as to my children,) Be ye also enlarged.

4 For ye are the temple of the living God; as is made manifest to you, when ye were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, in the temple of the Holy Ghost, consecrated to God.

5 Be not discordantly galled with infidels; for what (as we) partake of spiritual things, as a Christian, intercourses with error with darkness!

6 And what agreement hath Christ with Belial? or what portion is a believer with the infidel?

7 For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, (e v. 29.) Therefore, I will dwell among them, and walk among them; and I will be their God, and they shall be to me a people.

8 Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separated, saith the Lord, (Isa. ii. 11, LXX,) and touch no unclean person; and I will receive you,

9 And I will be to you a Father, and ye shall be to me sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

11. Our mouth is opened. — See the original word ἀνοικεῖον  may be translated, being the partner of the middle voice. Among the Corinthians, to speak, to the mouth, seems to be sufficient, the manner by which the king shall shut his mouth at him.
12. Ye are not straitened in us. — See the original word ἀνεκτέον.
13. Now, the same recompense I require, (I speak as to my children,) Be ye also enlarged.
14. Be not discordantly galled with infidels. — See what (as we) partake of spiritual things, as a Christian, intercourses with error with darkness!
15. And what agreement hath Christ with Belial? or what portion is a believer with the infidel?
16. (As 101.) And what place together in the temple of God with the temple of idols? For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, (e v. 29.) Therefore, I will dwell among them, and walk among them; and I will be their God, and they shall be to me a people.
17. Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separated, saith the Lord, (Isa. ii. 11, LXX,) and touch no unclean person; and I will receive you,
18. And I will be to you a Father, and ye shall be to me sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.
injured, or corrupted, or deceived any of them, ver. 2.—
And because, in thus speaking, he obliquely insinuated that their new teacher had done those injuries to them, he assured them he did not deride their simplicity in suffering themselves to be so used; for, as he said before, he had the most cordial affection for them, ver. 3.—But he spoke freely to them, because he had boasted of their good dispositions, and because their obedience in communicating the insensate person had filled him with consolation, ver. 4.

Further, to make them sensible of the greatness of his joy on account of their obedience, he pathetically described his anxiety of mind, occasioned by his not meeting with Titus at the time he expected him, ver. 5.—and the pleasure which his arrival, with the good news of their submission and love, had given him, ver. 6, 7.—And when he had taken his admonitions in good part, he told them he did not repent of having made them sorry for a little while by his former letter, ver. 8.—since their sorrow was of a godly sort, and had wrought in them true repentance, ver. 9, 10.—He told them likewise, that he wrote to them to excommunicate the insensate person, to shew the care which he took of them in the sight of God, ver. 12.

For which reason, the kind reception of Titus, and their obedience, whereby he was made joyful, and his spirit was refreshed, had comforted the apostle, and filled him with exceeding joy, ver. 13.—And seeing, before Titus went to Corinth, the apostle had boasted to him of the good disposition of the Corinthians, he told them he was glad that his boasting was found true, ver. 14.—In the last place, he informed them, that Titus entertained a most tender affection for them, which was increased by his remembering their obedience to the apostle, and their kindness to himself, ver. 15.—The apostle therefore rejoiced, that he now had confidence in them in every thing, ver. 16.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VII.—2 Receive us: (see chap. vi. 11, 12.) we have corrupted no one; we have deceived no one, we have offended no one.

1 I speak not this to condemn you; for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts, to die together, and to live together.

2 Great is my freedom of speech to you, great is my boasting concerning you; I am filled with consolation; I exceedingly abound in joy in all our affliction.

4 For when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were distressed on every side: without war, without fightings, within fears.

5 Nevertheless, God, who comforteth them who are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus.

6 And not for his coming only, (only) but also by the consolation wherewith he was comforted (he) by you, having related to us your earnest desire, your lamentation, your zeal for me; so that I rejoiced the more.

8 (1st Cor. 255.) Therefore, although I made you sorry by that letter, I do not repent, although I did repent: for I perceive that that letter, although but for an hour, made you sorry properly.

9 I now rejoice, not because ye were made sorry, but because ye were made sorry to a change of conduct; for ye were made sorry to a change of conduct, for ye were made sorry before a change of conduct.

CHAP. VII.—2 Receive me into your hearts, as a faithful apostle.

For whatever others may have done, I have offended no one among you; I have corrupted no one, either by my precepts or my example; I have deceived no one with false doctrine.

3 I speak not this to blame you for suffering yourselves to be so used by the false teacher, but from love; for I have said before, (chap. vi. 11,) that ye are in our hearts, to die together, and to live together.

4 Because I ardently love you, great is my freedom of speech to you, great is my boasting concerning you; Hearing of your obedience, I am filled with consolation; I exceedingly abound in joy in all my affliction: my joy from your obedience overbalances the pain occasioned by my affliction.

5 This ye may believe: for when we were come into Macedonia, from Ephesus, not finding Titus, our mind had no rest, fearing he had been ill received by you; we were distressed on every side; without war, without fightings, rising by the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles, within the fears concerning your behaviour.

6 Nevertheless, God, who comforteth them who are cast down through affliction, comforted me by the arrival of Titus from Corinth, for whose safety I had felt so much anxiety:

7 And not by his arrival in safety only, but also by the consolation wherewith he was comforted by you, having related to me your earnest desire to see me, your lamentation for your fault, your zeal to vindicate my character as an apostle, and to support my authority, things most acceptable to me; so that when I heard them, I rejoiced the more on account of the arrival of Titus.

8 Such were the effects produced by my reproves. Therefore, although I made you sorry by that letter, I do not repent of writing it, although I did repent after it was written; for I saw that it might irritate some of you. For I perceive that that letter, although for a little while, made you sorry in a proper manner.

9 I at present rejoice, as I said, (ver. 7,) not because ye were made sorry by my letter, for that would rather give me pain, but because ye were made sorry by it to a change of conduct. For ye were in both the clauses of this verse, as well as in the context which it contains.

CHAP. VII.—1. Although I did repent I.—Paul wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians, as he did all his epistles, by the direction and inspiration of the Spirit. And therefore his repenting of the severe things he had written, after his letter was sent away, was a suggestion of natural fear, called his letter, ver. 5, which he ought to have corrected, and which he did not correct, when he considered that what he had written had been suggested to him by the Spirit. The letter speaks for itself. Everything in it is highly proper, and worthy of the Spirit of God. Besides, the event is a proof of its propriety. It produced among many of the Corinthians the wished for reformation. And therefore the apostle did not repent of it at the time he wrote his second epistle, though, actually, acted by natural fear, he had repented of it immediately after it was sent away. Greeting translates the clause thus: Now, instead of the version, 'I am not angry, I am not sorry now, though I was sorry,' namely, when I wrote that letter, having done it with many tears, &c. &c. &c. to say that he was sorry that he had found himself obliged to write that letter to them. 2. Although for an hour:—that is, for a very short time. See 1 Thess. ii. 17, note 2. The apostle was glad that he had had occasion to them by his reproves had been so soon removed by their repentance.
made sorry in the manner God requires; your sorrow issuing in actual amendment of your fault, that ye might not be punished by me in any manner.

10 For the sorrow according to God worketh out a change of conduct unto salvation, not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world worketh out death.

11 Behold, (2 Cor. 7, 97.) now this very thing, that ye were made sorry according to God's will for your fault in the affair of the iniquitous person, what carefulness it wrought in you; you, apologizing, you, reproving, you, fear; you, earnest desire, you, zeal, punishment. By every thing ye have shewn yourselves to be now pure in this matter.

12 (2 Cor. 7, 87.) Indeed, although I wrote to you seerely, it was not for your sake did the wrong, nor is the punishment to your care, which is concerning you in the sight of God. For this reason, we were comforted in your comfort, and exceedingly the more we rejoiced for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was set at ease by you all.

14 (2 Cor. 7, 255.) Therefore, if I have boasted anything to him concerning you, I am not ashamed: (v. 35) for as we speak all things concerning you to the Corinthians, so also our boasting which was before Titus, is found a truth.

15 And his tender affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, and how he received him with fear and trembling.

16 I rejoice then, that I have confidence in you in every thing.

II. CORINTHIANS.

The directions which the apostle in his former letter gave to the Corinthians, concerning the collection for the saints in Judea, had not, it seems, been fully complied with. At the persuasion of Titus, indeed, they had begun that collection; but they had not finished it when he left Corinth; owing, perhaps, to the opposition made by... the faction, or to the disturbances which the faction had raised in that church. Wherefore, to stir up the sincere among the Corinthians to finish what they had so well begun, the apostle in this chapter set before them the example of the Macedonian churches; I suppose the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, who, notwithstanding their great poverty, occasioned by the persecution mentioned 1 Thess. ii. 14. had contributed beyond their ability, being much inclined to that good work by their own beneficent disposition, ver. 1, 2, 3. and had entreated the apostle to receive their gift, and carry it to Jerusalem, ver. 4, 5. His exhortation to the Corinthians on this occasion, no doubt, would be the more regarded by them, that it immediately followed the many commendations given them for their love and obedience. See chap. vii. 16. note. Wherefore, in the persuasion that they would now be hearty in the affair, the apostle told them he had entreated Titus, that as he had begun, so he would finish that good work among them, ver. 6. adding, that as they abounded in every other grace, and entertained great love to him their spiritual father, he hoped they would abound in that grace also, ver. 7.

This, however, is a little neglected, because works of charity must be voluntarily performed; but that they might emulate the forwardness of the Macedonians, and shew the sincerity of their love and gratitude to Christ, ver. 8; the more effectually to persuade them to part with some of their riches for relieving the saints, he told them, they were well acquainted with the greatness of the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich, ver. 9. He then gave it as his opinion, that they ought to finish these collections speedily, seeing they had begun them the last year, ver. 10. none of them postponing the matter any longer, on pretence of inability, ver. 11. because God regards the willingness of the giver, more than the greatness of his gift, ver. 12.

New Translation.

Chap. VIII. 1. Now, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God which is given to the churches of Macedonia?

2. That in a great trial of affliction, the overflowing of their joy (1 Cor. viii. 21.) notwithstanding their deep poverty, hath overflowed in the riches of their liberality.

3. For according to their power, (1 Cor. viii. 21.) not willing them of themselves;

4. With much earnestness requesting us that we would receive the gift and the fellowship of the ministry, which is to the saints.

5. And not as we feared; but first gave themselves to the Lord, (1 Cor. viii. 21.) and then to us by the will of God.

Ver. 1. Make known to you the grace of God.1—Because the word translated grace is in ver. 6, rendered by our translators a gift, and hath that meaning evidently, ver. 6, 7, 10; also, because the gift of God is an Hebraism for a very great gift, this verse may be translated, make known to you the exceeding great gift which is given by the church of Macedonia to the church of Corinth, to the saints in Judea. Yet I have retained the common translation, supposing the apostle means to speak of the charitable disposition of the Macedonians to the influence of the grace of God, as he does Titus's earnest care about the collection, ver. 10.

2. To the churches of Macedonia.1—The apostle means the Roman churches of Macedonia, which comprehended all the countries of the Greeks in Europe, not included in the province of Achaea. See 1 Thess. i. 7. note. Of these churches, the most forward, I doubt not, was the church of Philippians, which, on every occasion, showed a great regard to all the apostle's desires, together with an anxious care for the advancement of the gospel, and much willingness to part with their money for every laudable purpose.

But lest the Corinthians might fancy, that by thus earnestly recommending liberality in making the collection, he meant at their expense to enrich the brethren in Judea, he assured them he meant only the relief of their present pressing wants, that in their turn they might be able and disposed, in case of need, to assist the Corinthians, ver. 13, 14, 15. And to show that he was much interested in this matter, he thanked God for having put the same care concerning it in the heart of Titus, ver. 16. who, at his desire, had willingly agreed to go with him to Corinth, for the purpose of persuading them to finish their begun collection; but who, being more diligent in the matter than the apostle expected, had offered to go before him to exhort them, and was come to them with this letter, ver. 17. But that Titus might not be burdened with the whole weight of the work, he told them he had sent with him a brother of great reputation, who had been chosen by the Macedonian churches to accompany the apostle to Jerusalem, to witness his delivering their gifts faithfully, ver. 18, 19. a measure which he highly approved; because, in this affair, he wished to avoid all suspicion of unfaithfulness, ver. 20, 21. And that with them he had sent another brother likewise, whom he had found faithful in many things, ver. 22.

Now, that these messengers might meet with due respect from the Corinthians, the apostle informed them, that if any of the faction inquired concerning Titus, they might reply, he was his fellow-labourer in preaching the gospel to the Corinthians; or, if they inquired concerning the brethren who accompanied Titus, they were the messengers employed by the churches to carry their collections to Jerusalem; by which service they brought glory to Christ, ver. 23. Being therefore persons so respectable, he hoped the Corinthians would give them and the churches, whose messengers they were, full proof of their good disposition, and of his boasting concerning them, by treating them with every mark of affection and esteem, ver. 24.

Commentary.

Chap. VIII. 1. Now, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God which is given to the churches of Macedonia?—1. Now, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God which is given to the churches of Macedonia, hoping ye will follow their example.

2. That in a great trial of affliction, the overflowing of their joy, (1 Cor. viii. 21.) notwithstanding their deep poverty, hath overflowed in the riches of their liberality.

3. For according to their power, (1 Cor. viii. 21.) not willing them of themselves, they were willing of themselves;

4. With much earnestness requesting us that we would receive the gift and the fellowship of the ministry, which is to the saints.

5. And not as we feared; but first gave themselves to the Lord, (1 Cor. viii. 21.) and then to us by the will of God.

Ver. 2. Notwithstanding their deep poverty.1—By mentioning the poverty of the Macedonians as the circumstance which enhanced their liberality, the apostle in a very delicate manner intimated to the Corinthians, who were an opulent people, (1 Cor. iv. 9.) that it was their duty to equal, if not to exceed the Macedonians, in the greatness of their gift. See ver. 11. and 1 Thess. ii. 9. I suppose that the Corinthians had been spoiled of their good. So also I think the Bereans must have been. Acts xiv. 13. But the places of lesser note, the disciples may have been few in number, and not opulent.

Ver. 3. Beyond their power.1—This is no hyperbole, but an animadversion, strongly descriptive of the generosity of the Macedonians. They were willing to give more than they were well able, considering the distresses under which they themselves laboured.

Ver. 5. And not as (COVRAJ) we feared.1—Such is informs us, that the Attic applied form to things which the advance state of the price of the gospel, and much had increased; accordingly, some, with which quarterly it signifies to fear, as well as to hope. Here it signifies to 6 This success with the Macedonians moved me to entreat Titus, that as he had formerly begun, so he would also finish the same gift among you likewise.

7 (2 Cor. 8:7.) Now, as ye abound in every grace, in faith, and speech, and knowledge, and all diligence, and in your love to us, I wish that ye may abound in this grace also.

8 I speak not this as an injunction, but (2 Cor. 8:1.) an account of the diligence of others, and as proving the sincerity of your love.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sake he became poor, (Phil. ii. 8.) that ye through his poverty might be rich.

10 And herein I give my opinion (2 Cor. 9:5.) that this is profitable for you, who have formerly begun, not only to do, but also to be willing since the last year.

11 At present, therefore, finish the doing of it; that there was a readiness to will, so also let there be to finish from what you have.

12 For if a willingness of mind be present, according to what any one hath, he is well accepted, not according to what he hath not.

13 (2 Cor. 9:8.) However, I mean not that case should be to others, and distress to you:

14 But (2 Cor. 8:15.) on account of equality, that at the present time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that at another time their abundance also may be a supply for your want, (2 Cor. 8:9.) so as there may be equality.

15 As it is written, (Ex. vii. 18.) He who gathered much had nothing over; and he who gathered little had no lack.

16 Now thanks be to God, who hath put the same care concerning you into the heart of Titus.

17 For my exhortation, indeed, he accepted; but, being more diligent, of his own accord he is come out to you.

18 And with him we have sent the brother whose praise by the gospel is throughout all the churches, being an anointed city, we may suppose, that among the brethren there were some able to contribute liberally to this charity. Besides, the Corinthians had not, like the Thessalonians, and the other churches of Macedonia, been persecuted to the spoiling of their goods.

19 As there may be equality.—The equality which the apostle recommends, is not an equality of condition, but such an equality, as that our brethren may not be in want of the daily necessaries of life, while we abound in them; for the manna gathered by the Israelites was only provision for a day.

20 But, being more diligent.—So the phrase ἐτερησθήσετο; ἐτερησθήσετο; literally signifies. It seems the apostle did not desire Titus to go before him to Corinth, nor to be the bearer of this letter but to acquaint himself with the collection, when he accompanied the apostle to Corinth. Nevertheless, Titus being himself very earnest in the same purpose, prepared of his own accord to go before with the apostle's second letter, that he might have an opportunity of exciting the Corinthians to finish their collections before the apostle's arrival.

21 He came out to you.—Since ἐκῆρυξεν signifies to come, as well as to go, (1 Cor. 16:7.) here must be translated as come unto. For it would have been improper in a letter which the Corinthians were to read, perhaps in the hearing of Titus himself, to have said of him he be gone forth to you. But the impropriety is avoided in the literal translation.

22 Have sent the brother, whose praise, etc.—This brother is thought by many, both of the ancients and moderns, to have been 19 And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches' our fellow-traveller with this gift, which is ministered by us to the glory of the Lord himself, and declaration of your ready mind.

20 Taking care of this, that no one should blame us, for this abundance which is ministered by us.

21 Premeditating things comely, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. (See Rom. xii. 17, note.)

22 And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes found diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which he hath in your good disposition, for the gospel, whom I have oftentimes on trial found active in many important matters, but now much more active than common in his endeavours to forward the collection among you, upon the great confidence which he hath in your good disposition, in the work.

23 If any inquiry concerning Titus, be my partner in the ministry of the saints, and fellow-labourer with respect to you, having assisted me in planting the gospel among you. Or if they inquire concerning our brethren who accompany Titus, are persons sent by the churches to go with me to Jerusalem, (ver. 19,) and by that service they bring glory to Christ.

24 Wherefore, the proof of your love, and of our boasting concerning you, shew ye (as we 145.) before them, and (as) before the face of the churches.

Luke, whose gospel was well known throughout the churches of Macedonia and Achaia at the time Paul wrote this second epistle to the Corinthians, A. D. 52. See his life, Helvidius. Obs. p. 63. 3d edit.—From Acts xvi. 10, 11, where Luke was in the ship, it appears, that he was with Paul and Silas when they passed over from Asia, the first time, into Europe; and that he went with them to Philippi, ver. 12. But from Acts xvi. 1, where Luke alters his style, we learn that he remained at Philippi, when Paul and the brethren were sent down to Amphipolis and Apollonia, and did not join them again till Paul came with the collection from Corinth to Philippi, in his way to Jerusalem, six years after his first departure from Philippi, Acts xx. 5. Here we may suppose Luke employed himself, during these six years, in composing and making copies of his gospel, which he may have sent to the churches in these parts. And if he was the brother whom Paul sent with Titus to Corinth, he may have remained there till Paul arrived; and when Paul, on account of the lying in wait of the Jews, determined to return through Macedonia, Luke may have gone before him to Philippi, and was there from Acts xx. 5, that he joined Paul and the messengers of the churches in that city, and went with them to Jerusalem, where, and in Caesarea, he attended the apostle, and then accompanied him to Rome.

Ver. 19. Who was also chosen of the churches, &c. — This is the second character of the person who was sent by the apostle with Titus to Corinth. He was chosen by the churches of Macedonia to accompany Paul to Jerusalem, to witness his delivering their gift. This character likewise agrees very well with Luke. For having resided so long at Philippi, he was well known to the Macedonia churches, who, by making him their messenger, showed their great respect for him. The style of the Acts indeed shows, that Luke was not an eyewitness of Paul’s return to Macedonia from Corinth with the collections. But he may have left Corinth, and been gone to Philippi before the apostle, for reasons not now known to us.

Ver. 20. Taking care of this, &c. — The word προσέχειν sometimes signifies the failing or altering of the sails of a ship, to change her course, that she may avoid rocks or other dangers lying in her way. Here it is used in the metaphorical sense, for taking care that no one should find fault with the apostle, as unfaithful in the management of the collections.

Ver. 21. We have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes, &c. — This brother is supposed by some to have been Apollos, who, though he was unwilling to go to Corinth, when Paul sent his first letter, 1 Cor. xvi. 15, yet hearing of the reputation of the Corinthians, he was now willing to accompany Titus in his return. But there is no evidence that Apollos was with the apostle at this time in Macedonia. Others think this brother was Philemon, more than any other of his assistants, the apostle could with truth say, that he found oftentimes more diligent in many things; for from the time of the council of Jerusalem, when he set out with Paul to visit the Gentile churches, he seems to have been his constant companion for several years. Nevertheless, it is not certain that Philemon was with the apostle on this occasion, by his name is not mentioned among those who accompanied him to Jerusalem, Acts xx. 4. Others think Timothy is the brother spoken of, to whom likewise the character of δίκαιος is belongeth. But let us not forget that Timothy joined the apostle in writing this second epistle, consequently cannot be supposed to have gone with it to Corinth. According to others, this brother was Sothearus, who having, as supposed, been a ruler of the synagogue in Corinth before his conversion, was well known to the Corinthians, and a person of great authority among them. Lastly, some think the brother whose praise was communicated to the gospel, ver. 14, and the brother spoken of in this verse, were two of the messengers of the Macedonian churches whose names are mentioned Acts x. 1. But from 2 Cor. ix. 4, it appears, that they did not go before Paul, but accompanied him to Corinth.

2. Upon the great confidence which he hath in you. — Our translators supply here the words οὐχ άλλα, connecting the clause with the first member of the sentence; I have sent with them our brother, upon the great confidence which I have, &c. But the expression, as supplied, are more proper.

Ver. 22. They are the messengers of the churches, &c. — The apostle’s example, in doing justice to the character of his younger fellow-labourers, is highly worthy of the imitation of the more aged ministers of the gospel. They ought to introduce their younger brethren to the esteem and confidence of the people, by giving them the praise which is due to them. For, as Doddridge observes, they will most effectually strengthen their own hands, and edify the church, by being instrumental in setting forward others, who, on account of their faithfulness and diligence in the ministry, will in time merit the illustrious application of being 'the glory of Christ.'

CHAPTER IX.

View and Illustration of the Exhortation given in this Chapter.

The apostle in this chapter continued his discourse concerning the collection, not to persuade the Corinthians to undertake the work; that, as he observed, was not needful, ver. 1. He knew this gift which he had, with the Macedonians, that Achaia was prepared since the end of the last year; for so the apostle believed at the time he boasted of them; ver. 2. But now, being informed by Titus that a good deal still remained to be done, he had sent the brethren mentioned in the preceding chapter, to encourage them to go on, that his boasting concerning their being prepared might not be rendered false, but that at length they might be prepared, ver. 3. For if the Macedonian brethren, who were coming with him to Corinth, should find their collection not finished, he, not to say the Corinthians, would be ashamed of his confident boasting concerning them, ver. 4. He had judged it necessary, therefore, to entreat the brethren to go before him to Corinth, to persuade them to complete their collection, that whatever they should give might appear as freely given, and not as forced from them by his presence, ver. 6. In the mean time, to encourage them to give liberally, he put them in mind of the rule, according to which the rewards of the future life are to be bestowed: He that soweth, shall reap, etc., etc., ver. 6. Then desired every one of them to consult his own heart, and to give what he thought proper, without grudging, ver. 7:—Because God loves a cheerful giver, and can supply men abundantly with this world's goods, both for their own maintenance, and to enable them to do works of charity, ver. 8, 9. Further, he observed, that such a gift from so many Gentile churches, not only would supply the wants of the brethren in Judea, but being a demonstration of the affection which the Gentiles bare to them, would occasion many thanksgivings, ver. 10:—The Jews glorifying God for the profession of the Gentiles to the gospel, of which they would have so clear a proof, ver. 10:—and also praying for the Gentiles, whom they would love as their brethren on account of the grace of God bestowed on them, ver. 11:—Now the union of the Jews and Gentiles into one body or church, being in all respects a most happy event, the apostle returns thanks to God for his unspeakable gift Jesus Christ, through whom it had been accomplished, ver. 12.

I cannot finish this Illustration without observing, in praise of the apostle Paul, that there never was penned, by any writer, a stronger and more affecting exhortation to works of charity, than that which he addressed to the Corinthians in this and the preceding chapter:—The example of the Christians in Macedonia, who, notwithstanding they were themselves in very straitened circumstances, had contributed liberally towards the relief of the saints in Judea:—The great love of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, though he was rich, yet for their sake became poor, that they through his poverty might be rich:—God's acceptation of works of charity, not according to the greatness of what is bestowed, but according to the willingness with which it is bestowed:—The reward which God will confer on beneficent men in the life to come, in proportion to the number and greatness of the good actions which they have performed in this life:—His supplying them with a sufficiency of this world's goods for their own maintenance, and for enabling them to continue their good offices to the indigent:—His blowing their ordinary labour for that end:—The joy which is occasioned to the poor whose wants are relieved by the alms of the charitable:—The thanksgivings which other good men will offer to God when they see works of this sort done, but especially thanksgivings to God from the poor who are relieved in their straits by the charitable:—Their gratitude towards their benefactors, expressed in earnest prayers to God for their happiness:—and the cordial union which is produced between the rich and the poor by this intercourse of good offices:—All these considerations are displayed, in this excellent exhortation, with a tenderness and feeling, which nothing but a heart filled with goodness was capable of expressing.

With the above-mentioned affecting motives, which are suited to every ingenuous mind, the apostle intermixed a variety of other incitements to works of charity, adapted to the particular circumstances of the Corinthian brethren, which, therefore, must have made a strong impression on them:—Such as their former readiness to do good works:—Their being enriched with every spiritual gift; a kind of riches vastly superior to the riches which the apostle wished them to impart to their needy brethren:—Their love to him their spiritual father, whose reasonable desires it was their duty to comply with:—His having boasted of their good dispositions to the churches of Macedonia:—His anxiety that the messengers from these churches, who were coming to Corinth, might find them such as he had represented them:—And the shame with which the apostle himself, as well as the Corinthians, would be overwhelmed, if, when the Macedonian brethren arrived, they were found to have been negligent in making the collection for the poor in Judea. He therefore entreated them to prove the truth of their love to him, and of his boasting concerning them, before these worthy strangers, and before the churches whose messengers they were, by their finishing the collection with cheerfulness, that what they gave might appear to be a gift willingly bestowed, and not a thing extorted from them by his importunity.

Upon the whole, if any minister of the gospel, who is himself animated by a benevolent disposition towards mankind, has occasion to excite his people to works of charity, let him study with due attention the eighth and ninth chapters of St. Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians; for nowhere else will he find so fine a model to form his exhortation on, as that which is exhibited in these excellent chapters.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IX. 1 But indeed, concerning the propriety of the ministry to the saints in Judea, it is superfluous for me to write to you. What I have now in view is, to persuade you to finish speedily what you have begun.

2 For I am so convinced of your willingness, that in the persuasion ye had actually made the collection, I boasted of you to the Macedonians, that the churches of Achaia were prepared since the last year. And my account of your zeal in this matter, hath stirred up very many to follow your example.

3 Yet, as ye have not finished your collection, I have sent the brethren (chap. viii. 18. 22.) to inform you of my coming, that our boasting which is on your behalf may not be rendered false in this particular, by your making unnecessary delays; but that, as I said, ye may be prepared when I come:

Ver. 2. That Achaia was prepared since the last year. So the apostle thought, when he boasted of the Corinthians to the Macedonians. For in his former letter, which was written in the end of the preceding year, he had exhorted them to make the collection, and had given it charge to Titus, who carried that letter, to encourage them in the work. Besides, the Corinthians were accustomed to give a great respect for the apostle in the letter which they sent to him, and the messengers who brought that letter having assured them of his dispositions to obey him in every thing, he did not doubt of their having complied with his request. And therefore, when he went into Macedonia the following spring, after Pentecost, he told the Macedonian churches, that Achaia was prepared since the end of the last year. Firmly believing that it was so. (See 1 Thess. i. 7. note.

Ver. 3. That our boasting which was concerning you. When the apostle left Ephesus, he went into Macedonia, in the expectation of meeting Titus on his return from Corinth. But since Macedonia has remained some months before Titus arrived; and during that time,
II. CORINTHIANS.

4 Let us, if the Macedonians come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we may not ye) should be put to shame (w) by this confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to entreat the brethren, that they would go before to you, and complete beforehand your formerly announced (worse, 33.) gift, that the same might be thus ready as a gift, and not as a thing extorted.

6 Now this I say, He who soweth sparingly, sparingly also shall reap; and he who soweth bountifully, bountifully also shall reap.

7 Every one, according as he purposeth in his heart, ought to give, not with grief, nor by constraint; for God loveth a cheerful giver.

8 And God is able to make every blessing abound (ac) to you; that in every thing always having all sufficiency, ye may abound in every good work;

9 As it is written, (Psalm exii. 9.) He hath dispersed; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever.

10 Now he may be who supplieth seed to the sower, and bread for meat; supply and multiply your seed sown, and increase the produce of your righteousness.

11 That ye may be enriched in everything to all liberality, which worketh out through us thanksgiving to God.

12 For the ministry of this public service is not only filling up completely the wants of the saints, but also abundeth in many thanksgivings to God:

13 That, through the proof of this ministry, glorifying God for your professed subjection (ac) to the gospel of Christ, and for the liberality of your communication to them, and to all.

14 (Kata mesos) And in their prayer for you, ardentely loving you on account of the exceeding grace of God bestowed (g) on you.

we may suppose, he exhorted the Macedonian churches to make the collections and excited them to work by boasting of the forwardness of the Corinthians.

Ver. 4. By this confident boasting.—The word ευδοκήσας is often used by the LXX. to denote confident expectation, or firm hope. Our translators, therefore, have rendered it properly here by confidence. Here it is translated, in loc.) fundamental glorification—on the foundation of boasting. The Vulgate, substantially glosses—matter of boasting. The literal translation is, 'in this confidence of boasting.'

Ver. 5. Not as (εις προσφοράς) a thing extorted.—Estes thinks the proper translation of this clause is, 'Not as of covetousnes, because according to him, the apostle's meaning is that the alms given by the Corinthians should be large, as proceeding from a liberal disposition, and not small, as proceeding from covetousness. But the word προσφοράς being in the accusative case, hinders us from supplying the preposition of.—Through the interpretation this by a Greek word signifying circumcising, in which he is followed by Erasmus. But Stephanus, in his Concordance, citing this verse, translates it, 'expositum aliquid—thing extorted;' which I take to be the proper translation. See chap. ii. 11, note 1.

Ver. 6. To make every blessing.—The word πληρεῖν, which we have translated, our translators have rendered by the word enrich. 2 Cor. i. 15, and chap. vi. by the word gift. That it is used here to denote temporal gifts or blessings, is evident from the remaining part of the verse, and from the scope of the apostle's argument. The repetition of the words every and all in this passage rends it beautifully.

2. Sufficiency.—The Greek word αὐτόμαχος properly signifies self-ufficiency in one's self.

Ver. 8. As it is written, He hath dispersed.—This is an allusion to the seed, not only sown, but sown plentifully. And the image beautifully represents both the good will which the liberal distribute their alms, and the many needy persons on whom they are bestowed.

2. His righteousness.—The Hebrews used the word righteousness to denote alms. Accordingly, the LXX. translate the Hebrew word which signifies righteousness by ἀνακάτευρον, alms. The Latinists' declaration implies, that, in the case of providence, the beneficent are often blessed with worldly prosperity.

Ver. 9. May he who supplieth seed to the sower, and bread for meat, supply and multiply, &c. I have followed here the Syriac and Arabic versions, which I think preferable to the English. If a comma be placed after εὐδοκίας, the translation I have given will appear both literal and harmonious to first, &c. That it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater, which the apostle is supposed to have laid in his eye here.

2. And increase the produce.—Εὐδοκήσας, germinus; literally, the things which spring from your sowing.

3. Of your righteousness.—Hence industry is fully termed righteousness, because it is a righteous thing in the sight of God to labour for our own maintenance, and for the maintenance of those who cannot labour for themselves.

Ver. 10. That ye may be enriched.—I have followed the Vulgate in this translation: ut in omnibus sufficiatis.
CHAPTER X.

II. CORINTHIANS.

15 Now, thanks be to God for his unspaukable gift. 1

HITHER TO, St. Paul's discourse was chiefly directed to those at Corinth who acknowledged his apostleship, and who had obeyed his orders, signified to them in his former letter. But in this, and the remaining chapters, he addressed the false teacher himself, and such of the faction as still adhered to him, speaking to them with great authority, and threatening to punish them by his miraculous power, if they did not immediately repent. The different characters, therefore, of the two sorts of persons who composed the Corinthian church, as it was formerly observed, (Pref. sect. 2,) must be carefully attended to; otherwise this part of the epistle will appear a direct contradiction to what goes before.

The false teacher, it seems, and the faction, ridiculing the apostle's threatenings in his former letter, had said, that he was all meekness and humility, when present among them, but exceeding bold by letters when absent. This they represented as wise carnal policy. For, said they, being conscious of his own weakness, he does not choose, when present, to provoke us to make too narrow a search into his character, lest it should lead to disgraceful discoveries. The apostle, therefore, in answer to that sarcasm, began his address to the faction with telling them, in irony, that the very same Paul himself, who in presence was humble among them, but bold when absent, did not now when absent speak boldly, but humbly beseech them; not, however, by his own meekness, which they ridiculed, but by his meekness and gentleness of Christ. And what he besought of them was, that he might not be obliged to be bold, in the manner he had resolved to be bold, against some, who, on account of his meekness when present with them, had calumniated him as a person who walked after the flesh, ver. 1, 2. But though he was in the flesh, he assured them he did not war against idolaters and unbelievers with fleshly weapons, but with weapons far more powerful, bestowed on him by God, for the purpose of casting down all the bulwarks raised up by worldly policy for the defence of idolatry and indecency. These mighty weapons were the miraculous powers and spiritual gifts which Christ had conferred on him as his apostle, ver. 4, 5. He farther told them, that although he seldom used his miraculous power in punishing unbelievers, he had that power in readiness for punishing all disobedience in them who professed to be the disciples of Christ, and particularly for punishing such of the Corinthians as called his apostleship in question, ver. 6. He cautioned them, therefore, against estimating things according to their outward appearance; and told them, if the false teacher believed himself to be Christ's minister, he ought, from the proofs which St. Paul had given of his apostleship, to have concluded that even he was Christ's apostle, notwithstanding the meanness of his outward appearance, ver. 7. For which reason, said he, if I should now boast somewhat more than I have hitherto done, of the power which Christ hath given me as an apostle, I am sure, when that power is tried, I shall not be put to shame by its failing me, ver. 8. Then, in ridicule of the false teacher, who had said that he was bold towards them by letters when absent, he added, in the highest strain of irony, But I must forbear boasting of my power, that I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters, ver. 9, 10. And because the false teacher was a great pretender to reasoning, the apostle desired him, by reasoning from the effects of his power, already shown in the punishment of the incorruptible person, to conclude, that such as he was in speech by letters when absent, the same also he would be in deed when present, ver. 11.

Having thus threatened to punish the false teacher and his adherents, the apostle told them ironically, that, to be sure, he durst not rank and compare himself with their learned teacher, who was so full of his own praise. It seems that impostors had boasted among the Corinthians, of his great natural talents and acquired accomplishments. But the apostle told them, his high opinion of himself proceeded from his measuring himself only with himself, and from his comparing himself with himself; by which method of measuring himself, notwithstanding his great wisdom, he did not understand himself, ver. 12. Next, because the false teacher boasted of the great things he had done at Corinth, the apostle told them, that for his part he would not boast of things done out of the bounds prescribed to him by God; but would only say, that, according to these bounds, he had come to Corinth in an orderly course of preaching the gospel to persons who had never heard it before, ver. 13, 14. So that, when he boasted of things which he had done among the Corinthians, he did not boast of other men's labours, like the false teacher, who had intruded himself into a church planted by another; and therefore, agreeably to the rule prescribed by God, the apostle hoped, when their faith was increased, to be by them enlarged with respect to his bounds, ver. 15. So as to preach the gospel in the regions beyond them, where no other person had ever preached, ver. 16. Lastly, to shew the folly of the false teacher more fully, the apostle concluded this part of his discourse with observing, that the preacher of the gospel who boasts, should boast only in this, that he preaches in the manner the Lord allows, ver. 17. Because, not he who commendeth himself is the approved teacher, but he whom the Lord commendeth, ver. 18.

From this passage we learn two things: First, That the apostles were specially appointed to preach the gospel in countries where it had not been preached before.
This work was assigned to them, not only because they enjoyed the highest degree of inspiration, and possessed the greatest miraculous powers for confirming the gospel, but because they alone had the power of conferring the spiritual gifts, whereby their converts were enabled in their absence to edify themselves and others, and even to convert unbelievers. Secondly, That, in preaching the gospel, the apostles were not to pass by, or neglect, any nation that lay in their way, where the gospel had not been preached before, but were to proceed in an orderly course, from one country to another, after having preached in each; that the light of the gospel might be imparted to all.—According to this rule, the false teacher, who had come from Judea to Corinth, not in the orderly course of preaching in countries where the gospel had not been preached before, but by a direct and speedy journey, perhaps in the expectation of becoming rich by preaching in such a populous and wealthy city as Corinth, showed himself to be no minister of Christ; and having intruded himself into a church which had been planted by Paul, he had not the least reason to boast of his labors among the Corinthians.

New Translation.

Chap. X.—I Now I, the very same Paul who, when present, was humble among you, but when absent am bold toward you, beware you by the mildness and clemency of Christ.

3 For, though we walk in the flesh, we do not war according to the flesh.

6 We are not fleshly, (43,) but exceeding powerful for the overturning of strongholds.

5 We overturn reasonings, and every high thing raised against the knowledge of God, and lead captive every thought to the obedience of Christ.

6 Are prepared to punish all disobedience, when your obedience is completed.

7 Do ye look on things according to appearance? If any one is confident in himself?

Ver. 5. Some who conclude us to be really persons, &c.—In this and the preceding verse, the apostle turns against Corinth, who despised him as falsely pretending to supernatural powers, were warned of their danger. And the warning being conveyed to them in a very fine irony, whereas they were taunted with it, they must have stung them sensibly to find themselves thus treated. Vers 5. We do not war according to the flesh.—Ephesus thinks the apostle’s meaning is, That he did not use the vain reasonings and sophisms furnished by the wisdom of the Greeks, as the false teacher seems to have done.

Ver. 6. But exceeding powerful.—Our translators have rendered the phrase very powerful, Act vii. 39, as a superlative, exceeding fair. Wherefore, the phrase very powerful may here be translated very powerful. See Exs. iv. 27. —The powerful weapons of which the apostle speaks, were the gifts of inspiration and miracles, the faculty of speaking all kinds of languages, and the ability of communicating miraculous powers and spiritual gifts to others. These mighty weapons the apostle opposes, in this verse, to the fleshly or worldly weapons of swords, and spears, and military engines, and cunning stratagems, and false speeches, with which the men of this world carry on their wars.

Ver. 5. We overturn reasonings.—The phrase παρασυναισθήνω, denotes the beating down of strongholds by means of military engines. Now, as the strongholds of which the apostle speaks, were demolished by preaching, there is here, perhaps, an allusion to the beating down of the walls of Jericho, by the priests blowing their trumpets, and by the people’s shouting, Josh. vi. 31.

Ver. 6. We are not fleshly.—The change of the construction in the original directs to this translation, agreeable to the significance of the Greek participle, Exs. iv. 16. Beside, the apostle cannot be supposed to have said, as in our English version, That the arms of warfare led captive every thought, &c.; and had in reason to rejoice over all disobedience. The reasonings which the apostle says he throws down, were not the vain reasonings of those who gravely consider the existence of the gospel, but the sophisms of the Greek philosophers, and the false reasonings of the statements, and of all who from bad dispositions opposed the gospel by argument. For, as Chrysostom expresses it, Παρασυναισθήνω, καί ἐκ τῆς ἐκπαίδευσε τῆς γλῶσσας, ἢ παρασυναισθήνω, καί ἐκ τῆς ἐκπαίδευσε τῆς γλῶσσας, the apostle opposed the sophisms of the Greek philosophers, (see 1 Tim. iii. 6, note 2) and of the force of sophisms and sophisms.

Ver. 7. Do ye look on things according to appearance? If any one is confident in himself?—By using the phrase confident in himself, the apostle intimates, not by forbidding men to use their reason, but by opposing to them the most convincing arguments, drawn from the inspiration and miracles with which the preachers of the gospel were endowed.

Ver. 8. And every high thing raised up against the knowledge of God, and lead captive every thought to the obedience of Christ.—The apostle alludes to the terrors raised on the top of the walls of a besieged city, which, from which the besieged among them were rescued. To these high structures, the apostle compared the proud imaginations of the enemies of revolution, concerning the apostle, the counterfeit and false powers, in all matters of religion and morality. But these imaginations the apostle cast down, by the force of his arguments, which they made use of.

Ver. 8. And, with respect to them who profess themselves Christians, are prepared by our miraculous power to punish all disobedience, as I shall do in Corinth, when the obedience of such of you as are disposed to repent is completed.

Ver. 9. Do ye judge of things according to appearance? If any one is confident in himself?—By the phrase confident in himself, the apostle intimates, not by forbidding men to use their reason, but by opposing to them the most convincing arguments, drawn from the inspiration and miracles with which the preachers of the gospel were endowed.

that he is Christ’s, let him, on the other hand, (368) reason this from himself, that as he is Christ’s, so also we are Christ’s.

8. And therefore, if I should boast somewhat more abundantly of our power, which the Lord hath given us for your edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed.

9. That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10. For his letters, saith he, are indeed weighty and strong; but his bodily presence weak, and his speech contemptible.

11. Let such an one conclude this, that such as we are in speech by letters, when absent, the same also when present we shall be in deed.

12 (1 Gal. 98.) But we dare not rank (6, 183) and compare ourselves with some who commend themselves: However, they (6, 172) among themselves measuring themselves, and comparing themselves with themselves, do not understand themselves.

13. Further, we will not boast (56, 148) of things not measured; but to have come even to you, according to the measure of the line which God hath allotted to us.

14. For we do not stretch ourselves beyond OXHIA, as not reaching to you; but we are come as far as you also in the gospel of Christ.

15. We do not boast (see ver. 12;) of things not measured, that is, of other men’s labours.

3. That he is Christ’s:—By this the apostle did not acknowledge the false teacher to be a faithful minister of Christ. He had taken on himself the work of the ministry, and was by profession a servant of Christ. This Paul acknowledged, without entering into the consideration of his faithfulness. At the same time, as he pretended to great powers of reasoning, the apostle desired him to reason this for himself. That if he were a minister of Christ, merely by professing to be one, the apostle, who besides laying claim to that character, had exercised miraculous power among the Corinthians, was not mere man, but a more truly a minister of Christ than he was, who did not possess that proof. See chap. xii. 20. note 1.

Ver. 8. For your edification, and not for your destruction:—Here the apostle intended to the Corinthians, that he had ordered them to certain measures, not for the purpose of destroying him, but for preserving them from the consequences of their evil example. See chap. xii. 18.; xiii. 24.

Ver. 9. His letters, saith he, are indeed weighty and strong; but his bodily presence weak:—The apostle here gives the name of Letters to one letter. The word letters, therefore, was properly used by the false teacher, notwithstanding the passages written only one letter to the Corinthians at the time he said this.—His letter which was weighty, is his first epistle to the Corinthians.

Ver. 10. But his bodily presence weak:—From chap. xii. 18. and from ver. 12. of this chapter, it is evident, that there were several false teachers among the faction at Corinth. Nevertheless it is plain from ver. 11. that the apostle is speaking here of one teacher.

3. Are indeed weighty and strong:—In the apostle’s letter here referred to, he had spoken to the offenders sharply; and had threatened them in a very strict tone; particularly in chap. iv. 17-21. and through the whole of chap. v.

4. But his bodily presence weak:—From this it would appear, that St. Paul was either a man of small stature, or that there was something in his countenance or address which was unbecoming. In the Philippian Epistle, Triphon, who said he was baptized by him, called him many-tongued Galahadus. And the apostle himself speaks of his own weakness of the flesh, Gal. iv. 12.

And his speech contemptible:—With great contempt and indifference. But the meaning is worthy of being contended, contemned, contemptible. This may be understood.

Ver. 12. We do not rank.—Harnack and Ehrler have produced passages from the Greek writers, to show that the word συνορίζεσθαι, here used, signifies to rank one person with another. Accordingly, the Arabic version hath here a word signifying to compare the Latin name inordinate.

2. However, they among themselves measuring themselves:—I have followed the order of the original, because it suggests this idea: That the false teachers, in their conversations among themselves, measured or estimated themselves, and according to their real worth, but according to the opinion which they had formed of themselves. Besides, they compared themselves, not with the apostle of Christ, but with themselves, that is, with each other.

Horace’s advice, Epist. lib. i. 7. last line, "Metiri ac quemque suo modo as pede verum car," hath a different meaning; namely, that every one should follow the manner of life which best suits his genius.

Ver. 15. And claims authority on that account, let him, on the other hand, reason this by the exercise of his own understanding, that as he is Christ’s minister by profession, so also I am Christ’s minister; my claim to that character being much better than his.

And therefore, if, preferring myself to him, I should boast somewhat more abundantly than I have hitherto done of our power, who are apostles, to punish disobedience, which the Lord hath given us for your edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed by its failing, and make it that the disobedient among you.

9. But I forbear boasting of my power, that I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10. For his letters, saith the false teacher scornfully, are indeed weighty and strong in respect of boasting and threatening, but his bodily presence is humble, (ver. 1.), and his manner of speaking contemptible.

11. Let such a scoffing pretender to reasoning conclude this, that such as we are in speech by letters, when absent, the same also when present I shall be in deed.

12. But, to be sure, I, whose appearance and speech are so contemptible, dare not rank nor compare myself with some among you, who commend themselves, though destitute of the character, power, and success of apostles: However, they among themselves measuring themselves, and comparing themselves by their own opinion of themselves, and comparing themselves with each other only, and not with the apostles, do not understand their own inferiority.

13. Further, I will not like them boast of things not appointed to me, but to have come even to you in Corinth, according to the measure of the line which God, who assigns to every preacher of the gospel his bounds, hath allotted to me.

14. For, in preaching at Corinth, we do not like the false teacher go out of our line, as not reaching to you; but we are come as far as you also, in the regular course of preaching the gospel of Christ.

15. I say, I do not, like some others, take praise to myself on account of things not allotted to me, that is, of other men’s labours; but but we have hope, when your faith is increased, to be by you enlarged with respect to our line2 abundance.
16 To preach the gospel in the regions1 beyond you; and not in another man's line, to boast of things already prepared.3 17 He then who beasotheth, let him boast in the Lord.
18 For not he who commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

II. CORINTHIANS.

I have hope, when your faith is increased to such a degree that I can leave you to the care of your ordinary teachers, to be by you enlarged with respect to my line of preaching abundantly: 16 So as to preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, where no person hath yet preached, and not in another man's bounds, to boast to myself on account of things already prepared; that is, of churches already planted, as the false teacher hath done.
17 If, then, any teacher beasotheth, let him boast of his having performed his duty in the manner the Lord hath appointed.
18 For not he who commendeth himself is an approved teacher; but he whom the Lord commendeth, by the inspiration and miraculous powers bestowed on him.

CHAPTER XI.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

From the things written in this chapter it appears, that although the false teacher, on all occasions, took care to sound his own praise, ver. 9.—solemnly professing, that no man should deprive him of that ground of boasting, in the regions of Achaia, ver.
10.—This resolution he had formed, not from want of love to the Corinthians, ver. 11.—but that he might cut off all opportunity from the false teacher and others, who desired an opportunity to speak evil of him, as one who preached the gospel for gain. Also that the false teacher, who in public pretended to imitate him in taking nothing for his preaching, (though in private he received gifts from individuals), might be obliged to lay aside his hypocrisy, and, after the apostle's example, take nothing in private from any one, ver. 12.—There was a peculiar propriety in the apostle's taking nothing from his disciplcs in Corinth, on account of his preaching; because, being an opulent city, it might have been said, that his motive for preaching so long there was to enrich himself. This indeed was the view of the false teacher, who, by receiving gifts in private, showed himself to be a deceitful workman, although he assumed the appearance of a true apostle, by pretending to preach without taking any reward from the Corinthians. But his assuming that appearance was not to be wondered at, seeing Satan himself, on some occasions, puts on the appearance of an

The apostle having such good reasons for commending himself, he desired the faction, a second time, not to think him a fool for speaking in his own praise; or at least, as a fool to bear with him, that like the false teacher he might boast a little, ver. 16.—For, said he ironically, to be sure that which I am going to speak, in this confident boasting concerning myself, I speak not according to the Lord, but as in foolishness, ver. 17.—In his former letter, the apostle had used this expression, chap. vii.
12. 'To the rest I speak, not the Lord.' This the false teacher misinterpreting, had maliciously turned into ridicule, by telling the Corinthians, that the praises which Paul bestowed on himself were, he supposed, of the number of the things which the Lord did not speak. This sacrasm the apostle repeated in an ironical manner, to insinuate to the Corinthians, that the things which he spoke in vindication of himself as an apostle, he spoke by the commandment of Christ.—Then added, Seeing many, who are no apostles, praise themselves for their supposed qualities, I, who am a real apostle of Christ, will likewise praise myself for my good qualities, ver. 18. Especially as the false teacher and his followers, being such wise men, glially bear with fools, that they may have the pleasure of laughing at them, ver. 19.—Now, said he, ye are of such a bearing disposition, that if one enslaves you, if one eat you up, if one take your goods, if one raise you, if you be against you in wrath, if one even beat you on the face, ye bare it, ver. 20.—This, it seems, was the insoleil manner in which the false teacher treated his adherents at Corinth, who bare it all with great patience. In his account, therefore, of the bearing disposition of the faction, the apostle gave the sincere part of the church a laughable picture of the wisdom of their wise brethren, in bearing.—Farther, he told them, that he was obliged to speak in his own praise, because he had been represented as a low born, weak, ill qualified teacher. But he affirmed, that on whatever account any one among them was bold in his own praise, he also had just reason to be bold on the same account, ver. 21.—Are these boasters Hebrews? so am I. Are they, &c. ver. 22.—Is the false teacher a minister of Christ? I speak as a fool; I am more than an orator, &c. and in proof of what I say, I appeal to my labours and sufferings for the gospel. Here the apostle enumerates the labours and sufferings which he endured while executing his office; from which it appears, that no man ever did or suffered as much, in pursuit of the gospel or for Christ, as he did in preaching Christ, ver. 23—29.—And with respect to the weakness or cowardice with which he was reproached, he told them, that since he was obliged to boast, he would boast even of his weaknesses, in flying from danger on a particular occasion; namely, when the Jews laid wait for him in Damascus; because his escaping from that danger was an illustration of the care which both God and man took of him, as a faithful minister of Christ, ver. 30—34.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XI. 1 I wish ye could bear some little of my foolishness: ye, even bear with me as a chaste virgin to Christ.

3 But I am afraid, lest somehow, as the serpent beguiled Eve by his subtlety, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity which is due (so 142. 2) to Christ.

5 And even if I am an unlearned person in speech, &c. say, yet I am not so in the knowledge proper to an apostle: but on every occasion I have been made manifest by all things (w) among you.

Ver. 1. Could bear some little of my foolishness: The apostle terms his confessing himself foolishness, because his opposers gave it that appellation. Nor was it, because a matter both of prudence and duty; because the faction had been very haughty in opposing it.

Ver. 2. I am jealous of you. The word love was used by the Greeks to signify, not a peculiar affection, but the strength and vehemence of any affection whatsoever; so that it is applied to bad affections as well as to good. Hence it denotes jealousy, as in this passage: Concern for the honour of another, John ii. 17.—Anger, Acts x. 17.—Eros, Acts xxii. 40.—Love, 2 Cor. i. 9. See also Gal. iv. 17. Col. iv. 13.—Hence (E W, wos) are reckoned among the works of the flesh, Gal. v. 21. and one kind of zeal is termed even (Ewok, better zeal, James iii. 18.

2 I have betrayed you to one husband. I am afraid lest I have betrayed the Corinthians to Christ, not at all by word, but in a way which is altogether foreign to the spirit of the gospel, by persuading them that it is a different spirit, and that the spiritual gifts which have been received from Christ, have been assumed by the apostle as being actual goods of the kind of Christ. To this misapprehension is due the opposition, and to this error is due the later and more correct exposition of the same matter.

5 And even if I am an unlearned person in speech, &c. say, yet I am not so in the knowledge proper to an apostle: but on every occasion I have been made manifest by all things (by the doctrine I taught, and the gifts I bestowed) among you as a chief apostle.

Ver. 5. I was afraid lest somehow, as the serpent beguiled Eve by his subtlety, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity which is due (to Christ).

Ver. 6. I am not in fault as regards respect to inspiration, nor of miracles, nor of the power of communicating spiritual gifts, nor of success; for I am the apostle of Christ and God.

Ver. 8. I have been brought home to their husband's house, to live with them over. See Eph. ii. 19. The apostle having betrayed the Corinthians to Christ, he was anxious to preserve them from tears, or tears from their future sorrow, if the time of their marriage came they might not be rejected by him.

Ver. 9. I am not as a fool, lest somehow as the serpent beguiled Eve. He speaks as a fool, by his subtlety. This was the devil who beguiled Eve, our Lord hath inferred, by calling him 'a murderer from the beginning,' John vii. 5. The reason is, the apostle had learned, by giving the name of the old serpent to him who is called 'the Devil and his angels,' who descends the whole world, Rev. xii. 9. 10. Besides, in the history of the fall, the serpent is said to have been punished as a rational and accountable agent. Wherefore, what Moses hath written of the fall, is not an argument or falsity with a vulgar meaning, as Midrash and others contend, but a true history of things really done, in which the devil was the chief actor. There are who think, that the devil in that history was called a serpent figuratively, because in tempting Eve he used the qualities natural to serpents; and that the punishment inflicted on him, namely, his being confined to our atmosphere, is figuratively expressed by his being driven out of the garden, and to eat the dust. But others think, that the devil in the history of the fall is called a serpent, because he assumed the appearance of a serpent; and as after the fall a change was actually made in the form and state of that animal, to be a memorial of the devil's having abused its pristine form, for the purpose of deceiving and ruling mankind.

Ver. 9. I am in nothing inferior to the greatest of the apostles: so that ye had no reason to apply to any other teacher.

Ver. 10. And even if I am an unlearned person in speech, &c. say, yet I am not so in the knowledge proper to an apostle: but on every occasion I have been made manifest by all things (by the doctrine I taught, and the gifts I bestowed) among you as a chief apostle.
II. CORINTHIANS.

7 Have I committed an offence, in humbling myself, that ye might be exalted, because I have preached the gospel of God to you as a free gift? 8 Other churches I spoiled, taking wages from them to do you service.

9 (Kos) For being present with you, and in want, I distressed no one; (2 Cor. 12) but my want the brethren coming from Macedonia fully supplied, and in every thing I have kept, and will keep myself, from being burdensome to you.

10 As the truth of Christ is in me, (2 Cor. 6) surely this same boasting shall not be stopped (2 Cor. 14) concerning me in the regions of Achaia.

11 For what reason? Because I do not love you? God knoweth.

12 But what I do, (2 Cor. 12) that I will do, that I may cut off opportunity from them who desire opportunity, that wherein they boast they may be found even as we.

13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ.

14 But we are warned; for Satan himself transformed himself into an angel of light.

15 Therefore it is no great wonder if his ministers also transform themselves as ministers of righteousness; of those the end shall be according to their works.

16 (1 Tim. 6) Moreover, I say, Let no one think me a fool; but if otherwise, (2 Tim. 2) at least as a fool bear with me, that I also may boast a little.

him his want of these accomplishments. But Bull, in his Germ. and Diss. vol. i. p. 334, 341, gives it as his opinion that the reason of the fact was revealed, not against the apostle's style, but against his pronunciation and action in speaking, which through some bodily infirmity was ungraceful and unacceptable. And to this he applies 2 Cor. 10. 14. His letters, he saith, are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible. Perhaps the fact objected both imperfections to the apostle.

17 But I mean not that I reproach you; the subject is conceived, exalted by faith to the dignity of God's sons. Of this exaltation James (1 Tim. 6) speaks, chap. v. 8.

18 Preached the gospel of God to you as a free gift. This, the apostle's enemies said, was a presumption that he knew himself to be no apostle; or, if he were so, to conceal it, for he did not love the Corinthians. The first of these objections the apostle has already answered, chap. i. 3—9. On proving his right to maintenance, and by declaring that he declined using that right, merely to make his preaching the more acceptable and successful. The second objection he answers in this chapter, ver. 11—15; by assuring them, that his not demanding maintenance did not proceed from his not loving them, but that those teachers who boasted of their inducing him in not receiving maintenance, might be obliged to leave off taking presents from their disciples in private. Further, because his enemies pretended that he craftily declined taking maintenance from the Corinthians, that he might the more easily fence them by his answers, he takes notice of that calumny also, and refutes it, chap. xii. 16.

Ver. 6. Other churches I spoiled, taking wages from them. He means the church at Philippi. For the brethren of Philippi, being strongly impressed with a sense of the advantages which mankind derived from the gospel, were so anxious to render the apostle's preaching in Corinth successful, that during his residence there they sent him money, to prevent his being burdensome to the Corinthians. His acceptance of these presents he called a spoiling of the Philippians, because, as he was not labouring among them, he took their money without giving them any thing in return for it: as a taking of wages; but it was for a service performed, not to the Philippians, but to the Corinthians.

Ver. 8. I distressed no one. According to Jerome, this is a Greek word, απολεομισται, which E颞ios saith is the name of a fish called by the Latins flana, because it drives those who touch it of the sense of feeling. Supposing this to be the derivation of the word, the apostle's meaning is, I surpassed no one. But Joach. Comment. In his notes on the New Testament, observes, that the primitive word is used by Theocritus in the sense of infaring; and that Plato has used another derivative from that primitive in the same sense.

2. But my want, the brethren, &c. Though the apostle generally maintained himself by his own labour, he was sometimes so occupied in preaching, and in the other functions of his ministry, that he had little time for working. On such occasions he was much pinched with want; as happened in Corinth, when the brethren left off sending him. See ver. 7. 3. Fully supplied: ὄλλους. This word, as Bengelius observes, implies that the money sent by the Philippians, added to what he gained by his own labour, fully sustained him. Ver. 12. That wherein they boast they may be found even as we. It would seem that the false teachers at Corinth, in imitation of the apostle, pretended to take nothing for their own maintenance, and boasted of their disinterestedness. Nevertheless, on other pretences, they received presents from their disciples in private, nay, extorted them. See ver. 20. Wherefore, to put these impostors to shame, and to oblige them really to imitate him, the apostle declared, that he never had taken anything, nor ever would take anything from the Corinthians, either in public or in private, on any account whatever.

Ver. 13—14. Such are false apostles. They are false apostles, because they falsely pretend to be divinely inspired, and expressly commissioned by Christ.

15. Deceitful workers. Workman or labourer, is an appellation which St. Paul sometimes takes to himself, and often given to his assistants in the ministry. He called the presbyters of whom he is speaking deceitful, because they pretended to great disinterestedness in their work, while their only design was to promote their own interest.

Ver. 16. Transformeth himself into an angel of light. In this manner, it may be supposed, Satan transformed himself when he tempted our Lord in the wilderness; and in like manner, also, when he tempted our first mother Eve. Evil spirits are called angels of darkness, either because they are confined to the dark region of our atmosphere, or because they employ themselves in promoting error and wickedness, which is spiritual darkness; whereas good angels are called angels of light, because they employ themselves in promoting truth and virtue, which is spiritual light.

Ver. 16—17. If his ministers. False teachers are justly called the ministers of Satan, because they are employed in disseminating error, whereby Satan's kingdom is supported and propagated. Ministers of righteousness. The teachers of true doctrine are justly called ministers of righteousness, because they are employed in effecting the work of true doctrine to promote righteousness in them who receive it.

3. Of those the end shall be according to their works. Here
II. CORINTHIANS. 243

17 What I speak with so much confidence in my own praise, ye in irony say I do not speak according to the Lord's direction, but as in foolishness. Yet the Lord directs me to vindicate my own character as his apostle.

18 And therefore, seeing many teachers boast according to the manner of men, I also will boast in the same manner.

19 For though ye seek me a fool for praising myself, I know ye bear with fools gladly, for the purpose of laughing at them, being yourselves remarkably wise.

20 Your patience in bearing, I own, is very great; for ye bear it, if the false teacher enslave your conscience; or living in luxury at your expense; if he extort presents from you; if he raise himself against you in wrath, when ye refuse to comply with his will; if he even beat you on the face.

21 In what follows, I speak in answer to the reproach cast on me, namely, that I am weak. But I affirm, that in whatever respect my teacher among you is bold, (in foolishness no doubt I speak this,) I also am bold.

22 Are they Hebrews? I am a Hebrew also. Are they Israelites? I am the seed of Abraham.

23 Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool,) I am above them; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequently, in deaths often;

24 Of the Jews five times I received forty stripes save one.

The end, as in Rom. vi. 21, signifies the final issue of a course of action; consequently, the repetition which shall be made to the accuser.

Ver. 16. At least as a fool (προκατεχομαι) bear with me.—Eunice had frequently written to Paul, as can be seen from the 18th chapter of Philemon, where Paul desires the reader to bear with him. But Demetrius, when about to make a speech which he was afraid would not be well received, introduced it thus: προκατεχομαι ευναικίαν ἐγείρων. Bear with us, said he, and do not draw up your letters.

Ver. 17. I do not speak according to the Lord, but as in foolishness. This was a success of the false teacher, who, because the apostle in his former letter distinguished between the things which he himself spoke, and the things which the Lord spoke, fancied that he dared to tell them he was not inspired in the things spoken by himself. And therefore that imposter, in mockery of the praises which Paul bestowed on himself, said they were, he supposed, of the number of the things which the Lord did not speak by him. Thus withlie the apostle introduced here ironically, to show that whatever was necessary for the vindication of his character, and gifts, and powers, and behaviour, as an apostle, he spoke by inspiration from Christ, who promised to his apostles, that when called to destruction themselves, it should be given them in that hour that they were to speak.

Ver. 18. Ye bear with foolish gladly, being yourselves wise.—This is written in the highest style of the sublime. The falcon, he says, had said they would show their wisdom in bearing with, and labouring at the apostle as a fool, for praising himself so highly. Here he told them ironically, that, relying on their wisdom in bearing with him, he should bear for them the manner of others. But, in mockery, he mentioned their abjectly bearing the confusion and reproach, and degrading behaviour of the false teacher, as an example of their wisdom in bearing. But it was a bearing not with fools, but with an apostle, in their own case. By taking notice of this circumstance, therefore, the apostle placed their pretended wisdom in a truly ridiculous light.

Ver. 19. I, Eunice, (προκατεχομαι) take your goods.—Eunice, the original word was used by the Greeks to signify the making gain of a thing; and cites the following examples from Arist. Eqct. ver. 355. Καὶ ἐγὼ ἀνθρώποις ἐπεφέρω, καὶ σώμα τραίνατο, ὅταν τότε αὐτὸν γενέσθαι, ἀπὸ μάρτυρον εἰρήνην, "So then also make gain, when then disturb the city."

20. If one raise himself against you.—They who translate this clause as in our English Version, "If a man exalt himself," understand the apostle as saying, "If one claim peculiar honour on account of his lineage and other external advantages." The false teacher did not account of himself a true Jew. But I think the translation I have given of the clause agrees better with what follows. "If one beat you on the face," after having raised himself against you for that purpose.

Ver. 21. Are they Hebrews? I am a Hebrew also. Are they Israelites? I am the seed of Abraham. These questions he only means to intimate, that they who claim to be the homely church of God, and pride themselves on their descent, on supposition they belonged to them, the apostle pronounced these characters in a degree superior to them.

Ver. 22. If I am a minister of Christ.—As ministers are more to be desired than apostles, so was it to be desired that Paul might have been a minister, if he had been a minister of Christ, as the Corinthians supposed him to be.

Ver. 23. If I am a minister of Christ.—By these questions he only meant to intimate that they who claimed to be the homely church of God, and were so used, of which he so often spoke, that none of the heroes of antiquity, however vehemently actuated by the love of their own glory, or of power, what soever they suffered, did so much as in the pursuit of their objects, as the apostle Paul did, and suffered for Christ and his gospel.

Ver. 24. If I am a minister of Christ. He far exceeded them in respect of his labours in preaching, and of the sufferings and dangers which he underwent, in the long journeys which he made, both by sea and land, for spreading the gospel. See 1 Cor. xi. 11—13, where more is said concerning this subject.

3. In labours more abundant.—By mentioning his labours as things different from stripes, imprisonments, deaths, &c., the apostle leads us to think of the great bodily figure which he sustained, preaching by day, and his often working with his hands by night for his own maintenance, or castabout to him. And as he reproved so worldly benefit whatever from the gospel, he very properly commended his labours and sufferings, because they proved that he believed what he preached.

4. In prisons more frequently.—Luke in the Acts mentions Paul's imprisonment only once before this epistle was written, namely, at Philipp. But many particulars of the apostle's history, besides the imprisonments here referred to, are mentioned in the Acts, for the sake of heavy.

Ver. 25. Forty stripes save one.—By the law, Deut. xix. 2, punishment with stripes was restricted to forty at one beating. The whip with which these stripes were given, consisting of three separate cords and each stroke being counted as three stripes, thirty stripes made thirty-nine stripes, beyond which they never went. Hence the expression, 'for one.' Paul is the apostle, before his conversion, had been very active in inflicting this punishment on the disciples of Christ, he could not com-244 25 Thrice I was beaten with rods; once I was stoned; thrice I was shipwrecked; 2 I have spent a night and a day in the deep. 26 In journeys often; in dangers from rivers; in dangers from robber; in dangers from my countrymen; in dangers from the heathen; in dangers in the city; in dangers (sc) at sea; in dangers among false brethren. 27 In labour and toil; in watchings often; in hunger and thirst; in fastings often; in cold and nakedness. 28 Besides these tribulations, there is that which presseth me daily, my anxiety care of all the churches, that they may persevere in faith and holiness, and be defended from enemies. 29 And with respect to individuals: What brother is weak, who finds me weak in assisting him? What brother falls into sin, and I do not burn with zeal to raise him up? 30 If I must boast, being force to it, I will boast of the things which relate to my weakness.

31 The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for ever, knoweth that I do not lie. 32 In Damascus, the governor belonging to Aretas, the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, wishing to apprehend me; 33 But through a window in a basket I was let down (400, 150) by the wall, and escaped (sc) from his hands.

II. CORINTHIANS.

25 Thrice I was beaten with rods by the Romans; once, namely, in the street of Lystra, I was stoned and left as dead; thrice I was shipwrecked; and on one of these occasions I spent a night and a day in the deep sea. 26 For the sake of preaching the gospel, I have made long journeys often; I have been in dangers while passing rivers; in dangers from robbers; in dangers from the Jews; in dangers from the Gentiles; in dangers in cities from tumults; in dangers of perishing by want and by wild beasts in desert places; in dangers at sea from storms and pirates; in dangers among false brethren. 27 In these journeys and voyages I have undergone great labour and toil; I have often passed nights without sleep; I have endured much danger and thirst; I have often fasted whole days; I have suffered much from cold and want of clothes. 28 Besides these outward troubles, there is that which presseth me daily, my anxious care of all the churches, that they may persevere in faith and holiness, and be defended from enemies. 29 And with respect to individuals: What brother is weak, who finds me weak in assisting him? What brother falls into sin, and I do not burn with zeal to raise him up? 30 If I must boast, being force to it, I will boast of the things which relate to my weakness, notwithstanding my enemies upbraid me therewith.

31 These things happened in a danger the greatest of the kind that ever befell me: For the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who possesses blessedness infinite and eternal, knoweth that I do not lie, when I tell you, that 32 In Damascus the governor belonging to Aretas, the king of Arabia, at the instigation of the Jews, who were enraged against me because I preached that Jesus is the Christ, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, that he might apprehend me, and deliver me to them. In such a danger, where even the form of a trial was not to be expected, what could I do but flee? 33 But being conveyed into one of the houses built on the wall of the city, through a window in a basket I was let down with ropes by the side of the wall; and so, with the assistance of God and good men, I escaped from his hands.

View and Illustration of the Facts related in this Chapter.
Well, it does not become me to boast of any thing I have done or suffered as a minister of Christ: Nevertheless I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord, ver. 1.—But that he might not offend their affected delicacy, he did not say these visions and revelations were given to himself. He only told them, he knew a servant of Christ, who, fourteen years before the date of this letter, had been caught up as far as the third heaven, ver. 2.—Though whether in the body or out of the body, the apostle did not know, ver. 3.—This servant of Christ in paradise, heard things which could not be expressed in human language, ver. 4.—Concerning such a person, the apostle said he would boast; but concerning himself, he told them ironically, he would not boast except in his weaknesses, for which they ridiculed him, and of which he had boasted in the end of the preceding chapter, ver. 5.—And yet, being himself that servant of Christ who had been caught up, he told them that, if he inclined to boast concerning himself as the person who was so highly honoured, he should not be a fool, because he should speak nothing of himself but what was strictly true. Nevertheless, he forewarned them against the least show of disorderly boasting, saying that their boasting should be more highly of him than his appearance, or than his manner of speaking, warranted. This he said in high ridicule of their gibe, that his bodily presence was weak, but his letters weighty and powerful, ver. 6. Further, because he had said he would not boast except in his weaknesses, for which they had ridiculed him, he told them, that his bodily infirmity, instead of rendering him contemptible, was an honour to him; because it was sent on him by God, to prevent him from being too much elated with the transcendence of the revelations which had been given to him, ver. 7.—That he had besought the Lord thrice to remove it, ver. 8.—But that he told him, his grace was sufficient for making him successful as an apostle, and his power in converting the world was most illustriously displayed in the weakness of the instruments employed for that end. The apostle therefore boasted in his own weakness, that the power of Christ might be seen to dwell upon him, ver. 9.—Nay, he even took pleasure in weaknesses, insults, and persecutions, for Christ's sake, ver. 10.—But added, that if he appeared foolish in thus praising himself, his friends among the Corinthians had constrained him to it: because when his enemies called his apostleship in question, they ought to have spoken in his vindication, as they well knew he was in no respect inferior to the greatest of the apostles, ver. 11.—All the proofs of an apostle he had frequently shewed in their presence, by signs and wondrous powers, ver. 12.—So that, as a church, they were inferior to others in nothing, except that he, their spiritual father, had not taken care of their maintenance from them. But in the case of their finding fault with him on that account, he begged them to forgive him that injury, ver. 13.—Yet, to shew that he had done them no injury in that matter, he now told them he was coming to them the third time, and still would not be burdensome to them; because he did not seek their goods, but their salvation; and because the children ought not to provide for the parents, but the parents for the children, ver. 14.—And therefore with pleasure he would spend his time and waste his body for their souls' sake, so much did he love them; although the more he loved them, he found the less he was beloved by them, ver. 15.—Well then, said he, ye must acknowledge that I did not burden you, by taking maintenance from you. Nevertheless the faction say, (because it is the practice of the false teacher to whom they are attached, that by this show of disorderly boasting they try to lay aside all suspicion of my loving money, that I might draw it the more effectually from you by my assistants when absent, ver. 16.—But did I make the least gain of you, by any of them I sent to you after my departure, ver. 17.—I besought Titus to visit you lately. Did Titus, or the brother I sent with him, make any gain of you? Did they not walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps with me? ver. 18.—Further, by sending Titus to you the second time, do I apologize to you for not coming myself? In the sight of God I solemnly protest that I speak by the direction of Christ when I tell you that my sending Titus is designed for your edification, by giving you the fact that during my absence I have sent to you another apostle, ver. 19.—Yet I am afraid that when I come I shall not find you such reformed persons as I wish to see, and that I shall be found by you such as ye do not wish. My meaning is, that I shall strive, emulate, &c., among you, ver. 20.—So that when I come, I shall be so far humbled among you by my God, as to be obliged with grief to punish those among you who have formerly sinned, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness, which they have habitually committed, ver. 21.

II. CORINTHIANS. VIEW. 245

CHAP. XII.—Notwithstanding all my labours, and sufferings, and deliverances, it is not proper, it seems, for me to boast: Yet I will speak of visions and revelations of the Lord, with which one of his servants was honoured.

2. Fourteen years ago I knew a man in Christ, whether in the body, I know not; or out of the body, I know not; God knoweth: such an one I knew caught up as far as to the third heaven.

3. And revelations of the Lord;—These were discoveries of matters unknown, which Christ made to Paul by an internal impression on his mind, or by speech, as the revelations mentioned Acts xxii. 11. Perhaps also those which he says, ver. 4. he heard in parable. Of the former kind were all the inspirations of the Spirit beare on the apostles, and on those who in the first age preached the gospel by revelation.
II. CORINTHIANS.

3 Nay, I knew such a man, whether in the body or out of the body, I know not; God knoweth:
4 That he was caught up into paradise; and heard unspeakable words, which it is not possible for a man to utter.
5 Concerning such an one I will boast; but concerning myself I will not boast, except of my weaknesses.

6 (2 Cor. x. 10.) Yet, if I should incline to boast, I shall not be a fool; for I will speak the truth, if there is any one should ask me concerning me, as what he seemeth to me, or what he heareth from me.

7 (2 Cor. x. 20.) For that I might not be exalted above measure, by the transcedancy of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me, that I might not be exalted above measure.

9 Concerning this, thrice I besought the Lord that it might depart from me, fearing it would render my preaching from me. Therefore, are called 'the thorns of heaven.' The second heaven is that part of space in which the stars are. This was called by the Jews 'the heaven of heavens.' 1 K. viii. 27. 'This heaven of heavens cannot contain thee.' The third heaven is the seat of God, the holy place, the holy city, into which Christ ascended after his resurrection, but which is not the object of man's senses, as the other heavens are.

Ver. 4. 1. That he was caught up into paradise.—The Greeks used this word to denote gardens and parks, where the ground was finely dressed and planted with trees, shrubs, and flowers, and where animals of various kinds were kept for the pleasure of the proprietor. Hence the Greek commentators gave the sense of the person who was caught up by a sudden and miraculous manner, as a god, by way of eminence, to the garden of Eden, where our first parents were placed. This name was also given to the place where the spirit of the just after death reside in felicity till the resurrection, as appears from our Lord's words to the penitent thief, Luke xxiii. 43. "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." The same place is called the paradise of God; Ps. xlv. 1. Yet, Rev. ii. 7. heaven seems to be called 'the paradise of God.'

Clement of Alexandria, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, and most of the ancients, except Origen; and among the moderns, Bull, Whitby, Bengelius, &c. were of opinion, that the apostle had two different rapports, as methods very well applied, if one rapport only were spoken of, the repetition of 'whether in the body or,' &c. would have been needless, when speaking of his being caught up into paradise. Others think the apostle speaks of one and the same event, but that he gives the sense of Paradise to the place which he had before called the third heaven. And from his doubting whether he was caught up in the body, or in the spirit, he infers that he believed paradise, or the third heaven, to be within the bounds of this mundane system; especially as it is said of Stephen, Acts vi. 60. 'That he looked steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God.' For that circumstance, in Stephen's vision, shows the distance not to be immense.

For the opinions of mankind concerning the abode of the Deity, see Heb. i. 5, preceding.

2. And unspeakable words.—Parousia, words, being used by the Jews to denote matters as well as words, probably both were meant by the apostle. And seeing the things which he saw and heard in paradise could not be expressed in human language, it is plain that the purpose for which he was caught up was not to receive any revelation of the gospel doctrine, because that could have served no purpose, if the apostle could not communicate what he heard; but it was to encourage him in the difficult and dangerous work in which he was engaged. Accordingly, by taking him up into paradise, and showing him the glories of the invisible world, and making him a witness of the happiness which the righteous enjoy with Christ, even before their resurrection, his faith in the promises of God must have been exceedingly strengthened, and his hope so raised, as to enable him to bear with stedfastness that heavy load of calumnies and trials to which he was exposed in the course of his ministry. Not to mention, that this confirmation of the apostle's faith is no small confirmation of ours also. Some fanatics, supposing the apostle to have said that he heard in paradise words not to be uttered, have inferred, that the doctrines written in his epistles were dictated by inspiration, and that he taught deeper doctrines to the more perfect. But the word used by the apostle, apóthetē, does not signify things that are to be uttered, but things possible to be done.

3. Which it is not possible.—It is being the neater particle of apóthetē, &c. to be true. In this latter sense it is used by the same apostle, and by Paul often, as Revelation xii. 10. Here hath he said, and it is so accepted by Clement Alexander, in the beautiful passage quoted by him.

Ver. 5. 1. I will not boast, except of my weaknesses. —His enemies had said, 'His lodeliness is weak, and his speech contemptible.' In ridicule of that sarcasm, the apostle told the Corinthians, that instead of boasting of his rapports into the third heaven, he would boast of those very weaknesses for which his enemies ridiculed him, not only for his body, but for his soul also. It is in the commentary, but because his success in preaching was shown to be the effect of the divine power, the more clearly that he appeared weak and contemptible in the eyes of the world.

Ver. 6. Yet any one should think concerning me above what he seeth me to be, &c.—This is an exquisitely fine of the fiction. Bays the apostle, I might with truth boast of the visions and revelations of the Lord, with which I have been honoured, and I might boast of my bodily weaknesses; because they befell me through my being caught up. Yet, if any one should think concerning me above what he seeth me to be, &c. for fear any of you should think me a greater person than my mean bodily appearance, which he sees, and my contemptible speech which he heareth, warrant him to think me. By this irony, likewise, the apostle showed the absurdity of thinking that the whole of a teacher's merit lies in the gracefulness of his person, in the nice arrangement of his business, and in the mendicous tongues with which he pronounces his discourses.

Ver. 7. 1. There was given to me a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan.—Because the apostle called the thorn in his flesh 'a messenger of Satan,' and because the Canaanites are called 'thorns in the sides of the Israelites,' Num. xlv. 25. this piece of opinion, that by 'the thorn in his flesh' he meant the false teachers, whose opposition to the gospel occasioned him much pain. The ancient Latin commentators, by the thorn in his flesh, understood some unclean lust put into the apostle's soul through the temptation of the devil. But how could an unclean lust, which certainly was restrained by the apostle, hinder him from the work of God? Or could it be, that the flesh was sure? Or how could it make him appear contemptible to others, unless he discovered it, which he was under no necessity of doing? Or how could it take pleasure in such an absurdity? Yet the apostle followed Whitby, Lord Barrington in his Miscell. Sac., Brannock, and others, in thinking, that the thorn in the apostle's side was a weakness occasioned by his rapports, and which, affecting his looks, and gesture, and speech, rendered his manner of preaching not acceptable, and perhaps exposed the apostle himself to ridicule. Thus we find the revolutions made in Hebrews, and the change of countenance, chap. xii. 26, and sickness, chap. xvii. 27. Accordingly to this account of the thorn in the apostle's flesh, we find him speaking to the Galatians of an infirmity in his flesh, which they did not despise, Gal. iv. 14. But how was he afraid might have rendered him contemptible in their eyes? and therefore he calls it, 'the temptation which was in his flesh.' Moses, likewise, was afraid that his manner of speaking might render him an improper messenger to Pharaoh, Exod. iv. 10. 'I am slow of speech, and of a slow (a stammering) tongue.'

2. That I might not be exalted above measure.—This clause is wanting in some MSS. and in the Vulgate version. But though thus it was said in the beginning of the verse, the repetition of it here is not improper, as it is intended to draw a just and necessary inference from the preceding clause. Ver. 5. 1. Thrice I besought the Lord.—That the Lord to whom the apostle prayed was Christ, is evident from ver. 9. —It is supposed by some, that in praying thrice he imitated his Master's example in the garden: But others think his meaning is, that he prayed often and earnestly.

2. That it might depart from me.—The apostle was anxious to have this thorn removed, not that it was unworthy of him, but as a proof of his tenderness of spirit. Neither did he know that it would give additional honor to his labors, and to the gospel. —This example of prayer rejected, ought to be well attended to by all good men; because it shows, that our prayers, though they may be discouraged when their most earnest prayers seem to be disregarded, not disconsolate when they are rejected; because in both cases their good designs are effectually and usefully promoted.
II. CORINTHIANS.

9. But he said to me, Sufficient for qualifying thee to be an apostle is my grace; the miraculous gifts with which I have endowed thee; besides, my power in the conversion of the world is displayed in the weakness of the instruments whereby that work is accomplished. Most gladly, therefore, I will boast rather than be ashamed of my weaknesses, that the power of Christ may abide with me.

10. Wherefore, instead of being dissatisfied, I am well pleased with my weaknesses, with insults, with necessities, with persecutions, with distresses, for Christ's sake; because when I am weak, then I am strong.

11. Have I become a fool by boasting? Ye have constrained me to it; for I ought to have been commanded by you, (2 Cor. 10:18,) because I am in nothing behind the very greatest apostles, though I be nothing. Truly the signs of an apostle were fully wrought among you, with all patience, by signs and wonders, and powers.

12. For what is the thing wherein ye were inferior to other churches, unless that I myself have not been burdensome to you? (2 Cor. 11:9.) Forgive me this injury.

13. Behold, a third time! I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you; (2 Cor. 12:18,) because I seek not yours, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

14. Yes, I most gladly will spend and be spent for the sake of your souls, even although the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

15. Be it so then, I did not burden you; nevertheless, they say, being crafty, I caught you with guile.

16. With respect to any one of them I sent to you, Did I by him make gain of you? (2 Cor. 12:18.)

17. I besought Titus to go to you; and with him I sent a brother: Did Titus make any gain of you? Did we not walk in the same spirit? Did we not walk in the same steps?

18. By sending Titus again, think ye that we apologize to you? (2 Cor. 12:18.)

Ver. 9.-1. But he said to me, sufficient, &c.;—Probably Christ appeared to his apostle, and spoke to him. At any rate, it was under revelation of the Lord, which he subjected him to mention, though his modesty did not allow him to insist on it directly.

2. Most gladly of my weaknesses.—Revelation; I mean to be an apostle, his performing great and evident miracles openly in the view of the world; especially his healing diseases, his casting out devils, and his speaking foreign languages. But the greatest of all the signs was his conveying the spiritual gifts to them who believed; a power which none possessed but the apostles. See 1 Cor. 12:8, note. All these signs the apostle had external to Corinth; and, in particular, having communicated the spiritual gifts to many of the Corinthians, he, on account thereof, called them his formal letters, (the seal of his apostleship;) 1 Cor. 15:2.

3. With all patience.—By mentioning his patience, the apostle brought to the remembrance the hardships which he had endured while he executed the apostolical office among them, and especially in the case of the Corinthians. Nevertheless, so severe was his life and estate in which they were living among the Corinthians.

3. By signs and wonders.—See Rom. xv. 19; note 1. The appeal which the apostle here, and 1 Cor. iv. 7, made to the whole church of the Corinthians, (in which there was a great faction which called his apostleship in question,) concerning the miracles which he had wrought in their presence, and the spiritual gifts which he had conferred on many of them, is a strong proof of the reality of these miracles and gifts. See 1 Thess. i. Illustration at the close.

Ver. 14. Behold, a third time! I am ready to come to you;—Because it does not appear from the history of the Apostle that Paul had been in Corinth more than once before this letter was written, Es-tius was of opinion, that the resolution which he formed in Ephesus, of going directly to Corinth by sea, was the second time of his being ready to come to them; consequently, that this was the third time he was ready to come to them. See 2 Cor. vii. 11, note 1. 2 Thess. iii. 15, note 2.

Ver. 15. With respect to;—The original requires some preposition to govern this; I have in the translation supplied with, with respect to.

2. Did I by him make gain of you?—Es-tius, error externis. The original phrase signifies to make gain by improper or fraudulent methods. See 2 Cor. xi. 11, note 1.

18. And with him I sent a brother.—Who that brother was is not known. He may have been one of the apostles' companions in travel, who was with him in Ephesus when he wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians. Or he may have been one of the Ephesian brethren, whose zeal for the gospel moved him to accompany Titus to Corinth when he carried the former letter. The brother spoken of, 2 Cor. viii. 23, accords with this letter.

2. Did Titus make any gain of you?—Did he draw any money from you, either on account of his own maintenance, or on pretense that he would persuade me to receive it for mine.

18. By sending Titus again, think ye that we apologize to you for not coming myself! In the presence of God I solemnly protest, that
II. CORINTHIANS.

I speak by the direction of Christ when I say, that all these things, beloved, are done for your edification, that the guilty may have time to repent.

20 Yet I am afraid, lest perhaps, when I come, I shall not find you such as I wish; and that I shall be found by you such as ye do not wish: I mean, lest perhaps strifes about your teachers, and estimations among the leaders of parties, and wraths for injuries received, and brayings, and evil speakings, and whisperings against me, and swellings of pride and ambition, and actual tumults be among you; 21 And lest, when I come again, my God may humble me among you, by shewing me your church, which I planted, corrupted with many vices; and I shall, with lamenation, punish many who have formerly sinned, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness in speech and behaviour, which they have committed.

You have not received the spirit of bondage into fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. For I consider that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. For the creation was望服地, and piously, the beginning of the apostle's laconic manner of writing, refers to 1 Cor. 3, where he says, 'I have left Titus, namely, to go to Corinth. His sending Titus a second time, some might imagine was done to excuse his not coming himself. But he hereby assured them that he had no such view in sending Titus. He had delayed his own coming merely to give the guilty time to repent. Ver. 20. 1. Drawings. Here, according to Buda, cp 1 Tim. 3:15, drawlings, are contentsions by words, or abusive language.

2. Estimation. Estimation, cp 2 Cor. 11:4, unto sacrifices, are those vain ostentations, by which proud and ambitious men endeavour to make themselves look big in the eyes of their fellows, together with the temper of mind from which the boasting and the insolent behaviour which those ostentations spring. Ver. 21. 1. Be among you. I have added this clause from the Vulgate version, but have marked it as not in the Greek text.

Ver. 21. 1. And I shall bewail, &c. From this passage, and from 1 Cor. v. 2, it appears, that when the Christian churches cut off any of their incorrigible members by excommunication, it occasioned great grief, especially to the bishops and pastors, and was performed by them by the church, with great lamentation for the offender, whom they consider as lost. See Origen contra Celsum, ib. 3. Hence to mourn, and to beseech, in the language of the three times, or times of punishment.

2. Who have formerly sinned, and have not repented. The inceustrious person was not of this number; for he had repented, 2 Cor. II. 7, 8. Those of whom the apostle speaks, were such of the faction, who, notwithstanding all he had written in his former letter, had not refrained from partaking in the idolatrous sacrifices of the heathens, and from the lewd practice, to which, by their former education, they were still addicted.

3. Of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness. 1. Eu- tius thinks the apostol by uncleanness means those sins of the flesh which are against nature; and by fornication, the conjunction of male and female out of marriage. Of lasciviousness, he says it consists in ebirrismata oscilla, taciturnia, annus, &c. But by lasciviousness Bengelius understands sodomy, bestiality, and the other vices contrary to nature. But although some of the faction at Corinth may have been guilty of uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness, in the ordinary sense of those words, fancying, through the prejudices of their education, that those things were no sins, I scarcely think that any of them, after their conversion, would continue in the commission of the unnatural crimes mentioned by Eutius and Bengelius.

CHAPTER XIII.

View and Illustration of the Threatenings and Abridgments in this Chapter.

The taunting speech of the faction, that the apostle was bold by letters when absent, but humble and meek when present, he had answered by a delicate but pointed irony, chap. x. 1, 2. But as that speech contained an imputation, that his threatenings to punish them by a supernatural power were mere bugbear, without any foundation, he in this chapter tells them plainly, that he was now coming to Corinth a third time, and would punish all who opposed him, as well as those who had sinned habitually; and whatever of that kind was proved by the testimony of two or three witnesses, he would consider as fully established, ver. 1. In my former letter, said he, I foretold that the delivering the incestuous person to Satan, would be followed with the destruction of his flesh; and I now foretell, as present with you in spirit the second time, that the same thing will follow the censures which I shall inflict on the guilty; and being absent in body, I write to all those who have sinned before ye received my former letter, and to all the rest who have sinned since, that, if they oppose me when I come, I will not spare them, ver. 2. And this I will do the rather, that some of you, in derision, seek a proof of Christ speaking by me. For though ye think he is not able to punish you, yet, by the spiritual gifts which Christ hath bestowed on you, ye must be sensible, that he is sufficiently strong to punish every guilty person among you, ver. 3. He was crucified indeed through the weakness of his human nature; but though he gave himself to be put to death, he now liveth by the power of God. In like manner, though I also am weak in body, and subject to death as he was, I will nevertheless show myself alive with him, by exercising the power he hath given me in punishing you, however strong ye may think yourselves, ver. 4. And since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking by me, I desire you to try yourselves, whether ye be a church of Christ, and to prove yourselves, whether as a church ye possess any spiritual gifts. Know ye not yourselves to be a church of Christ, by the spiritual gifts ye receive from me? and that Jesus Christ is among you by his miraculous powers and spiritual gifts? unless perhaps ye are without that proof of his presence, ver. 5.

In this passage the apostle, by a very fine irony, showed the faction the absurdity of their seeking a proof of Christ's speaking by one who had converted them, and who had conferred on them, in such plenty, those spiritual gifts whereby Christ manifested his presence in every church. The apostle added, that although they should be without that proof of Christ's presence, having banished the Spirit from among themselves by their heinous sins, he trusted they should not find him without the proof of Christ's speaking by him, if it were needful for him to punish any of them when he came, ver. 6. Yet he prayed to God that they might do nothing evil; his wish being, not to appear approved as an apostle by punishing them, but that they might repent, although the consequence should be, that he should appear as one without proof of Christ's presence, having no occasion to exert his power in punishing them, ver. 7. For the apostle could at no time use the reproving of their faults, ver. 8. And to promote their perfection, being absent, he had written these things to them, that when present he might not need to act sharply against them, according to the miraculous power which the Lord Jesus had given him, for edifying and not for destroying his church, ver. 10.

The apostle having now finished his refutations to the faction, turned his discourse to the whole church, and bade them farewell; gave them a few directions, which, if they followed, God would be with them; desired them to salute one another with a kiss, expressive of their pure mutual love; told them that the saints (meaning the brethren of Macedonia, where he then was) were to be saluted them in token of their regard for them; then concluded with giving them his own apostolic benediction, ver. 11-14.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XIII.—I am coming this third time to you; by the mouth of two witnesses, or three, every matter shall be established.

I foresaw, and I now foretell as present in Spirit the second time, and being absent I could not come to you before sin, and to all the rest (2 Cor. 200). Certainly, when I come again, I will not spare you.

Since ye demand a proof of Christ's speaking by me, who (2 Cor. 151) towards you is not weak, but is strong (172) among you.

For though indeed he was crucified (?), through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God (2 Cor. 58, 98), and though we also are weak with him, but he will live with him, by the power of God (2 Cor. 149) among you.

Try yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove yourselves. Know ye not yourselves, that Jesus Christ is (172) among you; unless perhaps ye be without proof.

Ver. I. I am coming this third time to you. In the Acts of the Apostles, he was observed chap. 16, 11, note, there is no mention made of St. Paul's being at Corinth more than once before this second epistle was written. But that history by no means contains all the apostolic transactions. We may therefore suppose, that during the eighteen months which passed from his first coming to Corinth, to the inscription in the procession of Gallois, the apostle 1. visiteth Corinth a few times; and thirdly throughout Lycia and Arcadia, and the other provinces of the country of Achaea, where he converted many, 2 Cor. 11, having preached the gospel to them gratis, as at Corinth, chap. 2, 10 and handled several sermons called, 2 Cor. 12, 2. Arbacon, that is, the church of Achaea. If therefore, then, the apostle makes the earlier part of his proclamation, and spent some months in it, his return to Corinth would be his second coming; consequently, the apostle makes of this second visit a coming a third time to them. 2. Ketur, because the apostle 2 Cor. 15 speaks of his having been to them by Ephebesus, argues that if he had gone to them then, 9 would have his second visit earlier; and infer, that the whole of his eighteen months abide in Corinth was considered by him as his first coming. But this conclusion does not follow; because the apostle may have conferred no gifts on the Corinthians after his return from the countries of Achaea.

Ver. 2. I. He is separated from the following verse by a full stop, the sense of that verse will evidently be incomplete. But if the two verses are separated only by a comma, as I have done, the meaning will be, when I come again I will not spare you, since ye demand a proof of Christ's speaking by me:—This, with the other threatening references in the apostle's letters to the Corinthians, is a strong proof of the righteousness of the cause in which he was engaged. For if he had been carrying on an imposture with the aid of his disciples, he would have flattered them in their views, instead of threatening to punish them; as he must have known that such threats would, by himself, have been more culpable than they, would have procured them to destroy the church in his eye, though he was the plural number. And Michaelis is of opinion, that at his coming to Corinth he exercised the rod on that impostor so severely, that he obliged him to leave the city; or that, being terrified by the threats in these passages, he fled of his own accord before the apostle arrived.

Ver. 3. It is among you. With Whitsby's note on this verse it is necessary to shew the power of the apostle, by establishing St. Paul to preach the gospel to them in demonstration of the Spirit and of power; so effectually as to convert them to the faith, 1 Cor. ii. 4: In him, by his power, consistent in accordance with St. Paul's delivery of the incensum person up to St. Paul, 1 Cor. v. 2. By the charismatiemei, he is called by the Lord's name, unspeakably worthily.

Ver. 4. He foretold the power of God. Here the power of God is declared to be, not only the cause of Christ's resurrection, but the proof of his being now alive. In this latter view, the power of God signifies the power of God communicated by Christ to his apostles, to enable them to work miracles, and to confer the spiritual gifts on believers, and to punish offenders, for the confirmation of the gospel.

Commentary.

CHAP. XIII.—I am coming this third time to you, fully resolved to punish the obstinate. By the testimony of two witnesses or three, every matter shall be established: For I will hold that to be true, which shall be so proved.

I foresaw formerly, that the delivering of the incorruptible person to Satan would be followed with the destruction of his flesh; and I foresaw as present in Spirit the second time, and being absent I could not come to you before sin, and to all the rest; (2 Cor. 200). Certainly, when I come again, I will not spare you.

Since ye demand a proof of Christ's speaking by me, the threatenings in my first letter, who towards you is not weak, but is strong among you, by the spiritual gifts conferred on you, and by the punishments already inflicted on you.

For, though indeed Christ was crucified, by reason of the weakness of the human nature, which was liable to death, yet he now liveth by the power of God. And though I also, his apostle, am weak, as he was, being subject to persecution, infirmity, and death, I shall nevertheless show myself alive with him, by exercising the power of God among you, punishing you severely if ye do not repent.

I say, since ye demand a proof of Christ's speaking by me, Try yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove yourselves, as a church ye possess spiritual gifts: know ye not yourselves, that Jesus Christ is among you as a church, unless perhaps ye be without proof.
II. CORINTHIANS.

6 But I trust that ye shall know that we are not without proof.

7 (2 Cor. 1. 20.) Nevertheless, I pray to God that ye do nothing evil; not wishing that we may appear having proof, but that ye may do what is good, (2 Cor. 1. 20.) though we should be (2 Cor. 1. 31.) indeed without proof.

8 For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.

9 (1 Thess. 5. 23.) Therefore we rejoice when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we pray for, even your restoration.

10 For this reason, being absent, I write these things against the obstinate, that when present I may not act sharply, according to the power which the Lord hath given me, (2 Cor. 12. 2.) for edification, and not for destruction.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell: be ye restored, comfort yourselves, mind the same thing: live in peace; and the God of love and peace will be with you.

12 Salute one another (2 Cor. 13. 17) with an holy kiss, (See Rom. xvi. 16. note 1.)

13 All the saints salute you.

14 The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen. (See Eph. vi. 24. note 2.)

cities, and from individuals by their wickedness. — The word εἰρήνη, which our translators have rendered εἰρηνομένοις, does not denote of that meaning in this passage, as is plain from the scope of the discourse. The apostle, in speaking of the peace between Christ and man, had laid the stress upon the fact of reconciliation. The word εἰρήνη is accordingly used in the sense of peace, and is applied to various subjects. Hence our translators have rendered it with that literal significance without proof. Thus εἰρήνης is applied to all nations, Prov. xxv. 1. Is. i. 22. εἰρήνην, εἰρηνομένοις, εἰρηνομένους. and Paul is speaking of the peace of God, and the harmony of the church. The word εἰρήνη is used in that sense. It is applied to various subjects, but always according to its literal significance, without proof. Thus εἰρήνης is applied to all nations, without proof.

II. CORINTHIANS.

6 But, though ye should be without proof of Christ's presence among you, having questioned the Spirit, I trust that ye shall know, that I am not without the proof of Christ's speaking by me.

7 Nevertheless, I pray to God that ye do nothing evil; my wish being, not that I may appear having proof as an apostle by punishing you, but that ye may do what is good, may repent; although, in consequence thereof, I should be indeed without proof of my apostleship, having no occasion to punish you.

8 For we apostles cannot exercise our miraculous power in opposition to the truth, but always in support thereof.

9 Therefore, instead of delighting to shew my power, I rejoice when I can inflict no punishment on you because ye are strong in virtue. And this also I pray for, even your reformation.

10 This reason, being absent, I write these things against the obstinate, that when present I may not act sharply, according to the power which the Lord hath given me, for edifying the church, by reclaiming the vicious and confirming the virtuous, and not for the destruction of its members without cause.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell. Be ye restored by repentance; comfort yourselves with the prospect of eternal life; pursue the same great objects; live in peace, by avoiding those emulations which heathens have rent your church: And the God who delights to see his creatures living in love and peace, will be with you to direct and protect you.

12 When ye meet, or part, salute one another with an holy kiss, in token of that pure love which ye bear to one another, as the disciples of Christ.

13 All the disciples of Christ who are with me send their good wishes to you.

14 Receive ye my apostolical benediction: The favour of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the common fruition of the gifts and sides of the Holy Ghost, be ever with you all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.
And that they might know what things were written in those books concerning him, 45. He opened their understandings that they might understand the scriptures; he gave them the knowledge of the meaning of those passages of the scriptures which relate to himself, that they might be able to confirm the gospel which they were to preach, by testimonies taken from the law and the prophets. Accordingly, the apostle Paul, who, like the other apostles, had the true meaning of the Jewish scriptures communicated to him by inspiration, hath on these writings founded those enlarged views of the doctrines of the gospel, and of the divine dispensations, which he hath delivered in his epistles; in so much that his explanations of the Jewish scriptures, and the conclusions which he hath drawn from them, make a principal part of the gospel revelation.

The passages of the writings of Moses, which Paul hath explained in his epistles, and which deserve our special attention, are those in which God's transactions with Abraham the father of the patriarchs are recorded: namely, Gen. xi. 1-3. 14, 15, 16. xiii. 14-16. xv. 1-7. 18. xvii. 1-8. xviii. 9. xxi. 10-18.

In the first of these passages we are informed, that God commanded Abraham to leave his country and kindred, and go into a land which he would shew him. And to encourage him to break his connexions with his idolatrous kindred and acquaintance, God said to him, Gen. xii. 1. 'I will make thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing. 3. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.' Having received this command, Abram obeyed and went out, not knowing whither he went; Heb. xi. 8. He went out, notwithstanding he did not know whether the land into which he was going was a good or a bad land; or whether it was far off or near.

On leaving Haran, Abram seemed to be directed to go to Canaan. For on his coming to the plain of Moreh in Canaan, Gen. xii. 7. 'The Lord appeared to Abram and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land.' Some time after this, when Abram separated from Lot, Gen. xiii. 14. 'The Lord said to Abram, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward; and eastward, and westward. 15. For the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever.' 16. God will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered.'

All this while Abram had no child; for which reason, eight years after he left Haran, when God said to him, Gen. xv. 1. 'Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield and exceeding great reward,' he replied, 'What wilt thou give me, seeing I am childless?' Being now above eighty years old, the performance of the promise, to make of him a great nation, appearing every day more and more improbable, he became uneasy at the delay. Wherefore, ver. 5. 'God brought him forth abroad,' early in the morning, 'and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them; and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be. 6. And he believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness. 7. And he said to him, I am the Lord who brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.' And ver. 18. 'In that same day,' to assure him of the performance of this promise, 'the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.'

An after transaction, recorded Gen. xvii. the Lord explained to Abram the particulars comprehended in the covenant which he made with him, after counting his faith to him for righteousness. Ver. 1. 'When Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said to him, I am the Almighty God, walk before me and be thou perfect. 2. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. 3. And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying, 4. As for me, behold my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. 5. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham, for a father of many nations have I made thee. 6. And I will make thee exceedingly fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. 7. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee. 8. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession;' and I will be their God.'

Some time after this transaction, to shew us that the things promised to Abraham in the covenant depended on his continuing to believe and obey God, and on his commanding his children after him to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment, the Lord said concerning him, Gen. xviii. 19. 'I know him that he will command his children after him, and his household, to keep the way of the Lord, and to do justice and judgment;' and he gave Abraham the promise of the son promised to him, Gen. xvi. 7, 13. 'And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing.'

At length, when Abraham was an hundred years old, and Sarah was ninety, she brought forth her long expected son, whom Abraham named Isaac, (laughter), on account of the joy which his birth occasioned to his parents. —But lo! when this only son, to whom all the promises were expressly limited, was grown up, God put Abraham's faith to a trial still more severe than that which was occasioned by deferring his birth so long: He commanded him to offer this only son as a burnt-offering. Gen. xxii. 2. This most difficult command, Abraham, without hesitation, set about obeying. He went with Isaac to the appointed mountain, raised an altar, put wood on it, bound Isaac, laid him on the altar on the wood, and stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son; and would have slain him, had not the angel of the Lord called to him, and said, ver. 12. 'Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me. 15. And the angel of the Lord called to Abraham out of heaven the second time, 16. And said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son. 17. That in blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying, I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; 18. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.' Here it is to be remarked, that God confirmed all his former promises with an oath; and declared that he would perform these promises, because Abraham had done the difficult work of offering up his only son as a burnt-offering. Also he gave him a new promise, That the person in whom all the nations of the earth are to be blessed, should be one of his descendants; and declared, as before, that he made him this promise, because he had obeyed his voice.

From the foregoing account of God's transactions with Abraham, it appears that God's covenant with him contained six separate promises or stipulations on the part of God, namely,

I. That God would exceedingly bless Abraham.
II. That Abraham should be the father of many nations, and very fruitful.
III. That God would give to Abraham, and to his seed after him, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession.

IV. That he would be a God to Abraham, and to his seed after him in their generation.

V. That in Abraham himself, all the families of the earth should be blessed.

VI. That in Abraham's seed also, all the nations of the earth should be blessed.

These stipulations the apostle Paul, in different places of his epistles, hath styled the promises; and hath entered deeply into their meaning.

To understand these promises, in the whole extent of their meaning, the reader should recollect, that in the early ages, before the art of writing was invented, the most approved method of communicating and preserving knowledge was by allegory; that is, by making sensible objects which were present, or not very distant in point of time, representations of things which are not the objects of sense, or which are future, but which have some affinity to the things made use of to represent them. In this method of instruction, the characters and actions of remarkable persons, and the ordinary events of their life, were on some occasions considered as prefigurations of more distant persons and events to which they had a resemblance. Of this kind, which may be called the natural allegory, we have the following examples in scripture.

—Abraham, in respect of the faith and obedience which he exercised in uncircumcision, was a type of believers of all nations; and to shew this, he was made their father.
—Melchizedek, in his character and offices of a king and priest, was made by God himself a type of Christ, Psal. cx. 4.—David also, in his office and kingdom, prefigured Christ; on which account, Christ is called David by the latter prophets.—Abraham's wives and sons, according to St. Paul, Gal. iv. 24, were allegorical representations of the two covenants, and of the persons placed under these covenants.—The swallowing of Jonah by the whale, and his continuing in its belly three days and three nights, is declared by our Lord himself to be a prefiguration of his burial, and of his resurrection on the third day, Matt. xxvii. 4.—The characters, actions, and events which constitute the natural allegory, though existing apparently in the ordinary course of things, were ordered of God, so as to be types of those future persons and events, the knowledge of which God intended to communicate to the world.

There is in scripture, likewise, what may be called the instituted allegory; because it consisted of actions which God appointed to be performed with such and such circumstances, for the purpose of prefiguring future persons and events. Of this kind were all the Levitical sacrifices; particularly the paschal lamb, John xix. 36—and all the rites of worship appointed by Moses, which, as Paul tells us, Heb. x. 1. were shadows of good things to come.—Of the same kind was the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, which our Lord tells us, John iii. 14, 15. was a type of his being himself lifted up on the cross.—Probably also the command to offer up Isaac as a burnt-offering, was intended as an allegorical representation of the sacrifice of Christ, Heb. xi. 19.—And to name no more instances, many of the extraordinary things done by the prophets, at the command of God, were types; as is evident from the explication with which they were accompanied.

The allegorical method of communicating and preserving instruction, was attended with three advantages.—1. The emblem being an object of sense, made a strong impression on the imagination of the persons for whose instruction the allegory was intended, and might easily be remembered.—2. The verbal explication which often accompanied the instituted allegory, having for its subject an object of sense, neither required many words, nor were these words of uncertain meaning. This kind of allegory, therefore, with its interpretation, could be handed down to posterity with a good degree of accuracy, without the aid of writing.—3. In scripture, some future events are foretold in such a manner as to shew, that they are themselves prefigurations or predictions of future events more remote. In such cases, when the first events come to pass in the manner foretold, they are both a proof and a pledge that the more remote events, of which they are the signs, will take place in their season.

This account of the ancient scripture allegory I have given here, because from what our Lord and his apostles have said concerning the promises in the covenant with Abraham, it appears that that transaction, besides its first meaning, which terminated in the persons and events literally spoken of, had an allegorical, or second and higher meaning, which was to be accomplished in persons and events more remote. For example, Abraham's natural descendants by Isaac, though he was not yet born, were considered in the covenant as types of his seed by faith.

—In like manner, Isaac's supernatural birth, accomplished by the power of God, typified the regeneration of believers by the same power.—And the land of Canaan, promised to the natural seed as their inheritance, was an emblem of the heavenly country, the inheritance of the seed by faith.—In short, the temporal blessings promised in the covenant to the natural seed, had all an allegorical or second meaning; being images of those better blessings which God intended to bestow in a more remote period on Abraham's seed by faith, as shall be shown immediately.

The promises in the covenant with Abraham, thus allegorically interpreted according to their true intention, throw great light on the gospel revelation, in which there are many allusions to that covenant; not to mention, that the accomplishment of its promises in their literal meaning to Abraham's natural seed, is a striking proof of the divine original, both of the covenant itself, and of the gospel which it prefigured.

SEC. I.—Of the first Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

The first promise in the covenant was, that Abraham should be exceedingly blessed. Gen. xii. 2. 'I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing.' Gen. xii. 16. 'By myself I have sworn, said the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thine only son.' That in blessing I will bless thee; that is, I will greatly bless thee.

This promise, in its first and literal meaning, implied,

1. That God would bestow on Abraham great temporal prosperity, and protect him from evil during his sojournings as a stranger in Canaan, and in the neighbouring countries into which he might have occasion to go. Hence, in allusion to the literal meaning of this promise, God called himself Abraham's shield, Gen. xv. 1. In fulfilment of this promise, according to its literal meaning, God blessed Abraham so exceedingly, that after living in Canaan a few years, the male slaves born in his house who were capable of going to war, were no fewer than 318, with whom he pursued Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and defeated them near Damascus. Further, in the account which Moses hath given of Abraham's sojournings in Canaan, and Egypt, and in the land of the Philistines, various dangers from which God shielded him are mentioned, which, being well known, it is needless to speak of them particularly.

2. The blessing of Abraham, in its literal meaning, comprehended also God's counting Abraham's faith, concerning his numerous natural seed, to him for righteousness.
ness. Now the meaning of God's counting an action for righteousness, may be understood from the application of the phrase to Phinehas, after he executed judgment on Zimri and Cozbi. Psal. cvi. 30. 'Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment, and so the plague was stayed, and it was counted to him for righteousness to all generations;' that is, his executing judgment on these wicked persons was rewarded by God, as a righteous action, with a temporal reward which descended to his latest posterity. That this is the meaning of the phrase, appears from Num. xxv. where, speaking of the same action, God saith to Moses, ver. 11. 'Phinehas the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, hath turned my wrath away from the children of Israel, (while he was zealous for me sake among them,) that I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy. 12. Wherefore say, Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace. 13. And he shall have it, and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood;' so in the case of Abraham, his believing in the Lord that his seed should be numerous as the stars of heaven, is said to have been 'counted to him for righteousness,' because God rewarded him and his posterity with the covenant of an everlasting priesthood; so in the case of Abraham, his believing in the Lord that his seed should be numerous as the stars of heaven, is said to have been 'counted to him for righteousness,' because God rewarded him and his seed with the promise of the inheritance of Canaan, immediately after declaring that his faith was counted to him for righteousness. Gen. xv. 6. 'And he said to him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.' Then, as in the case of Phinehas, God confirmed this grant to Abraham's seed by a covenant: ver. 18. 'In that same day the Lord made a covenant with Abraham, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates. ' Such is the first or literal meaning of God's 'blessing Abraham exceedingly,' and of his 'counting his faith to him for righteousness.' But this promise, in both its parts, has also a second and higher meaning, of which the literal meaning was itself the sign, and which must now be explained. The promise to bestow on Abraham great temporal prosperity, and to protect him from evil during his sojourning in Canaan, was likewise a promise to bestow on him those spiritual blessings, and that protection from his spiritual enemies, which were necessary to his perseverance in faith and obedience hereafter on earth. This we learn from the apostle Paul, who calls the assistance of the Spirit, 'the blessing of Abraham,' and represents them as promised to him. Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from under the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. 14. That the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.' Next, the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, Gen. xv. 6. by bestowing on him the inheritance of Canaan, was, in its second and highest meaning, a promise to bestow on him the blessing of justification by faith. If, as we see that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel before to Abraham, saying, Surely in thee all the nations shall be blessed. For the blessing of justification by faith, the apostle hath termed 'the blessing of Abraham,' and tells us in ver. 13. as quoted above, that Christ died 'that the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations.' Wherefore, if the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, was nothing but God's rewarding him with the promise of bestowing on him and on his seed the inheritance of the earthly country, which indeed was its first meaning, the blessing of Abraham neither hath come on the nations, nor can come on them, notwithstanding the apostle hath assured us that Christ died to procure that blessing for them. It is evident, therefore, that when God promised to bless Abraham by counting his faith to him for righteousness, he in effect promised to justify him by faith. Now this implied, 1. That he would pardon Abraham's sins; 2. That he would reward him as a righteous person. 1. That the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, was a promise to justify him by faith, that is, to pardon his sins on account of his faith, is evident from Rom. vi. 6. 'In like manner, David describeth the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord counteth righteousness without works.' 7. Saying, 'Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.' 8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not count sin.' 2. That the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, was likewise a promise to reward him as a righteous person, by bestowing on him the heavenly country as a free gift, is plain, I think, from the history. For we are told, that immediately after God counted Abraham's faith to him for righteousness, he promised to give him the land of Canaan in inheritance, by which, not the inheritance of the earthly country only was meant, but the inheritance of an heavenly country also; as shall be proved in Sect. 3. where that promise is explained. Besides, that under the emblem of the earthly country an heavenly country was promised to him, Abraham himself knew: for the apostle assures us, that he died in the firm persuasion of his being to receive a country of that sort, according to God's promise. Wherefore, the apostle hath authorized us to believe, Abraham knew that the counting of his faith to him for righteousness, implied not only the pardon of his sins, but his being rewarded, as a righteous person, with the inheritance of heaven. But if Abraham knew the true import of God's counting his faith to him for righteousness, he would consider it either as a declaration from God that his sins were then pardoned, and that he was immediately to be rewarded with the possession of the heavenly country; or as a promise that he would be pardoned and rewarded at the general judgment—if he considered it as a declaration that his sins were then pardoned, and that he was immediately to be put in possession of the heavenly country, he would expect to be freed from death, the punishment of sin, and to be soon translated in the body into some place fit to be the everlasting abode of righteous men, like his pious ancestor Enoch, with whose history he doth seem to be acquainted. But if he considered the counting of his faith for righteousness, only as a promise that his sins were to be pardoned, and the possession of the heavenly country to be given him at the general judgment, he would expect to be raised from the dead with a body suited to the nature of the heavenly country into which he was to be introduced, and to live in that heavenly habitation in the body for ever. One or other of these Abraham had reason to expect; unless he thought God's counting his faith to him for righteousness, was nothing but a promise to give him the earthly country. However, as he did not find himself immediately translated from this earth in the body, and as but one righteous person had been so translated without dying, he would think it more probable, that in the counting of his faith to him for righteousness, the pardon of his sins, and the possession of the heavenly country, were only promised to him as blessings which he was to receive at the judgment. Wherefore, not doubting that he would die like other righteous men, Abraham, in consequence of his faith being counted to him for righteousness, would expect to be raised from the dead, to enjoy that life in the body which he knew he was to be deprived of by death, and to possess the heavenly country which was promised to him as the reward of his faith.
That Abraham should have been able to reason in the manner above described, concerning God's blessing him exceedingly, and concerning his counting his faith to him for righteousness, need not be thought strange, considering the great strength of his understanding, and the just ideas of the power, veracity, and other perfections of God, which he had attained. Besides, St. Paul assures us, that he reasoned with a similar strength of understanding and faith concerning his having a son by Sarah, notwithstanding the birth of that son was delayed till Abraham was an hundred years old, and Sarah ninety. Rom. iv. 19. 'And not being weak in faith, he did not consider his own body now dead, being about an hundred years old, neither the deadness of Sarah's womb. 20. Therefore against the promise of God he did not dispute through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; 21. And was fully persuaded that what was promised, he was able certainly to perform.'—Also Abraham reasoned in the like admirable manner, concerning the command to offer up his only son as a burnt-offering, that long-expected son to whom all the promises were limited. For recollecting that they were all to be fulfilled in Isaac, and having the most exalted ideas of the veracity and power of God, he concluded that although Isaac were yet in the womb, yet upon the altar, God would raise him from the dead. Heb. xi. 17. 'By faith, Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac; he who had received the promises offered up even his own children for a parable.' If Abraham could reason so justly concerning the birth of Isaac, and concerning the command to offer him up as a burnt-offering, we may believe that he reasoned with an equal strength of understanding and faith, concerning God's blessing him, and counting his faith to him for righteousness; and indeed concerning all the other promises in the covenant.

Exc. II.—Of the Second Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise is recorded in the following passages: Gen. xi. 2. 'I will make of thee a great nation.'—xiii. 16. 'I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered.'—Gen. xv. 5. 'Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be.'—xvii. 4. 'Thou shalt be a father of many nations.'—5. 'Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I constituted thee. 6. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful: and I will make nations of thee; and kings shall come out of thee.'—xviii. 18. 'Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation.'—xxii. 17. 'In multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore.'

On this promise the first thing to be observed is, that in the account given of it, Gen. xvii. 5. 6, there is a remarkable diversity in the expression; First, Abraham was to be 'a father of many nations.' And to shew in what manner he was to be a father of many nations, God said to him, 'Thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee.' In the Hebrew it is 'Nathaitscha Dedi te—I have given thee.' LXX., τονος τοι—'I have placed or constituted thee.' Next, Abraham was to be 'exceeding fruitful; and nations were to be made of him, and kings were to come out of him.' He was to be the father of many nations by the constitution or appointment of God; and he was to be so exceedingly fruitful by procreating children, that nations were to be made of him, and kings were to come out of him. In this diversity of expression, God intimated to Abraham that he was to have two kinds of seed; one by the constitution or appointment of God, in respect to which he was to be 'a father of many nations;' and another by natural descent, in respect to which he was to be 'exceeding fruitful' in children. This account of Abraham's seed merits attention, because the promises in the covenant being made, not to Abraham alone, but to his seed, in their first or literal meaning they belonged to his natural seed, but in their second or highest meaning, they were promises to his seed by faith.

The distinction of Abraham's seed into two kinds is intimated by our Lord Jesus, John viii. 39. where he told the Jews who sought to kill him, that notwithstanding they were the natural offspring of Abraham, they were not his children, unless they did the works of Abraham.—The same distinction is taught more plainly by the apostle Paul, who calls Abraham's natural progeny, 'his seed by the law,' the law of marriage; but his seed by the appointment of God, who gave believers of all nations to him for his seed, 'that which is by the faith of Abraham.' Rom. iv. 16. 'That the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is by the law, but to that also which is by the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all.'—In like manner, the same apostle, by telling us, Rom. ix. 8. 'The children of the flesh, those are not the children of God, but the children of promise are counted for seed,' hath insinuated that Abraham had two kinds of children or seed; and that the seed by the promise, 'a father of many nations I have constituted thee,' are the children of God to whom alone the promises in the covenant, in their second and highest meanings, belong.

This distinction of his seed into two sorts, I doubt not Abraham himself understood. My reasons are as follow: 1. In the promise, 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee;' the expression, I have constituted thee, must have led Abraham to expect a seed of some kind or other, different from that which he was to have by natural descent. For he could not imagine God would promise it as a favour, that he would constitute him the father of his natural offspring. He was their father by having begotten them, and not by any positive appointment of God whatever.

2. Seeing the seed of which God constituted Abraham the father, was to be so numerous as to make many nations, he must have known that these nations were not to be his descendants. His descendants, to whom the promises in their literal meaning belonged, were to be but one nation; as Abraham knew, from the limitation of the promises, first to Isaac, to the exclusion of Ishmael; and after that to Jacob, to the exclusion of Esau. Besides, that his descendants by Jacob were to be but one nation, Abraham must have known from the purposes for which they were chosen to be the people of God; and from their having so narrow a country as Canaan promised to them as their habitation. For he could not but know, that Canaan, instead of containing many nations, was no more than sufficient to be the habitation of the one nation of his descendants by Jacob.

3. Although the many nations of whom Abraham was constituted the father are called his seed, that appellation could not lead him to conclude certainly, that these nations were to spring from him by natural descent. Anciently, not only a person's offspring, but those who resembled him in his dispositions and actions, were called his seed. Thus, in the sentence pronounced at the fall, wicked men are called 'the seed of the serpent;' and the devil is called by our Lord, the 'father of murderers and liars.' Wherefore, as Abraham knew that the promises in the covenant, in their first or literal meaning, were limited to the one nation of his natural descendants by Jacob, it would readily occur to him, that the many nations of whom he was constituted the father, and who as his children were to inherit the promise in its second or highest meaning, were nations of persons who resembled him in his faith and obedience. And the rather when he considered, that those who partook of the qualities of his mind, were more really his children than those who were related to him only by fleshly descent. Besides, he may have known, that his seed by faith, being also the children of God, were better qualified than those who were his seed by natural descent, to receive the blessings promised in the covenant to his seed; especially the eternal inheritance of the heavenly country, which was promised to them under the image of the everlasting possession of Canaan.

4. The occasion on which the numerous seed was promised to Abraham, must have led him then, as they do us now, to think of a numerous seed, different from his natural progeny. Gen. xvii. 1. 'When Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said to him, I am the almighty God, walk before me and be thou perfect.' And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and I will multiply thee exceedingly.'—Gen. xxii. 16. 'By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, For because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; 17. That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heavens, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore.' The numerous seed being promised to Abraham as the reward of his walking before the Lord in a perfect manner, and of his having offered up Isaac as a burnt-offering, he could not think that a numerous natural progeny was the only seed promised to him. That kind of seed, however numerous, he must have known, is not the proper reward of a people walking before the Lord in a perfect manner, far less is it the proper reward of such an eminent degree of faith and piety as he expressed in the offering up of Isaac. To be the founder of a great nation, or even of many nations, was a blessing which any wicked man might attain in the ordinary course of things, and which some of that character actually had attained. Wherefore, when God repeatedly promised to Abraham, with a solemnity and pomp of expression which could not fail to attract his attention, that he would multiply him exceedingly; and that his seed should be numerous as the stars of the heavens, this chief of believers, whose understanding was as extensive as his faith was strong, would not interpret God's promises of a numerous and natural seed only, but of a numerous spiritual seed also, who were to resemble him in his faith and obedience. 'The promise of the numerous seed thus understood, must, to a person of Abraham's piety, have appeared an high reward indeed. It was an assurance from God himself, that in the progress of the world there were to be multitudes in every age and country, who should know and worship the true God; that God would acknowledge all such as Abraham's seed; that in fulfilment of the promise made in the covenant to Abraham's seed, he would count their faith to them for righteousness; and that he would bestow on them the everlasting possession of the heavenly country promised to Abraham, and to his seed by faith. Having thus showed that a numerous seed by faith was promised to Abraham, as well as a numerous natural progeny, and that Abraham himself knew both kinds of seed were promised to him, it remains to speak of the accomplishment of the promise, according to its two-fold meaning. And first, The promise that Abraham's natural seed should be as numerous as the dust of the earth, and as the sand which is on the sea-shore, though limited to the one nation of the Israelites who descended from Abraham by Jacob, hath been remarkably fulfilled even in that one nation; agreeably to Gen. xii. 2. 'I will make thee a great nation;' For, notwithstanding the oppression of Jacob's posterity in Egypt, they had multiplied so exceedingly, that when they came out, and were numbered in the wilderness, the males among them who were above twenty years old, and able to go to war, were no fewer than six hundred and three thousand, five hundred and fifty. Now, as neither the Levites, nor the old men, the women, and the children under twenty years old, were numbered, those together must have been at least four times the number of the males fit to go to war; consequently, the souls who came out of Egypt could not be fewer than three millions:—so exceedingly did God multiply Abraham's natural seed during the short time of their sojourning in Egypt.

The Israelites, after they were settled in Canaan, continued to multiply greatly; for when David numbered them, they were found in Israel and Judah, 'thirteen hundred thousand valiant men who drew the sword,' 2 Sam. xxiv. 9.—Afterwards, indeed, their numbers were diminished by the inroads of the Amorites and Chaldeans, and by the captivity, first of the ten tribes, and then of the two tribes; so that when they returned from Babylon they were but few. Yet that small remnant, in process of time, multiplied to such a degree in their own land, that when the Romans invaded them under Titus, their numbers were prodigious; as we learn from the accounts which Josephus hath given of those who perished by famine, by pestilence, by internal divisions, and by the sword of the Romans, during the course of their last war with that powerful people.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, and the total discomfiture of the Jews by the Romans, such of them as survived, being sold by their conquerors for slaves, were scattered through all the neighboring heathen countries, and from thence were dispersed, in process of time, over the face of the earth. In this last dispersion, the natural seed of Abraham have continued now near eighteen hundred years; and during that long period they have been miserably wasted, partly through their own turbulent disposition, and partly through the avarice and cruelty, both of the heathens and of the Christians among whom they dwelt. Yet, during all the calamities with which God have befallen them, they have ever remained, though not an united, yet a distinct people, by their observance of the institutions of Moses, but especially by their circumcision, declared by God himself to be the seal of his covenant with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 9; and by that external mark, and by their observance of the institutions of Moses, this people are everywhere known to be the posterity of Abraham. Moreover, they are at this time so numerous, that were they gathered out of all the lands where they are dispersed, and joined together, they would be a race perhaps as numerous as any at present found on the earth. Who does not see in all this the accomplishment of God's promise to Abraham, to multiply his natural seed 'as the dust of the earth, and as the sand which is on the sea-shore?' See Sect. 4. at the beginning.

In the second place, Abraham, by the promise, 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee,' being made the father of all in every age and nation who believe and obey the true God, his spiritual seed must be very numerous. It is true, we cannot number them, as Moses and David numbered the natural seed. This, however, we know, that in every nation there always have been, even in the darkest and most corrupt ages, many pious and virtuous men, who have feared God, and wrought righteousness, according to the light and the advantages which they enjoyed. See Sect. 4. 1st Art. p. 258. Also we know, that in the progress of the divine government, virtuous and good men, Abraham's
ON THE COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

SECT. III.—Of the third Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

The third promise is that which God made to Abraham immediately on his arrival in Canaan: Gen. xii. 7. ‘The Lord appeared to Abraham, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land.’—Gen. xv. 1. ‘Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward.’—7. And be said to him, I am the Lord who brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.—18. Unto thy seed have I given this land.’

Concerning the first or literal meaning of this promise, there can be no doubt; as little can there be any doubt concerning its fulfilment to Abraham’s natural seed, according to that meaning. After they had sojourned in Canaan and Egypt, God put Abraham’s natural seed in possession of the promised country by great miracles, and maintained them in possession of it during many ages.

But, like all the other promises in the covenant, this had a second and higher meaning, which Abraham and his immediate descendants well understood; namely, that under the image of the possession of Canaan, the possession of a better country, even an heavenly, was promised to them; as the following arguments I think sufficiently prove.

1. Although, when God said to Abraham, Gen. xii. 1. ‘Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father’s house, unto a land that I will shew thee,’ he might think of some country on earth only; yet when God afterwards said to him, Gen. xiv. 1. ‘I am the Almighty God, walk before me, and be thou perfect.’ And I will give to thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God; he would naturally conclude, that some better country than any country on earth was promised to him as the reward of his walking before God in a perfect manner. For the translation of his ancestor Enoch from this earth in the body, after walking with God, must have convinced him, that neither the possession of Canaan, nor of any country on earth in its present state, is the proper reward of a perfect virtue. Besides, the whole earth being cursed for Adam’s transgression, no part of it, as Abraham well knew, could be an everlasting habitation to him. In short, Abraham must have seen, that if the possession of Canaan, during the whole of his life, was all that God promised to him as the reward of his walking before him in a perfect manner, he would not be rewarded more than other men; many of whom, notwithstanding they were great sinners, he observed, were enjoying the felicity of earthly countries in the greatest perfection.

2. The possession of Canaan, promised in the covenant, being termed an everlasting possession; if nothing was meant thereby but the everlasting possession of the earthly country so called, Abraham, to whom it was promised, must have expected to live in that country for ever. The same expectation Isaac and Jacob, his immediate descendants, must have entertained, to whom, as well as to him, the everlasting possession of Canaan was promised. But if Abraham and all his posterity were to live in the earthly Canaan without dying, he would soon be sensible that it was a country too strait for containing all his seed.—Again, if that circumstance led him to interpret the promise concerning the everlasting possession of Canaan, of its being possessed for a long series of years by the successive generations of his posterity; yet, when he considered that the possession of Canaan, even promised to all his seed, to his seed by faith as well as to his natural seed, he would soon relinquish that interpretation; because it could not enter into his mind to think, that believers of all nations, who were on the earth in any one age, could live with his natural seed in so narrow a country as Canaan. Or if such a thing had been possible, he must have known, that to be transported into Canaan would have been no advantage, but rather a loss, to many of them; since the countries in which they were living, were better in every respect than Canaan. These reasons, I think, must have convinced Abraham, that a better and greater country than Canaan was promised in the covenant to him and to his seed, even an heavenly country, which was capable of containing all his seed, and by which the earthly country promised to his natural seed was only the emblem and pledge.

3. Supposing that Abraham thought Canaan was the only country promised to him and to his seed, if any of them died without receiving that country, he must have expected either that God would raise them from the dead to enjoy it, or that he would give them in the other world a country equal to or better than Canaan. For a person of Abraham’s exalted faith and piety, never could think God capable of breaking his promise. Accordingly, our Lord, in reasoning with the Sadducees, affirmed, that the promise to give to Abraham and to his immediate descendants the everlasting possession of Canaan, was virtually a promise to raise them from the dead. Luke xx. 37. ‘Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; for he is not a God of the dead, but of the living.’ When Moses, at the bush, called the Lord, the God of Abraham and of his immediate descendants, he brought to the remembrance of the Israelites the memorable words with which the promise, to give to their fathers personally the everlasting possession of the land of Canaan, was concluded, namely, ‘And I will be their God,’ Gen. xvii. 8. From these words our Lord reasoned against the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection of the dead, in the following manner:—Seeing the Lord, when he promised to give to Abraham and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, added, ‘And I will be their God,’ if Abraham and his immediate descendants died without receiving Canaan, and are not to be raised from the dead to possess it, the Lord, who promised it to them, could not truthfully call himself their God, so many years after they were dead. Or as the apostle intimates, Heb. xi. 16. he might have been ashamed to call himself their God. Besides, in the preceding part of his discourse, our Lord termed the promised country ‘That world,’ in contradiction to ‘This world;’ and declared, that to enjoy ‘that world,’ Abraham and his seed must be raised from the dead. Luke xx. 34. ‘The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage. But they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage. 35. Neither can they die any more, for they are equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.’ Wherefore, our Lord himself hath authorized us to believe, that in the promise to give to Abraham and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, a new world, and a resurrection from the dead in order to their enjoying that world, was really promised to them; for which reason he charged the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection, with ignorance of the scriptures. Matt. xxii. 30. ‘Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures.’

4. St. Paul expressly affirms, that Abraham and his immediate descendants knew, that in the promise to give to him and to them the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, a better and greater country, namely, an heavenly country, was promised to them. For he tells us, these men, to shew that they expected a city whose builder and ruler is God, never built any house or fixed habitation in Canaan, but always dwelled there in tents. Heb. xi. 9. ‘By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as belonging to others, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise. 10. For he expected a city having foundations, of which city the builder and ruler is God.’—Further, the same apostle informs us, that Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, though they never obtained the possession of Canaan, all died in the firm persuasion of obtaining it. Heb. xi. 13. ‘All these died in faith, though they did not receive the things promised. For seeing them afar off, and being persuaded of them, and embracing them, they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. 14. Now they who speak such things plainly declare, that they earnestly seek (σπεύδοντες) a native country, not Chaldea. 15. ‘For if they had remembered that from which they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. 16. But indeed they strongly desired a better country, even an heavenly.’—After these express testimonies, can any one suspect that Abraham and his immediate descendants did not know an heavenly country was promised to them in the covenant, under the image of Canaan; and that they were to be raised from the dead, in order to their enjoying it?

5. That the promise, to give to Abraham and to his seed the everlasting possession of Canaan, was a promise to give them the everlasting possession of an heavenly country, and to raise them from the dead to enjoy that country; and that Abraham and his descendants understood the promise no otherwise, is evident from this, that the Israelites, from the earliest times, entertained a strong hope of the resurrection of the dead, founded on the covenant with Abraham. Thus the Psalmist, speaking of the wicked, saith, Psalm. xlix. 14. ‘Like sheep they are laid in the grave,—and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning: Their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling. 15. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me.’—Wisdom of Solomon, iii. 4. ‘Though they be punished in the sight of men, yet is their hope full of immortality.’

What a strong belief of the resurrection of the just, and of the retributions of an after-life, founded on the covenant with Abraham, the latter Jews entertained, we learn from the history of the seven brethren, with their mother, who were put to death by Antiochus for refusing to taste swine’s flesh. 2 Macc. vii. 9. The second, when he was at the last gasp, said, Thou like a fury takest us out of this present life: but the King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, to everlasting life. ‘—And that they expected this resurrection to everlasting life, by virtue of the covenant with Abraham, appears from the words of the youngest of these brethren: ver. 38. ‘For our brethren, who now have suffered a short pain, are dead under God’s covenant of everlasting life: for what covenant of everlasting life did God ever make with the Jews, under which they could die, unless it be the covenant with Abraham, in which he promised with an oath, to give to him, and to his seed, the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession!’

Further, that the Jews derived their hope of the resurrection from the covenant with Abraham, may be gathered from their expecting the resurrection of the just only. Thus our Lord, speaking of the resurrection, according
ON THE COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

Lastly, the prevalence of the hope of the resurrection of the dead among the Israelites in the earliest times, may be understood from this well-known fact, that the nations who sprang from Abraham by Hagar and Keturah entertained the same hope, and communicated it to their neighbours; so that the resurrection of the dead, in one shape or another, was believed by the greatest part of the inhabitants of the east. Hence Job, who was an Arabian, expressed his hope of the resurrection in the strongest terms, chap. xiii. 25. 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. 26. And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. 27. Whom shall I see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me. The particulars contained in this section merit attention, as they shew how much the Deists and others are mistaken, who think the immortality of the soul, and the retributions of a future state, were not made known to the Jews by Moses and the prophets.

SECT. IV.—Of the fourth Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise is recorded Gen. xvii. 7. 'I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant. 8. And I will be their God.' This promise, though expressed in the most simple language, comprehends deep meanings. It consists of two articles.

1. The first article is contained in verse 7. 'I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant.' This establishment of God's covenant with Abraham and his seed in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, in its first or literal meaning implied, that Abraham's natural seed were to remain a distinct people in their successive generations, without ever being destroyed; because if they were to be destroyed, God's covenant with them would not have been everlasting. To this interpretation we are led by Moses, who declared, that if God destroyed Abraham's natural seed, it would be a breaking of his covenant with them: Lev. xxvi. 44. 'And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them.' Agreeably to this promise, God declared by Jeremiah, that he would utterly destroy the nations who had oppressed the natural seed of Abraham, but would never make a full end to his posterity: Jer. xlix. 28. 'Fear not, O Jacob my servant, saith the Lord, for I am with thee: for I will make a full end of all the nations whither I have driven thee, but I will not make a full end of thee.' In this promise, according to its first and literal meaning, an event is foretold of a very singular nature; namely, that Abraham's natural seed are always to continue a distinct race, and are never to be lost by mixing with other nations. To this nothing similar hath ever happened. For where are the people who, being scattered over the face of the earth, have preserved themselves distinct from the rest of mankind, so that, after continuing in a state of dispersion for thousands of years, the individuals, in their successive generations, are known to be of that people! The Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans, have all in their turns conquered, and been conquered, but have not kept themselves distinct from their conquerors, although they were not carried captives from their own country, far less were they scattered over the face of the earth, as the Israelites have been. All these nations are now so mixed with their conquerors, that the individuals of them cannot be distinguished. To the reason and experience of mankind, the continuance of Abraham's natural seed distinct from all the rest of the world, foretold in his promise, must, before it happened, have appeared an event utterly improbable. Yet this improbable event hath actually taken place, through a long succession of ages. For from the time of their going down into Egypt to this day, the Israelites, notwithstanding the many calamities which befell them, have still been preserved a distinct and numerous people, as was formerly shewed in the explication of the second promise in the covenant, p. 255, and they will be continued a distinct and numerous people, till the fulness of the Gentiles is come in, and their existence as a separate race is no longer needed to strengthen the evidences of the gospel. At that period, they also shall be converted to the faith of Christ, and, entering into the Christian church, they will, with the other disciples of Christ, assist in preserving the knowledge and worship of God among mankind to the end of the world. These things their own prophets have foretold, under the idea of their being restored to their own land, and of their worshipping God there, according to the Mosaic ritual.

But God's promise to establish his covenant with Abraham's seed in their generations for an everlasting covenant, in its second and higher meaning, imported, that his spiritual as well as his natural seed should be continued in the world, and be separated from the wicked for ever. Accordingly, notwithstanding Abraham's spiritual seed, the sincere worshippers of God, have from the beginning been persecuted, and often worn out, by the seed of the serpent, they have never been utterly destroyed. There have always been, in every nation, many good men who feared God and wrought righteousness, and who, notwithstanding they were not distinguished from the wicked by any external mark, as Abraham's natural seed always have been, are nevertheless sufficiently distinguished from them by their faith and holiness, and will continue a distinct people to all eternity. To render God's covenant with them everlasting in the strictest sense, Matt. xiii. 49. 'At the end of the world the angels shall come forth, and save the wicked from among the just.'

And being separated, Christ will carry them with him into heaven, and form them into one great community, called, Heb. xii. 23. 'The general assembly and church of the first-born;' and, Rev. xii. 23. 'There shall in nowise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie, but they who are written in the Lamb's book of life.' In this holy community the spiritual seed of Abraham will remain to all eternity, separated from the wicked, and united to one another by the indissoluble bond of the warmest love and friendship for ever.

The second article of the fourth promise is contained in these words: 'I will be thy God.' This implies, 1. That Abraham's natural seed were in general to know and acknowledge the true God as their God.—
Moreover, this promise being connected with their possession of Canaan, in the following manner, Gen. xvii. 8. 'I will give to thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God;' it signified, that the title of Abraham's seed to possess Canaan, de-depended on their continuing to worship and obey God.

How this promise, in its first or literal meaning, was accomplished, we learn from Moses, who insinuates that Abraham's posterity in Canaan, and in Egypt, acknowledged and worshipped the God of their fathers by those natural acts of piety which reason dictated, till they came to Sinai, where, by the ministry of Moses, God gave them a ritual of his worship, formed according to a pattern shewed to Moses on the Mount. From that time forward Abraham's posterity, while they remained in Canaan, continued to worship the true God according to that ritual.
On some occasions, indeed, they deviated into idolatry.
But they were always soon reclaimed, by the punishments which God sent on them. Besides, at no time did the whole nation to a man follow idols. In the times of the greatest corruption, there were many who abhorred idols. Thus it was in the reign of Ahab, when Elijah thought himself the only worshipper of the true God remaining in Israel: For there were, even then, seven thousand men left, who had not bowed the knee to Baal, 1 Kings xxi. 19. Thus it was likewise during the Baby-lonish captivity, when Shadrach and his companions were cast into a burning furnace, for refusing to worship the image which Nebuchadnezzar set up. Moreover, by the punishments sent on the Israelites for departing from the law of Moses, they were at length so thoroughly cured of their propensity to idolatry, that after their return from Babylon, even to this day, their abhorrence of idols hath been extreme. They have long ago been driven out of Canaan by the Romans, and have continued in a state of dispersion ever since. But this hath not been all them because they had forsaken the law of Moses, being more zealous of it then than ever; but because they crucified the Christ and rejected the gospel. In short, notwithstanding they have continued long in this last dispersion, and have suffered innumerable evils for their faith, not only from Mahometans and heathens, but from Christians also, they have continued to know and worship the God of their fathers, by such rites of the law of Moses as they could perform out of Judaea: so signal hath the promise in the covenant, that God would be the God of Abraham's natural seed in their generations, been ac-

This promise, in its second and higher meaning here, hath been fulfilled in Abraham's spiritual seed likewise.

From the beginning, there have been in all nations many who have known the true God, and have worshipped him by pious affections, by prayer, and by a sincere desire to know and to do his will—a worship more acceptable to God than any worship by bodily rites. Through this spiritual worship, believers of all nations, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, are by the promise of God, that is by a free gift, entitled to the possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type. And as all who believe in Christ are Abraham's spiritual seed, and the true Israel of God, the promise, that he would be a God to Abraham's seed in their generations, hath been remarkalbly fulfilled in them also. For the knowledge and worship of the true God have been more effectually spread through the world, and preserved among mankind by the disciples of Christ, than by the disciples of Moses.

That the preservation and knowledge and worship of God in the world by the spiritual seed was promised in the covenant, appears from Jer. xxi. 33. 'This shall be the covenant which I will make with the house of Israel, after those days, saith the Lord: I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people.' And from Isa.
lix. 20. 'And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them who turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. 21. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord, My spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.' According to the prophets, therefore, one of the particulars included in God's promise, that he would be a God to Abraham's seed in their generations, was, that the knowledge of himself, which he gave first to the natural seed in the law, and after that to the spiritual seed in the gospel, would never be lost in the world. With admiration and gratitude we behold the
ON THE COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

This promise hath been fulfilled to the spiritual seed likewise; for, notwithstanding the sincere worshippers of God, from the very beginning, have been persecuted by the wicked, and in these persecutions great numbers of them have been put to death, they have never been utterly destroyed. By the support which God on many occasions hath given to his suffering servants in times of persecution, many have been excited to imitate their virtues; and, by the ordinary care which he takes of them at all times, the generation of the servants of God hath been, and will be preserved in the world to the end. Nay, we have reason to expect, that at length the effect of that most wise and powerful government which God exercises over the world, will be to diminish the wicked, and to multiply the virtuous till they exceed the wicked in number, as was before observed, p. 256. And with respect to the present happiness of good men, it hath ever been acknowledged that their virtues, in all ordinary cases, make them much more happy than the wicked can be by enjoying the pleasures of sin; and in extraordinary circumstances, if they are more afflicted than others, their felicity will be greater in the heavenly country, according to Christ's promise, Rev. iii. 21. 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my father on the throne.'

Before we conclude our account of the third and fourth promises in the covenant with Abraham, we will endeavour to shew, First, That Isaac and Essekil have foretold the general conversion of Abraham's natural seed to the Christian faith, under the idea of their restoration to their own land, and their practising the Christian worship, under the idea of their worshipping God in Canaan according to the purity of the Mosaic ritual; and their happiness in their converted state, under the idea of their employments and enjoyments in the earthly country. Secondly, That Isaac's new heaven and new earth, chap. xiv. 17. and Essekil's temple, chap. xii. 1. and the land which he allotted to the twelve tribes, chap. xvii. 13-22, and the city whose dimensions he had described, chap. xiv. 6. are the same with the new heaven and new earth, and the heavenly Jerusalem, which John saw in his vision, related Rev. chapters xxi. xxii.; consequently, that the new heaven and the new earth, of which the prophets and the apostle have spoken, are the heavenly country promised in the covenant to Abraham's spiritual seed.

1. First, then, that Isaac and Essekil have foretold the general conversion of Abraham's natural seed to the Christian faith and worship, under the idea of their restoration to their own land, and of their worshipping God there according to the Mosaic ritual, and their happiness in their converted state, under the idea of their felicity in the earthly Canaan, must, I think, be acknowledged, when it is considered that these prophecies, literally understood, foretell, that when the Israelites are placed in Canaan, God's servant David shall be their prince for ever, Essek. xxvii. 25.; and that all the nations of the earth shall be subject to them, Isa. ix. 15. 'The nations shall serve the Lord, that will not serve thee, shall perish: Yes, those nations shall be utterly wasted.' But if these prophecies foretell the conversion of the Jews, the particulars mentioned in them will all happen. The converted Jews, in the Christian church, will not, as formerly under the law of Moses, be polluted with any ceremonial transgression: Neither will they be righteous merely by performing ritual services, but by doing pious and virtuous actions: And in the Christian church, Christ, called David, because he was prefigured by David, will rule them for ever. Moreover, the nation that will not serve them in their converted state, namely, by 'building up their walls,' as it is explained Isa. lix. 10, that is, by entering into the Christian church and strengthening it; 'shall be utterly wasted'.

3. Secondly, That Isaiah's new heaven and new earth, and Ezekiel's country and city, are the same with the new heaven and new earth, and the heavenly Jerusalem which John saw in his visions, will appear from comparing their several descriptions of these matters. Isaiah's new heaven and new earth which God is to create, are to be so excellent that 'the former shall not be remembered,' Isa. lv. 17. Wherefore they are to be created after the former heaven and earth are passed away. In this circumstance they agree with John's new heaven and new earth: for he saw these after the first heaven and the first earth were passed away,' Rev. xxi. 1. — Next, as in Isaiah's new Jerusalem, which God is to create a rejoicing, 'the voice of weeping shall be no more heard,' Isa. lxiv. 19; so in John's new Jerusalem, 'there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain,' Rev. xxii. 4. — Further, as Isaiah said to the Israelites, chap. ix. 19: 'The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light to thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory;' so of his new Jerusalem John says, Rev. xxi. 23. 'The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of the Lord did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.' And with respect to Ezekiel's waters, which issued out from under the threshold of the house, and became a great river, Ezek. xlvii. 1-5. it is the same with John's pure river of water of life proceeding out of the throne of God,' Rev. xxi. 1. For, as on the banks of Ezekiel's river a tree grew 'which brought forth new fruit according to its months,—and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine,' Ezek. xlvii. 12; so on either side of John's river, 'was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations,' Rev. xxi. 9.

These descriptions agree so exactly in all points with each other, that it is reasonable to suppose the subject of the prophecies and of the vision is the same: Wherefore, as John saw the new heaven and the new earth, and the heavenly Jerusalem, and the pure river of water of life issuing out of the throne of God, and the tree of life growing on its banks, after the resurrection of the dead, and general judgment, and punishment of the wicked, (Rev. xx. 11-15), I think it probable, that the prophecies in which all these particulars are mentioned, foretell the state of things after the resurrection, and general judgment; consequently, that Isaiah's new heaven and new earth, and Ezekiel's country and city, are the heavenly country promised to Abraham, and to his spiritual seed, in the covenant.

In the third place, St. Peter hath directed us to interpret Isaiah's prophecy and John's vision, of the heavenly country in which the righteous are to live after the resurrection and judgment. For, after describing the utter destruction of the present heaven and earth by fire, he adds, 2 Pet. iii. 13. 'Nevertheless we, according to his promises, expect new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.' These great events, he tells us, will happen when Christ returns from heaven to raise the dead and judge the world; and calls it the restitution of all things; and affirms, that God hath spoken of it by all his holy prophets since the world began. Acts iii. 18. 'Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord. 20. And he shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached to you, 21. Whom the heavens must receive, till the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.' But where hath God promised to create new heavens and a new earth, wherein righteousness is to dwell, except in the covenant with Abraham, in which he promised an heavenly country to Abraham's spiritual seed? And where do we find that God hath spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, unless it be in that covenant, and in the prophecies which foretell the fulfilment of the promises in that covenant!

Of the form and constitution of the heavenly country to be created for an everlasting habitation to Abraham's seed by faith, we know little, except, 1. That it will be a material habitation. For, as the righteous are to be raised with glorious, incorruptible, and immortal bodies, their everlasting habitation must be suited to the corporal part of their nature, raised from the dead in the greatest perfection of which it is capable. See 1 Cor. xv. 44. note. Hence the propriety of representing the heavenly country under the image of the earthly Canaan.—2. The new heavens and the new earth, being destined for an habitation to all the virtuous and the good, who have lived and who are to live in the world from first to last, they must be such as are capable of containing them, and with them such of the angelic natures as are to live with them in their new abode.—3. In scripture there are passages which lead us to believe that God will dwell with the righteous in the heavenly country, by some visible manifestation of his presence, unspeakably more resplendent than the glory by which he manifested his presence among the Israelites. Now, although God can receive no addition to his happiness from the excellency of his own works, we may suppose that the new heavens and earth will be so much the more exquisitely contrived, and so much the more glorious, that he himself is to be sensibly present with his people. Wherefore, if the present earth, even as it lieth under the curse, and is the habitation of sinners, affords its inhabitants such a variety of pleasing and edifying enjoyments, how full of pleasures the heavenly country be, which God's wisdom hath contrived, and his power created, for the entertainment of his favourite people. Isa. lxiv. 18. 'Be you glad and rejoice for ever, in that which I create; for behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy 19. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people.'—See Spectator, vol. viii. No. 580, where the future habitation of the righteous, and their happiness in that abode, are elegantly described.

sect. V.—Of the Fifth Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise we have Gen. xii. 2. 'I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing: 3. And in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed.'—xviii. 18. 'Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him.'

Concerning this promise let it be observed, that although at the time it was spoken Abraham may have thought it a promise of great temporal felicity only, to him and to the families of the earth through him, in some manner which he did not understand; yet afterwards, when God counted his faith to him for righteousness, and constituted him the father of many nations, he might conjecture, that the counting of his faith to him for righteousness, was what God meant by blessing him, as was observed p. 253; and that by constituting him the father of many nations, he was to make his name great; and that the blessing of all the families of the earth in him, consisted in their having their faith counted to them for righteousness, by virtue of the promise which God made to him as their father.

But whether Abraham understood this to be the meaning of the promise or not, what Paul wrote to the Galatians shews that it is its true meaning: Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations through Jesus Christ.' For what blessing belonging to Abraham can come on the nations, through Christ's buying them off from the curse of the law, unless it be the blessing of justification mentioned ver. 8. that is, of having their faith counted to them for righteousness, called the blessing of Abraham, because it was first promised to him personally by a covenant; and because in that covenant God promised to him to bestow the same blessing on men of all nations, who imitated him in his faith and obedience, and who, on that account, are considered by God as his children. For, as was shewn p. 255, Abraham was constituted the father of many nations, for the express purpose of receiving the promises in the covenant on their behalf, and in their name. Whereas, 2. seeing the counting of Abraham's faith to him for righteousness was implied, as was shewn p. 253, that his sins were to be pardoned, and that he was to be rewarded as a righteous person, God's blessing all the families of the earth in him implied, that all who imitated him in his faith and obedience were to have their sins in like manner pardoned, and to receive the reward due by God's promise to righteous persons; and that they are to be thus blessed, in consequence of the promise made to Abraham as the father of all believers.

This blessing of faith counted to them for righteousness, will assuredly come on all the families of the earth. For, as was shewn in the Illust. of Romans ii. Ess. vi. sect. 3. if faith does not exist in the belief of things which one hath no opportunity of knowing, but in the belief of such things as are made known to him, whether by the light of nature or by revelation, and in a sincere disposition to know and do the will of God, men in every age and nation may see and true faith may have their faith counted to them for righteousness, on account of what Christ hath done to procure that great blessing for them, whether they have lived in or out of God's visible church. But it will not be bestowed on them till the general judgment, when, their trial being ended, their state will be settled by the sentence of their Judge. For, seeing the pardoning of sin consists in a complete deliverance from death, the punishment of sin, and seeing the rewarding one as a righteous person, implies his actually receiving the reward due to a righteous person, it is evident that neither of these can take place till the judgment is ended. At that period of the divine government, the promise to bless all the families of the earth in Abraham, will be performed in the full extent of its meaning: Because then every one who is found to have feared God, and to have wrought righteousness, shall be accepted with him, whether they have lived in any visible church of God or not; for the Judge of all the earth is no respecter of persons. Acts x. 34.

The foregoing interpretation of God's promise to bless all the families of the earth in Abraham, is confirmed by St. Paul, as was hinted above. For he hath declared, that the blessing of the nations in Abraham, consisted in God's justifying them by faith. Gal. iii. 8. 'Now the scripture foreseeing that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel (the good news) to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all the nations be blessed.' Wherefore they who are of faith, are blessed with believing Abraham.' After this testimony of an inspired apostle, can there be any doubt concerning the meaning of God's promise to 'bless all the families of the earth in Abraham?'

Sect. VI.—Of the sixth Promise in the Covenant with Abraham.

This promise was made to Abraham, after he had laid Isaac on the altar with an intention to offer him as a burnt-offering; and is recorded, Gen. xxii. 18. 'In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.' Because Israël had said to the Israelites, chap. ix. 3. 'The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising,' the Jewish doctors affirmed, that the Gentiles were to be enlightened with the knowledge of the true God, and of his commandments, by the Jews converting them to Judaism. Also they affirmed, that this is the blessing of all the nations of the earth in Abraham's seed, which was promised to him in the covenant. But these interpretations St. Paul hath confuted, Gal. iii. 16. by observing, that the words of the promise are not 'and in thy seed,' as speaking of many persons, but 'and in thy seed,' as speaking of one person only. For from this circumstance he argued, that the blessing of all the nations of the earth in Abraham's seed was to be accomplished by one person only, who is Christ.

This argument, at first sight, may perhaps appear inconclusive, especially as, in the other promises, the word seed is used collectively, to denote a multitude of persons. Yet when it is remembered, that at the fall God said to the serpent, 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed—it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel,' we cannot doubt, that by the seed of the woman one person only was meant; and that 'the bruising of the head of the serpent,' signified that one person's defeating the malicious scheme which the devil (who because he assumed the form of a serpent when he deceived Eve, is called 'that old serpent, the Devil and Satan,' Rev. xii. 9.) had contrived for destroying the human race, and not the killing of serpents by men; for that was too trifling an event to be so solemnly foretold on so important an occasion. Besides, such an interpretation would imply, that Eve was deceived by a natural serpent, which is not to be supposed. Wherefore, the restorer of the human race having been foretold at the fall, under the personation of the seed of the woman, Abraham would naturally think of him, and of the purpose for which he was to be born, when God said to him, 'In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.' And the apostle reasoning hereafter, from its being said to him, and in thy seed, he concluded, that the nations were to be blessed in one person, who is Christ. For if God had meant to tell Abraham that the nations were to be blessed in the Israelites, his natural seed, collectively, he would have said, and in thy seed or sons, to prevent him from interpreting the promise of the person foretold at the fall under the appellation of the seed of the woman, who was to bruise the head of the serpent.

This promise hath been signally fulfilled in Christ, as the apostle hath affirmed; for, 1. In the prospect of Christ coming into the world, born of a woman, and of his offering himself a sacrifice for sin, Adam and Eve were resipi'd from death, and had a new trial appointed to them, under a more gracious covenant than the first; a covenant better adapted to their nature, now that it was weakened by sin. Their temporary reprieve from death God intimated by saying to the woman, 'I will put enmity between thy seed and her seed; and to the man, 'In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread, till thou return unto the ground.' And their having a new trial appointed, was instituted in the declaration, that the 'seed of the woman was to bruise the head of the serpent.' For if they were still to live under the first covenant, the serpent's contrivance for their destruction would have taken effect inevitably. It could only be frustrated by their having an opportunity, under a new covenant, of regaining the life which they had forfeited by their first disobedience. Further, that this gracious new covenant was procured for them by the death of the seed of the woman, was intimated by the bruising of his heel at the time he bruised the serpent's head. For although they might not, in that dark expression, discern the death of the seed of the woman as a sacrifice for their sin, God may have revealed it to them, together with its happy consequences. And the important discovery being made to them, in order that it might be perpetuated among their posterity, God may have appointed them to worship him by the sacrifice of beasts. It is true, Moses hath not said that God ordered our first parents to offer such sacrifices; yet his telling us, that God accepted the sacrifice of the firstlings of his flock which Abel offered to him, implies, that such a command was actually given by God; otherwise, the worshipping him by the sacrifice of beasts would have been ill-will, consequently it would not have been accepted by him.

Further, the bruising of the head of the serpent by the seed of the woman, and the serpent's bruising his heel, were of all the discoveries made to mankind in the first age the most important, may we not suppose, that to teach mankind the meaning of the serpent's bruising the heel of the seed of the woman, namely, that it signified his death as an atonement for the sins of men, God commanded Abraham to offer up his only son as a burnt-offering? That this was its meaning, Abraham might conjecture from the extraordinary nature of the command: Or if, by the strength of his own reason, he could not discover this, the angel who spake to him after Isaac was laid on the altar, may have made it known to him. For our Lord himself assures us, that Abraham saw his day with joy: John viii. 58. 'Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad.'

2. And in the view of Christ's coming and offering himself a sacrifice for sin, all Adam's posterity are included in the gracious new covenant under which he was placed, after he was restored from death. For if Adam's posterity were included in the covenant under which he fell, so far as to be liable to death for his offence, it is reasonable to think, that they are likewise included in the new covenant which was made with him, and that thereby they have an opportunity given them of regaining that bodily life which Adam forfeited for them. Besides, if the law under which Adam's posterity now live, be the law of works, to what purpose hath God allowed them to come into existence? By obedience to that law none of them can obtain life, but for the smallest act of transgression must perish. This, then, is one of the great blessings which are procured for mankind by Abraham's seed, Christ. In the prospect of his dying as a sacrifice for sin, they have obtained a trial under a more gracious covenant than the first; and this favour is not confined to any one nation or race of men, but is extended to all the posterity of Adam, without excepting any of them. So that in respect of this happy effect of his coming into the world in the human nature, he may truly be said to have died for all. See 2 Cor. v. 15, note 1.

3. By dying as a sacrifice for sin, Abraham's seed, Christ, hath obtained for all the nations of the earth deliverance from death, the curse of the law which Adam brake: so the apostle assures us, Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us.' His meaning, however, is not that any of Adam's posterity is to escape temporal death, but that they are all to be raised from the dead by Christ, in order to their receiving reward or punishment according to what they have done in this life, whether it hath been good or bad. They, who by giving the obedience of faith, have fulfilled the gracious requisitions of the new covenant under which they were mercifully placed, and who, when they failed in particular instances, have repented of these failures, shall be pardoned, and rewarded with eternal life; but they who have neither given this obedience, nor repented of their sinful courses, shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

4. As the reward of his dying for the sins of men, Abraham's seed, Christ, after his resurrection, was exalted to the government of the world. Therefore, seeing he exercises that government with the greatest wisdom, and power, and goodness, for the benefit of mankind, all the nations of the earth have, by his government of the world, been greatly blessed in him. And, in particular, they have been blessed in him with the influences of the Spirit, to enable them to overcome the evil propensities of their nature, and to fulfill the requisitions of the law of faith, under which he hath placed them. In one word, all the nations of the earth being indebted to Abraham's seed, Christ, for every blessing of providence and of grace which they enjoy, or hope to enjoy, they have been greatly blessed in him.

5. Many nations of the earth have been blessed in Abraham's seed; Christ, with the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation, and of the rewards and punishments of a future state. For these, with the other doctrines of true religion, Christ made known to his holy apostles and prophets by inspiration; and through the fidelity and diligence with which they published these things to the world, the knowledge of them was given to many nations in the first age, and hath been continued among them ever since, and even spread in the world, by the stated ministry of the word. Nevertheless, all the nations of the earth have not as yet heard the gospel; nor have all obeyed it to whom it hath been preached. But the prophets have foretold, Psal. lxix. 17, 'His name shall endure for ever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed.'

These are the blessings which were to come on all the nations of the earth, through Abraham's seed, Christ, because Abraham obeyed God's voice in offering up his only son Isaac, as a burnt-offering. By this, however, God did not mean that Abraham's obedience procure those blessings for the nations through Christ, but that, as the reward of his obedience in the affair of Isaac, God promised that the person through whom these blessings were to come on the nations, should be one of Abraham's seed. This interpretation is agreeable to the plain meaning of the words, 'And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice.'

CONCLUSION.

Having explained God's promises to Abraham, both in their literal and allegorical meaning, and having shewed in what manner they have been already fulfilled, or are yet to be fulfilled to the heirs hereof, it will be useful to look back, and take a view of the great discoveries which were made of God's gracious purposes respecting mankind, in that ancient oracle which God himself hath dignified with the appellation of his covenant with Abraham. First, then, in promising to bless Abraham exceedingly, it appears that God declared his intention to bestow on him the great blessing of justification by faith.
that is, his intention both to pardon his sins, and to reward him as a righteous person for his faith. In consequence of his pardon, Abraham was to be delivered from death, the punishment of sin, by being raised from the dead. And with respect to his reward, it will consist in the everlasting possession of that heavenly country, of which the earthy country promised to him and to his natural seed, was the emblem and pledge.——By constituting Abraham the father of many nations, God declared that he will consider all in every nation who imitate Abraham in his faith and obedience, as Abraham's seed, and perform to them the blessings promised in the covenant to Abraham's seed: consequently, believers of all nations are, like Abraham, to be justified by faith: they are to be pardoned, and to obtain the everlasting inheritance of heaven, after being raised from the dead. Also in heaven they are to have God for the object of their worship, and the source of their happiness to all eternity. And these blessings, which are all to come on them through Abraham's seed, Christ, are in the covenant declared to be the common privilege of believers of every age and nation, as Abraham's seed, whether they have lived in any visible church of God on earth or not.——But, which is of the greatest importance in this matter, it is expressly declared, that the blessings promised in the covenant are not to come on any, but on those whose faith is accompanied with habitual obedience. This God declared concerning Abraham himself, Gen. xviii. 19. 'I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; and the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.'——Thus it appears, that the principal doctrines, precepts, and promises, which were afterwards made known to the world more plainly in the gospel, were discovered to the Israelites in the covenant which God made with their father Abraham; so that, properly speaking, it was the gospel of the Israelites, and the rule of their justification.

It is true, the discoveries in the covenant with Abraham are not very obvious to us, because we are not accustomed to the allegorical method of instruction used in ancient times. But that method being familiar to the Israelites, they were at no loss to know, that the temporal blessings promised to the natural seed of Abraham, were emblems of those eternal blessings which belong to his seed by faith, and were in fact promises of those blessings to them. Farther, seeing the temporal blessings promised to the natural seed were all things future, and some of them at a great distance in point of time, their coming to pass exactly as they were promised, was a proof and a pledge, that the eternal blessings of which they are the prefigurations, shall be fulfilled to the spiritual seed in due season. For instance, can any person of good sense and candour, who considers by what wonderful exertions of the divine power Abraham's natural seed were brought out of Egypt, preserved in the wilderness during the space of forty years, and then put in possession of Canaan, the country promised to them in the covenant, entertain the least doubt of God's willingness and power to raise all Abraham's spiritual seed from the dead, and to introduce them into the heavenly country, of which the introduction of his natural seed into the earthly country was both an emblem and a pledge?

ESSAY VI.—On Justification.

To understand what the apostles have written, and others have disputed, concerning justification, it will be proper to explain the meaning of the words justify, and justification, as used in common speech. To justify a person, as was showed Rom. ii. 13, note 2, is a law phrase, denoting the action of a judge, who, when a person is accused at his bar of having committed some crime, acquits him after a formal trial, by a sentence pronounced in the hearing of his accuser and of the witnesses. The word, justification, is a law term likewise, and denotes the acquittal itself, together with its consequences, as far as they have a relation to the party accused.

In scripture, the words justify and justification have a sense analogous to their use in human courts of judicature. For, when God is said to justify men, the meaning is, that as the Judge of the world he acquits them by his sentence after an impartial trial, either because he finds them innocent of the things of which they are accused; or, if they are guilty, because he is graciously pleased to pardon them. Justification on the first ground, being merited, may be demanded by the accused as a matter of right; and consisteth in an absolute acquittal. But justification, on the second ground, being entirely gratuitous, may be granted or withheld, according to the pleasure of the judge. If granted, it consists in a full pardon of the accused person's sins, bestowed on him as a favour.

SECR. I.—Of the Doctrine of Justification, as explained by the Apostle Paul.

Paul, in his epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians, hath treated largely of the justification of men. What he teacheth on that subject in his epistle to the Romans, is comprehended in two propositions; the first of which we have Rom. iii. 20. 'By works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.' Now, since the apostle was speaking of a man's being justified in the sight of God, it is evident, that in this passage he considers men as standing at the tribunal of God, and claiming to be acquitted on account of works of law; that is, on account of their having done all the works which God's law requireth. Concerning men in these circumstances, the apostle declares, that 'by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight;' for this unanswerable reason, 'Because through law is the knowledge of sin.' The law of God, by requiring perfect obedience to all its precepts, under the penalty of death, maketh every man sensible that he is a sinner, and that, instead of being entitled to justification on account of works of law, he is liable to punishment on account of his sins. Wherefore, the knowledge of sin committed being incompatible with a meritorious justification, it is certain, as the apostle hath declared, that 'by works of law there shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God.'

But God, as Judge, may justify sinners gratuitously; that is, he may from favour pardon their sins on his own account, and by that pardon free them from punishment. Of this kind of justification St. Paul also speaks. For having affirmed and proved, that it is impossible for any sinner to be justified in the sight of God on account of works of law, because he neither hath performed nor can perform them, (see Rom. iii. 20, note 1.), he produceth his second proposition, in which the method established by God for the justification of sinners is declared, ver. 28. 'We conclude, that by faith man is justified, without works of law.' This proposition consists of two parts: first, That man, in his present state, is justified by faith; secondly, That he is justified by faith without works of law. These important doctrines the apostle establishes in the following fourth chapter, by appealing to the justification of Abraham, as related by Moses. And because it is natural for men to seek to be justified meritoriously by their own works, the apostle begins with proving, that Abraham was not meritoriously justified by his works. Rom. iv. 2. 'For (said he) if Abraham were justified by works, he might have had some ground to boast, but not before God.' Many contend, that justified by works, in this verse, means gratuitously justified by works proceeding from faith. And on the authority of this single text, in which it is denied that Abraham was justified by works, they affirm, that in the gratuitous justification of sinners, no regard whatever is had to good works proceeding from faith. But to overturn this false notion. I observe, that if the works mentioned by the apostle are works proceeding from faith, what he hath said of Abraham is not true; namely, that if he were justified by works he might boast. For the man who is justified gratuitously by works proceeding from faith, hath not the least title to boast. So Paul himself tells us, Rom. iii. 27. ‘Where then is boasting? It is excluded. By what law? Of works! No, but by the law of faith.’—The law which requires faith working by love in order to justification, effectually excludes all boasting; because works proceeding from faith being imperfect, do not entitle him who performs them to justification. If such a person is justified, it must be by free gift; consequently, he cannot boast of his justification as merited. Wherefore, the justification by works, which the apostle denieth to Abraham, being a justification of which he might have boasted, it cannot be a gratuitous justification by works proceeding from faith; for, I repeat it, of such a justification no man can boast; but it must be a meritorious justification by works of law, as mentioned Rom. iii. 20, 28, of which one may boast.

The apostle having shewed by Abraham's justification, that believers are justified without works of law, procures to prove the other branch of his proposition; namely, that men are justified by faith. And this he doth, by appealing, as before, to Abraham's justification. Rom. iv. 3. ‘For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.’ This passage of scripture we have Gen. xv. 6, where we are told, that God brought Abraham forth, and said, Look now towards heaven and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. And he said to him, So shall thy seed be. 6. And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness. On this the apostle reasons in the following manner, Rom. iv. 4. ‘Now to him who worketh, the reward is not counted as a favour, but as a debt; founding his argument on the phrase, “counted to him as a favour.”—For if Abraham had worked, that is, had obeyed the law of God perfectly, the reward would not have been counted to him, that is, bestowed on him as a favour; but it would have been given to him by his righteous Judge, as a debt due to him for his unerring obedience.—Next, to shew that Abraham and all believers are justified, not meritoriously by a perfect obedience to the law of God, but gratuitously by faith, the apostle adds, ver. 5. But to him who doth not work, who doth not pretend to have given a perfect obedience to God's law, (this sense of working is evident from ver. 4.), 'but believeth on him who justifieth the ungodly,' that is, who believeth God's promise to pardon penitent sinners, although they have not given perfect obedience to his law, his faith is counted to him for righteousness as a favour. The faith which such a sinner hath in the mercy of God, if it leads him to obey God sincerely, is, by mere favour, counted to him by his Judge as righteousness.

Further, to shew what is implied in God's counting one's faith to him for righteousness, the apostle cites a passage from Psal. xxxii. 1, 2, where David describeth the blessedness of the man to whom God counteth righteousness without works, so consisting in his having his sins covered, and not charged to him. Rom. iv. 6. ‘In like manner also David describeth the blessedness of the man to whom God counteth righteousness without works;' that is, who counteth faith for righteousness, without requiring a perfect obedience to his law. (see ver. 4.). 7 'Saying, Blessed (like Abraham) are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. 8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not count sin.'

Here it is proper to remark, that the apostle's illustration of the two branches of his conclusion, chap. iii. 28. 2 L

'We conclude that man is justified by faith, without works of law,' suggests four things concerning justification, which merit the reader's particular notice.—1. That the works which the apostle excludes from having any influence in the justification of sinners, are not works proceeding from faith, but works of law; that is, the perfect performance of all the works which the law of God enjoins, without falling in any one instance.—2. That as often as St. Paul speaks of justification by works of law, he means a meritorious justification; consequently a justification which the man who performs works of law may demand from his Judge as a debt due to him for his works, and of which he may justly boast.—3. That the justification obtained by God's counting one's faith to him for righteousness, is not a meritorious but a gratuitous justification; a justification which may be withheld from the believer without injustice; And therefore, if it is bestowed on him, it is bestowed as a favour.—4. That the counting of faith for righteousness is an implied promise of pardon as well as of reward; but both by the free gift of God—the faith and imperfect obedience of the believer, meriting neither the one nor the other of these blessings.

But although the apostle hath expressly declared, that by works of law no flesh shall be justified meritoriously in the sight of God; also, although he hath excluded faith, and the good works proceeding from faith, from having any meritorious influence in procuring for believers justification from God, it is to be carefully observed that he hath nowhere said, that believers are justified by faith alone. On the contrary, he hath, in this same discourse, expressly asserted, that good works are necessary, even to a gratuitous justification. For having affirmed, Rom. iii. 28. 'that man is justified by faith without works of law,' to shew us, that by works of law he means a perfect obedience to law; also, to prevent us from suspecting that by this doctrine he represents good works as not necessary to a gratuitous justification by faith, he adds, ver. 31. 'Do we then make law useless through the faith!' Do we make obedience to the law of God useless through the doctrine of justification by faith! 'By no means.'—For we establish law; we establish its obligation as a rule of life to those who are gratuitously justified by faith. I ask, could the apostle with truth have said that he established law, by teaching that men are justified by faith without works of law, if by works of law he had meant those good works which men perform from a principle of faith? This I think no one will affirm. Whereas, if by works of law he meant an unimposing obedience to the law of God, by teaching that men are justified by faith without such works, he strongly enforced the obligation of the law of God as a rule of life, to believers as well as to others. For all of the motives which can be proposed to induce sinners to forsake their sins, and to follow holiness to the utmost of their power, the most effectual is to assure them, that an unimposing obedience is not required in order to their justification, (for if that were the case, who could be saved?) but that God is graciously pleased, for the sake of Christ, to grant pardon and eternal life to every one who believeth on him, and sincerely obeys him. Psal. cxlv. 4. 'There is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.'

Such is the apostle Paul's doctrine concerning justification. In the following section we will examine the doctrine of the apostle James on the same subject, and compare it with Paul's; that we may judge whether the two apostles contradict each other in this important article; as many have erroneously supposed.

Sect. II.—Of the Doctrine of Justification, as explained by the Apostle James.

James hath treated of justification in the second chapter of his epistle; ver. 26. 'Wouldest thou know, O false man, that faith without works is dead? 21. Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had lifted up Isaac his son upon the altar? 22. Thou seest that faith co-operated with his works, and by works his faith was perfected. 23. And so that scripture was confirmed, which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness: And he was called the friend of God. 24. Ye see, therefore, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. 25. And in like manner, was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, having secretly received the messengers, and having sent them away by another road? 26. For as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without works is dead.

In this account of justification, James is thought to have contradicted Paul; and to reconcile them a variety of solutions have been proposed, most of which lead to very dangerous consequences. But, as shall be shewed immediately, the doctrine of the two apostles is the same: And the supposition, that they have contradicted each other, is founded on a misapprehension of what they have written on the subject, as will appear from what follows.

1. Although James hath said, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only; he hath nowhere said, in contradiction to Paul, that by 'works of law' a man is justified.—2. In like manner, although Paul hath said, 'We conclude that by faith man is justified, and not by works of law;' he hath nowhere said, in contradiction to James, that 'man is justified by faith only.' He hath denied, indeed, that Abraham was justified by works; but, as was shewed page 264, it is plain from the scope of his reasoning, that the works of which he speaks are not works proceeding from faith, but works of law; that is, a perfect performance of the works enjoined by law. These Paul excluded from the justification of Abraham, not because they would have justified him if he had performed them, but because it was not in his power to perform them.—3. The justification by works of which James speaks, is not a meritorious justification by works of law, but a free grace justification by works proceeding from faith, chap. ii. 22. 'Thou seest that faith co-operated with his works, and by works his faith was perfected.' This kind of works Paul is so far from excluding from his idea of justification, that he expressly declares them to be absolutely necessary to it. For, having observed that men are justified by faith, Gal. v. 5. 'We, through the Spirit, look for the hope of righteousness by faith;' to prevent us from imagining that faith is joined from good works, he immediately adds, ver. 6. 'For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love.' To the same purpose, Gal. vi. 15. 'In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.' Now, can any one be a new creature without forsaking his sins, and leading a holy life? Paul's description of a new creature determines this question, 2 Cor. v. 17. 'If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature: Old things are passed away; behold all things are become new.'—Wherefore, as the two apostles do not speak of the same kind of justification, nor of the same kind of works, their doctrine, rightly understood, hath not even the appearance of contradiction. To make their doctrine really contradictory, Paul's works of law must mean evangelical works, or good works proceeding from faith, contrary to the propriety of the expression, and to the scope of the apostle's argument, as was shewed page 264.

Farther, that the two apostles have not contradicted each other in their doctrine concerning justification, may be premised from this circumstance, that both of them have founded their doctrine on the justification of Abraham. Thus Paul, Rom. iv. 2. 'If Abraham were justified by works, he might boast; but not before God.' 3. For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.' In like manner, James ii. 21. 'Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he lifted up Isaac his son on the altar?' Now, as it is not to be supposed that the two apostles have built a contradictory doctrine on the same foundation, the presumption is, that their doctrine is the same.

However, not to rest the matter on a presumption, the agreement of the two apostles in this great article of the Christian faith will appear, if the doctrine of each is more narrowly examined. James, by telling us that Abraham was justified by works when he had lifted up Isaac on the altar, evidently alludes to what God said to him, Gen. xxii. 16. 'By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, 17. That in blessing I will bless thee.' This promise to bless Abraham, which God so solemnly confirmed with an oath, James, with as much truth, hath termed God's justifying Abraham, as Paul hath given that appellation to God's crowning his faith to him for righteousness. For, in fact, God's promise to bless Abraham was the same with his promise to count his faith to him for righteousness, as is plain from Paul's calling the counting of faith for righteousness, 'the blessing of Abraham,' Gal. iii. 14. See this proved more fully, Ess. v. Sect. 1. p. 253. Wherefore, when Paul said to Abraham, 'In blessing I will bless thee,' seeing he promised to bestow on him the blessing of righteousness counted to him; also, seeing God declared that he would so bless him, because he had not withheld his son, his only son, from him; it is evident, that if justification consisteth in having righteousness counted to one, Abraham was as really justified by the work of offering up Isaac, as by his believing in the Lord that his seed should be numerous as the stars of the heaven.

That Abraham was justified by the work of lifting up Isaac on the altar, Paul also hath acknowledged in his epistle to the Hebrews, chap. vi. 12. 'When God made promise to Abraham, seeing he could swear by no one greater, he sware by himself, saying, Surely, blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee.' That this was the promise which God made to Abraham when he had offered up Isaac, is evident from the oath with which it was confirmed. For on no other occasion did God confirm any promise to Abraham with an oath. And that Paul understood this to be a promise to justify Abraham, is equally evident from his observing, that God confirmed his promise with an oath, to the end that the heirs might have strong consolation from it: ver. 17. 'God willing more abundantly to shew the heirs of promise the immutability of his purpose, confirmed his promise (to bless Abraham) with an oath, that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation who have fled away to lay hold on the hope set before us. 18. Which we have as an anchor of the soul.'—But what consolation could the heirs derive from God's promise to bless and multiply Abraham, if the blessing promised to him was not the blessing of justification; and of his having a numerous seed by faith! And what hope was set before the heir to lay hold on as an anchor of the soul, unless it was the hope of pardon and eternal life, which was given to Abraham and to his seed in God's promise to bless and multiply him? Since, therefore, Paul knew that the blessing which God promised to Abraham after he had offered up Isaac, was the blessing of justification; also, since he knew that God expressly declared he would bestow that blessing on him, because he had not withheld his only son; by appealing to that transaction, as giving the heirs of promise strong consolation, Paul hath affirmed expressly as James, that Abraham was justified by the work of offering up Isaac. Consequently, for any one to say, or even to think, that Abraham was not justified by that work, is to contradict Paul as well as James; nay, it is to contradict God himself, who swears to Abraham: "Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is on the sea shore."

Further, although James hath said that Abraham was justified by the work of lifting up Isaac upon the altar, he hath not said, that his faith had no influence in his justification. On the contrary, he tells us expressly, that his faith co-operated with his works, namely, in procuring his justification; and thereby he hath intimated, that that work was rendered effectual by its proceeding from faith: At the same time adding, that by works Abraham's faith was perfected, he with equal plainness intimates, that Abraham's faith would have been imperfect, if he had refused to offer Isaac when God commanded him to do it. Wherefore, according to James, to render works acceptable to God, they must proceed from faith; and to render faith perfect or complete, it must produce good works. In short, without this union, neither faith nor works separately will avail any thing to men's justification.—In this doctrine Paul agrees perfectly with James, as is evident from Gal. vi. 6, vi. 15, formerly quoted, p. 286; and from all those passages in his epistles where he declares, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God; 1 Cor. vi. 9, and that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord," Heb. xii. 14.

Having thus showed that the two apostles, rightly understood, agree perfectly in their doctrine concerning justification, it remains, for the further illustration of the subject, to offer the five following remarks.

1. Notwithstanding in the account Paul hath given of Abraham's justification, and attending only to the sound, without considering the sense of what Paul hath written on the subject, and at the same time forgetting that faith is itself the greatest of all good works, have ascertained to faith some efficacy in justification which good works have not. This efficacy they represent, by calling faith 'the hand which layeth hold on the righteousness of Christ,' so as to make it the righteousness of the believer, and to render him perfectly righteous in the sight of God. But a doctrine of this kind, which implies an impossibility, and from which many dangerous consequences have been deduced by the Antinomians, ought not to be received; more especially as it hath no foundation in scripture. For none of the inspired writers hath called faith 'a hand which layeth hold on the righteousness of Christ.' They do not even say, that Christ's righteousness is counted, or imputed to believers; but far less that they are made perfectly righteous thereby; which is an impossibility.—because no person can be perfectly righteous in the sight of God, but one who hath never sinned. See Rom. iv. 3, note 2. What Moses hath written concerning the justification of Abraham, is, that his believing in the Lord, and not the righteousness of Christ, was counted to him for righteousness. In like manner, what Paul hath taught, is, that the faith of believers is counted to them for righteousness through Jesus Christ; that is, on account of what Christ hath done to procure that blessing for them. The efficacy, therefore, of faith, doth not depend on its laying hold on the righteousness of Christ, nor on its possessing any inherent merit, but on the good pleasure of God, who, from mere favour, counts the believer's faith to him for righteousness, having appointed it as the condition or means of his justification. But the same kind of efficacy is ascribed likewise to good works. And surely it becometh to God to appoint what conditions or means of justification seemeth to him good. Now, that he hath actually made faith and works, not separately, but jointly, the condition of justification, both Paul and James have declared: the one by assuring us, that nothing availth to men's justification but faith working by love; the other by telling us, that Abraham's faith co-operated with the work of lifting up Isaac on the altar, in procuring him the promise of the blessing of justification. However, neither the one apostle nor the other say, that justification is wrought by faith or works either separately or jointly. The meritorious cause of men's justification is Christ's obedience to death: Gal. iii. 13. 'Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, that the blessing of Abra- ham might come on the nations through Jesus Christ.' As the reward of his obedience to death, Christ hath procured for mankind the gracious new covenant, in which God, from pure favour, hath promised to bestow pardon and eternal life on all who, by faith and holiness, are capable of enjoying these great benefits. In one word, 'By grace we are saved through faith;' but it is a faith which worketh by love.

2. By constituting Abraham the father of all believers, Gen. xvii. 5. God made his justification the pattern of the justification of believers of all nations, and in all ages of the world; and in him hath showed what the dispositions and actions are, which he requisite in those on whom he will bestow justification as a free gift. This both Paul and James have taught us, by founding their doctrine concerning the justification of the great father Abraham. It is therefore of importance, in the present question, to attend to the character and behaviour of this chief of believers, as described by Moses.—Abraham was a native of Chaldea. But being commanded by God to leave his country and kindred, and to go into a land which he should shew him, Abraham obeyed, not knowing whither he was to go. When he arrived in Canaan, God promised to give that country to him and to his seed; and to make his seed as numerous as the stars of the heaven. This promise Abraham believed, notwithstanding he had all his life gone childless. Nay, he continued to believe it, till the long-promised son, by whom his seed was to become as the dust of the earth, was brought forth by Sarah, in the ninetieth year of her age, and when Abraham was an hundred years old. But mark what happened! When this only son was grown up, God commanded Abraham to offer him up on an altar as a burnt-offering. This difficult command he obeyed, notwithstanding all the promises which God had made to him and to his seed were limited to this only son; reasoning with himself, that God was able to raise him even from the dead, after he was burnt to ashes on the altar; and believing that he would actually raise him.—Further, though the possession of Canaan was promised to him personally, Acts vii. 5. God 'gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on;' for the cave and field of Machpelah Abraham bought with his money from Ephron the Hittite. Yet, when he was dying, he died in the firm persuasion that God would raise him from the dead, to possess the country which he had promised to him. What an admirable example of faith and obedience doth the history of this great believer present to our view! An example which shews, that his faith and obedience did not consist in a single act exerted on a particular occasion, but extended to all God's declarations and commands without exception, from the time he left Chaldea to the end of his life. Wherefore, having on every occasion believed in the Lord, and obeyed his commands, he obtained the promise of justification, confirmed by the oath of God, after he had offered up his only son; and was made the father of all believers, to teach us what our dispositions and actions must be, if we expect to be justified as Abraham was; and to make us sensible, that we are not his children, and heirs of the promises made to him and to his seed, unless, as our Lord expresseth it, John viii. 39. 'We do the works of Abraham.'

4. It was mentioned in the preceding Essay, page 251, that God said concerning Abraham, Gen. xviii. 19. 'I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment, that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.' And it was observed, that this was a declaration, not only to Abraham himself, but to Abraham's children, that they were to receive the blessings promised in the covenant, and particularly the blessing of faith counted to them for righteousness, only on condition of their keeping the way of the Lord, and their doing justice and judgment. These things merit the reader's notice in this place; because Abraham's justification being the pattern of our justification, if he was not to have the things promised to him, unless he kept the way of the Lord, and did justice and judgment, we cannot expect pardon and salvation, unless we persevere in faith and holiness to the end of our lives, as Abraham did.

6. The defenders of justification by faith alone ought to consider, that the doctrines of religion, both natural and revealed, may be really believed without having any influence on a man's temper and behaviour. So saith James, chap. ii. 18. 'One may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works; shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.' 19. Thou believest that there is one God; thou dost well. Even the devils believe this, and tremble. But James adds, the belief of the doctrines of the gospel, however firm it may be, and however zealously contended for, even to the giving of one's body to be burned, will have no influence in any man's justification, if it doth not produce good works. 1 Cor. xiii. 3. A faith of this kind is what James calls 'a dead faith.' Like the body without the spirit, it hath no vital operation. In short, it is not the faith which at the judgment will be counted to the believer for righteousness; but rather will aggravate his wickedness, and increase his punishment.

Sect. III.—Of the Justification of the Heathens.

To the doctrine of justification by faith it hath been objected, by the opposers of revelation, that it excludes all from the possibility of salvation who have not the benefit of revelation. This objection, if it were well founded, would, I acknowledge, bring discredit on the doctrine of justification by faith, and even on the gospel itself; because it would represent God as requiring from sinners a condition of salvation, which he himself hath put it out of their power to attain.

But the objection is of no value, as it proceeds on a palpable mistake, namely, that the faith necessary to justification consists in the belief of doctrines knowable only by an external revelation. For whether we consider the scripture account of faith, or whether we examine the particular acts of faith by which individuals are said in scripture to have been justified, we shall find, that faith doth not consist so much in the belief of any revealed moral or religious truth, as in men's attaching themselves sincerely to God by a strong inclination to know and to do his will; and in making a right use of their reason in searching after the will of God, as manifested by the light of nature; or, if they are favoured with an external revelation, in implicitly directing their religious sentiments and conduct by that revelation, so far as they are capable of understanding it; and in relying with an entire confidence on all the promises of God. Properly speaking, therefore, faith lieth in the heart more than in the head. So the apostle Paul teacheth, Rom. x. 10. 'With the heart we believe unto righteousness;' we believe so as to have righteousness counted to us.—The same apostle represents faith to consist in the strength of one's persuasion of the religious truths which he believes, and in the influence which that persuasion hath on his temper and conduct, rather than in the number and extent of the truths which he believes. 2 Cor. iv. 13. 'We having the same spirit (Esa. iv. 56.) of faith, according to what is written, I believed, therefore I have spoken: We also believe, and therefore speak.'—Heb. xi. 1. 'Now faith is the confidence (the confident expectation) of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen.'

From this account of faith it appears, that persons may have true faith whose religious knowledge is very limited. For to different persons the objects of faith must be more or fewer, according to their different capacities, and their different opportunities of gaining religious knowledge. In particular, the faith of those who are denied the benefit of revelation, can have for its object only the truths concerning God discoverable by the light of nature. Yet they may please God by acting agreeably to their faith in these truths. So the apostle hath expressly declared, Heb. xi. 6. 'Without faith it is impossible to please God: For he who cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him.'

The declaration, that they pleased God who diligently seek him, in consequence of their believing that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him, is conformable to truth. For, notwithstanding the faith of those to whom God hath not granted the external revelation, may not be so extensive as the faith of those who enjoy that benefit, their faith, that is, their attachment to God, may be as strong, and their inclination to know and to do his will may be as sincere, and have as great an influence on their conduct, as the faith of those who are favoured with revelation. Nay, their sense of the imperfection of their own works, and their reliance on the mercy of God, may be as complete—consequently, on account of the sincerity of their faith and obedience, they may be as acceptable to God as the others who enjoy revelation, and through the merity of Christ may be as readily saved; accordingly to St. Peter's declaration, Acts x. 34. 'Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons. 35. But in every nation, he who feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.'—Farther, it is to be considered, that even among those who are favoured with a written revelation, there are great differences in respect of their natural capacities, their improvement by education, and their opportunities of attaining the knowledge of the meaning of that revelation; by all which, the extent of the knowledge and faith of individuals must be very different. We may therefore believe, that the same extent of faith in the doctrines of revelation will not be required of all to whom a written revelation hath been given; but in judging individuals, a due regard will be had to the opportunities and advantages which each hath enjoyed. This I think our Lord hath inculcated, Luke xii. 47. "That servant, who knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. 48. But he who knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whosoever much is given, of him shall be much required: And to whom men have committed much, of him they will require the more."—Seeing then, the same extent of faith is not required from all who enjoy the benefit of revelation, because all have not the same natural capacity, nor the same advantages for profiting by the scriptures, do not consist in the same measure of faith from those who are denied the benefit of revelation, that extent of faith is not required which is expected from those who enjoy revelation. And therefore, at the judgment, the fault will consider what improvement every one hath made of the opportunities and advantages which he enjoyed; and what influence his faith in the truths which were made known to him had on his temper and actions.

That the faith necessary to justification consists in a sincere disposition to know and to do the will of God, so far as it is made known to men, and not in the belief of doctrines which they have no means of knowing, appears also from the particular exercises of faith recorded in the scriptures, by which individuals are declared to have been justified.—To begin with Noah: It is said of him, Heb. xi. 7. "By faith, Noah, when he received a revelation concerning things not at all seen, being warned of things not visible in the world; prepared an ark for the salvation of his family, by which he condemned the world, and became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Noah's faith, in this instance, did not consist in his believing any doctrine of religion made known to him by God; but in his believing a future event which God revealed to him, namely, that the ungodly world was to be destroyed with a flood; and in his obeying God's command to prepare an ark for the salvation of himself and family. Wherefore, since by that faith he "became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith," Owen and his followers are wrong in affirming, that the faith of which the apostle speaks in this chapter is not justifying faith. The next example is Abraham, of whom it is said, Gen. xvi. 6. "Abraham believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness." He believed in the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness. He believed the promises of the Lord, and his faith was the accomplishment of all the events which he had foretold; and of all the promises which he had made to Abraham, concerning his giving the everlasting possession of Canaan to his seed; so that, by their faith in these promises, they were encouraged valiantly to withstand and subdue their enemies.—Of this kind was the faith of Moses's parents, which moved them to disregard the king's commandment, and to hide their son three months; and the faith of Moses himself, which moved him to leave the court of Egypt, and to suffer persecution with the people of God, rather than to enjoy the temporary pleasures of sin: for ed him also to institute the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, that the destroying angel might not touch the first-born of the Israelites.—Of the same kind was the faith of the Israelitish prophets, by which they entered into and passed through the Red Sea; and of Joshua, by which he expected the walls of Jericho to fall down, after being encompassed seven days; and of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson and Jephthah; of David also and of Samuel, and of the prophets; who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, &c.—In short, the whole of the apostle's discourse in this chapter proceeds on the supposition, that faith is a disposition in the heart, leading those who possess it to act suitably to their knowledge of the will of God respecting their conduct, whether his will was discovered to them by the light of nature or by revelation. The foregoing examples of persons who were justified by their faith in the declarations and promises of God, notwithstanding these declarations and promises related merely to temporal matters, prove, I think, that they who believe in God, according to the manifestation which he hath made of himself by the light of nature, may be justified even by that kind of faith, provided it leads them habitually to comply with the will of God, so far as they know it. It is no just objection to this, neither doth it support Owen’s affirmation, mentioned p. 269. that some of the persons whose faith and obedience are praised by the apostle, were not justified thereby; such as many of the Israelites, who by faith passed through the Red Sea, but afterwards, by reason of unbelief, refused to go into Canaan, and for that sin were destroyed in the wilderness; and those who by faith compassed the walls of Jericho seven days, in expectation of their falling down, who cannot all be supposed to have been justified by that one act of faith: and perhaps some others who are said through faith to have subdued kingdoms. For since the apostle saith, ver. 39. ‘All these, though well testified of through faith, have not received the promise;’ 40. God having foreseen some better things for us, that they without us should not be made perfect;’ he certainly means, that many of these persons were justified by their faith: and with respect to the rest, there can be no doubt, that in so far as their faith led them to obey God, in the instance mentioned by the apostle, they did what was pleasing to God. But even on supposition that a number of them were not justified by their faith, because it was only temporary, it was wrong, on that account, to conclude concerning the rest, who are said to have obtained a good testimony through faith, and who are to be perfected, that is, rewarded together with us, that their faith did not avail to their justification; unless it could be proved, that, like the Israelites who passed through the Red Sea, they did not persevere in their faith and obedience. In particular, the conclusion would most certainly be false with respect to Noah, and Abraham, and Rahab. For of them it is testified, in so many words, that they were justified by their faith, notwithstanding we know its objects were such moral and religious truths only as were discoverable by the light of nature, and such revelations as God was pleased to make to them personally, concerning certain temporal matters in which they were greatly interested. Thus, from the accounts which the inspired writers have given of the faith necessary to justification, and from the example of those who are said in the scriptures to have been justified by their faith, it is abundantly evident, that justifying faith in different persons must be different in respect of its objects, according to the opportunities and advantages bestowed on each. Nevertheless, the principle of faith being the same in every dispensation, it may, by the assistance of the Spirit of God, be attained under every dispensation, and may be productive of holiness in the believer, in proportion to the extent and strength of his belief. If this account of the matter be just, it removes the greatest objection which infidels have raised against the gospel. For, by establishing faith as the condition or means of justification, it hath excluded none, not even the heathens, from the possibility of salvation. This liberal doctrine the apostle Paul, if I mistake not his meaning, hath expressly taught, Rom. iv. 11. where he tells us, that Abraham ‘received the mark of circumcision, as a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had in uncircumcision, in order to his being the father of all who believe to the end that righteousness might be counted even to them.’ But while we contend, that persons may have the faith necessary to justification, who, through their want of revelation, are ignorant of Christ, and of the method of salvation, we are far from thinking that any person can be justified otherwise than by Christ. All who are justified, are justified of God’s free gift, through the goodness of God to subject all to death for the disobedience of Adam, notwithstanding the greatest part of mankind never heard either of Adam or of his disobedience, it is equally consistent with the justice and goodness of God to bestow pardon and eternal life on account of the meritorious obedience of Christ, notwithstanding many of them never heard till then of the Person to whom they owe the great obligation, nor of his obedience to death for which it was procured for them. And the rather, that the discovery of the author of their salvation, and of the method by which he procured it, though not made to them till the judgment, will come in good time to lay a foundation for their gratitude and love to God and to Christ, throughout the endless ages of eternity.

But however consonant to reason and to the perfections of God it may be, that the benefit of Christ’s obedience should be extended, at the judgment, to persons who in their lifetime never had an opportunity to know and believe on him, provided they are found to have been animated by a real principle of faith; and some of those to whom Christ hath been offered in the gospel, but who have rejected him, is very different. There is unbelief having generally proceeded from evil dispositions, they can receive no benefit from Christ’s obedience. So he himself hath taught us, John iii. 19. ‘This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.’ 20. For every one who doth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. Upon the whole I affirm, a second time, that by making faith the condition of men’s justification, the gospel excludes none from salvation, but those who exclude themselves through pride of understanding and vicious dispositions.

Sect. IV.—Of the Propriety of making Faith the Condition of Men’s Justification.

The propriety of making faith, and more especially the faith of the gospel, the condition or means of the justification of those to whom the gospel is offered, hath been called in question by the Deists, on this principle,—‘That a man’s belief is not in his own power; but depends on the evidence with which the thing to be believed is accompanied; and on his ability to comprehend and judge of that evidence. But however true this principle, rightly understood, may be, it is no less true, on the one hand, that through indulged prejudices, and the prevalency of corrupt inclinations, and considerations of present interest, and even through inattention, men may render themselves blind to the clearest evidence; and, on the other hand, that by attention, impartiality, and willingness to know the truth, men may render themselves capable of discerning, and of being impressed with the evidence by which any doctrine or matter of fact is properly supported. In this view, to require the belief of the gospel from those to whom it is offered, is, in fact, to require them to use their rational faculties in a fit manner, and to exercise care and impartiality in judging of an affair which is of the greatest importance, to themselves and to the world. Therefore, seeing the proofs by which the gospel is showo.
Sect. IV.

ON JUSTIFICATION.

271

Ad to be of divine original, are sufficient to convince those who examine them impartially; for any one to reject the gospel as not of divine original, is certainly an evidence that his heart is so corrupted that he is incapable of salvation; whereas, to receive it, is a proof that he possesses a rectitude of disposition which fits him for heaven. So our Lord hath declared, John iii. 30. 'Every one who doeth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.' 21. But he who doth truth, cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." The belief of the gospel being thus a proof that men are capable of justification, and the rejection of it disqualifying them for receiving that blessing, to require faith in the gospel as the condition of the salvation of those to whom it is proposed, and to make the disbelief of it the cause of their condemnation, are both of them proper; consequently no fault can be found, either with our Lord's promise or with his threatening: Mark xvi. 15. 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.' 16. He who believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he who believeth not, shall be condemned.'

2. The gospel is much to be commended for making faith the condition or means of men's justification, because it is the highest exercise of piety, and the only true principle from which, in every dispensation of religion, good works must proceed. This praise is due to faith, not because by piety and good works men merit justification, but because by these jointly they become capable of pardon and eternal life. Wherefore, in speaking of men's justification, to separate good works from faith, and to make the latter consist wholly in the belief of doctrines, without connecting it with good works, is to err from the truth; as is plain from the many passages of scripture in which good works are enjoined as necessary to salvation, and bad works are forbidden as bringing condemnation on those who continue in them. To begin with the highest authority,—our Lord hath said, Matt. vii. 21. 'Not every one who saith to me, Lord, Lord,' (that is, who acknowledgeth me for his Master), 'shall enter into the kingdom of heaven: but he who doth the will of my Father who is in heaven. 22. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name have done many wonderful works? 23. And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: Depart from me, ye that work iniquity.' Matt. vii. 23. 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. 35. For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; and I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; 36. I was a stranger, and ye took me in; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.' Matt. xxv. 35-46. 'Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out.' 2 Pet. i. 5. 'Add to your faith courage, &c. 10. For doing these things ye shall never at any time fall. 11. And thus there shall be richly ministered to you an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.'—And especially Paul, the great defender of justification by faith without works of law, Rom. ii. 6. 'The righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works.' Ver. 13. Not the bearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.' Rom. viii. 12. 'If ye live according to the flesh, ye shall die: but if, through the Spirit, ye put to death the deeds of the body, ye shall live.' 1 Cor. vi. 9. 'Do ye not know that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers,' &c. Gal. v. 6. 'In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love.' Tit. ii. 11. 'The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, bath shone forth to all men. 12. Teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. 13. Expecting the blessed hope, namely, the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. 14. Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.' I Heb. xii. 14. 'Pursue peace with all men, and holiness, with out which no one shall see the Lord.'—So also James ii. 14. 'Though a man may say he hath faith, and have not works, will faith save him?'—And John, I Epistle iii. 7. 'Little children, let no one deceive you: He who doth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous.'

After these declarations from Christ and his apostles, can any one doubt that the faith which saveth is necessarily connected with good works; and that it is made the condition or means of our justification for any other reason, but because it is the vital principle of true holiness, whereby men are rendered capable of eternal life?

3. By establishing faith as the condition of men's justification, the gospel teacheth us, that at the judgment God will principally regard the disposition of men's minds, without severely searching into their actions. For, in particular instances, these may have been imperfect, and even faulty, through the greater corruption of nature which some have to struggle against, or the greater temptations to which others have been exposed, or the peculiar disadvantages under which a third sort have laboured, while their general conduct hath been right. Besides, in most cases, the bad actions of those who have a sincere desire to please God, having, through invincible ignorance, been performed under the notion, perhaps, of service done to God; or, if performed contrary to knowledge and conscience, having been speedily repented of by the believer—God will graciously forgive them for the sake of Christ, and will accept of their faith, or general disposition to please him, which led them to an habitual course of virtuous though not sinless conduct, as if it were a perfect righteousness; and will reward them from pure favour, on account of the meritorious obedience of Christ.

4. By making faith the condition of our justification, the gospel teacheth, that however good any action may be, as to the matter of it, if it does not proceed from faith, that is, from an habitual regard to the will of God, and from a sincere desire to please him, in the hope of obtaining those rewards which the lights of nature and of revelation encourage pious men to expect from his goodness, (Heb. xi. 6.), it is neither a moral nor a religious action; it is the mere effect of natural disposition, or perhaps of something worse: for instance, a desire of the praise of men, or a regard to one's own present interest; and therefore it will avail nothing to one's acceptance with God.

5. Lastly, the gospel, which hath made faith working by love the condition on which God will justify men in the way of favour, is attended with this advantage, that while it establisheth good works on the firmest foundation, and giveth them all the weight and importance in the Christian scheme which really belong to them, it beats down men's pride, by making them sensible of the imperfection of their virtue: And thus, taking away from sinners all pretensions to merit, it constrains them humbly to receive the great blessings of justification and salvation as free gifts from God through Jesus Christ, and lays a foundation for their gratitude to God, and love to Christ, throughout the endless ages of eternity.

Sect. V.—Of the Time when Believers are justified.

Many of the inextricable opinions with which theologians have perplexed themselves, in pretending to reconcita the doctrine of the apostles Paul and James on the article of justification, originates from the notion that believers are justified in the present life. And I acknowledge, that what Moses hath written concerning the justification of Abraham, according to its obvious meaning in modern language, seems to imply, that he was justified at the time he believed in the Lord. I acknowledge also, that what Paul hath written concerning the justification of believers, seems in like manner to imply, that they are justified in the present life. Nevertheless, I hope to make it evident, that neither Moses or Paul meant to teach any such doctrine.

1. To show this, my first argument shall be taken from the nature of justification. To be justified, in the scripture sense of the word, is to be acquitted from the charge of having broken the law of God, either by omitting the duties which it enjoins, or by committing the sins which it forbids; consequently it means, to be freed by the sentence of God from the punishment which they incur who break his law. Accordingly, the Westminster Assembly, in their Shorter Catechism, have rightly defined justification, 'An act of God's free grace, wherein he pardonneth all our sins, and accepteth us as righteous in his sight.' But as the whole of a man's life is a state of probation, the sentence of acquittal in which justification consisteth, must proceed upon an examination of all the deeds men have done in the body during the whole course of their trial. Wherefore, if the sentence of acquittal is passed immediately on a man's first faith, which is the opinion of Estius, Whitby, Locke, Taylor, and others, on the one hand, and of the Antinomians, and of some Calvinists, on the other, we must either hold, with the first-mentioned learned men, that the acquittal respects only the sins committed by the believer prior to that first act of faith; or with the last-mentioned persons, that it comprehends not only the believer's past sins, but all those also which he may happen to commit afterwards, till his death.

The first of these opinions, namely, that justification consists in the pardon of the sins committed previous to believing, labours under this inconveniency, that by connecting the pardon of past sins with men's first faith in the gospel, we are led to think, that some may be justified and pardoned with respect to all their past sins, on whom no change of dispositions hath passed, nor will pass; as was the case with Simon Magus, and many others in the first age, who were baptized and made an outward profession of faith in the gospel. He may have sinned likewise with many, in every age, who speculatively believe the gospel to be a revelation from God, and yet are not influenced thereby either in their temper or actions. I ask, will wicked persons, who die impenitent, not be punished for the sins they committed previous to their first faith in the gospel? To resolve the matter into the sovereign pleasure of God, will not account for his pardoning such persons; because if at any time God forgives the sins which men have committed while they continue in these sins, he acts contrary to his perfections, and to his character as the righteous Judge of the world.—Besides, if the future punishment of sin is to arise in part from the existence of evil dispositions in the mind of the sinner, those who live and die in their sins must be miserable, in proportion to the number and strength of the evil habits which they carry with them into the other world; these not being diminished in the least by their supposed first pardon. Wherefore, that sinners are pardoned in any period of their life without repentance, and that the sins which have been thus pardoned, will neither be punished in a future state, nor be the instrument of the sinner's punishment who dieth in his sins, being opinions which stand in opposition to the declared laws of God's government, and to the established course of things, they ought not to be adopted on a few expressions in scripture, which easily admit of a different interpretation. But to induce us to embrace such opinions, the plainest and most unambiguous assertions ought to be produced from the inspired writings in confirmation of them.—To all these considerations we may add, that if the speculative belief and outward profession of the gospel is sufficient, without repentance, to procure for sinners the pardon of all the sins they have committed previous to their believing the gospel, why may not the same kind of faith, continued in, procure for sinners, without repentance, the pardon of all the sins they commit through the whole course of their life? In short, the doctrine of a first and second justification, the one by faith, and the other by works, though patronized by many great names, being contrary both to scripture and reason, ought to be exploded.

The second opinion concerning the justification of believers in the present life, is, that the pardon granted immediately on their believing, includes not only their past sins, but all the sins which they may afterwards commit during the whole course of their life. But to this notion of justification it may with great propriety be objected, that it represents men's future actions as judged, and their sins as pardoned, before they exist: Or, if this form of the doctrine is too absurd to be maintained, it must at least be allowed, that a justification which includes the pardon of all future sins, very much resembles a Papish bull of indulgence, and gives men too great a liberty of sinning; consequently it can be no doctrine of the gospel.—The Antinomians indeed endeavour to remove this objection by asserting, that the evil actions of believers are not in them sins, neither doth God consider them as such; or, to use their own expression, God sees no sins in believers. But the impiety and folly of this assertion is too glaring to need any laboured confutation. Sin is sin, by whomever and at what timesoever committed; and, if not forsaken, will most certainly be punished.

2. My second argument to prove that men are not justified in the present life, shall be taken from experience; and it is this: Since justification is an act of God's free grace, in which he pardonneth all our sins, and accepteth us as righteous, if believers are pardoned in this life, they must in this life be delivered from the punishment of sin, that is, from diseases and death, and every evil which at the fall was inflicted on mankind as the punishment of Adam's sin. The reason is, a pardon which leaves the sinner under any part of his punishment, is no pardon at all; at least, it is not a full pardon. He may have an assurance of pardon given him in the promises of the gospel; but, while any part of his punishment is continued, he can no more be said to be pardoned, than a prisoner can be said to be freed from his confinement who is detained in prison. A believer also may in the promises of the gospel have an assurance of God's love, together with peace of conscience in the prospect of pardon, provided he perseveres in faith and holiness. But still this is not pardon; for, as was said before, pardon consists in an actual deliverance from all the penal consequences of sin, both in the present and in the future life. Further, one's acceptance as righteous in the sight of God, consists in his being rewarded as a righteous person. If so, this part of justification doth not take place at present. None of the children of Adam were ever in this life thus 'accepted as righteous in the sight of God,' except Enoch and Elijah, who, on account of their singular faith and holiness, and to shew what justification is, were translated in the body to heaven; whereby they were freed from death, the punishment of sin, and put in the immediate possession of a blessed immortality, the reward promised to the righteous.—Since, then, believers are neither delivered in this life from diseases and death, nor put in possession of the joys of heaven, but only in the promises of the gospel have an assurance that these blessings shall be bestowed on them at Christ's second coming, it is evident from experience, that no believer is justified in the present life.

3. A third argument, to shew that believers are not justified in the present life, arises from those passages of scripture in which justification is represented as a thing future. Of these the principal are, Rom. ii. 5. 'Revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every one according to his works,' &c. Rom. viii. 24. 'We are saved in hope.' Now hope seen, it is not hope: For what a man seeth, how also can he hope for it? 25. But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait with patience for it. Gal. v. 5. 'We, through the Spirit, look for the hope of righteousness by faith.' Wherefore, righteousness is not counted to us through faith in the present life; and our salvation is a thing future, being the object of our hope, and will not be accomplished till Christ's second coming.

4. A fourth argument is, if believers on their first act of faith are justified, that is, judged in the present life, and acquitted from the guilt of all the sins they have till then committed, they must be judged twice; contrary to the declarations of scripture, in which one judgment only, of the righteous as well as of the wicked, is spoken of; and that one judgment is foretold to happen at Christ's second coming.

From these arguments I think it evident, that notwithstanding Moses hath spoken of the justification of Abraham, and Paul hath spoken of the justification of believers, in words sometimes of the present, and sometimes of the past time, these passages are to be interpreted, like many other passages of scripture, in which things future are represented as past, or present, to signify the absolute certainty of their happening. Thus Moses says, in his song, Exod. xvi. 13. 'Thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation;' that is, thou wilt assuredly guide them. In the prophetic writings this manner of expressing things future is common. We find it used likewise by our Lord and his apostles, Matt. xxvi. 28. 'This is my blood of the new covenant, which is sheds for many;' that is, which is to be shed. —Luke xx. 37. 'Now, that the dead are raised;' (that is, shall be raised), 'Moses shewed at the bush.'—John iii. 19. 'He that believeth not is condemned already;' shall be condemned, if he does not repent. —Rom. viii. 30. 'Whom he called, them he also justified;' and whom he justified, them he also glorified. But as believers are not glorified in the present life, so neither are they justified. —1 Cor. xv. 2. 'By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory,' &c. But how could persons be already justified, whose salvation depended on the condition of their keeping in memory the doctrines they had been taught! —2 Tim. i. 9. 'He hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling.' Here the expression hath saved us, signifies only God's resolution to save us; as is plain from its being put before his calling us to believe the gospel. —2 Pet. iii. 11. 'Seeing all these things are dissolved;' namely, the heavens and the earth. These the apostle represents as already dissolved, to shew the certainty of their dissolution at the second coming of Christ. See Prelim. Essay, iv. 10.

Wherefore, since it is usual in scripture to speak of things future, sometimes as present and sometimes as passed, it does not follow from Moses saying, 'Abraham believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness,' that Abraham was then justified; nor from Paul's speaking of believers as already justified, that they are justified in the present life. Those expressions are to be considered only as assurances, or promises, that Abraham, with all his seed by faith, shall, at the general judgment, have their faith counted to them for righteousness and be rewarded as righteous persons. This is clear in the case of Abraham. For, as the counting of what Phil. nehas did to Zimri for righteousness, consisted in God's promising him the everlasting priesthood, so the counting of Abraham's faith for righteousness consisted in God's promising him the inheritance of Canaan, and not in giving him the actual possession of that inheritance. Further, as Canaan was the emblem of heaven, the promise to give to Abraham and to his seed the inheritance of Canaan, was also a promise to give them the inheritance of heaven, provided they persevered in their faith and obedience; and on that circumstance the title of Abraham himself to the heavenly inheritance was suspended, Gen. xviii. 19. as was formerly observed, p. 251.

From these things it is plain, that Moses' words, Gen. xv. 6, 'He believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness,' do not imply, according to their second meaning, that Abraham was then justified or pardoned, any more than they imply, according to their first meaning, that he then obtained the possession of Canaan. They were a declaration only, or promise, that Abraham should be pardoned, and put in possession of heaven in due time. —This being the true meaning of Moses' words, the expressions in St. Paul's writings, which seem to import that believers are justified in the present life, being formed on Moses' words, must, like them, be understood as declarations or promises that believers shall certainly be justified at the judgment; agreeably to the usage of the inspired writers, who, to shew the certainty of the future events of which they speak, represent them as already come to pass.

If the foregoing account of justification, and of the time when that blessing is bestowed on believers, be agreeable to scripture, the supposition of a first and second justification, framed for the purpose of reconciling the doctrine of Paul and James concerning the justification of believers, is inadmissible, being contrary both to scripture and reason. Besides, it is needless, the doctrine of the two apostles being perfectly the same. Wherefore, the expressions which Estius, Whitby, Locke, Taylor, and other commentators have given of certain passages in the epistle to the Romans, in so far as they are built on the supposition of a twofold justification, ought to be rejected as not agreeable to the truth of the gospel. —The same judgment should be pronounced on all those explications of the doctrine of justification, which have any tendency to weaken the obligation of good works. For although the abetters of these explications attempt to remove that inconvenience by a variety of subtle distinctions, these being not easily understood by the common people, make little or no impression on their minds; while the consequences which flow from the doctrine they are intended to vindicate, being obvious and agreeable to men's passions, have the greatest influence to make them hope for salvation, notwithstanding they continue in their sins.

But all hopes of this sort being expressly condemned in the gospel, every explication of the doctrine of justification which warrants such hopes, I repeat, ought to be rejected, not only as unscriptural, but as dangerous in the highest degree.

CONCLUSION.

There have I endeavoured to shew, that the belief of the doctrines of revelation is not necessary to the justification of those who are destitute of revelation; and that neither the belief of any particular doctrine, such as, that Jesus is Christ the Son of God, nor of any determinate number of doctrines, such as those contained in creeds and confessions, is necessary to the justification of all who enjoy revelation; because all have not an equal opportunity of knowing, nor an equal capacity to comprehend these doctrines. But that justifying faith consists in one's believing such doctrines of religion as God hath given him an opportunity and a capacity of knowing; and in his being so at pains to acquire such a knowledge of these doctrines, as his talents and opportunities enable him to acquire; whether he hath nothing but his own reason and conscience to direct him, or hath these faculties aided by an external revelation;—consists also in habitually recollecting these doctrines, so as to be influenced by them, not to a single act of obedience only, but to an habitual compliance with the will of God, as far as he knows it. This idea of justifying faith I have been at pains to explain and establish by the example of Abraham's justification, because it accords perfectly with all the things said of justifying faith in the scriptures, and is what men in every age and nation have supposed, with these circumstances of which I have spoken, to the sincere; and because it is such a faith as qualifies men for heaven, and which, according to the tenor of the new covenant made after the fall with Adam and all his posterity, through the merits of Christ.—I have likewise shewed, that the inspired writers have ascribed men's justification to good works, as expressly as to faith; not, however, as if either had any necessary influence in procuring justification, but as conditions equally required by God, and equally necessary to render men capable of eternal life, and so inseparably connected, that it is impossible for the one to exist without the other.—Further, I have proved, that the common opinion concerning the justification of believers in the present life, from which so many dangerous consequences have been deduced, is founded in a mis-understanding of the scripture phrasing, and is not agreeable either to reason or experience:—not to reason; for how can a man be justified till his trial is finished, and there is an opportunity of judging of his whole conduct? nor to experience; for where is the believer, who in the present life is freed from any of the temporary penal consequences of sin, and is put in possession of the reward which God hath promised to bestow on them whom he accepteth as righteous? The judgment and acquittal of believers will not happen till Christ returns to judge the world; at which period, believers of all ages and nations being raised from the dead, will, by Christ's sentence as Judge, be freed for ever from misery and death, and be put in possession of eternal life.

To conclude, I have thus largely treated of justification by faith, not only because it hath been controverted in modern times, but because wrong notions concerning that important article of Christian faith have a tendency to weaken the obligations of morality: Whereas, right conceptions concerning the spiritual motives of an holy life, throw a great light on the revelations of God, and shew the method of salvation discovered in these revelations to be consonant to the best ideas men can form of the character of God, as the righteous Governor of the universe.

Preface to the Galatians.

The Galatians were the descendants of those Gauls, who, finding their own country too strait for them, left it after the death of Alexander the Great, in quest of new settlements. These emigrants, on leaving their own country, proceeded eastward along the Danube, till they came to where the Save joins that river. Then dividing themselves into three bodies, under the conduct of different leaders, one of these bodies entered Pannonia, another marched into Thrace, and a third into Illyricum and Macedonia. The party which marched into Thrace passed over the Bosphorus into the Lesser Asia, and, hiring themselves to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, assisted him to subdue his brother Ziptes, with whom he was at war; and in reward for that service they received from him a country in the middle of the Lesser Asia, which from them was afterwards called Galatia, or Galatia.

The inland situation of Galatia preventing its inhabitants from having much intercourse with more civilized nations, the Gauls settled in that country continued long a rude and illiterate people. Yet they wanted neither the inclination nor the capacity to receive instruction. For when Paul came among them, and preached to them, they were so ravished with the doctrines of the gospel, that they thought themselves the happiest of mortals; and were so strongly impressed with a sense of the obligation they lay under to the apostles, for having enlightened them with respect to religion, that they thought they could never repay it, Gal. iv. 15. In short, his preaching and miracles had such an effect on the Gauls, that great numbers of them renouncing heathenism and emiting their gods, they formed many separate Christian churches, called in the inscription of the apostle's letter to them, The churches of Galatia.

How little intercourse the Galatians had with the neighbouring nations, may be known from this, that at the time St. Paul preached the gospel to them, and for many ages afterwards, they continued to speak the language of the country from whence they came. So Jerome, who lived more than 600 years after that people settled themselves in Asia, informs us. For he tells us, that in his time the language of the Galatians was the same with that which he had heard spoken when he was at Tarsus. See Rollin's Antiq. Hist. B. xvi. Sec. 5.

Sect. I.—Of the Time when, and of the Person by whom, the Galatians were converted to the Christian faith.

Luke, in his history of the Acts of the Apostles, hath not told us directly at what time, nor by whom, the Galatians were converted; but he hath mentioned Paul's journey into Phrygia and Galatia, for the purpose of confirming the churches. Acts xvi. 5, 6. And from what he tells us Paul said to Barnabas, when he proposed that journey to him, we learn, that he and Barnabas had formerly preached the gospel in the cities of Phrygia and Galatia. Acts xv. 36. 'Let us go again and visit our brethren, in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.'—Acts xvi. 4. 'And as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decree for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem. 5. And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily. 6. Now when they had gone throughout Phrygia, and the region of Galatia,' &c.—It is true, in the history which Luke hath given, Acts xiv. of the journey we allude to, which Paul and Barnabas made into the countries of the Lesser Asia, for the purpose of preaching to the Gentiles, it is not said expressly that they went into Phrygia and Galatia: But he hath mentioned particulars, from which it may be gathered, that in the course of that journey they preached in both of these countries. For example, having given an account of their being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, and mentioned the countries through which they passed, Acts xii. 4, 5, 6, 13, 14, 51. the historian, in the beginning of chap. xiv. relates what happened to them in Iconium, a city of Lycaonia; then adds, ver. 5. 'And when there was an assault made, both of the Gentiles and also of the Jews, with their rulers, to use them despicably, and to stone them.' unto the region that lieth round about. 7. And there they preached the gospel."—What the region was which lay round about the cities of Lycaonia, we learn from Ptolemy, I. c. 27, who speaks of a part of Lycaonia as bordering on Galatia, and says it contained fourteen cities, of which Iconium was the most famous. Farther, Strabo, in a passage quoted by Callistus, Geog. vol. ii. p. 201, speaks of a part of Lycaonia which bordered on Phrygia. Wherefore, since Galatia and Phrygia lay contiguous to Lycaonia, they probably were in the region round about Lycaonia into which Paul and Barnabas went and preached after leaving Lycaonia, and where they taught many, before they returned to Lystra, as mentioned ver. 21.—These facts and circumstances joined make it more than probable, that when Paul said to Barnabas, 'Let us go and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord,' he meant, among the rest, the cities of Phrygia and Galatia.

However, if I judge rightly, even this was not the first time Paul preached in Galatia. For his first preaching in that country is thus distinguished by himself: Gal. iv. 13. 'Ye know indeed, that in weakness of the flesh I preached the gospel to you at first. 14. Yet my temptation which was in my flesh ye did not despise, neither did ye reject me.' Now, if this weakness of the flesh, which he calls the temptation in his flesh, was, as is generally supposed, some visible bodily weakness occasioned by his rupture into the third heaven, his first preaching in Galatia probably happened soon after his rupture, and before Barnabas brought him from Tarsus to Antioch, as mentioned Acts xi. 25, 26. Consequently before the church in that city separated him and Barnabas to go and preach to the Gentiles, as related Acts xiii. 1, 2, 3. This appears likewise from those passages in the epistle to the Galatians, in which Paul insinuates that he was the person who had first called them to the knowledge and belief of the gospel, Gal. i. 6, 11, i. iii. 5, iv. 11, 13, 15, v. 8. For if Paul was the person who first called the Galatians, it must have happened before he and Barnabas went from Antioch, by the appointment of the Holy Ghost, to preach to the Gentiles. The reason is plain: If the Galatians were first called to the knowledge of the gospel, when Paul and Barnabas preached in those parts of Galatia which lay round about Lycaonia, Paul could not with truth have called himself their spiritual father, seeing Barnabas on that occasion was actually active with him in preaching to the Galatians, and no doubt converted some of them.

From all these facts and circumstances united, I think it is reasonable to conclude, that after Paul was sent to Tarsus to avoid the rage of the Jews in Jerusalem, as mentioned Acts ix. 30, he went from Tarsus, where he abode several years, into Phrygia and Galatia, soon after his rupture; which I suppose happened at Tarsus, or somewhere in Cilicia: That in Phrygia he preached and gathered churches at Laodicea Colossae and Hierapolis; and in Galatia, at Anicya, Pessinus, Tavium, Germa, and other cities, called in the inscription of his letter, The churches of Galatia: That afterwards, when he and Barnabas fled from Lycaonia into the region of Phrygia and Galatia which lay round about Lycaonia, they preached the gospel, and taught many in the cities of Phrygia and Galatia; That the brethren in these cities, being of the number of those to whom Paul and Barnabas, in the course of this journey, preached the gospel, they, among others, were the persons whom, after the council of Jerusalem, Paul proposed to Barnabas to visit as brethren, that they might see how they did: And that after Paul and Barnabas separated on account of their contention about John Mark, the churches in the cities of Phrygia and Galatia, mentioned above, were those whom Paul and Silas are said to have established in Phrygia and Galatia, by delivering to them copies of the decrees for to keep, which were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem, Acts xvi. 4, 6.

SECT. II.—Of the Date of the Epistle to the Galatians.

The opinions of learned men concerning the date of St. Paul's epistle to the Galatians, are widely different. Theodoret thought it one of those epistles which the apostle wrote during his first confinement at Rome: in which he is followed by Lightfoot and others. But, seeing in the other epistles which the apostle wrote during his first confinement, he hath often mentioned his bonds, but hath not said a word concerning them in this, the opinion of Theodoret cannot be admitted. —Because there is nothing said in the epistle to the Galatians of Paul's having been in Galatia more than once, L'Enfant and Brasecore think it was written during his long abode at Corinth, mentioned Acts xviii. 11, and between his first and second journey into Galatia. This opinion Lardner exposes, and assigns the year 52 as the date of this epistle. —The author of Miscellanea Sacra, who is followed by Beza, supposes it to have been written from Corinth to the apostle's second place there, and not long after he wrote his epistle to the Romans. —This likewise was the opinion of Grotius. —Mill places it after the epistle to the Romans; but supposes it to have been written from Troas, while the apostle was on his way to Jerusalem with the collections; to which he fancied the apostle refers, Gal. ii. 10. And that the brethren who joined him in writing to the Galatians, chap. i. 2, were those mentioned Acts xx. 4. —Hera, in his note on Gal. i. 2, gives it as his opinion, that the brethren who joined Paul in his letter to the Galatians, were the eldership of the church at Antioch; and that it was written in that city, in the interval between Paul and Barnabas's return from Paul's first apostolical journey, and their going up to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders concerning the circumcision of the Gentiles. —Tertullian, as Grotius informs us in his preface to the Galatians, reckonthis one of Paul's first epistles.

My opinion is, that Paul's epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch after the council at Jerusalem, and before Paul and Silas undertook the journey in which they delivered to the Gentile churches the decrees of the council, as related Acts xvi. 4. To this date of the epistle I am led by the following circumstances:— beyond all doubt.—This is the first reason for supposing that the epistle to the Galatians was written soon after the council of Jerusalem.

2. The second reason is taken from the inscription of the epistle, in which it is said, that all the brethren who were with Paul joined him in writing it: For as the only view with which any of the brethren could join the apostle in writing to the Galatians, was to attest the facts which he advanced in the first and second chapters for proving his apostleship, the brethren who joined him in writing it must have been such as knew the truth of these facts. Wherefore, they could be neither the brethren of Corinth, nor of Ephesus, nor of Rome, nor of Troas, nor of any other Gentile city where this epistle hath been dated, except Antioch. As little could they be the brethren who accompanied the apostle in his travels among the Gentiles, as Hammond conjectures: For none of them, except Silas, had any knowledge of the facts advanced in this epistle, but what they received from the apostle himself; so that their testimony was, in reality, the apostle's own testimony. The only brethren who could bear effectual testimony to these things, were those who lived in Judea and its neighbourhood; particularly the brethren of Antioch, who, by their intercourse with those of Jerusalem, must have known what had happened to Paul there, as fully as they knew what happened to him in their own city, where he had resided often and long. I therefore have no doubt that the epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch, and that the brethren who joined Paul in writing it were the brethren there, whose testimony merited the highest credit. For among them were various professed and learned, whose names are mentioned Acts xxii. i. with others of respectable characters, whose place of residence, early conversion, eminent station in the church, and intercourse with the brethren in Jerusalem, gave them an opportunity of knowing Paul's manner of life before his conversion; his being made an apostle by Christ himself; his being acknowledged as an apostle by his brethren in Jerusalem; his teaching uniformly that men are saved by faith without obedience to the law of Moses; his having strenuously maintained that doctrine in the hearing of the church at Antioch; his having publicly reproved Peter for seeming to depart from it, by refusing to eat with the converted Gentiles; and that, on being reproved by Paul, Peter acknowledged his misconduct by making no reply. All these things the brethren of Antioch could attest, as matters which they knew and believed; so that with the greatest propriety they joined the apostle in writing the letter wherein they are asserted.

3. That the epistle to the Galatians was written after the council of Jerusalem, and before Paul set out from Antioch on his second apostolical journey, appears from his not giving the Galatians any exhortations therein, or direction concerning the collection for the saints. At the time Paul went into Galatia from Tarsus, he does not seem to have planned that collection. Neither had he it in view when he went into Phrygia and Galatia, with Barnabas, from Ly西亚. What first suggested the idea to him was, if I mistake not, the exhortation of the apostles, when they gave him the right hands of fellowship, and agreed that he should go among the Gentiles, namely, 'that he would remember the poor;' that is, remember to make collections among the converted Gentiles, for the poor of the saints in Judea. Or he may have formed the resolution, in consequence of some conversation on the subject which he had with the three apostles before he left Jerusalem. But in whatever manner it originated, as Paul doth not seem to have formed that resolution till he went up to the council, and conversed with the other apostles, he could not with propriety mention it to the Galatians in any letter, till he had explained the matter to them in conversation. And this I doubt not the apostle did, when he carried to the decrees of the council in his second apostolical journey through Phrygia and Galatia. And the Galatians, having agreed to make the collections, he directed them in what manner to make them with the least inconvenience to themselves; and no doubt received from them their collections, when he went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, in his way to Ephesus, as mentioned Acts xviii. 23.—Or if any of the Galatian and Phrygian churches had not then finished their collections, they may have sent them to him during his three years' abode in Ephesus. These things I infer from the following circumstances: In his first epistle to the Corinthians, chapter xvi. 1, 2. which was written from Ephesus after he had gone over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, he mentioned the directions concerning the method of making the collections, which he had given to the Galatians before he wrote that letter, and desired the Corinthians to follow these directions in making their collections. Wherefore, as he did not after that go into Galatia, but went from Ephesus to Corinth, and from Corinth straightway to Jerusalem with the collections, he must have received the collections of the Galatian churches in the manner I have described.

4. When the apostle wrote his epistle to the Galatians, he had heard of the defection of some of them from the true doctrine of the gospel. This defection he represents as having happened soon after they were converted, Gal. i. 6. 'I wonder that ye are so soon removed from him who called you into the grace of Christ.' But if the epistle to the Galatians was written either from Rome, during the apostle's first confinement there; or from Corinth, during his eighteen months' abode in that city; or from Ephesus, where he abode three years; or from Troas, in his way to Jerusalem with the collections—the defection of the Galatians must have happened a considerable time after their conversion, even on the supposition that they were first called when Paul and Barnabas went into their country from Ly西亚. Wherefore, if the apostle's expression, 'I wonder that ye are so soon removed,' is proper, the epistle to the Galatians could not be written later than the interval between the council of Jerusalem and the apostle's second journey into the Gentile countries with Silas, when they delivered to the churches the decrees of the council.

The foregoing arguments for the early date of the epistle to the Galatians, afford to that date a degree of probability not usually obtained in a matter so dark and so remote.—Supposing, then, that this epistle was written soon after the council of Jerusalem, the apostle at Antioch may have heard of the defection of the Galatians, by letters from some of the faithful among them, which he received before he went to the council. Or he may have been informed of it in Jerusalem, during the council, by some who had lately come from Galatia. And after he returned to Antioch, he may have written this epistle to the Galatians by Titus, notwithstanding he resolved to visit them soon, for the purpose of delivering the decrees of the council. For the danger they were in from the false teachers, and the number of those who already had gone over to Judaism, made it necessary that the apostle should write immediately, to reclaim those who had apostatized, and to prevent others from following their example.

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion of Writing the Epistle to the Galatians.

Not long after the Galatians embraced the gospel, certain Jewish Christians, zealous for the law of Moses, came among them, and taught them, unless they were circumcised and obeyed the law, they could not be
The doctrine of the Judaizers concerning the necessity of circumcision to men's salvation, the apostle termed another gospel, or rather he declared it to be no gospel at all; because the Judaizers, utterly ignorant of the nature and efficacy of Christ's death, affirmed that the gospel had no sacrifice for sin; and that pardon and justification were only to be obtained through the Levitical stones; for which reason they exhorted the Galatians to be circumcised, that they might be entitled to the benefit of these stones. However, as they acknowledged Jesus to be a prophet sent of God, and considered his doctrines and precepts as an excellent institute of morality, they did not require the Galatians to renounce the gospel, but exhorted them to join the law with it, that by adopting the expiatory rites of the law, the gospel might be rendered a complete and effectual form of religion.

Some however of the Galatians, better instructed, opposed these errors as contrary to the doctrine of Paul, whom they still respected as their spiritual father. Therefore, the Judaizers, to lessen his credit, represented to the Galatians, that he was none of those who had accompanied Jesus during his ministry on earth; and from that circumstance they inferred that he was no apostle, or at best an apostle of men; that he received his commission to preach the gospel from the brethren at Antioch, or from the apostles at Jerusalem; that any knowledge of the gospel which he possessed, had been communicated to him by those who gave him his commission; that very little regard was due to the doctrine of such a teacher; that the apostles who accompanied Christ in his lifetime, being well acquainted with the true nature of the gospel, had a better claim to be followed, especially Peter, James, and John, who, as the false teachers affirmed, themselves obeyed the law, and enjoined it to all, as necessary to salvation; and that if Paul taught differently from them, it might be presumed, either that he did not rightly understand their doctrine, or that he did not faithfully interpret it. They even went so far as to affirm, that Paul himself had now changed his doctrine, and preached the necessity of circumcision, chap. v. 11.

To these calumnies the Galatians gave the more heed, that Paul's apostleship was not generally known in the church at that time. And as a few were already driven away, and others were in danger of following, it is not improbable, that some of the faithful among them judged it necessary to give the apostle an account of the Galatian churches, in a letter, which, as was formerly observed, he may have received at Antioch, before he went to the council of Jerusalem. Or the matter may have been discovered to him in Jerusalem, by some of the brethren who had lately come from Galatia. For soon after his return from the council to Antioch, he wrote, as I suppose, this letter, in which he rebuked the churches of Galatia with that authority and sharpness which, as their spiritual father, he was entitled to use in correcting their errors. In this letter also, by appealing to the reception which he met with from the apostles in Jerusalem, and to a variety of other facts, but especially by relating how he withstood Peter publicly at Antioch, for separating himself from the converted Gentiles on account of their not being circumcised, (all which facts the brethren at Antioch, who joined him in this letter, attested,) he effectually overcame the calumnies of his enemies, and established his own apostleship and authority in the clearest manner.

Then, by a variety of arguments taken from the Hebrew scriptures, he completely confuted the error of the Judaizers who inculcated circumcision, that is, obedience to the law of Moses, as necessary to salvation.

Here it may be proper to observe, that although the subject treated of, in the epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians, be the doctrine of justification by faith, the two epistles differ materially in this respect, that the epistle to the Romans was written to prove the justification of men by faith without works of law, that is, without a perfect obedience to the law of God written on men's hearts; whereas, the epistle to the Galatians was designed to prove, that men are justified by faith without the works of the law of Moses. This appears from the following, among other passages: Gal. iii. 2. 'This only would I learn from you: By the works of the law received ye the Spirit? or by the obedience of faith? That is, by performing the rites of the law of Moses, or by obeying the gospel, which requires faith in order to justification! 3. Are ye so senseless, that having begun in the Spirit, ye now make yourselves perfect by the flesh? 5. He then who supplied to you the Spirit, and wrought miracles among you, did he do these on account of the works of the law, or on account of the obedience of faith? Here, the opposition between the works of the law and the obedience of faith, and between the Spirit and the flesh, plainly sheweth, that by the law, in this discourse, the apostle means the law of Moses. Or if any doubt remains on the subject, it will be removed by attending to the apostle's reasoning in the following part of the chapter: where, having proved that the justification of sinners by faith was established in the covenant with Abraham, he told the Judaizers, ver. 17, that the law, which was given long after the promise, could not annul the promise, by introducing a method of justification different from that established by the promise. The following passages in like manner shew, that in this epistle the law means the law of Moses. Gal. iv. 21. 'Tell me, ye who wish to be under the law, why do ye not understand the law? Gal. v. 1. 'Stand fast, therefore, in the freedom wherewith Christ hath freed us; and be not again held fast in the yoke of bondage. 2. Behold, I Paul say to you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing. 3. And I testify, moreover, to every circumcised person, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. 4. Ye are separated from Christ who are justified by the law: ye are fallen from grace.' In short, the whole strain of the reasoning in the epistle to the Galatians sheweth, that the apostle's design in writing it was to prove against the Jews, that none of them could be justified by the works of the law of Moses. That law required perfect obedience to all its precepts, moral and ceremonial, under the penalty of the curse, from which the stoning and purification prescribed by Moses had no influence to deliver the sinner. Whereas, in his epistle to the Romans, the apostle treats of justification on a more enlarged plan: his design being to prove against both Jews and Gentiles, that neither the one nor the other can be justified meritoriously by performing works of law, that is, the works which the law of God, written on men's hearts, enjoins; but all must be justified gratuitously by faith, through the obedience of Christ. See Rom. viii. 1. Wherefore, the two epistles taken together form a complete proof, that justification is not to be obtained meritoriously, either by works of morality, or by rites and ceremonies, though of divine appointment; but is a free gift, proceeding entirely from the mercy of God, to those who are qualified by faith to receive it.

In writing on these subjects to the Galatians, it must be confessed the apostle shewed great anxiety and earnestness, and even a considerable degree of displeasure with his adversaries. But in so doing he is by no means blamable. For if he had not vindicated himself from the calumnies propagated by his enemies, where would have been the authority of his discourses and writings? And what use could they have been of to the world as a rule of faith! And with respect to circumcision, and obedience to the law of Moses, if the Judaizers had been allowed to establish these as necessary to salvation, Judaism, as was observed in the Preface to the Romans, page 50, would have been the religion of the world, to the utter subversion of Christianity. In a word, of all the questions respecting religion which were agitated in the first age, this, concerning the justification of sinners by faith without the works of the law of Moses, was the most interesting. By the establishment of that doctrine, a bulwark was raised against the re-entering of those superstitions which disfigured the preceding forms of religion. For if the sacrifices and ceremonies of the law of Moses, which were all of divine appointment, had no efficacy in procuring the pardon of sin, none of the rites of men's invention, on which the superstitious set such a value, can have any influence in procuring that blessing. Besides, on the right determination of this question the comfort of the Gentile converts in the first age, and their hope of salvation, hinged. No wonder then that Paul, to whom Christ had committed the conversion and instruction of the Gentiles, was zealous in teaching the doctrine of justification, without the works of the law of Moses; and in boldly reproving, and even threatening those who taught the contrary doctrine, agreeably to the injunction which he afterwards gave to Titus in a similar case, Tit. i. 13. 'Rebuke them sharply, that they may be healthy in the faith.'

The erroneous doctrines of the Judaizing teachers, and the calamities which they spread for the purpose of discrediting Paul as an apostle, no doubt occasioned great uneasiness of mind to him and to the faithful in that age; and did much hurt, at least for a while, among the Galatians. But, in the issue, these evils have proved of no small service to the church in general. For by obliging the apostle to produce the evidences of his apostleship, and to relate the history of his life, especially after his conversion, we have obtained the fullest assurance of his being a real apostle, called to the office by Jesus Christ himself, and acknowledged to be an apostle by them who were apostles before him; consequently we are assured, that our faith in the doctrines of the gospel, as taught by him, (and it is he who hath taught the peculiar doctrines of the gospel most fully), is not built on the credit of men, but on the authority of the Spirit of God, by whom Paul was inspired in the whole of the doctrine which he hath delivered to the world. See Pref. to 2 Corinthians, sect. 2, page 211.

Page 211. The latter of these two letters is directed to the churches of Galatia, it was to be read publicly in every church. We may therefore suppose, that it was sent first to the brethren in Anticyra, the chief city of Galatia, with an order to them to communicate it to the other churches, in the same manner as the first epistle to the Thessalonians was appointed to be read to all the holy brethren in that city, and in the province of Macedonia. See Prelim. Ess. ii. page 22.

I have hinted above, that Titus was the bearer of the epistle to the Galatians. My reasons for that conjecture are 1. That Titus, being a Greek, was greatly interested in the doctrine which this epistle was written to establish, and would willingly undertake the office of carrying it to the Galatians, more especially as he was mentioned in its name. 2. Having been present in Jerusalem with Paul at the council, he could by word of mouth attest the things which happened in Jerusalem, to which the apostle appealed in proof of his own apostleship, and in proof of the doctrine which he uniformly taught. And that doctrine Titus could not doubt confirmed, by relating to the Galatians, that Paul resisted the Judaizers in Jerusalem when they attempted to have Titus himself circumcised. Moreover, if the reader think Titus was not the bearer of this letter, he may suppose it was sent by the person who brought the apostle word of the defection of the Galatian brethren, which occasioned its being written.

Sect. IV.—Of Paul and Barnabas's Journey to Jerusalem, mentioned Gal. ii. 1, and of the Decree passed by the Council of Jerusalem respecting the converted Gentiles.

According to the general opinion, the occasion of the apostle's journey to Jerusalem, mentioned Gal. ii. 1, is related Acts xvi. 1, as follows: 'And certain men, who came down from Judea, taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised according to the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved.' 2. When, therefore, Paul and Barnabas had no small discussion and disputations with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question.'—Some of the things which happened to these messengers in Jerusalem after their arrival, Paul mentioned to the Galatians, chap. ii. 2—10. But he said nothing of the decision which the apostles and elders gave concerning the matter referred to them by the brethren of Antioch. Our knowledge of that decision, and of the deliberation which preceded it, we owe to Luke, who tells us, their decision was directed to the brethren of the Gentiles who were in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia; and that it was expressed in the following terms: Acts xv. 28. 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things: that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which, if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well.' This decision or decree hath given rise to much controversy. For, according to many, the brethren of the Gentiles, to whom the apostles directed their decree, were the whole Gentile converts without distinction. But others contend, that they were the converts from that class of Gentiles who were called proselytes by the Jews. The determination of this point involves some important consequences, and merits to be examined with care.

And, first of all, the account which Moses hath given of the character and obligations of the different sorts of persons who lived with the Jews in the land of Canaan, must be considered. He hath mentioned them under the denominations of, The circumcised stranger; The sojourning stranger; and The alien or foreigner.—The circumcised stranger was in every respect a Jew. For it is declared, Exod. xii. 49, 48, and elsewhere, that 'to the home born, and to the circumcised stranger, there is one law.' Hence the circumcised strangers were called strangers within the covenant, and strangers. The LXX. call them Προσελκυσμένοι, Proselytes, by way of eminence; and of them our Lord spake when he said to the Pharisees, Matt. xxii. 15, ' Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte.'—The sojourning stranger went by the name of The stranger within their gates. In the Greek language they were denominated Παρακτησίως, Sojourners. In the history of the Acts of the Apostles this sort of strangers are called Religious, or worshipping proselytes. To know who 'the brethren of the Gentiles' were to whom the apostles and elders directed their decision, it will be of use to consider the duties and privileges of those Gentiles who were called sojourners, strangers, and worshipping proselytes. Their duties are described by Moses as follows:—'They were bound, 1. To observe all the moral and judicial precepts of the law, whereby injuries were restrained, and crimes were punished, and justice in dealings was maintained, Num. xix. 20.—2. To worship no God but the God of Israel. For idolatry was forbidden to every inhabitant of Canaan, under the pain of death. Levit. xxvi. 1; Deut. xxvii. 15. And because the partaking with the heathens in the feasts on their sacrifices, was a joining with them in their idolatry, the stranger within their gates, was to abstain from all such meats. In short, the absolute renunciation of idolatry was the condition on which any stranger or Gentile was permitted to dwell among the Israelites. To abstain from blood, whether pure or mixed, under the pain of death, Levit. x. 10, and from every thing that had been strangled, with the intention to keep the blood in it, ver. 13: But all the other kinds of food which were prohibited to the Israelites they were permitted to eat; and therefore, it was unlawful for the Israelites to go into their houses, and to eat with them, Acts x. 28.—4. To abstain in particular was the Israelite from adulteries, marriages and unnatural lusts, called, in the Hebrew language Zuzuth, and in the Greek He Capheus, Levit. xxi. 26.—5. To eat no leavened bread during the passover week. Exod. xii. 19, although such strangers were not allowed to eat the passover, ver. 43: unless they submitted to be circumcised, ver. 48.—6. To keep the Sabbath, Exod. xx. 10, because it was instituted to preserve the memory of the creation of the world, six days, and of God's resting on the seventh. They were likewise bound to observe the fast of the 10th of the seventh month, Levit. xvi. 29, and the feast of weeks, Deut. xvi. 11—14.

With respect to the privileges of the sojourning strangers, or worshipping proselytes, we know, that by observing the above-mentioned precepts they were entitled to a variety of civil privileges: Such as,—1. A right to live among the Israelites, and to enjoy the protection of the laws, and to be exempted from oppression, Levit. xxiii. 33, 34. And the Israelites to exercise humanity and compassion towards them, in all their dealings with them, Exod. xii. 21, xiii. 12; Deut. x. 18—2. They had an equal share in the sacrifices of the Israelites, Numb. xxxv. 15—3. They had a right to join in such parts of the worship of the God of Israel as were in use among the patriarchs; and which were not peculiar to the Mosaic economy. For example, they might offer burnt-offerings, Levit. x. 8; Numb. xv. 15, 16. In later times, even those heathens who did not live in Canaan were permitted to offer sacrifices to the God of Israel: as is evident from Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 3. Bell. ii. 12, 6; and for that purpose they came up to the Jewish festivals, John xii. 20. Likewise the stranger, or worshipping proselyte, had a right to pray to God in the temple, and in the synagogues through the land: For the outer court of the temple was appropriated to their use. Accordingly, at the dedication of the temple, Solomon, in his prayer, mentioned the stranger coming from a far country to worship, 1 Kings viii. 41. See also Mark xi. 17. The proselytes also seem to have prayed in their own houses, at the hours of the morning and evening sacrifices, Acts x. 3, 4, at which times the Jews likewise prayed.4. The worshipping proselyte had a right to hear the law read and explained at the great festivals, Deut. xxxxi. 12: consequently they were entitled to hear the scriptures read in the synagogues. Allowing that some of the proselytes, were purely religious, and that several of these were employed in the various industries of the Jewish nation, I am inclined to agree in opinion with those who think the decree of the apostles and elders had for its object those Gentiles who, having been formerly worshipping proselytes, had embraced the gospel, and not the converts from idolatry. My reasons for being of this opinion are these,—

1. The arguments used by Peter and James, in the council, make it probable that the converted proselytes, and not the converted idolaters, were the brethren of the Gentiles concerning whom the apostles and elders deliberated, and whom by their decree they bound to observe the four precepts mentioned in it; while they declared them free from all the other precepts of the law of Moses. For example, when Peter said in the council, Acts xv. 7. 'God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel and believe,' he evidently spake of Cornelius and his company, none of whom were idolatrous Gentiles at that time, but devout men who feared God,' Acts x. 2. And when, after James had declared, how God at the first did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name, he plainly spake of Cornelius and his company,—Peter had, he told them, that the calling of Cornelius and his friends by Peter, had happened in fulfilment of the words of the prophet Amos, chap. ix. 11, 12, which he thus expressed, Acts xv. 16. 'I will return, and will build the tabernacle of David; 17. That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord.' Wherefore, since the idolatrous Gentiles were not called by the name of God, the Gentiles in after-times, on whom God's name was to be called, and who were to seek after the Lord, were not idolatrous, but devout Gentiles, worshippers of the true God. Consequently, when James added, ver. 19. 'My sentence is, that we trouble not them who from among the Gentiles are turned to God,' he spake not of the idolatrous, but of the devout Gentiles or proselytes, who were more perfectly turned to God by believing the gospel.

2. This is still more clear from the reason which James assigned for enjoining the Gentiles who were turned to God to observe the four precepts mentioned in the decree: Acts xv. 21. 'For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day.' Did Moses anywhere in his law enjoin all the Gentiles to abstain from the pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood? Moses delivered no precept whatever to the Gentiles, Rom. iii. 19. Wherefore, that Moses was preached and read in the synagogues in every city, was no reason why the converted idolaters should have been enjoined to obey the four precepts mentioned by James. But if he spake of the converted proselytes, his reasoning is conclusive. It is as if he had said, Though we free the converted proselytes from circumcision in the same manner that they were free from it by Moses, we must write to them to abstain from the pollutions of idols, &c. because these precepts being enjoined by Moses to the proselytes, if they neglect them, and the reading of him in the synagogues every Sabbath, making the Jews sensible that these converts have forfeited their rights as proselytes, they will banish them out of Judea.

3. That the decree of the apostles and elders related to the converted proselytes, and not to the converted idolaters, will be acknowledged, if the conversion of the idolaters was not generally known in Jerusalem at the time the apostles and elders met to consider of the circumcision of the Gentiles. That their conversion was then a secret, appears from what Paul told the Galatians, chap. iii. 3. namely, that when he came to Jerusalem 'he communicated that gospel which he preached to the Gentiles, to them who were of reputation, but privately, lest perhaps he had run, or should run in vain.' Therefore, though it be said, Acts x. 3. that Paul and Barnabas declared 'the conversion of the Gentiles,' as they passed through Phœnix and Samaria in their way to Jerusalem, the secrecy observed by Paul, when he communicated to the three chief apostles the gospel which he preached to the Gentiles, obliges us to suppose, that by the conversion of the Gentiles Luke meant the conversion of the proselyted Gentiles, a sense in which the term Gentiles is often used by him in his history of the Acts. See chap. x. 45. xi. 1. 18. xii. 32. See also Mark xi. 17.

4. That the decree related to the converted proselytes, and not to the converted idolaters, may be argued from this circumstance:—That if it related to the whole body of the converted Gentiles, the four precepts enjoined by the decree are necessary to all Christians at this day, and to the end of the world, as a term of salvation; consequently, all who profess the gospel ought to abstain from eating blood, and things strangled, and meats offered to idols, notwithstanding St. Paul hath declared, 1 Tim. iv. 4. 'That every creature of God is good, being received with thanksgiving, and nothing to be cast away.'—Rom. xiv. 17. 'That no meat is unclean in itself.'—1 Cor. vi. 12. 'That all meats are lawful,' to every believer.—Rom. xiv. 17. 'That the kingdom of God is not meat and drink.'—1 Cor. vii. 8. That the eating, or not eating, of this or that kind of meat, does not recommend any one to God. 1 Cor. x. 25. That the circumcision of the Gentiles might eat 'whatever was sold in the shambles,' and, ver. 27. 'whatever was set before them' in the houses of the heathens, 'saking no question' about its having been offered to idols. Lastly, That in none of the places of Paul's epistles where he hath spoken of meats, is there the least intimation that the eating of things strangled, and of blood, and of meats offered to idols, except in the idol's temple as an act of worship, is forbidden to Christians. From all which I conclude, that the prohibition in the decree related to none of the brethren of the Gentiles, but the converted proselytes only.

Perhaps it will be said, that the four precepts were not enjoined in the decree as things necessary to salvation, but as necessary on account of the prejudices of the Jewish believers; and that the obligation of these precepts was only temporary. To this I answer, I. That at the time the apostle Paul in his epistle declared all meats lawful, the prejudices of the Jewish believers were as strong as ever.—2. That neither in the history of the Acts, nor anywhere else in the New Testament, is there the least hint of the abrogation of the decree. On the contrary, we are told, Acts xxii. 21. that when Paul came to Jerusalem with the collections, James and the elders told him, the Jewish believers who were zealous of the law had been informed, that he taught all the Jews who lived among the Gentiles to forsake Moses; and therefore advised him to quiet their minds, by observing a solemn public rite of the law, in order to convince them that he himself walked orderly, and kept the law. This advice Paul readily complied with; having never taught that the law of Moses, as the municipal law of Judea, was to be forsaken by the Jews or the proselytes. What he taught everywhere was, that the keeping of the law of Moses was not necessary to the salvation either of Jews or Gentiles; and, that if any man sought salvation by keeping the law, Christ would profit him nothing, Gal. v. 2. 4.

To prevent this fourth argument from being misunderstood, it is proper to add, that by restricting the decree to the converted proselytes, and by teaching that it laid no obligation on any other denomination of believers, it is not meant to imitate that formication, like the eating of things strangled and of blood, was by the decree allowed to the converted idolaters. All Christians ever were, and still are bound to abstain from incestuous marriages, unnatural lusts, and every species of fornication. But their obligation to abstain from those vices, doth not arise from having been forbidden to the Israelites and proselytes by Moses, but from their being expressly forbidden by Christ and his apostles. At the death of Christ, the law of Moses was abolished in all its parts, to all mankind, as a religious institution, Coloss. ii. 14. note 5. Wherefore, no one is obliged to perform moral duty, because it was enjoined by Moses, but because it is written on men's hearts, and is enjoined by Christ; who in his gospel hath renewed the moral precepts of the law of Moses with greater efficacy than they were enjoined to the Jews, having established them on better promises than were held forth in the law.

5. That 'the brethren of the Gentiles,' who were bound by the decree, were the converted proselytes alone, may be argued from the reproof which Paul gave to Peter, for refusing to eat with the Gentiles in Antioch.

After the council, Peter followed Paul to Antioch, and did eat with the Gentiles, before certain persons came from James; but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself. For this Paul blamed him openly, as compelling the Gentiles to Judaize. I ask, did Paul mean that Peter compelled the Gentiles to observe the four precepts enjoined in the decree? If the decree was general, we cannot doubt that all the converted Gentiles in Antioch were observing these precepts when Peter withdrew from them, and did not need to be compelled to observe them. And if they were not observing them, Peter did right to compel them; and was not to be blamed for so doing. Or, by Peter's compelling the Gentiles to Judaize, did Paul mean, that he compelled them to receive circumcision, which Peter compelled the Gentiles, by separating himself from them after the council passed their decree, cannot be understood on the supposition that their decree related to the whole body of the Gentiles; but it may easily be explained, if it related to the converted proselytes only. For when the converts from idolatry began to multiply in Antioch, through the labours of Paul and Barnabas, it is natural to think, that after the council of Jerusalem had bound the converted proselytes to observe the four precepts as formerly, the zealous Jewish believers in Antioch would insist, that the converts from idolatry ought to be put on the same footing with the converted proselytes, and be obliged to obey the four precepts: that the brethren of Antioch consulted James on the question, who, it would seem, sent them word by their messengers, that the converted idolaters were bound by the decree equally with the proselytes; that the idolatrous Gentiles, rightly instructed by Paul, refused to observe these precepts; and that on their refusal, Peter, who happened to be then in Antioch, withdrew from them; although, before the messengers returned from James, he had gone into their houses, and eaten with them. This conduct Paul justly condemned, as a compelling the converts from idolatry to Judaize, that is, to obey the four precepts as necessary to salvation, contrary to the truth of the gospel. For the idolatrous Gentiles having no connexion with the commonwealth of Israel, were under no obligation whatever to obey the law of Moses; and therefore, if any part of that law was bound on them by Peter, it must have been as a term of salvation, contrary to that freedom from the law of Moses wherewith Christ had made the idolatrous Gentiles free.

These arguments, if I am not mistaken, prove that 'the brethren of the Gentiles,' about whom the apostles and elders in Jerusalem deliberated, and concerning whom they passed their decree, were not converted idolaters, but converted proselytes. And I have been at the pains to establish this fact, First, Because it shows us that the four precepts enjoined in the decree were, as they are called in the decree, necessary things to the converted proselytes only; not however as terms of salvation, but to entitle them to those political privileges which were granted to them by the law of Moses. It is true, however, that consequently, these were not religious but political precepts, whose obligation was confined to the converted proselytes, and expired when that class of men ceased to exist. Secondly, because this decree, contrary to the intention of those who framed it, affording a plausible pretence to the Jews for insisting that all the Gentile brethren were bound to observe the law of Moses, the right knowledge of the persons who were bound by that decree will make us sensible, that the controversy concerning the obligation of the law of Moses, which rent all the Gentile churches in the first age, was determined by the apostle Paul according to the mind of his brethren apostles, and according to true, when he taught, that after the death of Christ, the obligation which lay on the Jews themselves to obey the law of Moses, arose merely from its being the municipal law of Judea. Thirdly, the right knowledge of the purpose for which the four precepts mentioned in the apostolical decrees, were enjoined on the converted proselytes, will convince us, that Paul’s practice, with respect to the law of Moses, was perfectly consistent with his doctrine concerning that law, and with the truth of the gospel, which made no alteration in any person’s political state. His doctrine was, that every one ought to continue in the political state wherein he had been called. Wherefore, when he exhorted the Jewish converts to continue subject to the law of Moses, it was only because it was the municipal law of Judea, which as good citizens they were bound to obey. For the same reason, he himself always obeyed the law whilst he resided in Judea. And even in the Gentile countries where the Jews were numerous, he observed the distinction of meats and days appointed by Moses, that he might gain the Jews to Christ. And when he came to Jerusalem with the collections, because a report prevailed, Acts xx. 21., that he taught all the Jews who were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying, That they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs,” he, by the advice of James, assisted certain Nazarites to discharge their vow; and thereby showed the falsehood of the report which was spread concerning him. The truth is, he nowhere taught any of the Jews to forsake the law of Moses, and that whoever sought salvation by obedience to that law, separated himself from Christ, and was therefore, when he himself obeyed the law, and advised others to do so, it was not as a term of salvation, but merely as a matter of political obligation.
Galatians.

In giving to the assembly of the apostles, and elders, and brethren of the church of Jerusalem, who met to deliberate concerning the circumcision of the converted Gentiles, the appellation of The Council of Jerusalem, I have followed the ancient ecclesiastical writers, who generally gave it that name. Nor is the appellation improper. For though it was inferior to those assemblies which in after-times were dignified with the title of Council in this respect, that it was composed of members from one church only, it far surpassed them in all the quality of its members, and in the authority of its decisions. It was composed of all the apostles who were then in Jerusalem, men endowed with the continued inspiration of the Spirit of God; and of the elders of the church of Jerusalem, most, if not all of them. men upon whom the Holy Ghost fell on the memorable day of Pentecost; and of the brethren of the greatest note in that church, chosen by the different bodies of the faithful in Jerusalem, who assembled in separate places for the worship of God. Hence those brethren are called, in the preambles to the decrees, Acts xv. 22, 25. ‘chosen men’; and ver. 22. ‘chief men among the brethren.’ In short, the Council of Jerusalem, consisting of such men, was a more respectable assembly than any council which hath met since, or which will ever meet again. And its decisions are, without doubt, of greater authority than the decisions of those councils who have called themselves Oecumenical, because composed of members gathered from the greatest part of the Christian world; and Holy, on the feigned pretence that their decisions were dictated by the Holy Ghost.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Facts asserted in this Chapter.

Because the false teachers had called Paul an apostle of men, and had said that he was made an apostle by the church at Antioch, or at best by the apostles in Jerusalem, he began his letter with affirming, that he was not an apostle of men, but an apostle appointed by Jesus Christ himself, and by God the Father who raised Jesus from the dead, ver. 1. —By mentioning the resurrection of Jesus, St. Paul glanced at the miraculous manner in which he himself was made an apostle by Christ after his resurrection; and of which Luke hath given an account, Acts ix. 3—9. He alluded to it likewise, ver. 5, where he calls it ‘God’s revealing his Son to him.’ So that St. Paul, both in respect of the time and of the manner of his being raised to the apostolic office, instead of being inferior, was superior to the other apostles: Christ came from heaven, by the appointment of his Father, to qualify him for that office, and to confer on it upon him. Next he told the Galatians, that all the brethren who were with him, joined him in this letter; by which he intimated, that they attested the whole of the facts he was going to relate, ver. 2. Then expressed his surprise, that the Galatians were so soon removed from his doctrine to another gospel, ver. 6. —which he told them was no gospel at all, ver. 7. —And because the false teachers affirmed, that, after conversing with the apostles in Jerusalem, Paul had become sensible of his error, and now enjoined circumcision, chap. v. 11. he twice anathematized every one who preached contrary to what they had heard him preach, though it were himself, or an angel from heaven, who did it, ver. 8, 9. —Then asked his opponents, whether, in so speaking, he endeavoured to please men or God? ver. 10. —It seems the Judaisers had represented him to the Galatians, as one who suited his doctrine to the inclinations of his hearers; a columny which they hoped would be believed, as Paul’s apostolical character was not then generally known. Besides, the Judaisers were for the most part bad men, and capable of affirming any falsehood which they thought would promote their views.

Further, the apostle’s enemies pretended, not only that he was an apostle sent forth by men, but that he was taught the gospel by Ananias, or by the brethren at Antioch, or by the apostles at Jerusalem. For he solemnly averred, that he received the gospel from no man, nor body of men whatever, but from Christ himself, ver. 11. —And in proof of that aversion, he appealed to his manner of life, both before and after his conversion, as a thing well known: That before his conversion he furiously persecuted the church, ver. 13. —and was exceedingly zealous of the traditions of Moses, chap. iv. 14. in that period, therefore, of his life, he had neither opportu-

Ver. 1—An apostle, not from men.—Perhaps in this Paul glanced at Matthias, who was an apostle sent from a general meeting at Jerusalem, as mentioned Acts 1, 19. Or his meaning may be, that he was not sent forth, nor did he claim the apostleship from the brethren of Antioch. See note 3 on this verse.

2. Neither by man. Here Paul seems to have had Peter and James in his eye, whom alone he saw as his first coming to Jerusalem after his conversion, and desire that he was appointed an apostle.

3. But by Jesus Christ. Paul was first made an apostle by Christ, when he appeared to him in the way to Damascus, Acts 9:15. And three years after that, his apostolical commission was renewed, Acts 22:11. So that he was sent forth, neither by the church at Jerusalem, nor by that at Antioch. The Holy Ghost, indeed, ordered the prophets at Antioch, Acts xxi. 8, to separate Paul and Barnabas, but it was to the work whereunto he had called them formerly. This separation was simply a recommending them to the grace of God by prayer. And, in fact, it is so termed. Acts xv. 36.

Ver. 2. All the brethren who are with me. The brethren here mentioned were the brethren of Antioch, especially those who were the apostle's fellow-servants in the gospel. So the word brethren is used in Phil. iii. 3. To separate Paul and Barnabas, but it was to the work whereunto he had called them formerly. This separation was simply a recommending them to the grace of God by prayer. And, in fact, it is so termed. Acts xxi. 36.

Ver. 3. To the churches of Galatia. Here it is remarkable, that the churches of Galatia are not, as the other churches to which Paul wrote, designated, the churches of God, or of Christ, perhaps to signify that office on him, a new convert of whose sincerity they had not as yet sufficient proof, ver. 20. After spending fourteen days with Peter, which was too short a space of time for him to be instructed by Peter in the knowledge of the gospel, he went into the countries of Syria and Cilicia, whither he was sent by the brethren, because the Jews in Jerusalem, exceedingly enraged against him for having deserted their party, and gone over to the Christian, sought to kill him, ver. 21. And from Cilicia, where he abode several years, he went, I suppose, into Galatia. Thus it came to pass, that for a long time after Paul's conversion he was personally unknown to the churches in Judea, who had heard nothing more concerning him, but that he who formerly persecuted the Christians, now preached the facts concerning Christ which he had formerly endeavoured to dispose of, ver. 22, 23. This great change of behaviour in so violent an enemy, occasioned the churches to glorify God on account of his conversion, ver. 21.

From these things it is evident, that when Paul went into Cilicia, and from Cilicia into Galatia, he had seen none of the apostles but two; and that he had never been at any general meeting of the apostles, to receive from them either the office of an apostle, or the doctrine of the gospel. And therefore, if he converted the Galatians in some journey which he made into their country from Cilicia, the doctrine which he preached, and the miracles which he wrought, must have been bestowed on him, not by man, but by Jesus Christ, and by God the Father, as he himself hath affirmed.

2. Paul an apostle, not sent forth from any society of men, neither appointed by any particular man, but by Jesus Christ, and by God the Father, who raised him from the dead, and after his resurrection sent him from heaven to make me an apostle;
there are, who, on pretence that their doctrine of justification by the law of Moses is authorized by God, trouble you with doubts concerning your profession, and wish to pervert the gospel of Christ. But even if we, or an angel from heaven, should preach to you a gospel contrary to what we have preached to you, let him be anathema. 2. As we said before, so now, (2 Tim. 2:17.) a second time I say, if any one preach to you a gospel contrary to what ye have received, (see Col. ii. 6.) note him be anathema. 3. (2 Pet. 3:9.) And now, do I make men my friends, or God? Or do I seek to please men? If indeed I still pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ. 4. Now I certify you, brethren, concerning the gospel which was preached by me, that it is not according to men. 5. For I neither received it from man, nor was I taught it, except by the revelation of Jesus Christ. 6. For I have received, (2 Tim. 3:14.) certainly, of my behaviour formerly in Judah; that I excessively persecuted the church of God, and laid it waste. 7. And made progress in Judaism above many of the same age with myself in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers. 8. But when God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, was pleased 9. To reveal his Son (2 Cor. xi. 23.) to me, that I might preach him to the heathen as risen from the dead, immediately I did not consult flesh and blood; 10. I should not be the servant of Christ.]—This is a cutting reproach to all those ministers who, under pretence of the doctrines of the gospel, fear of displeasing their hearers, or to gain popularity. 11. For I neither received it from man, nor was I taught it, except by the revelation of Jesus Christ. 12. For I neither received it from man, nor was I taught it, except by the revelation of Jesus Christ. 13. And laid it waste. [The word ἀναστάσεως being derived from ἀναστά, to raise, signifies to raise and destroy with great fury, as in the sinking of towns.] 14. And made progress in Judaism above many of the same age with myself in mine own nation; being more exceedingly zealous than any of them in maintaining the traditions of my fathers, in which, as a Pharisee, I placed the whole of my religion. 15. But when God, who separated me from my birth to be an apostle, and ordered my education with a view to that office, and who called me to it by his unmerited goodness, was pleased 16. To show his Son to me, that I might preach him to the heathen as risen from the dead, immediately after that I did not consult any man in Damascus, as having doubts concerning what I had seen, or as needing information concerning the gospel which I was called to preach.
17 Neither did I go up to Jerusalem to be instructed by them who were apostles before me: but I went away into Arabia, and again returned to Damascus.

18 Then, after three years, I went up to Jerusalem to become acquainted with Peter, and abide with him fifteen days.

19 But I saw no other of the apostles, except James the Lord’s brother. I 20 Now, the things I write to you, behold, before God, (Peter, 260.) assuredly, I do not falsely affirm.

21 After that I went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia:

22 And I was personally unknown to the churches of Judea which are in Christ.

23 But only they heard, that he who formerly persecuted us, now preached the faith which formerly he destroyed.

24 And they glorified God on my account.

Ver. 17. I went away into Arabia.—Luke, in his history of the Acts, takes no notice of the apostle’s journey into Arabia. But from the manner in which Acts 21. 3, it is mentioned here, it would seem that the apostle went into Arabia immediately after he recovered his sight and strength, which had been impaired by the light with which Christ was surrounded when he appeared to him, and by the manner in which he was cast out by that incommensurate appearance. Nevertheless, as we are told, Acts x. 9, that after Saul recovered his sight and strength, he was certain days with the disciples of Damascus, during which he preached Christ in the synagogues, we must interpret the word immediately, ver. 16. in such a manner as to admit, that after his conversion he spent a few days in preaching at Damascus, and then retired into Arabia; and that what is said, Acts iii. 22. Saul increased in note in strength, and confounded the Jews, &c. is an account of what happened after his return to Damascus from Arabia. See Harmony, Petrus, Observ. 5. And as Christ promised to tell Saul what he should do, Acts xxii. 10. we cannot doubt that it was by Christ’s direction he went into Arabia, to receive further revelations, and to inflame the discontents of the chief priests, who, as soon as they heard of his overthrowing the cause which he had persecuted, would endeavour to put him to death. Indeed, the Jews in general were so enraged against him for going over to the Christians, that when he returned from Arabia to Damascus, such of them as lived in that city took counsel to kill him. Acts xiv. 19. See also Acts x. 22. Ver. 18. To become acquainted with Peter.—This being Paul’s first visit to Jerusalem since his conversion, the brethren there shunned him, suspecting that he adorned himself a disciple, with a view to betray them. But Barnabas, who probably had heard the particulars of his conversion from Ananias, took him and brought him to the apostles, (Peter and James,) and declared to them how he had seen the Lord in the way, Acts xii. 24. It does not appear that on this occasion any thing was said, either by Barnabas or by Saul, concerning Christ making Saul an apostle, at the time he converted him, and concerning sending him to preach to the idolatrous Gentiles. Acts xvi. 10, 17. 18. Those things were not mentioned in Jerusalem till Paul went up to the council fourteen years after his conversion, Gal. ii. 2, 7, 8, 9.

19 James the Lord’s brother.—The Hebrews called all near relations brothers. This James was the son of Alphaeus by Mary the sister of our Lord’s mother. See the Pref. to the Epistle of James.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Facts related in this Chapter.

From the history which the apostle gave of himself to the Galatians in the preceding chapter, it appears, that from the time of his conversion to his coming with Barnabas from Tarsus to Antioch, he had no opportunity of converting with the apostles in a body; consequently, in that period he was not made an apostle by them. In like manner, by relating in this chapter what happened when he went up from Antioch to Jerusalem, fourteen years after his conversion, in company with Barnabas and Titus, a converted Gentile, he proved to the Galatians that he was an apostle, before he had that meeting with the apostles in a body, ver. 1. For, at that time, instead of receiving the gospel from the apostles, he communicated to them the gospel or doctrine which he preached among the idolatrous Gentiles; not because he acknowledged them his superiors, or was in any doubt about the matter; but lest it might have been suspected that his doctrine was disapproved by the apostles, which would have harmed his success among the Gentiles, ver. 2. And to show that the apostles to whom he communicated his gospel approved of it, he told the Galatians, that not even Titus who was with him, though an idolater before his conversion, was compelled by the apostles to be circumcised, although it was insisted on by the false brethren, who endeavoured to bring the Gentiles under bondage to the law, ver. 3. 4. And that he and Titus did not yield in the least to these false brethren, by obeying any part of the law as a condition of salvation, for so much as an hour; that the truth of the gospel might remain with the Galatians, and all the Gentiles, ver. 5. Next, to shew that the apostles of the greatest note were by no means superior to him, Paul affirmed that from them he received nothing. For however much they had been honoured by their Master formerly, these apostles added nothing either to his knowledge, or to his power, or to his authority as an apostle, ver. 6. But on the contrary, perceiving that he was commissioned to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, as Peter had been to preach it to the Jews, ver. 7.—because he who fitted Peter for preaching to the Jews, had fitted Paul for preaching to the Gentiles, by bestowing on him the gift of inspiration, and by enabling him, not only to work miracles in confirmation of his doctrine, but to communicate the spiritual gifts to his converts, ver. 8. They, knowing these things, instead of finding fault either with his doctrine or with his practice, James, Cephas, and John, who were the chief apostles in point of reputation, gave him the right hand of fellowship; thereby acknowledging him to be an apostle of equal authority with themselves, and equally commissioned by Christ to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, as they were to the Jews, ver. 9.—The only thing they desired of him was to exhibit the Gentiles to contribute for the relief of the poor, ver. 10. Moreover to make the Galatians fully sensible of his authority as an apostle, and of his knowledge in the gospel, Paul told them, when Peter came to Antioch under the council, he opposed him openly, because he was to be blamed, ver. 11. For, before certain persons zealous of the law came to Antioch from James, Peter, who had been taught by a vision to call no person unclean, did not eat with the converted idolatrous Gentiles; But when these zealous Jewish believers were come, he withdrew for fear of their displeasure, ver. 12. And others of the brethren in like manner dissembled in so much, that even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation, ver. 13. But this behaviour being contrary to the truth of the gospel, Paul publicly rebuked Peter for it, in the hearing of all the disciples at Antioch. And because, after giving him that reproof, he explained to the church the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the justification of sinners, he judged it proper to give the Galatians a short account of the things which he had said on that occasion, ver. 14-21. And as it does not appear that Peter, when thus reproved of Paul, offered any thing in his own defence, we may believe he knew the truth, and acknowledged publicly, that obedience to the law of Moses was not necessary to the salvation either of the Jews or of the Gentiles. Or, if he did not make this acknowledgment verbally, his silence on the occasion was equally expressive of the truth.

Peter's behaviour towards the idolatrous converts in Antioch, having proceeded, not from ignorance of the truth of the gospel, but from an unreasonable fear of the displeasure of the zealous Jewish brethren, it seems to show us, that one's knowledge is not always of itself sufficient to prevent one from falling into sin: as his denying his Master on a former occasion sheweth, that the resolutions which even good men, not constant followers of the justice of the Gospel, may at times for a season follow with the performance of the duty resolved on; but that, in every case, the assistance of God is necessary, to render one's knowledge of what is right, and his purpose to do it, effectual in practice; and that the person who hath made the greatest proficiency in knowledge and virtue, ought to be diffident of himself and humble, agreeably to Solomon's maxim, Prov. xlviii. 14. 'Happy is the man who feareth always.'

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. II. Then, within fourteen years from my conversion, I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, taking with me also Titus, one of the idolatrous Gentiles whom I had converted. (Ver. 3.)
2 And I went up by the direction of Christ; and after declaring in public the success of my ministry, I explained to the existence of the gospel depending on its decision, it was necessary to determine it in the most public and solemn manner possible. Accordingly, at this assembly, the apostles, the elders, and the church of Jerusalem, were present for the purpose of discussing the question. This assembly was not the same as the one at Antioch, but consisted of representatives from various provinces and cities. At this assembly, the apostles and elders were present, and the question of circumcision was discussed. The results of this assembly were recorded in Acts xxix. 27-12. This assembly was attended by the apostles and elders, as well as the Gentiles who were converts, and the latter were not required to observe the Mosaic law. The implications of this decision were far-reaching, and the Gentiles in Jerusalem, as well as those in all the churches, were required to observe the Mosaic law. Fortunately, Paul was not present at this assembly, as he was sent by the Gentiles to the church at Antioch at this time.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II. Then, within fourteen years from my conversion, I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, taking with me Titus also, one of the idolatrous Gentiles whom I had converted. (Ver. 3.) 2 And I went up by the direction of Christ; and after declaring in public the success of my ministry, I explained to the existence of the gospel depending on its decision, it was necessary to determine it in the most public and solemn manner possible. Accordingly, at this assembly, the apostles, the elders, and the church of Jerusalem, were present for the purpose of discussing the question. This assembly was not the same as the one at Antioch, but consisted of representatives from various provinces and cities. At this assembly, the apostles and elders were present, and the question of circumcision was discussed. The results of this assembly were recorded in Acts xxix. 27-12. This assembly was attended by the apostles and elders, as well as the Gentiles who were converts, and the latter were not required to observe the Mosaic law. The implications of this decision were far-reaching, and the Gentiles in Jerusalem, as well as those in all the churches, were required to observe the Mosaic law. Fortunately, Paul was not present at this assembly, as he was sent by the Gentiles to the church at Antioch at this time.
apostles the gospel which I preach to the Gentiles: But to avoid offense, I did it privately to them who were of greatest reputation, namely, Peter, James, and John, (ver. 4,) lest perhaps, being suspected to preach differently from them, my future and past labors might become useless.

3. However, (vs. 110) not even Titus, who was with me, (ver. 16,) though a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised,

4. (See 15, 108.) On account even of the secretly introduced false brethren, who came in privy to spy out our liberty which we have by Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage,

5. To whom we gave place by subjection, (vs. 110) not even for an hour, that the truth of the gospel might remain with you.

6. (As 15, 104.) Besides, from them who were of reputation (see ver. 2, note 2.) I received nothing, as an apostle. God does not show favor to men as regards external advantages. He did not raise them who attended Christ during his ministry, above me. For to me, they who were of reputation communicated nothing. (See Gal. 1, 16, note 1.)

7. But, on the contrary, perceiving that I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, even as Peter was with that of the circumcision;

8. (For he who wrought inwardly in Peter, (as 147,) in order to the apostleship of the circumcision, wrought inwardly also in me, in order to convert the Gentiles;)

9. And knowing the grace which was bestowed on me, James, and Cephas, and John, who were thought to be pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we more after they returned to Antioch from the council, but rather evidence to the contrary, Acts xxv. 39. that opinion cannot be admitted. —Bzas thought this a journey not mentioned in the Acts, but which Paul and Barnabas made to Jerusalem, after carrying the alms, and before they went to the council. His opinion he founded on this, that Peter could not have refused to eat with the Gentiles, since he represented Paul to have done so. This is true, but Peter’s behavior did not proceed from ignorance, but from fear; for he was equally well informed of the freedom of the Gentiles from the law, before the council as after it, as is plain from his speech in the council. And therefore his behavior is due to a spiritual Appendix, which it could be, if it proceeded from ignorance.

2. To them who were of reputation. —The Greeks, as Bzas observes, used the phrase κατασκοπή, men of appearance, for κατακόρολοι, those who were in high estimation with others. By afterwards adding εἰς τὴν, ver. 6, and κατασκοπή, ver. 9, the apostle, according to his usual manner, shews us how to complete the elliptical phrase.

3. In vain. —-This is an allusion to the race. For he is said to run in vain, who loses the prize.

Ver. 3. Was compelled. —H-yavvsw. This word here, as in several other passages, signifies to be compelled, not by force, but by strong persuasion. See ver. 14, and chap. vi. 12.

Ver. 1. On the account even of. —This clause must be joined with the last words of the preceding verse, in the following manner: —Was compelled to be circumcised, on account even of the secretly introduced false brethren. —As it. Bzas thinks it is here put for ἵνα, nempe. But this makes no difference in the sense. —As is wanting in some MSS. —The apostle’s meaning is, that Titus was not compelled by the apostles and others at Jerusalem to be circumcised as young even of the false brethren, who, when they found that Titus was not circumcised, compelled, I suppose, of Paul to his brethren apostles on that account. By informing the Galatians, that after he had communicated to the chief apostles the gospel which he preached to the Gentiles, not even Titus, who was a Gentile, was compelled to be circumcised, Paul gave them the most convincing proof of the doctrine concerning the freedom of the Gentiles was entirely approved by the other apostles.

4. Secretly introduced false brethren. —These brethren were introduced into the meetings which Paul had with the apostles, by some of their acquaintance secretly, that is, not knowing their real character.

Ver. 3.-1. Not even for an hour. —The Clermont MS., and the Vulgate version, read, they shall not be expunged. But the whole strain of the epistle shows that it ought to be retained. See chap. v. 1-3.
10 Only desiring that we would remember the poor, which very thing I also made haste to do.

11 (2a. 104.) Moreover, when Peter came to Antioch, I opposed him personally, because he was to be blamed.

12 For before certain persons came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, being afraid of them of the circumcision.

13 And the other Jews also assembled with him, in so much, that even Barnabas was carried away with them by their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that they did not walk rightly, (πεπίδοκοι) according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before all, if thou, being a Jew, art called to Christ, why dost thou live as the Gentiles? and not after the manner of the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to Judaize?

15 We who are Jews by nature, (ταῖς ἡσυχίαις) see Eph. ii. 3, note 2) and not sinners of the Gentiles.

16 Knowing that man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we also have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we attempt to please God in any other way, then do we work to ourselves condemnation.

18 For if a man abide without works, he is justified not.

19 But we are justified by faith, (πεποιθόμενοι) not in works, lest we should be justified by our own works, lest any man should glorify himself.

20 For we are his workmanship, (ποιμενί) created in Christ Jesus, to do good works, which God hath prepared beforehand that we should walk in them.

21 Therefore, putting aside the works of the law, we serve in the newness of the spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter.

22 Galatians. 287

3. Because he was to be blamed. 3.—Though the gift of inspiration apostles on the seeusted them from error in doctrine, it the apostolic office, and in token that Barnabas was sent forth by the Holy Ghost, to preach the gospel to the Gentiles; and agreed that we should travel among the Gentiles, while they preached to the Jews in Judea.

10 The only thing they desired, was, that we would remember to make collections for the poor, among the Gentiles; which very thing I also made haste to do among the converted Gentiles in Antioch.

11 Moreover, to show that as an apostle Peter is not superior to me, I inform you, that when he came to Antioch after the council, I opposed him personally in the presence of the church, (ver. 14.), because in this very affair of the Gentiles he was blamable.

12 For before certain persons came from Jerusalem to us, he went with the converted Gentiles to Antioch. But when they arrived, he withdrew, and separated himself from them, as if it had been a sin to eat with them. But the true reason was, he being afraid of the converted Jews.

13 And the other Jews also hypoctrized with him, abstaining from the tables of the Gentiles. So that even Barnabas, who with me had preached salvation to the Gentiles without the works of the law, (Acts xiii. 39), was carried away with them by their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that such eminent teachers did not walk rightly, according to their own knowledge of the true doctrine of the gospel, I said to Peter in the hearing of them all; in the hearing of Barnabas and all the brethren: If, in this case, because of Cornelius, thou, though thou art a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles in respect of meat, and not after the manner of the Jews, because thou knowest the truth respecting that matter, why now compelst thou the converted Gentiles to obey the law by refusing to eat with them, as if the distinction of meats were necessary for their salvation?

15 I added, we apostles, who are by birth and education, and not isolated Gentiles, who are ignorant of God, and of his will respecting the salvation of sinners.

16 Knowing by the law and the prophets, as well as by our own do not preserve them from all prodigality and sin in conduct, as is plain from this instance. Wherefore, the most advanced, whether in knowledge or virtue, warned by Peter's example, ought to take heed they fall. The novices and uncertain with which Peter behaved when related by his brother Paul, describes great praise (see illustration, p. 251), and is highly worthy of the imitation of the ministers of the gospel, and of all Christians.

17 Ver. 12—13. Certain persons came from Jerusalem. 1.—The persons who came from Jerusalem. I imagine, were messengers who had been sent by the church in Antioch, to know his opinion concerning the converts from among the isolated Gentiles. For as there were some of that sort now in Antioch, the brethren there might think it necessary to inquire, whether they were to be regulated by the decree concerning the proselytes. And seeing Peter was on this occasion to eat with the Gentiles after the manner of the Jews, it might be conceived that James gave his opinion, that the converts from heathenism, as well as the converted proselytes, ought to observe the four necessary observances. For all were not to be known, but the knowledge of thy faith is in this matter equally with Peter. 11. He may have thought it prudent to inculcate this principle, according to the Corant of the converts, for fear of offending more zealous Jewish believers, who, with a degree of rigor which it is difficult to describe, insisted on the isolated Gentiles observing the four precepts. The other brethren at Antioch, who, like Peter, knew the truth, dissented also from the same motive. And the division was so general, that Barnabas himself parted in it. Nevertheless Paul singly stood forth to stem the torrent, and by his zeal and courage maintained the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the Gentiles, in spite of that great opposition.

2. Afraid of them in the circumcision. The Jews reckoned it impossible to eat with the proselytes of the genera, Acts x. 28. 3. Some were not permitted to them, being unclean to Jews.

13. Was carried away with them. Another observes, that the original word άπόλαφης signifies to carry or drive away a person against his will. He signifies to carry away by the force of authority and example, in opposition to judgment and conviction. 11. As I said to Peter before them all. This happened probably at the conclusion of some of their meetings. For on those occasions it was usual, after the reading of the law and the prophets, to give the assembly instruction. See Acts xii. 15. In this openly reproving Peter, Paul acted not only honestly, but generously, for it would have been mean to have found Paul with Peter behind his back, without giving him an opportunity to vindicate himself, if he could have done it in a more becoming and in a former instance, may have been suffered to fall, the more effectively to discourage the ambition of this instrument of his pretended once-sure success to supremacy and infallibility.

19.—We are Jews by nature. As in the first part of his discourse, where the apostle speaks only of himself and Peter, he meant to speak of all the teachers of the gospel, so in this second part, when he describes himself in the act of inculcating with the state of believers in general.

21. And not sinners of the Gentiles. On this Whewell remarks, that the word σινόρες in scripture signifies great and habitual sinners; and that the Jews gave the Gentiles that appellation, on account of their practice of idolatry, which was ascribed to them throughout the known world. From these notes, it appears, that there was a great and unanswerable distinction between the Jews and the Gentiles; and that a little apparent difference in point of doctrine, was not to be allowed to disturb the great line of distinction, which separated the two great and important classes in the world.
works of law, but only through the faith of Jesus Christ; even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we may be justified (a) by the faith of Christ, and not by works of law. For by works of law no flesh shall be justified.

17 (To tē). But if, seeking to be justified (a) by Christ, even we ourselves are found sinners, will Christ be the minister of sin? By no means.

18 For if I build again those things which I destroyed, I constitute myself a transgressor.

19 (To ταο. 91.) Besides, I through law have died by law, (b) so that I must live by God.

20 I am crucified together with Christ. Nevertheless I live; yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me. (c) (v. 105.) For the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith which is of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I do not set aside the grace of God. For if righteousness is through law, then certainly Christ hath died (hope) in vain.

count of their idolatry and other vices. Accordingly, Matt. xxi. 65. 'The son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners,' means, is delivered into the hands of the Gentiles; as is plain from Matt. xx. 18.

Ver. 16.—1. Man is not justified by works of law. 2. So I translate the υπὲρ τοιούτου, without the article, because the proposition is true of every law whatever. Yet I acknowledge, that there are examples where the word υπὲρ, without the article, signifies the law of Moses. See Exe. iv. 69.

5. Through the faith of Jesus Christ.—According to Chandler, 'the faith of Jesus Christ' is the gospel of Jesus Christ. But I rather understand the apostle as meaning, the faith which Jesus Christ hath enjoined as the means of men's justification. For this is the genuine, not of the object, but of the agent. See Exe. iv. 45. and Rom. iii. 52. note.

Ver. 18. I constitute myself a transgressor.—Hammond thinks the word ἀνεπαρκής signifies (translates) a desirer or apostate. And in confirmation of his opinion observe, that Julian was called ἀνεπαρκής, the apostate, for deserting the Christian faith. But the common translation of this clause, in which the ordinary sense of the original word is given, agrees better with the context.

Ver. 19. I through law have died by law.—The words υπὲρ τοιούτου and ἐν τῷ are not in the verse are duties, not of the object, but of the cause or instrument. See Exe. iv. 20. and Rom. vii. 10, 11. notes. —That law here signifies the law of God in general, may be inferred, from its being said, that mankind die by law. For it was not by the curse of the law of Moses that Adam and his posterity died, but by the threatening annexed to the law given in paradise; and which, though published in the law of Moses, was not, properly speaking, the curse of that law, but the curse of the law of nature. See Gal. iii. 10, 13. notes.

Ver. 20. Christ liveth in me. —To show the advantage which believers derive from Christ's government, they are called his body, as being animated and directed by him. And he is said to 'live in them;' namely, by the influence of his Spirit dwelling in them, Rom. viii. 11. and enabling them to put to death the deeds of the body, ver. 13.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Reasoning in this Chapter.

St. Paul having by many arguments proved himself a real apostle, and showed that his knowledge of the gospel was given him by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ, proceeds, in this and the following chapter, to treat of the doctrines in dispute between him and the false teachers. They affirmed, that no man could be justified but by the law of Moses, because the pardon of sin could be obtained only by the stonnements which it prescribed; and therefore they urged the Gentiles to become Jews, that they might have the benefit of these stonnements. But to impress the Galatians the more strongly with a sense of the danger of that doctrine, the apostle charged them with want of understanding for coming to it; and speaking of their not obeying the truth, as the effect of some fascination, ver. 1.—Then, by asking those who had gone over to Judaism, whether they had received the spiritual gifts by obeying the law, or by obeying the gospel, he showed them that obedience to the law was not necessary to men's acceptance with God, ver. 2.—And taxed them with folly, because after having had their acceptance with God, in the gospel dispensation, sealed to them by the gifts of the Spirit, they proposed to make themselves more acceptable by performing the ceremonies of the law of Moses, which sanctified nothing but the flesh, ver. 3.—Besides, by that course, they rendered all their former sufferings for resisting Judaism of no use, ver. 4. —And to finish his rebuke, he asked them, whether he had communicated the spiritual gifts to them, to prove that men are saved through obedience to the law of Moses, or to prove that they are saved through obedience to the gospel? ver. 5.

In what follows, the apostle overthrows the doctrine of the Judaisers more directly by observing, that even Abraham himself was justified, not by works like those of the law of Moses, but in the gospel method of faith counted for righteousness. And that they who like him believed in God, are Abraham's sons, and entitled to all the blessings of the covenant, ver. 6, 7. —And that God having determined to justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel, or good news of his determination by Abraham, saying, 'In thee shall all the nations be blessed,' ver. 8. —And therefore, in every age and nation, they who believe in God shall be blessed with Abraham, by having their faith counted to them, as his was to him, for righteousness, ver. 9. — Whereas, according to the law of Moses itself, every one who seeketh justification meritoriously by the works of that law, most certainly is condemned by its curse, ver. 10.

Farther, to prove that by the law of Moses no man is justified in the sight of God, the apostle appealed to the Jewish prophets as testifying that doctrine, particularly Habakkuk, ver. 11. — Besides, the law does not require faith, but obedience to its precepts, as the condition of the life which it promises, ver. 12. — Wherefore every sinner being doomed to death by the curse of the law of Moses, no person can be justified by that law. But Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law of Moses, which is in fact the curse of the law of nature, consequently from law itself as a rule of justification, by dying for us, ver. 13. — That the blessing of Abraham, the blessing of justification by faith, which, in the covenant with Abraham, God promised to bestow on all nations through his seed, might come upon the Gentiles through Christ Jesus; and that they might receive the gifts of the Spirit, promised as the seal of their title to justification and eternal life by faith, ver. 14.

But because Isaiah, as was observed Eze. v. Sect. 5. had foretold, chap. ix. 3-5, that the Gentiles were to come to the light of the Jews, and that they were to be converted to them; the Jews (Eze. v. Sect. 6.) contended, that the blessing of the nations in Abraham’s seed was to be accomplished by the Gentiles embracing Judaism, and by their receiving justification through the Levitical stonements. Wherefore, to overturn that false notion, the apostle reasoned in the following manner: — Even a human covenant is not set aside or altered, after it is ratified, except by the contracting parties, ver. 15. — But the promises of the covenant, concerning the countning of the faith of the nations for righteousness, were made, not only to Abraham, but to his seed; particularly this promise, “In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.” He does not say, “in and seeds,” as speaking concerning a multitude of children, but as concerning one person only, “in and thy seed, who is Christ,” ver. 16. — I therefore affirm, that this covenant which was before ratified by God, concerning the blessing of the nations with justification by faith through Christ, in consequence of the promise made to Abraham as the federal head of believers, the law which was given four hundred and thirty years after cannot annul, so as to abolish the promise, by introducing a method of blessing or justifying the nations, different from that established by the promise, ver. 17. — Farther, if the inheritance be obtained by works of law, it is no longer bestowed by promise; yet God bestowed it on Abraham and his seed, as a free gift, by promise, ver. 18.

Ye will perhaps reply: If neither the inheritance nor justification is obtained through the works of the law of Moses, why was that law added after the covenant was made with Abraham? It was added for the sake of restraining the Jews from transgressions, and more especially from idolatry; and to continue till Christ the seed should come, to whom it was promised, that the nations should be blessed with justification by faith through him. Moreover, the law being added to the covenant for this other purpose, namely, to make the Israelites sensible that they were sinners, and that God was displeased with them, it was delivered by angels into the hand of a mediator, ver. 19. — For a mediator is not employed between persons in good agreement with one another, ver. 20. — From these things it followed, (though the apostle hath not drawn the conclusion), that a law which was given to make the Israelites sensible they were sinners, and which by its curse condemned every sinner to death without remedy, could never be intended for their justification. Is the law of Moses then, which makes us sensible of our transgressions, and subjects us to its curse, inconsistent with the promise of justification by faith? By no means. That operation of law, on the contrary,leweth the absolute necessity of the promise. For if any law could have been given, capable of delivering us from death temporal and spiritual, certainly righteousness might have been obtained by such a law, ver. 21. — But the law of Moses contained in the scripture, instead of communicating righteousness and eternal life to any person, hath shut up all mankind together in prison, as sinners sentenced to death, that the promise of justification, now published in the gospel, may be performed to all believers, ver. 22. — Wherefore, before the gospel was introduced, Jews and Gentiles were imprisoned as condemned criminals, and shut up together under the custody of law, so as to be obliged to have recourse to the method of justification by faith, which at the beginning was but imperfectly discovered, but which was afterwards to be fully revealed to all in the gospel, ver. 23. — So that the law was our pedagogue to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith, ver. 24. — But the method of justification by faith being now universally made known in the gospel, Jews and Gentiles are no longer under the pedagogy of the law of Moses and of nature, ver. 25. — Besides, ye Jews and Gentiles are all the sons of God and heirs of eternal life, through your faith in Jesus Christ: so that to your being the sons of God, it is not necessary to subject yourselves to the law of Moses, ver. 26. — For at your baptism ye professed to put on the temper of Christ, ver. 27. — And where this is really done, there is in the gospel no preference given to men, as formerly under the law, on account of their descent, their outward condition, or their sex: but all are equally honourable and equally beloved of God as his sons, who possess the temper and virtues of Christ, ver. 28. — And with respect to you Gentiles, if ye are Christ’s brethren by possessing his temper and virtues, certainly ye are Abraham’s seed, and heirs of the heavenly country, according to God’s promise, ver. 29.

New Translation.

 Chap. III. — O seneales Galatians, who hath deceived you? not to obey the truth, to whom visibly Jesus Christ was set forth crucified (Ps. 116.) On account of the works of the law, ro.

Ver. 1—1. Seneales. — The word ग्रातू properly signifies persons void of understanding: also persons who, though they have understanding, do not form right judgments of things, through want of consideration.

2. Who hath deceived you? — The word ग्रातू signifies to fashion, or deprive one of the use of his faculties by looking on him. Hence Virgil, "Neque quisquis homo, oculus malum fractus agat." The word is used likewise for deceiving one with false appearances, after the manner of jugglers, in which sense I understand it here.

This word was used to denote things written on tablets, and hung up to public view.

Commentary.

 Chap. III. — The doctrine of justification by faith is so full of comfort, and the proofs of it are so clear, that I must ask you, O seneales Galatians, what false teacher hath deceived you, and turned you from the gospel, to whom plainly Jesus Christ was set forth crucified for you, in order to procure you eternal life, or if

GALATIANS.

1. The gifts of the Spirit, whereby your acceptance with God was sealed. Or (q) an account of your yielding the obedience of faith?

2. Or an account of your yielding the obedience of faith?

3. When I communicated the gifts of the Spirit to you, few of you had any knowledge of the law of Moses.

4. Are ye so senseless, that having begun in the Spirit, ye now make yourselves perfect (middle voice) by the flesh?

5. Have ye suffered so many things in vain? (eia) surely indeed it is in vain. (See chap. v. 2.)

6. He, then, who supplied you with the Spirit, and wrought miracles among you, did he supply you (q, 156.) on account of the works of the law, or (eia) on account of the obedience of faith? (ver. 2. note 2.)

7. seeing Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.

8. Certainly, that they who are of faith, the same are (eia) the sons of Abraham.

9. (Tyr 33.) Wherefore they who are of faith, (see ver. 7. note 1.), are blessed with spiritual gifts proceed, is called 'the Spirit of adoption.' Rom. viii. 15. Now also the Jewish believers, when they heard of the descent of the Holy Ghost on Cornelius and his company, immediately concluded that God had granted them spiritual gifts, through miraculous means. The Galatians, therefore, in the gifts of the Spirit, have no clear evidence of the being accepted of God under the Gospel, their faith was not based on any spiritual experience, and this was the same as with the Galatians. 'Forth,' and in ver. 9., the word (*ευτύχειν) signifies submission, as also in Rom. xv. 22. LXX. He w 22. Behold obedience is better than sacrifice. In like manner, the compounded word (ευτύχεος) signifies submission, Rom. v. 19.

Ver. 3. Having been in the Spirit, &c.—The term is used in this verse, in the same sense as in 1 Cor. ii. 14., to denote the invisible and spiritual. 'Through the Spirit.' And the people who use such terms are calculated to purify the spirits of men; and because he disowns the assistance of men to obey its precepts. On the other hand, the law is called the flesh, because it naturalizes worship by sacrifice and purification of the body of the sacrifice, because that form of worship did not cleave to the conscience of the worshipper, but only his body, and because the Israelites were put under the law by their fidelity only.

Ver. 4. But he, then, who, &c.—Thus the apostle uses this person in this verse, he plainly speaks of himself; and insinuates, not only that he was the person who converted them, and bestowed on them the spiritual gifts, but that the teachers who had persuaded them to embrace Judaism, had conferred no spiritual gift on them; consequently had given no evidence of the truth of their doctrine.

2. Supplied to you the Spirit;—that is, the spiritual gifts. These, as distinguished from miracles, were faith or fortitude, prophecy, utterance or eloquence, discerning of spirits, foreign language, and their interpretation of foreign languages.

3. Did he these things to recommend the works of the law, &c.—that is, Did he these things to recommend the works of the law of Moses to you, as necessary to your salvation? or to recommend the obedience of faith, as the means of your justification? As this interpretation renders the apostle's question in this verse different from his questions in ver. 2. Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, &c.—I have no doubt that it is the true interpretation; especially as it conveys not only a different meaning of the questions, but one that is very important.

Ver. 6. Seeing Abraham believed God, &c.—Here the apostle alludes to the transaction recorded by Moses, Gen. xvii., where we are told, ver. 6., that God 'brought' Abraham forth abroad, and said, Look now towards heaven and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. And he said and said, 50. He shall thy seed be. And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness. From this it is plain, that what Abraham believed was, that his seed should be numerous as the stars of the heaven; and that his belief of this promise implies the possession of the divine power, and goodness, and veracity, God counted it to him for righteousness. This transaction the apostle mentioned here, as the foundation of his doctrine in ver. 7. namely, that they who imitate Abraham in his faith are his sons, and heirs with him of the blessing of faith counted for righteousness. To show this connexion, I have translated *ευτύχεος by the English word seeing; a sense which it sometimes hath in the writings of the Greeks. See Esai. iv. 35. And it was counted to him for righteousness—\(\) that is, it was considered by God as an act commended by God, and on that account he was reckoned Abraham, and the nations (m) by faith, preached the gospel before to Abraham, saying, Surely in thee all the nations shall be blessed.

Ver. 9. Wherefore they who are of faith, according to God's promises, they who imitate Abraham in his faith, and who after his example seek to be justified by faith, are blessed with spiritual gifts, as the apostle has just observed. In vs. 7. "the works of the law" are referred to, and in that verse what the law required of men was called the "flesh," and the works of the Spirit, or faith, the "Spirit." And it is to be observed, that the law requires more than that a man should believe; in that case it is called "the flesh." But faith is the evidence of things not seen; and the law, as the apostle observes, requires that a man should do, and not believe; and the works of the law are said to be "the flesh." And it is plain that the apostle was not speaking only of the outward works of the law, for he adds, "What shall the end be of the commandment which God spake in the mouth of Moses, &c. 5. And the promise followed, saying, Surely in thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. The promise, according to God's promises, they who imitate Abraham in his faith, and who after his example seek to be justified by faith, are blessed in the same manner as he was." The promise, according to God's promises, they who imitate Abraham in his faith, and who after his example seek to be justified by faith, are blessed with spiritual gifts.
Galatians

be blessed with believing Abraham, by having their faith counted to them for righteousness.

10 But all, without exception, who seek justification by the works of the law, are under the curse; for it is written, (Deut. xxvii. 26), Accursed is every one who continueth in all the things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

11 Besides, that (τὰ νῦν) by law no one is justified (ἀπαραβίασθαι) before God, is manifest: for, the just (ἡ δικαιοσύνη) by faith shall live.

12 Also, the law is not of faith. But he who doth these things, shall live by them. (Rom. ii. 28) As the apostle, following the LXX, hath translated the words εὐγνώμονας, χρηματίζεται, or εὐγνώμονας, χρηματίζονται, or εὐγνώμονας, χρηματίζονται, as it is evident from the book of the law, by law, the law of Moses, is translated by law, the law of Moses, is translated by law, the law of Moses.

13 Christ hath bought us off from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us; for it is written, (Deut. xxvii. 23).
14 That the blessing of Abraham might come on the nations through Christ Jesus; as it is written, he that waiteth for the Lord shall inherit the land.

15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men: Yet no covenant is given to an infant.

16 Now to Abraham were the promises spoken and to his seed: (See ver. 19.) He doth not say, And in seeds, as in (verse 16), concerning the practice of men: Yet no seed is one seed or altereth a ratified covenant, though but of a man.

17 Brethren, in confining those who affirm that the blessing of the nations in Abraham, and in his seed, be to be accomplished by their conversion to Judaism, I speak according to the practice of men: Yet no seed is one seed or altereth a ratified covenant, though but of a man.

18 Now, to Abraham were the promises made, that in him all the families of the earth shall be blessed; and to his seed, that it is likewise all the families, the Jews not excepted, shall be blessed. God doth not say, And in seeds, as in (verse 16) concerning one person be with, And in thy seed the nations are to be blessed; not through the whole of Abraham's seed, but through one of them only, who is Christ.

19 All the nations shall be blessed through him, because the seed of Abraham is confessed, though he is one seed.

20 I speak the Father's seal, And in (verse 19), concerning the practice of men: Yet no seed is one seed or altereth a ratified covenant, though but of a man.

21 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men: Yet no one seed is one seed or altereth a ratified covenant, though but of a man.

22 And, if Abraham had spoken concerning seed, he might have said, Isaac.

23 But the words were not so spoken, as that it is one seed which this blessing came on.

24 What then? Shall we enslave the nations? No, but we shall be enervated, as the word is rendered in our translation.

25 What then? What shall we say? The earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord, as in (verse 24) concerning the practice of men: Yet no seed is one seed or altereth a ratified covenant, though but of a man.

26 As it is written, there have been two covenants: The one, of law, and the other, of promise.

27 The law, therefore, is of the works of the law, and he that doeth them shall live by them: The promise, on the other hand, is of the works of the Spirit, and he that believeth them shall live by them.

28 Brethren, the Scripture did not give the promise to Abraham or to his seed, but to Gentiles also.

29 If it be so, that the Gentiles have received the promise, what is the cause?

30 For the seed is not all of one nature: for though as concerning the law, the seed is of Isaac;

31 Yet he saith, not all that are promised are justified.

32 That is, they are not all of one kind: for as concerning the law, the seed is of Isaac;

33 But as concerning the promise, all of them are not justified.

34 That is, they are not all of one kind: for as concerning the law, the seed is of Isaac;

35 But as concerning the promise, all of them are not justified.

36 Brethren, my word is not against the Scripture, for the Scripture saith the word of promise, 37 The word of promise, that is, the truth.

38 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

39 Brethren, he saith, that Isaac shall inherit the blessing.

40 But they say, Abraham had two sons, Esaiah and Jochabed.

41 What then? Two sons? As in (verse 40) concerning the practice of men: Yet no seed is one seed or altereth a ratified covenant, though but of a man.
Wherefore, this I affirm, that the covenant which was after ratified by God, (to be, 148.) concerning the blessing of the nations in Christ, the law which was made four hundred and thirty years after, cannot annul, (see 11,) so as to abolish the promise.

BESIDES, if the inheritance even of the earthly country be obtained by works of law, it is no longer bestowed by promise as a free gift. Yet Moses expressly declares, that God bestowed the inheritance of Canaan as a free gift on Abraham by promise.

But if the inheritance was not by the law, but by the promise as a free gift, why was the law added after the promise? It was added on account of restraining transgressions; and was to continue until the seed should come whom it was promised, that all things should be blessed in him; being spoken by angels, who put it in the hand of Moses, as a mediator between God and the people.

The giving of the law by a mediator, shewed the Israelites that God was displeased with them; because a mediator is not one; but God is.

And so it was, that word seed, collectively, to denote a multitude of children, they used it likewise for a single person, and especially so. Gen. iv. 15. I will not call his name by thy mouth. It shall be called by his head, and shall bring his brother's hand.

And E've, speaking of Seth, says, Gen. iv. 18. God hath made me another seed, instead of Abel whom Cain slew. The word seed being thus applied to denote a multitude of children, as well as to a single person, is in ambiguity; and therefore the Jews could not certainly know that they were to be the instruments of bringing forth the promise, unless it had been said, and in this sense.

And though we have no example of the word seed used by the Hebrews for men, yet from the apostle's argument we may presume it was used in the plural, to denote an innumerable, or a diverse of children. In that sense, Eve had seeds in her two sons, as every person of any teacher, or even a child, is called a seed, Gen. xx. 13. So likewise Abraham had two seeds: Gen. xx. 12. In Isaac shall thy seed be called. And Abraham and Sarah the aged and barren woman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed, or seed.

Now, because God fulfilled his promise to Abraham, that Abraham's descendants were to be the seed of Abraham in the nations were to be blessed. And if the Jewish doctors counted their claim by observing, that in the promise it is not said so, and is, in so much as God would have said it had he meant both Ishmael and Isaac, lest in thy seed the apostle might with propriety turn their own arguments against them themselves; especially as the Jews were one of the nations of the earth, that were to be blessed in Abraham's seed. Lastly, to see the word seed of a single person, was highly proper in the covenant with Abraham, whereas God declared his gracious purpose of making mankind, because that term leads us back to the original promise, that the seed of woman should bruise the head of the serpent.

2. Who is Christ?—Is either of the two sons of Sarah, as it is often interpreted, to the seed of Sarah? Here the apostle, regarding the meaning rather than the form of the word seed, saideth, hath put the relative pronoun in the masculine gender, notwithstanding the stranger word, or the exact rendering. See Ch. iv. 16. This language in the gender of the relative apostle hath made, pursuant to his affirmation, that the promise was to bless all the nations of the earth in Abraham's seed, God spake of one person only.

The apostle therefore concludes that God's promise to bless all the nations of the earth in Abraham's seed, when he tells us that seed is to be called in Isaac. Abraham's seed I have made all the nations of the earth blessed. They have not been blessed in Isaac, although it was said of him, in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Neither have all the nations of the earth been blessed in Abraham's poverty collectively as a nation; nor in any other way of the Sarah's seed.

He therefore is the only seed of Abraham spoken of in the promise, as the apostle Paul expressly asserts. Besides Peter and Paul, because a Christian, gave the same interpretation of this promise, Acts xviii. 28. Ye are the children of the children of the children, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, being sworn unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

Upon you first, God hath raised up his servant Jesus, sent him to bless you, turning away every one of you from his misgivings.

3. So as to abolish the promise.—Though, [129] to [131], the promise be in the singular number, it comprehends all the promises, the promise to give the nation to Abraham's seed Christ; by confounding their faith to them for righteousness, mentioned in this verse, being put for all the promises, and among the rest, for the promise of the inheritance, mentioned ver. 18.

BESIDES, if the inheritance be by law, then seed by the inheritance here, is the inheritance of all the promises, because they all belong to believers, as Abraham's seed by faith. But I rather think the inference of which the apostle would remove, is what he is to correct, Rom. iv. 11. The inheritance of the world, or hereby country of which Canaan was the type.

Ver. 19. 1. It was added on account of restraining transgressions, that is, on account of the restraining the Israelites from that abominable idolatry, and the sins connected with idolatry; the evil of which the law discovered to them by its prohibitions, and cursed. Accordingly to this account of the law, idolatry, and all the solemnities practiced by the Canaanites and the other heathen nations that surrounded the Hebrews, were forbidden in the law under the severest penalties. Farther, the law was added after the promise, to show the Israelites what things were offensive to God, Rom. iii. 29.

Also, by the manner in which it was given, becoming sensible of their transgressions, and of the punishment to which they were liable, they might be constrained to have recourse to the covenant with Abraham, in which justification was promised through faith, as it is now promised in the gospel. See Coloss. iii. 11. note 6, as the close.

Because the nations who inhabited Canaan and the neighbouring countries were worshiped useless gods with feasting and many popous rites, by which their senses were delighted, and their imaginations strangely suggested; moreover, following Mammon, was of opinion, that a worship of the same pompous kind was prescribed to the Israelites that being directed to the worship of a living God whom they were to make no image or representation whatever, they might be prevented from having communion with those gods of the heathens. And it must be owned, that thus the imagination of idolatry arisen from the true interpretation of God's people to bless all the nations of the earth in Abraham's seed, when he tells us that seed is to be called in Isaac. Abraham's seed I have made all the nations of the earth blessed. They have not been blessed in Isaac, although it was said of him, in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Neither have all the nations of the earth been blessed in Abraham's poverty collectively as a nation; nor in any other way of the Sarah's seed.

He therefore is the only seed of Abraham spoken of in the promise, as the apostle Paul expressly assures. Besides Peter and Paul, because a Christian, gave the same interpretation of this promise, Acts xviii. 28. Ye are the children of the children of the children, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, being sworn unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed.

Upon you first, God hath raised up his servant Jesus, sent him to bless you, turning away every one of you from his misgivings.

2. Till the seed should come whom it was promised. It was not that the law, which was bounden every sinner to death, should continue any longer than till the seed should come whom it was promised, that in him the nations of the earth were to be blessed, by having their faith counted to them for righteousness. For Christ having come, and published in his gospel God's gracious invincibility of uniting believers of all nations by faith, if the law of Moses, which condemned every sinner to death without mercy, had been alone to rule, it would have made the promise of no effect. It was therefore added with great propriety at the death of Christ; especially as the gospel was then a dispensation of religion, more effective than the law for discovering sin and the penalty of transgressions.

BETH, being commanded of angel: [132]—[134], Being commanded; or, as it is expressed Heb. vi. 3. Being spoke by angels. This is affirmed likewise by Stephen, Acts vii. 32.

In the land of a mediator: If I mistake not, this is an allusion to Moses bringing down in his hand the two tables of the covenant, and to what he said to the Levites, Deut. v. 5. INX—In his name on Heb. xi. 28-34, the mediator of the covenant, and to the successions of the Jewish high-priests, by whose office were mediators between God and the people, and were at all times the word of Christ, till this time. But this interpretation does not suit the apostle's argument.

Ver. 20. 1. Now a mediator is not (i.e.) of one; that is, of parts in fellowship, or use, signifies in other passages; particularly, John xiv. 21-23. [129] 1 Cor. iii. 8, vi. 15, and 17, in other languages.
Galatians

played between parties who are in friendship: But God is in friendship only with the righteous.

1. Is not the law, then, which subjects men to the curse for their sins, contrary to the promises of God, wherein he declares that he will justify them by faith? By no means. The law, by subjecting men to the curse, without giving them that hope of mercy, obliges them to flee to the promises for justification. For if there had been a law given, which was able (possessed) to make sinners alive, certainly righteousness would have been (ex quo) by law.

2. But the Scripture hath shut up together (τὰ ταραττό) all under sin, that the promise (ἐστ) of the gospel of Jesus Christ might be given to them who believe.

3. Wherefore, before faith came, we were kept in darkness under law, shut up together? (ἐν τοις) unto the faith, which should afterwards be revealed.

4. So that the law hath been our pedagogue, leading us (συνέχει) unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

5. But faith being come, we are no longer under the pedagogue.

6. For ye are all the sons of God, (διὰ τὴν φύσιν) through the faith published (ἐκ πραγματείας) by Christ Jesus.

7. Besides, as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, (ἐν Χριστῷ) have put on Christ.

In Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek.

But God is one. — The latter clause of the 10th, and the first clause of the 11th verses, make an enigma, as the lexicographer, in which the conclusion is wanting. But if it had been expressed, the enigma would have stood thus: — The law was given in the hand of a mediator, ver. 19. Now a mediator is not employed between parties in friendship, ver. 20. Therefore, he who gave the law to the Israelites through angels in the hand of a mediator, was not in friendship with them. The clause which follows, 'But God is one,' is the universal proposition of another enigma, which is the major conclusion of the argument in the following synecdoche. This enigma, if it had been fully expressed, would have proceeded as follows: — God was not in friendship with the Israelites, but God is in friendship with all who are righteous: Therefore the Israelites were not righteous: Therefore, the apostle's observation concerning the giving of the law in the hand of a mediator, implied that God was not in friendship with the Israelites when he gave them the law, no his observation. — But God is one, being an antithesis to the other, implies that God was in friendship with Abraham, when he gave him the promises in person, without a mediator. But I think the interpretation of that clause given in the commentary, agrees much better with the history. For the first part of the law, called the ten commandments, God, or the angel who conversed with Moses, spoke to the Israelites himself. But his voice was so terrible that they were terrified to hear it no more. Now the terrorfulness of God's voice could proceed only from his impressing the Israelites with a sense of God's displeasure with them on account of their sins; and therefore, the putting of the law in the hand of a mediator, on account of the terror existent in the people by the voice of God, was a strong proof of their sinfulness: Exod. 20. 19. 'All the people saw the thunderings and the lightnings, &c. 19. And they said to Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die.'

Ver. 21. A law given, which was able to make alive: — Here St. Paul appears, that the law of Moses was utterly incapable of making the Jews alive, either from spiritual or temporal death; because it neither promised them the assistance of the Spirit of God to overcome the corruptions of their nature, nor the pardon of their sins repentance, issuing in deliverance from death temporal and eternal. Indeed, it was not only the absence of these, but the presence of another, that was the cause of this law's being unable to make alive; viz. the presence of the message of justification, except at the fall; it was then established: and till it came, Adam was kept in ward without hope, under the law he had broken. In like manner, the Gentiles under the law of nature, and the Jews under the law of Moses, were kept in ward as criminals, and had no hope of pardon but what the law of faith gave them, as made known absolutely in the first promise, Gen. iii. 15 and afterwards, in the covenant with Abraham.

22. Shut up unto the faith. — The law of Moses, instead of being contrary to the promises of God, or covenant with Abraham, effectually co-operated therewith. By the perfection and spirituality of its moral precepts, it makes us Jews capable of our inability to obey perfectly; and by its curse denounced against every one who does not obey perfectly, it makes us free, trembling and afflicted, to the method of salvation revealed to the forementioned Abraham by the Spirit of promise, and published to all mankind in the gospel. — This sense the proposition in hath likewise, ver. 24.

Ver. 21. The law hath been our pedagogue. — The servant who attended the children of great men to the court and religious race. On this verse Beza makes the following remark: — 'Est autem infinita quaedam Pauli enigmatis inclusio, insinuandae, quae ad nos hanc sententiam explicat: 'Perfection.' This is the enigma, signifying the rapidity of the apostle's genius, his great delight in the enigma. — Chandler thinks, that the apostle's observation concerning the giving of the law in the hand of a mediator, implied that God was not in friendship with the Israelites when he gave them the law, no his observation. — But God is one, being an antithesis to the other, implies that God was in friendship with Abraham, when he gave him the promises in person, without a mediator. But I think the interpretation of that clause given in the commentary, agrees much better with the history. For the first part of the law, called the ten commandments, God, or the angel who conversed with Moses, spoke to the Israelites himself. But his voice was so terrible that they were terrified to hear it no more. Now the terrorfulness of God's voice could proceed only from his impressing the Israelites with a sense of God's displeasure with them on account of their sins; and therefore, the putting of the law in the hand of a mediator, on account of the terror existent in the people by the voice of God, was a strong proof of their sinfulness: Exod. 20. 19. 'All the people saw the thunderings and the lightnings, &c. 19. And they said to Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die.'

Ver. 22. Ye are all the sons of God through the faith published by Christ Jesus. — Ye are all the church and people of God, and heirs of the promises, through believing the gospel. — See Gal. iv. 5. note 2 and 1 John ii. 20. note. — By this observation the apostle insinuated, that the dispensation was now at an end, in which men were sons or people of God by virtue of their descent from Abraham. For, on that account alone, the hermeneutics as a nation were called God's son, and his firstborn; Exod. 22. 22. Deut. xiv. 1. All who believe the gospel are the sons of that, which is, the people of God, and heirs of all the privileges which belong to the promised people of God.

Ver. 27. As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ: — That is, have professed that ye have put on Christ. — See Eus. iv. 1. Christ, here, signifies the Gospel of Christ. — By telling the Galatians, that in their baptism they professed to put on the virtues of Christ, the apostle insinuated, that by possessing the virtues of Christ, they were more truly the sons of Abraham and of God, than those who were related to Abraham by natural descent only, and to God by holding a place in his visible church. — Having the virtues of Christ wrought in them by the power of God accompanying the promise to Abraham, 'A father of many nations I have consumed thee,' they were truly the sons of God. — In the expression, 'I have put on Christ,' there is an allusion to the prophetic rite which in the first age usually accompanied baptism. — The person to be baptized put on his old clothes before he went into the water, and put on new or clean raiment when he came out of it; to signify that he had put off his old nature, with all his former bad principles and practices, and was become a new man. — Hence the expressions, 'putting on the old man, and putting on the new.' Eph. iv. 22, 24. — Wherefore baptism under the gospel, as the rite of initiation, is as effectual for making men the sons of God, as circumcision was under the law.
nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, nor male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.

28 And if ye be Christ's, certainly ye are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Gen. xvii. 8.

Ver. 28.—1. There is neither Jew nor Greek. 2. He is here‐bearing God's name for believers, as it is likewise James i. 27. The clause is elliptical, and must be supplied, as I have done, from the end of the verse, in this manner: “In Christ Jesus there is neither Jew nor Greek.” 3. In the gospel dispensation God pays no regard to men on account of their nativity; all the Gentiles, who are of the Dispersion, in Christ have an equal right to the privileges of the gospel, and are equally in favor with God, and are equal in respect of dignity. To the Jewish teachers in Galatia, who imagined that their being Abraham's children according to the flesh, would of itself secure their acceptance with God, this letter may have appeared a most humiliating doctrine: But to the Galatians it was of singular use, to prevent their being misled by those teachers, who strongly affirmed, that the Gentiles could not share in the privileges of the people of God, without being circumcised.

Nor male nor female:—Under the law, males had greater privileges than females, and were called the male sex, and the male animals had greater privileges than females; but this is changed, and females are treated in the same manner, with respect to the privileges of the gospel dispensation. The second question, concerning the keeping of the passover, is answered here. That as the heir of a great sign of God's covenant; they alone were capable of the priesthood, and of the kingdom; and inheritances belonged to them, preferentially to females in the same degree.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The apostle having established the joyful doctrine, that believers in every age and country of the world, are heirs of the promise made to Abraham and to his seed, goes on in this chapter to answer two questions, which he knew would naturally occur to his readers, but which, according to his manner, he does not formally state. The first is,—Since all believers from the beginning were heirs of the promises, as well as of the things promised, why were they not put in possession of the promises from the beginning; by sending Christ into the world, and introducing the gospel dispensation in the first age; that the promises, especially the promise of pardon and eternal life through faith, might have been published universally, and preserved for the benefit of the heirs in every age? The second question is, Why were mankind left for so many ages to the directions of the laws of nature and of Moses, neither of which gave them any hope of pardon and eternal life?—To the first of these questions the apostle replied, That in not giving the heirs the knowledge of the promises by introducing the gospel dispensation immediately after the fall, God treated them as a prudent father treats his son while under age. During his non-age, he does not allow him to possess the estate of which he is the heir, because he has no discretion to use it aright, but he keeps him in the condition of a bondman. In the same manner, though believers from the beginning were heirs of the promises, God did not in the early ages put them in possession of them, by immediately setting up the gospel dispensation; because, in the first ages, the state of the world did not admit either of the universal publication of the gospel, or of its preservation, ver. 1. To the second question, concerning the keeping of the heirs for so many ages under the tuition of the laws of nature and of Moses, as the apostle answers, that as the estate must be prepared by a proper education for enjoying it with dignity, and is, therefore, in his childhood, placed under tutors who protect and instruct him, and stewards who manage his estate and supply him with necessaries, till the time appointed in his father's will for taking possession of his inheritance, ver. 2. So, to prepare believers for the actual inheritance of the promises under the gospel dispensation, God judged it proper to continue them for a long time under the bondage of the laws of nature and of Moses, that by experiencing the hardships of that bondage, they might be made more sensible of the happiness which they were to derive from the liberty of the gospel, ver. 3.

More particularly, it was not fit that a complete discovery of the method of salvation should be made to all mankind, by the publication of the promises in the gospel, till they were made sensible of the insufficiency of their own natural powers for discovering an effectual method of reconciling themselves to God. Accordingly, for many ages they were left to the guidance of their own reason; and during that period, they lost even the imperfect knowledge of the method of salvation which God had revealed to their first parents after the fall, notwithstanding, to preserve that knowledge, God appointed the sacrifice of beasts, as an emblem of that effectual sacrifice which the seed of the woman was to offer in due time. For mankind, not preserving the true meaning of these sacrifices, believed them to be real atonements, and in that persuasion multiplying them without end, they foolishly expected to be pardoned, through the number and costliness of the animal sacrifices which they offered. In this state of the world, God thought fit to introduce the law of Moses, in which the same sacrifices of beasts were appointed; not however as real atonements for sin, but expressly as types of the real atonement which God had promised should be made; that by bringing back the rite of sacrifice to its original intendment, and by reviving the expectation of a real atonement, mankind might be made sensible, that it is not possible for the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sin. This important truth was still more directly shewed in those precepts of the law of Moses, which ordered the same sacrifices to be offered for the same persons. For, as the apostle justly argues, Heb. x. 2. if these sacrifices had been real atonements, being once offered, and the sinner cleansed, he would have had no more conscience of sin; consequently, he needed not to have repeated these sacrifices. Thus the Levitical sacrifices, by reviving the expectation of a real atonement to be made in due time, and by shewing the utter inefficacy of the sacrifices of beasts to procure the pardon of sin, led the Jews to the sacrifice of Christ, the only real atonement; so that, as the apostle affirms, Gal. iii. 24, the law of Moses, by its sacrifices as well as by its curse, was a pedagogue to lead the Jews to Christ. Wherefore, when the heathens, under the tuition of the light of nature, were made sensible of the insufficiency of their own natural powers to discover any effectual method of obtaining pardon; and when the Jews, by the law of Moses, were showed that it was not possible for the sacrifices of beasts to take away sin; and when the political state of the world admitted the gospel to be preached to all nations, and preserved when preached—then was 'the fulness of the time,' or the proper season for God's sending forth his Son into the world born of a woman descended from Abraham, to make a complete discovery of the method of salvation by the gospel revelation, ver. 4.—And by offering himself a sacrifice for sin to redeem believers, the heirs of the promises, from the tuition both of the law of nature and of the law of Moses; and to place them under the gospel dispensation, that they may 'receive the adoption of sons;' that is, all the privileges which belong to the sons or heirs of God.

Next, it is observed to believing Gentiles, equally with the believing Jews, are the sons of God, and heirs of the promises, the apostle addresses both, saying, Wherefore, because ye are sons, God hath sent forth his Spirit of his Son into your hearts, the Holy Spirit, whose gifts are evidences of your sonship, and embolden you to address God by the endearing appellation of Father, ver. 6.—Thou then who possessest the gifts of the Spirit, whether thou be a Jew or a Gentile, art no longer a bondman under the tuition of the law either of nature or of Moses, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God, an heir of all the promises of God, through the atonement which Christ hath made for thee, ver. 7.—However, ye Gentiles ought to remember, that in your heathen state, being ignorant of the true God, ye worshipped with a slavish subjection things which are no gods, ver. 8.—But now, having acknowledged the true God as your Father, or, to express it better, being acknowledged by the true God as his sons, ye worship him acceptably with spiritual services. And being in this happy state, why do ye, by embracing Judaism, return to the same kind of basely unprofitable worship, by sacrifices, washings, and holy days, which ye practised in heathenism? ver. 9.—I am told ye observe the days, and new moons, and seasons, and years enjoined in the law of Moses; which kind of worship, though different in respect of its object, is in its nature the same with the worship ye formerly paid to your idols, and has the same tendency to beget in you a superstitious, slavish disposition. These observances, I know, ye have been taught to believe are necessary to your salvation. But I assure you, they are utterly ineffectual for that purpose, ver. 10.—I am afraid I have laboured in vain among you, ver. 11. Less, however, this rebuke might have offended the Galatians, he assured them that it proceeded from love; and desired the continuance of their affection, which, when he first preached to them, had been very great, ver. 12-20.

The apostle next turned his discourse to the false teachers, and asked them and their disciples, who wished to be under the law of Moses as the rule of their justification. Why they did not understand the law! He meant the written law of Moses, which, when rightly interpreted, taught the freedom of Abraham's seed by faith, from the bondage of the law, ver. 21.—To prove this, the apostle, entering into the deep meaning of the things which Moses hath written concerning Abraham, to believe is Abraham, as the father of the people of God, had two sons, the one by the bond-maid, Hagar, the other by the free-woman, Sarah, ver. 22.—But the one by the bond-maid was begotten by the natural strength of his parents; but the son who was born of the free-woman was begotten supernaturally, through the strength communicated to his parents by the promise, ver. 23.—These things, the apostle told the Galatians, are an allegory: For these mothers represent the two covenants, by which men are made the church and people of God. The one covenant is that of the law, given from Mount Sinai, whereby the descendants of Abraham, according to the flesh, were made the visible church and people of God; and which bringeth forth all its children in bondage to the law. This covenant is represented by Hagar, ver. 24.—Wherefore, her son Ishmael, whom she brought forth in bondage, was a type of the then present Jerusalem, or visible Jewish church, consisting of Abraham's natural descendants by Isaac; who are in bondage to the law, and who, if they have no relation to Abraham by nature, and to God but by being in his visible church, will be excluded from the inheritance of heaven; as Ishmael was from the earthly inheritance, on account of his being brought forth in bondage. Hagar and her son Ishmael are likewise types of those who, under the gospel dispensation, are members of God's visible church, merely by being born of parents who are members of that church, and who are in bondage to their lusts; for they likewise will be excluded from the inheritance of heaven, ver. 25.—The other covenant is that of the gospel, which was published from Mount Zion, Isa. ii. 3, where by believers, Abraham's children by faith, are made citizens of the Jerusalem above; that is, members of God's invisible catholic church, whose present position is in heaven. This covenant is fitly typified by Sarah the free-woman, who was constituted by God the mother of all believers. And her son Isaac, who was born in freedom, is an apt type of Abraham's children by faith, who being regenerated by God, are born in freedom from the bondage of the law, and from the slavery of sin; and are the catholic invisible church of God, and heirs of the heavenly inheritance, ver. 26.

The foregoing account of Abraham's wives and sons, and of the persons and things typified by them, the apostle told the Galatians was confirmed by Isaac, who foretold the conversion of the Gentiles, under the idea of their becoming Sarah's children by faith, in these words: Rejoice, O barren woman, &c. ver. 27.

Having thus established his allegorical interpretation of the history of Abraham's wives and sons, he drew there from the following conclusion concerning believers of all nations: 'We, brethren, after the manner of Isaac, are the children begotten to Abraham by God's promise. A father of many nations I have constituted thee,' and are the persons typified by Isaac, ver. 28.—But, says the apostle, as then Ishmael, who was begotten according to the flesh, persecuted Isaac, who was begotten according to the spirit, by mocking him, and by insisting that he should be excluded from the inheritance of God, so also the younger son, so it hath happened now: the Jews, the natural descendants of Abraham, persecute us believers in Christ, who are Abraham's spiritual seed, and endeavour to exclude us from the inheritance, because they were the church and people of God before us, ver. 29.—But what saith the scripture happened on that occasion? why, that God ordered Abraham to cast out the bond-woman and her son; for the son of the bond-woman shall not inherit with the son of the free-woman; thereby declaring, that those who are the people of God only by natural descent and outward profession, shall not inherit the heavenly, ver. 30.—Thus, brethren, it appears from the law itself, that the births of Ishmael and Isaac were ordered in such a manner as to show, that believers of all nations are the children of Abraham, not by the bond-woman, indeed, but by the free; consequently, that they are heirs of the promises, and of the heavenly country, although they are not in bondage to the law of Moses, ver. 31.

CHAP. IV.

1 Now I say, as long as the heir is a child, he differeth nothing from a bond-man, though he be lord of all:

2 (Acts, 78.) For he is put under tutors and governors, until the time of him that was appointed of his father.

3 So also we were withal children, being in bondage under the elements of the world.

4 But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, born under the likeness of man:

5 That he might buy back those who were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

CHAP. IV.

Commentary.

1 Now if ye ask, why the gospel dispensation was not introduced immediately after the fall? and why the heirs, during so many ages, were left to the guidance of the law?—namely, the acknowledged end of Moses! I answer, As long as the heir is a child, he differeth nothing from a bond-man, although by right of inheritance he be the proprietor of the whole estate.

2 For he is put under tutors who teach him, and stewards who manage his estate, and supply him with necessaries, until the time before appointed of his father, for giving him the possession of his inheritance, arriveth.

3 So we also, the heirs of the promises, whilst we were children, were not put in possession of the promises, by the introduction of the gospel dispensation, immediately after the fall, but, to fit us for that dispensation, were placed in bondage under the elements of the world.

4 But when the time, before appointed of the Father for putting the heirs in possession of the promises, by the introducing of the gospel dispensation, was fully come, God sent forth, from heaven into our world, his Son, born of a woman, and born under the law; that, by his obedience unto death, he might buy off Jesus and Gentiles who were under law, that we might receive the adoption of sons; that we Gentiles might be made the people of God, and receive the blessings belonging to the people of God, by being introduced into the gospel church.

5 Ver. 1.-As long as the heir is a child, he differeth nothing from a bond-man, although he be lord of all. The time of this dispensation was that in which the Jews and Gentiles, being under the law and under the covenant of Moses, were the children of the world.

6 Ver. 2.-For he is put under tutors, which are the clergy of the church, and stewards, which are the bishops and presbyters, and under the law, which is the Mosaic law.

7 Ver. 3.-And the fulness of the time was come, when the church was ready to receive the gospel.

8 Ver. 4.-When the time was come, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, and born under the likeness of man, that he might buy back those who were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

9 Ver. 5.-That he might buy back those who were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons; that we Gentiles might be made the people of God, and receive the blessings belonging to the people of God, by being introduced into the gospel church.
And because ye are sons, God (καί τε κόρης) hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. (See Rom. viii. 15, note 2.)

7 So that thou art no more a bond-man, but a son; (See Gal. iii. 2, note 1.) and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

8 (Acts, 81.) However, then indeed, not knowing God, ye served as slaves (τω ως ήμερας εστε συνειδητα) those who are not gods by nature. See Eph. ii. 3, note 2.

9 But now, having acknowledged God, or rather, being acknowledged of God, why turn ye back again to the weak and poor elements, to which again, from the first, ye incline to be in bondage?

10 Ye carefully observe days, and moons, and seasons, and years.

11 I am afraid of you, lest perhaps I have laboured in vain among you.

12 Brethren, I pray you, Be as I am; for I am as ye are. Ye have injured me in nothing.

13 Ye know, indeed, that ( Acts, 117.) in weakness of the flesh I preached the gospel to you at first.

14 (Kae. 211.) Yet my temptation which was in my flesh, ye did not despise, neither did ye reject me; but received me as an angel of God, MAT, as Christ Jesus.
15 What then was your happiness! for I bear you witness, that, if possible, plucking out your eyes, ye would have given them to me.

16 So that I am become your enemy, when I speak truth to you!

17 They love you ardentlv, not honourably; for they wish to exclude us, that ye may love them ardentlv.

18 But ye are honourable to be ardentlv in love with a good man at all times, and not merely when I am present with you.

19 My little children, for whom I again travail in birth, till Christ be formed in you, 20 (1 Thess. iv. 10.) I could wish, indeed, to be present with you now, and to change my speech; for I am exceedingly in doubt (16th) concerning you.

21 Tell me, ye who wish to be under the law, that is, the law of Moses, do ye not understand the law?

22 For it is written, that Abraham had two sons; one by the bond-maid, and one by the free-woman.

23 But he, verily, who was of the bond-maid, was begotten according to the flesh, but he who was of the free-woman, (is) through the promise. (Gen. xviii. 10.)

24 Which things are an allegory: for (unto) these women are the two covenants: The one, verily, from Mount Sinai, bringing forth which the Galatians regarded the apostle at his first coming among them, cannot be more strongly painted than by these expressions.

Ver. 15. What then was your happiness!—It is necessary, who change saying, who change, may be taken in denigration. What, or How great then was your blessing of me! the blessings which ye gave me. This sense of the expression phrase, is unusual. In other passages of Paul’s writings, the word is used to denote blessed, or bases. Rom. ix. 23. Gen. xix. 22. We therefore must put it in the margin. I suppose it to be the true meaning, because it agrees better with the other with the sense of the apostle’s discourse.

Ver. 16. So that I am become your enemy—The apostle’s ad\- dressees, in putting the Galatians in mind of their former affection and gratitude to him as their spiritual father, and his contrasting it in this verse with their present temper of mind, is admirable.

Ver. 17. They love you ardentlv.—For this translation as ex, 2 Cor. xi. 1. Here, by importing the change of the apostle’s disposition towards him to the griffins of the false teachers, the apostle in some measure extinguished their fruit.

2. They wish to exclude us.—Instead of αἰσχρός, you, which is the common reading, some MSS. and printed copies have γιῖν, i. e., for which reason our translators have put it in the margin. I suppose it to be the true reading, because it agrees better with the other with the sense of the apostle’s discourse.

Ver. 22. For it is written.—As the apostle hath said, ver. 17. that he was going to reason from the law, the expression, ‘It is written,’ certainly means written in the law. Yet the passages quoted here from the law, Lev. i. 1, is one of many examples, in which the word law is used for the whole body of the Jewish revelation. See Rom. xi. 2, note. In ver. 29.—1. Which things are an allegory. This clause (ἦν ἄλλης προεστότης) is translated by Pearce, which things are allegorical, namely, by the prophet Isaiah, chap. iv. 17. But the frequent participles are sometimes put for their corresponding substantive nouns, (Ezra, vi. 16, last paragraph), the common translation, ‘which things are an allegory,’ is abundantly just. Properly, an allegory is, when persons and events present, or near at hand, with their qualities and circumstances, are considered as types or representations of persons and events more remote, to which they have a resemblance. Of this kind were the histories of some persons and events recorded in the Old Testament, as was shewed page 299. For the qualities and circumstances of these persons and events were, it seems, so represented by God, as to be apt representations of such future persons and events as God intended should attract attention of more power. This, however, is to be laid down as a fixed rule, that no ancient history is to be considered as allegorical, but those which God himself, or persons inspired by him, have interpreted allegorically.
25 (τῆς ἷγαροῦ ἀγρείων ἂν ἐγενέσθαι, for the name Hagar denotes Mount Sinai in Arabic), and she answered to the present Jerusalem, and is in bondage with her children. (See ver. 24, note 1.)

26 (οὐ, ἂν ἀποκτένων, see ver. 30.) But the freewoman, who is the mother of us all. (See ver. 24, note 1.)

27 For it is written, (Isa. liv. 1.), Rejoice, O barren, that beareth not: break forth and cry, thou that travailest not in birth: for more are the children of the deserts, than of her that was married. For, seeing the prophet, as well as the apostle, ver. 26, considers Sarah as the mother of all believers, we may not suppose she was made to conceive her son supernaturally, that she might be a type of the covenant under which believers are regenerated by the power of God; and that her son might be a type of all who by regeneration become members of the invisible church of God, called ver. 26, the Jerusalem after the flesh, which is free both from the bondage of the curse from the curse of the law. In like manner, Abraham's son by Hagar the bondmaid may have been begotten by the natural strength of the flesh, and born by a proper representation of such as are God's visible church, begotten by faith to the flesh; consequently, that, as the representation of the Jews, which was in bondage to the law, and which gave its members no title to the heavenly inheritance on account of the relation which they had to Abraham by natural descent. In this view, Hagar herself is a representation of the covenant from Sinai, by which the Haranites were made the visible church of God, and put in bondage to the law, and were by its curse excluded from the inheritance of heaven, if they had no other relation to Abraham but that of natural descent. In further confirmation of the allegorical meaning of the figures recorded by Moses, the apostle observes, ver. 29. That Ishmael, who was begotten according to the flesh, persecuted Isaac, who was begotten according to the spirit, as the Jews, the natural seed of Abraham, persecuted the believing Jews and Gentiles, his spiritual seed. Wherefore, as in his birth and condition, so in his character and actions, Ishmael was a fit type of the unbelieving Jews, Abraham's children; and Isaac, from the interpretation of the allegory, the apostle draws this conclusion, ver. 31. That all believers are the children of Abraham, not of the bond-woman, but of the free. (See Peter's equally good interpretation of Abraham's wife and sons; for he calls all believing holy women, whether Jews or Gentiles, the daughters of Sarah. If they, like her, believe, they become, 1 Pet. iii. 6. And Christ himself tells us, that those only are the children of Abraham, who do the works of Abraham, John vii. 15.)

28 Bringing forth children into bondage: The Jews are very properly said to have been driven into bondage by the covenant from Sinai, because the worship enjoined in that covenant was extremely troublesome and expensive; particularly their frequent separations on account of uncleanliness, their purifications and washings, their numerous sacrifices, and especially their three annual journeys to Jerusalem; all which were more grievous, that the Jews were of no avail in procure the favour of God, as moral governors of the Gentiles, by their additional care and trouble with which the pious Jews performed these things, their conscience of sin and dread of punishment being as great as before.

29 But the thigh of the covenant, which was formed for Isaac, established by the promise, his name being changed, Lehi, which is the name of Israel, is not new; it is alluded to by Isaiah; in that prophecy, Isaiah, chapter liv., it is written, Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear, break forth and cry, thou that didst not work for child: for more are the children of the desolate, than of the married woman. (See chap. iv. 1.)

30 But the apostle, transferring the thought to the present Jerusalem, which was the temple, ver. 8., and by that represents the church, which was the temple, Jer. xxv. 27., and is in bondage with her children; and in that sense is called, the Jerusalem after the flesh, agreeable to his former designation, ver. 26., Calls her, the freewoman, who is the mother of us all.

CHAPTER V.

39. But even so, he who was begotten (according to the flesh) was persecuted him who was begotten according to the Spirit, as also now.

40. But what saith the Scripture? (Gen.
xxi. 10.) Lo! even Isaac was the bond-maid and her son; for the son of the bond-maid shall not inherit with the son of the free-woman.

41. "Well then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-maid, but of the free-woman.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

The apostle, in the third chapter, having, from Abraham's justification by faith, proved,—1. That all who believe are the seed of Abraham, whom God in the covenant promised to justify by faith, proved,—2. That the law of Moses, which was given long after the covenant was raised by the oath of God, could neither annul nor alter the covenant, by introducing a method of justification different from that which was so solemnly established in the covenant;—3. That men are heirs of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the type, not meritoriously by obedience to the law, but by the free gift of God;—4. That the law was given to the Israelites, not to justify them, but to restrain them from transgressions, and by making them sensible of their sins, and of the demerit of their sins, to lead them to Christ for justification:—Parting, in the fourth chapter observed, that the method of justification by faith, established at the fall, was not universally published in the first ages, by immediate introducing the gospel dispensation, because the state of the world in the first ages did not admit thereof; and because it was proper that mankind should remain a while under the tuition of the light of nature, and of the law of Moses:—Also having declared, that the supernatural procreation of Isaac, and his birth in a state of freedom, was intended to typify the supernatural generation of Abraham's seed by faith, and their freedom from the bondage of the law of Moses as a term of salvation;—the apostle, in this fifth chapter, as the application of the whole of his doctrine, exhorted the Galatians to stand fast in that free-don from the law of Moses as a term of salvation, wherewith Christ had freed them in the gospel dispensation:

and by no means to be again held fast in bondage to any ritual form of worship, ver. 1.—Then, with the authority of an inspired apostle, he solemnly declared, that if they sought salvation by receiving circumcision, Christ would be of no manner of use to them as a Saviour, ver. 2.

The Judaizing teachers, who enjoined obedience to the law of Moses as necessary to salvation, being sensible, that the burdensomeness of the services required by Moses might deter the Gentiles from receiving circumcision, had, it seems, made the Galatians believe, that circumcision did not bind those who lived out of Judea to obey the more troublesome and expensive services of the law; such as the offering of sacrifices, the paying of tithes, the going up to Jerusalem three times in the year, &c.; but to obey those precepts only which were of easy performance—namely, the keeping of the sabbaths, the new moons, and the other holy days enjoined in the law; the abstaining from unclean meats, the avoiding of the company of the uncircumcised, &c. Wherefore, to undeceive the Galatians, the apostle solemnly testified to them, that every circumcised person, who sought to be justified by the law of Moses, bound himself to obey all its precepts without exception, and subjected himself to its curse if he failed in the least particular, ver. 5.—In short, they separated themselves from Christ, who sought to be meritoriously justified by the law of Moses; and, to their unspeakable loss, excluded themselves from the grace offered in the gospel, ver. 6.—as they might know from this, that all who adhere to Christ are warranted, by the gifts of the Spirit bestowed on them, to hope for justification through faith, without the works of the law of Moses, ver. 5—
Besides, in the gospel dispensation, neither circumcision, nor the want of it, availth anything to men's acceptance with God, but faith, strongly working by love to God and to man, ver. 5.—Next, the apostle having observed, that at the first the Galatians made good proficiency in the doctrine of the gospel, he asked, who it was that now interrupted their progress, so as to make them forsake the truth! ver. 7—And hoped, that when they considered what he had written, they would not think differently from him concerning the method of justification, ver. 10.—And because his enemies had said, that since he conversed with the apostles at Jerusalem, he had altered his doctrine, and now taught the necessity of circumcision, he desired to know how it came to pass that the Jews still persecuted him! For, if he preached circumcision, the stumbling-block of the cross of Christ was certainly removed out of their way, ver. 11.—Then concluded with wishing them to cut off by excommunication the person who had subverted them, ver. 12.

The doctrinal part of the epistle being finished, the apostle, in what remains, advised the Galatians not to use their freedom from the law of Moses with respect to meats, as a pretext for grumbling and murmuring, the offence of their weaker Jewish brethren, who still thought the meats forbidden by Moses unclean, ver. 13.—Because, in so doing, they would break the great Christian law of love, ver. 14.—the Jews, by speaking of the Gentiles as profane persons, and the Gentiles, by representing the Jews as ignorant bigots. For, said the apostle, by thus giving occasion to the flesh to exercise its lusts in biting and devouring one another, ye will bring destruction on one another, ver. 15.—He therefore commanded them to obey the dictates of their spirit, and not to fulfil the lusts of their flesh. Withal, to make them the more watchful in that respect, he told them, that the inclinations of the spirit and of the flesh are oftentimes contrary to the one to the other; and that, through the prevalence of the inclinations of the flesh, men are frequently hindered from doing what their spirit, that is, their reason and conscience, incline them to do. At the same time, to encourage them, he assured them, that if they followed the dictates of their reason enlightened by the Spirit, they would not fall under the curse of any law whatever, ver. 18—Then, to shew what sort of actions the lust of the flesh would lead them to perform, he enumerated the works of the flesh; and, to make them sensible of the dangerous nature of these works, he foretold now, as he had done before, that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God, ver. 19—21.—Also he enumerated the fruits of the Spirit; and in their commendation took notice, that their excellence is so evident, that in no nation was there ever any law made against them, ver. 22, 23.—Further, as a powerful motive to renounce the works of the flesh, he assured them that all Christ's faithful disciples have crucified the flesh with its passions and lusts; In short, since the Galatians lived under the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, he commanded them to walk according to its rules, ver. 25.—And cautioned such as possessed the spiritual gifts, to avoid vain-glory in the exercise of them, that they might not provoke their brethren to anger and strife. And those who were destitute of the spiritual gifts, he exhorted not to envy those who were endowed with them. ver. 26.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. V.—I Stand fast, therefore, in the freedom wherewith Christ hath freed us, and be not again held fast in the yoke of bondage.

2 Behold, I Paul say to you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing.1

3 (Mark 11 Petri 267.) And I testify, moreover, to every circumcised person, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.1

4 Ye are loved from Christ, who are justified (Eom. 1.) by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

5 (Eph. 98.) But we, through the Spirit, look for the hope of righteousness by faith.

Ver. 1. Be not again held fast.]—The apostle, though writing to Gentiles, might say, Be not again held fast in the yoke of bondage, because the law of Moses, which he was cautioning them to avoid, was a yoke of the same kind with that under which they had groaned while heathens. See Gal. iv. 3. note.—By this precept, the apostle likewise condemns the superstitions bodily services enjoined by the church of Jerusalem, which are really of the same nature with those prescribed by Moses, with this difference, that none of them are of divine appointment.

Ver. 2. If ye be circumcised, Christ will profit you nothing.]—This general expression must be limited, as in the commentary; because we cannot suppose that the circumcision of the Jewish believers incapacitated them from being profited by Christ. Further, as the preservation of Abraham's posterity, a distinct people from the rest of mankind, answered many important purposes in the divine government, (see Rom. xi. 3. note.) their observance of the rite of circumcision, declared by God himself to be the seal of his covenant with Abraham, was necessary to mark them as his descendants, as long as it was determined that they should be continued a distinctive people, and not assimilated to the Gentiles. This shows that the apostle's declaration is not to be considered as a prohibition of circumcision to the Jews as a distinctive mark, but as a rite to be retained by them as a memorial of their origin, and a pledge to the Gentiles of their future adoption. And therefore, while the Jews practised this rite, according to its original intention, for the purpose of distinguishing themselves as Abraham's descendants, and not for obtaining salvation, they did what was right. But the Gentiles, being of Abraham's race, were under no political obligation to circumcise themselves; consequently, if they received that rite, it must have been because they thought it necessary to their salvation; for which reason, the apostle absolutely prohibited it to all the Gentiles.

Ver. 3. He is a debtor to do the whole law.]—See the Illustr. ver. 3.—From chap. vi. 13. it appears, that the Judaizing teachers, who so earnestly enjoined obedience to the law of Moses as necessary to salvation, did not observe it themselves. This shows, that their sole motive in urging the Galatians to be circumcised, was, as the apostle in the passage just now cited observes, that they might avoid persecution from their unbelieving brethren, and have the honour of marking the Galatians prophetically to Judaism.

Ver. 4. Ye are loved from Christ.]—So the word ἐπίσπητος is translated by our translators, Rom. vii. 2. —The Vulgate hath here, 'Venit alia Christo! Benis, Evangelium separata Christi.' The apostle's meaning is, that whoever sought to be justified meritoriously by the law of Moses, and for that purpose received circumcision, dissolved his connexion with Christ; for Christ, who had been his Saviour, was neglected, and denounced all relation to, and dependence on Christ as a Saviour.

Ver. 5. Look for the hope of righteousness.]—So the word ἐπίσπητος is translated, Philipp. iii. 20.—Either this clause is elliptical, CHAP. V.

6 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision avails any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love, 2

7 Ye did run well; but who put a stop to you, that ye should not obey the truth? 8

8 (Ch) This persuasion cometh not from him who called you. 9

A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. 10

I am persuaded, (vi. 142,) concerning you (v. 155,) by the Lord, that ye will think nothing differently FROM ME: But he who troubleth you shall bear punishment, whatsoever he be. 11 12 But I, brethren, if I (v. 193,) new preachment, why am I (v.) now persecuted? Certainly the offence of the cross is abolished.

13 I wish they were even cut off who subvert you. 2

14 For the whole law is fulfilled in love. 60, by one precept, ver. 6, by this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, have a care lest ye be consumed by one another. 1 16 (Aen. 49. 20.) I command then, Walk by the spirit, and ye will not fulfill the lust of the flesh.

GALATIANS.

6 For in the gospel dispensation, neither circumcision avails any thing towards our acceptance with God, nor uncircumcision, but faith strongly working by love to God and to man. 7 At first ye made great progress in the doctrine and practice of the gospel: Who hath interrupted you in that good course, so as to make you now reject the truth? 8 This persuasion concerning the law, and the efficacy of its expulsion, is not wrought in you by him who first called you. 9 A little leaven, that is, the errors of one teacher, are sufficient to corrupt a whole church. 10 However, to comfort you, I am persuaded concerning you by the Lord, who, on reading what I have written, ye will not think differently FROM ME: But the teacher who, by his falsehoods, hath given you so much trouble, shall, when I come, be punished for it, whoever he be. 11 My enemies tell you, that I preach circumcision, brethren, if I now preach circumcision, why am I now persecuted by the Jews? Having left off preaching salvation through a crucified Messiah, certainly the offence of the cross is removed, (1 Cor. i. 23,;) and they should no longer persecute me. 12 I wish they were even cut off by excommunication, who subvert your faith by their malicious calumnies and false doctrines. 13 Now ye, brethren, have been called by the gospel into freedom from the law of Moses as the rule of your justification. Nevertheless, use not this liberty as a pretext for gratifying your lusts. 14 They who stickle for the law ought to be zealous in the offices of love. For the whole law, as it respects our neighbour, is fulfilled by obeying one precept, even this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 15 But if, from your zeal for, or your zeal against the law of Moses, ye wound and destroy one another's characters, have a care lest ye bring everlasting destruction on one another. 16 I command then, Walk according to the dictates of your spiritual part, and so ye will not gratify the lust of your animal nature; particularly, ye will not gratify the selfish passions of envy, malicious anger, revenge, and must be supplied thus. We look for the accomplishment of our hope of righteousness by faith; or, hope, the substantive noun, stands for the participles.—We through the Spirit look for the hoped righteousness by faith.

Ver. 6.—Nor circumcision. 1.—The apostle mentioned circumcision because the Galatians, from his speaking so much against circumcision, might have fancied there was something meritorious in uncircumcision. 2. But faith strongly working by love.—The account which the apostle gives here of faith deserves attention. He does not say that it is the ground of justification; nor that it is a speculatively true belief of the truths of the gospel; nor that it is an instrument or means of justification, or that it is the cause of justification; but he gives it as an active virtue in the persons justified; and this is the true idea of the faith here meant. Faith for faith's sake is not the faith which is justified by faith, because they were deficient in love to each other. 3. Ye did run well.—The exercises of faith and holiness enjoined in the gospel, are often in scripture compared to the ancient athletic exercises, especially to the race; because in each exercise (as greater exertions of activity and strength were necessary to obtain the prize, Heb. xii. 1.) 4. Who put a stop to you?—In the apocryphal, the apostle did not ask who was the person who had put a stop to them; but he expressed himself in an exhortatory and instructive manner. The word signifies one going across the course, so as to unjustly and stop another who is running. 5. And ye were even cut off. —This is a proverbial expression, in which the pernicious and infectious nature of erroneous doctrine and vicious example is set forth. Hence our Lord gave the name of leaven to the doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees. Matt. xvi. 11, 12. The same put the apostle gave to the doctrine of the Judasites in this passage, and to the incestuous person. 1 Cor. v. 7. See note 1. on that verse. 6. Even cut off.—Ver. 10. Shall bear punishment.—See 2 Cor. v. 6, 8. xii. 10. 7. But who put a stop to you?—Jordin thinks the apostle threatened to punish false teachers.

Ver. 11.—I command then, Walk by the spirit. —The apostle often uses the word spirit, to denote men's spiritual part, their reason and conscience
For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary to one another, so that ye cannot do the things which ye incline, these ye cannot do.

But if ye are led by the spirit, ye are not under the law. See the note on ver. 23.

Now, the works of the flesh are manifest: which are uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, enmities, strife, envying, wrath, brawling, sects, heresies, concupiscence which I foretell you now, as I also have foretold, that they which practise such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such things there is no law.

Besides, they who are Christ's, have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts.

Since we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit.

Galatians.

Ye have great need to subdue the lusts of the flesh: for the flesh strongly inclines men to act contrary to reason and conscience; and these principles are often contrary to each other, so that ye cannot always do the things which your better part inclines you to do. See Rom. vii. 18.

But, to encourage you to subdue the flesh, know, that if ye habitually follow the dictates of your better part, ye are not under the curse of any law, so as to be punished.

Now, the works produced by the lust of the flesh are manifest: namely, idolatry, fornication, and all kinds of uncleanness; such as incest, sodomy, bestiality, the indulging lascivious thoughts, and the reading of lascivious books; the worshipping of idols, sorcery, or a pretended communication with invisible malignant powers; enmities long kept up; quarrels issuing in unreasonable law-suits; ambitious envying; violent anger; brawling; causeless separations; the forming of sects in religion, for the sake of gain, in opposition to conscience; inward grieving at the happiness of others; the taking of men's lives unjustly, and the maiming of their members; intemperance to intoxication; lewd frolics, and running through the streets in the night-time; and such like evil practices: concerning which I foretell you now, as I have often done formerly, that they who practise such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. A awful declaration!

But the fruit which reason enlightened by the Spirit of God produces, is love to God and man; joy, occasioned by that excellent affliction; peace with all men; the patient bearing of injuries; a soft and sweet manner of speaking; a beneficent disposition; fidelity in engagements, promises, and trusts; calmness under provocations; temperance in the use of meats and drinks. In praise of these virtues I observe, that there never was any law or religion by which they were prohibited, or the persons punished who practised them.

Besides, they who are Christ's brethren, (iii. 29.) have, from love to him, and admiration of his character, crucified the body with the passions and lusts proper to it.

Since we live in the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, and, enjoy the spiritual gifts, let us also walk by the spirit: that is, by the rules prescribed in this spiritual dispensation.
Let us not be vain-glorying, provoking one another, envying one another.

In particular, let us who enjoy the spiritual gifts, beware of being puffed up with pride, lest we provoke one another to anger; and let us who want these gifts, abstain from envying those who possess them.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations in this Chapter.

The apostle, in what follows, recommends to the spiritual men who were teachers in the Galatian churches, to restore, by meek exhortations and affectionate rebukes, those who were surprised into any fault, ver. 1.—And to sympathize with, and assist one another in every distress, whereby they would fulfill Christ's law of love, ver. 2.—And because men's neglecting others in their distresses, often proceeds from pride, or an high opinion of themselves, the apostle exhorted every one to try his own work; and if he found it good, he would have matter of boasting in what he himself is, and not in the inferiority of others, ver. 4. This, he told them, was the only sure ground of boasting, because every one shall bear his own burden at the judgment, and be treated, not according to the opinion which he hath of himself, or which others have of him, but according to what he truly is, ver. 5.

Having thus instructed the teachers in their duty to the people, he shewed the people their duty to their teachers; for he commanded every one who was instructed in the word, to impart some share of all the temporal good things which he enjoyed, to the person who instructed him, ver. 6. And lest any of them might neglect to provide a proper maintenance for the ministers of the word, on the pretences which an immoderate selfishness is ready to suggest, he assured them, as certainly as men reap the kind of grain which they sow, ver. 7.—so certainly he who, neglecting good works, soweth into his flesh, by employing himself in procuring the gratification of his fleshly appetites, shall from such a course reap corruption: whereas he who soweth into his spirit the good seed of knowledge and virtue, shall from that course reap life everlasting, ver. 8. And therefore he exhorted the Galatians, whilst they had opportunity, to do good to all, especially to them who were of the household of faith, ver. 9, 10. Next, he desired them to consider what pains he had taken, in writing so large a letter to them with his own hand, to secure them against the sophistry of the false teachers, ver. 11. And having recalled these impostors to his thoughts, he could not finish his letter without observing, that the earnestness with which they pressed circumcision, proceeded entirely from their desire to live in pleasure, and to avoid persecution for preaching salvation through a crucified Messiah, ver. 12. To prove this, he assured the Galatians, that these circumcised teachers did not themselves keep the law; but they wished them to be circumcised, that they might boast among the unbelieving Jews of their having proselyted them to Judaism, ver. 13. But with respect to himself, he told them, that he had no worldly view whatever in converting them, and never wished to boast in any thing, but in the doctrine of salvation through the cross of Christ, by which the world was crucified to him, and he to the world, ver. 14. Then declared a second time, (see chap. v. 6,) that under the gospel, neither circumcision avails any thing towards our acceptance with God, nor uncircumcision, but an entire change of principles, dispositions, and actions, ver. 15. And having in this epistle plainly declared, and fully established the doctrine of justification by faith, he forbade the false teachers to trouble him any more on account of that doctrine, as he bare on his body marks of his sufferings for the gospel, whereby his sincerity in the things which he preached was put beyond all doubt, ver. 17. Then concluded with giving the Galatians his apostolical benediction, ver. 18.

NEW TRANSLATION.

Chap. VI.—1. Also, brethren, if any member of your churches, through the strength of temptation, or the frailty of his own nature, is surprised into any work of the flesh, ye who are teachers and rulers, restore such a person to his proper place in Christ's body, the church, by meek instructions and affectionate rebukes and wise counsels, that he may view himself as one of this frailty, lest he fall more deeply into temptation. 2. Instead of rebuking another with harshness, sympathize with another in every distress; and thus fulfill the law of Christ, which enjoins benevolence even to those who fall into sin. 3. For if any one, thinking highly of himself, is immoderately severe towards his brethren when they fall into sin, and does not assist the distressed, such a person, being nothing, deceiveth himself in thinking himself better than others. 4. But the worth of a man is shown by his works, let every one try his own work, rather than the work of others, and if good, then he shall have boasting in himself alone, and not in another, as worse than himself.

COMMENTARY.

Chap. VI.—1. Also, brethren, if any member of your churches, through the strength of temptation, or the frailty of his own nature, is surprised into any work of the flesh, ye who are teachers and rulers, restore such a person to his proper place in Christ's body, the church, by meek instructions and affectionate rebukes and wise counsels, that he may view himself as one of this frailty, lest he fall more deeply into temptation. 2. Instead of rebuking another with harshness, sympathize with another in every distress; and thus fulfill the law of Christ, which enjoins benevolence even to those who fall into sin. 3. For if any one, thinking highly of himself, is immoderately severe towards his brethren when they fall into sin, and does not assist the distressed, such a person, being nothing, deceiveth himself in thinking himself better than others. 4. But the worth of a man is shown by his works, let every one try his own work, rather than the work of others, and if good, then he shall have boasting in himself alone, and not in another, as worse than himself.

1. Ver. 1—1. If a man be surprised into any fault, ye, the spiritual men, restore such a person in the spirit of meekness; taking a view of thyself, lest even thou be tempted.

2. Ver. 2. Ye, the spiritual men, restore.—Exagregia, See Ew. lv. 12. note 1.—According to Locke, Glandier, and others, spiritual, the spiritual men, were those among the Galatians who were eminent for their knowledge and goodness. But I rather think they were persons who possessed the spiritual gifts. 1 Cor. xiv. 31. and so it belonged to instruct, admonish, and rebuke others. For the teachers and rulers were generally chosen from among the first converts, on whom the spiritual gifts were bestowed in the greatest plenty.

3. Ver. 3. Taking a view of thyself.—There is a great beauty in thus suddenly changing the discourse from the Galatian spiritual men to the reader himself. It rescues his attention, and carries the exhortation home to him with peculiar force.

4. Ver. 4. Lest even thou be tempted.—That is, fall by temptation; the cause being here put for the effect. The consciousness of our own frailty should dispose us to be merciful towards those who sin.
Galatians

1. To bring your actions to the trial, it is absolutely necessary: for every one, at the judgment, shall answer for his own actions only.
2. Now let him who is instructed in the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, impart a share of all the good things he enjoys to the instructor. By this good work, ye may have matter of boasting in yourselves, ver. 4.
3. To maintain them who teach you, is your duty. Therefore, do not deceive yourselves, God will not be mocked: for, as in the natural, so in the moral world, whatever a man soweth, that also he shall reap.
4. Therefore he who, by spending his time and wealth in gratifying his sensual desires, soweth into his own flesh, shall reap from such a sensual life reprobation; the utter destruction of his soul and body. But he who, by spending his time and wealth in improving his mind, and in doing good to others, soweth into his spirit, shall, from such sowing into the spirit, assuredly reap life everlasting.
5. Wherefore, having such a prospect, let us not flag in improving our minds, and in doing good to others: For, in the proper season, namely at the judgment, we shall reap (ver. 8.) the blessed harvest of everlasting life, if we faint not.
6. Certainly, then, while the season of sowing lasts, let us work good to all men, whatever their country or their religion may be, but especially to them who are of the family of God by faith; for, considering our persecuted state, we ought to be very attentive in succouring one another.

1. Ye see how large a letter I have written to you with my own hand. By this ye may understand my anxiety to preserve you in the true faith of the gospel.
2. As many of your teachers as wish to appear fair in the eyes of their unbelieving brethren, by their attachment to the law, these strongly persuade you to be circumcised, not because they think circumcision necessary to salvation, but only that they may not be persecuted by the unbelieving Jews, for preaching salvation through a crucified Messiah.
3. These hypocrites do not enjoin circumcision on any conscientious motives; for not even do the circumcision themselves keep the law of Moses; but they wish you to be circumcised, merely that they may boast, among the unbelieving Jews, of having persuaded you to receive that rite in your flesh.
4. But let it never happen to me to boast, except in salvation through the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world is crucified to me—is reigned incapable, either of alluring me by its plea-
CONCLUSION.

As it was the general belief of the Jewish nation, that salvation could only be obtained by obedience to the law of Moses, it is natural to suppose, that many of the Jews who embraced the gospel would teach the Gentiles, that unless they were circumcized they could not be saved: And, on the other hand, that such of them as knew the truth of the gospel, would oppose that false doctrine with a zeal equal to the magnitude of its pernicious consequences. The truth is, this controversy actually took place very early in the church, and occasioned such keen disputation and dissension among the brethren, that it became necessary to apply to the apostles and elders in Jerusalem to have it determined. Accordingly, after deliberating on the matter with the chief brethren of the church, they unanimously decreed, that circumcision was by no means necessary to the salvation of the Gentiles; and sent copies of their decree to the churches in Antioch, and Syria, and Cyrrhus, by the hands of Barnabas and Paul. But the latter, who knew the extreme attachment of the Jews to the law, foreseeing, that notwithstanding the decision of the apostles and elders, some of the more zealous Jewish believers in every church would urge the Gentiles to receive the law as necessary to their salvation; and knowing, that by the prevalence of that doctrine the gospel would be overthrown, he judged it proper that the brethren of the Gentiles should be secured from being drawn into an error so pernicious. He therefore wrote immediately to the churches of Galatia, where, as he was informed, some had already gone over to Judaism, the letter, in which he proved by the strongest arguments, that circumcision was not necessary to the salvation of either Jews or Gentiles, but that faith working by love. The same doctrine he inculcated in most of his other epistles; and by his zeal for the truth of the gospel, and earnest endeavours to maintain it, he at length banished Judaism out of the Christian church. The epistle to the Galatians, therefore, in which this matter was debated and settled, being, as Chandler observes, the earliest of all the writings of the New Testament, in its most early period, carrieth, in the very nature of the question of which it treateth, a strong internal evidence of its antiquity and authenticity. For it is not to be supposed, that any person in the second or third age of Christianity would be at the trouble to write such an elaborate letter, for the purpose of determining a controversy, which it is well known had no existence in the church after the apostles' days.
EPHESIANS.

PREFACE.

St. Paul’s first coming to Corinth happened in the year 51, as was formerly shewed, Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 1. On that occasion he abode among the Corinthians somewhat more than eighteen months, Acts xvii. 11, 18, then departed by sea for Judea. In his voyage, touching at Ephesus, a city famed for its commerce and riches, and for its being the metropolis of the province of Asia, he preached in the synagogue there with some prospect of success. But hastening to go to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, he left Ephesus soon, Acts xviii. 19, 20, 21. His first visit, therefore, to the Ephesians, was in the year 53. From the history of the Acts it appears, that the Ephesians were a very dissolute people, and extremely addicted to magic; ‘walking,’ as the apostle expresseth it, chap. ii. 9; ‘according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit which worketh in the children of disobedience.’—Their city, also, was the very throne of idolatry; the worship of idols being performed in no part of the heathen world with greater splendour than at Ephesus, on account of the famous temple of Diana, which was built between the city and the harbour, at the expense of all Asia; and in which was an image of that goddess, said to have fallen down from Jupiter, Acts xix. 25. This image, as we may well suppose, was worshipped with the most pompous rites by a multitude of priests, and a vast concourse of votaries from every quarter, who, to gain the favour of Diana, came to Ephesus to offer sacrifices at her shrine.

Such being the state of religion and morals among the Ephesians, St. Paul, who was expressly commissioned by Christ to turn the Gentiles from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, resolved, at his departure from their city, to return soon, Acts xviii. 21. that he might have an opportunity of attacking idolatry in this its chief seat. Accordingly, having celebrated the feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem, ‘he went down to Antioch, and after he had spent some time there he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples,’ Acts xviii. 23, 23. And having passed through the upper coasts, he came to Ephesus, Acts xix. 1. On this occasion he preached boldly in the synagogue for the space of three months, discourse concerning, and proving the things which related to the kingdom of God, ver. 8. But the Jews, who had heard him with pleasure at his former visit, now opposed him violently, when they perceived that he preached salvation without requiring obedience to the law of Moses. They spake also with the greatest virulence against the gospel itself; in so much, that the apostle found it needful, and even dangerous, to frequent the synagogue any longer. Wherefore, separating the disciples from the unbelieving Jews, he discourse daily in the school of one Tyranus, who either was himself a disciple, or allowed the apostle the use of his school for hire: ‘And this,’ we are told, Acts xix. 10, ‘continued for the space of two years; so that all they who dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks.’

After leaving the school of the philosopher Tyranus, the apostle seems to have preached and worked miracles at Ephesus, in the places of most public resort; for his fame became so great, that ‘from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them,’ Acts xviii. 11. About this time, also, the apostle’s fame was greatly increased, by what happened to the seven sons of Sceva, one of the Jewish chief priests, who went about pretending to cast out devils. In short, Paul’s preaching and miracles were so blessed of God, that multitudes of the idolatrous inhabitants of Asia, strongly impressed by them, embraced the gospel; and among the rest, many who had practised the arts of magic and divination. These, to shew how sincerely they repented of their former evil practices, brought out the books which contained the secrets of their arts, and burned them publicly, notwithstanding they were of very great value: So mightily grew the word of the Lord, and prevailed in Ephesus itself. This extraordinary success determining the apostle to stay in Asia for a season, he sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia. But after they were gone, one Demetrius, a silversmith, who made shrines for Diana, calling together the workmen of like occupation with himself, said to them, ‘Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth: Moreover, ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people; saying, that they be no gods which are made with hands: So that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought; but also, that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth.’ By this artful speech Demetrius engaged the craftsmen to such a degree, that they made a great tumult, laid hold on Gaius and Aristarchus, Paul’s companions, and rushed with them into the theatre, intending, no doubt, to throw them to the wild beasts which were kept there. But the town-clerk, speaking to the multitude with great calmness and prudence, quieted them and dismissed the assembly; so that the Christian preachers were let go in safety.

It is said, Acts xx. 1. That ‘after the uproar was ceased, Paul departed for to go into Macedonia.’ But as in the sacred history many events are narrated as in immediate succession, which happened at a considerable distance of time from each other, the passage just now quoted may be supposed an instance of that kind. For, if I am not mistaken, the apostle abode two or three months in Ephesus and its neighbourhood after the riot. This appears from his speech to the elders of Ephesus at Miletus, Acts xx. 19. ‘Remember that after three years, I left you and came to Ephesus, Acts xx. 19. 21. When he returned he preached in the synagogue three months, then taught in the school of Tyranus two years. On leaving the school of Tyranus, he preached and wrought miracles more publicly; the effect of which was, that many believed, and came and confessed their evil deeds, Acts xix. 18. Many also who used curious arts, being converted, brought their books and burned them, ver. 19. After which the apostle sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia, but he himself stayed in Asia till the riot of Demetrius. The things which happened after Paul left the school of Tyranus, to the riot of Demetrius, may have taken up five months; and these added to the two years and four months before mentioned, make his abode in Ephesus, from his first arrival to the riot, in whole, only two years and nine months. Wherefore, the remaining months of his three years’ abode at Ephesus must have passed after the riot; unless we are of opinion, that his transactions, from the time of his leaving the school of Tyranus to the riot, occupied eight months. However, as some of the Asians were his friends, Acts xix. 19, there is nothing improbable in supposing, that he remained in safety at Ephesus, or in the country adjacent, even after the riot; especially if he no Sect. II. — Shewing that the Epistle, which, in our Canon, is inscribed to the Ephesians, was actually written to them, and was not originally inscribed to the Laodi- cæans.

Since the publication of Mill's edition of the Greek New Testament, many learned men have adopted his opinion, that the epistle in our Canon inscribed To the Ephesians was not written to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiæans. This opinion Mill hath endeavoured to support by the following arguments:—1. The testimony of Marcion the heretic, who, as Tertullian reports, said the Epistle to the Ephesians was written to the Laodiæans; or called this the Epistle to the Laodiæans. 2. St. Ia- sil, in his second book against Eunomius, insinuates, that the first verse of the epistle to the Ephesians ran originally in this manner: *'To the saints who are, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus,' without the words in Ephesians.—3. Certain passages in the epistle itself, which, in Mill's opinion, are neither suitable to the character of the Ephesians, nor to the habits which subsisted between them and their spiritual father Paul.

But to these arguments Lardner, who maintains the common opinion, opposes. 1. The agreeing testimony of all the ancient MSs. and versions of this epistle now extant; particularly the Syriac, Vulgate, Persic, and Arabic, all which, without exception, have the words in Ephesians in the first verse. For, as he very well observes, *'It is inconceivable how there should have been such a general agreement in this reading, if it was not the original inscription of the epistle."

2. The unanimous consent of all the ancient fathers, and Christian writers, who, without exception, bear witness that this epistle was written to the Ephesians, and never entertained the least doubt of it. This argument is well represented by Lardner, who, after the most accurate search into every thing pertaining to ecclesiastical antiquities, hath thus written, Can. vol. ii. page 394, *'That this epistle was sent to the church at Ephesus, we are assured by the testimony of all catholic Christians of all past ages. This we can now say with confidence, having examined the principal Christian writers of the first ages, to the beginning of the twelfth century; in all which space of time, there appears not one who had any doubt about it.' Of these testimonies, that of Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, in the end of the first century, is very remarkable. In a letter which he wrote to the Ephesians from Smyrna, in his way to Rome, he says, chap. xii. 'Ye are the companions in the mysteries of the gospel of the Paul the sanctified, the martyr, deservedly most happy; at whose feet may I be found when I shall have attained unto God, who (παρεσφάλασθηναι), for (λήγειν), as (παρεκκλησην, Eph. ii. 31. is put for (λήγειν), throughout all his epistle, makes mention of you in Christ.

3. Ignatius means that Paul commended the Ephesians, and never blamed them throughout the whole of his epistle, as he did elsewhere in the letters which he wrote to them. This is exactly true of the present epistle to the Ephesians. Moreover, by calling them παρεκκλησι, companions or partakers of the mysteries of the gospel of Paul, he alludes to those passages in the present epistle to the Ephesians, where the gospel is presented as a mystery made known to the apostle, and by him to them. Ignatius having thus plainly described our epistle to the Ephesians, there can be no doubt of the genuineness of its inscription. For if that epistle was written in the 9th of Nero, and Ignatius's epistle in the 10th of Trajan, as Bishop Pearson supposes, the distance between the two epistles will be only forty-five years; consequently, Ignatius being of age at the time Paul is supposed to have written to the Ephesians, he could not be ignorant of the truth concerning it. But, without citing more testimonies, it is sufficient to observe with Lardner, in the general, 'That Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian, writers of the second and third centuries, quote this epistle as written to the Ephesians, as freely and plainly as they do his epistles to the Romans, Galatians, Corinthians, or any other of the acknowledged epistles of Paul; and that it is quoted, in like manner, by all the writers of every age, Latins, Greeks, and Syrians.'
great a stress, Lardner observes, that his credit is very little in an affair of this kind. For Tertullian, who says Marcion called this ‘the Epistle to the Laodiceans,’ says also that Marcion rejected the epistles of Paul to Timothy and Titus. And though Grotius has remarked, that in speaking of the epistle to the Ephesians, Marcion had no temptation to falsify, the answer is, All the catholic writers of that age have called this the ‘Epistle to the Ephesians,’ and they had no temptation to falsify; for they had no interest to serve by it: And if Marcion ever said this epistle was written to the Laodiceans, meaning thereby that it was written, not to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans, he affirmed what was false; as we are expressly assured, by the unanimous testimony of men who had no interest to deceive us in this matter, and who could not be deceived themselves.—Further, though Tertullian hath said that Marcion called this the Epistle to the Laodiceans, he hath not said that Marcion founded his opinion on the authority of any ancient MSS; he had ever seen. On the contrary, there is reason to believe, that the copy of this epistle which Marcion used, was inscribed, not to the Laodiceans, but to the Ephesians, as Lardner hath showed. Besides, it is not said that Marcion founded his opinion on any ancient MSS, he had ever seen, so neither is it said, that any person who had opportunity to know the matter, told him that this epistle was written not to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans. We have good reason, therefore, to believe, with Lardner, that if this was Marcion’s opinion, he took it up without inquiry; being led to it, perhaps, as others since his time have been, by the manner that is made, Col. iv. 16. of an epistle from Laodicea.

4. With respect to St. Basil’s inquisition, that the words in Ephes. were wanting in the original inscription of this letter, Lardner hath observed, that if any ancient MSS. wanted these words, they were so little regarded as not to be followed by any of those who transcribed the scriptures. For there are no MSS. now extant, in which that reading is preserved. And even though it had been preserved in some, they could have no authority; because the omission of the words, in Ephes. would make this a general epistle; contrary to chap. i. 15. which shews, that it was addressed to some particular church, of whose faith and love the apostle had heard good accounts, and whom he begged not to faint at his afflictions for them, chap. iii. 15. Contrary also to chap. vi. 21. 22. which shews, that the members of this particular church were well acquainted with the writer, and took such an interest in him as to be comforted by the knowledge of his affairs. Nay, contrary to ver. 23. 24. of the same chapter, where the brethren in Ephesus are given for the brethren of a particular church, and then to all who loved our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

5. To the passages in this epistle quoted to prove that it could not be written to the Ephesians, Lardner opposes a variety of other passages, which agree better to the Ephesians than to any other people; particularly those which shew, that the apostle was well acquainted with the persons to whom he wrote. For example, chap. i. 13. where he says, ‘By whom (Christ), after ye believed, ye were sealed with the spirit of promise.’ Also in the end of chap. i. having spoken of Christ as filling all his members with his graces and graces, he adds, chap. ii. 1. ‘Even you who were dead in trespasses and sins.’— Chap. iv. 20. ‘But ye have not so learned Christ. 21. Seeing ye have heard him, and have been taught concerning him, as the truth is in Jesus.’ Now, could the apostle say these things, unless he had been well acquainted with the persons to whom he wrote? or rather, unless they had been instructed and endowed with the spiritual gifts by himself?—Further, if the apostle had not been acquainted with the persons to whom he was writing, and if they had not been his own converts, would they have taken such interest in him, as to make it proper for him to send Tychicus to make known all things concerning himself? chap. vi. 21. 22. —To all the former, add chap. ii. 20. 21. 22. 23. 18. in which there are evident allusions to the temple of Diana; which shews still more plainly, that the epistle under consideration was written to the inhabitants of Ephesus.

6. The passages in this epistle which are quoted to prove that it could not be written to the Ephesians, may easily be interpreted consistently with the supposition that it was inscribed to the Ephesians; as shall be shown in the notes on the passages themselves, chap. i. 15. iii. 2. 4. 7. The salvation sent to the brethren in Laodicea, Col. iv. 15. is a strong presumption, that the epistle in the canon, inscribed to the Ephesians, was not directed to the Laodiceans. For the epistle to the Colossians being written at the same time with the supposed epistle to the Laodiceans, and sent by the same messenger, Tychicus, Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7. 8. is it probable, that, in the epistle to the Colossians, the apostle would think it needful to salute the brethren in Laodicea, to whom he had written a particular letter in which he had given them his apostolical benediction?

To conclude, the arguments on the one side and on the other of this question, being fairly weighed, every impartial person, I should think, must be sensible, that Mill’s opinion stands on no solid foundation. And therefore I scruple not to affirm, with Dr. Lardner, that the epistle under consideration was not written to the Laodiceans, but to the Ephesians; as the inscription, which is undoubtedly genuine, expressly bears.—If any reader is of a different opinion, he may be indulged in it, because, as Chandler observes, ‘It is not material to whom the epistle was inscribed, whether to the Ephesians or Laodiceans, since the authority of the epistle doth not depend on the persons to whom it was written, but on the person who indited it; who was St. Paul, as the letter itself testifies, and all genuine antiquity concur.’

Sect. III.—Of the Occasion of Writing the Epistle to the Ephesians.

During the apostle’s imprisonment at Rome, among others who were sent to inquire after his welfare, Ephaphroditus came to him from the Philippian, and Ephesians from the Colossians. In return for the kindness of these churches, the apostle wrote to them the letters in the Canon of the New Testament, which bear their names. Now, as was observed in the last paragraph but one of the preceding section, seeing he sent his letter to the Ephesians by Tychicus, the bearer of his epistle to the Colossians, and left it to him to give the Ephesians an account of his state, (Eph. vi. 21.) and seeing Ephaphroditus, (Phil. iv. 18.), and Epaphras, (Col. i. 7. 8.) came from their respective churches, to give the apostle an account of their affairs, and to inquire how matters went with him, may we not suppose, that Tychicus also came on the same errand from Ephesus? especially as we have reason to think he was an Ephesian, from his being appointed by the churches of Asia, of which Ephesus was the metropolis, their messenger, along with Trophimus an Ephesian, (Acts xx. 20.), to accompany Paul to Jerusalem with the collections, Acts xx. 4. Besides, it appears, that about the time the epistle to the Ephesians was written, some person had given the apostle an account of their affairs; for he tells them, chap. i. 15. ‘That he had heard of their faith and love.’ This person, I suppose, was Tychicus, who may have told him likewise of the insidious arts used by the Judaizing teachers, for persuading the Ephesians to join the law of Moses with the gospel. But whoever the person was who gave the information, be at the same time assured the apostle, that their arts had not succeeded. The Ephesians maintained the faith of Christ in purity, and lived suitably to their Christian profession.

This good news filled the apostle with joy. Nevertheless, knowing how indefatigable the false teachers were in spreading their errors, he wrote to the Ephesians the letter which bears their name, not to censure them for any irregularity of conduct, as he did the Corinthians, nor for any deviation from the doctrine of the gospel, as he did the Galatians, but merely to prevent them from being impressed with the plausible arguments which the Judazers used to persuade them to embrace the law of Moses. Of these arguments, indeed, the apostle hath given us no particular account. But, from the things which he hath written, to establish the Ephesians in the faith and profession of the gospel, we may conjecture, that at Ephesus, as in all other places, the false teachers suited their arguments to the passions and prejudices of the persons they addressed. And therefore, because the Ephesians, before their conversion, had been captivated with an high admirated of the heathen mysteries, and with the magnificence of the temple of Diana, and with the splendour of her worship, and looked upon to themselves as keepers of the temple of that idol, and boasted of the privileges which her priests and votaries enjoyed; the Judazers talked to them in the most pompous manner of the law of Moses, and of its wonderful discoveries concerning the being and attributes of God, the origin of things, the deluge, the general judgment, &c. as far exceeding the discoveries made in the most celebrated of the heathen mysteries.
They described likewise the magnificence of the temple at Jerusalem, and the splendour of the worship performed there, according to a ritual of God's own appointment: They praised the efficacy of the atonements made by the Levitical sacrifices, and the advantages which the Jews derived from the oracles of the tree God, contained in their sacred books: Withal, they exulted the Jews as the most honourable people on earth, because they were the keepers of the only temple the true God had on earth, and worshipped him in that temple, and had among them an order of men, made priests by God himself, to offer sacrifices for sin, and to perform all the other parts of the worship of God.

The apostle, says, I have said, are not formally stated by the apostle. Nevertheless, as was just now observed, the things which he hath written in this epistle imply, that the Judazers teachers objected to the Ephesians with speeches of that sort. For, lest the admiration of the heathen mysteries might have made them fond of the law of Moses, whose discoveries they were told exceeded the discoveries in the mysteries; and lest their passion for a pompous worship might have inclined them to embrace the showy rites of Judaism, or perhaps to relapse into heathenism, the apostle gave them such a sublime view of the Christian doctrine and worship, as could not fail to raise their admiration. Only, in giving it, he did not follow the didactic method, but filled his letter with rapturous thanksgivings to God for the great discoveries made to the Ephesians in the gospel. And having mentioned some of these blessed truths, he ended them, 'The mystery of God's will,' chap. i. 9.—and 'the mystery,' by way of eminence, chap. iii. 3.—and 'the mystery of Christ,' ver. 4.—and 'the mystery of the gospel,' chap.
vi. 19. and observed, that that mystery was made known to the holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, Eph. iii.
5. not to be concealed, like the heathen mysteries, but to be published, that Jews and Gentiles receiving it, might be gathered together into one church, ver. 10. or fellowship, which he called a heavenly place, on account of the discoveries of heavenly things that were made in it, chap.
ii. 6. Next, the apostle prayed that God would enlighten their understanding, that they might know the greatness and extent of the blessings promised to believers in the mystery of God's will, ver. 18, 19. Then spake of the dignity of Christ, whom God hath made head over all things to the church, and of his power to fill all the members of his church with spiritual gifts, ver. 20—23. And among the rest, even the idolatrous Gentiles themselves, who, notwithstanding the discoveries made in the heathen mysteries, were living in deplorable ignorance and wickedness, chap. ii. 11—13.

Next, with respect to the law of Moses, and the pompous worship performed in the temple of Jerusalem, the apostle told the Ephesians, that they and the rest of the Gentiles, while idolaters, had indeed been excluded from that worship, and of course were strangers to the covenants of promise, and without the desire to have these privileges was not to be regarded by them under the gospel; because Christ, by his death, had abolished the whole ordinances of the law of Moses, as of no far-er use. And by joining Jews and Gentiles into one new society, or church, the Gentiles were become joint partners with the Jews in all spiritual privileges, chap.
i. 11—18.: And were no longer strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the believing Jews, ver. 19.: And were built with them on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, into a great temple for an habitation of God, chap. ii. 22.:—By representing the Christian church under the image of a temple, the apostle, if I mistake not, insinuated, among other things, that it was intended to be the repository of the mystery of God's will,
as the heathen temples were the repositories of the mysteries of the gods to whom they were consecrated.

Further, the apostle assured the Ephesians, that the mystery of Christ had been made known to him and his brethren apostles, more fully than in former ages to the Jewish prophets; namely, that the Gentiles should be joint heirs, and a joint body, and joint partners with the Jews, of God's promises in Christ, through the gospel, chap. iii. 3—6. And therefore, they were to give no heed to the Judaising teachers, who excluded the Gentiles from these privileges, merely because they were not circumcised. And to the united body of Jews and Gentiles, forming the Christian church, he gave the appellation of 'the fellowship of the mystery,' chap. i. 9., the honours and privileges of which he described, ver. 13—19.
as he doth likewise the bonds by which the members of this fellowship are united; namely, 'one Lord or head, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father of us all,' chap. iv. 4—6.: Not omitting the supernatural gifts with which the members of this fellowship were endowed, chap.
iv. 11, 12.: Lastly, he expressly prohibited the Ephesians from joining in any of the heathen fellowships, on account of the works of darkness committed in them, chap.
v. 11.

Upon the whole, I submit it to my readers, whether the apostle, by representing the gospel in this epistle, no less than five times, under the idea of a mystery, did not mean to lead the Ephesians to compare it with their own mysteries, for the purpose of making them sensible, —

That, in authority and importance, the discoveries contained in the gospel infinitely exceeded the discoveries made in the most celebrated of the heathen mysteries, and were much more effectual for comforting and directing mankind in their journey through life.—3. That Christ, the head of the Christian fellowship, was much more powerful than all the heads of the heathen fellowships joined together.—3. That the Christian church, in which the mystery of God's will was kept, was a far more excellent fabric than the temple of Diana at Ephesus.—4.
That the honours and advantages which the members of the Christian church derived from Christ, their head, far surpassed the honours and advantages which the initiated PREFACE TO THE EPHESIANS.

Sect. V.

To the Ephesians, viewed in the light wherein I have placed it, appears excellently calculated for repressing that vain admiration of the mysteries, which the Ephesian and other Gentile converts still entertained; and for enervating the specious arguments used by the Judaizers for seducing them to observe the law of Moses. This epistle, therefore, must have been of great use for confirming the whole body of the Gentile converts inhabiting the province of Asia, in the belief and profession of the gospel.

Before this section is concluded, it may be proper to observe, that the fourth, fifth, and sixth chapters of the epistle to the Ephesians are called, by Theodoret, The moral admonition; as containing a more complete system of precepts respecting the temper of mind which the disciples of Christ ought to possess, and respecting the duties which they owe to themselves and to each other, than is to be found in any other of St. Paul's epistles.

Sect. IV.—Of the Persons for whom the Epistle to the Ephesians was designed.

That the epistle to the Ephesians was designed for the use, not of the Ephesians alone, but of all the brethren in the proconsular Asia, not excepting those to whom the apostle was personally unknown, may be gathered from the inscription of the epistle, and from the benedictions with which it is concluded. The inscription runs thus, 'To the saints who are in Ephesus, and to the believers in Christ Jesus' by which last expression, I understand persons different from 'the saints in Ephesus,' namely, all the believers in the province of Asia. In like manner, in the conclusion of the epistle, we have, first a particular benediction, chap. iv. 23. 'Peace be to the brethren,' namely, in Ephesus; then a general one, ver. 24. 'Grace be with all them who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity,' that is, with all the faithful in the proconsular Asia. For that there was a considerable intercourse between the churches of the proconsular Asia and that at Ephesus, appears from the first epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Ephesus; where, instead of mentioning the church at Ephesus by itself, as saluting the Corinthians, the salutations are from the churches of Asia in general, comprehending Ephesus among the rest: 1 Cor. xvi. 19. 'The churches of Asia salute you.'—Paul, indeed, commonly directed his letters to the churches in the great cities, because they were more numerous than the other churches. Yet that he designed them for all the brethren in the neighbourhood, appears from the inscriptions of his epistles to the Corinthians, as was observed, Prelim. Es. ii. page 22. To these arguments add, the bonds by which the moral admonition delivered in the epistle to the Ephesians, as well as the catholic manner in which the other matters contained in it are handled, shew clearly, that it was designed for others besides the brethren at Ephesus.

This remark, concerning the persons for whom the epistle to the Ephesians was designed, may be of considerable use in helping us to judge of some passages. For example, when we recollect that this epistle was directed 'to the faithful in Christ Jesus,' throughout the province of Asia, many of whom, it is to be supposed, had never seen Paul's face, we shall be sensible of the propriety of his saying to them, even according to the common translation, chap. iii. 2. 'If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God given to me.' For although the brethren at Ephesus, with whom an apostle abode three years, and many of the inhabitants of the province of Asia, who had heard him preach in Ephesus, Acts xix. 10, must have known that he was appointed by Christ the apostle of the Gentiles, some of the churches of Asia, or at least some of the members of those churches, who had never seen him, may have been ignorant of the miraculous manner in which he was converted, and commissioned to be an apostle. And therefore, his mentioning these things, together with the revelations that were made to him of the mystery of God's will, in his epistle to the Ephesians, which was designed for their use likewise, may have been very necessary to enable them to make them understand what his knowledge and authority as an apostle of Christ were. Accordingly, as if this part of the epistle had been written for a class of readers different from those to whom the foregoing part was addressed, he introduces it with his name: Eph. iii. 1. 'On account of this, I Paul am the prisoner of Jesus Christ, for you Gentiles,' &c. See, however, the new translation of the passage.—In like manner, by considering the epistle to the Ephesians as designed for all the brethren in the province of Asia, we see the reason why the apostle has handled his subjects in a general manner, without making any of those allusions to particular persons and affaires, which might have been expected in a letter to a church gathered by himself, and in which he had so long resided, and with the members of which he was so intimately acquainted. Such allusions would not easily have been understood by strangers, and therefore they were with great propriety avoided.

Sect. V.—Of the Time and Place of writing the Epistle to the Ephesians.

During the apostle Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea, though it lasted more than two years, yet he did not write any epistles to the churches which he had planted, or to particular persons; at least we know of none which he wrote. But during his confinement at Rome, having more liberty, he wrote several epistles which still remain. For when the news of his confinement in that city reached the provinces, some of the churches which he had gathered sent certain of their most respected members all the way to Rome, as formerly mentioned, to visit and comfort him. Philip. iv. 18. Col. i. 7, 8. These messengers having given him a particular account of the state of the churches from whence they came, their information gave rise to the letters which the apostle wrote at that time; and which may be distinguished from his other letters, by the mention made in them of his imprisonment and bonds. Wherefore, the apostle's bonds being frequently introduced in his epistle to the Ephesians, chap. iii. 1. 11. iv. 1. vi. 12. there can be little doubt of its being written during his confinement at Rome: But whether in the first or in the second year of that confinement, learned men are not agreed. Many, supposing it to have been written at the same time with the epistle to the Colossians, have dated it in the end of the second year of the apostle's confiennent, at which time we know the epistle to the Co- lionians was written. And that these two epistles were written about the same time, they prove by observing that there is a great similarity of sentiment and expression in them; and that they were sent by the same messenger, namely, Tychicus, Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7. But in Lard- ner's opinion, these circumstances are not decisive; be- cause Tychicus may have been sent twice from Rome into Asia by the apostle, with letters, during his two years' confinement; and because several reasons may have rendered it proper for him to write the same things to these churches, especially as a considerable space of time intervened between the writing of the letters in which they are contained. Rejecting, therefore, the late data of the epistle to the Ephesians, Lardner supposes it to have been written in the beginning of the first year of the apostle's imprisonment at Rome. And, in support of his opinion, he offers the two following arguments, Canon, chap. xii.
PREFACE TO THE EPHESIANS.

1. That Timothy, who joined the apostle in his letters to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, did not join him in his epistle to the Ephesians. True. But might not Timothy, after joining the apostle in the letters mentioned, leave Rome on some necessary business before the epistle to the Ephesians was begun? That this was actually the case, we have reason to believe; for the apostle, in his letter to the Philippians, promised to send Timothy to them soon, chap. ii. 19. And in his epistle to the Hebrews, which was written after his release, he informed them that Timothy was sent away, Heb. xiii. 23. Wherefore, having left Rome before the letter to the Ephesians was begun, his name could not be inserted in the inscription, notwithstanding it was finished in such time as to be sent to Ephesus by the messenger who carried the letters to the Colossians and to Philemon.

2. Lardner's second argument for the early date of the epistle to the Ephesians is, that in his letters to the Philip- pians and to Philemon, the apostle expresses his hope of being soon released; whereas, in his letter to the Ephes- sians, he does not give the most distant indication of any such expectation. But the apostle, in his epistle to the Colossians, makes as little mention of his release as in his epistle to the Ephesians. And yet all allow that that epistle was written and sent along with the epistle to Philemon, in which the apostle expresses the strongest hope of that event. He did not think it necessary, it seems, to mention his enlargement in his letter to the Co- lossi ans, because he had ordered Tychicus to inform them of it: Col. iv. 17. ‘All things concerning me, Tychicus will make known to you.’ For the same reason he may have omitted mentioning his release to the Ephesians, as may be inferred from Eph. vi. 21. ‘Now, that ye also may know the things relating to me, and what I am doing, Tychicus will make known to you all things.’ The phrase- ology here deserves notice, ‘That ye also may know,’ which I think implies, that at this time the apostle had ordered Tychicus to make known all things concerning him to some others, namely, to the Colossians; consequently that the two epistles were written about the same time. And as Tychicus and Onesimus, to whom the apostle de- livered his epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, were to take Ephesus in their way, he gave them his letter to the Ephesians likewise, and ordered them, when they delivered it, to enjoin the Ephesians to send a copy of it to the Laodiceans, with directions to them to send a transcript taken from their copy to the Colossians. Tychicus, therefore, and Onesimus, taking Ephesus in their way, delivered the apostle's letter to the church in that city, as they were directed, then proceeded with the letters to the Colossians and to Philemon, which when they delivered, their commission was at an end.

If the epistle to the Ephesians was written, as I suppose, soon after the epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, the mention which is made of the apostle's release in his letter to Philemon, will lead us to fix the writing of the three epistles to the end of the second year of the apostle's confinement at Rome, answering to a. d. 60 or 61.

SECT. VI.-Of the Style of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

The critics have observed, that the style of the epistle to the Ephesians is exceedingly elevated, and that it cor- responds to the state of the apostle's mind at the time of writing. Overjoyed with the account which their mes- senger brought him of their faith and holiness, chap. i. 15, and transported with the consideration of the unsearch- able wisdom of God, displayed in the work of man's redemption, and of his astonishing love towards the Gentiles, in making them partakers through faith of all the benefits of Christ's death equally with the Jews, he soars high in his sentiments on these grand subjects, and gives his thoughts utterance in sublime and copious expressions. At the same time, he introduces various deep, and hitherto unknown doctrines, to which he gives the appellation of mysteries, in allusion to the occult doctrines which the Greeks dignified with the name of the mysteries of this or that god, and on the knowledge of which the initiated in these mysteries highly valued their stealth, and theconfigured in their breasts. In short, this epistle is written as it were in a rapture. Hence Je- rome, on chap. iii. says, "Nullam epistolam Pauli tanta habere mysteria, tam reconditum sensibus involuta, quae et apostolus in suo gloriam." Grothus likewise entertained an high opinion of this epistle; for he says, it expresseth the sublime matters contained in it, in words more sublime than are to be found in any human language: "Herum sublimitatem, aequam veris sublimi-ribus, quam unla unquam habuit lingua humana." This character is so just, that no real Christian can read the doctrinal part of the epistle to the Ephesians, without being impressed and roused by it as by the sound of a trumpet.

SECT. VII.-Of the Eleusinian and other heathen Mysteries, alluded to in this Epistle.

I. The apostle Paul, in this and in his other epistles, having often alluded to the heathen mysteries, and having condemned them all, on account of the shameful things practised in them, Eph. v. 11, 12. it is proper, both for understanding his allusions, and for shewing the propriety of his censure, to give, in this section, some account of these famed institutions.

Bishop Warburton, from whom I have taken the great- est part of this account, in his Divine Legation, b. ii. sect. 4, informs us, That each of the heathen gods, besides the worship paid to him in public, had a secret worship, to which none were admitted but those who were prepared by previous ceremonies. This secret worship was termed the mysteries of the god; which, however, were not per- formed in all places where he was publicly worshipped, but only where his chief residence was supposed to be. According to Herodotus, Diodorus, and Plutarch, who, in support of their opinion, appeal to the most ancient testimonies, these mysteries were first invented in Egypt, whence they spread themselves into most countries of Europe and Asia. In Egypt, they were celebrated to the honour of Isis and Osiris; in Asia, to Mythus; in Samothrace, to the mother of the gods; in Beotia, to Bacchus; in Cyprus, to Venus; in Crete, to Jupiter; in Athens, to Ceres and Proserpine, thought to be the same with Isis and Osiris; and in other places to other gods, to an incredible number. The most noted of these mysteries, however, were the Orphic, the Bacchic, the Eleusinian, the Scelest, the Cynic, and the Mystenic. But the Eleusinian mysteries, celebrated by the Athenians at Eleusis, a town of Attica, in honour of Ceres and her daughter Proserpine, in process of time swallowed up all the rest. For, as Zosimus tells us, lib. iv. "These most holy rites were then so extensive, as to take in the whole race of mankind." Accordingly, ancient authors have spoken most of the Eleusinian mysteries. However, as they all proceeded from one fountain, and consisted of similar rites, and had the same end in view, at least till they were corrupted, what we are told of any of them, Warburton thinks, may be understood of them all.

The general object of the mysteries was, by means of certain shows and representations, accompanied with hymns, to impress the senses and imaginations of the initiated with the belief of the doctrines of religion, according to the views of them which the contrivers of the mysteries, or those who introduced them into any country, entertained. And, that the mystic shows might make the deeper impression on the initiated, they were always exhibited in the darkness of night.

The mysteries were divided into two classes, the lesser and the greater. The lesser mysteries were intended for the common people; the greater were set up in higher stations, and of more improved understandings. Plutarch seems to speak of a third class, called the intuitive, (see 2 Pet. 1. 16. note 2,); though others give that name to the second class. In both the mysteries, the doctrines of providence and future retributions were inculcated; but in the greater there were, besides, revealed to the initiated, certain doctrines called ægeæa, because they were never to be mentioned, except to such of the initiated as were capable of understanding them, and that under the most religious seal of secrecy.

In the celebration of the lesser mysteries, matters were so contrived, that the person to be initiated, at his entrance, was filled with an inexpressible horror. So Proclus, "In the most holy mysteries, before the scene of the mystic visions, there is a terror diffused into the minds of the initiated." So likewise Dyon Chrysost, in his account of the initiation into the lesser mysteries: "Just so it is, as when one leads a Greek or a Barbarian to be initiated, in a certain mystic dome excelling in beauty and magnificence, where he sees many mystic sights, and hears, in the same manner, a multitude of voices; where darkness and light alternately affect his senses, and a thousand other uncommon things present themselves before him." It seems the darkness was dispelled by the sudden flashing of light, immediately succeeded by a dismal darkness.—Warburton, who thinks Virgil's description of Æneas's descent into hell, an allegorical relation of his initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries, supposes that the mystic vision, which occasioned the horror in the mind of the initiated of which Proclus speaks, is described, Æneas, lib. vi. 273, where, in the very entrance of hell, all the real and imaginary evils of life, together with many frightful forms, are said to be stationed.

Vestibulum ante ipsum, primumque in failixis Orci, Locris, et utriusque passere culde cure; Parvenscum habitant morbi, triquetrae semen, Et Metus, et maladap Fauna, et turpe Egonia, (Terribiles visio formas) Leuthaneque Labortque, Tum magis muggiosa Luteus Nepus; et tuae membra Gaudia, mortuferaque adversus in immine Bethem; Ferreque Exemusium thalamo, et Dominarum demensa, Vipereum crucem vitis inmores cruciis, &c.

Corripit hic saebh trepsus formidosum ferrum Æneas, astrictaque aciem venenosis offerat.

Ino. 290.

Æneas, astrictaque aciem venenosis offerat.

—Farther, because Virgil represents Æneas, after passing the river Styx, and entering the Logus tentem, or purgatory, as distressed with the cries of the shades of infants cut off in early life, Warburton supposes that they were introduced into the mystic show, that by an exhibition of their miserable state, parents might be deterred from the barbarous practice of exposing their children, which prevailed among the Greeks.—Among the uncommon things represented in the lesser mysteries, Warburton saith, there were men and women properly habituated, who, personating the gods both supernal and infernal, passed in review before the initiated. And to each of them a hymn was sung, explaining their character, attributes, and actions. These hymns, Clemens Alexandrinus has termed, the theology of images or idols. Proclus likewise tells us, "In the celebration of the mysteries, it is said that the initiated meet many things of multiform shapes and species, which represent the first generation of the gods."

In the lesser mysteries, there were representations of Purgatory and Tartarus; and shows exhibited to the initiated, of persons suffering punishments in Tartarus, suitable to the nature of their crimes. And to represent the miserable state of the greatest criminals, men were introduced, who personated Theseus and Ixion, and Sisyphus and Phlegyas, suffering eternal punishments, and who, as they passed in review, gave each an admonition to the initiated, to beware of the crime for which he in particular was suffering: And for this Warburton appeals to that passage of the Æneid, where, as Æneas was passing by the gate of Tartarus, (for he was not permitted to enter), the Styx gave him an account of the punishments of the wicked imprisoned in that place of torment for ever, by the sentence of Rhadamantus.—Æneas, lib. vi. lin. 557.

Hinc exspecti genitus, et xáca sanans, Veritas, tum striptius (toti, trachaque catena), Consistit Ananias, stratemque extrema lassata, Subitoque factus fusos (cognita effere) fulminea Ursuntur puniit, quia tantus plagor ad astra, Tum vates or ses qua hoa, Dux mycter Teutrum, Num quia cuncta, semel et inscribere lumen. Saepe, cum haurit Hector prodest Averna, IPsum Deum putans docus, perseque omnia damnat. lin. 557.

But whatever impression these representations might make on the minds of the initiated, Warburton saith it was rendered in a great measure ineffectual, by the shows of the gods and goddesses who passed in review before them; and by the hymns which were sung to each, descriptive of his origin, his character, and his actions. For the vicious actions of the gods, celebrated in these hymns, must have led such of the initiated as were capable of reasoning on the subject, to consider the punishments inflicted on men for the very same crimes of which the gods themselves were guilty, as utterly unjust; consequently, to think the whole a fiction. So that the motives to virtue, arising from the representations of the punishment of the damned, were destroyed by the confirmation which the popular theology derived from the other parts of the shows in the lesser mysteries. The truth is, if a person was disposed to gratify any irregular passion, it was easy for him to excuse himself by the example of the gods, as we find one actually doing in Terence: "Ego homuncio, hoc non facerem!"

To remedy this inconvenience, Warburton saith the greater mysteries were contrived, in which such of the initiated as were judged capable of the discovery, were made acquainted with the whole delineation of the commonly received theology. The mystagogue, hieropont, or priest, who might be of either sex indiscriminately, and whose office it was to conduct the initiated through the preparatory ceremonies, and to explain to him the mystic shows, taught him, that Jupiter, Mercury, Venus, Mars, and the rest, were only dead men, who, while in life, were subject to the same passion with themselves: But having been benefactors to mankind, grateful posterity had deified them; and with their virtues had canonized their virtues also.—The fabulous divinities being thus discarded, the mystagogue discovered to the initiated the Supreme Creator of the universe, who pervades all things by his virtue, and governs all things by his providence, and who is one, having neither equal nor second to himself. From this time the initiated was called Νασηνας, a beholder, to intimate that he saw things as they are, without disguise; whereas before, he was only μετέ, from μετα τι, which, one who was to keep his mouth shut, because he did not understand the true nature of things. This doctrine of the unity of God, taught in the greater mysteries, Warburton affirms, was the grand secret, αληθεία της μεγαλοπρεπούς, of which there is so much said in ancient authors.

The discovery of the Supreme Being was made in the greater mysteries, first of all by a mystic show or representation, which Periuss thus describes, “The ορθήδοξη is when he who is initiated beholds the divine lights.” To the same purpose, Themestius—“It being thoroughly purified, he now displays to the initiated a region all over illuminated, and shining with a divine splendour. The clouds and thick darkness are dispersed, and the mind emerges into day, full of light and cheerfulness, as before of disconsolate obscurity.” That which the priest thoroughly purified was οὐκ αἰματική, an image, which represented the Divine Being. When this was exhibited, the hierophant, habited like the Creator, sung a hymn in honor of the one only God; of which, according to Warburton, there is a fragment preserved by Clem. Alexand. and Eusebius, which begins thus: “I will declare a secret to the initiated. But let the doors be shut against the profane. But thou, Musæus, the offspring of fair Seleuc, attend carefully to my song; for I shall speak of important truths. Suffer not, therefore, the former prepossessions of your mind to deprive you of that happy life which the knowledge of these mysterious truths will procure you. But look on the Divine Nature; incessantly contemplate it, and govern well the mind and heart: Go on in the right way, and see the sole Governor of the world. He is one, and of himself alone; and to that one all things owe their being. He operates through all, was never seen by mortal eyes, but does himself see every thing.”

Because Musæus, who had been hierophant at Athens, directed Enea to the place in Elysium where his father’s shade abode, Warburton thinks Anchises opened to him the doctrine of perfection in these sublime words,— Principio cæstus, ac terrae, campanoque liqueas., Eln. 721.

Luctuosissime globis Lunic, Thianum mortu, Neque maculae add: techesum medium, ite cæsurae inserat.
Neque saeptis modum, et natiuc ac corpore inserant.
Inde hominum pænaeque genibus, tectisque volutam.
Et quæ materne fort mitias, sed acer parte portus, &c.

and that with this discovery of the unity, Enea’s initiation concluded. On this supposition it will follow, that before the unity of God was discovered to the initiated, the shows which represented the inhabitants of Elysium were exhibited to them. In the shows they saw legislators, and such as had brought mankind from a state of nature into a civilized state, enjoying happiness in the chief places of Elysium. Next to them the initiated beheld patriots, and those who had died for the good of their country. Virtuous and pious priests were represented as occupying the third place. And the lowest was assigned to the inventors of the mechanic and liberal arts.

The shows being ended, the initiated, as was observed above, were introduced to the sight of the αἰματική, or shining image, which represented the Creator; and the hymns in which the oracles, or secrets, concerning his nature, attributes, and operations, were delivered, being sung, the assembly was dismissed with the two following barbarous words, καὶ ἐκτός ἢ καὶ ὧν, which, as Le Clerc thinks, are only a bad pronunciation of κατὰ and ἐκτός, which he says signify, in the Phoenician tongue, It itch, and abstain from evil.

If we may believe Voltaire, the initiated, at almost every celebration of their mysteries, confessed their sins. For in his Essay on Universal History, chap. xii. after telling us that Aquinas said of confession, ‘It is not a downright sacrament, but a kind of sacrament,’ he adds, “Confession may be looked upon as the greatest check to secret crimes. The sages of antiquity had in some measure embraced this salutary practice. The Egyptians and the Greeks made confession of sins at their expiaations, and almost at every celebration of their mysteries. Marcus Aurelius, assisting at the mysteries of Cerus Eleusina, confessed to the hierophants.” But of the sins which the vulgar among the heathens confessed, those which the gods were supposed to commit, in whose honour the mysteries were celebrated, we may be sure made no part.

The nature of the greater mysteries being such as above described, the wisest of the ancients, Warburton says, spoke of them as very useful in forming men to virtue, and as the source of their best consolation. For which reason, as Zoëmyns tells us, when the Emperor Valentine resolved to suppress all nocturnal ceremonies, Festus, who governed Greece as Proconsul, informed him, that such a law, by abolishing the mysteries, would cause the Greeks to lead οὐκ αἰματική, a lifeless life, a life absolutely void of comfort. Nor is it any wonder, saith Warburton, that the Greeks should have considered the abolition of the mysteries as the greatest evil, since the life of man, without the support of the doctrine taught in the mysteries, was thought by them as no better than a living death: On which account Leocrates called the mysteries, “the thing which human nature stood most in need of.”

But notwithstanding, according to Warburton, the greater mysteries were contrived to correct the errors of the popular religion, inculcated by the shows in the lesser mysteries, and to impress the initiated with just notions of God, of Providence, and of a future state, he acknowledges, that the discovery came too late to counteract the pernicious influence of the shows in the lesser mysteries; and that the Orgies of Bacchus, and the mysteries of the mother of the gods, and of Venus, and Cypir, being celebrated in honour of deities who inspired and presided over the sensuous passions, it was natural for the initiated to believe that they honoured divinities when they committed the various actions of which they were the patrons. He likewise acknowledges, that the mysteries of these deities being performed during the darkness of night, or in dark places, and under the seal of the greatest secrecy, the initiated indulged themselves on such occasions in all the debaucheries with which the patron god was supposed to be delighted. The truth is, the enormities committed in the mysteries of these impure deities came at length to be so intolerable, that their rites were proscribed in different countries; as were the rites of Bacchus at Rome. See Livy, B. 39. No. 8. 18.

The English translator of Voltaire’s Essay on Universal History, hath subjoined the following note to the passage quoted above from that essay:—“These mysteries were so revered by the ancients, and kept with such secrecy, that the disclosing of them was reckoned the most impious action that could be committed. This, however, did not hinder several writers, in the first ages of Christianity, from prying into the great secret, and bringing it to light. Tertullian says of it, Tus tus αἰμα-tis divinitus, &c. similem membro virili revelavit.”
Theodoret says it was, "Nature mulchiris image." Induced by these and other testimonies, Warburton himself acknowledges, what he hath termed "that very flagitious part of the mysterious rites when they were," namely, the carrying of the cross and calix in procession. Concerning this obscene rite, Leland, who, as shall be shewed immediately, differs from Warburton in his account of the design of the mysteries, saith, (Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revolution, vol. i. p. 195. note,) that this obscene rite, instead of being introduced when the mysteries were at the worst, seems to have been one of those anciently used in the mysteries of Isis, from which the Eleusinian rites were derived. Warburton indeed saith, "it was introduced under the pretence of their being emblems of the mystical regeneration and new life into which the initiated had engaged themselves to enter." But Leland says, "it is no way probable that this was the original ground of introducing it, but a pretense invented for it after it was introduced; and observes, that Arnobius justly exposed the absurdity of couching holy mysteries under obscene representations, on pretense that they had a profound and sacred meaning."—Be this, however, as it may, the facts above mentioned, which are acknowledged by all, shew with what truth the apostle Paul styled the so-called heathen mysteries, Eph. v. 11. 'The unfruitful works of darkness: works which produced no good, either to those who did them, or to society; and prohibited Christians from joining in them, because the things which were done in them, under the seal of secrecy, were such, that it was even base to mention them, ver. 12.

Warburton tells us, that while all the other mysteries became exceedingly corrupt, through the folly or wickedness of those who presided at their celebration, and gave occasion to many abominable impurities, whereby the manners of the heathens were entirely vitiated, the Eleusinian mysteries long preserved their original purity. But at last they also, yielding to the fate of all human institutions, partook of the common depravity, and had a very pernicious influence on the morals of mankind. Wherefore, in proportion as the gospel gained ground in the world, the Eleusinian mysteries themselves fell into disrepute, and, together with all the other Pagan solemnities, were at length suppressed; Rollin thinks, by the Emperor Theodosius. (Antient Hist. vol. v. p. 15.)

II. It is now time to mention, that Bishop Warburton's account of the design of the mysteries hath been the subject of much controversy among the learned. His supposition, that Ciceron's account of Aeneas's descent into hell, in the sixth Æneid, is a description of the mysteries and of Æneas's initiation into them, hath been contradicted by some, who are of opinion that the poet conceived that episode merely to embellish his poem with an account of a future state; and that, by the apporation of the ghosts, which were afterwards to return to life, and become the great men of his country, he might have an opportunity of celebrating their praises.—In like manner, Warburton's doctrine concerning the design of the mysteries, that they were instituted to expose the falsehood of the vulgar polytheism, and to teach the doctrines of the unity, of providence, and of a future state, hath been opposed at great length by Dr. Leland, in his Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, vol. i. chap. viii. ix. For, page 189. having mentioned, that the most learned and zealous advocates for Paganism, as Apuleius, Iamblichus, Hierocles, Proclus, and others, after Christianity made its appearance, cried up the mysteries as the most effectual means for purifying the soul, and raising it to communion with the gods, Leland saith, "I cannot think that the legislators, in instituting the mysteries, concerned themselves much about restoring the soul to its original purity, in the Pythagorean or Platonic sense. What they had in view, by Warburton's own acknowledgment, was, to promote the cause of virtue, as far as was necessary for the ends of civil society. As to any thing farther than this, they were not solicitous. The mysteries seem to have been originally designed to civilize the rude people, to form and polish their manners, and, by shows and representations which were fitted to strike the imagination, to bring them to a greater veneration for the laws and religion of their country, which, among the pagans, was always regarded as a necessary ingredient in a virtuous character."—Such is Leland's account of the mysteries, which he supports, page 190. by appealing to Diodorus, who saith, "That in the Sicilian Feast of Ceres, which lasted ten days, was represented the ancient manner of living, before men had learned the use and culture of bread-corn." This representation was evidently designed to make men sensible of the value of a civilized life. The same thing may be gathered from more ancient writers, who tell us, "The principal subject of the Eleusinian mysteries was the life of Ceres, her wanderings after her daughter, and her legislation in Sicily and Africa, where she taught the inhabitants agriculture, and gave them laws, and thereby reclaimed them from their rude manners." This, Leland saith, is what Ciceron seems to have had in view, De Legibus, lib. ii. cap. 14. "Nam nihil cum multa divinissque videntur Athenae peperisse, atque in vitam humanam attulisse, tum nihil melius utraque mysteriae, quibus ex agrestis inanissimae vitis, exculti ad humanitatem et multis numus; neque solum cum letitia vivendi rationem acceptum; sed etiam cum spe meliorem oririendi." With respect to what Ciceron says of the mysteries, that they enabled men "to die with a better hope," Leland thinks it relates to what was instilled in the mysteries, that those who were initiated and purified, enjoyed after death greater felicity than others, and were honoured with the first places in the Pagan abodes; whereas others were forced to wallow in perpetual dirt, stink, and nastiness, page 191.—The like account of the mysteries Cicero gives at the end of his fifth book against Verres, cap. 72. "Teque Ceres et Libera, quam sacra, sicut omnium hominum et religionum fuerunt, longe maximis atque occultissimis ceremoniis continetur, a quibus initia vitis atque victis, legum, morum, manuactus, humanitatis exempla, hominibus et civitatibus datae; placide discuntur; quotum sacra populus Romanus a Graecia accepta et ascita, tantat religione et publice et privatis tutur." On this passage Adrian Turnebus remarks, "Initis vocatur ab initia vitis, in quibus Ciceron legum et frugibus, in quarrum reum memoria (mysteria) fiesbat, cum auta ferino ritu homines sibi vitam propagabant." Having thus explained and proved his own account of the mysteries, Leland proceeds to examine the proofs which Warburton hath produced in support of his doctrine, that the mysteries were instituted to disclose the error of polytheism, page 197. The first proof is that passage from St. Austin, concerning an Egyptian hierophant who informed Alexander the Great, that even the deities of an higher order had once been men. This is followed by two quotations from Ciceron, who, according to Warburton, tells us, not only that the Eleusinian mysteries, but the Samothracian and Lemnian, disclosed the error of polytheism. But Leland saith, "All that can be gathered from these two passages is, not that the error of the vulgar polytheism was taught in the mysteries, but only that the chief of the gods vulgarly adored, had been taken from the human race to heaven." But Ciceron, who mentions this, neither gives it as his own opinion, nor represents it as the doctrine of the mysteries, that they were not to be regarded as gods on that account, nor worshipped. On the contrary, in one of these passages he plainly approves the dedication of famous and excellent men—and the worship of such deities he expressly prescribes in his book of laws."—ibu. ii. c. ii. p. 100, and c. ii. p. 115. Ed. Davis. Leland saith, p. 198, "Nor do I believe any one passage can be produced from all Pagan antiquity, to show that the design of the mysteries was to undermine the people as to the vulgar polytheism; and to draw them off from the worship of the national gods." All the ancients who have spoken of the mysteries, have represented them as instituted for the purpose of bringing the people to a greater veneration for the laws and religion of their country. "Some of the heathen, indeed," p. 198, "were sensible, that if it was once allowed that their gods had been of human extraction, this might be turned to the disadvantage of the public religion. Hence it was, that the Roman pontiff, Scævola, was for having it concealed from the people, that even Hercules, Æsculapius, Castor and Pollux, had been once mortal men, lest they should not regard and worship them as gods." And Plutarch, De Isid. et Orc, speaking of those who represented some of the gods as having been originally famous men, saith, "This is to overturn and dissolve that religious persuasion, which hath taken possession of the minds of almost all men from their birth: It is to open a wide door to the atheistical crowd."—But, saith Leland, page 200, "Whatever Plutarch and some others might think of it, those who conducted the mysteries seem to have been of another mind. For if they taught the initiated in the greater mysteries, that the gods commonly received had been once men, it is reasonable to suppose, that they took care the public religion should not suffer by it, by letting them know, that, notwithstanding this, they ought now to be regarded as gods, and to have that worship rendered to them which ancient tradition and the law required." Next, with respect to the mysteries being instituted to teach the doctrines of providence, and of a future state, by that representation of rewards and punishments in the life to come which was made in the shows of the lesser mysteries, Leland observes, page 193, that the virtues rewarded and vices punished in the shows, being those which more immediately affected society, these representations might be intended, by the legislators and civil magistrates, to produce good effects for the benefit of the state. Nevertheless, saith he, "some eminent Pagans seem not to have entertained so advantageous thoughts of the mysteries, as regard to their moral tendency;" particularly Socrates, who always declined being initiated. "It is true he is introduced in Plato's Phædo, as giving a favourable interpretation of the design of the mysteries;" but for his part, concerning those who instituted them, "that they were no means persons; and that they taught, that whatsoever went to hades without being expiated, would lie in the dirt, or filthiness; but that those who went thither purged and initiated, would dwell with the gods." The purification here referred to seems to have been the ritual purification prescribed in the mysteries concerning which, see Potter's Antiq. vol. I. p. 555. This purification, Socrates supposed, was intended to signify that the soul must be purified by virtue: but he does not say this was declared in the mysteries. To pass, however, from that circumstance, if Socrates spoke of the mysteries at all, considering the veneration in which they were held by the people, and the support which they received from the magistrates, he could not speak of them otherwise than he did. Nevertheless, as Leland observes, "his neglecting to be initiated is a much stronger proof that he had no good opinion of the mysteries, than any thing which can be produced to the contrary." Leland in his historical proceedings, page 202, to examine the proofs produced by Warburton, to shew, that the doctrine of the unity, or of the one God, the Creator and Governor of the world, was taught in the mysteries, and was the very object, or great secret, in all the mysteries throughout the Gentile world. The proofs of this are, first, two passages of Clements Alexandrinus, and one of Chrysippus. All that can be gathered from them, Leland saith, is, that the mysteries treated of the nature of the gods, and of the universe. In these passages, there is not one word to shew that the doctrine of the unity was taught in the mysteries. Nor is the passage produced from Strabo more express. It is true he saith, "The secret celebration of the mysteries preserves the majesty due to the divinity; and, at the same time, imitates its nature, which hides itself from our senses." But by the divinity, Leland thinks Strabo does not understand one supreme God, as distinguished from inferior deities, but the divinity to whose honour the mysteries were celebrated. Accordingly, he immediately after mentions Apollo, Ceres, and Bacchus, as the deities sacred among the Greeks; to each of which, according to the prevailing theology, divinity was ascribed. —The third testimony is from Galen, who, speaking of the benefit which would arise, not only to the physician, but to the philosopher who labours to investigate the universal nature by considering the parts of the human body, saith, "Those who initiate themselves here, have nothing like it in the Eleusinian or Samothracian mysteries." Now, though Leland allows that Galen, in this passage, intimates that the divine nature was treated of in the mysteries, he observes, that he saith nothing from whence we can form a judgment, whether the mysteries were designed to instruct men in the unity, or what kind of doctrine they taught; only that it was not to be compared to that which might be learned from considering the human body. —The fourth testimony is a passage from Eusebius, which, because some terms employed in the mysteries are used in it, is brought by Warburton to prove that the doctrine of the unity was taught in the mysteries. But this Leland thinks strange, as the contrary appears from the passage itself, where Eusebius expressly saith, "For the Hebrews people alone was reserved the honour of being initiated into the knowledge of the true God, the Creator of all things, and of being instructed in the practice of true piety towards him," page 205. —The fifth testimony is a passage from Josephus, than which, Warburton saith, nothing can be more explicit. But Leland is not of his opinion. In his discourse against Appius, Josephus shews that the Jews enjoyed advantages for acquiring the knowledge and practice of religion, superior to other nations. Wherefore, as the Gentiles boasted greatly of their mysteries in that respect, Josephus, who in all his works was careful not to give offence to the Gentiles, saith nothing to the disparagement of their mysteries; but, supposing them to be as holy as they would have them to be, he observes, that they only returned at certain seasons, and were solemnized for a few days; whereas the Jews, by the benefit of their sacred rites and laws, enjoyed all the advantages pretended to be in these mysteries, through the whole course of their lives. Leland adds, "It is observable, that Josephus doth not enter on the consideration of the nature and design of these mysteries, nor of the doctrines taught in them, though he is very plain and express in his account of the principles of the Jews, particularly relating to the one true God, the sole cause of all existence." But though Leland rejects the testimonies produced from ancient writers, as insufficient to prove that the doctrines of the unity, of providence, and of a future state, were taught in the mysteries, he acknowledges that the hymn of Orpheus, which Warburton hath quoted from Clem. Alexandrinus, is much more to his purpose, if it could be depended upon; because in it the doctrine of the unity is plainly asserted. This hymn, Warburton endeavours to shew, was the very hymn which was sung to the initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries by the hierophant, habited like the Creator. But Leland saith, p. 207, it doth not appear from Clement, that that hymn made a part of the mysteries. "He takes notice, indeed, of a poem made by Orpheus on the mysteries, and which he supposes to have contained an account of the mysteries, and of the theology of idols. He also mentions the hymn in question, which he supposed likewise to have been composed by Orpheus, and which contained a quite contrary doctrine. But he doth not mean, that this hymn was a part of that poem in which Orpheus gave an account of the mysteries. He rather seems to have considered it as a distinct poem, composed by Orpheus afterwards, in which he supposed him to have recanted the doctrines he had taught in the former." To shew this, Leland appeals to Clement's account of the hymn, which is as follows: "The Thracian hierophant, and who was at the same time a poet, Orpheus the son of Coelus, after he had opened or explained the mysteries and the theology of idols, introduces the truth, and makes his recantation; singing, though late, a truly holy song."—Here, saith Leland, "Clement seems plainly to oppose these verses to the accounts which Orpheus had given of the mysteries, and makes them in effect a recantation of the whole theology of the mysteries, which he calls the theology of idols." But it is to be observed, that Clement represents him as late in making this recantation, and singing this holy song. Leland adds, "I do not well see upon what ground Clement could say this, if that very song made a part of the mysteries, and was sung by the hierophant himself, at the very time of the celebration of the mysteries, and before the assembly was dismissed. For in that case the verses were sung in the proper season in which they ought to have been sung, according to the order of the mysteries." Leland further observes, that Warburton, to shew that the hymn referred to belonged to the mysteries, and made the most venerable part of them, translates the latter part of the passage from Clement thus: "The sacreds then truly begin though late, and thus he enters on the matter." But Leland affirms, that there is nothing in the original answering to these words in his translation, "The sacreds then truly begin." Farther, he saith, page 208, "This hymn of Orpheus is very justly suspected; as would have appeared, if the whole had been produced. It is only the first part of it which is cited by Warburton from Clement's admonition to the Gentiles. But it is given more lately by the same Clement last Stemmata; and at still greater length by Eusebius, who quotes it from Aristotle, a Jewish paraphrast, who produces it to shew that Orpheus and the Greeks took their doctrine of God, the Creator of the Universe, from the books of Moses."

As a direct confusion of Bishop Warburton's doctrine concerning the mysteries, Leland saith, chap. ix., page 223. If the design of the mysteries had been such as Warburton represents it, "it is inconceivable that the ancient Christian writers should have so universally explained against them, as Warburton acknowledges they did, had they not been connected with the mysteries to Christianity, and some of them, no doubt, had been admitted both to the lesser and to the greater mysteries. And therefore being well acquainted with the nature and design of the mysteries, it was natural, that in the mysteries men were brought under the most solemn obligation to a holy and virtuous life, and that the secret doctrine taught in the greater mysteries, was intended to detect the error of polytheism, and to turn men from the worship of idols to the one true God, they must have had a good opinion of these mysteries as, so far at least, coinciding with the design of Christianity." How then came they, in discourses addressed to the heathens themselves, "frequently to speak of the mysteries in terms of the utmost abhorrence, as impure and abominable, and as rather tending to confirm the people in their indolency than to draw them off from it! The making such odious representations of the mysteries, suppose they knew the design of them to be what Warburton represents it, (and if it had been so, some of them must have known it), would have been absolutely inconsistent with common honesty. Nor can I believe," saith Leland, "that such excellent persons as many of the primitive Christians undoubtedly were, could have been capable of such a conduct."

Leland, page 225. mentions Clem. Alexandr., as one of the Christian writers who speaks of the representations in the mysteries as agreeable to the fables of the poets and mythologists concerning Jupiter, Ceres, Proserpine, Bacchus, and other deities; and calls "those who brought these mysteries from Egypt into Greece, The fathers of an execrable superstition, who sowed the seeds of vice, and wickedness and corruption in human life; and says, The mysteries were full of delusion and portentous representations, calculated to impose upon the people. He concludes his account of the mysteries with saying, "These are the mysteries of atheistical men. I may rightly call those atheists, who are destitute of the knowledge of him who is truly God, and most impudently worship a boy turned in stones by the Titans, a woman slaying things, and the parts which modesty forbids to name."—Leland adds, "This whole account of the heathen mysteries given by Clement, is transcribed and approved by Eusebius, who introduces it by observing, that Clement knew these mysteries by his own experience." Farther, "the account which Arnobius gives of the Eleusinian mysteries celebrated at Athens, is perfectly agreeable to that of Clement."

To take off the force of the preceding argument, Leland observes, page 226, that Warburton endeavours to account for the ill opinion which the ancient Christian writers entertained of the mysteries, by observing, that they bore a secret grudge to the mysteries, because "the Christians, for their contempt of the national deities, were branded by the mystagogues as atheists, and in their solemn shows represented as in Tarsus." But Leland saith, "this is by no means a proper apology for the ancient Christians, if the charge which they brought against the mysteries was false;" because no ill treatment from the heathens could authorize them to give a false and paltry representation of their mysteries. —The last thing Warburton has advanced, to take off the force of the argument arising from the testimony which the Christian writers have borne to the impurity of the mysteries, and which Warburton calls the strange part of the story, is, that after all they have said against the mysteries, they should so studiously and formally have transferred the terms, phrases, rites, ceremonies, and discipline of these odious mysteries into our holy religion." He adds, "Sure, then, it was some more than ordinary veneration the people had for these mysteries, that could incline the fathers of the church to so fatal a council." To this Leland replies, page 227, "The veneration which the people had for the mysteries, affords not the least presumption, that the design of them was to overthrow the popular polytheism, but rather the contrary. Yet, because of the veneration which was so generally paid to them," the Christians adopted "the terms used in the mysteries, the better to gain upon the heathens, and to show that Christianity effected that in reality which the heathen mysteries vainly pretended to do."

As an illustration of the foregoing answer, Leland, p. 238, produces a passage from the latter end of the very discourse in which Clement shews that he had the worst opinion imaginable of the mysteries. He there speaks of the Christian religion, in allusion to the mysteries of Baœchos, and invites the heathens to quit the one, in order to embrace the other. He all along employs the terms which were made use of in these mysteries. He talks of celebrating the venerable orgies of the word.” To the hymns which were sung at the mysteries, he opposes a hymn sung to the great King of the Universe. He speaks of a Christian’s being initiated, and cries out, “O true holy mysteries! Being initiated, I am made holy.” He says, “The Lord himself acts the part of an hierophant,” or interpreter of the mysteries; and he concludes, “These are the Bachemalia of my mysteries: come then and be initiated.”—But, saith Leland, can anyone think that Clement means the same as allusion to the mysteries, because he really took them to be holy and useful things? The contrary plainly appears from this very passage, as well as from what he had said before in the Panegyric upon the Church; for but as they were accounted holy, and were considered as the most perfect means of purifying the soul, he takes occasion to show, that that venerable purity was really to be found in the Christian religion, and in its sacred duties and rites, which the heathens falsely attributed to their mysteries. Yet, saith Leland, I agree with this learned writer in the judicious remark which he makes, that the affecting to transfer the terms, phrases, and ceremonies of the mysteries into our holy religion, had a bad effect. It contributed very early to vitiate that religion which Ammianus Marcellinus, a Pagan writer, saw and acknowledged was absoluta et simplex, as it came out of the hands of its Author.

CHAPTER I.

Because the Ephesians, in their heathen state, had held the mysteries of their idol gods in the highest veneration, on account of the supposed importance of the discoveries which were made in them to the initiated: and because they esteemed the initiated, on account of these discoveries, more honoured and happy than the rest of mankind—the apostle began this epistle with displaying the great dignity and happiness of the members of the Christian church, whether Jews or Gentiles; not by a formal declaration of their honours and privileges, but by thanks to God for having bestowed these great honours and privileges on them. Thus, first of all, he thanked God for his having blessed the Gentiles with every spiritual blessing in the Christian church, equality with the Jews, although they did not obey the law of Moses, ver. 3.—And because the Judaizing teachers affirmed, that this was contrary to God’s purpose respecting the Jews, the apostle, in his thanksgiving, took notice, that God had bestowed those blessings on the Gentiles as well as on the Jews, agreeably to an election of them before the foundation of the world, that they might be holy through love to God, on account of his great goodness to them; and through love to man, from a regard to the commandment of God, ver. 4.—Next, he thanked God for his having predestinated holy persons of all nations to be to his own children; that is, to be the objects of his love and the heirs of his happiness; not through obedience to the law of Moses, but through faith in Jesus Christ, agreeably to his own benevolence, ver. 5.—which is now made known by the gospel, in order that men may gratefully praise him for his goodness, which is admirably displayed by the great favour shewed to them on account of his beloved Son, ver. 6.—by whose blood or death, and not through the sacrifices either of Judaism or of heathenism, we his sons shall obtain redemption, even the forgiveness of our sins, according to the greatness of his goodness, ver. 7.—the knowledge of which, Paul told the Ephesians, God had made to abound in the apostles, together with sufficient wisdom and prudence to fit them for publishing it to the world, ver. 8.

Having mentioned the knowledge of the goodness of God in the redemption of the world, which was communicated to the apostles, St. Paul beseeches God particularly for having made known to them the mystery of his will concerning his pardoning sins through the blood of Christ, and making the Gentiles heirs of the inheritance of heaven through faith, equally with the Jews, in accordance to his own benevolent purpose, which he had formed from the beginning of his own accord, ver. 9.—Here it is proper to observe, that the riches of God’s goodness, in resolving to pardon men’s sins through the blood of death by his Son, and to bestow that great blessing on the Gentiles equally with the Jews, are called in this place the mystery of God’s will, because, like the heathen mysteries, these things had hitherto been kept secret, Rom. xvi. 25; and because they were discoveries of infinitely greater importance to mankind, and much more certain, than all the discoveries made to the initiated in the most famed of the heathen mysteries. May we not, therefore, suppose, that this honourable appellation was given by the apostle to the gospel, to render it venerable in the eyes of the Ephesians, and of all the Gentiles who admired the heathen mysteries!—Further, the apostle tells, that God’s benevolent intention, in making known to him, and to his brethren apostles, the mystery of his will, was, that by their publishing it to the world, he might, in the gospel dispensation, gather together Jews and Gentiles into one church or fellowship under Christ, ver. 10.—that by faith in him, and not by obedience to the law of Moses, the Jews themselves might inherit the blessings promised in the covenant to the spiritual seed of Abraham; to which blessings he had predestinated believers of all nations, agreeably to his purpose—who bringeth all things to pass, not according to the will of any man, or body of men, but according to his own sovereign pleasure, ver. 11.—
and, in particular, that the believing Jews, even before he came, might occasion praise to God for his goodness and truth in the performance of his promises, by receiving the inheritance as a free gift through faith, and not as a debt through the law, ver. 12.—By whom (namely, by the Christ) ye Gentiles also have inherited the promises made to the spiritual seed of Abraham, having believed the word of truth, even the good news of your salvation, which was preached to you: By whom, also, after ye believed, ye were sealed, as God's children and heirs, with the Holy Spirit; so that ye can have no doubt of your salvation by faith without obedience to the law of Moses, ver. 13.—Which Holy Spirit, therefore, to believers, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, is the earnest or assurance that the inheritance shall be bestowed on them; and is to continue in the church, until the actual redemption of the people whom Christ hath purchased with his blood, is accomplished by the general resurrection, ver. 14.—Thus it appears, that the honours and privileges belonging to believers as the children of God, and as members of the Christian church or fellowship, are infinitely greater and more valuable than those of which the initiated, or members of the heathen fellowships, boasted.

After displaying the great excellency of the gospel revelation, and the honours and privileges belonging to the members of the Christian church, and tacitly contrasting these with the heathen mysteries, and with the privileges of the initiated, the apostle told the Ephesians, that the good news which he had received of their faith and love, made him daily give thanks to God on account of their happy state, ver. 15, 16.—and pray to God to give them both natural wisdom and revealed knowledge, in order that they might continue to acknowledge Christ as their Saviour, notwithstanding they should be persecuted for so doing, ver. 17.—also enlightened eyes of their understanding, that they might know the greatness of those privileges, which, by calling them into his fellowship, he had taught them to expect; and know likewise the glory of the inheritance which he had prepared for his children the saints, ver. 18.—and what the exceeding greatness of his power is with respect to believers, in making them as present alive from their trespasses and sins, (chap. ii. 5.), and in raising them hereafter from the dead to enjoy the inheritance; of which power, the apostle told them, God hath already given an illustrious example, in raising Christ, the head of the Christian fellowship, from the dead, and setting him down at his own right hand, ver. 19, 20.—far above all the different orders of angels in heaven, and potencies on earth, ver. 21.—and hath subjected all things under his feet, and hath given him to head over all things, for the benefit of the church, ver. 22.—which being animated, governed, and protected by him, as the human body is by its head, it is his body, by which his character, as Lord and Saviour of the church or Christian fellowship, is rendered complete, and is filled by him with all manner of gifts and graces, in order that every member of his body or fellowship may grow, under him, in perfection and happiness, ver. 23.

This sublime account of the resurrection of Christ, the head of the Christian church or fellowship; and of God's setting him down at his own right hand, as ruler both of the angelical hosts and of the princes and potencies on earth; and of his putting all things under his feet; and of his making him head over all things for the benefit of the church; and of his being rendered complete as the head of the Christian fellowship, by the union of its members to him; and of his making them alive from the death of sin; and of his filling them with miraculous gifts and moral graces, was, I think, designed by the apostle as a contrast, first, to the character and power of the false gods worshipped by the heathens as the heads of their fellowships, and, secondly, to the honours, advantages, and privileges which the initiated derived from their participation in those mysteries—and all with a view to make the Ephesians sensible, how far inferior in dignity and happiness the members of the heathen fellowships were to the members of the Christian church, which is a fellowship protected and governed by so high and powerful an head as Christ, whom the only true God hath raised to the government of the Universe, for the purpose of making the members of this noble fellowship holy and happy through all eternity.

CHAP. I.—Paul, by the will of God, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the saints (18) who are in Ephesus, and to the believers in Christ Jesus:

2 Grace be to you, and peace (see Rom. i. 7, note 4.) from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, (19) who hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing (20) in the heavenly places, (w., 167.) through Christ;

4 (Ksew) According as he hath elected us (21) through him before the foundation of the world;

2. In the heavenly places.—Here, and in chap. ii. 5., heavenly places, heavenly places, means the Christian church, called by Christ himself the kingdom of heaven, because the Christian church was foretold, Dan. ii. 41, under the character of God, of God of heaven would set up, and which shall never be destroyed. It is true, the proposition re, in the word re, spiritual, is not thought to denote the higher local situation of the heavenly places. Yet this doth not hinder us to interpret them of the Christian church, as much as that kingdom of God will not attain its perfect state, till it be translated to the regions above.—Rea thinks heavenly place denote heaven properly so called, because heavenly places signify heaven, Eph. iii. 10; consequently, that the apostle's meaning is, every spiritual blessing necessary to fit men for heaven. According to this meaning the translation should be, every spiritual blessing for heavenly places just now mentioned.

Ver. 4.—Elected us through him, before the foundation of the world.—This being said of the Ephesian brethren in general, it can't world, that we might be holy, and unblameable in his sight; (v) through. (See ver. 15.) 5 (Gropes) His hath predestinated us to the adoption of son unto himself, (his) through Jesus Christ, according to the benediction of his own will,
6 (To the praise of the glory of his grace, (w) whereby he hath highly favoured us, (n, 187.) on account of the Beloved;
7 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;
8 (Hl:Hp) The knowledge of which he hath made to abound in us apostles, with all wisdom and prudence necessary to the right manifestation of the same to the world. See Col. i. 25.
9 Blessed therefore be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath made known to us apostles the secret of his will concerning the pardon of sin, and concerning his making the Gentiles heirs of the everlasting inheritance through faith, agreeably to his own beneficent design which he formed within himself;
10 Namely, in the gospel, which is a dispensation calculated for the advised state of the world, by its publishing that secret, makes the following remark: "Here is a noble, beautiful, and affecting declaration from his grace, to the glory of his grace, and from the glory of his grace, to the praise of the name of Jesus Christ, who, by the grace of God, to whom belong the adoption of sons, whereby we are made to all the fulness of the times, (Eph. i. 23), to the glory of God."—John xi. 52.

V. 2.—In whom we have redemption, even the forgiveness of sins; (v) 4. (See ver. 15.) Seeing redemption consists in the forgiveness of sins, it follows, that the redeemed shall be delivered from death, the punishment of sin, by a blessed resurrection; and, in consequence of that deliverance, they shall be put in possession of the eternal inheritance. The great blessings, the apostles principally, before the creation of the world, the same as the apostles who are written to as "the称为 the" by power through faith, Exod. xvi. 6. I will redeem you with a stretched out arm, and with an outstretched hand, I will redeem you; and I will stretch out my hand, and will take you out of all the places where they have called your name, and will also consecrate you to me as a holy people. John iii. 16.

V. 8. With all wisdom is the fullness of peace. In the epistle of Paul, sometimes denotes that complete knowledge of the gospel doctrine which was communicated to the apostles by inspiration, I think, in this passage, it signifies the quality which commonly goes by the name of wisdom, because it is joined with prudence, and was an endowment very necessary to fit the apostles for discharging the duties of their office successively, under the guidance of the grace of God in the gospel.

V. 9. The mystery of his will: the whole doctrine of the gospel, taken completely, is called 'the wisdom of God in a mystery,' 1 Cor. ii. 7. not because any part of it is insignificant, but for the reasons mentioned in the note on that verse.——The same application is given to particular discoveries made in the gospel. For example, the salvation of the Gentiles through faith without obedience to the law of Moses, and the rejection, together with the future restoration of the Jews, are called 'a mystery,' Rom. xi. 25. as so many other particulars which were not made known to the Jews during the time of Christ, and especially afterwards. The rejection of the Gentiles is called 'the redemption of the purchased people,' Eph. ii. 14. See 1 John ii. 2, note 1. Because the Jew did not know that the privileges of election and adoption were here annexed to the grace of Christ, his chapter expressly maintained their title to these privileges in common with the Gentiles.

3. Benignity.——So it signifies, Luke xi. 11. Accordingly it is there rendered with the same word.

V. 6. To the praise of the glory of his grace.—On this Gosc.
gather together all believers into one body, society, or visible church, under Christ as their head, (see Col. i. 18, note), both Jews and Gentiles: I say, under him, 11 By whom even we Jews have inherited the promises that were made to the fathers, of which promise an exact instrument (ver. 5, note 1.) according to the purpose of him, who effectually worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will, 12 That we should be to the praise of his glory, (ver. 6.), who before hoped in the Christ.

chap. l. 13 (to the) By whom ye also have inheri-terit, (from ver. 11. 12.) - Having believed the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation, (w.) by whom also, after ye believed, ye were sealed with the Spirit of promise, the Holy Spirit, 14 Who is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased people, to the praise of his glory. (Ver. 12.)

15 For this reason, I also, having heard of the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you, this some understand the last dispensation of religion, in which all the former dispensations terminated, and which was erected when the time fixed for it by prophecy was fully come. The word properly signifies, the plan which the master of a family, or his steward, hath established for the management of the family. Also it signifies, a plan formed for the management of any sort of business. In this passage it signifies, the plan which God had formed for accomplishing the salvation of believers, by gathering them together into one church, under Christ as their head or governor, chap. iii. 2.

To gather together (to) all things. Here, as in other passages of scripture, (to) is put for the, all things; see Ecc. iv. 21. 2. The word properly signifies, to recapitulate the principal matters contained in a discourse. Here it is used metaphorically, to denote the gathering together of believers of all nations into one church, of which Christ is the head. 3. Both things in the heavens, and things upon the earth. Because the powers of heaven, Luke xii. 29, denote the Jewish rulers and the shaking of the heaven and of the earth, foretold by Haggai, is interpreted by St. Paul, Heb. vi. 25. of the abdication of the Jewish and heathen religious, I am inclined to think, by things in the heavens and things upon the earth, in this verse, to understand the Jews and the Gentiles. According to this interpretation, the gathering of all things under Christ means, not only the forming of Jews and Gentiles into one catholic church, but the bringing of them both into the heavenly country, through the mediation of Christ, as is evident from ver. 11-13. Whereas, as things on earth, and things in heaven, both in this passage and Gal. i. 20, understand the angelical host; and by things on earth, believers of all nations, who, with the angels, shall at length be joined in one great society or church, for the perpetuation of worship. This passage is not translated very consistently, according to Heb. xii. 22. Here, by things in the heavens, understand the souls of the saints in heaven who died before Christ came into the world, and who are not to be made perfect till the resurrection.

In fact. According to the counsel of his own will. The apostle makes this observation, to convince the believing Jews that God will bestow on them, and on the believing Gentiles, the inheritance of heaven through faith, whether their unbelieving brethren are pleased or displeased therewith.

To the apostles. The word proper, (to) of the apostles, Xwv, Who before hoped in the Christ. -Chandler's note here is good. He saith, "This is a proper characterizing mark or distinguishing mark of the Jews. They had the promises of the Messiah or Christ, and therefore hoped in him before the time of his actual appearance. Thus we find it was the common character of the devout Jews, that they waited for the consolation of Israel, Luke x. 22., and that they looked for redemption in Jerusalem, ver. 38., that they hoped in the Messiah before the time of his appearance." This circumstance therefore proves, that the apostles are speaking in the Christ in this verse; for the Gentiles had no hope in Christ before he actually came, Eph. ii. 12.

Ver. 13-14. By whom ye also have been supplied the words 'have inherited,' from ver. 11. because that addition agrees better with the apostle's design, than the addition which our translators have taken from their translation of ver. 12. have trusted when. 2. Ye were sealed with the Spirit of promise. -This is an Hebraism for the promised Spirit. See Gen. iii. 13. note 1. -In allusion to the custom of merchants in the eastern countries, who marked their bills or parcels with seals, to distinguish them from the goods of others. Christ is said to have marked the Gentiles as the children of God, by bostering on them the name of Christ. Hence, when Peter rehearsed to the brethren in Jerusalem, how the Holy Ghost fell on Cornelius and his company, as on the Jewish believers at the beginning, they replied, Acts x. 38. 'Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life.' According to this idea, the ordinary influences of the Spirit on the minds of believers are also included in this sealing, because thereby they acquire the consciousness of the age of God, and are prepared for eternal life. Accordingly, though the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, whereby the believing Jews and Gentiles in the first age were sealed as heirs of the promise, have long since been withdrawn, the ordinary influences of the Spirit of God still remain. And if they produce in any man a new nature, he is thereby marked or declared to be God's son; and that mark or seal is to him a stronger evidence of his title to the inheritance, than if he possessed the miraculous gifts; nay, than if an angel from heaven assured him of his title. Hence earliest ought we to be in our endeavours to obtain this most excellent seal of the Spirit. See Eph. v. 30. where likewise we are said to be 'sealed with the Holy Spirit to the day of redemption.' 14. Another reference to the mysteries of Diana received from the priests a sacred seal or ring, with the figure of a bull, as the mark of their initiation. And it is well known that the servants in the temples of particular gods, and even the workmen, had marks on their bodies, by which they were distinguished. Perhaps in this passage the apostle alludes to these marks also. See Gal. vi. 17. note 2.

Ver. 14. 1. Who is the earnest of our inheritance. -See 2 Cor. iii. 11. note 2. At this passage Jerome explains, "Si ait huius terrae, quam sit sit possessio? -If the earth is your possession, how great a possession is he?" See Col. i. 12, where the inheritance here spoken of is called the inheritance of the same grace in which the Gentiles also. See Gal. iii. 29. note 2, to the apostles. The redemption here spoken of, being the redemption of the body of Christ, purchased people from death by the resurrection, Rom. viii. 23. 'the earnest of the Spirit,' which is to remain in the church till that glorious event is accomplished, must be principally the ordinary influences of the Spirit, producing in believers that belief which is necessary to their inheriting heaven. See ver. 13, note 2.

Ver. 15. Having heard of the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you. -This does not imply that the Ephesians were strangers to the apostle. He wrote in the same terms to the Thessalonians who were his converts, 1 Thess. iii. 4. For even when we were with you, we foretold you that we were to be afflicted, as also it hap- pened, even as ye know. 6. For this reason also, no longer bearing my anxiety, I was to know your faith, lest by some means I might have supposed that you had been tempted you, and our labour have been in vain. 6. But now when Timothy came to us from you, and gave us the good news of your faith and love.—In like manner, writing to Philemon, his own convert, he saith, verse 4. 'I give thanks to my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers, 6. Hearing of thy love towards the Lord Jesus, and all the saints.' Therefore, as the apostle's bearing of the faith and love of Philemon, does not mean that he was ignorant of these things till they were reported to him, but that he had an assurance of converting in the true faith of the gospel, and in their love to one another, so the and of the love which IS to all the saints.

16 Do not cease (see 1 Thess. v. 17, note) to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers:

17 That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, (Rom. i. 23, note 1,) would give the Spirit (56.) of wisdom and revelation, (6.) for the acknowledgment of him;

18 Also, the eyes of your understanding be enlightened, (in order that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches (52.) of his inheritance, (53.) prepared (54.) for the saints;

19 And what the exceeding greatness of his power (142.) with relation to us who believe, (5.) according to the working of his strength, (see 2 Cor. iv. 17, note 5.)

20 Which he wrought (5.) in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

21 Far above all government, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come;

22 And subj ected all things under his feet, (1) and (Acts, Eph. iv. 11.) appointed him head (1) of all things in the church. (Acts, Eph. iv. 11.) over all things (ς, 25.) for the church,

23 Which is his body, and the fulness of him who filleth all with all.
