HISTORICAL SKETCH

THE JEWS,

SINCE THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

BY

REV. BERNHARD PICK, Ph.D.

NEW YORK:
JOHN B. ALDEN, PUBLISHER.
Judæa was a waste, Jerusalem was a heap of ruins. The temple had been consumed by flames, and the third exile—the European—began. Directly after the triumph of Titus, the great Council of the Israelitish Rabbins was established at Tiberias, in Galilee. The school of Scribes, instituted in that city, soon took the place of that temple, whose restoration has never ceased to be the object of their hopes and prayers. The celebrated revolt of Bar-Cochba and Akiba sprung, in great measure, from thence. Tiberias had become a kind of Jerusalem, where the so-called Oral Law was framed. The first idea of such an undertaking is thought by many to have originated with Rabbi Akiba, who was flayed alive in the Bar-Cochba revolt, in 135. But universal tradition attributes both the plan and its accomplishment to Rabbi Judah, the Holy, styled also the Nasi, or Prince, that is to say, spiritual head. of the synagogues in that country. About the year A.D. 190 he completed a collection of all the oral or traditional laws, called the Mishna. The later Rabbins have exhausted their ingenuity in making commentaries upon, and additions to, this work. The whole collection of these commentaries is named Gemara. With the Mishna, its text-book, it forms the Talmuds. Of these the Jerusalem Talmud is prior in date, having been completed toward the end of the third century in Palestine; while the Babylonian Talmud, compiled in the schools of Babylon and Persia, takes its date from the year 500. The Talmud is not the only national work of which the Jews, during their present captivity, can boast. From the very first we find ranked with it two other works of tradition—the Massorah or fixing the text of the Bible, and Cabbala or "Theosophy."

The dispersed Jews, even before the fall of Jerusalem, had classed themselves under three different designations. The Rabbins understand by the "Captivity of the East," the remains of the ten tribes; by that "of Egypt," the Jews under the dominion of the Ptolemies, particularly those of Alexandria; by that "of the West" the Jews dispersed over every part of the Roman Empire. In the following HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE JEWS.

Sketch we shall speak only of the Jews in the East, and in the West, in Asia and in Europe, since with the history of the Jews in those countries are connected the annals of their wandering and suffering in all parts of the world.

In the Roman Empire, after the reign of Vespasian and Adrian, the condition of the Jews was not only tolerable, but in many respects prosperous. But a complete reverse took place when the Emperor of Rome knelt before the Cross, and the Empire became a Christian state. From this epoch we may date the first period of humiliation. The second marked period in their state of moral and political degradation extends from the commencement of the middle ages to the death of Charlemagne and the incursions of the Normans in Europe. This period, which closes with the discovery of America, the reign of Charles V., and the Reformation, was for the Jews everywhere, with the exception of those in Spain and Portugal, a time of the deepest misery, oppression, and decay. Thus the period of cruel oppression of the Jews in the West began with the triumph of Christianity over Paganism, just as in the East, three centuries later, it may be dated from the rise and triumph of the Crescent. As has already been stated, the humiliation of the Jews commenced under Constantine. A gleam of hope shone upon them in the days of Julian the Apostate, but they were more ill-treated under his Christian successors. Till the reign of Theodosius, in the fourth century, however, their position in the Empire was tolerable. Different, however, it was in the fifth century. The Roman Empire had, from the year 395, been divided into the Eastern or Greek Empire, of which Constantinople was the capital; and the Western Empire, of which Rome and Italy still formed the center. In both these divisions, the position and treatment of the Jews became worse and worse. In the West, even under Honorius, its first emperor, oppressive laws began to be enacted against the Jews. In the East, i.e., in the eastern part of the Roman Empire, soon after called the Empire of Greece, or Byzantium, the position of the Jews became particularly unfavorable. The government of the Emperor Justin, and the code of Justinian, soon permanently fixed the social relations of the Jews in the Byzantine Empire. Justin (A. D. 523) excluded all non-Christians from holding any office or dignity in the state. In the reign of Justinian the enactments against the Jews were made more onerous. No won-under that during his reign many rebellions broke out among the Jews.

From the reign of Justinian, the position of the Jews in the Greek Empire became such as to prevent their possessing any degree of political importance. True, they carried on theological studies in the country of their fathers, especially at Tiberias. But even here the last surviving gleam of their ancient glory was soon extinguished. The dignity of Patriarch had ceased to exist with the year 429, and the link connecting the different synagogues of the Eastern Empire was broken. Many Jews quitted Palestine and the Byzantine empire to seek refuge in Persia and Babylonia, where they were more favored. When in 1455 Constantinople was taken by the Turks, some of the Jewish exiles from Spain and Portugal took refuge in the ancient capital of the Eastern Empire, where the number of their descendants is now considerable.

In the far East, beyond the boundaries of the Grecian Empire, the Jews continued in a comparatively prosperous condition until the triumph of the Islam was complete. The Jews in Babylonia were governed by the Resh-Glutha, or Prince of the Captivity. Since the Babylonian exile a great many Jews had settled here, who were joined by several fresh colonies even before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, and by many more after that epoch. The Prince of the Captivity mediated between the heads of the synagogue and the Persian or Parthian kings. The dignity itself took its rise while the Parthians reigned in Persia, and continued under the new dynasty of the Sassanides, and only came to an end in the middle of the eleventh century, under the dominion of the caliphs. The feeling existing between the Parthian kings and the Jews was of a very friendly nature, and whenever the Parthians undertook a war against the Romans, the common foe of both Jews and Parthians, the former always assisted the latter. Thus when Chosroes I., surnamed the Great, declared war against the Byzantine Empire in 531, the Jews lent their assistance. And although their hopes were for the present crushed by the brilliant victory gained by the Romans, yet under Chosroes II., grandson of the former, 25,000 Jews assisted in the war against Heraclius, which resulted in the capture of Jerusalem (A. D. 625), which was, however, retaken by Heraclius four years later. Under the caliphs, the Jews met by turns with good and ill treatment. The downfall of the caliphs brought no favorable change to the Jews. On the contrary, their troubles increased and their celebrated schools at Pumbaditha and Sora at length entirely disappeared, and the succession of their learned men was continued henceforth in Spain. Thus the rise of the Mohammedan power in Asia gave the signal that the time for their greatest oppression and degradation in the East also had come.

In the Peninsula of Arabia the Jews had dwelt from time immemorial. They date their establishment there, according to some, from the visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon. Before the time of Mohammed the Jews were very prosperous there, and even a Jewish kingdom under Jewish kings should have had existed there. When Mohammed made his appearance, he found the Jews in general favorably disposed toward him. Several of the Jewish tribes became even his open partisans. But when his principles and plans became more thoroughly known, and the Jews rejected him, Mohammed at once commenced a war of extermination against them. His first attack was against the clan of the Beni-Kinouka, who dwelt in Medina, and was overcome by the warrior-prophet. The same fate awaited the other tribes, one after the other. From the moment that the Jews declared themselves against Mohammed, they became the especial object of his hatred, and since that time a feeling of enmity has ever existed between the Mussulman and the Jew. Crescent and Cross shared equally in the contempt and hatred of the Jew, and as in Christian Europe so in Mohammedan Asia and Africa, the Jew was compelled to bear a distinctive mark in his garments—here the yellow hat, there the black turban.

Beyond the boundaries of either the old Roman or the Byzantine Empire, Jews have, in early times, been met with, both in the most remote parts of the interior of Asia, and upon the coast of Malabar. In the latter place they probably arrived in the fifth century in consequence of a persecution raised in Persia. In the seventeenth century a Jewish colony was met with in China. When the Jews emigrated there is difficult to ascertain.

But to return to the West. It has already been stated that with the conversion of the Roman Empire to Christianity evil days came upon the Jews. In the Western Empire this unfavorable change commenced in the days of Honorius, and would have continued so; but the storm that burst over Rome toward the end of the fifth century changed in a degree the position of the Jews. The Northern nations, as long as they professed Arianism in preference to the Catholic faith, showed themselves merciful to their Jewish subjects. This was especially the case with the Goths. When the dominion of the Ostrogoths, under their king Theodoric, succeeded that of Odoacer and the Heruli in Italy and the West, the Jews had every reason to be satisfied with their new sovereign. The consequence was that the Goths in the West, like the Persians in the East, found faithful allies in the Jews of that period. When Justinian, by his general, Narses, conquered Italy from the Ostrogoths (A.D. 555), the Jews, especially those at Naples, assisted him, only to be heavily punished afterward.

The Visigoths also, in their defence of Arles in Provence, against the Franks under Clovis, were assisted by the Jews. In Spain, the kings of the Visigoths treated them with favor, till about the year 600, their king Recared, having embraced Catholicism, inaugurated that peculiar system of conduct toward the Jews, which finally resulted in their total expulsion from the Peninsula. The Franks were at the beginning less merciful to the Jews than the Goths. The Merovingians treated them with peculiar rigor. Thus in 540, King Childerbert forbade the Jews to appear in the streets of Paris, during the Easter week. Clotaire II. deprived them of the power of holding office. King Dagobert compelled them either to receive baptism or to leave the country. Under the Carolingians in France, the Jews of the eighth and ninth centuries enjoyed a great degree of prosperity, so that the Romish bishops took alarm. Under Pepin le Bref, they enjoyed many privileges, and so likewise under his son Charlemagne, and under his successor and son Louis le Débonnaire. The latter even freed them, from the grinding taxes imposed upon them, and confirmed to them these immunities in the year 830. And all exertions of the priesthood, especially of Agobard, bishop of Lyons, to injure the Jews, were utterly useless.

The position of the Jews underwent an entire change at the downfall of the Carolingian dynasty, which began to decay after the death of Louis le Débonnaire. The invasion of the Normans was partly the cause, and partly the signal for a complete change of kings in Europe. An age of barbarism spread over the whole face of Christianity, the feudal system developed itself, in every way injurious to the Jews. But one of the greatest evils which they were compelled to endure, was the prevalence of the crusading spirit. During the first crusade (1096-1099), Treves, Spires, Worms, Mayence, Cologne, and Regensburg were the seat of oppression, murders, and bodily tortures, inflicted upon the Jews. During the second crusade (1147-1149), Rudolph, a fanaticel monk, traveling through central Europe, stirred up the populace to take vengeance on all unbelievers. The cry "Hep! hep!" was sufficient to bring terror to the heart of every Jew. But King Conrad III. and such men as Bernard of Clairvaux protected them, and thus the sufferings of the Jews were less, compared with the intemperate zeal of Rudolph. During the middle ages, the Jews were not only persecuted, but, where they were tolerated, they became also the Pariahs of the West. But to resume the thread of events.

In France, formerly so signally patronized by the Carlovingians, the Jews experienced a different treatment after the extinction of that dynasty. Toward the end of the eleventh century they were banished and afterward recalled by Philip I. In 1183 they were at first banished by Philip Augustus, but re-admitted upon certain conditions, one of which was the obligation to wear a little wheel upon their dress as a mark. Louis VII. (A. D. 1223) treated them all as his serfs, and with one stroke of his pen remitted to his Christian subjects all their debts to the Jews. Louis IX. (St. Louis), being anxious to convert them, commanded that the Talmud be destroyed by fire, and twenty-four carts-full of the Talmud were publicly burned in Paris (1244). Philip the Fair, after robbing them repeatedly, expelled the Jews from France in 1306. Under Louis X. they were treated unfavorably, while Philip V., the Long, favored and protected them. In 1341 the usual accusations of treason, poisoning the wells, etc., were brought against them, and many were burned, massacred, banished, or condemned to heavy fines. Under John II. they enjoyed a little rest, and so also under Charles V. But in 1370 they were again banished, but soon recalled under Charles VI. In spite of the many vicissitudes, Jewish learning flourished in France, especially in the south. Men like David Kimchi and Rashi have become household names in Jewish as well as in Christian theology.
In England the Jews date their first residence from the time of the Heptarchy. In the twelfth century, under Henry II. and his son, the cruel treatment and plundering of the Jews reached its height. On the coronation day of King Richard I. (1189), when they came to pay their homage, the population plundered and murdered them a whole day and night in London. This sad example of London was followed at Stamford, Norwich, and more especially at York. Under King John (A. D. 1199) all kinds of liberties and privileges were granted to the Jews, but he soon showed that he cared more for their money than for their persons. Henry III. (1217-1272) followed the same policy, and when the Jews petitioned the king to allow them to leave the country, he would not grant that request. Under Edward I. they were banished in 1290, and some sixteen thousand are said to have left the country.

In Germany, Jews were found already in the fourth century, especially at Cologne, where they soon became numerous and prosperous. But the commencement of the middle ages in Germany, as elsewhere, put an end to their favorable position. It is true that the Emperor of Germany regarded the Jews as his Kammerknechte, or "Servants of the Imperial Chamber," and as such they enjoyed the emperor's protection, but the scores of violent deeds, which are recorded, only show that even the protection of the emperor could not prevent the popular rage from breaking out and marking its course by bloodshed and desolation. The least cause was sufficient to massacre the Jews. When in 1348 an epidemic malady, known as the Black Death, visited half of Europe, the Jews were blamed for it because they were said to have poisoned the wells and rivers. A general massacre took place, in spite of the demonstrations of princes, magistrates, bishops, and the Pope himself. In the south of Germany and in Switzerland, the persecution raged with most violence. From Switzerland to Silesia, the land was drenched with innocent blood, and in some places their residence was forbidden.

In the Netherlands, the history of the Jews during the middle ages was much like that of Germany and the north of France. In Flanders they were already living at the time of the Crusaders. In the twelfth century they were driven out, but were found there again in the fourteenth. In 1370 they were accused of having pierced the holy wafer, an accusation which had brought many to the stake. In Utrecht the Jews resided till the year 1444. In Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, many Jews had sought refuge after their banishment from France by Philip the Fair.

Before the end of the tenth century, Jews are already found at Prague. Boleslaus I. favored them, and permitted them to build a synagogue. In Poland they existed very early. Under Boleslaus V., Duke of Poland (1264), they enjoyed many privileges. His great-grandson, King Casimer, showed them still greater favor, out of love, it is said, for Esther, a beautiful Jewess. Synagogues, academies, and rabbinical schools have always abounded in Poland.

In Italy, where Jews have resided from early times in their ghettos, the Popes generally appeared kindly toward them. Gregory I., the Great, in the seventh century, proved himself the friend of the Jews, but Gregory VII., in the tenth century, was their enemy. In other great towns of Italy, the position of the Jews varied. At Leghorn and Venice they met with favor, and so also with a less degree in Florence, but at Genoa they were looked upon with enmity. In the kingdom of Naples, where they settled about the year 1200, persecutions took place from time to time. Italy is the home of some Jewish poets and expositors.

In Spain the Jews must have settled at a very early time, for the Council of Elvira, assembled in 305, made enactments against them, which proves that they had already become numerous there. Under Recared, the first Catholic sovereign of the Gothic race, the long-continued and relentless work of persecution began. His successor Sisebul (612–617) ordered all his Jewish subjects to renounce their faith or quit his dominions. Under Sisenard, the fourth Council of Toledo, in the year 631, mitigated these measures of compulsion, without rescinding any of the penalties which had been previously enacted. Chintilla, in 626, exiled the Jews, but they still remained in great numbers under Wamba (672). In 698, Erwig persecuted them, while Egiza banished them upon the accusation of having entered into league with the Saracens of Africa. Witzia (in 700) recalled them. Under his successor Rodrigo, the Saracens invaded Spain after the famous battle of Xeres de la Frontera in 711. The Jews greeted the Arabs as their deliverers, who again treated them kindly. In the reign of Abderahman III. (912-961), Cordova became eminent for industry and learning, and the Jews shared largely in the splendor and prosperity of the Arabs. Less peaceful times, however, enjoyed the Jews in the Christian states of the Peninsula.

From the southern part of Spain the Jews had emigrated to Castile in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, where they soon became very prosperous. Their synagogues and schools increased, and as formerly in the East by the Resh Glutha, so were they now governed by the Rabbin mayor, an Israelite, usually in favor at court, and appointed by the king. Every kind of office was open to them, and they often served in the army. But soon the populace, stirred up by the inferior clergy, gave vent to envy, which manifested itself first by the usual accusations of sacrilege and the murder of Christian children, but soon broke out into open rage and acts of violence. Amid the general prosperity of the Jewish nation, a massacre took place at Toledo in 1212, and in 1213 the Council of Zamora, in Leon, vehemently demanded the revival and enforcement of the ancient law against the Jews. In general we may say, that the kings of Castile and Aragon, with very few exceptions, eminently befriended the Jews during the four centuries which elapsed between the reign of Ferdinand I. and the Catholic sovereigns, Ferdinand and Isabella. Ferdinand I. was almost the only one who showed enmity to the Jews. Alphonso VI. (who conquered Toledo from the Saracens) granted many valuable privileges to the Jews. Alphonso IX., of Castile (A.D. 1158-1196), showed them still greater favor, because of his love for the fair Jewess Rachel. The prosperity of the Jews in Castile and their influence reached its greatest height in the reigns of Alphonso XI. (1312-1350) and his son, Peter the Cruel (1350-1369). All this grandeur and these privileges were, nevertheless, not unfrequently accompanied by violent acts on the part of the populace, and complaints and protestations from the Councils and the Cortes, which had little or no effect upon the kings.

More perilous times, however, commenced for the Jews of Castile and the rest of Spain under John I. (1379-80). This king found occasion to deprive them of the jurisdiction they had hitherto possessed. Under Henry III., tumults took place at Seville in 1390 and 1391 and the Jewish quarter was attacked and burned to ashes. This fearful example spread, as by contagion, to Cordova, Madrid, Toledo, over the whole of Catalonia, and even to the isle of Majorca. In the first years of the reign of John II., a royal mandate, dated Valladolid, 1412, was issued, which contained the most oppressive measures which had ever been promulgated against the Jews since the time of the later Visigothic kings. Among other enactments, they were ordered to wear a peculiar dress. In consequence of these severe enactments, many joined the Church, who were styled Conversos, or "New Christians."

The glorious period during which Isabella, the sister of Henry IV., with her husband, Don Ferdinand of Aragon, governed Castile, brought a complete change over the whole face of the country, and became to the Jews, and also to the New Christians, the time of a most striking crisis.

But before speaking of this period, let us glance at some of the most famous literary men of the Jews during their residence in that country, before the close of the middle ages. We mention Menahem ben Saruk (d. 970), author of a biblical dictionary; Jehudah Ibn Chajug (in Arabic Aboulwalid), the chief of Hebrew grammarians (about 1050); Ibn Ganach (d. 1050), the grammarian; Ibn Gabirol (the Avicebron among the Schoolmen), philosopher, grammarian, and commentator (d. 1070); Ibn Pakuda the moralist (1050–1100); Ibn Giath, the cosmographer, astronomer, and philosopher; Ibn Gikatilla the grammarian (1070–1100); Ibn Balaam, commentator and philologist (d. 1100); Moses ibn Ezra, the hymnist (d. 1139); Jehuda Ha-Levi, the philosopher and poet (d. 1141); Ibn Daud, the historian (d. 1180); Abraham ibn Ezra, commentator, philosopher, and poet (d. 1167); Jehuda Alcharizi, the Horace of Jewish poetry in Spain (d. 1230); Benjamin Tudela, the traveler; Jehuda Tibbon, the prince of translators (d. 1190); Isaac Alfasi (d. 1089); Moses Maimonides, the greatest of all mediæval rabbis (d. 1204); Moses Gerundensis, or Nachmanides (d. 1270); Abraham Abulafla, the cabbalist (d. 1292); Moses ben Shem—Tob de Leon—the author of the Sohar (d. 1305); Jedaja Bedarchi, or Penini (d. 1340); Abner, of Burgos, better known by his Christian name Alfonso Burgensis de Valladolid (d. 1346); Jacob ben Asheri; Ibn Caspi (d. 1340); Gersonides, or Rabbaï among the Jews, famous as philosopher and commentator (d. 1345). Solomon Levi of Burgos better known by his Christian name Paulus Burgensis or de Santa Maria, bishop of Burgos (d. 1435); Josef Albo (d. 1444); Simon Duran, the polemic (d. 1444); Ibn Verga, the historian, who died in the dungeon of the Inquisition; Abravanel, the theologian and commentator, who was exiled with his co-religionists from Spain (d. 1515).

The great prosperity of the Jews in Spain proved their ruin. The ignorant populace, instigated by the priests, could not brook the happy condition of the Jews, and wherever they were to be found, they were from time to time pounced upon; numbers of them were slain, while others, to save their lives, submitted to baptism. Thus the Spanish Church contained, besides a body of real Jewish converts, whose names are known by their excellent writings, a large number of nominal Christians who, by sentiment, remained Jews. Soon popular suspicion was aroused against these latter, the so-called "New Christians;" and at last the Inquisition was set in motion to find those out who while outwardly conforming to the Church, secretly lived according to the rules of the Synagogue. Horrible are the details of what the Inquisition wrought at that time in Spain; but, curiously enough, all to no purpose. Cruel as was the old Inquisition, it was to be surpassed by the new Inquisition, established by Ferdinand and Isabella, and which cast so dark a shadow over their reign. While the old Inquisition was of a limited power, and its influence of little importance, the powers of the "New Inquisition" or "Holy Tribunal" were enlarged and extended, and under Torquemada, the first Inquisitor-General, it became one of the most formidable engines of destruction which ever existed. Isabella at first felt great repugnance to the establishment of this institution, and some of the most eminent men opposed it. But the Dominicans had set their heart upon it, and were determined to obtain it. What finally determined the queen to adopt it was a vow she had made when a young infanta, in the presence of Thomas of Torquemada, then her confessor, that if ever she came to the throne she would maintain the Catholic faith with all her power, and extirpate heresy to the very root; and thus it was that she became instrumental in the perpetration of the most horrible cruelties which blacken and deform the history of men. The New Inquisition reached its climax in the year 1492, when an edict was published ordering all Jews who would not embrace Christianity to leave the country within four months. The news of this edict came upon the Jews like a thunder-clap. Every appeal to the compassion of the king and queen was defeated by the opposition of Torquemada. The Jews offered immense sums of money as a price for remaining in a country where they had already been established for centuries. But the merciless Torquemada presented himself before the king, with a crucifix in his hand, and asked, for how many pieces of silver more than Judas he would sell his Saviour to the Jews? Over 300,000 Jews left Spain, and emigrated to Africa, Italy, and Turkey. Most of them went to Portugal, where they enjoyed a few years of rest. In 1497, however, they were again left to the choice, either to receive baptism or leave the country forever. Many abandoned forever the soil of Portugal; others, not few in number, embraced or feigned to embrace the Roman Catholic faith. Under Don Emanuel and his son John III., the "New Christians" enjoyed the protection of the state in every way in Portugal.

Following the Spanish exiles, a short time after the edicts of 1492 and 1497, Jews and New Christians were to be met with in the newly-discovered territories of America and in Brazil. In Africa, Asia, and the Turkish Empire, their families and synagogues have been established, and have continued to this day. In great numbers the exiled Jews settled in the western parts of Africa, especially in the states of Morocco. At Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, Oran, and Fez, Jews soon felt themselves at home. In the Turkish Empire, soon after the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453, the Jews became a prominent part of the population, and when the Spanish exiles came here, they found numerous synagogues and schools of learning. And although they belonged to one nation, yet they kept distinct from their co-religionists, preserving not only their own liturgy, but also their language, and were distinguished here as everywhere from their other co-religionists by the name of Sephardin or Spaniards. In Italy also they were welcomed, with the exception of Naples, where they were not allowed to remain. In the Ecclesiastical States, and especially at Rome, the exiles were but little persecuted, and the New Christians lived in far greater security in the Papal States than in Spain and Portugal. The Jews established in Italy printing establishments; the most celebrated was that at Ferrara, where the famous Spanish version of the Old Testament was printed. That there were also many learned men among the Jews of Italy is but natural.

Shortly after the passing of the edicts in 1492 and 1497, many Jewish emigrants sought refuge on the northern side of the Pyrenees, where they enjoyed many privileges. Early in the seventeenth century, Portuguese Jews were settled and flourishing in the Danish States. At Hamburg, which was soon honored with the appellation of "Little Jerusalem," the Jews enjoyed a very great social prosperity. The country, however, which has shown the greatest favor and afforded the warmest hospitality to the exiled Spanish Jews since the close of the sixteenth century, was the Low Countries of the Netherlands. When the first Jews, or New Christians, from Spain, made their appearance in the Low Countries, there was not a vestige of those French and German Jews whose troubles we have before related. The first indication of this reestablishment of the Jews in the southern part of the United Provinces is found in the year 1516. At that time some refugees from Spain petitioned Charles V. to be allowed to reside in his dominions. Their appeal was unheeded, and severe edicts entirely excluded New Christians from Holland. And yet, notwithstanding these edicts, many Jews were to be found in these provinces before and after their separation from Spain. Their religion had long ceased to be tolerated, but they practiced it with the greatest secrecy, and lived and prospered under Spanish names. At Antwerp, also, the concealed Jews were very numerous, and had established academies for the study of Hebrew and Spanish literature. Most of these Spanish and Portuguese Jewish families established themselves shortly afterward in the Protestant Low Countries, to seek there complete freedom for the exercise of their own religion. Their first settlement at Amsterdam was made on the side of East Friesland. It was from Embden, that, in the year 1594, ten individuals of the Portuguese families of Lopes, Homen, and Pereira came to Amsterdam, where they soon resumed their original Jewish name of Abendana, and in the year 1596 the Great Day of Atonement was celebrated by a small community of Portuguese Jews at Amsterdam. In 1598 they built the first synagogue in that capital, and in 1618 the third. In the meantime the German and Polish Jews had also established their synagogues in the capital of Holland; and Amsterdam, like Hamburg, was a "Little Jerusalem." Of the authors and learned men brought up in the synagogues of Holland, we mention Rabbi Menasseh Ben Israel, who pleaded the cause of his brethren before Oliver Cromwell. Contemporary with him was the well known Uriel da Costa. To the generation which succeeded that of Uriel da Costa, belongs Benedict Spinoza. At the Hague too, the Portuguese Jews enjoyed great prosperity and esteem, and their synagogue is situated in one of the finest quarters of the town.

Almost immediately after the discovery of the New World, the Jews from the Peninsula established themselves in America. The first Jewish colony was established in Brazil, in 1624, when the Dutch took possession of that country. The nucleus formed by the Jewish settlers from Holland was greatly strengthened by the progress of the Dutch in Brazil, under William of Nassau, about 1640, when some 600 Jews sailed from Amsterdam to Brazil in 1641, but who were obliged to leave again in consequence of the downfall of the Dutch rule in Brazil, in 1654. In the meantime, the settlement founded in French Guiana increased at a rapid rate, where the Jews enjoyed special privileges. During the wars between France and England in the reign of Louis XIV., the Jews in Eastern Guiana suffered severely, in consequence of which they settled at Surinam. Their privileges were confirmed under King Charles II., by Lord Willoughby (1662), and the Dutch and West Indian Company. Of those parts of the West Indies where Jewish settlements are to be found, the British colony of Jamaica deserves special mention. Here a large Hebrew congregation has been in existence since the middle of the seventeenth century.

As regards the Jews in the United States and North America at large, Prof. Cassel (in his article Juden in Ersh and Gruber's Allgemeine Enzyklopädie) disposes of those of North America in the following pithy words:—

"To the Jews emigrated to America, especially to the United states, that continent represents the land of the independence the settler obtains by the very fact of setting his foot on its shore. The Jews of North America have no history of their own; theirs is the history of the freedom of that continent. American Jews are none, but only Jews from all parts of Europe who emigrated here, formed congregations and were free and independent. In the seventeenth century, Jews went to North and South America with the English and Portuguese; in the eighteenth century they joined in the struggle of the American colonies for their independence; and in the nineteenth America is the great commonwealth, where the Jewish portion of the population of Europe, being sick of Europe—some impelled by the spirit of adventure, others by rank despair—seek and find a harbor of refuge."

In England, as we have seen, Menasseh Ben Israel of Amsterdam pleaded the cause of his co-religionists before Cromwell. Although this effort was then in vain, yet in 1666, under Charles II., permission to reside and practice their religion was granted to the Jews. Since that time Jews have become very numerous in England, which was and is to them a real home.

The Reformation opened a new and better era to the Jews. Not that the Reformers, personally, were much more tolerant to them than the Romish Hierarchy, but the very fact that the boasted Unity of the Church had received a serious blow, made people more inclined to toleration. Besides, since the invention of the printing-machine, the Jews had been engaged in publishing beautiful copies of the Hebrew Bible and of the Talmud. This brought their learning into prominence, and some of the leaders of public opinion were more friendly to them. Reuchlin, for instance, stood manfully up for the preservation of the Talmud. Luther, too, owed much to the Jews, for it was chiefly with the help of a Latin translation of Rashi's Commentary to the Old Testament made by Nicholas de Lyra, that he was enabled to translate the Old Testament from the original Hebrew.

The fury of persecution formerly directed against the Jews was now directed against heretics in the bosom of Christianity itself, and while the Jews were left alone, yet the anathema of public contempt, humiliation, and exclusion from every public or private connection, still all lay heavily upon them. Thus the period of 270 years, which intervened between the Reformation and the French Revolution, was of a monotonous character to the Jews, with the exception of a few instances, which attracted public attention. Thus in 1677 the pseudo-Messiah, Sabbathai Levi (born at Smyrna in 1625), died at Belgrade as a Mohammedan. Notwithstanding the apostacy of this pretender there were some who upheld his claims even after his death, and asserted that he was still the true Messiah, and that he was translated to heaven.
Some even of his most inveterate foes while living, espoused his cause after his death. A few years later this heresy appeared under a new form, and under the guidance of two Polish rabbis, who traveled extensively to propagate "Sabbathaism," which had its followers from Smyrna to Amsterdam, and even in Poland. In 1722 the whole sect was solemnly excommunicated in all the synagogues of Europe. In the year 1750, Jacob Frank, a native of Poland, made his appearance, who caused a schism in the synagogues of his native country, and founded the sect of the "Frankists."

The most extraordinary movement which occurred among the Jews in the eighteenth century was that of the sect termed the Chasid\-din, or hyper-orthodox Jews. Contemporary with the rise and progress of this sect there lived in Germany the famous Moses Mendelssohn, born in 1729 at Dessau, a man whose remarkable talents and writings constituted an era in the history of the modern Jews. The influence produced by the writings of Mendelssohn was to destroy all respect for the Talmud and the Rabbinical writers among the Jews who approved his opinions. Mendelssohn died in 1786.
Six years before Mendelssohn's death, Joseph II. had ascended the Austrian throne, and one of his first measures was an edict intended to ameliorate the condition of the Jews. In Austria Proper from the first establishment of the duchy in 1267, they were regarded as belonging to the sovereign of the country. In 1420 and 1460 persecutions broke out against them in Vienna. In 1553, Ferdinand I. had granted them the right to reside in the Austrian capital, but at a later date he expelled them. Maximilian II. recalled them, and Ferdinand II. permitted them, about the year 1620, to erect a synagogue in Vienna. In 1688 an edict appeared signifying the wish that they leave Vienna and the Duchy of Austria entirely; but in 1697 we find that the Jews had gradually returned in large numbers. After the accession of the Empress Maria Theresa their condition improved, and under Joseph II. they enjoyed equal rights and privileges with other subjects. They enjoyed these advantages until after the death of Joseph II. The reactionary spirit then prevailed in Austria, and many privileges were withdrawn.

As in Catholic Austria, so in Protestant Prussia, an amendment in the condition of the Jews began to appear and to develop itself as early as the eighteenth century. Under the Elector of Brandenburgh, Frederick William (1640-1688), the Jews had again an asylum and a safe abode in Prussia. During the reign of King Frederick I. the synagogue at Berlin was built. Frederick William, the father of Frederick the Great, was equally favorable to the Jews, although Frederick the Great is thought not to have looked favorably upon them. He did not persecute them, but, on the whole, they were treated as inferior to the other inhabitants of the country, and the whole community was considered responsible for the crimes of its individual members. The successor of Frederick the Great endeavored by new laws to effect a salutary change for the Jews; the result was, that some of them attained to considerable wealth, but the majority of them retained a degraded and dependent position, which continued till toward the close of the eighteenth century. Mendelssohn, it is true, tried to elevate his people, and to bring about this task he was assisted by such men as Hartwig, Wessely, Isaac Enchel, David Friedländer and others. But the effect produced by his writings was precisely the same as that occasioned by the writings of Maimonides six centuries earlier—to render the Jews dissatisfied with their religion, and to drive them either to the adoption of total infidelity on the one hand, or of Christianity on the other. The latter was the case with his children.

The French Revolution marked a new era in the history of the Jews. Not only the Jews, but also the Christian, or, more properly speaking, the civilized world, had become intoxicated with the idea of reforming everything. Several writers, as Dohm and Grégoire, advocated the regeneration of the Jews, and the French revolution furnished an opportunity of realizing some of their ideas. The Jews had been much neglected or cruelly oppressed, but now a new system of legislation commenced. On September 27, 1791, the French National Assembly declared them citizens of France. On September 2, 1796, a similar decree was passed in Holland.

Napoleon, when in the zenith of his power, perceiving the spirit that was stirring in the Jewish mind, conceived the idea of turning it to his own advantage. He thought that the Jews, existing in considerable numbers in most parts of the world, understanding all languages, possessing great wealth and endowed with talents, might prove useful allies in his plan of universal empire. He undertook the vast project of giving these scattered fragments a center of unity in their long lost, but never forgotten, national council—the Sanhedrin. His idea was that all Jews in the world would obey the Sanhedrin, and that this body, with its seat at Paris and appointed by himself, would be governed by him. He clearly saw that with the old fashioned Jews he could effect nothing. The land of their love was Palestine, their hope the Messiah, and God their legislator. He knew that to them their religion was everything, and his decorations of the Legion of Honor worse than nothing, yea, an abomination. To make use of the Jews it was necessary to reform them, and he perceived in the nation a large party, ready and willing, though upon different principles, to be the agents in effecting this reform. And though Napoleon's intention was to make the decisions of the Sanhedrin the religious law of all the Jews in the world, yet he felt the indecency of legislating for a religious body to which he did not belong. He therefore thought it necessary, at least to preserve an appearance of permitting this body to reform itself. On July 28, 1806, the French Sanhedrin began to sit, and nominated as president, Abraham Furtado, a Portuguese of Bordeaux. After the meetings were fully constituted, and were prepared for the transaction of business, Napoleon appointed commissioners to wait upon them, and to present to them twelve questions, to answer which was to be the first and principal occupation of the Sanhedrin. The answers given by this body were satisfactory to Napoleon, who convened another great Sanhedrin in 1807. To this assembly the Rabbis from various other countries, especially from Holland, were invited, in order that the principles promulgated by the body might acquire general authority among the Jews. The Jews throughout France were at first highly pleased at the interest taken by the emperor in their affairs. But their joy was soon afterward diminished by an edict which he issued in those provinces which bordered on the Rhine, and which restricted the Jews in their commercial affairs. Nevertheless, in Westphalia, Napoleon exerted a favorable influence by supporting the reformatory endeavors of Israel Jacobsohn, who devoted himself to the diffusion of education among his brethren by establishing schools and a seminary for the proper instruction of teachers among them. The same Jacobsohn also undertook a reform in the public worship. The temple which he built at his own expense at Seesen, he furnished with an organ, a choir of the school children, and commenced regular preaching in German. This was the first instance since the destruction of the Temple that instrumental music was introduced into Jewish worship. The Rabbinic Jews regarded the playing upon instruments as a labor, and therefore a desecration of the Sabbath. But the reformed Jews cared little for Rabbinic principles, and hailed this change with enthusiasm. Subsequently temples were built at Berlin, Hamburg, Leipsic, and everywhere.

Beyond the borders of France, the principles set forth by the Sanhedrin found but a faint echo, and soon met with positive opposition, especially in Germany and Holland. It is true, that the French armies at their invasion of the Netherlands in 1795, effected the producing by degrees a complete emancipation of the Jews. Yet, strange as it may appear, the emancipation was received and estimated very differently by the Jews of Holland than by those of France. With a few exceptions, the Jews of Spain and Portugal, who were lovers of monarchy and aristocracy upon principle, and devotedly attached to the House of Orange, cared not for a so-called emancipation, which accorded very little with their political attachments and their religious opinions. Even the Jews of the German and Polish synagogues of Holland were little disposed to exchange their ancient Israelitish nationality, for the new political character offered to them by the Revolution. Only a small number, following the spirit of the age, formed a kind of political association under the title of Felix Libertate, which gave rise to a schism in the synagogue, which lasted till the reign of William I. From this association, the Felix Libertate, which had founded an independent synagogue, three deputies were sent to the Sanhedrin at Paris.

In the new Batavian Republic, founded in 1795, the opinions concerning the political equality of the Jews were divided. There were many admirers of the Revolution of 1789 in France, and that of 1795 in Holland, yet they were restrained by scruples of conscience from wishing for a complete naturalization of the Jews. Finally, however, the contrary opinion prevailed, and the change was made. Under the government, first of Louis Napoleon, and then of the House of Orange, the Jews of Holland became reconciled by degrees to their new political rights. After the restoration of the House of Orange to the government of Holland, the principle of absolute equality among all the inhabitants also remained unaltered.

In Belgium also, the Jews enjoyed equality in the sight of the law. In spite of the new political position of the Jews in Europe, constituting as it does a new epoch in history, the ancient barriers between the Jews and Christians could not be broken down. In Germany, for instance, the entire emancipation of the Jews, which in France had been established, as it were, in a moment, had to struggle for more than thirty years longer. Already before the Revolution of 1789, in the principal states of Germany measures were taken to secure to the Jews some rights, and to amend their condition. The French Revolution, and the influence of the French Imperial Government, considerably aided the cause of the Jews throughout a great part of Germany, especially in Westphalia, with its capital, Frankfort-on-the-Main, and in Prussia. The reign of King Frederick William III. assured to the Jews, by the edict published March 11, 1812, the right and title of Prussian citizens, with some restrictions and conditions.

When the Congress of Vienna, in 1815, settled the affairs of Europe, the sixteenth article imposed upon the Diet an obligation to take the necessary measures for advancing the social improvement of the Jews, and to obtain for, and to secure to them the enjoyment of all civil rights, on condition of their fulfilling the duties connected with them. This proposal met with intense opposition from many quarters. The prejudices against the Jews seemed to be intense, varying in their nature and degree according to the different circumstances of the thirty-eight states into which the Germanic body was divided. In the end the Congress decided to leave the decision of the matter to the legislation of the respective states representing the confederation. When this subject came up subsequently for discussion in the legislative bodies of the several states it was found that three distinct parties existed, who might be termed the Conservative, the Historical, and the Revolutionary. The Conservative party wished to leave things in statu quo; the Historical appealed to history, and insisted upon making progress and improvements in harmony with the necessities of the age. The Revolutionary party, caring for neither history nor religion, insisted upon an entire revolutions of things, in which, amid the cry of universal equality, liberty, and fraternity, the Jew, should secure his equal rights. The most famous of the Revolutionary party was Bruno Bauer, who openly declared he wished not for the emancipation of the Jews, but for their entire destruction and extinction. The King of Prussia, in the spirit of the historical party, published an edict, according to which equality of rights and duties was secured to the Jews, with some exceptions. The year 1848, with its revolutionary principles, effected the full emancipation of the Jews in Germany, and ever since they are found in parliament as well as in universities, in schools as well as in courts, etc. Of late a reaction has taken place against the Jews of Prussia, the end of which cannot yet be foreseen.

In England, Parliament passed in 1753 a bill for the naturalization of the Jews; but in the following year the bill was rescinded. But in 1847 their equality before the law was de-declared. In the Scandinavian countries the Jews enjoy many liberties, but not their absolute emancipation. In Russia the Jewish population have experienced, at different times, various kinds of treatment, and up to this day they undergo many vexations.—As in Russia, the Jews experienced a diversified fate in the territories of the Pontiff, varying according to the peculiar disposition and prejudices of the successive Popes. Under Pius VII. (1816-1825) they enjoyed ample protection and equal franchises; different, however, it was under Leo XII., who reinforced old and obsolete bulls. Under Pius IX., the Ghetto of the Jews at Rome was solemnly and publicly opened, and thus the wall of distinction and separation between Jews and Christians was removed. The Pope's example was followed by Charles Albert in 1848, who proclaimed perfect equality of political rights to the Jews.

In Mohammedan countries—Asiatic and African—the relation between the Jews on the one hand, and the government and people on the other, has progressed in exact proportion that the influence of Christianity and the growth of civilization have exercised on those countries. Still great, however, is the contempt in which Jews and Christians, and more particularly the former, are held by Mohammedan populations. But on the part of the government of the Viceroy of Egypt and of the Sultan of Constantinople, a gradually increasing favor has been exhibited to the Jews. At one time only, in 1840, an accusation was leveled against the Jews in Syria, for having assassinated Father Thomas, who for thirty years had practiced medicine at Damascus, and who, as had been reported, was last seen in the Jewish quarter. A persecution against the Jews took place, scenes of barbarity occurred, till at last the representations of the European governments made an end to the cruelties.

Wherever Jews are to be found at present, they enjoy liberties and privileges. Looking at their religious state in Europe and America, we find the Jews divided into three parties: the strict orthodox, conservative, and reformed, or liberal. In Europe the synagogue has produced a number of learned men, who have enriched oriental literature and other sciences. In America, the land of liberty, the Jews have been less productive.

In our rapid survey we have glanced at the past and present of the Jews. There exist at this day about seven million Jews, scattered all over the globe. "The destinies of this wonderful people, as of all mankind," says Dean Milman, "are in the hands of the All-wise Ruler of the Universe. His decrees will be accomplished, his truth, his goodness, and his wisdom vindicated."
